Please note:
I do not know of a standard 3-character abbreviations for the books of the Bible. For my own convenience (and in this text file) I used the abbreviations below.

For example, if Pastor Wurmbrand referred to John 3:16 in any of his books, you will find "JHN 3:16" in that book;
1 John 3:2 under "1JN 3:2", etc.

(If the columns below appear misaligned, you might have to change to "full window" view and to use a non-proportional font such as Courier or New Courier.)

About

"No contemporary person has meant so much for the opening of the eyes of the West to what is going on in the Communist camp - except the much decried Wurmbrand. Before Wurmbrand came, we spoke to deaf ears."
The Revd Michael Bourdeaux, Director of the Institute for the Study of Religion and Communism, London

"Wurmbrand irritates, but opens our eyes ... Wurmbrand has got the world to hearken, even if he has sacrificed himself. He has shouted the cry of the martyrs."
The Revd Ingemar Martinson, General Secretary of the Slavic Mission, Sweden

"Wurmbrand is an Iron Curtain Paul. He is the most authoritative voice of the Underground Church, more than a living martyr."
~Underground Evangelism~

~Tablet~, New Zealand

"We have checked and can say with almost certainty that there has never been a Pastor Wurmbrand in Romania."
Finnish Communist newspaper

"The manifestations of Wurmbrand are determined by high emotions, they are without compromise and often naive ... His judgements about church politics prove a terrifying narrowness ... The danger of Wurmbrand's grotesque distortions consists in the fact that he calls Christian groups in Eastern Europe to resistance until death ...
Gerhard Simon in ~The Churches in Russia~

"In the present Communist regimes strong powers for the humanization of society lie hidden ... Wurmbrand becomes really dangerous."
Van de Heuwell, then Director of Public Relations, the World Council of Churches

"Pastor Richard Wurmbrand possesses a bordello and nine night clubs in the USA."
From the Soviet Film, ~The Emissaries~, which had as its target the smuggling of religious literature into the USSR, organized by "Jesus to the Communist World"

"Except the Bible, nothing has shaken me like Wurmbrand's ~Tortured For Christ~. It is the message of the century. Even more: since the persecution of Christians by Nero, it is the most powerful Act of Martyrs."
Dr Kurt Koch, renowned German evangelical pastor and author

"Wurmbrand is broadly charitable in his understanding of God's love and the nature of man. Not even an ounce of contentiousness appears in his books. Perhaps the agony of long imprisonment purges that out of a man."
~Alliance Witness~, USA

"Wurmbrand suffered beastly treatment by the Communists, so he has remained with a confused mind. He is not Evangelical, so he cannot be trusted. He is rather a mystic."
A Dutch Christian magazine

"Wurmbrand is intemperate."
~Catholic Herald~, London

"Wurmbrand speaks softly, without flourished comparisons and without dramatic exaggerations ... His concepts of Christianity come from the original sources ... Loud promotion does not correspond to his character.
Richard Wurmbrand is surprisingly near to the Nazarene whom he represents. Weak in health, he catches through unyielding spiritual power. He descends from the podium exhausted and has made his audience ashamed rather than inflamed."

~Christian Vanguard~, USA

"Wurmbrand has been pro-Nazi."

~Tacoma News Tribune~, USA

"Some church leaders in the West attack Pastor Richard Wurmbrand, the leading fighter for the Underground Church, accusing him of lying and exaggerating regarding the atrocities in Communist prisons. I have personally met Christians who sat in prison with Wurmbrand. They told me, 'Not only is everything which Wurmbrand says true, but much, much more. Nobody can describe the ferocious things happening there.'"
Mrs Anutza Moise, author of ~A ransom for Wurmbrand~ in ~Morgenbladet~, Norway

"Reverend Richard Wurmbrand still bears the marks on his body of hideous Communist tortures. He is an internationally respected author, lecturer and evangelist."
~Boston Herald~, USA

"The publicity given Solzhenitsyn has brought to light the truth of Wurmbrand's outspoken statements. Should we not back up Wurmbrand and his Christ-like mission to the Communist world?"
~Reformatio~, Switzerland

"Both Solzhenitsyn and Wurmbrand are giants in modern church history."
~Dagen~, Norway

The following - excerpted from a preface to Pastor Wurmbrand's book, " The Total Blessing," is from Tom White, Director of The Voice of the Martyrs, USA:

The facts about the author are much simpler: He is an ordinary Christian who lived in very unusual circumstances.

He is a pastor of Jewish descent, who served in Romania in Fascist and Communist times. His wife, Sabina, and he were also in jail under Communists, the author for fourteen years, his wife for three. Both parents of his wife, three sisters, a brother and six foster children (they count as foster children only because legal adoption was not possible) were killed in the holocaust.

During his term in jail, he never had any books or writing materials. He could only meditate and have spiritual experiences, favoured by the fact that he spent years in solitary confinement.

After the ordeal, Wurmbrand arrived in the West where he founded an international organization dedicated to helping persecuted churches and families of prisoners. It was founded to be the voice of the martyrs: making known [not only] their suffering, but also their splendid examples of love and heroism.

The organization has its offices in 40 countries and expands its work to 70.

In different countries it works under different names. In the USA it is called "The Voice of the Martyrs." In the UK it has been founded by the Revd Stuart Harris and is named "Release International."

Mr Harris was the first Western pastor to come to Romania in a time of fierce persecution; he met secretly with the author to get first-hand information about the suffering church, and brought its message to Great Britain.

The organization provides churches oppressed by Communism and Islam with God's word and literature in 63 languages, legally where possible. Where this is not possible they introduce books by other ways. In some cases they create, at great risk, secret printing presses within countries with oppressive regimes.

Pastor Wurmbrand wrote much about the suffering churches and missionary problems. This time he has written a book about God and human life. Most of the thoughts contained in this book come from when he was alone in a cell, 30 feet beneath the earth, never, but never, seeing sun, moon, stars, trees, flowers, birds, butterflies. He never saw any other color than grey - the grey of the walls and of the prison uniforms. He never heard a voice except the insults of those who watched him.

So don't wonder if some of these thoughts seem strange. They come from a man who lived a strange life.

Dear Prayer Warriors,

The Lord has granted Richard Wurmbrand the desire of His heart: He is home at peace with Jesus!!! I ask you all a few months ago to pray that God complete all that need to be done to bring our dear father in the Lord home. God has granted is so and on Sat. Feb 17th Pastor Richard Wurmbrand pasted away to be with Jesus and Sabina and so many more.

I believe my life and even all of your prayers are part of Pastor Wurmbrands reward and legacy. If it were not for him I would not understand and love our persecuted brothers and sisters today. If I were not in this work I would not e-mail you the notes of prayer. So in one way or another I think all of us can say we have been impacted by this servant of God.

If I had time today I could write you quotes and storys of Richard Wurmbrand all day long. On a human level, possibly only behind my parents, are Richard and Sabina Wurmbrand in terms of the effect they have had on my life. I will always consider them spiritual parents. So the loss of Pastor Wurmbrand is the loss of a spiritual father. God has prepared me well in that I knew it was time and I have been praying for the homecoming, and I have so many of Richard Wurmbrand's writings to feed upon. Therefore his influence is not gone.

For a beautiful overview and testimony of Pastor Wurmbrand's life please visit the web page http://members-proxy-1.mmbrprxy.home.net/amschl/richardwurmbrand/ I think the time spend reading his story might be worth your time.

I take the staff today who have taken care of Richard Wurmbrand. They are doing well and request your prayers during these busy and emotional days.

I will be at the memorial this weekend if any of you can come I would love to see you.

Until we see him in heaven,
David

REVEREND RICHARD WURMBRAND

Rev. Wurmbrand spent 14 years in Romaninan communist prisons, of which nearly three years in a solitary cell. His life experience was described in several worldwide bestsellers (see biography and funeral announcement below.) From his book In God's Underground comes this description, in a poem, of what he considered to be one of his most important spiritual experiences:

"Alone in the cell, now, I felt Satan’s presence. It was dark and cold, and he was mocking me. The Bible speaks of places "where satyrs dance," and this had become such a place. I heard his voice day and night, " Where's Jesus? Your Savior can't save you You've been tricked, and you'

ve tricked others. He isn't the Messiah?you followed the wrong man" I cried aloud, "Then who is the true Messiah who will come?" The answer was plain, but too blasphemous to repeat. I had written books and articles proving Christ was the Messiah, but now I could not think of one argument. The devils who made Nils Hauge, the great Norwegian evangelist, waver in his faith while in jail, who made even John the Baptist doubt in his dungeon, raged against me. I was weaponless. My joy and serenity were gone. I had felt Christ so close to me before, easing my bitterness, lightening the darkness, but now I cried, "Eli, Eli, lama sabachthani" and I felt utterly forsaken.

"During those black, horrible days, I slowly composed a long poem which may not be easily accepted by those who have not known any similar physical and spiritual state. It was my salvation. By word, rhythm and incantation, I was able to defeat Satan. Here is an unrhymed and unmetrical version which gives the exact meaning of the Rumanian:

From childhood I frequented temples and churches. In them God was glorified. Different priests sang and tensed with zeal. They claimed it right to love You. But as I grew, I saw such deep sorrow in the world of this God that I said to myself, "He has a heart of stone. Otherwise He would ease the difficulties of the way for us." Sick children struggle with fever in hospital: sad parents pray for them. Heaven is deaf. The ones we love go to the valley of death, even when our prayers are long. Innocent men are burned alive in furnaces. And heaven is silent. It lets things be. Can God wonder, if, in undertones, even the believers begin to doubt? Hungry, tortured, persecuted in their own land, they have no answers to these questions. The Almighty is disgraced by the horrors that befall us.
How can I love the creator of microbes and of tigers that tear men? How can I love Him who tortures all his servants because one ate from a tree? Sadder than job, I have neither wife, child nor comforters, and in this prison there is neither sun nor air and the regime is hard to endure.

From my bed of planks they will make my coffin. Stretched upon it, I try to find why my thoughts run to You, why my writings all turn towards You? Why is this passionate love in my soul, why does my song go only to You? I know I am rejected; soon I will putrefy in a tomb.
The bride of the Song of Songs did not love when she asked if You are " rightly loved." Love is its own justification. Love is not for the wise. Through a thousand ordeals she will not cease to love. Though fire burns and the waves drown her, she will kiss the hand that hurts. If she finds no answer to her questions she is confident and waits. One day the sun will shine in hidden places and all will be made plain.

Forgiveness of many sins only increased Magdalene's burning love. But she gave perfume and shed tears before You said Your forgiving word. And had You not said it, still she would have sat and wept for the love she has towards You, even being in sin. She loved You before Your blood was shed. She loved You before You forgave. Neither do I ask if it is right to give You love. I do not love in hope of salvation. I would love You in everlasting misfortune. I would love You even in consuming fire. If You had refused to descend to men, You would have been my distant dream. If You had refused to sow Your word, I would love You without hearing it. If You had hesitated and fled from the Crucifixion, and I were not saved, still I would love You. And even if I found sin in You, I would cover it with my love.

Now I will dare to say mad words, so that all may know how much I love. Now I will touch untouched strings and magnify You with a new music. If the prophets had predicted another, I would leave them, not You. Let them produce a thousand proofs, I will keep my love for You. If I divined that You were a deceiver, I would pray for You weeping and, though I could not follow You in falsehood, it would not lessen my love. For Saul, Samuel passed a life in weeping and severe fasting. So my love would resist even if I knew You lost. If You, not Satan, had risen wrongly in revolt against Heaven and lost the loveliness of wings and fallen like an archangel from high, hopeless, I would hope that the Father would forgive You and that one day You would walk with Him again in the gold streets of Heaven.
If You were a myth, I would leave reality and live with You in a dream. If they proved You did not exist, You would receive life from my love. My love is mad, without motive, as Your love is, too. Lord Jesus, find some happiness here. For more I cannot give you.

When I had completed this poem, I no longer felt the nearness of Satan. He had gone. In the silence I felt the kiss of Christ, and everyone is silent when he is kissed. Quiet and joy returned."

BIOGRAPHY
Rev. Richard Wurmbrand, 91, author of 18 worldwide Christian bestsellers, translated in over 70 languages mostly describing his 14 years of communist imprisonment, was born the youngest of four boys, in a Jewish family in Bucharest, Romania. Shortly thereafter, the father, a dentist established a practice and moved the family to Istanbul, Turkey. Upon the death of the father from a flu epidemic in 1919, the now extremely poor family returned to Romania. Richard, intellectually gifted, fluent in 9 languages, had a stormy youth, was active in leftist politics and working as a stockbroker when marrying Sabina in 1936. Same year, the Jewish couple met during a vacation in the Romanian mountains, a German carpenter who placed a Bible into their hands. Hardly having any education and unable to answer their questions, this carpenter did not do much more than urge these two young, educated, Jewish intellectuals to just take the time and read at least one of the Gospels, in essence a short biography of the most famous personality of the Jewish people, Jesus Christ. Sabina and Richard meeting also other Jewish-Christians converted and were baptized. They joined the church of the Anglican Mission to the Jews in Bucharest, Romania. Eventually studying on his own, Richard a charismatic speaker, was first ordained as an Anglican and then after WW II re-ordained as a Lutheran minister. Their only son, Michael was born in 1939.

Due to Romania's declaration of war against England and the other Western Powers, at the beginning of WWII, the foreign Anglican minister had to leave Romania. Rev. Richard Wurmbrand and his wife Sabine, without thought to family or possessions, continued unafraid and without respite an intense illegal missionary Christian work. They smuggled numerous Jewish children out of ghettos, preached daily in many bomb shelters and ended up arrested many times for underground Christian activities during a state of war. At least one time they were a few hours away from being sentenced to be shot by a military Romanian tribunal, which had no patience or understanding for two Jews turned Christian and their other Jewish-Christian followers conducting such underground activities while Romania was at war. The Wurmbrands, loved and respected by many Romanian Orthodox Christian personalities though, escaped only through the intervention of the chief editor of Romania's main newspaper of the time. Sabine's parents, two sisters and a brother perished in Nazi massacres. Also killed by Romanian Nazi Legionnaires in Romania was Isaac Feinstein, an influential Jewish Christian missionary to the Romanian Jews who was the main factor in the conversion of the Wurmbrands. Their lives during that period was described in Wurmbrand’s book, Christ on the Jewish Road.

In the short period after the end of WWII and the transformation of Romania into a communist state (1945-1947) Rev. Wurmbrand printed and organized the surreptitious distribution of one million Russian Gospels to the Russian troops that occupied Romania. He pastored a church of 1, 000, mostly made of Jewish converts. In February 1948 Rev. Richard Wurmbrand, though under Swedish diplomatic protection, was kidnapped from the street by the Communist government and disappeared in the Communist prison system. In preparation for a show trial he was kept under a secret name for nearly 3 years in a solitary cell, underwent tortures and was sentenced to 25 years of prison as an enemy of the communist state. The show trial was never held as he resisted all tortures to make him confess imagined crimes. He spent 14 years in Communist prisons in two periods, 1948-1956 and 1959-1964. He succeeded to convert to the Christian faith high-ranking secret police officers who helped his eventual release. His wife, Sabina was also imprisoned in a slave-labor camp for 3 years. In 1964 the communist government allowed him and his family be ransomed for $10,000 by Norwegian Christians. His books Tortured for Christ and In God’s Underground

The events that gave him worldwide recognition in the Western World have not been gathered before in any book and therefore are narrated here.

The Wurmbrands arriving in December 1965 in Oslo, Norway,and not understanding Norwegian, visited their first Sunday the American Lutheran Church. Impressed by the freedom of worship they cried uncontrollably during the entire service. Rev. Myrus Knutson, the minister of the church, from deep compassion opened generously his home to the refugee family while checking through the US embassy government connections on the veracity of this refugee's strange accounts of suffering and torture. His contacts answered, "fully reliable" and so Rev. Wurmbrand was invited to speak at the largest NATO base chapel meeting in Oslo. The meeting being opened for questions, Colonel-Chaplain Cassius Sturdy asked Pastor Wurmbrand why the West should or not try and coexist with communism? Wurmbrand, always dramatic in his behavior, quickly stepped off the podium, snatched the colonel's wallet from his pocket and replied," I took your money, your money is in my pocket. Let's coexist!" He replied further that of course communism wants to coexist once it had occupied half the globe. There might be no solution for cancer but no one has decided to coexist with cancer and thus an accommodation with communism is not possible. Every thief would like to coexist with the police but this is unacceptable. Colonel Sturdy stood up on the spot and said, "Gentlemen, let's send this man to America to snatch the wallets from all leftist and open their eyes." Indeed, a collection was taken on the spot and Rev. Wurmbrand was organized an itinerary within a month with speaking engagements mostly in the Eastern United States.

Arrived alone in New York most meetings were small military chapel gatherings and Rev. Wurmbrand scheduled immediately his return for lack of any success. He went though to Philadelphia to visit the only friend he knew, a Jewish-Christian minister. This minister discouraged him from trying to stay in the United States as he was too old and to feeble to pastor a church, and, "you will not be able to raise a salary" were his final words. He asked the minister to show him a little bit Philadelphia. It so happened that the biggest anti-Vietnam rally was that day underway at which a Presbyterian minister was the main pro-left speaker. Stopping out of curiosity to listen Rev. Wurmbrand, 6'3" went straight for the microphone, shouting, "you know nothing of communism, I am a doctor in communism. You should be on the side of communism's victims instead of defending their torturers." "How could you be a doctor in communism?" was the sarcastic reply. "Here are my credentials," answered Wurmbrand, taking off his shirt to show deep torture scars on his torso. The police took Wurmbrand away asking him to get dressed, yet it was enough for newspaper people to take dramatic photographs and ask for interviews. Next day in nearly all major newspapers in the United States, and some abroad, on page one were pictures of the minister who showed his torture scars and request for interviews and speaking engagements poured in so that Rev. Wurmbrand had to postpone his return and prolong by 1 ½ month his stay in the States. He had to return for another 3 months speaking tour. In May 1966 he testified before the U. S. Senate's Internal Security Subcommittee. His testimony became the US Government most sold publication in the following three years. Together with the family he immigrated to the United States in November of 1966.

Once in the States the Wurmbrand family started Christian Missions to the Communist World, presently Voice of the Martyrs, Inc. (based in Bartlesville, Ok., General Director Tom White) a world wide organization having as its aim to help Christians persecuted by communist regimes, evangelize leftist and having also an important thrust presently, after the fall of communism in Russia, in Arab countries. The mission has branches in over 35 countries in the Free World. The organization activities and Rev. Wurmbrand speaking in many countries effectively drew the attention of the world to the plight of their fellow forgotten Christian brethren. Wurmbrand's message at all times: "Hate the evil systems, but love the persecutors and try to win them to Christianity." Profound faith, sharp thinking and quick wit combined to give him a warm personality. His principle, "help anyone and give to anyone who arrived to ask from you, even you can help or give only a little." Christian Leaders around the world have called him a living martyr and " the Iron Curtain Paul." Rev. Wurmbrand spoke in practically most countries of the Free World, conducted many influential televised interviews. An example would be an amazing 1 1/2 hour appearance with Madelaine Murray O'Hare, the outspoken atheist, that left her literally speechless. Wurmbrand not initially invited to the interview asked from the audience, "I have travelled throughout the world and saw many charitable works like Christian hospitals, Jewish orphanages, even Buddhist nursing homes. Could you give me an example of any atheistic charitable establishment?" Ms. O'Hare remained silent for over 3 minutes, upon which Allan Burke, the moderator invited Rev. Wurmbrand into the debate. Unfortunately, O'Hare did not agree to the subsequent release-publication of the videotape.

Unknown yet in the Free World are theological works already translated and to be published by the VOM organization, Wurmbrand wrote before him being imprisoned under communism. A few of his sermons appeared as " Sermons in Solitary Confinement."

Rev. Wurmbrand kept speaking and actively traveling way past 85. Rev Wurmbrand was confined for the last five years, to a bed due to severely advancing leg neuropathy contracted during his 3 years of solitary confinement when he was obliged to stand interminable hours and being kept close to starvation. He died 2/17/01 of respiratory failure. His wife Sabina died 8/17/00. He is survived by his son, Michael.

Visitation and Testimonial Services will take place on Friday, 2/23/2001 at 7PM in the Memorial Chapel, entrance through Gate 1, and Saturday, 2/24/01, 1PM in the Hillside Chapel, Gate 17, at the Rose Hill Cemetery, 3888 Workman Mill Rd, in Whittier, CA. 90601 (phone: 562 699-0921; fax: 562 699-6372; http://rosehills.com). The Grave is located in the Garden of Meditation, the first plot behind the funeral building, right by the entrance.

COMMUNIST EXPLOITATION OF RELIGION
Congressional Testimony of REV. RICHARD WURMBRAND
HEARING Before the Subcommittee to Investigate the Administration of the Internal Security Act and Other Internal Security Laws, of the Committee on the Judiciary, Washington, D.C.

UNITED STATES SENATE
EIGHTY-NINTH CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION

Friday, May 6, 1966
The subcommittee met, pursuant to call, at 10:20 a.m., in room 18, Old Senate Office Building, Senator Thomas J. Dodd presiding. Also present: Jay G. Sourwine, chief counsel; Benjamin Mandel, director of research; Frank W. Schroeder, chief investigator; and Robert C. McManus, investigations analyst.

Senator Dodd: I will call this hearing to order. We have as our witness today Pastor Richard Wurmbrand, who is a refugee from Rumania. Mr. Sourwine will introduce and read a copy of Dr. Wurmbrand's credentials.

I must say, before you do so, that we are grateful for your appearing here. I am familiar with the nature of your testimony -- I think I am -- to an extent. I feel that you are rendering a real service to the cause of the free world.

Go ahead, Mr. Sourwine.

Mr. Sourwine: Mr. Chairman, this letter of credentials, which I shall read pursuant to your instructions, was given to Dr. Wurmbrand by Dr. Hedenquist, who is the mission director of the Svenska Israels missionen. The reason is explained the text. It reads:
"Pastor Richard Wurmbrand is a refugee from Rumania, a country which he had to leave because of the antireligious persecution. Fleeing from there, he has not the usual credentials, which have been taken from him at his arrest by the secret police of the Communists....

"During the whole war he has been pastor of our mission in Rumania. Since our mission retired from Rumania in 1945, from that year to 1948 he has been a pastor of the Norwegian mission to the Jews....

"He was also a professor of the Old Testament in the Seminary of Bucharest.

"From 1948 to 1956, he was in prison for religious motives. Released in 1956, he was no more authorized by the Communist authorities to fulfill his duties. From 1956 to 1959 he preached and exercised his other pastoral functions illegally.

"Rearrested for this in 1959, he was again in prison until July 1964, when he was released on the basis of a general amnesty.

"Since 1964, he was pastor of the Evangelical Church in Orshova, a Rumanian town.

"Continuing to be the object of persecution and being in great danger, our Scandinavian mission to the Jews succeeded to make him escape from three.

"We recommend him as a most reliable person, a fine Christian who has published several books against atheism and communism and who has got a burning heart for Christ and for all people in need.
This is signed by Dr. Hedenquist, doctor of theology, mission director in Sweden for Svenska Israels missionen.

Reverend Wurmbrand: He is the former secretary of the World Council of Missions.

Senator Dodd: Without objection, this letter will be included in the record. Since it has been read, it will not be reprinted.

Mr. Sourwine, you may proceed. I have some questions which I might as well ask to begin with, rather than wait until later.
Pastor, how many languages do you speak?

Reverend Wurmbrand: ...Something like 14.

Senator Dodd: Obviously, you speak English.

Reverend Wurmbrand: Yes; English, French, German Hungarian, and so on.

Senator Dodd: Did you come directly from Rumania?

Reverend Wurmbrand: No, no; from Rumania I went to Italy; from Italy to Oslo, and then from Europe I came to the States.

Senator Dodd: From where?

Reverend Wurmbrand: From Paris.

Senator Dodd: When was that?

Reverend Wurmbrand: I came to the States 3 weeks ago.

Senator Dodd: Were you required by the secret police to make any commitments before you could leave Rumania?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Before I left Rumania I was called twice to the secret police. The first time they said that they don't know yet if they will allow me to leave the country with my family. They said: "Dollars have been received for you. You will have to leave the country, but perhaps we will let some time to pass, because your remembrances of prison are too fresh and you have too good a pen."

Senator Dodd: What?

Reverend Wurmbrand: A pen. "You can too well write. Perhaps we will keep somebody here of your family as hostage." The second time they called me again and they said: 'Now you will leave the country, but be very cautious when you come out. You may preach Christ as much as you like. We know that you are a preacher, but don't touch us. Don't speak against Communists. If you will speak against communism, for $1,000 we can find a gangster who will liquidate you. We play with you with open cards. You come from prison. You have met in prison men whom we have brought back from the West."

And that is the truth. I have been in prison with a Rumanian Orthodox priest, Vasile Leul, who has been kidnapped from Austria. I have seen his nail torn out and broken, and so they reminded me of that. "You know how our prisons are and that you can come back in prison."

And the third thing which they said: "We have also another possibility with you. We can destroy you morally outside. We will find story with a girl or a money story or something else and people will be stupid enough to believe it. We will destroy you if you touch us."

And under these conditions I was allowed to come out. And very sorrowfully in the West I found people in the West, even religious leaders, who told me the same thing: "Preach Christ as much as you like but don't touch Communists."

Senator Dodd: As I understand it, you said you came to this country 3 weeks ago. ...

Reverend Wurmbrand: One month today.

Senator Dodd: Were you in prison from 1948 to 1956?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Yes, and then imprisoned again in January 1959 to 1964.

Senator Dodd: Were you in the same prison all of that time?

Reverend Wurmbrand: No, no; we were transferred from one prison to the others.

Senator Dodd: From 1956 to 1959 as I understand it, you exercised your religious function in spite of the law against such activity, did you not?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Yes, yes.

Senator Dodd: How did you do this?

Reverend Wurmbrand: When I came out from prison in 1956, I was licensed to preach - of course, nobody can preach in our country accept he has a license from the Government - and in the beginning I got a license, but which was withdrawn from me after the first week of preaching.

The motives are so comical you would say. In a sermon I said that Christians must keep hope, because of the wheel of history turns....

"You meant us, that communism will change, that communism will fall. Never will it fall." It has been reproached to me that in a sermon I have said Christians must practice patience, patience, and again patience. "Ah, you meant that the Americans will come and we must be patient until they come."

Everything was misinterpreted, and so the license has been withdrawn from me. And then generally in the Soviet countries there exists the underground church which works as the first Christians worked. Only now we understand texts of the bible which we had not understood before. I did not know why it is written in the Bible that a man named Simon was called Peter. Simeon was called Niger and so on. Everyone is called otherwise than his mother called him. So it is with us now. In every village I was called by another name. I was called Valentin, Georgescu, Ruben. In every village I had another name, and so I could preach.

I did not understand in earlier times why Jesus, when He wishes to have the last supper said: "Go in town and you will see a man with a pitcher and go after him and where he enters prepare the supper."

Why does he not give an address, a number, and a street? Now we know it when we make secret prayer meetings. We never give the address. We don't know if that man is not the informer of the secret police. We tell to the main to wait in a public garden or somewhere, and when one with a flower here, or with a necktie passes, go after him. We don't introduce ourselves to each other, and if somebody asks the name of the other one, we know that he is the informer of the secret police. And so we have developed a technique of secret church work and so I could work.

Senator Dodd: How did you keep alive.? How did you sustain yourself?

Reverend Wurmbrand: The Christians sustained me everywhere. I had no salary, I had no regular salary but the Christians everywhere sustained me. In Rumania the first question asked of a pastor or a priest of any denomination, is: Has he been in prison? If he has been in prison he is all right. All the Christians sustain him.

Senator Dodd: You were rearrested in 1959, as I understand it.

Reverend Wurmbrand: Yes

Senator Dodd: Were you kept in the same prison until your release in 1964?

Reverend Wurmbrand: No. Then, also, I was in several prisons.

Senator Dodd: Could you describe for us the cell in which you were kept in solitary confinement?

Reverend Wurmbrand: There were different cells. In solitary confinement I was the first 2, nearly 3 years. It was in the most beautiful building of Bucharest in the building of the Secretariat of State for Internal Affairs. It is a building before which all foreigners stand and admire it. I can tell you that your White House is a very little building in comparison with ours. And there, beneath the earth, 10 meters beneath the earth, are the cells. There are no windows in the cells. Air enters through a tube. And there were a few desks with a mattress, with a straw mattress. You had but three steps for to walk. Never were we taken out from these cells except for interrogations when prisoners were beaten and tortured.

For years I have never seen sun, moon, flowers, snow, stars, no man except the interrogator who beat, but I can say I have seen heaven open, I have seen Jesus Christ, I have seen the angles and we were very happy there.

But the treatment was very bad. The purpose was to make us mad. You didn't hear a noise. A whisper you didn't hear in this cell. The guard had felt shoes. For years, not to hear anything. In all these years of prison we never had a book, we never had a but of paper, we never had a newspaper, nothing to distract our mind except that from time to time tape recorders were put on the corridor. I didn't know what a tape recorder is. I had not seen such a thing.

But at once we heard beautiful Rumanian music, and then we enjoyed it. We didn't know what has happened with the Communists that they make us enjoy, and after 10 or 15 minutes at once you heard, "Ha, ha, ha don't beat," the torturing of a woman. This lasted for half an hour the torturing of a woman. And of 100 prisoners who had been in that cell, in that corridor, everybody recognized that it is his wife or that it is his girl. I myself thought also that it is my wife.

Never will a Westerner understand, if I would not have the mark on my body, which are my credentials.

Senator Dodd: Excuse me, never will who understand? ...

Reverend Wurmbrand: A Westerner can't understand God is here and knows that I will not tell you the while truth because if I will tell you the while truth, you will faint and rush out of this room, not bearing to hear what things have happened. But I will tell you that in a prison they crucified a cat before ourselves.

They beat nails in the feet of the cat and the cat was hanging with the head down, and can you imagine how this cat screamed and the prisoners, mad, bead on the door, "Free the cat, free the cat, free the cat," and the Communists very polite, "Oh, surely we will free the cat, but give the statements which we ask from you and then the cat will be freed," and I have known men who have given statements against their wives, against their children, against their parents to free the cat.

They did it out of madness, and then the parents and the wives have been tortured like the cat. Such things have happened with us.

Senator Dodd: Did you have any fellow Christians like you imprisoned?

Reverend Wurmbrand: We had hundreds of bishops, priests, monks in prisons; my wife who is near me, she has been with Catholic nuns. My wife tells that they were angels; such have been put in prisons. Nearly all Catholic bishops died in prison. Innumerable Orthodox and Protestants have been in prison, too.

Senator Dodd: The point I was getting at - and I guess I did not make it clear - where the Christians treated any differently or mistreated any differently?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Everybody in prison was very badly treated. And I cannot be contradicted on this question, because I have been with physicians, I have much more broken bones than anybody, so either I broke my bones or somebody else broke them. And if I would not have been a clergyman but a murderer - it is a crime to torture a murderer, too.

The Christian prisoners were tortured in a form which should mock their religion. I tell you again in the prison of Pitesti one scene I will describe you about torturing and mocking Christians, and believe me I would renounce to eternal life to paradise after which I long, if I tell you one word of exaggeration. God is here and knows that I do not say everything. It cannot be said. There are ladies here. There are other people hearing it.

One Sunday morning in the prison of Pitesti a young Christian was already the fourth day, day and night, tied to the cross. Twice a day the cross was put on the floor and 100 other cell inmates by beating, by tortures, were obliged to fulfill their necessities upon his face and upon his body. Then the cross was erected again and the Communists swearing and mocking "Look your Christ, look your Christ, how beautiful he is, adore him, kneel before him, how fine he smells, your Christ."

And then the Sunday morning came and a Catholic priest, an acquaintance of mine, has been put to the belt, in the dirt of a cell with 100 prisoners, a plate with excrements, and one with urine was given to him and he was obliged to say the holy mass upon these elements, and he did it. And I asked him afterward, "Father, but how could you make this?"

He was half mad. He answered to me: "Brother, I have suffered more than Christ. Don't reproach to me what I have done." And the other prisoners beaten to take holy communion in this form, and the Communists around, "Look, your sacraments, look, your church, what a holy church you have, what fine is your church, what holy ordinance God has given you."

I am very insignificant and a very little man. I have been in prison among the weak ones and the little ones, but I speak for a suffering country and for a suffering church and for the heroes and the saints of the 20th century; we have had such saints in our prison to which I did not dare to lift my eyes....

Senator Dodd: Now, did the Rumanian secret police employ brainwashing techniques?

Reverend Wurmbrand: The worst thing has been the brainwashing. All the tortures of times before were nothing in comparison with brainwashing.

To describe very shortly brainwashing: First of all we were doped. The dope was put in our food. I did not know about this dope. But we saw only the results, a dope which gave two results. First of all, what the physician calls aleulia which means lack of power of will. The power of will was completely broken. If we were told, "Lift your hand," I lifted it. If I was not told to let the hand down, I would never have left it down.

We were at the same time very much undernourished. We had times when we received 100 grams, one slice of bread, a week. It was told to us, "We give you as many calories as you need to be able to breathe only, " and so our power of will has been broken.

Second, this drug or perhaps it is another drug, produces the delirium of self-accusation. I have seen prisoners knocking during the night on the door and saying, "Take me to the interrogator, I have new things to say against me." Prisoners quarreled with their interrogators to say against themselves more than the interrogators asked from them.

And then we have had in prisons the curious phenomenon that we as priests received confessions from other prisoners. Now everybody is a sinner, but not everybody is a criminal. Men who have never murdered confessed that they have murdered, that they have committed adultery, that they have stolen. They felt they had to accuse themselves. This has also been the result of doping.

And after we were doped like that - that is the secret of all the Soviet show trials, in which the prisoners accuse themselves - then the time of brainwashing came. For 17 hours a day from 5 in the morning to 10 in the evening we had to sit like this. We were not allowed to lean. We were not allowed to rest a little bit our weary heads upon our hands. To close your eyes was a crime. Seventeen hours a day we had to sit like that and hear from the morning to the evening: "Communism is good, communism is good, communism is good, communism is good," until you heard one who was already 20 years in prison under the Communists shouting, "Communism is good, communism is good, communism is good, I give my life for communism."

It was after the technique of Professor Pavlov, a scientific suggestion.

In prison there were not only priests and pastors. We have had hundreds of peasants and young boys and girls who were put in prison for their Christian faith. These were separated and for them there was a special brainwashing, not only that "communism is good," but "Christianity is dead, Christianity is dead, Christianity is dead. Nobody more believes in Christ, nobody more believes in Christ, you are the only fools."

And so on. And I must tell you that you may know how far this brainwashing went. I do not like to pose here like a hero. I believed that Christianity is dead under this influence. I believed -

Senator Dodd : I did not hear that.

Reverend Wurmbrand: I believed that Christianity is dead under this suggestion. Nobody goes more to church. They gave us post cards. I have not seen my wife for 10 years. They gave me post cards, they gave to all of us post cards: "Write to your children and wife; they may come and on that day see you and bring your parcels," so on that day we were shaved; we expected and expected until the evening and nobody came. They had not sent the post cards, but we did not know.

Then came the brainwashings. "Your wives are laying in bed with men, " obscene words, "Your children hate you. You have nobody to love in the world. You are the only fools. Give up faith. Nobody is more Christians. Christianity is dead."

I believed also that nobody is more a Christian. I had read in the Bible that there will be in the last time the great apostasy, that people will leave the faith and I believed that I lived now this time. But I said to myself if Christianity is dead, I will sit at its tomb and will weep until it arises again, just as Mary Magdalene sat at the tomb of Jesus and wept until Jesus showed Himself. Then when I came out of prison I saw Christianity is not dead. The number of practicing Christians in Rumania according to the figures given by the Communists themselves in 20 years of Communist dictatorship has grown 300 percent.

Senator Dodd: How do the Communists use religion for their own purposes if they do?

Reverend Wurmbrand: That is a very tragic side. The worse thing in Rumania has not been the persecution of Christians. The persecution has make the Christians to be of steel. The worst thing has been the corruption of religion. They have put as religious leaders their man. A bishop, a pastor, a preacher, just a man like other man and can commit sins. Now if they found a preacher or somebody else in adultery or in some money irregularity or I do not know what sin, they called him and blackmailed him and said, "Now you must become our man. Otherwise we publish what we have found." Or they found others who were weak ones, whom they promised I do not know what. They never keep their promises. And these men, they put at the leadership of religion everywhere.

They have their bishops, their bishop vicar, their professors of theology, their presidents of the Baptists and Pentecostals and so on. I could give names. I know this from firsthand. Because many of these, when we came out of prison, out of remorse confessed to us what they have done. And now they use these men. With us in Rumania religion is a very great thing. You do not find much religious difference in Rumania. By these weak Christians, the Communists used religion for their propaganda.

When the Communists came to power in Rumania, they convoked in the building of our parliament a congress of all the cults. There were 4,000 priests; pastors, rabbis of all religions were there. Our Prime Minister Gorza, said the same things which you hear now in the West. This was in 1945 when they came to power with us. "You know Rumanian communism will not be like Russian communism. We are a democratic communism. We will not persecute the church. We are on the side of monarchy. We will never collectivate agriculture. We are something entirely else and you should be on our side and then we will protect religion and we will give salaries to the priests."

And the priests, good men, simply believed him and cheered him. Priests and bishops one after the other stood up and said, "Well, if your communism is otherwise than the Russian communism, if it will be a good communism, we do not object against communism in principle." And one after the other stood up and praised this form of communism. There was only one in that congress who protested and said that communism can never change, that terror is an essential part of communism, because communism is contrary to human nature....

But what has happened? I went to prison, this was one of the charges against me. I met in prison all those who had praised communism, all those who have collaborated with communism, and they were treated just like me. They had been the fools. There was only one difference that I was in prison with a good conscience and they were with a bad conscience. In prison they had remorse. Religion was used for Communist propaganda in our country.

Just to give you one example: To the Orthodox Church of Rumania foreigners come and see the liturgy and see everything so beautiful. The church is open. They do not understand the language, they do not know what is preached. I will give you the test of the sermon. It was a sermon about an epistle of St. Paul where it was written that Chris is our peace , and so the priest explained, "Christ is our peace. Who is against peace? American imperialists. And who is on the side of the peace? We, the Socialist countries."

So you see that Christ identifies Himself with socialism and so on. Such sermons they have. They have used the religion for their own purposes in the country. Then they have used the religion for getting political positions in the West. They are not fools to send in the West representatives of the Communist Party. They send bishops with great beards and beards are always very impressive here in the West, and through these beards they influence the West.

Senator Dodd: I have many more questions, but would you show your wounds and scars, if you have some?

Reverend Wurmbrand: I apologize here before the ladies.

Senator Dodd: Take your time. If ever a man was entitled to time, I think you are.

Senator Dodd: What is the scar behind your ear?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Here they put the knife and said, "Give accusatory statement against your bishops and against the other pastors. Do you give or not? And they cut. It is true that they did not cut very deeply.

Senator Dodd: These are all knife wounds?

Reverend Wurmbrand: They tortured by all means. They beat until they broke the bones. They used red-hot irons, they used knives, they used everything. And what was the firs thing is not they beat, not what they did, but how they did it. They interrogated you very politely, and if you did not wish to say what they asked they said, "Well, we have the first. On the 15th you will be beaten and tortured at 10 o'clock in the evening."

Imagine what 14 days were after this. We have had prisoners who during this time, which has been given to them, knocked at the door, "I can't bear it. I will say everything," before they have been tortured.

Senator Dodd: I wish you would turn around before you put your shirt on.

Reverend Wurmbrand: And that it may be very clear, it is not that I boast with these marks. I show to you the tortured body of my country, of my fatherland, and of my church, and they appeal to the American Christians and to all freemen of America to think about our tortured body, and we do not ask you to help us. We ask you only one thing. Do not help our oppressors and do not praise them. You cannot be a Christian and praise the inquisitors of Christians. That is what I have to say.

Senator Dodd: All right. You may put on your clothes. That scar on your right breast, do you remember how that was inflicted?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Yes; by knife.

Senator Dodd: By knife?

Reverend Wurmbrand: By knife. I have been in Oslo. I went to a hospital. There were several physicians. I can give their names. I spoke with them about religion. In the beginning they said, "We are atheists," and then they saw my body and I asked them what treatment do I need. They said: " About treatment, do not ask us. Ask only the one in whom we don't believe, but who has kept you alive, because according to our medical books, you are dead. A man who has what you have, with four vertebras broken, cannot live. According to our medical books, you are dead. If you are alive, then the one in whom we don't believe has kept you alive." ...

I have been not the worst tortured. The proof is that I am alive. So many died. Nearly all our Catholic bishops have been so handled that they have died, and in that time the Russians were in our country, they decided that the Catholic bishops should be killed. One of the members of the Government has been Gromyko, one of the murderers of Christians. . ..

Senator Dodd: You saw and heard this yourself.

Reverend Wurmbrand: ...I must just pour out before you my heart. I speak for a country and I speak for a church. We are very, very sad there about all these compromises. I must tell you I have been in England before I came to the States, and I have spoken with high Christian officials from England. The Archbishop of Canterbury and many canons and so on have been in our country recently, last year. So I asked Christian leaders - I will not tell names - "Why have you sat at banquets with our inquisitors? I am a little pastor, I cannot interrogate you, but I speak for the others who cannot speak for themselves. "Why have you sat at banquets with our inquisitors?"

I was answered, "We are Christians and must have friendship and fellowship with everybody, with the Communists, too. Don't you agree?"

I said, "I can't polemicize with you. I have not read the Bible for 14 years. You must know Christianity better than I. Faintly I remember in the Bible it is written that friendship with the world is hatred toward God. But supposing you must have friendship and fellowship with everybody. How is it that you have had friendship and fellowship only with our inquisitors, and with us never?"

Never have these great men of the West been in the houses of Christian martyrs. I have an only son and I love him. I cannot look to him. He looks like a skeleton. He has hungered. He will never be healthy. And so many of our children died. All these great relates from the West are great men. I am very little in comparison with them. But I always asked myself, "Well, all right, make friendship with the Communists. But only with the Communists?" They never inquired about us.

I asked them, "Why did you go to see the Pope, who is all right, who does not need your visit?" "When you have been in Rumania why have you not visited the tombs of the Catholic bishops killed in tortures? Why have you not shed there a tear? Why have you not put there a flower? That is what we expected. Why have you not left 10 pounds? Ten pounds would have been the salvation of a Catholic family there. You go to see the Pope. The Pope is all right. He has to eat and to drink." But I must say we are very sad there about these compromises with communism. We do not understand. I am a man who does not understand politics. I have not read newspapers for 14 years.

It may be right for a state to have peaceful existence with communism. I do not know. That is a question for Johnson and Goldwater to decide. But the church can never have peaceful coexistence with atheism. Everybody would laugh if I would say that health can peacefully exist with the microbe of tuberculosis, that the FBI can coexist peacefully with gangsters, that the church can peacefully exist with drunkenness, but communism and atheism is much worse than drug addiction and drunkenness. You drink a little wine and the next day it passes, but communism poisons youth and our children since 50 years. How can there be peaceful existence with this on the side of churchmen and the church leadership I cannot understand.

I must say I have been very sad. I have read in your periodicals that, I do not know why, church bodies here ask the admission of Red China in the organization of allied nations. It may be right. I do not know politics. I do not know what this organization of allied nations is, but I ask myself, "You, a church periodical, why don't you write about the tortures inflicted to Chinese Christians by the communists? That is your business and leave the business of politics to the Senate and like this."

I express here the grief and the great pain of a suffering country and of a suffering church, and I apologize if I am a little unpolite. ...

Mr. Sourwine: You were being questioned by the Rumanian secret police, were you not?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Yes.

Mr. Sourwine: When you say they wanted to know how they could win the World Council of Churches for their purposes, did you mean for the purposes of Rumania?

Reverend Wurmbrand: No, no, no; for the purposes of communism, for the purposes of the whole Communist world.

Mr. Sourwine: In other words, the Rumanian secret police are, in your opinion at least, just like any other communist secret police?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Sure, there is no difference at all, and our interrogations, if they were important ones as mine, they went to Moscow. I know it from the Orthodox priest, Vasile Leon, who has been kidnapped from Austria and he has been brought to Moscow. In Moscow he has been interrogated about me. In Moscow they knew everything about Rumania. They worked hand in hand. At that time the secret Rumanian police had Soviet advisers.

Mr. Sourwine: I think you have touched on this, but can you perhaps give us a little more on the subject? What has been the policy and practice of the communists with respect to religion in countries where they have come into power?

Reverend Wurmbrand: They used three great instruments.
1. First of all, the persecution, to make everybody afraid. They never accepted that they have put anybody in prison for religious motives. They found always political motives. Now I will give you the political motives. ...

"...a pastor, was sentenced to 15 years in prison. He was one of the greatest saints whom I have ever seen in life. The charge against him was he preached on a Sunday morning in a village about John 21 where it is said that the Lord walked on the seashore and he saw the apostles and asked them, "Have you something to eat?" They said, "We have not," and then Jesus said, "Throw your nets on the right side."

So the pastor preached from the pulpit. He asked, "Have you something to eat?" And when he asked, "Have you something to eat?" Everybody began to weep, because with us, peasants have nothing to eat. After the collectivization of agriculture our peasants have nothing to eat. Peasant children do not see milk and fruit. Everything goes to the collective and from the collective perhaps to Vietnam. Nobody knows where it goes. Our population does not see. They began to weep because they had nothing to eat and then the pastor, not knowing in what world he is, said, "Dear children, you have nothing to eat because you throw your nets on the left side. You must throw them on the right side." He meant the side of the clemency and of the goodness of God.

The next day there was the secret police, "Aha, you have said not to go to the left-wing with the communists but with the right side, the imperialists." The man got 15 years of prison.

So there has been, first of all, this method of persecution. There has been, 2. secondly, the method of corruption. We live in the times of the abomination of the desolation of the holy places.... For the first time in church history the leadership of churches is dominated by the central committee of an avowed atheistic power. The central committee of the party decides who must be patriarch, who must be Baptist preacher, Pentecostal preacher, and so on. Everywhere they have found weak men or women with some sin. Those they have put in the leadership of churches and so you could hear in our theological seminary in Bucharest the theology that God has given three revelations - once through Moses, second through Jesus, the third through Karl Marx, and so on.

Religion is corrupted from within. Religion has been widely used and is still as the tools of communist politics. The priests everywhere had to propagate the collectivization of agriculture and everywhere when communists have something important to do, knowing the influence of religion, priests and pastors are put to preach these things.

Mr. Sourwine: Have the communists shown themselves to be opposed only to Christianity, or to all religions?

Reverend Wurmbrand: To all the religions. The Jewish religion has been persecuted just as the Christian religion. In the prison of Gherla we had a whole room with rabbis who were in prisons. We had in prison the Moslem priests and so on.

Mr. Sourwine: Did they segregate the rabbis in one room

Reverend Wurmbrand: Yes.

Mr. Sourwine: The Christians in another, and --

Reverend Wurmbrand: No, no, they were at a time kept with us, but the rabbis, because they had to respect certain dietary laws and the Sabbath and so on, they separated them in order not to provoke collision with other prisoners.

...Senator Dodd: Were the rabbis subjected to the same kind of torture that you suffered?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Yes; sure, sure. There was no difference in this. I must say it may look anecdotic for you. I had a discussion once with the commandant of the prison of Targulacna, and he said, "We are not like the Fascists who made the racial differences and persecuted the Jews and Hungarians. We are not so. Look around you. We keep in prison Rumanians, Hungarians, and Jews all alike. We don't make racial differences."

Mr. Sourwine: That could be interpreted to mean that he was saying people of the Jewish faith were being persecuted for their religious activity, but not for their race. Is it true that there is no anti-Semitism in Rumania?

Reverend Wurmbrand: There is anti-Semitism. Just before we left the country, everywhere where Jews were in high positions as chief engineers or directors in ministry and so on, they were silenced and put to lower functions. ...

Mr. Sourwine: Just as a matter of racial prejudice?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Sure. They could have been atheists They were even members of the Communist Party, but if they were of Jewish origin, they were put to lower positions. From the secret police all the Jews have been driven out.

Mr. Sourwine: Are there any Buddhists in Rumania?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Buddhists? No; we have none. Perhaps a few intellectuals, just a few.

Mr. Sourwine: Have the communists done anything, to your knowledge, to try to win position and influence for communist agents in the religious community of the free world?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Sure. We had a professor, Justin Moisescu.

Mr. Sourwine: Moisescu?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Moisescu, yes. He was a professor. He had never been a priest. Truly a very clever and a very cultured man. He was professor of church history, but a layman. With us there has been a law that you can't be professor in a theological institute unless you are a priest. So he resigned. He didn't wish to be a priest.

...he was known in the whole country as a whoremonger, as a drunkard, nobody appreciated him. At once we heard that in a few weeks he had become priest, bishop, metropolitan of Yasi. That is the highest function with us after the patriarch.

Mr. Sourwine: That is the Rumanian Orthodox Church?

Reverend Wurmbrand: In the Rumanian Orthodox Church. Whatever will be the consequences for me, I have told you how I have been threatened, and these threatenings are not simple words.

Recently from Italy two Rumanians have been kidnapped. We have their names. An I know what can happen to me. But I will tell you this Justin Moisescu personally has denounced a group of 400 Christian peasants from his own bishopric. I have been imprisoned with them. He has denounced the priests whom he ordained when he knew that they said some counterrevolutionary word.

He has a very impressive beard and he has come out to the free world and was accepted as a bishop, and those in the West believe that they speak with the Orthodox Church of Rumania and they speak with the secret police of Rumania.

And now the interesting thing is I would not mind accepting men like him and like Gromatca, this arch traitor and others. I don't mind that they are accepted in the West. But I ask myself in every bargain, in every business, both parts must win. I give you the product but you must give me the dollars for it. We accept your traitors. What does the East accept from us?

If we had posed to Rumania this question, "We will accept Justin Moisescu, you must accept a Bible society in Rumania," we would have it. But we accept without asking for it.

Justin Moisescu is a member of the secret police. They sent to America the priest Liviu Stan. Everybody knows Liviu Stan is a man of the communists. When the communists came to power he was among the first ones who put posters on our walls that Christians must vote and go with the Communists. These posters were signed and the others by this Liviu Stan. The communists in Rumania are not so stupid to send here a man who will say. "I come from the side of the communist party" Liviu Stan came as a representative of the Orthodox Church of Rumania. And so they have many men. They have sent recently a priest, Ananaia.

Now that is a very interesting thing about this priest, Ananaia. This priest, Ananaia, has been with me in prison. He has been 10 year in prison. He has been beaten. He has passed through brainwashing. And they have such a confidence in brainwashing that they had the confidence to send him to the West and he does their work.

Senator Dodd: He is a priest in good standing, and of what church?

Reverend Wurmbrand: In the Orthodox church.

I speak out of the pain of a heart. I can't polemicize. I am a very little pastor. I can't polemicize with great religious bodies, but I am a man who has read nothing for 14 years. And now I came out to the West. I had always been very interested in missions and I wished to know what happens in missions. I took in hand the International Review of Missions, edited by the World Council of Churches, and I read there in the issue of January that in Rumania, orthodoxism and protestantism grow in an atmosphere of full religious liberty.

If the man who wrote this has not taken thousands of dollars from the Rumanian secret police, he deserve to be hanged for stupidity. He could have taken money for this. I believe he has not taken money. And then I wrote to them a letter, and said, "Either you lie or I lie. If I lie, I promise that never more will I be a pastor. If you lie you have to withdraw. Now to see if I lie or you lie I ask you to answer the following 20 questions, if you say there is full religious liberty in Rumania.

"Where is the office of the World Council of Churches of Religion in Rumania? It has offices everywhere. In the communist countries it has none.

"Where is the Bible Society? We have no Bible Society. Show me one Bible printed in 20 years. We have no such thing. Tell me the name of one Christian who for 20 years could publish a book. Give me the name of one Christian professor of humanistic sciences in our country. Tell me on Sunday school in Bucharest where it can be attended.

"Tell me where is the YMCA in Rumania. Where are the pastors Ghelbegeanu, Vacareanu, and so on?" They are in prison.

"Please answer to me these questions. If you have received answers, I have received answers."
There is no possible answers. It is not right for Christians to mock our sufferings. The communists have mocked us enough. Don't praise our inquisitors. That is the only thing which we ask. I apologize before these great Christians bodies. I am really a very little man but I speak for the great saints who suffer in prison. It is not right to praise our inquisitors or to think that now they have become better.

Mr. Sourwine: Are the restrictive measures imposed upon the exercise of religion in Rumania today as stringent as they were 10 or 15 years ago?

Reverend Wurmbrand: No; they are no more stringent and I will explain to you why.... Generally our men are very poor with us, unbelievably poor.

My salary when I left Rumania was $28. You say it is little, $28 a week. It was $28 a month. My son was not allowed to finish his studies because of my condemnation. He worked as a building worker and had $30 a month. Our bishop has $70 a month. And now our population is very, very poor.

Senator Dodd: When you say dollars, you mean the equivalent?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Yes; the equivalent of $70. Now I was in a very poor family with five little children, and I caressed a child and the mother said to me, "This child is so good, it doesn't weep even when it is hungry." It had given up weeping because the child knew it is useless to weep. You can't get food. And so this child was not beaten, because it didn't weep any more. The Rumanian people does not weep any more. And, therefore, it must not be beaten any more.

The Rumanian people, as well as the other peoples behind the Iron Curtain, are desperate. They have abandoned hope that they will ever be released. For years we have heard a broadcast station: "Rebel against communism, rebel against communism," and when we rebelled we were abandoned.

And we see how our oppressors are helped. I will tell you a scene. Believe me, God is here. I tell you the scene just as it happened. It was in the years of brainwashing, the 14th year of prison. We are gathered to a meeting, and Major Alexandrescu, the commandant of the prison of Gherla, delivered us a speech and said:
"You fools, you set for 15 or 20 years in prison and expected the Americans to come. You expected the Americans will come and release you. Now I will give you the news. The Americans come but not to release you. They come to help us, to help us, to make business with us, to make trade with us. You fools have not known. The Americans if you beg them, they give you nothing.. If you insult them, if you mock them, they give you money. We have been more clever than you. "
These are words which I have heard myself. Such things have happened in our country.

Mr. Sourwine: Are there any open churches in Rumania today, which anyone may attend?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Just I didn't finish this question. So there is a relaxation in what sense? Our people has given up the fight. Political underground movements don't exist any more with us. They have no such. And so everything has quieted down in the country, and so they don't need any more of the same terror. I have been for years in prison with thieves and murderers. Even before having been put in prison I have been chaplain of a prison. A thief after he has stolen is a gentleman. He give to the waiters the greatest tips and he invites girls and he invites you and he orders the best wines. He has not worked for his money. And such thieves are the communists. They have stolen half of Europe, they have stolen Russia, too. They have stolen a great part of Asia. And now they have what they have stolen and they are gentlemen and they expect the next occasion to steal again.

In this sense there is a relaxation with us, but it is not an essential one. We continue to have the avowed dictatorship of an atheistic party. We have one party. There can be no religious freedom where there is one party. We have elections. Now a joke is make with us that when God created Adam, He created only one woman, Eve, and He said to Adam, "You are free to choose for wife whomsoever you wish." But there was only Eve. And so are the elections with us.

Our Government doesn't mind old women coming to church, but our childhood, our youth is poisoned with atheism. We are not allowed to counteract, and what bitter fruits will come out of this seed nobody can know.

Now you have asked another question, do we have open churches in Rumania? If somebody comes to Rumania - it is another situation in Russia - if somebody comes to Rumania, he is really impressed.

The Orthodox liturgy is something very beautiful. It is grand. And if you come in Rumania you see thousands of churches open, liturgies, sermons, many people in the church. And I have spoken with Americans who have been there and have told me, "I was very impressed." And now there is really a certain religious liberty. In Rumania you are allowed to say as much as you like that God is good. You are not allowed to say that the Devil is bad. St. John the Baptist could have saved his life if he had said: "Repent because the kingdom of heaven is near." Nobody would have touched him. He was touched when he said, "You, Herod, are bad."

If Christ would have delivered a thousand "Sermons on the Mount" they would not have crucified Him. They crucified Him when He said, "You vipers," then He was crucified.

In Rumania you can say God is good but you can't say "communism is cruel, they commit atrocities, it is a crime to poison children with atheism." If you do this you go to prison. There are many priests, rabbis, and pastors who compromise and don't put the dot on the "I." There exists the real church and the real religion and that which compromises.

Mr. Sourwine: Are there churchmen in Rumania today who willingly cooperate with the communist authorities?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Surely. The Orthodox hierarchy nearly entirely. Of the Catholic hierarchy, not one. The Catholic bishops died in prison, all except four. These four have house arrest. At the Vatican council no Catholic bishop was allowed to come. Came a Catholic priest, a well-known traitor, Augustine, who is the real leader of the Catholic Church; the leadership of the Baptists, for example is entirely in the hands of the communists.

I have here a document which I present to the Senate, a list of 150 Russian Baptist pastors recently deported to Siberia. Not all arrived in Siberia. Many died of tortures.

Senator Dodd: Can you talk a little more slowly? I could get your pronunciation better.

Reverend Wurmbrand: This is a list of 150 Baptist pastors of Russia who have been recently deported to Siberia. I have the names , the addresses, the names of their wives, of their children. They have not all arrived to Siberia, because of the tortures many died

Senator Dodd: These were Rumanians?

Reverend Wurmbrand: No, no, Russians. And I give it to the Senate.

Mr. Sourwine: Mjr. Chairman, do you wish this list and the document of transmittal to go into the record? There is an English translation to be made.

Senator Dodd: Yes; I believe it should be in the record.

Senator Dodd: I don't quite understand this. These are 40 Russian Baptists?

Reverend Wurmbrand: 150

Senator Dodd: Were they in Rumania?

Reverend Wurmbrand: No, no, they are Russians. We got from Russia. Here I have another very interesting document.

Mr. Sourwine: If you would excuse me, please, I believe the Senator's question raises a point you should clear up. How do you have this information about Russia? Have you been in Russia?

Reverend Wurmbrand: I have worked for years secret missionary work among the Russian soldiers who occupied our country. I speak Russian fluently, and we brought many Russian soldiers to Christ. To preach Christ to the Russians means Heaven on earth. They seek the Gospel as the thirsty soil seeks water. They have not known Him. The beauty of the Gospel you know it when you preach to Russians; how they live it and how they enjoy it, and so I have made some connections.

In a public sitting I can't say how I have arrived to have these lists.

Mr. Sourwine: You know it to be authentic?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Personally I can tell you from where I have this list, but it is absolutely authentic. It can be controlled. Surely in a public sitting I can't say how I have received it.

I present to the Senate also a very interesting document, the most interesting I have ever known in this matter, the document, "Li Wei Man." It is a letter of the Central Committee of the Communist party of China addressed to the Central Committee of the Communist party of Cuba. Now recently they have quarreled but this letter is an older one in which they teach how to win the leadership of the churches for communism, how to make that the communists should be leaders of the churches. It is an unequaled document of Machiavelianism. We have lived these things but never have I seen it put on paper as this.

Mr. Sourwine: May I suggest this be printed as an appendix to the record, Mr. Chairman?

Senator Dodd: Yes.

Senator Dodd: I take it what you have been telling us must be more or less common knowledge in Rumania, is it?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Yes; surely.

Senator Dodd: Would it be accurate to deduce that the embassy officials of the several countries must have heard it too?

Reverend Wurmbrand: They don't wish to be troubled in their quietness. They close their eyes before this menace. I have met men who simply close their eyes when I told them about these things. They know that they are true. But they have a certain policy of friendly relationship with the communist countries, and they are very honest men, but they are duped exactly as we were duped in Rumania.

Wherever the communists came in the beginning, they said the same thing which I read here in newspapers and in periodicals. "You know Stalin's communism has been very bad, but Yugoslavian communism or another kind of communism, this is very good."

A little lion in its first days you can play with him just like with a puppy. When he becomes great, only then he is a lion. Yugoslavian communism is this little communism. And American communism a very little one and English communism is a very little one. When they grow, when they can do whatever they will to do, then only we can see them.

With us, in the beginning, we also had a very nice communism. I have seen in Rumanian Communist demonstrations signs with the slogan, " God save the King." I have seen the communist Secretaries of State making great crosses, showing themselves as being on the side of religion and making compliments to religion and bowing to religion and saying they are Democrats. In the beginning, they have put in prison party members who said that the agriculture must be collectivized. And they have gone together with the bourgeois party, with the Liberal Party of Tatorescu and with other Democrats.

I have seen in the West Social Democrats collaborate with them. In Rumania, I have seen dying Social Democrats in the same cell with me; they died. Communists in Rumania, too, were nice until they had the whole power in hand. When they had the whole power in hand, they have done things exactly as in Russia, and so they will do everywhere. There is no difference.

Mr. Sourwine: You mentioned demonstrations by the Communists. Does Rumania have anything like the demonstrations that are so prevalent in this country, demonstrations against the Government's activities or against its policies?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Nobody can say a word of criticism. Such a thing doesn't even enter in the mind of somebody. I will tell you something of which may be laughable for you. It is very tragical with us. But the story is just as I tell you. I know the man.

A man was in a barbershop in a little town, Sibiu. While the barber shaved him, he said to the barber: "What should I do? My hair falls." The barber said, "Very well, I will make you a friction but you must not be anxious about this. The most intelligent people of the world have been bald." On the other seat there was an officer of the secret police and he said to the barber, "What have you said now?"

"I have said that the most intelligent people of the world are bald. "

"So, you assert that Stalin has not been intelligent." It is a question of laughter for you but it is tragical with us. Nobody dares to say a word.

I stopped in Newark, and in Philadelphia, a demonstration against the war in Vietnam. I had not this clerical suit on. I stopped the demonstrators and I undressed myself to the belt. Afterwards I heard that it is illegal here in the States, and that I could have gone to prison for this. I undressed myself.

Senator Dodd: It would have been all right on the bathing beach.

Reverend Wurmbrand: Yes; it was not on the beach. And I told them, "This have Communists done to me. Do you think that American Christians should fight against communism?" So they surrounded me and asked me, "Why have Communists done to you this?" I said to them, "Suppose that I am a murdered. Do you agree that a murderer should be tortured? Has Oswald been tortured? Has Ruby been tortured with you?" They all said, "No; murderers have not been tortured." I continued: "Then know that I have not be charged with murder. I am a clergyman." They stopped the demonstration. In Philadelphia there was again such a demonstration.

I am not a man of politics. I can't speak for the war of Vietnam or against the war in Vietnam. I speak this general principle that Christians must be on the side of righteousness. They must never be on the side of the inquisitors of Christians. They must be on the side of the victims of the inquisitors, they must be on the side of the Christians.

In Philadelphia there was a great meeting. A pastor with clerical suit, a Presbyterian pastor, delivered a speech in which he praised Communists and said that Communists are all right and it is stupid to fight against them. I have learned something from the Communists. In a minute - after - the pastor was no more in the pulpit, I was in the pulpit. I said: "Now I will speak about communism. What do you know about communism? And I will show you my credentials, how I have studied communism." I undressed myself to the belt. I did not know that all these bad reporters are there and took pictures. And I showed them my body. "That is what Communists do to Christians, and you, Pastor, why don't you make demonstrations, if you are a Christian and if you have youth in you and vigor, why don't you demonstrate before the Soviet and Rumanian Embassies and the other embassies against torturing Christians?" And then the public, which has been there booed him and shouted to him " Judas."

These are Judases. They may be all right innerly, I don't know their hearts, but I think that Christians, if they wish to demonstrate, they should demonstrate against those who have recently deported 150 Baptist pastors.

Mr. Sourwine: The subcommittee has received substantial information to the effect that the Rumanian Communist Government has infiltrated into this country Communist-trained clergy with other missions than those of a spiritual nature. Do you have any information about that?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Rumanian Communists are very interested in the fact that you have here, in the States, something like 300,000 on their side. They can't very well win them for communism, but they can win them for a leftwing Christianity which supports communism. They have sent here several men, Moisescu, Liviu Stan, and so on. These don't come with Communist slogans but with the words: "You must love your Rumanian fatherland.  You must have connections with the Rumanian patriarchy."

When I came out from Rumania I saw for the first time a Rumanian newspaper which appears in Bucharest, and which nobody in Bucharest has ever seen. The Voice of the Fatherland it is called, and in the fatherland nobody sees this newspaper. Only your American Rumanians see it and in France. I have never seen it. My son looked at it, and we have never seen it. In this newspaper you read about priests and churches. In our newspapers you will never have a word about the church. There you have pictures of priests and monasteries and how fine it is and so on. They make this propaganda, surely.

Senator Dodd: You mean this paper is only distributed in the free world?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Only in the free world. They have at midnight, which corresponds to I don't know what hour here in the United States, it is noon or I don't know what, they have religious services which are jammed in Rumania, but they are emitted from Rumania. We have no religious services on the broadcasts. These are broadcast religious services only that the Americans should know how fine the Communists are and that they have religious services.

Mr. Sourwine: Are you saying that the religious services of the Rumanian Orthodox Church ...are broadcasts in Rumania at a time which is midnight in Rumania?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Yes.

Mr. Sourwine: Beamed to the Western World?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Yes; sure.

Mr. Sourwine: To the free world?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Sure.

Mr. Sourwine: And not broadcast in Rumania?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Sure. In Rumania, nobody hears them.

Mr. Sourwine: Of course, a broadcast beamed from Rumania to the United States necessarily will have enough power to be picked up in Rumania if anyone wanted to tune in.

Reverend Wurmbrand: First of all, it is a very inconvenient hour. It is midnight for us. Secondly, in Rumania it is jammed.

Mr. Sourwine: It is what? ...

Reverend Wurmbrand: They jam it in Rumania.

Mr. Sourwine: So that even those who know about it, who might try to pick it up ----

Reverend Wurmbrand: It is jammed. You can't hear it in Rumania.
In this moment, no reprisals would be taken. No reprisals are taken today if somebody hears foreign broadcasts. But everything is noted. What happens with us? We have waves of terror. We have had a great wave of terror from 1948 and 1949 which lasted until 1955. We had the relax until 1958 when nobody was arrested but everything was noted.

Then in 1959 came again a wave of terror, and all those who were noted for years before were taken in. And now the whole spy work continues with us. You are not arrested. But everybody knows that he is spied out and that everything is noted. How far this inner spy net goes is unimagined.
In a little townlet of ours there is a little Baptist church with only 22 members. The pastor of that church told me that he is the informer of the secret police and that he knows three members of his church who give information against him. So it was in the church in which I was. The servant of the church had the order to inform who comes to me. I had no salary. So, usually men who came to me brought a little parcel with food and clothes and so on. The servant had to spy out who comes with parcels. In the smallest churches you have five or six who have to spy out what the others do. One neighbor spies the other. Children spy on their father and so on. It is without end so nobody dares to do a thing.

Senator Dodd: I am somewhat interested in these interrogations to which you were subjected. If I understand you correctly, they lasted for hours; is that right?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Yes; surely.

Senator Dodd: Without going into a lengthy explanation, what did they ask you?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Well, they asked many things.
First of all they wished to know who has said counterrevolutionary things of all the bishops and priests and pastors and laymen whom I knew.
Who has spoken against the Government.
Who has something against the Government. How we organized and so on, without end.
And now at a certain moment I was tired with being beaten. They told me at a certain moment,

"Mr. Wurmbrand, supposing that you are not a counterrevolutionary, you are a well-known pastor in the whole country and everybody had confidence in you and you spoke with bishops and all kinds of men and you have been in so many villages and towns and everybody confessed to you and so forth. Tell us who are the counterrevolutionaries. Don't speak about your activity. You are all right. You are not a counterrevolutionary. But then show your loyalty toward our Government, tell us who the counterrevolutionaries are. Are you disposed to do so?"

So, I said, "Yes; I am disposed."

When they heard that I am disposed, they asked me: "Do you smoke, do you wish liquors?" Everything I could have at that moment. And he knew, the officer, that he will receive another star there if he gets from me this information. And then he asked me now, "Who are the counterrevolutionaries?" I said, "As you know I have worked on an international scale, so I can tell you the counterrevolutionaries not only in Rumania but even in Russia."

Oh, he was so glad. I said: "In Russia, you have had as Secretary of State for Internal Affairs, Yagoda. Yagoda has killed thousands of people as counterrevolutionaries. Then you have discovered who has been the counterrevolutionary: Yagoda has been. Yagoda has been shot as counterrevolutionary.

"Then you have had as Secretary of State for Internal Affairs, Beria, and Beria has killed other thousands of people as counterrevolutionaries. Then you have found out who has been the counterrevolutionary: Beria. " Why do you seek the counterrevolutionaries in the church? See them in your own party. And in Rumania it has been the same thing.

Communists are not only anti-Christian. They are anti everything. They are anti their own comrades.

I have been in prison. I have been there with Lucretiu Patrascanu, the great Communist leader, who has brought communism to power in our country. He was put in prison and tortured until he became mad.

My wife has been in prison with Gheorghe Cristescu... the founder of communism in Rumania, who has been in prison for communism under the borgeois. He has been with my wife together, and he said to my wife, " Forty years ago I fought for the 8-hour labor day and now my Communist Party has come to power and I have to work 14 hours a day."...

Senator Dodd: What was the name of the prominent woman Communist in Rumania?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Ana Pauker, and she was also in prison.

Senator Dodd: Do you know her?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Yes, yes surely; she has also been in prison, and she has been kept a short time and then afterward she died of cancer.

Senator Dodd: We don't have any more questions. Do you have anything more you want to say, Pastor?

Reverend Wurmbrand: I want to say something. I owe it to those with whom I have been in prison. I have told you so many sad things. I don't wish to end with this note. I must tell you that in these great tortures and this great suffering, Christians have shown themselves as saints and as heroes, and if I am allowed to conclude with just one scene which I have seen myself.

It was at the canal. With us, 150,000 men and women have been arrested to build a canal. Beaten, tortured, hungry, without anything, they had to build a canal.

Senator Dodd: Build a canal?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Yes; a canal, the Danube Canal. My wife has worked and shoveled the earth. At this canal, there was a religious brigade of 400 men, bishops, priests, peasants who loved Christ, sectarians and so on, all who were for religious motives in prison.

Over this brigade criminals have been put, and to the criminals it has been promised that they will be released if they torture these Christians. This promise has never been kept. But imagine a criminal who is sentenced for life, if he knows that he has such a hope. If they saw you in this brigade making a cross as it is a habit with us in Rumania, or folding your hands or saying a word about God you were beaten to death.

And now a Sunday morning the political officer of the prison comes, the whole brigade is gathered, and just at random he sees a young man. He calls him, "What is your name?" He says the name. "What are you by profession?" He said, "A priest." And then, mocking, the Communist said, "Do you still believe in God?"

This priest knew that if he says yes, this is the last day of his life. We all looked to him. For a few seconds he was silent. Then his face began to shine and then he opened his mouth and with a very humble but with a very decided voice he said: "Mr. Lieutenant, when I became a priest I knew that during church history thousands of Christians and priests have been killed for their faith, and notwithstanding I became a Christian and I became a priest. I knew what I became. And as often as I entered the altar clad in this beautiful ornate which priests wear I promised to God, "If I will wear the uniform of a prisoner, then also I will serve Him. Mr. Lieutenant, prison is not an argument against religion. I love Christ from all my heart."

I am sad that I can't give the intonation with which he said these words. I think that Juliet when she spoke about Romeo, she spoke like that. We were ashamed because we - we believed in Christ. This man loved Christ as a bride loves the bridegroom. This man has been beaten and tortured to death. But this is Rumania. Rumania is a country which is mocked, which is oppressed, but deep in the hearts of the people is a great esteem and a great praise for those who have suffered. The love to God, the love to Christ, the love to fatherland has never ceased. My country will live. With this I finish.

Senator Dodd: Your testimony has certainly been very impressing. (At this point, a member of the audience later identified as L.D. O'Flaherty, addressed the Chair).

Mr. O'Flaherty: Mr. Chairman, we have pretty substantial reason to believe that our brother is in danger of his life, and I don't know what steps we could take to have him claim asylum here. He has asylum in France, but we fear for his life because as he as told you, they have told him they will bump him off, get a gangster to bump him off. What arrangements if any - I am not a politician or a political science scholar - what arrangements could be made for his asylum in this country? Can he make a declaration to secure asylum here for his protection?

We know individuals have followed him from city to city unknown to him, and I ask this openly here.

Senator Dodd: Would you identify yourself? I didn't get your name.

Mr. O'Flaherty: O'Flaherty. L.D. O'Flaherty.

Senator Dodd: O'Flaherty?

Mr. O'Flaherty: I am a businessman, a Christian businessman. I am a director in a certain organization here that is giving him support, Friends of Israel. On that basis I make this request. I don't think he understands the danger.

Reverend Wurmbrand: We have a God who protects us. We have the angels around us.

Senator Dodd: I think we had better discuss this matter privately with the pastor after the public hearing. I don't think it is a matter which should be discussed publicly.

Mr. O'Flaherty: Thank you.

Senator Dodd: We will adjourn this hearing now subject to further call.

(Whereupon, at 11:50 a.m., the subcommittee adjourned subject to the call of the Chair).

OBITUARY - Sabina O. Wurmbrand (1913-2000)
August 14, 2000

Sabina O. Wurmbrand (1913-2000)

Sabina O. Wurmbrand, co-founder of The Voice of the Martyrs, a Christian mission with offices in 30 countries, went home to the Lord Friday, August 11, 2000, at 10:15 p.m. She had been seriously ill for the past several months and was hospitalized in Tijuana, Mexico.

She was born Sabina Oster on July 10, 1913 in Czernowitz, a city in the Bucovine region of the Austro-Hungarian Empire, which became part of Romania after WWI, and since WWII has been part of the Ukraine. This area was an important educational and cultural hub for the Jewish faith. Sabina graduated from high school in Czernowitz, and then attended classes for two years at the Sorbonne in Paris, France, where she studied languages, and became fluent in many during her life. After her studies there, she was employed in Bucharest, Romania.

While in Bucharest, she married Richard Wurmbrand on October 26, 1936. During a vacation later in 1936, both Richard and Sabina were converted and baptized in the Christian faith, joining the church of the Anglican Mission in Bucharest.

During the WWII occupation of Romania in 1940-43, Sabina's parents, two sisters, and one brother were killed in Nazi concentration camps. Sabina was active in the Romanian underground from 1940-45. She smuggled numerous Jewish children out of ghettos, preached daily in bomb shelters, and was arrested several times for underground Christian activities during a state of war. She and her husband Richard were spared from execution through the intervention of the chief editor of Romania's main newspaper and the interest shown in their case by prominent religious leaders. During this time, Sabina was one of the founders of the Jewish-Christian Church in Bucharest.

At the end of World War II, Sabina traveled regularly to Budapest, smuggling in goods and food, especially salt, that were needed by refugees living there. During her travels, she would actively speak to the Russian occupation forces about the Christian faith. In 1946, she organized a soup kitchen in Bucharest which served 1,000 people a day during a severe drought. During the summers of 1946 and 1947, she organized Christian camps for Romania's religious leaders of all denominations, and held daily devotions for them. During these years she also conducted street meetings with gatherings of up to 5000 people.

After Richard's arrest by the Communist government in 1948, she encouraged many young ministers to continue underground Christian activity. She was arrested in 1951 and taken to a prisoners' labor camp to build a river canal. She loaded and unloaded box-cars with stones. She spent three years in prison, and was under house arrest for several years after release. The Communist authorities promised to free her if she would divorce her husband and renounce her faith, which she refused to do. She and her family escaped Romania in 1966, traveling throughout Europe and America, speaking for the newly founded organization, Christian Mission to the Communist World, which became The Voice of the Martyrs in 1992. Sabina actively spoke to churches, groups, and conferences for 32 years after the founding of the ministry, and accompanied her husband to testify at Congressional hearings on religious persecution. She wrote and published a book, The Pastor's Wife, detailing her Christian testimony and life, which continues to be published in six languages.

Sabina's life was characterized by an understanding of Christian love and forgiveness, with an effort to redeem lives for Christ. She is survived by her husband, Richard; a son, Michael; and two grandchildren.

The funeral will be Wednesday, at the Sky Rose Chapel of the Rose Hill Cemetery in Whittier, California. USA Headquarters for The Voice of the Martyrs is located in Bartlesville.

COMMUNIST EXPLOITATION OF RELIGION

HEARING BEFORE THE SUBCOMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE THE ADMINISTRATION OF THE INTERNAL SECURITY ACT AND OTHER INTERNAL SECURITY LAWS OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY

UNITED STATES SENATE
EIGHTY-NINTH CONGRESS
SECOND SESSION

TESTIMONY OF REV. RICHARD WURMBRAND
COMMUNIST EXPLOITATION OF RELIGION
Friday, May 6, 1966

US. Senate, Subcommittee to Investigate the Administration of the Internal Security Act and Other Internal Security Laws, of the Committee on the Judiciary, Washington, D.C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to call, at 10:20 a.m., in room 318, Old Senate Office Building, Senator Thomas J. Dodd presiding. Also present: Jay G. Sourwine, chief counsel; Benjamin Mandel, director of research; Frank W. Schroeder, chief investigator; and Robert C. McManus, investigations analyst.

Senator Dodd: I will call this hearing to order. We have as our witness today Pastor Richard Wurmbrand, who is a refugee from Rumania. Mr. Sourwine will introduce and read a copy of Dr. Wurmbrand's credentials.

I must say, before you do so, that we are grateful for your appearing here. I am familiar with the nature of your testimony. -I think I am to an extent. I feel that you are rendering a real service to the cause of the free world.

Go ahead, Mr. Sourwine.

Mr. Sourwine: Mr. Chairman, this letter of credentials, which I shall read pursuant to your instructions, was given to Dr. Wurmbrand by Dr. Hedenquist, who is the mission director of the Svenska Israels-missionen. The reason is explained the text. It reads:

Pastor Richard Wurmbrand is a refugee from Rumania, a country which he had to leave because of the anti religious persecution. Fleeing from there, he has not the usual credentials, which have been taken from him at his arrest by the secret police of the Communists. Our mission, knowing him since 26 years, certify hereby that he is an Evangelical Minister who has had until now the following functions:

From April 1939, to January 1940, he was secretary of the church's mission to the Jews which had to retire from Rumania at the last date because of the war. During the whole war he has been pastor of our mission in Rumania. Since our mission retired from Rumania in 1945, from that year to 1948 he has been a pastor of the Norwegian mission to the Jews.

In the same time he has worked also in the representation of the World Council of Churches for Rumania.

He was also a professor of the Old Testament in the Seminary of Bucharest. From 1948 to 1956, he was in prison for religious motives. Released in 1956, he was no more authorized by the Communist authorities to fulfill his duties. From 1956 to 1959 he preached and exercised his other pastoral functions illegally.

Re-arrested for this in 1959, he was again in prison until July 1964, when he was released on the basis of a general amnesty.

Since 1964, he was pastor of the Evangelical Church in Orshova, a Rumanian town.

Continuing to be the object of persecution and being in great danger, our Scandinavian mission to the Jews succeeded to make him escape from three.

We recommend him as a most reliable person, a fine Christian who has published several books against atheism and communism and who has got a burning heart for Christ and for all people in need.

This is signed by Dr. Hedenquist, doctor of theology, mission director in Sweden for Svenska Israelsmissionen.

Reverend Wurmbrand: He is the former secretary of the World Council of Missions.

Senator Dodd: Without objection, this letter will be included in the record. Since it has been read, it will not be reprinted.

Mr. Sourwine, you may proceed. I have some questions which I might as well ask to begin with, rather than wait until later.

Pastor, how many languages do you speak?

Reverend Wurmbrand: There are legends about me that I speak very many languages. Something like 14.

Senator Dodd: Forty?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Fourteen.

Senator Dodd: Obviously, you speak English.

Reverend Wurmbrand: Yes; English, French, German Hungarian, and so on.

Senator Dodd: Did you come directly from Rumania?

Reverend Wurmbrand: No, no; from Rumania I went to Italy; from Italy to Oslo, and then from Europe I came to the States.

Senator Dodd: From where?

Reverend Wurmbrand: From Paris.

Senator Dodd: When was that?

Reverend Wurmbrand: I came to the States 3 weeks ago.

Senator Dodd: Were you required by the secret police to make any commitments before you could leave Rumania?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Before I left Rumania I was called twice to the secret police. The first time they said that they don't know yet if they will allow me to leave the country with my family. They said: "Dollars have been received for you. You will have to leave the country, but perhaps we will let some time to pass, because your remembrances of prison are too fresh and you have too good a pen."

Senator Dodd: What?

Reverend Wurmbrand: A pen. "You can too well write. Perhaps we will keep somebody here of your family as hostage." The second time they called me again and they said: "Now you will leave the country, but be very cautious when you come out. You may preach Christ as much as you like. We know that you are a preacher, but don't touch us. Don't speak against Communists. If you will speak against communism, for $1,000 we can find a gangster who will liquidate you. We play with you with open cards. You come from prison You have met in prison men whom we have brought back from the West."

And that is the truth. I have been in prison with a Rumanian Orthodox priest, Vasile Leul, who has been kidnaped from Austria. I have seen his nail torn out and broken, and so they reminded me of that. "You know how our prisons are and that you can come back in prison."

And the third thing which they said: "We have also another possibility with you. We can destroy you morally outside. We will find story with a girl or a money story or something else and people will be stupid enough to believe it. We will destroy you if you touch us."

And under these conditions I was allowed to come out. And very sorrowfully in the West I found people in the West, even religious leaders, who told me the same thing: "Preach Christ as much as you like but don't touch Communists."

Senator Dodd: As I understand it, you said you came to this country 3 weeks ago.

Reverend Wurmbrand: Yes, sir; just today it is 1 month.

Senator Dodd: Three weeks?

Reverend Wurmbrand: One month today.

Senator Dodd: Were you in prison from 1948 to 1956?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Yes, and then imprisoned again in January 1959 to 1964.

Senator Dodd: Were you in the same prison all of that time?

Reverend Wurmbrand No, no; we were transferred from one prison to the others.

Senator Dodd: From 1956 to 1959 as I understand it, you exercised your religious function in spite of the law against such activity, did you not?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Yes, yes.

Senator Dodd: How did you do this?

Reverend Wurmbrand: When I cam out from prison in 1956, I was licensed to preach - of course, nobody can preach in our country accept he has a license from the Government - and in the beginning I got a license, but which was withdrawn from me after the first week of preaching.

The motives are so comical you would say. In a sermon I said that Christians must keep hope, because of the wheel of history turns, and the wheel of life.

"You meant us, that communism will change, that communism will fall. Never will it fall." It has been reproached to me that in a sermon I have said Christians must practice patience, patience, and again patience. "Ah, you meant that the Americans will come and we must be patient until they come."

Everything was misinterpreted, and so the license has been withdrawn from me. And then generally in the Soviet countries there exists the underground church which works as the first Christians worked. Only now we understand texts of the bible which we had not understood before. I did not know why it is written in the Bible that a man named Simon was called Peter. Simeon was called Niger and so on. Everyone is called otherwise than his mother called him. So it is with us now. In every village I was called by another name. I was called Valentin, Georgescu, Ruben, In every village I had another name, and so I could preach.

I did not understand in earlier times why Jesus, when He wishes to have the last supper said: "Go in town and you will see a man with a pitcher and go after him and where he enters prepare the supper."

Why does he not give an address, a number, and a street? Now we know it when we make secret prayer meetings. We never give the address. We don't know if that man is not the informer of the secret police. We tell to the main to wait in a public garden or somewhere, and when one with a flower here, or with a necktie passes, go after him. We don't introduce ourselves to each other, and if somebody asks the name of the other one, we know that he is the informer of the secret police. And so we have developed a technique of secret church work and so I could work.

Senator Dodd: How did you keep alive.? How did you sustain yourself?

Reverend Wurmbrand: The Christians sustained me everywhere. I had no salary, I had no regular salary but the Christians everywhere sustained me. In Rumania the first question asked of a pastor or a priest of any denomination, is: Has he been in prison? If he has been in prison he is all right. All the Christians sustain him.

Senator Dodd: You were re-arrested in 1959, as I understand it.

Reverend Wurmbrand: Yes.

Senator Dodd: Were you kept in the same prison until your release in 1964?

Reverend Wurmbrand: No. Then, also, I was in several prisons.

Senator Dodd: Could you describe for us the cell in which you were kept in solitary confinement?

Reverend Wurmbrand: There were different cells. In solitary confinement I was the first 2 , nearly 3 years. It was in the most beautiful building of Bucharest in the building of the Secretariat of State for Internal Affairs. It is a building before which all foreigners stand and admire it. I can tell you that your White House is a very little building in comparison with ours. And there beneath the earth 10 meters beneath the earth are the cells. There are no windows in the cells. Air enters through a tube. And there were a few desks with a mattress, with a straw mattress. You had but three steps for to walk. Never were we taken out from these cells except for interrogations when prisoners were beaten and tortured.

For years I have never seen sun, moon, flowers, snow, stars, no man except the interrogator who beat, but I can say I have seen heaven open, I have seen Jesus Christ, I have seen the angels and we were very happy there.

But the treatment was very bad. The purpose was to make us mad. You didn' t hear a noise. A whisper you didn't hear in this cell. The guard had felt shoes. For years, not to hear anything. In all these years of prison we never had a book, we never had a bit of paper, we never had a newspaper, nothing to distract our mind except that from time to time tape recorders were put on the corridor. I didn't know what a tape recorder is. I had not seen such a thing. But at once we heard beautiful Rumanian music, and then we enjoyed it. We didn't know what has happened with the Communists that they make us enjoy, and after 10 or 15 minutes at once you heard, "Ha, ha, ha don't beat," the torturing of a woman. This lasted for half an hour the torturing of a woman. And of 100 prisoners who had been in that cell, in that corridor, everybody recognized that it is his wife or that it is his girl. I myself thought also that it is my wife.

Never will a Westerner understand, if I would not have the mark on my body, which are my credentials.

Senator Dodd: Excuse me, never will who understand?

Reverend Wurmbrand: A Westerner can't understand.

Senator Dodd: A Westerner?

Reverend Wurmbrand: A Westerner can't understand God is here and knows that I will not tell you the whole truth because if I will tell you the whole truth, you will faint and rush out of this room, not bearing to hear what things have happened. But I will tell you that in a prison they crucified a cat before ourselves. They beat nails in the feet of the cat and the cat was hanging with the head down, and can you imagine how this cat screamed and the prisoners, mad, beat on the door, "Free the cat, free the cat, free the cat," and the Communists very polite, " Oh, surely we will free the cat, but give the statements which we ask from you and then the cat will be freed," and I have known men who have given statements against their wives, against their children, against their parents to free the cat. They did it out of madness, and then the parents and the wives have been tortured like the cat. Such things have happened with us.

Senator Dodd: Did you have any fellow Christians like you imprisoned?

Reverend Wurmbrand: We had hundreds of bishops, priests, monks in prisons; my wife who is near me, she has been with Catholic nuns. My wife tells that they were angels; such have been put in prisons. Nearly all Catholic bishops died in prison. Innumerable Orthodox and Protestants have been in prison, too.

Senator Dodd: The point I was getting at and I guess I did not make it clear, were the Christians treated any differently or mistreated any differently?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Everybody in prison was very badly treated. And I cannot be contradicted on this question, because I have been with physicians, I have much more broken bones than anybody, so either I broke my bones or somebody else broke them. And if I would not have been a clergyman but a murderer – it is a crime to torture a murderer, too.

The Christian prisoners were tortured in a form which should mock their religion. I tell you again in the prison of Pitesti one scene I will describe you about torturing and mocking Christians, and believe me I would renounce to eternal life to paradise after which I long, if I tell you one word of exaggeration. God is here and knows that I do not say everything. It cannot be said. There are ladies here. There are other people hearing it.

One Sunday morning in the prison of Pitesti a young Christian was already the fourth day, day and night, tied to the cross. Twice a day the cross was put on the floor and 100 other cell inmates by beating, by tortures, were obliged to fulfill their necessities upon his face and upon his body. Then the cross was erected again and the Communists swearing and mocking "Look your Christ, look your Christ, how beautiful he is, adore him, kneel before him, how fine he smells, your Christ." And then the Sunday morning came and a Catholic priest, an acquaintance of mine, has been put to the belt, in the dirt of a cell with 100 prisoners, a plate with excrements, and one with urine was given to him and he was obliged to say the holy mass upon these elements, and he did it. And I asked him afterward, "Father, but how could you make this?" He was half mad. He answered to me: "Brother, I have suffered more than Christ. Don't reproach to me what I have done." And the other prisoners beaten to take holy communion in this form, and the Communists around, " Look, your sacraments, look, your church, what a holy church you have, what fine is your church, what holy ordinance God has given you."

I am very insignificant and a very little man. I have been in prison among the weak ones and the little ones, but I speak for a suffering country and for a suffering church and for the heroes and the saints of the 20th century; we have had such saints in our prison to which I did not dare to lift my eyes.

I am a Protestant, but we have had near us Catholic bishops and monks and nuns about whom we felt that the touching of their garments heals. We were not worthy to untie their shoelaces. Such men have been mocked and tortured in our country. And even if it would mean to go back to a Rumanian prison, to be kidnaped by the Communists and going back and tortured again, I cannot be quiet. I owe it to those who have suffered there.

Senator Dodd: Now, did the Rumanian secret police employ brainwashing techniques?

Reverend Wurmbrand: The worst thing has been the brainwashing. All the tortures of times before were nothing in comparison with brainwashing.

To describe very shortly brainwashing: First of all we were doped. The dope was put in our food. I did not know about this dope. But we saw only the results, a dope which gave two results. First of all, what the physician calls alleluia which means lack of power of will. The power of will was completely broken. If we were told, "Lift your hand," I lifted it. If I was not told to let the hand down, I would never have left it down. We were at the same time very much undernourished. We had times when we received 100 grams, one slice of bread, a week. It was told to us, "We give you as many calories as you need to be able to breathe only, " and so our power of will has been broken.

Second, this drug or perhaps it is another drug, produces the delirium of self accusation. I have seen prisoners knocking during the night on the door and saying, "Take me to the interrogator, I have new things to say against me." Prisoners quarreled with their interrogators to say against themselves more than the interrogators asked from them. And then we have had in prisons the curious phenomenon that we as priests received confessions from other prisoners. Now everybody is a sinner, but not everybody is a criminal. Men who have never murdered confessed that they have murdered, that they have committed adultery, that they have stolen. They felt they had to accuse themselves. This has also been the result of doping. And after we were doped like that - that is the secret of all the Soviet show trials, in which the prisoners accuse themselves - then the time of brainwashing came. For 17 hours a day from 5 in the morning to 10 in the evening we had to sit like this. We were not allowed to lean. We were not allowed to rest a little bit our weary heads upon our hands. To close your eyes was a crime. Seventeen hours a day we had to sit like that and hear from the morning to the evening: " Communism is good, communism is good, communism is good, communism is good," until you heard one who was already 20 years in prison under the Communists shouting, "Communism is good, communism is good, communism is good, I give my life for communism."

It was after the technique of Professor Pavlov, a scientific suggestion.

In prison there were not only priests and pastors. We have had hundreds of peasants and young boys and girls who were put in prison for their Christian faith. These were separated and for them there was a special brainwashing, not only that "communism is good," but "Christianity is dead, Christianity is dead, Christianity is dead. Nobody more believes in Christ, nobody more believes in Christ, you are the only fools."

And so on. And I must tell you that you may know how far this brainwashing went. I do not like to pose here like a hero. I believed that Christianity is dead under this influence. I believed -

Senator Dodd: I did not hear that.

Reverend Wurmbrand: I believed that Christianity is dead under this suggestion. Nobody goes more to church. They gave us post cards. I have not seen my wife for 10 years. They gave me post cards, they gave to all of us post cards: "Write to your children and wife; they may come and on that day see you and bring your parcels," so on that day we were shaved; we expected and expected until the evening and nobody came. They had not sent the post cards, but we did not know. Then came the brain washings. " Your wives are laying in bed with men," obscene words, "Your children hate you. You have nobody to love in the world. You are the only fools. Give up faith. Nobody is more Christians. Christianity is dead."

I believed also that nobody is more a Christian. I had read in the Bible that there will be in the last time the great apostasy, that people will leave the faith and I believed that I lived now this time. But I said to myself if Christianity is dead, I will sit at its tomb and will weep until it arises again, just as Mary Magdalene sat at the tomb of Jesus and wept until Jesus showed Himself. Then when I came out of prison I saw Christianity is not dead. The number of practicing Christians in Rumania according to the figures given by the Communists themselves in 20 years of Communist dictatorship has grown 300 percent.

Senator Dodd: How do the Communists use religion for their own purposes if they do?

Reverend Wurmbrand: That is a very tragic side. The worse thing in Rumania has not been the persecution of Christians. The persecution has make the Christians to be of steel. The worst thing has been the corruption of religion. They have put as religious leaders their man. A bishop, a pastor, a preacher, just a man like other man and can commit sins. Now if they found a preacher or somebody else in adultery or in some money irregularity or I do not know what sin, they called him and blackmailed him and said, "Now you must become our man. Otherwise we publish what we have found." Or they found others who were weak ones, whom they promised I do not know what. They never keep their promises. And these men, they put at the leadership of religion everywhere.

They have their bishops, their bishop vicar, their professors of theology, their presidents of the Baptists and Pentecostals and so on. I could give names. I know this from firsthand. Because many of these, when we came out of prison, out of remorse confessed to us what they have done. And now they use these men. With us in Rumania religion is a very great thing. You do not find much religious difference in Rumania. By these weak Christians, the Communists used religion for their propaganda. When the Communists came to power in Rumania, they convoked in the building of our parliament a congress of all the cults. There were 4,000 priests; pastors, rabbis of all religions were there. Our Prime Minister Gorza, said the same things which you hear now in the West. This was in 1945 when they came to power with us. "You know Rumanian communism will not be like Russian communism. We are a democratic communism. We will not persecute the church. We are on the side of monarchy. We will never collectivate agriculture. We are something entirely else and you should be on our side and then we will protect religion and we will give salaries to the priests."

And the priests, good men, simply believed him and cheered him. Priests and bishops one after the other stood up and said, "Well, if your communism is otherwise than the Russian communism, if it will be a good communism, we do not object against communism in principle." And one after the other stood up and praised this form of communism. There was only one in that congress who protested and said that communism can never change, that terror is an essential part of communism, because communism is contrary to human nature.

What would you say if I would take the purse out of your pocket? Everyone wishes to have something. A dog wishes to have a bone, and communism is against human nature because it does not allow you to have anything of yours and so communism must use terror. At that congress there was only one who said these things. This one is now before you.

But what has happened? I went to prison, this was one of the charges against me. I met in prison all those who had praised communism, all those who have collaborated with communism, and they were treated just like me. They had been the fools. There was only one difference that I was in prison with a good conscience and they were with a bad conscience. In prison they had remorse. Religion was used for Communist propaganda in our country.

Just to give you one example: To the Orthodox Church of Rumania foreigners come and see the liturgy and see everything so beautiful. The church is open. They do not understand the language, they do not know what is preached. I will give you the test of the sermon. It was a sermon about an epistle of St. Paul where it was written that Christ is our peace , and so the priest explained, "Christ is our peace. Who is against peace? American imperialists. And who is on the side of the peace? We, the Socialist countries."

So you see that Christ identifies Himself with socialism and so on. Such sermons they have. They have used the religion for their own purposes in the country. Then they have used the religion for getting political positions in the West. They are not fools to send in the West representatives of the Communist Party. They send bishops with great beards and beards are always very impressive here in the West, and through these beards they influence the West.

Senator Dodd: I have many more questions, but would you show your wounds and scars, if you have some?

Reverend Wurmbrand: I apologize here before the ladies.

Senator Dodd: Take your time. If ever a man was entitled to time, I think you are.

Senator Dodd: What is the scar behind your ear?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Here they put the knife and said, "Give accusatory statement against your bishops and against the other pastors. Do you give or not?" And they cut. It is true that they did not cut very deeply.

Senator Dodd: These are all knife wounds?

Reverend Wurmbrand: They tortured by all means. They beat until they broke the bones. They used red-hot irons, they used knives, they used everything. And what was the first thing is not that they beat, not what they did, but how they did it. They interrogated you very politely, and if you did not wish to say what they asked they said, "Well, we have the first. On the 15th you will be beaten and tortured at 10 o'clock in the evening." Imagine what 14 days were after this. We have had prisoners who during this time, which has been given to them, knocked at the door, "I can't bear it. I will say everything," before they have been tortured.

Senator Dodd: I wish you would turn around before you put your shirt on.

Reverend Wurmbrand: And that it may be very clear, it is not that I boast with these marks. I show to you the tortured body of my country, of my fatherland, and of my church, and they appeal to the American Christians and to all freemen of America to think about our tortured body, and we do not ask you to help us. We ask you only one thing. Do not help our oppressors and do not praise them. You cannot be a Christian and praise the inquisitors of Christians. That is what I have to say.

Senator Dodd: All right. You may put on your clothes. That scar on your right breast, do you remember how that was inflicted?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Yes; by knife.

Senator Dodd: By knife?

Reverend Wurmbrand: By knife. I have been in Oslo. I went to a hospital. There were several physicians. I can give their names. I spoke with them about religion. In the beginning they said, "We are atheists," and then they saw my body and I asked them what treatment do I need. They said: " About treatment, do not ask us. Ask only the one in whom we don't believe, but who has kept you alive, because according to our medical books, you are dead. A man who has what you have, with four vertebras broken, cannot live. According to our medical books, you are dead. If you are alive, then the one in whom we don't believe has kept you alive."

Senator Dodd: I think it is important for our purposes to understand this completely. As I take it, they cut you, but they must have been asking you questions.

Reverend Wurmbrand: Surely, surely. I had worked in the representation of the World Council of Churches in Rumania, and after the war this World Council of Churches made a great relief work and I myself had relationship with the Rumanian patriarchs and with the bishops and with the Baptists and with the Pentecostals and Lutherans and so on, and we worked with all these. And now they wish to make with us in Rumania a great show process, a great show trial as they have made in Hungary with Cardinal Mindszenty and so on, and they wished from me accusatory statements against all these with whom I have had connections, and because I did not wish to give these accusatory statements, I and others have been tortured. This has been the usual thing. Nobody enters in the Rumanian secret police without being beaten, without being tortured. I have been not the worst tortured. The proof is that I am alive. So many died. Nearly all our Catholic bishops have been so handled that they have died, and in that time the Russians were in our country, they decided that the Catholic bishops should be killed. One of the members of the Government has been Gromyko, one of the murderers of Christians. Perhaps you will understand why I call his name.

Reverend Wurmbrand: I have seen Catholic priests, heroes, dying not only for Christ and confessing Christ to the end, but dying for the Pope.

I have heard the word of a Catholic priest, I will not tell his name. He was asked, "Do you still believe in the Pope?" and he said, "Since St. Peter there has always been a Pope, and until Christ will come again there will always be a Pope. And the actual Pope, Pius the 12th has not made peace with you and never will a Pope shake hands with you." He was trampled under the feet and tortured to death. Under our eyes he was killed. At that time a member of the government who killed this Catholic priest has been Gromyko, and the priest died with the hope that never will a Pope shake hands with his murderers.

Senator Dodd: You saw and heard this yourself.

Reverend Wurmbrand. Yes, surely; and it is not only one case. I could never finish if I would tell you what I have seen. I must just pour out before you my heart. I speak for a country and I speak for a church. We are very, very sad there about all these compromises. I must tell you I have been in England before I came to the States, and I have spoken with high Christian officials from England. The Archbishop of Canterbury and many canons and so on have been in our country recently, last year. So I asked Christian leaders – I will not tell names – "Why have you sat at banquets with our inquisitors? I am a little pastor, I cannot interrogate you, but I speak for the others who cannot speak for themselves. "Why have you sat at banquets with our inquisitors?"

I was answered, "We are Christians and must have friendship and fellowship with everybody, with the Communists, too. Don't you agree?"

I said, "I can't polemicize with you. I have not read the Bible for 14 years. You must know Christianity better than I. Faintly I remember in the Bible it is written that friendship with the world is hatred toward God. But supposing you must have friendship and fellowship with everybody. How is it that you have had friendship and fellowship only with our inquisitors, and with us never?"

Never have these great men of the West been in the houses of Christian martyrs. I have an only son and I love him. I cannot look to him. He looks like a skeleton. He has hungered. He will never be healthy. And so many of our children died. All these great relates from the West are great men. I am very little in comparison with them. But I always asked myself, "Well, all right, make friendship with the Communists. But only with the Communists?" They never inquired about us.

I asked them, "Why did you go to see the Pope, who is all right, who does not need your visit?" "When you have been in Rumania why have you not visited the tombs of the Catholic bishops killed in tortures? Why have you not shed there a tear? Why have you not put there a flower? That is what we expected. Why have you not left 10 pounds? Ten pounds would have been the salvation of a Catholic family there. You go to see the Pope. The Pope is all right. He has to eat and to drink." But I must say we are very sad there about these compromises with communism. We do not understand. I am a man who does not understand politics. I have not read newspapers for 14 years.

It may be right for a state to have peaceful existence with communism. I do not know. That is a question for Johnson and Goldwater to decide. But the church can never have peaceful coexistence with atheism. Everybody would laugh if I would say that health can peacefully exist with the microbe of tuberculosis, that the FBI can coexist peacefully with gangsters, that the church can peacefully exist with drunkenness, but communism and atheism is much worse than drug addiction and drunkenness.

You drink a little wine and the next day it passes, but communism poisons youth and our children since 50 years. How can there be peaceful existence with this on the side of churchmen and the church leadership I cannot understand.

I must say I have been very sad. I have read in your periodicals that, I do not know why, church bodies here ask the admission of Red China in the organization of allied nations. It may be right. I do not know politics. I do not know what this organization of allied nations is, but I ask myself, "You, a church periodical, why don't you write about the tortures inflicted to Chinese Christians by the communists? That is your business and leave the business of politics to the Senate and like this."

I express here the grief and the great pain of a suffering country and of a suffering church, and I apologize if I am a little unpolite.

Senator Dodd: You were the representative of the World Council of Christian Churches?

Reverend Wurmbrand: I was one of the workers of the office of the World Council of Churches. This man who give me a certificate, this Pastor Hedenquist, was at that time one of the leaders of the Council of Churches who came to Rumania.

Mr. Sourwine: You were responding to the chairman's question about what had been asked of you under interrogation. Did you complete that answer?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Well, it is a very interesting thing. Jesus says that the children of this world are wiser than the children of light. You are a political body. You interrogate me about what I have been asked about the World Council of Churches. The World Council of Churches never put to me this question.

Senator Dodd: Never what?

Reverend Wurmbrand: They have never put to me the question, "You have been arrested. One of the main subjects of your interrogation was that you represented us in Rumania. Please tell us what you have been interrogated about?"

I was never asked by them. The secret police wished to know everybody with whom they worked and with whom we had connections and so on. One of the great purposes of their interrogation was to know how they could win the World Council of Churches for their position.

Mr. Sourwine: How they could win?

Reverend Wurmbrand: The Council of Churches to defend their position.

Mr. Sourwine: How did you answer that one?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Well, I hoped - I must say that I was mistaken in the answers which I gave - I hoped that the World Council of Churches will never be won to their position.

Senator Dodd: Will never be what?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Won for their position.

Senator Dodd: Work for their position?

Reverend Wurmbrand: That they will never, so I had hoped. And now when I came out I read last month there was a sitting of the World Council of Churches in Geneva, in which they took the following decision, a very nice decision: "We ask both parts to keep peace."

But in the East nobody published this decision of theirs. Nobody in the East has the slightest ideas of this decision. So this disarms only the West. Such decisions are taken. They look very fine. The purpose has been accomplished.

Mr. Sourwine: You mentioned questions about the World Council of Churches. Was there more than one, or was there just the single question of how they could win it for their purposes?

Reverend Wurmbrand: No; there were also other questions; what relief they sent and to whom they gave this relief and what was the political purpose of this relief, and so on. They considered then the World Council of Churches - that was in 1948 - they considered the World Council of Churches as an American spy organization. They do not consider it any more like that.

Mr. Sourwine: You were being questioned by the Rumanian secret police, were you not?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Yes.

Mr. Sourwine: When you say they wanted to know how they could win the World Council of Churches for their purposes, did you mean for the purposes of Rumania?

Reverend Wurmbrand: No, no, no; for the purposes of communism, for the purposes of the whole Communist world.

Mr. Sourwine: In other words, the Rumanian secret police are, in your opinion at least, just like any other communist secret police?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Sure, there is no difference at all, and our interrogations, if they were important ones as mine, they went to Moscow. I know it from the Orthodox priest, Vasile Leon, who has been kidnaped from Austria and he has been brought to Moscow. In Moscow he has been interrogated about me. In Moscow they knew everything about Rumania. They worked hand in hand. At that time the secret Rumanian police had Soviet advisers.

Mr. Sourwine: I think you have touched on this, but can you perhaps give us a little more on the subject? What has been the policy and practice of the communists with respect to religion in countries where they have come into power?

Reverend Wurmbrand: They used three great instruments. First of all, the persecution, to make everybody afraid. They never accepted that they have put anybody in prison for religious motives. They found always political motives. Now I will give you the political motives.

A Unitarian pastor, a friend of mine, has been put in prison and sentenced to 7 years under the charge that on a Christmas Eve he has said that Jesus being a baby Herod wished to kill him but his holy mother fled with him to Egypt. That was the charge. "Aha, you meant us under Herod, and you hope Nasser will be on the side of the imperialists and therefore you mentioned Egypt."

Another friend of mine, a pastor, was sentenced to 15 years in prison. He was one of the greatest saints whom I have ever seen in life. The charge against him was he preached on a Sunday morning in a village about John 21 where it is said that the Lord walked on the seashore and he saw the apostles and asked them, "Have you something to eat?" They said, "We have not," and then Jesus said, "Throw your nets on the right side."

So the pastor preached from the pulpit. He asked, "Have you something to eat?" And when he asked, "Have you something to eat?" Everybody began to weep, because with us, peasants have nothing to eat. After the collectivization of agriculture our peasants have nothing to eat. Peasant children do not see milk and fruit. Everything goes to the collective and from the collective perhaps to Vietnam. Nobody knows where it goes. Our population does not see. They began to weep because they had nothing to eat and then the pastor, not knowing in what world he is, said, "Dear children, you have nothing to eat because you throw your nets on the left side. You must throw them on the right side." He meant the side of the clemency and of the goodness of God.

The next day there was the secret police, "Aha, you have said not to go to the left-wing with the communists but with the right side, the imperialists."

The man got 15 years of prison.

So there has been, first of all, this method of persecution. There has been, secondly, the method of corruption. We live in the times of the abomination of the desolation of the holy places. There have always been bad Popes and good Popes and bad priests and good priests. For the first time in church history the leadership of churches is dominated by the central committee of an avowed atheistic power. The central committee of the party decides who must be patriarch, who must be Baptist preacher, Pentecostal preacher, and so on. Everywhere they have found weak men or women with some sin. Those they have put in the leadership of churches and so you could hear in our theological seminary in Bucharest the theology that God has given three revelations - once through Moses, second through Jesus, the third through Karl Marx, and so on.

Religion is corrupted from within. Religion has been widely used and is still as the tools of communist politics. The priests everywhere had to propagate the collectivization of agriculture and everywhere when communists have something important to do, knowing the influence of religion, priests and pastors are put to preach these things.

Mr. Sourwine: Have the communists shown themselves to be opposed only to Christianity, or to all religions?

Reverend Wurmbrand: To all the religions. The Jewish religion has been persecuted just as the Christian religion. In the prison of Gherla we had a whole room with rabbis who were in prisons. We had in prison the Moslem priests and so on.

Mr. Sourwine: Did they segregate the rabbis in one room --

Reverend Wurmbrand: Yes.

Mr. Sourwine: The Christians in another, and --

Reverend Wurmbrand: No, no, they were at a time kept with us, but the rabbis, because they had to respect certain dietary laws and the Sabbath and so on, they separated them in order not to provoke collision with other prisoners.

Mr. Sourwine: Did the prison authorities permit the Jews to follow their dietary requirements?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Yes.

Mr. Sourwine: To practice their religion?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Yes; under one form. They could follow the dietary rules, not eating everything which has been given to them. That is all. They did not give them any special food.

Senator Dodd: Were the rabbis subjected to the same kind of torture that you suffered?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Yes; sure, sure. There was no difference in this. I must say it may look anecdote for you. I had a discussion once with the commandant of the prison of Targulacna, and he said, "We are not like the Fascists who made the racial differences and persecuted the Jews and Hungarians. We are not so. Look around you. We keep in prison Rumanians, Hungarians, and Jews all alike. We don't make racial differences."

Mr. Sourwine: That could be interpreted to mean that he was saying people of the Jewish faith were being persecuted for their religious activity, but not for their race.

Is it true that there is no anti-Semitism in Rumania?

Reverend Wurmbrand: There is anti-Semitism. Just before we left the country, everywhere where Jews were in high positions as chief engineers or directors in ministry and so on, they were silenced and put to lower functions.

Mr. Sourwine: Would you expand on that?

Senator Dodd: Just repeat it.

Reverend Wurmbrand: Yes, yes. Just before we left Rumania a few weeks before we left Rumania, all kinds of Jews who were chief engineer or directors or something great in different institutions have been put to lower positions just because they were Jews.

Senator Dodd: To lower positions?

Reverend Wurmbrand: To lower positions.

Mr. Sourwine: Not because of religion?

Reverend Wurmbrand: No, no.

Mr. Sourwine: Just as a matter of racial prejudice?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Sure. They could have been atheists. They were even members of the Communist Party, but if they were of Jewish origin, they were put to lower positions. From the secret police all the Jews have been driven out.

Mr. Sourwine: Are there any Buddhists in Rumania?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Buddhists? No; we have none. Perhaps a few intellectuals, just a few.

Mr. Sourwine: Have the communists done anything, to your knowledge, to try to win position and influence for communist agents in the religious community of the free world?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Sure. We had a professor, Justin Moisescu.

Mr. Sourwine: Moisescu?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Moisescu, yes. He was a professor. He had never been a priest. Truly a very clever and a very cultured man. He was professor of church history, but a layman. With us there has been a law that you can't be professor in a theological institute unless you are a priest. So he resigned. He didn't wish to be a priest.

And the, what discussions he had with the secret police he knows, he was known in the whole country as a whoremonger, as a drunkard, nobody appreciated him. At once we heard that in a few weeks he had become priest, bishop, metropolitan of Yasi. That is the highest function with us after the patriarch.

Mr. Sourwine: That is the Rumanian Orthodox Church?

Reverend Wurmbrand: In the Rumanian Orthodox Church. Whatever will be the consequences for me, I have told you how I have been threatened, and these threatenings are not simple words.

Recently from Italy two Rumanians have been kidnaped. We have their names. An I know what can happen to me. But I will tell you this Justin Moisescu personally has denounced a group of 400 Christian peasants from his own bishopric. I have been imprisoned with them. He has denounced the priests whom he ordained when he knew that they said some counterrevolutionary word.

He has a very impressive beard and he has come out to the free world and was accepted as a bishop, and those in the West believe that they speak with the Orthodox Church of Rumania and they speak with the secret police of Rumania. And now the interesting thing is I would not mind accepting men like him and like Gromatca, this arch traitor and others. I don't mind that they are accepted in the West. But I ask myself in every bargain, in every business, both parts must win. I give you the product but you must give me the dollars for it. We accept your traitors. What does the East accept from us? If we had posed to Rumania this question, "We will accept Justin Moisescu, you must accept a Bible society in Rumania," we would have it. But we accept without asking for it. Justin Moisescu is a member of the secret police. They sent to America the priest Liviu Stan. Everybody knows Liviu Stan is a man of the communists. When the communists came to power he was among the first ones who put posters on our walls that Christians must vote and go with the Communists. These posters were signed and the others by this Liviu Stan. The communists in Rumania are not so stupid to send here a man who will say. "I come from the side of the communist party" Liviu Stan came as a representative of the Orthodox Church of Rumania. And so they have many men. They have sent recently a priest, Ananaia.

Now that is a very interesting thing about this priest, Ananaia. This priest, Ananaia, has been with me in prison. He has been 10 years in prison. He has been beaten. He has passed through brainwashing. And they have such a confidence in brainwashing that they had the confidence to send him to the West and he does their work.

Senator Dodd: He is a priest in good standing, and of what church?

Reverend Wurmbrand: In the Orthodox church.

I speak out of the pain of a heart. I can't polemicize. I am a very little pastor. I can't polemicize with great religious bodies, but I am a man who has read nothing for 14 years. And now I came out to the West. I had always been very interested in missions and I wished to know what happens in missions. I took in hand the International Review of Missions, edited by the World Council of Churches, and I read there in the issue of January that in Rumania, orthodoxism and protestantism grow in an atmosphere of full religious liberty.

If the man who wrote this has not taken thousands of dollars from the Rumanian secret police, he deserves to be hanged for stupidity. He could have taken money for this. I believe he has not taken money. And then I wrote to them a letter, and said, "Either you lie or I lie. If I lie, I promise that never more will I be a pastor. If you lie you have to withdraw." Now to see if I lie or you lie I ask you to answer the following 20 questions, if you say there is full religious liberty in Rumania.

"Where is the office of the World Council of Churches of Religion in Rumania? It has offices everywhere. In the communist countries it has none.

"Where is the Bible Society? We have no Bible Society. Show me one Bible printed in 20 years. We have no such thing. Tell me the name of one Christian who for 20 years could publish a book. Give me the name of one Christian professor of humanistic sciences in our country. Tell me on Sunday school in Bucharest where it can be attended.

"Tell me where is the YMCA in Rumania. Where are the pastors Ghelbegeanu, Vacareanu, and so on?" They are in prison.

"Please answer to me these questions. If you have received answers, I have received answers."

There is no possible answers. It is not right for Christians to mock our sufferings. The communists have mocked us enough. Don't praise our inquisitors. That is the only thing which we ask.

I apologize before these great Christians bodies. I am really a very little man but I speak for the great saints who suffer in prison. It is not right to praise our inquisitors or to think that now they have become better.

Mr. Sourwine: Are the restrictive measures imposed upon the exercise of religion in Rumania today as stringent as they were 10 or 15 years ago?

Reverend Wurmbrand: No; they are no more stringent and I will explain to you why. I have been in a very poor family, a family with five children. Generally our men are very poor with us, unbelievably poor.

My salary when I left Rumania was $28. You say it is little, $28 a week. It was $28 a month. My son was not allowed to finish his studies because of my condemnation. He worked as a building worker and had $30 a month. Our bishop has $70 a month. And now our population is very, very poor.

Senator Dodd: When you say dollars, you mean the equivalent?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Yes; the equivalent of $70. Now I was in a very poor family with five little children, and I caressed a child and the mother said to me, "This child is so good, it doesn't weep even when it is hungry." It had given up weeping because the child knew it is useless to weep. You can't get food. And so this child was not beaten, because it didn't weep any more. The Rumanian people does not weep any more. And, therefore, it must not be beaten any more.

The Rumanian people, as well as the other peoples behind the Iron Curtain, are desperate. They have abandoned hope that they will ever be released. For years we have heard a broadcast station: "Rebel against communism, rebel against communism," and when we rebelled we were abandoned.

And we see how our oppressors are helped. I will tell you a scene.

Believe me, God is here. I tell you the scene just as it happened. It was in the years of brainwashing, the 14th year of prison. We are gathered to a meeting, and Major Alexandrescu, the commandant of the prison of Gherla, delivered us a speech and said:

"You fools, you set for 15 or 20 years in prison and expected the Americans to come. You expected the Americans will come and release you. Now I will give you the news. The Americans come but not to release you. They come to help us, to help us, to make business with us, to make trade with us. You fools have not known. The Americans if you beg them, they give you nothing.. If you insult them, if you mock them, they give you money. We have been more clever than you."

These are words which I have heard myself. Such things have happened in our country.

Mr. Sourwine: Are there any open churches in Rumania today, which anyone may attend?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Just I didn't finish this question. So there is a relaxation in what sense? Our people has given up the fight. Political underground movements don't exist any more with us. They have no such thing. And so everything has quieted down in the country, and so they don't need any more of the same terror. I have been for years in prison with thieves and murderers. Even before having been put in prison I have been chaplain of a prison. A thief after he has stolen is a gentleman. He gives to the waiters the greatest tips and he invites girls and he invites you and he orders the best wines. He has not worked for his money. And such thieves are the communists. They have stolen half of Europe, they have stolen Russia, too. They have stolen a great part of Asia. And now they have what they have stolen and they are gentlemen and they expect the next occasion to steal again.

In this sense there is a relaxation with us, but it is not an essential one. We continue to have the avowed dictatorship of an atheistic party. We have one party. There can be no religious freedom where there is one party. We have elections. Now a joke is made with us that when God created Adam, He created only one woman, Eve, and He said to Adam, "You are free to choose for wife whomsoever you wish." But there was only Eve. And so are the elections with us.

Our Government doesn't mind old women coming to church, but our childhood, our youth is poisoned with atheism. We are not allowed to counteract, and what bitter fruits will come out of this seed nobody can know.

Now you have asked another question, do we have open churches in Rumania? If somebody comes to Rumania - it is another situation in Russia - if somebody comes to Rumania, he is really impressed.

The Orthodox liturgy is something very beautiful. It is grand. And if you come in Rumania you see thousands of churches open, liturgies, sermons, many people in the church. And I have spoken with Americans who have been there and have told me, "I was very impressed." And now there is really a certain religious liberty. In Rumania you are allowed to say as much as you like that God is good. You are not allowed to say that the Devil is bad. St. John the Baptist could have saved his life if he had said: "Repent because the kingdom of heaven is near." Nobody would have touched him. He was touched when he said, "You, Herod, are bad."

If Christ would have delivered a thousand "Sermons on the Mount" they would not have crucified Him. They crucified Him when He said, "You vipers," then He was crucified.

In Rumania you can say God is good but you can't say "communism is cruel, they commit atrocities, it is a crime to poison children with atheism." If you do this you go to prison. There are many priests, rabbis, and pastors who compromise and don't put the dot on the "I." There exists the real church and the real religion and that which compromises.

Mr. Sourwine: Are there churchmen in Rumania today who willingly cooperate with the communist authorities?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Surely. The Orthodox hierarchy nearly entirely. Of the Catholic hierarchy, not one. The Catholic bishops died in prison, all except four. These four have house arrest. At the Vatican council no Catholic bishop was allowed to come. Came a Catholic priest, a well-known traitor, Augustine, who is the real leader of the Catholic Church; the leadership of the Baptists, for example, is entirely in the hands of the communists.

I have here a document which I present to the Senate, a list of 150 Russian Baptist pastors recently deported to Siberia. Not all arrived in Siberia. Many died of tortures.

Senator Dodd: Can you talk a little more slowly? I could get your pronunciation better.

Reverend Wurmbrand: This is a list of 150 Baptist pastors of Russia who have been recently deported to Siberia. I have the names , the addresses, the names of their wives, of their children. They have not all arrived to Siberia, because of the tortures many died.

Senator Dodd: These were Rumanians?

Reverend Wurmbrand: No, no, Russians. And I give it to the Senate.

Mr. Sourwine: Mr.Chairman, do you wish this list and the document of transmittal to go into the record? There is an English translation to be made.

Senator Dodd: Yes; I believe it should be in the record.

Mr. Sourwine: Will you hand that list to the reporter?

(NOTE: The list and the document are not listed in this Net publication as they were too copious in nature. However, the information can be copied from the original transcript. Try your local library).

Senator Dodd: I don't quite understand this. These are 40 Russian Baptists?

Reverend Wurmbrand: 150.

Senator Dodd: Were they in Rumania?

Reverend Wurmbrand: No, no, they are Russians. We got from Russia. Here I have another very interesting document.

Mr. Sourwine: If you would excuse me, please, I believe the Senator's question raises a point you should clear up. How do you have this information about Russia? Have you been in Russia?

Reverend Wurmbrand: I have worked for years secret missionary work among the Russian soldiers who occupied our country. I speak Russian fluently, and we brought many Russian soldiers to Christ. To preach Christ to the Russians means Heaven on earth. They seek the Gospel as the thirsty soil seeks water. They have not known Him. The beauty of the Gospel you know is when you preach to Russians; how they live it and how they enjoy it, and so I have made some connections.

In a public sitting I can't say how I have arrived to have these lists.

Mr. Sourwine: You know it to be authentic?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Personally I can tell you from where I have this list, but it is absolutely authentic. It can be controlled. Surely in a public sitting I can't say how I have received it.

I present to the Senate also a very interesting document, the most interesting I have ever known in this matter, the document, "Li Wei Man." It is a letter of the Central Committee of the Communist party of China addressed to the Central Committee of the Communist party of Cuba. Now recently they have quarreled but this letter is an older one in which they teach how to win the leadership of the churches for communism, how to make that the communists should be leaders of the churches. It is an unequaled document of Machiavelianism.

We have lived these things but never have I seen it put on paper as this.

Mr. Sourwine: May I suggest this be printed as an appendix to the record, Mr. Chairman?

Senator Dodd: Yes.

Senator Dodd: I take it what you have been telling us must be more or less common knowledge in Rumania, is it?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Yes; surely.

Senator Dodd: Would it be accurate to deduce that the embassy officials of the several countries must have heard it too?

Reverend Wurmbrand: They don't wish to be troubled in their quietness. They close their eyes before this menace. I have met men who simply close their eyes when I told them about these things. They know that they are true. But they have a certain policy of friendly relationship with the communist countries, and they are very honest men, but they are duped exactly as we were duped in Rumania.

Wherever the communists came in the beginning, they said the same thing which I read here in newspapers and in periodicals. "You know Stalin's communism has been very bad, but Yugoslavian communism or another kind of communism, this is very good."

A little lion in its first days you can play with him just like with a puppy. When he becomes great, only then he is a lion. Yugoslavian communism is this little communism. And American communism a very little one and English communism is a very little one. When they grow, when they can do whatever they will to do, then only we can see them With us, in the beginning, we also had a very nice communism. I have seen in Rumanian Communist demonstrations signs with the slogan, "God save the King." I have seen the communist Secretaries of State making great crosses, showing themselves as being on the side of religion and making compliments to religion and bowing to religion and saying they are Democrats. In the beginning, they have put in prison party members who said that the agriculture must be collectivized. And they have gone together with the bourgeois party, with the Liberal Party of Tatorescu and with other Democrats.

I have seen in the West Social Democrats collaborate with them. In Rumania, I have seen dying Social Democrats in the same cell with me; they died. Communists in Rumania, too, were nice until they had the whole power in hand. When they had the whole power in hand, they have done things exactly as in Russia, and so they will do everywhere. There is no difference.

Mr. Sourwine: You mentioned demonstrations by the Communists. Does Rumania have anything like the demonstrations that are so prevalent in this country, demonstrations against the Government's activities or against its policies?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Nobody can say a word of criticism. Such a thing doesn't even enter in the mind of somebody. I will tell you something of which may be laughable for you. It is very tragical with us. But the story is just as I tell you. I know the man. A man was in a barbershop in a little town, Sibiu. While the barber shaved him, he said to the barber: "What should I do? My hair falls." The barber said, "Very well, I will make you a friction but you must not be anxious about this. The most intelligent people of the world have been bald." On the other seat there was an officer of the secret police and he said to the barber, " What have you said now?"

"I have said that the most intelligent people of the world are bald."

"So, you assert that Stalin has not been intelligent." It is a question of laughter for you but it is tragical with us. Nobody dares to say a word.

I stopped in Newark, and in Philadelphia, a demonstration against the war in Vietnam. I had not this clerical suit on. I stopped the demonstrators and I undressed myself to the belt. Afterwards I heard that it is illegal here in the States, and that I could have gone to prison for this. I undressed myself.

Senator Dodd: It would have been all right on the bathing beach.

Reverend Wurmbrand: Yes; it was not on the beach. And I told them, "This have Communists done to me. Do you think that American Christians should fight against communism?" So they surrounded me and asked me, "Why have Communists done to you this?" I said to them, "Suppose that I am a murdered. Do you agree that a murderer should be tortured? Has Oswald been tortured? Has Ruby been tortured with you?" They all said, "No; murderers have not been tortured." I continued: "Then know that I have not be charged with murder. I am a clergyman." They stopped the demonstration. In Philadelphia there was again such a demonstration. I am not a man of politics. I can't speak for the war of Vietnam or against the war in Vietnam. I speak this general principle that Christians must be on the side of righteousness. They must never be on the side of the inquisitors of Christians. They must be on the side of the victims of the inquisitors, they must be on the side of the Christians.

In Philadelphia there was a great meeting. A pastor with clerical suit, a Presbyterian pastor, delivered a speech in which he praised Communists and said that Communists are all right and it is stupid to fight against them. I have learned something from the Communists. In a minute - after - the pastor was no more in the pulpit, I was in the pulpit. I said: "Now I will speak about communism. What do you know about communism? And I will show you my credentials, how I have studied communism." I undressed myself to the belt. I did not know that all these bad reporters are there and took pictures. And I showed them my body. "That is what Communists do to Christians, and you, Pastor, why don't you make demonstrations, if you are a Christian and if you have youth in you and vigor, why don't you demonstrate before the Soviet and Rumanian Embassies and the other embassies against torturing Christians?" And then the public, which has been there booed him and shouted to him " Judas."

These are Judases. They may be all right innerly, I don't know their hearts, but I think that Christians, if they wish to demonstrate, they should demonstrate against those who have recently deported 150 Baptist pastors.

Mr. Sourwine: The subcommittee has received substantial information to the effect that the Rumanian Communist Government has infiltrated into this country Communist trained clergy with other missions than those of a spiritual nature. Do you have any information about that?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Rumanian Communists are very interested in the fact that you have here, in the States, something like 300,000 on their side. They can't very well win them for communism, but they can win them for a leftwing Christianity which supports communism. They have sent here several men, Moisescu, Liviu Stan, and so on. These don't come with Communist slogans but with the words: "You must love your Rumanian fatherland.  You must have connections with the Rumanian patriarchy." Whey I came out from Rumania I saw for the first time a Rumanian newspaper which appears in Bucharest, and which nobody in Bucharest has ever seen. The Voice of the Fatherland it is called, and in the fatherland nobody sees this newspaper. Only your American Rumanians see it and in France. I have never seen it. My son looked at it, and we have never seen it. In this newspaper you read about priests and churches. In our newspapers you will never have a word about the church. There you have pictures of priests and monasteries and how fine it is and so on. They make this propaganda, surely.

Senator Dodd: You mean this paper is only distributed in the free world?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Only in the free world. They have at midnight, which corresponds to I don't know what hour here in the United States, it is noon or I don't know what, they have religious services which are jammed in Rumania, but they are emitted from Rumania. We have no religious services on the broadcasts. These are broadcast religious services only that the Americans should know how fine the Communists are and that they have religious services.

Mr. Sourwine: Are you saying that the religious services of the Rumanian Orthodox Church –

Reverend Wurmbrand: Yes.

Mr. Sourwine: Are broadcasts in Rumania at a time which is midnight in Rumania?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Yes.

Mr. Sourwine: Beamed to the Western World?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Yes; sure.

Mr. Sourwine: To the free world?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Sure.

Mr. Sourwine: And not broadcast in Rumania?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Sure. In Rumania, nobody hears them.

Mr. Sourwine: Of course, a broadcast beamed from Rumania to the United States necessarily will have enough power to be picked up in Rumania if anyone wanted to tune in.

Reverend Wurmbrand: First of all, it is a very inconvenient hour. It is midnight for us. Secondly, in Rumania it is jammed.

Mr. Sourwine: It is what?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Jammed.

Mr. Sourwine: They jam it in Rumania?

Reverend Wurmbrand: They jam it in Rumania.

Mr. Sourwine: So that even those who know about it, who might try to pick it up ----

Reverend Wurmbrand: It is jammed. You can't hear it in Rumania.

Mr. Sourwine: Suppose a group of persons were called together trying to tune in that broadcast above the jamming. Would there be reprisals against them? It is an illegal thing?

Reverend Wurmbrand: In this moment, no reprisals would be taken. No reprisals are taken today if somebody hears foreign broadcasts. But everything is noted. What happens with us? We have waves of terror. We have had a great wave of terror from 1948 and 1949 which lasted until 1955. We had the relax until 1958 when nobody was arrested but everything was noted.

Then in 1959 came again a wave of terror, and all those who were noted for years before were taken in. And now the whole spy work continues with us. You are not arrested. But everybody knows that he is spied out and that everything is noted. How far this inner spy net goes is unimagined. In a little townlet of ours there is a little Baptist church with only 22 members. The pastor of that church told me that he is the informer of the secret police and that he knows three members of his church who give information against him. So it was in the church in which I was. The servant of the church had the order to inform who comes to me. I had no salary. So, usually men who came to me brought a little parcel with food and clothes and so on. The servant had to spy out who comes with parcels. In the smallest churches you have five or six who have to spy out what the others do. One neighbor spies the other. Children spy on their father and so on. It is without end so nobody dares to do a thing.

Senator Dodd: I am somewhat interested in these interrogations to which you were subjected. If I understand you correctly, they lasted for hours; is that right?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Yes; surely.

Reverend Wurmbrand Well, they asked many things. First of all they wished to know who has said counterrevolutionary things of all the bishops and priests and pastors and laymen whom I knew. Who has spoken against the Government. Who has something against the Government. How we organized and so on, without end. And now at a certain moment I was tired with being beaten. They told me at a certain moment, "Mr. Wurmbrand, supposing that you are not a counterrevolutionary, you are a well-known pastor in the whole country and everybody had confidence in you and you spoke with bishops and all kinds of men and you have been in so many villages and towns and everybody confessed to you and so forth. Tell us who are the counterrevolutionaries. Don't speak about your activity. You are all right. You are not a counterrevolutionary. But then show your loyalty toward our Government, tell us who the counterrevolutionaries are. Are you disposed to do so?" So, I said, "Yes; I am disposed."

When they heard that I am disposed, they asked me: "Do you smoke, do you wish liquors?" Everything I could have at that moment. And he knew, the officer, that he will receive another star there if he gets from me this information. And then he asked me now, "Who are the counterrevolutionaries?" I said, "As you know I have worked on an international scale, so I can tell you the counterrevolutionaries not only in Rumania but even in Russia."

Oh, he was so glad. I said: "In Russia, you have had as Secretary of State for Internal Affairs, Yagoda. Yagoda has killed thousands of people as counterrevolutionaries. Then you have discovered who has been the counterrevolutionary: Yagoda has been. Yagoda has been shot as counterrevolutionary.

"Then you have had as Secretary of State for Internal Affairs, Beria, and Beria has killed other thousands of people as counterrevolutionaries. Then you have found out who has been the counterrevolutionary: Beria. " Why do you seek the counterrevolutionaries in the church? See them in your own party. And in Rumania it has been the same thing.

Communists are not only anti-Christian. They are anti everything. They are anti their own comrades.

I have been in prison. I have been there with Lucretiu Patrascanu, the great Communist leader, who has brought communism to power in our country. He was put in prison and tortured until he became mad.

My wife has been in prison with Gheorghe Cristescu. Everybody in Rumania knows the founder of communism in Rumania, who has been in prison for communism under the bourgeois. He has been with my wife together, and he said to my wife, "Forty years ago I fought for the 8-hour labor day and now my Communist Party has come to power and I have to work 14 hours a day."

They are anti absolutely everything. It is not only anti-Christian.

Senator Dodd: What was the name of the prominent woman Communist in Rumania?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Ana Pauker, and she was also in prison.

Senator Dodd: Do you know her?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Yes, yes surely; she has also been in prison, and she has been kept a short time and then afterward she died of cancer.

Mr. Sourwine: I have no more questions, sir.

Senator Dodd: We don't have any more questions. Do you have anything more you want to say, Pastor?

Reverend Wurmbrand: I want to say something. I owe it to those with whom I have been in prison. I have told you so many sad things. I don't wish to end with this note. I must tell you that in these great tortures and this great suffering, Christians have shown themselves as saints and as heroes, and if I am allowed to conclude with just one scene which I have seen myself.

It was at the canal. With us, 150,000 men and women have been arrested to build a canal. Beaten, tortured, hungry, without anything, they had to build a canal.

Senator Dodd: Build a canal?

Reverend Wurmbrand: Yes; a canal, the Danube Canal. My wife has worked and shoveled the earth. At this canal, there was a religious brigade of 400 men, bishops, priests, peasants who loved Christ, sectarians and so on, all who were for religious motives in prison.

Over this brigade criminals have been put, and to the criminals it has been promised that they will be released if they torture these Christians. This promise has never been kept. But imagine a criminal who is sentenced for life, if he knows that he has such a hope. If they saw you in this brigade making a cross as it is a habit with us in Rumania, or folding your hands or saying a word about God you were beaten to death.

And now a Sunday morning the political officer of the prison comes, the whole brigade is gathered, and just at random he sees a young man. He calls him, "What is your name?" He says the name. "What are you by profession?" He said, "A priest." And then mocking the Communist said, " Do you still believe in God?"

This priest knew that if he says yes, this is the last day of his life. We all looked to him. For a few seconds he was silent. Then his face began to shine and then he opened his mouth and with a very humble but with a very decided voice he said: "Mr. Lieutenant, when I became a priest I knew that during church history thousands of Christians and priests have been killed for their faith, and notwithstanding I became a Christian and I became a priest. I knew what I became. And as often as I entered the altar clad in this beautiful ornate which priests wear I promised to God, "If I will wear the uniform of a prisoner, then also I will serve Him. Mr. Lieutenant, prison is not an argument against religion. I love Christ from all my heart."

I am sad that I can't give the intonation with which he said these words. I think that Juliet when she spoke about Romeo, she spoke like that. We were ashamed because we - we believed in Christ. This man loved Christ as a bride loves the bridegroom. This man has been beaten and tortured to death. But this is Rumania. Rumania is a country which is mocked, which is oppressed, but deep in the hearts of the people is a great esteem and a great praise for those who have suffered. The love to God, the love to Christ, the love to fatherland has never ceased. My country will live. With this I finish.

Senator Dodd: Your testimony has certainly been very impressive. (At this point, a member of the audience later identified as L.D. O'Flaherty, addressed the Chair).

Mr. O'Flaherty: Mr. Chairman, we have pretty substantial reason to believe that our brother is in danger of his life, and I don't know what steps we could take to have him claim asylum here. He has asylum in France, but we fear for his life because as he has told you, they have told him they will bump him off, get a gangster to bump him off. What arrangements if any - I am not a politician or a political science scholar - what arrangements could be made for his asylum in this country? Can he make a declaration to secure asylum here for his protection?

We know individuals have followed him from city to city unknown to him, and I ask this openly here.

Senator Dodd: Would you identify yourself? I didn't get your name.

Mr. O'Flaherty: O'Flaherty. L.D. O'Flaherty.

Senator Dodd: O'Flaherty?

Mr. O'Flaherty: I am a businessman, a Christian businessman. I am a director in a certain organization here that is giving him support, Friends of Israel. On that basis I make this request. I don't think he understands the danger.

Reverend Wurmbrand: We have a God who protects us. We have the angels around us.

Senator Dodd: I think we had better discuss this matter privately with the pastor after the public hearing. I don't think it is a matter which should be discussed publicly.

Mr. O'Flaherty: Thank you.

Senator Dodd: We will adjourn this hearing now subject to further call.

(Whereupon, at 11:50 a.m., the subcommittee adjourned subject to the call of the Chair).

VOICE OF THE MARTYRS - Richard Wurmbrand

Communists Should Not Teach In American Colleges

"What the Communists have done to Christians surpasses any possibility of human understanding."

Reverend Wurmbrand

Since Americans are running towards totalitarianism at breakneck speed, and since they have allowed the Communists to establish the vast majority of The Communist Manifesto here in America under the guise of Liberalism with more freedom and liberty gobbled up by the minute, it is only fitting to let some light shine on the future of American children and grandchildren, for the day is approaching, when they grab complete power.

Thanks so much for reading this. I know few will, as it is very long. The first time I read this years ago, I just sat silent for hours thinking about things.

I have known people like this man. I've heard much worse than even this. Much worse. All the lies and compromises that led to the enslavement of Rumania, you can hear every day from the liberals right here in this country -- and from the national council of churches.

"A little lion in its first days you can play with him just like with a puppy. When he becomes great, only then he is a lion. Yugoslavian communism is this little communism. And American communism a very little one and English communism is a very little one. When they grow, when they can do whatever they will to do, then only we can see them With us, in the beginning, we also had a very nice communism. I have seen in Rumanian Communist demonstrations signs with the slogan, "God save the King." I have seen the communist Secretaries of State making great crosses, showing themselves as being on the side of religion and making compliments to religion and bowing to religion and saying they are Democrats. In the beginning, they have put in prison party members who said that the agriculture must be collectivized. And they have gone together with the bourgeois party, with the Liberal Party of Tatorescu and with other Democrats. "

Richard Wurmbrand had plenty of time to think during his fourteen years in a Communist prison. He reflected on his life, his world, and especially his Creator. His fellow prisoners included other pastors, theologians, and Bible scholars. They shared ideas and insights, and even preached sermons to each other.

The captivity he endured included years of solitary confinement. Although deprived of human companionship, he remained in intimate communion with God. He examined in depth the revelation of the Bible and its mandates for the Christian life.

His meditations from those years are provocative, challenging, sometimes disturbing. They are the thoughts of a man who has been close to God and close to death. After reading his contemplations, you will read the Bible in an entirely different way. You will look on your fellow man in a new light. You may even live in a new way.

Richard Wurmbrand is a Rumanian pastor. When the Soviets took over Rumania he worked with the underground Church. Arrested for this work, he served eight years in prison. When released, he went right back to his underground ministry and then back to jail. After his final release, he was able to leave Rumania through the efforts of Christians in Norway. Today he heads the mission organization known as "Jesus to the Communist

This is the fourteenth title which I have had published since I arrived in the free world.

I had come to the West, after fourteen years in Communist prisons, almost unknown, and not at all familiar with the Western reader.

I owe it to Edward England, a man wholeheartedly dedicated to providing the church with food for souls, that my books could appear, spread and be translated in over fifty languages.

God rewarded his work. The publishing of these books, which tell of the struggle, the heroism and the faith of Christians under unspeakable oppression, led to the founding of the International Christian Mission to the Communist World.

Edward England provided the English-speaking Commonwealth with books extolling Christ; this mission in whose foundation he played a decisive role now does the same thing secretly in Communist countries.

Our mission and I express herewith our thanks.

Preface

While in Australia recently, I received the news that my daughter-in-law in California had been gravely injured in an automobile accident that demolished the car. Her nine-year-old daughter, who was with her at the time, had also been hurt. When I called California to learn the details, my granddaughter, in answer to my inquiries, exclaimed, "I have good news! I received a cat for a present!" Then followed a graphic description of - the cat.

Jesus taught us to become like little children, to take a detached view of events, even tragic ones. We may bleed, we may be traumatized, but still we can experience joy in little things that might be considered childlike or unsophisticated.

This is exactly what happened to me in jail.

I spent fourteen years in Communist prisons (not many by Communist standards: the Rumanian Baptist pastor Hrapov has been in jail for twenty-seven years; the Catholic Paulaitis for thirty-four; the Orthodox monk Michael Ershov for forty-four). We were hungry, beaten, tortured. For years we were individually isolated in solitary cells, where we heard nothing, not even a whisper.

We had not books or writing materials, much less a Bible. We never saw a child, and seldom a woman. We saw no colors: our world was gray. The walls were gray, our uniforms were gray, even our faces were an ashen gray. We soon forgot that blue, green, red, violet exist.

During those long gray months, those leaden years, what did we think about? Certainly not about Communism or about having to suffer. Our minds were too childlike to be controlled by events.

Shakespeare, in "Henry IV," wrote, "Thought is the slave of life." Humanistic philosophy also claims that material conditions determine how our minds work. This might well be true for adults, but not for children. A child lying in a hospital bed after a major accident can have uppermost in his mind a promised toy. We had the same experience. We thought often about things completely unrelated to the pains endured. This is not to deny that everything in jail could be a problem. Will there be many worms in our soup today? Will it contain at least five beans, or perhaps a few more? Will we be allowed to use the toilet? Will I be beaten today? How should I mislead my interrogator so as not to denounce others and cause their arrest? Will I ever be freed? We had problems, but would not allow these to obsess us.

Not long ago, during a board meeting of the Christian Mission to the Communist World, my granddaughter sat on the carpet near us playing with her toys. Overhearing our melancholy discussion of mission problems, she asked, "O papa, what is 'problem'? Where is the word "problem" found in the Bible?" I replied, "Nowhere." Puzzled, she queried, "Then why do you, pastors, worry about something that is not in the Bible?"

This happened years after my release from prison. While in jail, we did not live with problems. Let them beat, starve, mock us. With such things our torturers busied themselves. We were free to rejoice in the mysteries of the Word of God. With such things we kept busy.

I thought about God and about the Bible, about its words, its letters, even the blank spaces between the letters. At times I saw these shapes more vividly than the black letters. During those years the only author I considered apart from the Bible was Shakespeare.

Charles Dickens once said his father gave him this advice: "Each day read a page of the Bible to know God and a page from Shakespeare to know men." Perhaps because I am Jewish, and thus basically Oriental, I think much in images, not in propositions. With me in my cell were the Bible characters of old, as well as the saints of all ages - that "cloud of witnesses" mentioned by Paul. I also saw, as in a theater, Shakespeare's characters.

From childhood I have possessed a fantastic memory, which, with much exercise, expanded even more in prison (though there were temporary breakdowns as a result of being doped). All prisoners indulged in images. Drugs, which were put in our food for brainwashing, enriched the imagery. But we knew that beyond the images lay the Truth, so complex that even a multitude of images could not exhaust it. We must be able to look at it in its nakedness, in its simplicity. This I attempted to do.

The day I was baptized, the Jewish Christian pastor Isaac Feinstein gave me a verse: "Reuben [my Hebrew name] shall live and not die." In a similar vein, Shakespeare said about King Richard II, "God for his Richard has a glorious angel. Then, if angels fight, weak men must fall."

With this in mind, I did not waste time, between beatings and tortures, thinking about how badly I had been beaten or fearing that I would be beaten again. Instead, I recited verses of Scripture, Shakespeare, and other poetry. I even composed poems.

"All places that the eye of heaven visits are to a wise man ports and happy havens" ("Richard II"). This even includes Communist prison cells. Atheists believe they put me in jail. I believe God sent me there, to allow me to delve more deeply into the truths concealed within His words.

The outward circumstances, the complete silence, the situation of not being distracted by either sight or sound - all were highly favorable to deep thought. This is when I composed the essence of meditations presented in this book.

After three years of solitary confinement, we were moved to common cells. There I met with many theologians, some of them exquisite Hebraists and scholars in Greek. Now my thoughts could be chiseled and honed. Later, when free, I could complete the work with scholarly research.

God says we should serve Him not only with all our heart, but also with all our mind. This means intellectual work, hard work. As children we used our brains to learn algebra and geometry. As adults we explore the mysteries of molecules and atoms. When man split the atom, he created the ultimate weapon. Why should we not ponder diligently every atom of the Word of God, however challenging the task, so that we might counter with the ultimate Truth? This desire is strong within me, as I contemplate the words of life that can conquer the destructive forces of godless thinking.

Imprisoned Christians mocked gnawing sorrow. In chains, sometimes in straitjackets and gagged (we were considered mad), awaiting the specter of death as often as the cell door was opened, we thought about God's Word.

Christians in the free world also contemplate His Word. But because thoughts given by God in those extreme circumstances might resound with deeper harmony, I publish them. "They breathe truth that breathe their words in pain." I am confident that these reflections conceived in silence and nurtured in pain will enable you to delve more profoundly into truth, in order to know "the" Truth.

1 The Mystery of Jesus' Sacrifice

Suppose you were living 2,000 years ago in Palestine, that you were sinful, heavy with guilt, and Jesus told you, "Your sin is grave and deserves punishment. 'The wages of sin are death.' But tomorrow I will be flogged and crowned with a crown of thorns for you - I invite you to assist them when they drive nails into my hands and feet and fix me to a cross. I will cry in anguish, and I will share the sorrow of my mother whose heart will be pierced by compassion for me as if by a sword. You should be there to hear my cries. And when I have died, you shall know that your sins are forgiven forever, that I was your substitute, your scapegoat. This is how a man gets saved. Will you accept my suffering for your offense, or do you prefer to bear the punishment yourself?" What would you have answered?

I believe that this dilemma should be placed before a soul seeking salvation. Fifteen hundred years before the historical birth of Christ the Bible says, "This day have I begotten thee" (PSA 2:7). It also says to the penitent 2,000 years after Golgotha, "Today I die for you." Jesus' life and death are outside of time and space.

Would you accept? More than once in Communist prisons I have seen a pastor receive a beating to the blood in place of another prisoner. A name would be called and the pastor would simply say, "It is I." In Auschwitz, Maximilian Kolbe, a priest, offered to take the place of a Pole sentenced to death by the Nazis. The Pole was the father of many children. The

commandant of the camp accepted the substitution and the Pole was

I lived many years in an isolated subterranean prison cell, in timelessness, something akin to the weightlessness experienced by astronauts. Just as they know no difference between heavy and light, I knew no distinction between past, present and future. In my prison cell Jesus' presence was immediate. His life did not belong to the past, nor was it a series of successive events. He put before me the problem which I have put to my readers. He told me, "You are a sinner and are condemned to eternal punishment for your transgressions, but I am ready to save you. Because of your sin, I will endure rejection, flogging, the pains of crucifixion and the agony of seeing my holy mother broken-hearted at the foot of the cross. My blood will cleanse you from all sin." I had to decide whether or not to accept the sacrifice of the innocent Son of God for my sins. I believed that to accept would be a greater wickedness than all I might ever have done in my life and I flatly refused this proposal. Jesus was glad of my "No."

Then came the real question, the thing He had had in mind from the beginning. "What if I incorporate your being into mine, if you become part of my body, if you deny yourself as an independent self, and I will live in you henceforth and you will be 'crucified with me' (GAL 2:20), 'buried with me' (ROM 6:4), and share the fellowship of my suffering? People in churches will sing, 'safe in arms of Jesus,' while you will be safe as an arm of Jesus, nailed like His to a cross, but also imparting goodness like His. Do you wish to become my co-worker for the salvation of mankind, alleviating sufferings, filling up 'that which is behind the afflictions of Christ' (COL 1:24), and imparting eternal life to others? By virtue of my presence in you, the real fruits of my wounds will appear in your soul."

I have accepted this proposal. Christians are meant to have the same vocation as their King, that of cross-bearers. It is this conscience of a high calling and of partnership with Jesus which brings gladness in tribulation, which makes Christians enter prisons for their faith with the joy of a bridegroom entering the bridal room.

When George Vins, the general secretary of the Baptist Union of USSR, was sentenced for his faith, believers present in the courtroom covered him with flowers, and his little daughter, hoisted on a stool, recited in front of the Communist judges, "Father, with Christ you are free in prison, and freedom without Him is prison." The believers waiting outside the building received him with a Christian hymn.

The relative of a Christian prisoner in Red China said to someone who sympathized with her, "You should not feel sorry for us, for if he were not in that slave labor camp, how could the others here come to know the Gospel of the Lord Jesus?"

In the same spirit we should receive the crosses of poverty, racial discrimination, personal betrayals, unfaithfulness of marriage partners, rebellion of children and all other sorrows of life.

A man who smugly accepts Christ's dying for him and shouts Hallelujah about the innocent Son of God receiving punishment he himself deserves should be more severely punished than before. The Gospel, the good news, is the privilege of becoming a member of the Body of Christ, of suffering, of dying in pain with Him, and also of being resurrected with Him in glory.

Because sacrifice is implicit in a conversion, the call of the Evangelist has the name "altar-call." Every being placed upon the altar in Jerusalem, lambs, rams, and pigeons, died. Someone dies for you. This time it is not an animal, but the Son of God. He has decreed it and nothing you can do will change His mind. You can only ask for the privilege of being able to sacrifice yourself as well henceforth for the glory of God and for the good of your fellowmen. In return you receive the right to die to sin and to the world and its laws.

The reality of a conversion is in becoming one with Him. It is shameful and abominable to accept His substitutionary death otherwise.

2 Why All the Suffering?

Reading the Bible in a solitary cell, from memory, I am struck by the extent to which suffering pervades it. It begins with the catastrophe of mankind's expulsion from paradise, and it concludes with the majority of mankind entering hell.

Why do even saints have to suffer? Why are there sufferings in the animal and vegetable kingdoms? Why is a baby born with suffering? Is suffering God's only educational method? Why does evil exist? Why have Christians suffered for decades in Communist jails?

After dedicating forty years of his life to missionary work among the Australian aborigines, a pastor fell sick. He suffered greatly as he was being transported on primitive roads to the city and was barely able to breathe. He asked his family to sing and to read to him from the Bible. Finally he said, "Stop praises. I have served Him my whole life and He does not care for me." He took the Bible from his wife's hand and threw it into the bush. He could find no answer to the problem of suffering.

The only answer which I believe should be given is not to ask the question. Jesus, when He was on the Cross, asked God why He had forsaken even His only begotten Son. His question is followed only by a question mark. All that is revealed to us is that the question exists and that we can live with it.

A sufferer once came to a pastor and asked him many questions. The pastor answered, "Kneel here in church and ask Jesus for the answers." The man replied, "Do you really think I will hear a voice from heaven?" "No," said the pastor, "but by keeping quiet in prayer for several hours before God, you will realize that you can go along without answers to all your problems. This would have been Jesus' answer and it will quiet you." You do not need more than His peace, which passes all understanding. You do not need both peace and understanding, for understanding presupposes qualifications which of most us do not have.

The Talmud (Haghiga) says that there were four men who ascended to the highest firmament, Ben Azai, Ben Zoma, Elisha ben Abuya and Rabbi Akiba. Ben Azai saw the glory of God and died. Ben Zoma saw and went mad. Elisha ben Abuya became irreligious. Only Rabbi Akiba returned unharmed.

Paul writes about a man who was caught up into paradise, but he could not communicate to anyone about what he experienced because the words he heard in paradise were unspeakable words (2CO 12:2-4).

A legend says that Moses once sat near a well in meditation. A wayfarer stopped to drink from the well and when he did so his purse fell from his girdle into the sand. The man departed. Shortly afterwards another man passed near the well, saw the purse and picked it up. Later a third man stopped to assuage his thirst and went to sleep in the shadow of the well. Meanwhile, the first man had discovered that his purse was missing and assuming that he must have lost it at the well, returned, awoke the sleeper (who of course knew nothing) and demanded his money back. An argument followed, and irate, the first man slayed [sic] the latter. Whereupon Moses said to God, "You see, therefore men do not believe in you. There is too much evil and injustice in the world. Why should the first man have lost his purse and then become a murderer? Why should the second have gotten a purse full of gold without having worked for it? The third was completely innocent. Why was he slain?"

God answered, "For once and only once, I will give you an explanation. I cannot do it at every step. The first man was a thief's son. The purse contained money stolen by his father from the father of the second, who, finding the purse, only found what was due him. The third was a murderer whose crime had never been revealed and who received from the first the punishment he deserved. In the future believe that there is sense and righteousness in what transpires even when you do not understand.

Faith in God is the sole answer to the mystery of evil.

3 Respect Poverty

In prison, I come to the lowest level of poverty. I possess nothing, which makes me look in a new light at this verse - "Rob not the poor, because he is poor. Neither oppress the afflicted in the gate" (PRO 22:22).

Do not rob the poor of his only wealth, that precious jewel, poverty itself. St. Francis of Assisi spoke about "sorella poverta," sister poverty. Ascetics and saints of all ages have abandoned earthly joys for this valuable friend. Moses preferred the poor life of a pastor to being grandson of Pharaoh. Buddha left his father's palaces to know the serenity which only utter poverty can give. Christ, possessor of heaven, chose birth in a stable, life as a carpenter among oppressed people and death among thieves on a cross. He said, "Blessed be ye, poor, for yours is the Kingdom of God" (LUK 6:20).

With what right do I take away the source of a man's blessedness? If I deprive him of poverty, I deprive him of the Kingdom of Heaven. Imagine how it would have been had the rich man of the parable (LUK 16:19-31) been what is usually called good-hearted and divided with poor Lazarus his purple robes and fine linen, and invited him to dine sumptuously with him every day. He would have called Lazarus into future hell.

Poverty is the entryway to the Kingdom of Heaven. The ugly embryonic stage when we look like frogs and apes is the prologue to manhood. Destroy a caterpillar because it is a repugnant worm and you will have destroyed the future butterfly. Taking away a man's poverty, we take from him the source of eternal happiness.

But must we not help the poor? We surely must - by sharing his poverty, by demonstrating our regard for his high estate. Mother Theresa of Calcutta set an example. By sharing the experience of poverty a poor man is given the sense of his dignity before God and other men, whereas a few pennies thrown to him degrade him.

We commonly confound the unpleasant with the bad. Poverty is unpleasant, but it is a Christian's trial of love. What girl is not seduced into admiring a handsome boy who offers her rings and bracelets and cars and castles? Would she choose to live with that same young man in a humble cottage? It was easy for Job to love God with his family and cattle and gold secure. But what was the nature of his love? A trial had to be made in order to strengthen Job's faith.

Before I went to prison, my own social and material situation was very comfortable. In moments of self-examination, I asked myself whether I really loved God or loved rather the many outward and inner gifts with which He had endowed me. Then, in solitary confinement, hungry, trembling for cold, without even shoes - then I could really check whether I loved God or His gifts. How I rejoice to discover that songs of praise flew from my lips under those circumstances! The faith had been tried.

Christians do not fear hunger and would not readily rob the poor man of this experience. For Jesus says even to the rich, who are familiar with black caviar and other dainties, "I have meat to eat that ye know not of" (JHN 4:32). The angel Raphael said to Tobit in the apocryphal book of this name (12:19), "It seemed, truly, as if I ate and drank with you. But I used an invisible meat and a beverage which men cannot see." The meat of the angels, of which men also can partake, consists in seeing God, in loving Him even in times of affliction, and in doing His will in all things. You cannot sit luxuriously in restaurants, listening to jazz music, served by half-naked waitresses, and eating from an endless menu, and at the same time participate at the heavenly banquet. Nobody can have both worlds. Heavenly food is reserved for those who are hungry.

Kierkegaard spoke truly when he said, "To represent a man who by preaching Christianity has attained and enjoyed in the greatest measure all possible worldly goods and enjoyments, to represent him as a witness to the truth is as ridiculous as to talk about a maiden who is surrounded by her numerous troop of children" ("Attack Against Christendom").

After years of preaching, a pastor should be poorer than before he began his ministry.

Our God is that of the narrow gate and of the needle's eye. If, because of your social position you are not among the hungry, this is a simple matter to remedy: you can fast. But do not rob the poor of poverty. Do not rob the hungry of heavenly manna. Your well-intentioned acts of philanthropy can be robberies.

4 Right Attitude Toward Poverty

It is our greed, our idolatry of money, which makes us equate poverty and unhappiness. The correct attitude of a well-to-do Christian towards a poor one is not pity, but rather envy or emulation. Although you might have more bread than your poor brother, and butter and anchovies upon your bread, "man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word of God" (LUK 4:4). The poor man has a privilege which you do not: Jesus has been sent to preach the Gospel to the poor (LUK 4:18); only a poor man can fully hear the message. Rich men hear only a watered-down Gospel delivered by pastors who have never hungered or fasted, who are rich or would like to be so.

Such pastors do not wish to lose their rich contributors and preach to them from the Gospel only so much as will not give offense. They never tell their rich parishioners that they have as much chance to enter the Kingdom of Heaven as a camel to enter through a needle's eye, in other words, that their whole religion is in vain.

I repeat the question put in the former meditation: should we not help the poor? Surely we should, but on one condition: not to rob him of his previous poverty.

The way to help the poor is to follow Jesus' example and become poor like them.

We read in the Hebrew book, ~Shemen ha tov~, how Rabbi Havyim Auerbach of Launtzitz was once petitioned by a shoemaker who had no wood to heat the room in which his wife and newborn infant lay. The rabbi immediately awakened a wealthy neighbor. The rich man invited the rabbi to come in, but the rabbi said he preferred to speak outside. It was bitter cold and the rich man had to stand shivering on the street and talk with the rabbi for a long time. At last the rabbi mentioned the shoemaker's plight and said, "Now that you have felt the cold yourself, you will know what to do." The rich man brought wood to the shoemaker's family, dragging it there himself in a wheelbarrow. Whoever has not felt the noose about his own neck cannot know the situation of someone who is in deadly danger.

No welfare state or philanthropic millionaire can replace the charitable works done long ago by monks and nuns who had taken vows of poverty. These people, some of them former members of the upper class, gathered the poor into the first hospitals, homes for the aged people and orphanages. They descended in reality and in spirit to the level of those whom they strove to help, and truly loved their neighbors as themselves. Embracing poverty for themselves, they could appreciate its value for others. The aged, the cripples, and the poor were helped not only with bread, but also by being brought to regard as a privilege what they had until then seen as a handicap.

In the United States and other countries there are now so many poverty programs which do not work. St. Francis of Assisi's program worked. He became poor and influenced many rich men to give away their money, not in heavily borne taxation, but in jubilating love.

There are diverse manners of giving help. I read that natives of Portuguese colonies, when they were sick, passed by the state hospitals and traveled many miles further to a Christian hospital. When asked why, since the state hospitals were as well equipped and gave the same treatment as the Christian ones, the natives answered: "Yes, the treatment is the same, but the hands are not the same." It is only the empty hand that can caress.

"Neither oppress the afflicted in the gate" (PRO 22:22). "Jesus also, that He might sanctify the people with his own blood, suffered without the gate" (HEB 13:12). Jesus longed to arrive at Golgotha to fulfill the salvation of mankind. But in those days everyone, even executioners with victims, were stopped at the gates to answer questions, to show their papers. I too have seen it. It is not easy to be taken outside a prison gate, not even for an execution. The executioner knocks at the gate: the guard looks suspiciously through the peep-hole, then checks the written order. So it was also in times before.

It is written in Proverbs, "Do not oppress the afflicted in the gates." Those who belong to Jesus are so happy to bear afflictions for His sake: do not stop them again at the gates to question them, to slow down their heroic march towards self-sacrifice by offering them pardons or conditions. By doing this you further oppress the afflicted ones who glory in their afflictions for Christ's sake.

A Christian must so conduct himself that his children will joyfully say like Jacob, "God of my father" (GEN 32:9). Jacob had ancestors of whom he could boast. Abraham had left the highly civilized Ur of Chaldee, living as a stranger in a barren land in order to be free to worship God as he knew best. Isaac was ready as a child to magnify God by his death. Such men should not be robbed of the afflictions which promise them an eternal weight of glory.

Affliction has its difficulties. Often you are overcome by despair. God seems to have hidden His face from you. But then you realize that it has only been for sport, like play with a child. You seek Him, find Him again, God and you, both exhilarated, both open wide with joy.

There is a deep teaching in the Talmud: "Before a man eats and drinks, he has two hearts." He feels both his own hunger and another's. Once he has eaten and drunk, he remains with only one heart, with thought only for his own comfort.

Instead of robbing the poor of poverty and the afflicted of the affliction which will constitute his future glory, see that you yourself are among the men with two hearts.

5 Untruthfulness in Biblical Personalities

We cannot tell the Communist interrogators the straight truth about our church activity. If we were to give frank replies to all their questions, more arrests would follow. We remember Rebecca used an immoral ruse to give Jacob the blessing normally due to Esau as first-born (Genesis 27). The ethical value of an action is judged not only by its accordance with certain moral rules, but also by its long-range results.

If Rebecca had not done this, Isaac would have given the blessing to Esau. Then Esau's descendants would have been the chosen people instead of the Jews. Some savage would have had to try to become the Saviour of the world. Wild men would have been the holy prophets.

What catastrophe if Rebecca and Jacob had not cheated and lied in that one circumstance! Their behavior was part of God's plan. Isaac's sight had grown weak so that Jacob might be mistaken for Esau and receive the blessing.

Obviously to take such action even in exceptional circumstances is a dangerous choice. Others will justify their selfish deceits by holding up what you have done for holy motives as an example.

The Midrash says: "Jacob later married Rachel, but on the marriage night, Laban, her father, substituted Leah, a girl whom Jacob disliked (GEN 29:23-25). In the morning, he saw he had been cheated and told Leah, 'During the night, I call you so often, "Rachel," and you answered. Why did you deceive me?' She said, 'Your father called you "Esau" and you pretended to be your brother. You deceived your father. No teacher is without a disciple. I have learned from you.'"

We must be aware of this danger but Christians cannot altogether forego the serpent's wisdom.

Can a Christian be a police inspector, an undercover agent, a diplomat or an officer in war without using ruses?

How could the underground church survive in countries where there is persecution if it did not follow Rebecca's example? Such strategies are shocking because they are the exception to the Christian rule of complete truthfulness.

Words are spoken for various purposes other than for communicating truth. Sometimes they serve self-defense, like the words of Paul, "I have committed nothing against the people or the customs of our fathers" (ACT 28:17). In 1TH 2:14-16, Paul had burst out against certain customs. He had nullified an essential part of Jewish law when he declared circumcision of no value. But now he was in danger of death. In such cases, in moments of crisis, words have to be the servants of another master than truth.

Old Testament Joseph said, "I was stolen away out of the land of the Hebrews" (GEN 40:15). This was not the fact, but we can appreciate his desire to cover up the sin of his brothers who had sold him as a slave.

Let us have in view the many sides of human life when we judge the ethics both of biblical personalities and of our fellow men.

6 What is Caesar's?

Many Christians have submitted to Hitlers, Stalins, Maos and the multitude of lesser white, black and yellow dictators. Many did it with good intentions, guided by the Lord's words, "Render unto Caesar the things which are Caesar's" (MTT 22:21).

The words have been misunderstood. Jesus did not advise His disciples to give anything to Caesar. His words were addressed to the Pharisees. Has an order given to a German soldier any validity for a British soldier? The Pharisees and Jesus' disciples were at odds with one another: the words were spoken to Jesus' detractors, not to His friends.

Jesus had no coin of His own - "They brought unto him a penny" (v. 19). Jesus' foes were caught in Caesar's monetary system, while Jesus' disciples owned nothing.

The Hebrew Bible does not even contain the verb "to have." Christians consider possessions to be wrong, for they are only administrators of God's possessions. Owning nothing, the Christian could owe nothing to Caesar.

Who was this Caesar anyway? A foreign conqueror who had occupied Palestine, he had contributed nothing to its well-being. He had never planted a tree, built a highway, or even visited the country. Yet he had established tax-collectors to milk its riches, and had slaughtered anyone who dared resist his edicts. Nothing in Palestine belonged to Caesar.

If you say to a Czech, Hungarian or Pole, "Render to the Soviets the things which belong to them," he would understand you instantly. Nothing belongs to them. These words can only mean, "Give them a boot in the back and send them packing."

This was also the sense of Jesus' words. If the Pharisees were so convinced that they served God, why were their minds preoccupied with things which are not godly? Jesus commands them, "Do both things: serve a tyranny and serve God at the same time." He knew they would soon realize that these things are not compatible. One must choose between being Caesar's bootlicker and a true servant of God who stands before a godless king like Herod and tells him to his face, "What you do is unlawful." This is the attitude which cost John the Baptist his head.

It is a misuse of Jesus' words to interpret them as counseling submissiveness to despots. My own interpretation is in fact the contrary. Just as the soul is higher than the body, so the sacerdotal dignitary excels and instructs the regal; the celestial, the terrestrial. It is the duty of kings to obey church leaders, rather than the reverse.

7 Someone's Missing in Jesus' Genealogy

"Who can believe in the Bible's inerrancy?" a pastor once asked me. "I can show you at least one sentence which is positively untrue. It is MTT 1:17 where we find the assertion that there were forty-two generations from Abraham to Christ. But there are more in the genealogy of Luke 3 and in those of the Old Testament."

There is even stranger aspect to Matthew's genealogy. Matthew was a publican and he knew how to count accurately. He claims to give the names of forty-two generations. But if you thoroughly check, you will find that he only gives 41 names.

It is not immediately apparent that one person is missing. Attention to verses 11 and 12 of Matthew 1 reveals that one and the same Jechonias is counted twice. The genealogy is divided into three groups of ancestors, each of fourteen persons, but the last person of the second group is also the first person of the third group.

There is one name wanting in this list: it is yours. Jesus has to be conceived in you as utterly as He was conceived in the womb of Virgin Mary.

Jesus said, "Whosoever shall do the will of my Father which is in heaven, the same is my brother, and sister ..." Up to this point His words are easily comprehended. Every believer can be His little brother or sister. But He offers one other possibility; He says, "... and mother" (MTT 12:50). We can be mothers to Him, insofar as Jesus is conceived in us. His relationship with us will encompass that of son and mother, and we will be motherly towards Him.

All love contains an element of self-interest. You love father - he gives pocket money; you love mother - she gives candies. Your brothers and sisters are also your playmates. Only motherly love is completely unselfish. I know of a mother beaten to death with an axe by her son who, before she died, asked him whether he had hurt himself in doing it. A mother's love exists without asking any return.

Your attitude toward Jesus can be motherly. Then you will be the forty-second generation, the missing link in His genealogy.

Matthew's text was not meant to be simple history; nor was it meant to give mathematically precise figures, but rather figures which have a symbolic meaning. Both Matthew and Luke give a multiple of seven as the number of Jesus' ancestors, forty-two in the first case, seventy-seven in the other. Seven in the Bible is the holy figure, a topic which will be explored in a later meditation.

One could say it is untrue that a coronation confers a kingdom, but it is a true symbol of its being conferred. So in the same way, the generations from Abraham to Jesus were not truly forty-two. Matthew himself gives only forty-one names. But the report contains a true spiritual message.

Something can be true without being factual.

8 Male and Female Words

For many years I never saw a girl or a woman. This increased my curiosity regarding everything to do with the feminine.

Like most languages, Hebrew has male and female nouns.

English, which has the same article for all nouns, is an exception in the family of human languages. In German, "table" is male and has the article ~der~, "lamp" is female and has the article ~die~, "bread" is neuter and has the article ~das~. Adjectives and verbs also take different forms according to the gender of the noun. This is also true in Slavic and Latin languages.

The Hebrew has not only male and female nouns, but also male and female forms for one and the same noun. For example, "ship" is ~ani~ in its male and ~anijah~ in its female form. ~Shir~ and ~shirah~ are male and female forms of the word "song." ~Erets~ and ~artsah~ are the two forms for "earth," ~asham~ and ~ashamah~ for "sacrifice."

The male and female forms represent the active or passive aspects of the nouns in question, and their usage can greatly affect the inner meanings of many passages in the Bible.

Even when he writes in Greek, a language in which the noun does not have this peculiarity, John considers "the great winepress of the wrath of God" (REV 14:9) as not being so cruel a thing as it would seem. According to the rules of Greek grammar, he has to use the masculine gender for the noun, "winepress," but he defies the grammar and puts the adjective "great" in the feminine gender to show that with God even wrath has a gentle character.

The suffix "ah" in Hebrew usually indicates femininity. Women's names often end with "ah," as in Bathshebah, Dalilah or Sarah. However, this ending also shows direction in the sense of "tending toward." What is thus expressed in the genius of the Hebrew language is that objects tend toward a female, passive or subject form. They all begin by asserting their independence, but in the end will all be submitted to the will of God.

~Ruah~, the Hebrew word for spirit, is female. In GEN 1:2, "And the Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters," the verb "moved" also takes the feminine form. Thus an exact translation of these words, a rendering which would reproduce a Hebrew's feeling reading them would be "The female spirit moved in a womanly manner upon the face of the waters."

The frequent name for God in the Hebrew Bible, ~Adonai Sabaoth~, means not just "the Lord of hosts," but, exactly translated, "The Lord of the female hosts," like, "the Amazons." Male and female Christians both, all who believe are ~brides~ of Christ and warriors with feminine characteristics. The direction for all of us must be toward acquiring more female characteristics: gentleness, quietness, submission, passive acceptance of everything the Bridegroom decides.

Biologists have discovered that all fetuses are created female. Later the Y chromosome sends a flood of male hormones over some fetuses, causing them to develop into males. The Y chromosome does this work by producing H-Y antigen, a substance found in the cell walls of all men, but not in women.

Every embryo is female in the beginning. Through becoming brides of Christ, through putting ourselves in the feminine position toward Him, we return to our original state, to the purpose for which we have been created, to be Christ's brides.

A male, at conversion, also becomes a bride of Christ, not a bridegroom.

9 Manner of Breathing

New prisoners ask us, "How can I resist torture?" Among many other pieces of advice, we tell them, "Breathe deeply, rhythmically."

Paul writes, "Whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God" (1CO 10:31). This includes a saintly manner of breathing.

Life of mankind began when God breathed the breath of life into Adam (GEN 2:7). In what rhythm and manner will God have breathed?

The Bible speaks about many kinds of breathing. The sinner is compared to "a wild ass that snuffs the wind at her pleasure" (JER 2:24). Jeremiah also speaks about men who neigh after their neighbors' wives (JER 5:8). The persecutor Saul of Tarsus is described as "breathing out threatenings and slaughter against the disciples of the Lord"

(ACT 9:1). Jesus himself had a breath apart. "He breathed on His apostles," and they received the Holy Spirit (JHN 20:22). Orthodox priests still breathe on persons as part of the baptismal rite.

What is your manner of breathing? Do you exhale anger, lust? Or do you have the quiet, majestic, serene breathing of a man who has no attachment or repulsion towards the world, and who is undisturbed by it? Such breathing must be practiced.

Yoga exercises can be useful but do not solve problems. A man can practice yoga in the morning and begin to neigh and to breathe hatred in the afternoon. One must practice breathing to the glory of God in the moments of greatest temptation. When others shout at you or torment you physically, when you are in danger, or are attracted toward sin, proceed slowly and begin to breathe in the holy manner: deeply, evenly, rhythmically. This will help you be a victor.

The language of the Bible teaches us to be attentive to our manner of breathing. In Hebrew, ~ketsar af~, "short of breath," is the expression for "impatient"; ~ereh apaim~ "long of breathing," means "patient, serene." The states of our souls are connected with our breathing. When one breathes deeply for ten minutes in a slow, even rhythm, constantly thinking, "Now I inhale; now I exhale," anger becomes impossible. One who has the foolish desire to become angry can practice breathing in the opposite manner.

Do everything to the glory of God: even the manner in which you breathe is known by the Almighty. Trees breathe slowly and live longer; insects, the contrary.

10 Unintelligible Words

The Bible contains, in its original, words whose meaning we do not know, e.g., ~eshpar~ in 2SM 6:19 and 1CH 16:3. The Authorized version translates it "flesh," but puts the word in italics to show that the meaning is uncertain. Some Jewish commentators translate it as "cake of dates."

No one is sure of the meaning of the words ~selah~ and ~miktam~ which are frequently found in the Psalms. The renowned Jewish interpreter Rashi says that selah means "eternally." Ybn Ezra thinks it is a musical sign. The Septuaginta translates selah as "pause."

~Miktam~ appears in the heading of Psalms 16, 56, 57, 58, 59 and 60. The Midrash, a Jewish commentary, says David was humble (~makh~) and righteous (~tam~), hence, ~miktam~. Rashi believes it is, like ~selah~, the indication of a melody. Ybn Ezra and Luther derive the word from ~ketem~ - "gold." A note in the Authorized version calls Psalm 16 "a golden Psalm." Others consider the Babylonian word ~kafamu~ as the source of ~miktam~ and translate, "a psalm of atonement." All of these are guesses.

The Greek word ~epiussion~, which appears in The Lord's Prayer (MTT 6:11), exists nowhere else in Greek literature. The English translation "daily" in the expression "daily bread," is arbitrary. Jerome used "our supersubstantial bread." There are many other words whose meaning remains a mystery. One possibility is that no meaning at all should be attributed to such words. Nowhere does the Bible affirm that everything in it must have meaning.

The ~Mumonkan~, a 12th century fundamental book of Zen Buddhism, says, no-meaning is the meaning of the walkers of the "way."

The Hebrew text of the Bible has musical notations. The Old Testament is a song in which some sounds are there simply for their musical beauty, without any sense, like the "tra-la-la" in popular songs of modern nations.

The whole Bible is an inimitable symphony. Not only the meaning of the sentences, but their very sound can move the soul to ecstasy. To give just one example: in English we read that the multitude of believers were "of one heart and of one soul" (ACT 4:32). This is a deep thought, but in Greek it is a beautiful sound also, a rhyme: "Kardia kai psyche mia." Letters, syllables, and whole words could have been written in the Bible just for the splendor of the sound. Anyone whose ear is attuned will enjoy them. They cannot be translated.

Luther called our reason "a beast" because of its tendency to interfere in religious matters. The rational mind seeks sense and logic in everything, including the Bible. But why should the Bible be bound to always make sense to the mind? It speaks rather to the soul.

Kruger, the president of the Boer republic, went hunting, leaving behind his sick wife with a sick child. Upon his return he heard his wife singing, which was not her habit. Entering the house he found her sitting in bed with the dead child in her arms. Within a short time she also died, still clinging to the baby.

Forsaking everything, Kruger tramped through fields and forests, trying to make sense of life and love, which unite us for a time, until death forcibly separates us. His friends alarmed, sought him for many days and found him hungry, singing and with deep peace in his heart. He had not found the meaning of things, but he had given up seeking.

Why must we always apply logic and syllogism to everything? Why not simply sing a melody, as the nightingale does, without constructing meaningful sentences? It is in its music that the deep sense of the Bible is to be found - where the heart simply sings, sometimes in unintelligible words, about the unintelligible ways of God.

Thinking like this, I did not mind when my speech became blurred, because of the circumstances in which I was detained.

11 Almah

Everyone would consider it bad taste to publicly discuss or write about whether his wife was a virgin at marriage, but many debate whether Mary was really a virgin when she gave birth to Jesus.

In many circles it is contested whether Isaiah really prophesied the virgin birth. The argument is that in his words (ISA 7:14), "The Lord himself shall give you a sign: Behold, a virgin shall conceive," the Hebrew expression "almah" does not necessarily mean "virgin." It could also mean "young maid."

Like other nouns in Hebrew, the word "virgin" has two forms. "Elem," the male form, is always used for a very young boy who could not have known a woman yet, like David when he killed Goliath (1SM 17:56). In this passage the Authorized Version translated "elem" as "stripling." The word occurs again in 1SM 20:35 in reference to "a little lad" who accompanied Jonathan.

Since "elem" in the male form surely indicates a virginal boy, why then should the female form, "almah," not also have the inference? Surely Matthew the Evangelist knew better Hebrew than the modern professors of theology, and his translation of Isaiah's prophecy was, "a virgin shall be with child" (MTT 1:23). For myself, I would believe in the virgin birth of Jesus even if it were not written in the Bible.

We humans all have split characters. How could it be otherwise, since we inherit from our parents features which come from two divergent and often contradictory lines? Jesus, however, was One: He is not ravaged by inner antagonisms. His heritage comes from a single line.

You can rely on the Bible. Mary was a virgin when she conceived Jesus. The One who kept her pure and holy by His grace will also see that you appear before Him with virginal purity.

12 The Double Sense of the Word "Netzah"

They gave me twenty-five years, which was practically the same as life imprisonment. The day I received the sentence, the following thoughts occurred to me. Hebrew biblical words have a cluster of meanings, giving them a spectrum like that of the rainbow. Let us examine two meanings of the word netzah. This word can mean "perpetual" - "Why is my pain perpetual?" asks Jeremiah (JER 15:18). But netzah also means "victory" (1CH 29:11 and ISA 25:8). Thus, what appears to be a despairing, unanswered question in Jeremiah could also be faithfully and literally translated, "Why is my pain? It is to serve victory."

It is said that King Solomon once stood at the seashore admiring the fleets of many nations passing by. He asked the high priest who was standing beside him, "How many ships a year do you think pass through our waters?" The priest answered, "Only three." The king, thinking the priest was being insolent, said indignantly, "How dare you give such a reply? I see dozens of ships at this very moment." - "An illusion," responded the high priest. "In reality all ships sailing on all the seas are only three: the ship of desire for money, that of desire for fame, and that of desire for pleasure. These are the three forces which drive through the seas, whatever name a vessel takes for a while."

The king pondered this for some time. In his Song he had foretold of a fourth ship, a very small one, unable to navigate beyond the small lake of Galilee, but in the end surpassing all others. This would be the ship of the Messiah, a ship powered by the sacrifice of the Son of God, by intense love, by the desire to serve.

It sails in defiance of all the laws of hydrodynamics. The wonder accomplished by the Messiah when the tempest ceased and the ship was rescued at His command is an even greater miracle than is commonly thought. Mark wrote that the waves had beaten into the ship, "so that it was now full" (MRK 4:37). Any vessel thus full of water will sink whether the sea is stormy or calm. But this ship, the ship of Jesus does not sink, not even when the waters of sins, crimes, schisms, heresies and persecutions have filled it to the brim. It advances toward victory.

Its "perpetual" (netzah) great sorrows are but the shadow of the ~netzah~, the victory toward which it sails.

13 Two Senses of"Sabahtani"

"Eloi, Eloi, lama sabahtani," was Jesus' cry from the Cross. The Evangelist translated these words from the Aramean: "My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken me?" But this is not the only possible translation.

Sabahtani is the first person, past tense of ~leshabeah~ which means "to forsake." But ~leshabeah~ also means "to glorify." It is frequently used in this sense even in modern Hebrew prayers. So the words of Jesus could have been translated, "My God, my God, to what (degree) have you glorified me!" These were the words with which the Therapeuts, a subdivision of the Essenian sect of Jesus' time, finished their prayers. It was an expression of amazement at the multitude of graces received.

On the last evening, the Lord prayed, "Glorify thy Son" (JHN 17:1), probably using the Aramean word, ~meshabeah~. The apparent result was not glorification, but being abandoned by most of His disciples, being flogged, mocked, crucified, and forsaken by God. Is this how the heavenly Father answers prayer?

But Jesus' supplication that evening could also have had an entirely other, mysterious, sense: "The hour has come. Our plan should now be fulfilled. Forsake, reject (shabeah) thy Son, that thy Son may glorify (also ~shabeah~) Thee through bearing everything with patience and love." Thus the whole Passion which followed is a consummation of Jesus' prayer.

It may also seem strange that Jesus' words, "You have forsaken me," are in the past tense, while He was being forsaken then and there - the crucifixion was a very present event. Why then does Jesus use the past tense? Ordinarily someone would not ask while being beaten, "Why did you mistreat me?" He would say, "Why do you beat me?" using the present tense.

One of the secrets of spiritual strength is to live outside of time. A present-day revolution with all its immediate horrors is difficult to endure. But we can easily bear reading about the French Revolution and its guillotine of 200 years ago. God and the spirit live eternally. Eternity is not timelessness, but life beyond time. You can decide how you wish to regard an episode of your life, in the present or in the past. Everyone sometimes ponders pleasant memories of the past and relives them as if they were present. The opposite can be done as well. You can transfer today's difficulties into the past, thereby enabling yourself to cope with them serenely. In this manner they cannot break you. This is how we resisted.

14 How to Examine Yourself

Solitary confinement tempts you to endless brooding over your past life. St. Paul writes, "Let a man examine himself" (1CO 11:28). How should one proceed? There is no specific instruction in the Bible, but Christian experience of hundreds of years has taught us at least one thing: Do not be too thorough in self-examination. A little creature in the laboratory can be examined so extensively that it dies from over-exposure.

Rather than examining all the details of your own life, try to fathom the depth of your faith in the value of Jesus' life, death and resurrection.

Once a man was greatly concerned about the state of his soul. No sermon or religious book could satisfy him. Finally, he heard about a hermit who was reputed to have great wisdom. The man took a horse and rode to the mountaintop where the sage lived. He found the sage in meditation at the entrance to his cave. The sage asked the man what he desired. "I seek salvation," said the man. The sage was silent for a long time. Then he said, "Why don't you seek a horse instead?" - "I have a horse," the man replied. Turning toward the rear of the cave, the sage remarked, "So that is it," and said no more.

As the man rode down the mountain on his horse, he thought and thought about his meeting with the sage. All at once he was enlightened: Why should he seek a horse? He had one. He was riding on it. Therefore why should he seek salvation: God sent His Son into the world that the world might be saved through Him. Salvation was already assured. A man riding on a horse should not bother to seek a horse unless he had overtired or killed the one he has. The Savior can not be exhausted. Unless a man flees from salvation, unless he consciously refuses it, he has it without much ado. Jesus has come to seek and to save what is lost. We do not have to seek Him. His desire for us to be in paradise is much greater than our own. His desire to forgive our sins is much greater than our desire to be forgiven. Salvation cannot be sought, but only accepted. When the man arrived in the valley, he understood.

Christians often say, "I was saved five or fifteen years ago." This cannot be so. We were all saved 2,000 years ago, when Jesus died for us on Golgotha. Perhaps it was only five or fifteen years ago that we realized it.

When we approach Holy Communion, the main thing we must ask ourselves is, "When I hear the words, 'This is my blood, shed for you and the remission of your sins,' do I understand them as clearly addressed to me? Do I know, as surely as a rider knows he has a horse under him, that my sins are forgiven and forgotten and dealt with?" If I understand this, I have examined myself well and am worthy of Holy Communion.

15 The Bible's Imprecise Time

I lost the notion of time, I didn't know what hour or what day it was, my solitary cell being subterranean; I didn't even know if it was spring or summer.

The authors of the Bible knew their lives are eternal. Time did not matter for them and so they were quite imprecise in dating events.

In JHN 21:1 we read, meta tauta-"after these things Jesus showed himself again." How long was it "after these things?" You search in vain.

Chapter 3 of Matthew starts with the words, "In those days came John the Baptist preaching in the wilderness of Judea." In the preceding verse, John and Jesus could not have been more than 2 or 3 years old, so three decades must have elapsed before John began his public ministry. For the Evangelist it was still "in those days."

Both John and Matthew were speaking about events between which much time passed as if they took place simultaneously. Before Einstein this would have been considered inaccurate. Now we know that a statement about the simultaneity of two events acquires meaning only in relation to the place where an observer is situated. It belongs to the subjective part of our observation, not to the objective part which constitutes history.

The spirit blows wherever it wishes, says Scripture (JHN 3:8). Wind and spirit are the same word in Greek. I can place myself spiritually in a position such that events distant from each other in time appear to occur simultaneously. It is like some Americans who like to watch two or three TV programs at the same time.

Can the preaching of John the Baptist occur "in those days," i.e., at the time of his childhood? This is how Matthew saw the events. Who am I to accuse him of inaccuracy?

We have a promise, "Ask and it shall be given you" (MTT 7:7). This verse seems to contradict much of our experience. Every believer knows of answered, but also of unanswered prayers. We have asked and were not given. But how much time has passed since we asked?

Moses asked God, "Let me go over and see the good land that is beyond Jordan." The Lord answered, "Let it suffice thee; speak no more unto Me of this matter" (DEU 3:25-26). Here is an instance not of an unanswered prayer, but of a prayer clearly refused. How does this fit with, "Ask and it shall be given you?" Well, a little later, some 3,500 years, or, to use the biblical expression, "in those days," Jesus was on Mount Tabor with His disciples and "there appeared unto them Moses and Elias" (MTT 17:3). Mount Tabor is in Canaan, beyond Jordan, in the Promised Land. So Moses' request was finally granted, only with a few thousand years' delay. Not much for one whose life is eternal.

We have before us not an eternal life, but eternal lives. The Hebrew has no singular for life. Most Hebrew nouns which end with "im" are plural, and the biblical word for life is "haiim." We will have a multitude of lives and opportunities. I believe that all prayers will be answered.

Eternal life is more than infinite. Kantor, a Jewish disciple of Einstein, conceived the notion of "transfinite." When you draw an endless line in one direction from a given point, its mathematical value is x, infinite. But when you draw from the same point two or more endless lines in different directions, you have something beyond the infinite. Kantor calls it "the transfinite," and uses the Hebrew letter ~Aleph~ for its mathematical symbol. The possibilities of eternity are inexhaustible. "Ask and it shall be given you." Do not ask when. Heaven is outside of time.

Periods of time in general are not objective physical facts, but are dependent upon the observer. Time and space are by their very nature confused representations of the only real thing: the interval in the space-time continuum! Let us think biblically, outside of time.

16 The Things Beyond the Bible

The Bible contains what God revealed to us, taking into account the condition and capacity of our hearts and minds.

Jesus told His disciples, "I have yet many things to say to you, but ye cannot bear them now"(JHN 16:12). We wonder what He would have said, had we been capable of receiving all His words.

The Biblical authors have left many interesting things untold. Paul complains that time fails him "to tell of Gideon, and of Barak, and of Samson and of Jephthae; of David also and Samuel and of the prophets"(HEB 11:32). Much of Paul's time was absorbed by dealing with all the trifling questions which produced so much strife among the first Christians.

Jude had intended to write about the most important subjects of "common salvation" (Jude verse 3). We have remained without the knowledge of his thoughts in this matter because he had instead to exhort the believers to beware of "ungodly men" who had crept into the leadership of the church.

Biblical authors also had to adjust their messages so as not to offend the prejudices of listeners. The first Christian sermon, that delivered by Peter on Pentecost, calls Jesus simply "a man approved by God" (ACT 2:22), "exalted by the right hand of God" (ACT 2:33). Peter does not say that Jesus is the Son of God. This would have been too difficult for the Jews to accept. Diplomacy is a factor in all intelligent preaching.

We must come to understand not only what the pastor says, but also what he might have said, had we been open for the whole truth.

When a statue of Kruger, the president of the Boer Republic, was made in Pretoria, Kruger's wife asked the sculptor to make the president's top hat hollow so that when it rained the birds could drink from it. Those familiar with the history of the Boer Republic are inspired by this statue, encouraged to emulate that great statesman in their own actions. Birds get from that same statue only a few drops of water.

If we do not remain little birds in faith, we will come to know what the authors of the Bible could not tell their contemporaries. The river of life will give us more than a few drops of water.

Cod passes us through prison to give us new ability to understand.

17 Euphemisms in the Bible

Some tortures are obscene. If ever freed, should one tell what happened?

The Bible consistently avoids mention of an essential part of life, an aspect overworked to the point of offense in current language: The word "sex" never occurs in the Bible, nor do words for the sexual organs or sexual intercourse. The latter is replaced with "to know": Adam ~knew~ Eve his wife" (GEN 4:1). For the female sex organ, the word commonly used is "the shame"- ~boshet~, or sometimes "The navel" (SOS 7:2). The general tendency of biblical style is toward euphemisms.

This applies not only to sexual matters. In Acts, we repeatedly find the expression that Jesus was "hanged on a tree" (ACT 5:30). The crucifixion evoked too gruesome a picture.

Scripture also avoids telling the complete story of certain wrong actions. In GEN 35:22, in the Authorized Version, the word "it" is written in italics, a type used whenever the translators have added something to the original text. In Hebrew this sentence remains incomplete: "Reuben lay with his father's concubine. Israel heard." We would expect to be told the details of the incest and of the terrible clash between father and son, which must have followed. However the Masoretes left a blank space in the Hebrew text after the words "Israel heard," to teach us that the worst in bad things is better left unsaid.

In GEN 4:8, after the words ~Vaiomer Cain~, "And Cain said," the Masoretes left another blank space with a circular mark indicating an intentional omission of something important.

Both the Samaritan text of Genesis and the Septuagint, the first Greek translation, add at this point that Cain said to his brother, "Let us walk out into the fields." The Syriac version is, "Let us go to the desert." But knowledge of a more far-reaching discussion between the brothers seems to have been kept orally. The Targum, an Aramaic paraphrase of the text, adds that Cain said, "I thought that the world has been created in mercy, but it is not governed according to merits of good works, nor is there any judgment or a judge, nor shall there be any future state with rewards and punishments. Why is my sacrifice refused?"

The Bible as given by God prefers to pass over Cain's words with silence. By such omissions we are taught not to reproduce or quote the words of wrongdoers. Such words are too often contagious.

The Bible also avoids the use of epithets. The Jewish historian Josephus Flavius of the first century wrote that Pilate was a corrupt and cruel mass-murderer. We know from the Talmud that the high-priests of Jesus' time were merchants more than servants of God, stooges of the Roman empire, who obtained their high positions through bribes. But the Bible gives no reproach against the personal lives of Caiphas and Pilate. It tells only what they did to Jesus. The Evangelists did not consider it their calling to publicly denounce their sins.

We know from historical sources that the lives of the whole Herodian dynasty were debauchery. The Gospels report only the minimum about their dealings with the children in Bethlehem and with the apostles. One private sin is mentioned only because it led to the death of John the Baptist.

We, who delight in every defect we discover in an adversary, benefit by emulating the Bible's use of euphemisms and silence.

18 A Language Without the Word "Word"

The Word of God was given through the Hebrew people. This can be asserted clearly in any language except Hebrew itself. The chosen people, the depository of the Word of God, have no specific word for "word." They use ~davar~, which also means "thing."

The evangelist John wrote in Greek, but thought in Hebrew. In his native tongue, the prologue to his gospel would read, "In the beginning was the ~davar~, the thing, and the thing was with God and the ~davar~, the real thing, was God."

To speak in words which have no substance in reality is to chat, not to speak.

You cannot comprehend the Bible if you look at it as a mere collection of words.

The Mamunkan, one of the great books of Zen Buddhism (13th century) says, as if animated by the Hebrew spirit: "Words do not express things; phrases don't show the mind-movement. He who receives only words is lost; to stagnate with sentences is to be deluded."

It is obvious that words can express only words, not feelings, experiences or objects. The latter express themselves without words.

As Einstein has connected space with time and has created the concept of the four-dimensional space-time continuum, the Hebrews conceived the unique notion of "davar," the thing-word with two aspects, one verbal and the other in the physical or spiritual reality.

In Hebrew Jesus could not have said simply, "Thy word is truth" (JHN 17:17). He must have used here davar, which is more than "word." Words alone, even divine words, are not the truth: they can be cloaks for cruelty, strife and greed as well as inspirations for holiness. "Thy davar, thy word-thing, in its double aspect, is the truth," just as, after Einstein. events are no longer placed only in space or only in time. Instead we have the notion "interval" in physics, which comprehends them both.

The Italian sculptor Tommassi ornamented the cemetery of Buenos Aires with statues, each representing one of Beethoven's symphonies. When a friend asked me to describe them, I found myself at a loss for words.

Beethoven expressed what he felt in notes which, when played, give sounds. The sculptor carved in marble what he felt when he heard the music. I looked upon the figures of stone. If I put my own feelings into words, what relation would they bear to Beethoven's symphonies?

A blind man once asked a friend to describe milk to him. His friend began, "Milk is white." The blind man stopped him with a second question, "What does white mean?" "White is the color of a swan," was the reply. The blind man then asked, "What is a swan?" The explanation was, "It is a bird with a bent neck." He persisted in questioning. "What does 'bent' mean?" The friend bent his elbows and said, "Touch my arm now and you will understand what I mean by the word 'bent.'" The blind man touched his friend's elbow and exclaimed, "Now I know what milk is like!"

If the Bible is only an accumulation of words, we will know about God only as much as the blind man knew about milk .

We have to arrive through the words to the real thing, to God himself. Only then will we be illuminated.

A man asked a saint, "Who is God?" The saint replied, "Who are you?" The man said, "I am so-and-so." The saint asked, "Do you know so-and-so?" He said, "Of course."

The saint held up a dust-whisk and asked, "Do you see the dust-whisk?" The man replied, "I see it." The saint stopped the dialogue as useless.

"God" is a sound produced by English-speaking people to communicate about a mysterious being. Another, a small mysterious being, myself, about whom I also know almost nothing is called "Richard" in English. French people pronounce the name, "Rishaar," and Germans in a manner which cannot even be approximated in English spelling. I see an object which the English call "dust-whisk." It is used for wiping dust away only by adults. Children would regard it as a toy. It can also be useful for spanking or for drawing a line.

With men who remain in the sphere of words, discussions lead nowhere. Words are useful only if they lead out of the realm of mere chatting to the "davar,"to the reality-word.

With what words could I explain God? Should I say He is a King? This is a title which many good men, but also Herod, Nero and Henry VIII bore. I might confuse minds calling Him "King."

Should I call Him "Father?" Luther had a very harsh father and was reluctant to address God with the words of the Lord's prayer.

Even "God" is a word used not only for the Creator, but also for cruel beings like Moloch and Quetzlcoatl who asked thousands of human sacrifices.

We have to pass from simple words to the davar, the real thing, in order to apprehend God, not only Creator, but also Keeper and Destroyer.

19 Don't Trouble Him

Just as death was an unspeakable pain for Jesus, His birth must also have caused Him great anguish. It is written in ACT 10:44, "The Holy Ghost fell." The advent of the Spirit, which for us is uplifting, is for Him a fall. "The seeds fell," says Jesus in the parable of the sower (MTT 13:4). Before developing into wheat, they must first fall from the hand of the Master. Later Jesus explains that the ground stands for different types and qualities of men (LUK 8:12-15). For each one, the coming to earth is a falling. This is the meaning of birth for every man. How much more must the birth of the Son of God have been a descent, the pain of which He preferred not to mention. The depth of His fall is shown in the fact that He is put in the most humble place, a manger.

We Christians are so bold as to sing, "Come into my heart." But what sorrows await Him there! Many faithful souls, foreseeing how their faults will grieve the Master, repeat Peter's words as he fell down at Jesus' knees, "Depart from me, for I am a sinful man, O Lord" (LUK 5:8).

The Roman centurion, instead of inviting Jesus as we do, told Him, "Lord, trouble not thyself: for I am not worthy that thou shouldst enter under my roof." This officer was praised for his faith above all others in Israel. What a contrast to our habit of troubling Him about all manner of trifles, and never being willing to appeal to an angel. We insist on summoning the Master himself for our needs and ask whenever possible for visible signs.

A really loving soul is careful not to disturb the Beloved. I know about a girl who was in love with a young man whom she knew to have a great career ahead of him. She felt that, being uncultured herself, she would be a burden for him in society. He loved her heartily, but she refused his advances and caused him to marry another girl, more suitable for his social status. Sometimes the greatest love is shown in renouncing the beloved.

Jesus' coming to earth was a great agony for Him. His coming to fulfill your prayer troubles Him. So many were healed of blindness simply by asking, and then, with eyes wide open for the world's temptations, they ran after their lusts, forgetting to whom they owed their sight. Christians renounce many things. Renounce also your many requests. Give Him peace in the hours when He wishes to be alone.

Should you not trouble Him even when you are terribly hurt? Perhaps not, for what will you do should Christ accept your prayer and alleviate your suffering? Might this not mean a terrible loss for you?

Once, in his sleep, a man swallowed a venomous snake which stuck in his throat. He awoke in terrible pain, but not knowing its cause. A woodsman, a man of experience, passing by, fiercely beat the man until he was black and blue. At last the snake was vomited out and slithered away. Had the man begged the woodsman to give him peace, and had his request been granted, he would have died.

None of us receives more blows than absolutely needed: "the very hairs of your head are all numbered" (MTT 10:30). Our lives are foreordained. Does our heavenly Friend not also know how many sufferings we must endure?

Do not trouble the Master. He knows.

20 Exaggerations in the Bible

Much has been written by believers about the Bible's accuracy, but its obvious exaggerations are seldom mentioned.

"To Jesus of Nazareth give all the prophets witness," says Peter (ACT 10:43). But there were Hebrew prophets like Obadiah or Amos who did not ever mention the Messiah.

A Samaritan woman who met Jesus told people, "Come, see a man which told me all things I ever did" (JHN 4:29). This certainly cannot be accurate. It would take years to reveal someone's every action. Jesus had shown her only that He knew of her many sexual transgressions.

Critics would say that such statements are inaccuracies which entitle one to call the Bible into doubt. But those who know the human heart learn from such statements about the impact Jesus made upon his contemporaries.

During World War II, my wife went to Budapest under dangerous circumstances to bring relief to the suffering Christians there. For a long time we had no news from her. During that time, I was unable to read anything without seeing her picture on the pages of every book or newspaper I opened. I could have said like Peter, contrary to the experience of other men, "All books and magazines contain only Sabina's image."

For a time after her interview with Jesus, the Samaritan woman was obsessed with the remembrance of all her mistakes, and in such a state of conscience she could truthfully say, "He told me all things I ever did."

For Peter, who had seen the risen Lord and was full of the experience of the Messiah, it must have seemed that all the prophets had spoken only about Christ. It was just while Peter was speaking in this way, which normally would be considered exaggeration, that "the Holy Ghost fell on them."

Many Christian preachers and writers are too insistent on accuracy. The Holy Spirit does not fall on those who listen to them because Jesus is not their all. They are filled with observations and thoughts about other things besides the Lord.

The apostle Paul also exaggerates when he says, "All they which dwelt in Asia heard the word of the Lord Jesus" (ACT 19:10) But Paul never went farther than Asia Minor. Persia, Russian Asia and China were unknown to him. Paul's assertion shows with what his mind was consumed: not with wealth, fame or pleasure, but with a dream so strongly felt that it seemed real: Asia at the feet of Jesus.

Such dreams are truth. A simple description of facts is uninspired boredom. God's truth has wings; it sees the distant future as being present.

I could well understand Paul's assertion when, after my liberation, I was preaching in Taiwan. Although I was speaking before only 10,000 persons on a small island of China, this was not how I experienced it. Before my spirit and before my eyes were the 900 million of mainland China who have no way to hear the Gospel. It was to them that I spoke.

Every night during my years in solitary confinement, I delivered a sermon to my congregation at home. I was sure that my words reached them. Words are heard not only by those whose physical ears perceive the sound. Perhaps Paul knew more about telepathic communication than we do.

It is an exaggeration to consider something as exaggeration simply because it appears so to us. It is not that the Bible exaggerates; we exaggerate in criticizing it.

Many things which previously were considered Biblical exaggerations have later proved true. Moses called Palestine "a land that flows with milk and honey," an obvious boast (DEU 26:9). But recently a scientist has shown the earth to be capable of over three times its present food yield, and cited Israel as an example:

(1) The average cow in Israel produces 50% more milk a year than the U.S. average.

(2) In Israel, an orange grove is yielding 16 tons of fruit a year - a world's record.

(3) An acre in Israel grows twice as many peanuts as are grown on Jimmy Carter's peanut farm.

(4) Cabbages and tomatoes grown in Israel are among the finest anywhere.

All of this is achieved despite limited rainfall in this little country. So Moses' boast is not such an exaggeration after all.

Biblical authors regard numbers as unimportant. On the day of Pentecost, when the Christians of Jerusalem, 120 of them, were gathered together and became filled with the Holy Spirit, Peter explained the occurrence as being the fulfillment of a prophecy of Joel: "It shall come to pass in the last days, says God, I will pour out my Spirit upon all flesh" (ACT 2:17). A hundred persons can hardly be called "all flesh."

Such statements are normally called exaggerations. But if a man cannot readily find simple words for his feelings, if he clothes them in superlatives, should we call this a lie? Is ~Faust~ a lie because Goethe, feeling the power and complexity of evil, personified it as Mephistopheles? Peter was so overwhelmed by the fiery cloven tongues which had sat upon each of the disciples (ACT 2:3) that he could not speak except in superlatives.

Nehemiah exaggerates too when he says, "Thou hast multiplied the children of Abraham as the stars of heaven" (NEH 9:23). But there are billions of stars, not that many Jews.

The Bible is an Oriental book. One cannot appreciate its truth by applying Anglo-Saxon standards to it. The rules of truthfulness vary from one culture to another. In the Anglo-Saxon world, a statement is true only when it exactly fits reality. In fact, understatements are often preferred. With the Japanese it is otherwise. It is correct to say what is pleasing to your interlocutor, even if this is not the real state of affairs. Hyperbole is the normal for an Oriental. God has made His revelation to us through an Oriental book, and the Bible is inerrant according to the Oriental mentality which produced it.

21 Sayings Missing in the New Testament

It is important to observe in the Bible not only what it contains, but also what it omits.

One of the interesting features of the New Testament is that Jesus never asked anyone to tell Him about the circumstances of his sins. He knew men to be sinful, so the details of their trespasses, be they small offenses or huge crimes, did not interest Him. Instead of probing in dirt, He went from one man to another saying, "Be of good cheer, son; be of good cheer, daughter. Your sins are forgiven."

Another important feature is that no one ever said to Jesus, "Please, forgive me," or "I am sorry." On the last evening all the apostles fled and one denied Him. Later, when the resurrected Lord appeared to them, it would have been seemly for them to ask His forgiveness. None did.

Whoever looked into Jesus' face saw there so much love and goodness that he felt, "With Jesus forgiveness is self-evident. His willingness to forgive me is much greater than my readiness to ask for forgiveness. His wish for me to be saved is far greater than my own. His desire for my fellowship in heaven is greater than my wish to go there." We do not have to approach Jesus with words of apology, but only trusting in His goodness.

There is something else that cannot be found in the New Testament: Jesus never turned down anyone's invitation.

To refuse an invitation would be foreign to His nature. You just invite Him into your home and heart. He accepted invitations even from His worst enemies. He will surely accept yours.

Let us be attentive to the verses missing in the Bible.

22 Words Missing in the Bible

Now that, being a prisoner, I have nothing, I realize the importance of the fact that in the Old Testament the verb"to have" never occurs. It does not exist in the Hebrew language, not even in modern Hebrew. To lack even a word for expressing the idea of having is real "not having."

It is sinful to have. All the first Christians who were "possessors of lands or houses sold them and brought the prices of the things that were sold, and laid them down at the apostles' feet" (ACT 4:34-35). They were Jews and discovered, thanks to Jesus, what had long since been revealed through the genius of their language: it is wrong for God's people to have. A child of God can only administrate things which really belong to the Creator.

In Greek the word echo is used for "to have," but it has several other meanings as well: "to be able," "to be possessed with," "to can," "to count," "to do," etc.

The idea of "having" is a false notion. l was born without my consent - I did not choose the time or place, my bodily shape or my inherited character. My life developed in circumstances which were largely not of my own forming. I do not "have" my life. It proceeds according to laws established beyond myself. Nor do I have the things appertaining to life.

The renowned tenor Caruso was obliged to sing in the opera on the day of his mother's death, in order not to disappoint the thousands of fans who had come especially to hear him. After the performance he exclaimed, "I believed in the beginning that I had a voice; now I realize the voice has me."

Even joys and sorrows are given or withheld by others, and in the last analysis, by one other Being.

Not only is the infinitive "to have" absent from the Hebrew vocabulary, but even the genitive case is little in use. In Hebrew one does not normally say, "the house of a man" because nobody is meant to own one. In everyday Hebrew speech the genitive is replaced by the so-called "construct case," which consists in shortening the word for the thing possessed. Thus any person or object reduced to being a possession loses value.

In the Lord's prayer the word "I" is missing completely, although it is one of the most frequently spoken words in the prayers of men.

There is one thing worse than praying before an idol: praying before one's own image and bowing to it.

Christians should not be I-centered, but God-centered. The "I" should completely disappear in prayer, even as a reminder of the identity of the person who prays. True prayer is an outstreaming of love so pure that all that matters is the good of the whole and the will of God.

Another word which is completely absent from the Bible is the word "history." History is the record of events as they succeed each other in time. In history an event is assumed to be the effect of preceding events which are its cause. All this is illusion. What I see in a cinema also seems to be a succession of events, but the projectionist could have run the film backwards, showing the events in inverse sequence, or the film could have been spliced to put the events in a different order. Everything is pre-determined by God. The pen with which God has written all things which will happen until the end of the world has long since dried, and will not again be dipped in ink to write an alternative version.

23 Interesting Biographies Missing in the Bible

The New Testament recounts repeatedly and in great detail the life history and conversion of the persecutor Saul of Tarsus to Paul the future apostle, although there must have been other biographies which at the time, when Acts of the Apostles was written, seemed more interesting than that of the persecutor.

Paul said, "Many of the saints did I shut up in prison ... and when they were put to death, I gave my voice against them. And I punished them oft in every synagogue and compelled them to blaspheme" (ACT 26:10-11). Not only had he killed Christians, he broke their resistance and made some of them become apostates.

These were the first renegades and martyrs of Christianity, but the Bible does not report their names or even tell the story of their suffering, betrayal or heroic death.

Perhaps the biblical authors wished to prevent future abuses in the veneration of saints. In later centuries, stories of martyrs were told in minute detail and often embellished with fantasy.

The Bible says about the fellow prisoners of Old Testament Joseph, who was put in charge of them, "Whatsoever they did there, he was the doer of it" (GEN 39:22). Likewise Christ is the doer of the lives of martyrs. It would not have been biblical to make a great fuss over them; they themselves would not have desired it.

Why should martyrs be so honored? What they have done

is not the maximum, but the minimum required from a disciple of Christ. Even to be like Christ in life and death would be below what could be expected of him. Whoever is like Christ is not Christ. We are meant to be Christ. We are the body of Christ - so we are He. "You will be like God," the devil said to Eve. "Ye are gods," said Jesus. The union between the believer and God is perfect. Martyrdom is a small thing in comparison with this calling.

Other highly interesting biographies are absent from the Bible. We are told in ACT 2:41 that on one day, in Jerusalem alone, three thousand souls were added to the Church. Did they remain steadfast? Did they, in their turn, bring others to the Church?

Why do you need answers? We continually hear about many who accept Christ at evangelical mass rallies. What happens with these people afterwards? Are their decisions sincere?

Whoever puts many questions gets many depressing answers. The Bible teaches us to rejoice that some men had at least partial good will and good intentions, even if only for one day.

A Samaritan woman brought her whole town to Christ (JHN 4:30). Had she continued like this, no unconverted cities would have remained in Palestine. The Bible tells us only what she did on that one day. After this a veil is thrown upon her life.

A thief, Zacchaeus, promised under the Lord's influence to give half his goods to the poor and to restore four-fold what he had stolen (LUK 19:8). The Bible story concludes with his promise, but we are not told whether he fulfilled his pledge. The holy author rejoiced that a thief showed even a single moment of contrition.

Jesus praises an officer as being the most faithful man He had ever met (MTT 8:10). It would seem to be instructive to know how this officer continued his life.

A man who is faithful today might not always remain so. However the Bible does not give us whole biographies, but teaches us to rejoice in the little and transitory good we find in men.

24 Echad and Iachid

An ancient Chinese parable tells of a hunter who went out to set traps with his son. The son, despite all warnings, set the traps on the road, instead of waiting to arrive in the forest.

Soon many people were caught in the traps, including the boy's mother and sister. Next, love and truth and hope were caught, and finally even the road fell into the snare. The world remained without a road.

After a long time, the father convinced his son to unlock the traps. The road was so happy to be free that it stretched out until the whole world became a road. "How beautiful ~my~ road is now!" exclaimed the boy. The road, hearing that someone claimed it as his possession, died. Since that time there has been no road in the world.

It is a pessimistic story. There is a road to God. The Bible is His revelation, a map that must be read with careful attention to its wording. This road also cannot be claimed by anyone as "mine"; it is God's only.

The Bible's main teaching is that God is one; our faith and baptism are one. But the Hebrew language has two expressions for the concept "one."

~Iachid~ stands for absolute oneness, as in GEN 22:2: "Take thine only son Isaac, whom thou lovest ..." ~Echad~ represents composed oneness as in GEN 1:5: "It was evening and it was morning, one day" (so in Hebrew).

God is never called ~iachid~ in the Hebrew Bible, but always ~echad~, a composed unity. The literal translation of DEU 6:4, the keystone of the Jewish faith, is: "Listen, Israel, Jehovah, your gods (plural) is a Jehovah of composed unity (echad)."

"God was never alone, but being the only One, was many, for He was not wordless, nor wisdomless, nor powerless, nor counselless" (Hippolyt). "There are always present to Him the Word and Wisdom, the Son and the Spirit through whom and in whom He made all things freely and spontaneously" (Irenaeus).

God knows himself with perfection. This self-knowledge is called the Eternal Son. He possesses all the attributes of the Father whom He knows. The two are united in perfect Divine love. This love also has all the attributes of the Father. We call this love Holy Spirit. The three entities are one. This oneness is ~echad~, composed, a oneness between entities who also retain their distinction.

The "Zohar," an ancient book of Jewish mysticism, referring to DEU 6:4, also proclaims God as a Trinity. Asking why God's name appears three times in this verse, it answers: "The first, the Lord 'Jehovah,' is the Father above. The second name is of Jesse, the Messiah who is to come from the family of Jesse through David, and the third is the way which is below, and the three are one."

The atom, nature, the individual - all are unities. Parts in a state of extreme tension achieve the miracle of oneness.

There is oneness in diversity, and tension even within the Godhead. "It pleased the Father to bruise His son" (ISA 53:10). The Son, in agony in Gethsemane, begged the Father to spare Him. The Father's decision stood.

Jesus said, "Who has seen me, has seen the Father (JHN 14:9). Is this also true when you have seen Jesus weeping and in despair?

Jesus also spoke the mysterious words, "If I go not away, the Comforter will not come unto you" (JHN 16:7), giving the impression that the two cannot be in the same place at once.

We commonly say that Jesus is our mediator and intercessor with the Father, which seems to imply that the Son intervenes to change the Father's decision in our favor.

God is one, ~echad~, not ~iachid~. If His Unity were not so complex, there would not be such a great need to proclaim it.

The Church is one, man and wife are one - ~echad~, composed unities. Believe in Oneness despite diversity and tensions which sometimes impair the basic harmony. This Oneness cannot be broken.

The way is not your property. Nobody can possess the One. The one God, the one Church, owns us.

25 The Mystery of Unanswered Prayer

The Bible is full of unaccepted prayers.

Paul writes, "Without ceasing ... I make request ... to have a prosperous journey by the will of God to come unto you" (ROM 1:10). Instead of a prosperous journey, he traveled as a prisoner in fetters and was shipwrecked. Other examples abound throughout the Bible.

Every request in prayer shows a lack of submission to what God in His wisdom and love has foreordained. What would the world be like if God were to change His plan every time someone expressed a desire in prayer?

The Talmud says that the Jewish high priest entered the most sacred place of the temple once a year to pray for the people, and always concluded his prayer with the words, "God, disregard the requests of Wayfarers." This was wise: everyone who traveled on Monday asked that there be no rain on that day; likewise those who traveled on Tuesday, Wednesday, etc. If God listened to them all, the people would perish because of drought.

The following story illustrates the best manner of prayer. Two Christians each planted an apple tree in front of his house. When the time for reaping apples came, the first looked angrily at his tree: it bore not even one apple. When he approached his neighbor's house, he became even angrier. The branches of his brother's tree were cracking under the weight of beautiful fruits. He asked his brother, "Explain this to me. We planted our trees at the same time; we serve the same God. How is it that He gave you so many apples and none to me? "The other answered, "Perhaps you did not pray for your tree." "What! Not pray?" said the first, "I prayed every day: 'God, give rain; God, enough, now stop the rain. God, sun is needed now; too much now, it might scorch my tree.' I never neglected prayer, and it was all in vain. How did you do it?" The brother replied, "I am not so keen at prayer as you are. I prayed only once, in the beginning, like this, 'Father, I have planted an apple tree and wish to have fruit in due time. It is not for me to teach you how much sun and rain to give. You are a more ancient gardener than myself. You created Eden and all trees grow under your direction. Grant me apples in due time.'"

We experience unanswered prayer because we ask for too many things without knowledge of their long-range results.

There is really only one Christian request: "Here I stand, a sinner forgiven by grace and, at the end of my life, I pray to dwell in heaven with my beloved ones. Teach me to serve you on earth as I journey toward your heaven." Such a prayer never goes unheeded.

26 Why Did Jesus Choose a Devil as Apostle?

Under Communist pressure, some pastors became renegades. Does this annul the value of their messages of times before?

"Jesus said: One of you is a devil. He spoke of Judas Iscariot" (JHN 6:70-71). If Jesus knew Judas was a devil, why did He choose him to be an apostle?

We learn the word of God from the psalms of David, a murderer and adulterer, who normally should have spent his life in prison; from Solomon, never satiated with women and in the end an idolater; from Peter who turned coward when courage was required. God chose these men to teach us to distinguish between the message and the sins of the messengers, to accept our teachers in spite of their weaknesses and their great sins. If we were to reject works of art produced by immoral men, there would remain almost no great works of art.

We are all strengthened by the hymns: "There is a fountain filled with blood drawn from Immanuel's veins," and "God moves in a mysterious way His wonders to perform." These and other familiar evangelical songs were composed by William Cowper, who later became a national poet of Britain, but never again used his gift in the service of God.

Cowper wrote in his hymn that sinners plunged beneath the blood of Christ lose all their guilty stains. But about himself he wrote, "There is no encouragement in the Scripture so comprehensive as to include my case, nor any consolation so effectual as to reach it." He admitted the free forgiveness of God's love to every case except his own: "I believe myself the only instance of a man to whom God will promise everything and perform nothing."

Does this tragic change of attitude, which Cowper kept until his death, diminish his value as a hymnist? We have to distinguish between the song and the composer.

In the West, the lives of political leaders, high-ranking officials and even Church leaders are probed with such thoroughness that even the archangels would not be found faultless if submitted to such examination. We might better simply say, "Does this man perform his political, economical and religious duties well?"The rest belongs to God. No one is without sin and even men who have committed grave offenses have been useful in the Kingdom of God.

Perhaps it was to teach us this that Jesus went to the extreme of appointing a devil as an apostle. He could not have chosen worse than that.

27 Why Did Jesus Not Allow Himself to Be Made a King?

When Jesus perceived that the Jews would make Him a king, He departed (JHN 6:15). Surely He would have been a better king than Herod and He must have known it. Why, then, did He not accept?

We can only postulate His motives.

One reason would be that the choice would not be His. Nations are fickle: today they elect a king; tomorrow they overthrow him. Christ does not accept the roles we choose for Him. The choices must be His. His decision was to be a Savior for eternal life rather than a king in this life.

On the other hand, the fact that He was a good Savior does not prove that He would have been a good king over Judea, just as a good Sunday school teacher might not necessarily be a good prime minister.

As man, He sometimes showed utter indifference toward human suffering, just as He could also show compassion. None of these attitudes dominated Him.

He chose among them. He was told about innocent Galileans killed by Pilate. A kingly person in the earthly sense would have shown indignation and would have organized the tyrant's overthrow. Jesus said simply: "Suppose ye that these Galileans were sinners above all the Galileans, because they suffered such things? I tell you, Nay: but, except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish"

(LUK 13:2-3).

He is told about a catastrophe, a tower which has collapsed killing eighteen people: Jesus does not give instructions about building more safely in the future, nor does He organize relief for families of the victims. He repeats the above words and makes this another occasion for teaching repentance. He acknowledges only one real motive for grief: that of not being a saint.

This is the correct attitude for a Savior, but not for an earthly king.

When Jesus heals a man inhabited by demons, He causes a large herd of swine to drown (LUK 8:33). Jesus shows callousness toward this destruction of property. But it was acceptable for a Savior to destroy a herd and leave someone impoverished in order to heal his fellow man, and therefore Jesus does not justify himself, nor do the evangelists defend His action.

He achieves the objective to be expected from a Savior. For an earthly king such behavior would not be right.

Jesus predicts a national tragedy: the destruction of the Jewish state. He does not call upon men to risk their lives in defense of their fatherland as a secular king would have to do. He tells His disciples, "At such time flee"(LUK 21:21). The abandonment of their countrymen at such a tragic time forced the final break between Christianity and Judaism.

The Savior had entrusted the disciples with a deposit of eternal truth which had to be kept intact. This was more important than the defense of their land.

So thinks a Savior. An earthly king has another calling. These two purposes do not mix.

Jesus could not be an earthly king, and those who try to make Him the Solver of earthly problems are mistaken.

28 Why the Outbursts of Rage With Jesus?

The Bible teaches that God is love. It does not teach that He is all love or only love. His actions also have other aspects .

Job said, "God has delivered me to the ungodly and turned me over into the hands of the wicked ... He has broken me asunder, he has also taken me by my neck ... and set me up for his mark. His archers compass me round about" (JOB 16:11-13). When I read these lines, I envision St. Sebastian pierced with arrows from all sides by the persecutors of Christianity. Job would say that God was the first cause of what Sebastian suffered.

Job surely believed in one God, but speaks as if there were a plurality in Him. He describes God as one would describe an enemy, but says in the same chapter, verse 19 [JOB 16:19], "My witness is in heaven," which means he visualizes God as one who takes his defense.

Jesus represented God on earth. Whoever saw Him, saw the Father (JHN 14:9). Jesus could not be all love.

He sometimes burst into what seems to be unmotivated rage. The Pharisee who invited Him to dinner did not make any unkind remark to Jesus or about Him, but merely wondered why Jesus had not washed His hands before the meal. Jesus began to vituperate at all Pharisees, calling them fools and hypocrites.

A lawyer, another guest, tried to do what I also would have done, in an attempt to appease Jesus. In answer, Jesus speaks harshly about all lawyers and even about the lawyers' fathers (LUK 11:38-52).

Anyone would have objected to such behavior from a guest.

It is best that we accept God and Jesus, His messenger, as they are. It is wrong to impose human ethics and human patterns of behavior upon God.

Jesus wished to die crucified, this being the only way to pay the ransom for human sin. In order to be crucified, He had to arouse violent hatred toward himself. Without this hatred, neither the atoning death of Jesus nor our salvation could take place.

The first apostles had the same aim, knowing that the blood of martyrs is the seed of the Church. They also willingly evoked hatred towards themselves.

In Rome some Jews believed the message of Paul, others not, but he generalized in accusing the whole nation, "This people is waxed gross and their ears are dull of hearing" (ACT 28:24-27).

Jesus and His apostles often did things which filled others with anger. It was necessary. Similar behavior is practiced sometimes in the underground church today.

29 About Eternity

Eternity is not endless time. Such a thing does not exist, as there are no spaces without dimension. Eternity is a state in which time no longer exists (REV 10:6). The philosopher Boethius has given the definition generally accepted by the Christian Church. Eternity is "the total, simultaneous and perfect possession of an endless life." As the Greek thinker Parmenides put it: eternity is whole, unique. In eternity nothing has been or will be. "All is at once, one, continuous."

Imagine a motion picture. When we view it through the projector we see the events recorded on the film successively, and each one seems to be the effect of those preceding. Once in a cinema I found myself praying for an innocent man suffering terribly on the screen. I implored God to save him. But what was to happen was already recorded on the film. My business was only to behold.

We should live with the perspective of eternity in the present, in perfect serenity. Everything has been foreknown, predestined (ROM 8:29). As Omar Khayyam expressed it so well:

> With earth's first clay, they did the last man knead
> And then of the last harvest sow'd the seed.
> Yea, the first morning of creation wrote
> What the last dawn of reckoning shall read.

Islamic tradition attributes to Mohammed the words, "The pen wherewith God has written all things which will ever happen has long since dried." Christians, too, believe in predestination.

Therefore the ideal attitude for a believer is the contemplative one. Jesus says, not just to Martha, but to all men: "Ye are careful and troubled about many things, but one thing is needful, and Mary has chosen that good part" (LUK 10:41-42). Almost every Christian today would say she had made the wrong choice: she had chosen not to prepare a dinner for a dozen hungry men, but quietly to behold the beauty of the guests.

Nowhere does the Bible enjoin us to "Be active," but on countless occasions we are told, "Behold," behold without interfering. "Behold, there came wise men" (MTT 2:1). Instead of beholding them, men showed them the way to Bethlehem, and it cost the lives of many innocents. "Behold, there came a leper and worshipped Him" (MTT 8:2). At that time, men knew no cure for leprosy. Do not interfere unless you are sure of being able to help. Just behold: the Lord will do the rest.

"Behold, there arose a great tempest in the sea" (MTT 8:24). One of two things will happen: either you will drown and go to the Father, or you will escape and live for the Father. So, do not panic but simply behold. In all things, the bigger the fuss, the more discordant the results.

We are not yet in eternity, but we can catch a glimpse of it by passing as much time as possible in quiet contemplation.

30 The Quest for God

The quest for God is old.

An Ugarithic poem, "Ludlul bel nemequi" (I'll praise the Lord of wisdom") dating from 2500 B.C., contains the moving verse:

> Oh, that I only knew that these things are well > pleasing to a god.
> What is good in one's sight is evil for a god.

What is bad in one's mind is good for his god.
Who can understand the counsel of the gods in the midst of heaven?
The plan of God is deep waters.
Who can comprehend it?

Men seek the right relationship with God but because His will, His predilections, and thoughts are unknown to us, we tremble at every step that it might sever the loving relationship.

Such fear disappears only when we pass from relationship with God to possession of God.

In Jesus, the Son of God became man. A marriage feast between the divine and the human natures took place.

I can now say, "I am my beloved's and my beloved is mine" (SOS 6:3). He is my possession. He disposes of me, but I also dispose of Him. It is no longer a relationship between two entities who can at any moment become separate. The barrier is broken by Christ. God is no longer alone, and the tormented heart of man is no longer single. The heart now responds to God in Shakespeare's words: "No more can I be servered from your side, than can yourself in two divide" (Henry VI).

The difficulty of not understanding God's way disappears. "Shall the thing formed say to him that formed it, why hast thou made me thus?" (ROM 9:20). The soul which possesses God knows that His control of the world cannot be judged by man's myopic view. "The deceived and the deceiver are his" (JOB 12:16). He who possesses God is satisfied with this and asks no questions.

On the last day, the Lord will say to some, "I never knew you" (MTT 7:23). How can a Creator not know His creation?

He created us, but not as creatures external to himself; He created us that we might live and move and have our being in Him (ACT 17:28). He desired union with us in eternal embrace and not as a knower/ known duality. Those rejected in the end will be those who have not realized this and have remained knowers of God.

They have had a relationship with a distant God, perhaps even a good relationship, prophesying in His name and casting out devils and doing many wonderful works (MTT 7:22), but they remained separate from God, unpossessed of Him. They did not belong to their beloved, and their Beloved was not theirs.

The renowned Christian mystic, Meister Eckhardt teaches that he who adores God is an unbeliever. Those who believe unite with Him, and no one is left to be adored.

31 Relative Weight of Wonders

When I wondered why God does not free us through an angel, as it happened when St. Peter was in jail, I remembered in Acts 2, there are 27 verses about the teachings given by apostle Peter and only nine words about miracles: "many words and signs were made by the apostles."

Miracles play a minor role in the Christian religion primarily because it is too easy to regard as miraculous what is not.

Missionaries who went to the Ambrim tribe in the New Hebrides preached without success until they took out their artificial teeth and put them back again. This was the start of a breakthrough. The chief exclaimed that the gods had come to them in the likeness of white men.

Many healings considered miraculous have no more value than that, although I myself have also experienced real miracles of reconstituted health.

What takes place after the miracle can also be a problem. In Shakespeare's "Henry VI," when the king heard about a blind man wonderfully cured, he said, "By his sight his sin is multiplied."

If regeneration does not accompany the cure the former blind man will be possessed by new passions which will make him a worse man than before. This is also true of other infirmities. I have personally known blind persons healed to the great detriment of their souls.

We should also have in view that some of the biblical miracle stories derive from questionable translations. We are told that Elijah was fed by ravens-orevim-in Hebrew (1KI 17:6). The same Hebrew word is used in ISA 13:20 for "Arabs." What if Arabs fed the prophet?

There have been so many miracles in the course of history history. They do not usually convince anyone except sometimes the person who benefits. Jesus told those who sought Him,"Ye seek me, not because ye saw the miracles, but because ye did eat of the loaves" (JHN 6:26).

In the search for miracles what counts is the satisfaction of the desires of the self. But Jesus teaches us to deny ourselves. If the self is not mortified, every miracle only increases the demand for more and magnifies egoism. So the Bible does not emphasize miracles, but rather the teaching which brings about new birth.

Let us walk securely according to the biblical teachings, and if God does a miracle, let us rejoice.

32 The Crime of Fear

It is fear which made some Christians around us become Judas's.

REV 21:8 enumerates eight categories of men who shall have their part in the lake which burns with fire and brimstone. First on the list are not the unbelievers or murderers as would be expected, but the fearful.

Fear is so human. Peter feared in Gethsemane. We all do, but it is more abhorred by God than many gross offenses. It seems that there are many battles ahead even in eternal life. God's universe is vast and courage will be one of the great criteria of selection.

A Christian never flies except to the devil's throat. He can say of himself what King Charles of Frances says in Shakespeare's "Henry VI"; "Him I forgive my death that kills me when he sees me go back one foot or fly. My army, rather with their teeth the walls they'll tear down than forsake the siege."

We are Jesus' sheep. Sheep do not run from the wolf. They cannot defend themselves, but they witness for their Creator by enduring their deaths patiently, without turning their backs to the enemy.

Children of God can be burned at the stake, but they cannot be made to give in. We are assigned to be the scourge of demons.

When Henry Vl said, "Of all base passions, fear is the most accursed," he expressed a biblical thought.

33 Science and the Bible

Not only biblical authors, but also other sages of antiquity knew things which modern science is only now discovering. Aristotle, Greek philosopher of the third century B.C. wrote in "On the generation of animals" that lead ore increases in size and becomes thick and white when air gets into it. Until the beginning of this century this idea was considered to be just an oddity from barbaric times.

Some seventy years ago, flotation was discovered by the modern world. Powdered mixture of ore and rock is mixed with water and air forced in. The ore becomes white, increases in bulk and floats on the surface of water. This process is used today on millions of tons of ores all over the world. So the ancients knew something after all.

The more so ancients inspired by God, the authors of the Bible: it is foretold that at the return of Jesus "the Mount of Olives (on which He will stand) shall cleave in the midst thereof ... and half of the mountain shall remove toward the north and half of it toward the south" (ZEC 14:4). The Quarterly Journal of the Geological Society 1958 tells that the rocks in the Jordan Valley are in considerable tension, that the valley is in a state of shear. This means that geologically, the whole Mideast is moving northwards. Science makes us wait for the moment of the mount's cleavage, but we wait also for His feet to touch its peak. We are not fools.

Science has shown what a big influence genes, climate,

food, sickness and bodily structure have upon our character. The phases of the moon and the spots in the sun are factors in our behavior. The greatest incidences of crime occur during the hottest months of the year.

Our minds are complex, but our souls even more so. Who in antiquity knew about the Oedipus, Electra and Pygmalion complexes, etc., about the innate subconscious which can lead us to commit terrible deeds? Because of these things, some say, the biblical moral criteria are obsolete.

It is true that many in ancient times were ignorant. But there was One who knew what was in man (JHN 2:25) and because He knew, He taught, "Judge not" (MTT 7:1). He knew. He said, "God sent not His Son into the world to condemn the world" (JHN 3:17). He said this in times when court procedures were simple and straightforward - if a man stole or killed, he was condemned. Mitigating circumstances were not taken into account. Jesus' attitude was scientific long before the conception of human behavioral science.

The whole scientific method - unbiased, exact and thorough investigation, based on facts alone, comes from Jesus. In a world of unrestrained passions, He said "We speak that we do know, and testify that we have seen" (JHN 3:11), so much, nothing more, exactly like in a scientific laboratory. "Go and show John those things which ye do hear and see" (MTT 11:4). No fantasy, not even religious fantasy, only the observed facts, just like a scientist gathers data.

Jesus taught mankind to study what happens in nature: "Behold the fowls of the air," and "Consider the lilies of the field" (MTT 6:26-28). From the birds men learned aviation, and from the lilies they learned botany and agronomy.

Never regard science as a danger for religion. Einstein, a scientist whose name the whole world respects, has written, "Science without religion is lame; religion without science is blind."

The great difference between science and religion is that the first does not establish immutable truths and eternal dogmas. It approaches truth by successive approximations without ever making the claim to complete accuracy. Religion has a definite revelation from God - Heaven and earth will pass away, but Jesus' words will stand forever.

34 How to Read the Bible

In prison we repented of many sins. We repented also of the manner in which we had read the Bible.

The Talmud fixes a rule, "Ein dorshim maase bereshith beshanaim" - "You do not speak about Genesis, the things of the beginning when you are in two." God created the universe all alone. Adam was one single man. The Bible is read properly only when you transpose yourself completely into the situation and state of spirit of the author at the moment of writing.

Remember the Bible is only a summary. Adam lived 930 years, but the Bible has only one chapter and a half, 40 verses, to devote to so long a life.

Just as Cuvier reconstructed the skeleton of a prehistoric animal from a single bone, we are called upon to re-create everything from just a few words.

Remember that much of the Bible is poetry. Although Hebrew poetry does not rhyme, one of its characteristics is an alphabetical structure, e.g., JOB 13:7-11, in which every line starts with an "H." The whole Psalm 119 is arranged alphabetically, beginning with verses which have "a" as first letter, others which have "b" and so on. Poetry can reveal truth, but not necessarily accuracy of detail.

The Bible is meant to be read very slowly with special pauses for respiration and meditation. In the Hebrew text there is the ~athnach~, a sign which divides a verse into main clauses. Another sign for pausing is the ~segholta~ [ ] which

subdivides the clause before ~athnach~. 1KI 13:18, read according to Hebrew punctuation, would be as follows: "And he said unto him, I am also a prophet as thou art (segoltha - a pause. Breathe and reflect) and an angel spoke unto me by the word of the Lord (the angel would not speak to you, reader, unless you pause as prescribed for meditating and evoking him), saying, bring him back with thee into thine house, that he may eat bread and drink water (athnach - deep respiration, meditation). But he lied unto him. (Pause. Here there is a sign called ~silluq~, which separates this verse from the following.)

Zaqeph-qaton (written [ ]) stands for a slight pause. "And now thus says Jehovah thy creator, O Jacob (zaqeph-qaton, a slight pause) and thy former, O Israel (athnach, big pause), thou shalt not fear for I have redeemed thee (slight pause), I have called by thy name, mine thou art (stop before passing to the next verse.) The zaqeph gadol plays the role of the zaqeph-qaton where no conjunctive accent precedes.

It is good to know all this. The accents can reveal the interpretation of doubtful passages, as in ISA 40:3: "The voice of one that cries (zaqeph-qaton, pause) in the wilderness (zaqeph-gadol, pause) prepare ye the way of the Lord." Wherever two zaqephs occur in the same clause, that which comes first is stronger. We must therefore read, "The voice of one that cries: In the wilderness prepare ye the way of the Lord" and not, as it is usually punctuated, "The voice of one that cries in the wilderness: prepare ye the way of the Lord."

Learn to read the Bible slowly, breathing rhythmically, with pauses to put in the correct accents. In this way you can immerse yourself in the Spirit in which the Bible was written, and thus be able to participate in the Oneness which is its essence.

35 Open Space

Some people complain about sermons and devotional books that they are not dense enough, that they should contain more teaching. This is like complaining about a love letter that too much paper is wasted on empty spaces.

When a lover once complained about this, the black letters grew and grew to satisfy him until the sheet of paper was totally black.

Woe to a religious book which leaves no place for questions. If matter, the physical universe, is mysterious, the more so God. Man has to search. He cannot be given pre-masticated .

It is good to ask questions in religion, but you must ask the right ones. Herod inquired of the wise men (MTT 2:7) what time the star appeared which heralded the birth of Jesus. He did not ask how they knew that the star had anything to do with the appearance of the Messiah.

After the Lord told the parable of the sower (MTT 13:3-8), the disciples asked, "Why speakest thou unto them in parables?" rather than asking the more important question about why men's destinies differ so greatly and what can be done to change them.

Seeing the senselessness of many questions, Jesus did not answer them. Jesus revealed what people needed to know, not what they asked for.

For many years I thought that I believed the whole Bible to be the Word of God. When I was in prison, I discovered that my belief was incomplete. The Bible consists of white sheets of paper inscribed with black letters. I had believed only the black letters to be the Word of God. But there is meaning in the blank spaces, too.

The blank space can be used for decoding the ciphered parts.

In JER 25:26 we read about Sheshach, but no adversary of Israel is known by this name. The Hebrews used a simple cipher called ~Athbash~ in which the first letter of the alphabet, "a," can be exchanged with the last letter of the Hebrew alphabet "t"; the second letter, "b," with the second last, "sh," and so on. By applying this code to the word ~Sheshach~ the result is "Babel," the Hebrew name for "Babylon." In those days Babylon was a super-power. It would have been too dangerous to denounce it openly, so a nickname was used.

Many things in the Bible are coded. There are stories of sins and salvation of persons thousands of years and thousands of miles apart. Decode! You might find that you yourself are meant and are called by a code name.

There are numerous contradictions between Bible texts - LUK 9:3 forbids the apostles to carry staves, MRK 6:8 allows it; LUK 10:4 forbids sandals, MRK 6:9 allows. Many other things are sometimes allowed and sometimes forbidden. You have to find out which Bible verse applies to you at a certain moment, what things are allowed or forbidden you. There is plenty of space in the white places of the Bible for your notes and thoughts. When you have found sure guidance from God, it will be part of His eternal Word, the part for you for that given moment.

For many years I was one person alone in a cell.

God is also one, and we are created in the image of God, the image of His oneness (GEN 1:26). It is written, "Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord" (DEU 6:4). The chosen people of God are one. We read "Who is like your people Israel, a nation that is one in the earth (1CH 17:21 according to the original). Except for God and His people, oneness is nowhere to be found, yet without it, there is no Godhead, nor can the real church exist.

Oneness creates a special state of spirit. The Jews sing, ~Huh echad veein sheni~. "He is one and there is no second." This applies to the oneness of the children of God, too. The believer being one, without division in knower, known and act of knowledge, becomes a deep mystery for himself. Moses and Aaron said, "What are we?" (EXO 16:8). They did not know. Likewise, David asks, "Who am I and what is my life?" (1SM 18:18).

Live in oneness, without self-contemplation, self-admiration, self-despite or self-pity. No one exists apart from this one self, no one to admire or despise you or recognize in you that your self is being despised or praised. It is a simple, serene existence. No winds blow, no tempests arise.

Deify yourself, become godlike in oneness and you will be one in the spirit with all who do likewise. It is written, "You shall take on the first day (of the feast of tabernacles)

the boughs of goodly trees, branches of palm trees and the boughs of thick trees and willows of the brook" (LEV 23:40)

All of these references to boughs and branches refer to Israel. Just as the citron has both taste and fragrance, so does Israel have men who are both learned and righteous in actions. Just as the fig has a taste but no fragrance, so Israel has men who have learning, but no good deeds. As the myrtle has fragrance but no flavor, so has Israel men who do good works but are not learned. And just as the willow has neither taste nor fragrance, so Israel has men who are neither learned nor righteous. And what does the Holy One, praised be He, do with them? He said, "Let them be interrelated, united in one group, and they will be able to atone for one another. When Israel does so, it will be exalted" (Leviticus Rabbah 30:2).

Oneness in the Church is achieved through mutual forbearance, mutual compensation.

37 Where and What is God?

A Jewish book of mysticism. "The Zohar" writes, "The creatures of the earth think of Him as being on high, declaring 'His glory is above the heavens' (PSA 113:4) while the heavenly beings think of Him as being below, declaring 'Thy glory is above all the earth' (PSA 57:5).

Both have limited vision. God is outside of space. The one who is all in all cannot have a certain place to dwell, to the exclusion of other places. Therefore Christ who is God says, "The foxes have holes and the birds of the air have nests; but the Son of man has not where to lay his head" (MTT 8:20). If He were limited to space, He would not belong to Godhead.

God occupies no place anywhere. Creator of the universe, which has space as one of its attributes, He existed before there was such a thing as place. Space is required by material objects, but not by thoughts, ideals and desires which do not rest in a point fixed by geographical coordinates. God is spirit, not a material object which must exist somewhere. When the Bible says that He is in heaven, it is to indicate His elevation. God dwells in Israel, in Zion, in His Church: such things are said for the purpose of giving honor to an institution or a people. But these assertions in the Bible are never exclusive - they do not limit God. They do not mean that He is in Zion, but not in Britain; in church, but not in a factory.

Nor can time be applied to God. The biblical Hebrew has no tenses to indicate time: you cannot say that things have been, or are or will be. You enter the sphere of Divinity, of timelessness. The Hebrew verb has only two fundamental categories, the perfect and the imperfect. ~Oseh~ means "in the process of being done." ~Asah~ indicates completed action. Biblical Greek also has a verb form called ~Aorist~, which literally translated means "without horizon." God is the Creator of the universe, which has time as one of its attributes but He and His people are timeless. He was when there was no time. He will be when "there should be time no longer" (REV 10:6).

God is called Father and King because we humans associate these titles with our concept of esteem. He did not procreate us as a father did. He did not become king by inheritance or conquest as other kings do. He is above all that we can say in human words.

When Livingstone went to the cannibals, he wished to teach them "God is love," but they did not have the word "love." So he asked them what was the best thing they knew. They replied "Unboy," which is the smoked meat from the arm of a man. So Livingstone preached, "God is the best unboy." He was criticized for this, but wrongly. God is not unboy, it is true, but neither is He love. Love is a sentiment shared by humans and superior animals. But is God merely a human sentiment? Because love was the highest thing the Greeks knew, John said, "God is love," just as Livingstone said, "God is unboy" for those who knew no better.

There are no human words and categories to indicate how and where God is. Whenever attributes are applied to God, they are what are called "anthropomorphisms," likenesses from human life which are used to tell something about Him. We are limited in our thoughts and words about God, but let us know that, beyond all our limitations, He is.

38 Why Did Jesus Change Water Into Wine?

I spent many years among criminals, hearing from them of all the debacles that alcoholism produces. 1, had I such power, would change all the alcoholic beverages into water. Why did Jesus do the opposite and change water into wine at the marriage feast in Cana? (JHN 2:7-11).

The word "wine" in Biblical times did not mean what it means today. Natural fermentation produces a maximum of only 14 percent alcohol. Higher alcohol content kills the yeast cell which produces it. Modern alcoholic beverages which are 50 percent or more alcohol are a result of freezing and distillation processes unknown in antiquity. In ancient Palestine, wine contained no more than 8 percent alcohol because of the limited amount of natural sugar in grape juice. The Jews had no sugar cane and so could not add sugar.

A second consideration is that both the English Bible and the Greek New Testament translate two different Hebrew words as "wine" or, in Greek, "oinos."

(1) ~Tirosh~ occurs 38 times and has correctly been translated into Latin as "must" or "fresh wine." This word probably does not refer to a fermented drink, but indicates rather a fresh fruit of the harvest as in the expression "corn, wine and oil." In JOE 2:24, HOS 9:2 and PRO 3:10 ~tirosh~ is said to be filling the presses, so it could not be anything other than grape juice freshly squeezed. Isaiah speaks about ~tirosh~ as "found in the cluster." I cannot understand how translators could use the word "wine" for a juice still in the cluster. Micah said, "Thou shalt tread ... tirosh" (MIC 6:15), which cannot possibly be considered as wine.

(2) ~Yayin~ occurs 153 times and means fermented wine, but with a limited percentage of alcohol as explained above.

If the story of the events in Cana is translated so that Jesus changed water into must, it would be more consistent with the condemnation of drunkenness and the commandment of sobriety so often repeated in the Bible.

39 Daring Arguments With God

Saints have sometimes dared to argue with God. And sometimes they have won. When God decided to destroy the Jewish people because they were worshiping the golden calf, Moses said to Him, "Turn from thy fierce wrath and repent of this evil against thy people .... And the Lord repented of the evil which he thought to do unto his people" (EXO 32:14).

Job accused God of laughing at the trial of the innocent and giving the earth into the hand of the wicked (JOB 9:23-24). David prayed in despair, "How long wilt thou forget me, O Lord?" (PSA 13:1).

The Lord said to Cain (after the latter killed Abel) "Where is Abel, your brother'?" He answered, "I do not know. Am I my brother's keeper?" (GEN 4:9). Cain was, in effect, saying"You, O Lord, are the Keeper, the one who should watch over all creatures, and yet you ask me concerning Abel." The situation may be compared to that of a thief whose burglary escaped notice until morning. When the watchman caught him, he asked, "Why did you steal?" The thief answered, "I am a thief by profession, and I do my work regularly. Your profession is to stand watch at the gate. Why did you abandon your profession? And now you ask me why I stole!" Thus, too, did Cain speak to God: "I killed Abel; but you created in me the impulse to evil. You are the Keeper of all and yet you permitted me to kill him. You have killed him! If you had accepted my offering as you accepted his, I would not have been jealous of him" (from the Midrash).

A man once came to a pastor for advice. "What should I do about blasphemous thoughts which pass through my mind?" he said. "I am assailed by the idea that there is no God and that if He does exist, He is not good. This drives me to madness because if this were the case, the world and life would be entirely senseless. How could we continue to be in a world without a good God?" The pastor answered "Do not fear. Just go on with your 'blasphemous' thoughts."

Rabbi Elimelekh of Lizhensk once sent his disciples on the eve of the Day of Atonement to observe the actions of a tailor. "From him," he said, "you will learn what a man should do on this holy day." From a window they saw the tailor take a book from his shelf in which was written all the sins that he had committed throughout the year. Book in hand, the tailor addressed God: "Today, the day of forgiveness for all Israel, the moment has come for us - you, God, and myself - to settle our account. Here is the list of all my sins, but here also is another volume in which I have written down all the sins that you have committed, the pain, the woe and the heartache that you have sent me and my family. Lord of the universe, if we were to total the accounts exactly, you would owe me much more than I would owe you! But it is the eve of the Day of Atonement, when everyone is commanded to make peace with his fellow. Hence, I forgive you for your sins if you will forgive me for mine." The tailor then poured himself a cup of wine, pronounced the blessing over it, and then exclaimed: "L'hayyim! (To life!), Master of the world. Let there now be peace and joy between us, for we have forgiven each other, and our sins are now as if they never were."

The disciples returned to Rabbi Elimelekh, recounted what they had seen and heard and complained that the tailor's words were overly impudent before heaven. Their master answered that God himself and His heavenly court had come to listen to what the tailor had said in great simplicity, and the tailor's words had caused great joy in all the spheres.

Speak with God as with a friend. You can prevail over Him. If you consider something He does unjust, say so. Do not cover your inner complaints with flatteries which are not sincere.

God had decided that only males would inherit in Israel. The daughters of Telephehad pleaded with Moses to return to God and to tell Him that since their father had no sons, the law should not apply to them. They should inherit, even though they were females. Moses returned with God's answer, "The daughters of Telephehad speak right" (NUM 27:7).

Be daring with God. Not all His decrees are definitive. Through clearly expressing your dissatisfactions and doubts, you may receive understanding.

40 El - A Name of God

Hebrew is a unique tongue - spare, lean, sinewy, yet rich, even poetic. Built around a skeleton of a mere four hundred roots, it impresses when flashed out. Able to bear heavy burdens of thought, it flexes its musculature with great subtlety and hides the secrets of its skill from all but the learned or enlightened.

Many languages contain homonyms, but none so many as the Semitic tongues. Yet the different meanings of a word must have a connection between them in the deeper layers of our psyche, or men would not have chosen to use the same vehicle for different notions.

Therefore, by translating a given Hebrew word into its English equivalent, one does not carry across the whole truth, since in Hebrew, as in several other Semitic idioms, a word has not one but a cluster of meanings. In the Chicago Assyrian dictionary, for instance, eight pages were needed to relate all the possible interpretations of the Semitic word ~abu~.

A modern illustration of this clustering of meanings (in this case, among homonyms) comes to mind. Sigmund Freud once wrote of a German psychotic who was obsessed with the idea that rats (Ratten in German) were attacking him. Under psychoanalysis it was established that he was worried about two things: he could not pay the installments (in German, ~Raten~) on his house, and because of this he was not able to marry (in German, ~hei-raten~). These concerns, exhibiting themselves in similar words, were behind his obsession with rats.

Likewise, with Semitic languages, words with the same or similar sounds are related to each, though more deeply, strongly, or expressively than is the case with our modern European languages.

We must keep these subsurface relationships in mind in order to understand ~El~, a name frequently used for "God" in the Hebrew Bible. (The corresponding Sumerian and Ugaritic name for God is ~Il~.) In the original Hebrew text of the Old Testament there were no vowels. The name El was written with the letters ~Alef~, a mute sound, and ~L~. Therefore, "El" is not the only possible pronunciation of these two letters: they are sometimes pronounced "Al."

As "El" they meant "God," "toward," or "against"; as "Al" they meant a mild prohibition, a negative wish, like the Greek ~me~. We find this "Al" in 1SM 22:15: "Let not the king impute anything ..." It is obvious that nobody could give the king an order, so the word "Al" is substituted for an absolute command. It is used only with the so-called jussive form of the verb, which is a semi-command.

When a Hebrew pronounced or read a word, all its possible connotations collaborated in producing an impression upon him, just as a chord struck on a piano sets up sympathetic vibrations in every other stringed instrument within range. Likewise, when he approached God ~El~, he knew he was approaching a mysterious being who cannot be reached in this life but who always remains a direction "toward" - El - which one moves.

In addition, the one who worships Him automatically becomes a man who is "against" - the same word ~El~. Henceforth he must swim against the stream. Christians, wrote Paul, are not conformed to this world (ROM 12:2). They know which way the wind blows, but they follow their own course.

The moment one calls upon God ~El~, another string vibrates: "Al"-the discreet advice, "Please don't!" A relationship with God includes, then, acceptance of the "Al," of His plea, "Don't rush to do this thing you have in mind." It also invites recognition of the fact that He never spoke against an action unless it was harmful to the individual or to society.

Rabbi Pinhas of Korez once spoke these mysterious words: "People think they pray to God, but it is not so. For the prayer itself is the essence of Godhead." The meaning is clear when one understands that in Hebrew ~El~ signifies the aim. God, as well as the directing of the heart to Him. Prayer is ~El~ just as the person to whom one prays is ~El~. Thus, "Toward" and "God"are the same word in divine revelation.

It behooves us, then, to pronounce ~El~, the name of God, bearing all this in mind. Let us repeat it with love ... ~El~. Just as the name of an earthly beloved – of a bride, of a child, of a sweetheart – brings honey to the mouth, so the names of the Lord, infused with His glory, are sweet.

The Lord taught His disciples to pray, "Hallowed be Thy name" (MTT 6:9). Summarizing His work on earth that last evening before Gethsemane and Golgotha, He said to His Father, "I have manifested Thy name" (JHN 17:6). If we pronounce His name with piety and devotion, our eyes will behold His attributes and His wonderful works.

Often we use the word "God" casually. without reverence. Not so the Jews who, when they write the scroll of the Law for the synagogue, immerse in water for purification as often as they come to one of His names. If they write it fifty times a day, they immerse fifty times – sometimes, in winter, in icy water.

In an acorn resides an oak. In the short name ~El~, Godhead itself lives. Pronouncing His name with devotion helps to unite our mind with His and enlarge our understanding.

Between us and our names there is often a difference. A human being can have the name of Mary without being pure; the name of Magdalene without watching faithfully at the foot of His cross; the name of Paul without being an apostle; the name of Richard without having a lion-heart. With God the difference between himself and His name does not exist. We magnify Him when we magnify His name. He speaks through us when we have His name reverently on our lips.

If the names of God are a flight of steps leading to God himself, ~El~ is the first step. Flies buzz indiscriminately from blossoms to dunghills, bees only from flower to flower. So we should move from one name of God to another, settling from time to time also on His commandments, precepts, miracles, and on His life as reflected in His saints.

The Moslem "Allah" is not the same as ~El~. Allah refers only to the Creator and no one else. The Hebrew "El,"as well as "Elohim," another name, like the word "god" in English, was used also for men. God said to Moses, "Thou shalt be to Pharaoh instead of God" (EXO 4:16). Jesus said to His Jewish audience, quoting The Psalmist, "Is it not written in your law, I said, Ye are gods?" (JHN 10:34). He called them gods "unto whom the word of God came."

If we seek earnestly to know God--~El~ and speak His holy name with reverence, we too may find ourselves, in time, individuals toward whom the desires of many turn. Our loving words and our meek "don'ts" will have value. We may even become symbols to those who are against unrighteousness. Such are the gracious significations included in the seminal holy syllable ~El~.

41 Compound Names of God

"Tao [God] named is not the real Tao," said Lao-Tse, and there is truth in this assertion.

The possibility of giving names to any thing or person, including God, is circumscribed by the limitations of language itself. First of all, a given language has a certain number of letters or characters at its disposal in the formation of words. Suppose, for instance, that God had a name requiring for its expression an English "w," a Spanish "n"(as in ~mana~), or a German"". Such a name would not have been accessible to the Hebrews because their language contained neither these sounds nor their corresponding letters. By the same token, the Hebrew name of Jesus - ~Jeshua~ - cannot be written accurately in English.

Second, the potential for giving names depends on the available substantives, verbs, adjectives, and so on, of a language. The aggregate is called in Sanskrit ~naman~, from which the Greeks derived ~anoma~ and the English ~name~. The name of God, then, is the sum total of words in which His character can be expressed. Thus, when you pray, as Jesus enjoined in the Lord's Prayer, "Hallowed be Thy name," recognize its limitations. Look to the reality for which there are no names in our language, the real person beyond any name in any tongue.

Because no name is complete or all-embracing, there are many names for God in Scripture. The Son of God could be called in Hebrew "the Lamb" or "the Lion of Judah."

But when He was introduced to the Eskimos, these names were meaningless, since they had no knowledge of such animals. Other names had to be found.

One should be wary of confounding a name with identification. God has many aliases because every name of His is only an approximation.

Even the word "name" has a double sense in Hebrew. The corresponding word is Shem. Now, Shem is one of the sons of Noah and the progenitor of the Semitic race. In Scripture His name stands for the Semites, just as Japheth stands for the Indo-German race descended from Him (GEN 9:27). When Jesus taught His Jewish disciples the "Our Father," He said "Jitgadal shimcha." We have here a typical example of how ideas reduced to words can be exposed to different interpretations. The words can be correctly translated "Hallowed be thy name" and "Hallowed be thy semitic race." He who wishes to hallow God must of necessity approach Him as He is, beyond words.

To overcome this difficulty, the Bible provides not only simple names of God such as El, Elohim, JHWH (Jahweh, or Jehovah), but also compound names, just as in mathematics one uses not only whole numbers but also decimals to arrive closer to reality.

For instance, the Lord appeared to Abraham as ~El-Shaddai~ (GEN 17:1), which means "a sufficient God," "a nurturing God," or more literally "God - a female breast," that is, a God who feeds one at His breast.

The English Authorized Version says, "I am the Lord that heals thee" (EXO 15:26). But the Hebrew uses only two words, a compound name of God, "Jehovah-Rophe," the healing Jehovah. Furthermore, the Hebrew does not contain the idea that He heals "thee." God does not revolve around your person. He simple heals.

"Jehovah-Jireh" (GEN 22:14) means literally "God who sees to it or who provides." "Jehovah-Megaddesh" (LEV 20:8) is God who renews or sanctifies.

"Jehovah-Shalom"(JDG 6:24) is God-peace.

"Jehovah-Nissi" (EXO 17:15) means "God - my wonder" or "God - my sign." This compound name is also the name of an altar built to God, to indicate that approaching the altar can signify approaching God himself.

The name "Jehovah-Tsidkenu" (JER 23:6) meaning "God - our righteousness," belongs not only to Godhead, but also to His people, since the Jewish nation is called by this name. Thus, to join His flock is like joining God.

One interesting compound name is "Jehovah-Shammah" (EZE 48:35), meaning"God is there." In Hebrew, "there" when applied to a male subject is ~sham~, when applied to a female is ~shammah~. Here is a case in which the name of Jehovah is linked to a female substantive, indicating the all-encompassing nature of His love and concern for His creatures.

The names by which a sovereign God deigns to be called in Scripture to reveal His character to humanity are many and varied and could inspire volumes. Their very multiplicity underscores the difficulty of reducing Godhead to the limitations of human language. But they are intended to reveal to sinful man the many facets of a loving God.

How sad it would be for a lover to know only the name of his beloved, when he desires the beloved herself. To sanctify the name of God - to pray "Hallowed be Thy name" - means to advance from knowledge ~about~ God to the blessed reality of His presence.

42 Anohi and Ani

There is often little resemblance between the peoples and the languages they speak. Missionaries who have lived among primitive tribes sometimes found, to their surprise, that the native languages were far ahead of the natives. The language bore the stamp of thought and development.

The grammar of the Ambrim tribe in the New Hebrides is more precise than that of English. ~Ire~ is an"inclusive we," comprising both speaker and the person spoken to. ~Komai~ is an "exclusive we," in which the person spoken to is not included. In a sermon, "Our Father" would be used with the inclusive pronoun, to include the congregation; but when the preacher prays, "Our Father," he would use the exclusive pronoun so as to exclude God, the person addressed.

The uncultured, degraded Jews, who had emerged from 400 years of slavery, had a highly developed language, such as you would not have expected in a nation at that level.

There are two Hebrew expressions for "I": ~Ani~ and ~Anohi~. ~Ani~ emphasizes the pronoun. It is used when one boasts "I did it." When attention is focused upon the action rather than on the person who performed it, the expression ~Anohi~, in the sense "I ~did~ it!" is used.

The Ten Commandments begin with the words ~Anohi Adonai Eloheiha~ (EXO 20:2), which shows that the sentence is to be read "I ~am~ the Lord thy God." The emphasis is not "I" but that the Lord ~is~ our God, a God who has freed people from slavery and wishes to free us, too; a Lord on whom we can rely.

The words of Cecil Rhodes, the founder of the British Empire in Southern Africa, were, "So much to do; so little done." He had been a man for whom it was important that great achievements of the English should be accomplished through him. Although he had had forerunners, and others would continue his work, this could not satisfy him. He passed away feeling that ~he~ had done little. Rhodes would have used ~Ani~ to refer to himself.

The Christian or divine manner of thinking is just the contrary. The ~Ani~ disappears in ~Anohi~. The self is denied (LUK 9:23). The work to which we are called is what is important. We do our little part. We are happy if others do even more and better than we.

The whole structure of the Hebrew language de-emphasizes the role of the individual, putting the accent on the deed performed. The English sentence "Moses guarded a horse," which tells us what Moses did, can be translated in Hebrew only as ~Shamar Mosheh sus~ - "Guarded Moses a horse." The important thing is the guarding of the horse. That this was done by Moses was of secondary importance.

Even the first verse of the Bible sounds different in Hebrew than in English. In English the emphasis is on God. "In the beginning ~God~ created." We are meant to know that the universe is His doing and we should adore Him. In the Hebrew the emphasis is that in the beginning God ~created~ the heavens and the earth. The order of the words in the original GEN 1:1 is "In the beginning created God." Rejoice in the beauty of creation - this is the primary meaning. The Hebrew text satisfies also one's curiosity about who is behind it. It was created by a God who keeps himself in humility.

Such nuances as ~Ani~ and ~Anohi~ or putting the verb before the subject show how important the manner of reading the Bible is. The Master asks a lawyer, "How do you read?" It is obviously not the same thing to read "~I~ and the Father are one," "I ~and~ the Father are one," "I and the ~Father~ are one," "I and the Father ~are~ one," or "I and the Father are ~one~.

In reading the Bible, much depends upon the voice and intonation. I have met only once in my life (in Finland) a pastor who recited from memory the Bible text for the sermon so convincingly that the sermon which followed was superfluous. The Bible reading had already brought souls to conversion and illumination.

Let us learn to think in the Hebrew manner even though speaking another language. De-emphasize the self; focus on the action performed.

43 The Keri and the Ketib

In the 10th century A.D., the Masoretes, a number of authoritative rabbis, established ancient rules in writing for the proper transcription and reading of the Old Testament. Besides certain alterations in spelling and wording due to the addition of vowels which did not originally exist, the present text also contains the musical notations for chanting the Scriptures, along with .some strange annotations called ~Keri~ or "the reading" as distinguished from ~Ketib~, "the writing."

The Masoretes established that certain words were to be written one way, but read another. The simple written text veiled certain mysteries of the Bible. Often a simple story contains details which seem irrelevant, but are actually secret meanings which lie beneath the surface in coded language. The Keri is the key for unlocking the code and revealing the deeper meaning of the story.

A case of Keri versus Ketib is found in 2KI 5:12 2ki0512 in which Naaman the leper asks, "Are not ~Abana~ and ~Pharpar~, rivers of Damascus, better than all the waters of Israel?" It would be difficult to prove any sort of qualitative difference between the rivers of Palestine and Syria, nor can we definitely identify any Syrian rivers by these names. But the Keri of the Masoretic text soon reveals the hidden meaning by changing the spelling of the "rivers" to read: "Are not ~Amanah~ and ~Parpar~ better?" Soon the hidden meaning becomes clear.

Hebrew words often have male and female forms, like the male and female substantives in German and Latin. ~Amanah~ is the female form of ~Amen~. It connotes complete female submission, saying "Amen" to all the Divine spouse has decided. ~Par~ is an animal brought as sacrifice and ~parpar~ is thus superlative sacrifice. Naaman's question may now be understood in its deeper sense "Are not saying a superlative "Amen" (complete submission to God's will, as exemplified by the Virgin Mary's acceptance of the angel's decree that she become the mother of the Lord), and offering valuable sacrifices - are these not more worthy than washing in the River Jordan?"

The most obvious answer is "yes." But when God commands something ordinary or common, simple obedience assumes a higher aspect, and may become worthier in God's eyes than an action that may seem more valuable. Many would be ready to do great works for the Lord, but would not be willing to humbly scrub the floor of an orphanage or mission office. Naaman was not required to seek a high spiritual action, such as the saying of ~Amanah~ or bringing of ~Parpar~. The leper had to do something common: to wash himself in the Jordan, because that was God's will for him. May we learn from the revealed meaning of this story!

44 How to Speak

I regretted in jail the manner in which I had previously preached. The Hebrew word for "to speak," ~leomer~, implies the notion "to speak excellently." The speech of a child of God cannot be other than excellent. Hence, the expression "to speak excellently" would be a tautology in biblical Hebrew. ~Leomer~ is also used in biblical Hebrew for "to command."

When Jesus spoke He spoke excellently, commandingly, whereas most men only chatter. He spoke in beautiful parables, in a noble manner, and His followers spoke nobly also. The following parable illustrates how believers learned the secret of ~leomer~ from Christ.

A wise king asked a renowned painter whether he could paint a dragon for him. Happy to serve the king, the painter replied, "Certainly." The king then asked him, "But have you ever seen a dragon?" As the painter had not, the king advised him, "Seek first to see a dragon and paint it afterward." The painter knew that dragons were mythical figures, and reflected about the meaning of the king's order. He thought, "The king must have meant I should first look for a man as evil as a dragon." So we went from jail to jail until he found a fierce criminal, whose very appearance breathed murder. He returned to the king and told him, "I am ready to paint. I have seen a dragon." The king inquired, "Does this dragon appeal to you." "No," replied the painter. "Go again," said the king, "and find a dragon which attracts rather than frightens you." After years passed in meditation, the painter returned to the king and said, "I found the dragon you mentioned in my own bosom. It is my own wicked heart. I will paint it." And he painted his self-portrait.

The beauty of this parable shows that those who understood it had learned from Jesus to comprehend the Hebrew manner of speaking exquisitely.

Jesus says (meaning that He spoke the following words in the most beautiful and compelling way), "From within, out of the heart of men, proceed evil thoughts, adulteries, fornications, murders, thefts, covetousness, wickedness, deceit, lasciviousness, the evil eye, blasphemy, pride, foolishness" (MRK 7:21-22). Christ said this long before the psychoanalysts and more beautifully and powerfully than they. And in the same sublime manner, He said that the remedy for the evils within the human heart is "the blood of the new testament, which is shed for many for the remission of sins" (MTT 26:28).

It was said about Jesus, "Never man spoke like this man" (JHN 7:46). He spoke excellently, in accord with the genius of His language. Let us also learn to speak exquisitely and in a manner which gives pleasure.

45 Jesus' Multiple Crucifixions

Several places in Jerusalem are shown as having been the site of Golgotha. This is as it should be, for there have been a multitude of Goliaths. Jesus was not crucified only once.

Sculptors and painters have tried to help us encounter the crucifixion that occurred 2,000 years ago. But Jesus suffers even more cruelly today when those who were once enlightened fall away and "crucify to themselves the Son of God afresh" (HEB 6:4-6).

A mass falling away, the great apostasy, is taking place today, just as was prophesied for the days before Christ's coming again. Today's crucifixions occur as a mass phenomenon. It is not just a few hundred people shouting, "Crucify Him"; not just a small band of soldiers flogging Him and hammering nails into His flesh. Now millions participate. And they are crucifying a glorified Lord, one who is in heaven where the anguish of heart for the eternal fate of mankind is much more intense than on earth.

Charles Gardiner, famous mining engineer in South Africa, once refused to dismount from his horse to examine some gold which was being shown to him. He said, "Earth of this chemical composition cannot contain gold." Walker, a carpenter who discovered a reef whose contents in gold and diamonds was assessed at 3 billion dollars, died in poverty because he thought the diamonds were merely shining toys for children. Unenlightened men often pass by things of high value without giving them due importance. This is forgiven without much ado.

But once you have been enlightened, be careful; tremble once you have tasted the heavenly gift, fear once you are a partaker of the Holy Spirit. To taste the Word of God and the powers of the world to come is a great responsibility. Henceforth, by abandoning your faith, you become one of the henchmen who crucify the Son of God afresh, this time a glorified Son of God (HEB 6:6).

The first crucifixion, though a horrible crime, brought salvation to mankind. Your fresh crucifixion of the Lord may also prove beneficent in some way - everything concurs to the good in the wise plan of God - but the Church will no longer be able to renew you to repentance. Beware!

While others crucify Him afresh, my aim in life is to de-crucify Him. Will you join me in this?

In order to de-crucify Him you must forget about yourself.

Once there was a saintly monk who prayed a great deal but also spent much time caring for the beard of which he was quite proud. An angel appeared with the message that this was displeasing to God, and that the beard should be sacrificed. The monk was humbled and immediately accepted the reproach. Carefully he plucked out his beard, hair by hair. Now, every time he prayed, he thought with satisfaction about the fact that he had given up his beard. The angel appeared again and told him sadly, "Nothing has changed. Your mind still dwells upon your beard."

Abandon what is good within you as utterly as you forsake the evil within you. May He, and only He, live in you. By so doing you de-crucify Jesus.

46 The Jesus

One of the strange things in the Gospel is that sometimes the definite article is placed before the names of Jesus, Peter, and other personalities, as if these were not proper names.

It is most irregular to place the definite article before a proper name. I would not refer to my wife as "the Sabine" or to my son as "the Michael." Usually an article is placed only before a generic name, e.g., "the Christian," or "the believer." It is as if the Evangelists intended to portray certain types rather than real persons.

"The Jesus" (~ho Iisus~ in Greek), is the prototype of "the Jesus-type man," who responds to certain circumstances in a certain manner according to a spiritual law. Similarly there is "the Peter-type man," and the "Pilate-type."

In Hebrew, even the spelling of the name changes when the definite article is placed before it. "The" in Hebrew is ~ha~. After this prefix the first letter of a name or a noun is Jesus in Hebrew is ~Yeshuah~; "The Jesus" would be ~Ha-Yyeshuah~. "The Peter" would be "Happetrus."

The Greek article and this little prefix ~ha~ in Hebrew have great depth and can be a matter for much fruitful meditation.

In his splendid collections of Sufite stories, Indries Shah tells of a Moslem monk who attended religious discussions, listening attentively to all that was said, but always remaining silent. People wondered why he came and considered him too stupid to understand their debates. One day the monk invited the others to visit his monastery. They were brought to a grand marble building, splendidly carpeted, with dervishes everywhere in meditation. These rose and bowed respectfully when the monk appeared. The guests realized how they had erred in thinking disdainfully about their host. After a good meal, the guests were given pleasant rooms for sleep. When they awoke, the monastery was gone. They had been sleeping on a mountain top, on stones, and were half frozen. They cursed the monk who, through some magic, had made them believe in the existence of the luxurious temple, and they worried about how to get down from the mountain. But all at once they found themselves at their usual gathering in one of their homes, where religious matters were heatedly being debated. The monk sat in the corner as usual, without saying a word.

The people fell upon him, demanding an explanation. He said, "You are caught in deceit. You are not able to distinguish truth from falsehood. Otherwise you would be quiet and sure, knowing the truth only for living, and not as subject for debate. Would you debate 2 x 2 = 4? You have accepted one illusion after another, a monastery all of marble, then a hostile mountaintop. Perhaps even this room and your religious discussions are simple illusions like the others." Having spoken these words, he disappeared.

Those who belong to "the Jesus," to "the Jesus-type," to what the Bible calls the body of Jesus, belong to it now as much as did Jesus of Nazareth 2,000 years ago. A foot is as much a part of a body as a head, requiring no discussion or debate to bring them together. "The tribes of Israel said to David, Behold we are your bone and your flesh" (2SM 5:1). Christians can say the same words to Jesus Christ.
When they suffer, Jesus suffers. When they are received and helped, Jesus is helped. They belong to the "ho Iisus. "They are no longer spectators of the life of Jesus, another person than themselves, but actors in the drama of "ho Iisus."

The Gospels have retained some of the words which our Lord spoke on the cross in the Aramean language, e.g., "Eloi, Eloi, lama sabahtani?" Others are known only in the Greek translation.

One of Jesus' utterances as He died can have different meanings. This is the word, "It is finished" (JHN 19:30), in the sense that the work of redemption of our sins through His shedding of blood has now been accomplished. The corresponding Hebrew word, which Jesus will have pronounced is "Kalah" which means also "Bride." Could this not have been a last thought of love for Jesus' bride, the Church? Does it not perhaps show that she and her purity until His return were His last desire?

If a cry after His bride was one of our Lord's last words, we can be at peace. He will help us to overcome all our handicaps.

Isidore of Seville ran away from school, finding scholarship too difficult. Sitting down beside a spring that trickled over a rock, he watched the water as it fell in drops, one at a time. The drops had worn away a large stone. This sight inspired him with hope that his dullness could be conquered. Later he became one of the greatest scholars of his time. These drops of water gave Britain a brilliant historian, and the Church a famous teacher.

Everyone belonging to the Church, the bride of Christ, can be confident, however humble and backward he might be. For over three years Jesus was aware of the sins, doubts and misunderstandings of His apostles. Once He had to call Peter "Satan" to bring him to his senses (MTT 16:23). He said to them all, "How long shall I suffer you?" (MTT 17:17) but He loved them passionately, and when nailed to the cross, He sighed, "O, bride."

The sins of believers are only temporary. "When He shall appear, we shall be like Him" (1JN 3:2). Each of us will be another aspect of Jesus, as beautiful and pure as He is.

We were His last thought. May He have pre-eminence in our lives today, and be our last thought too. May our parting word be "Bridegroom," as His perhaps was "Bride."

48 Identification with Christ

David sang, "Thou wilt not leave my soul in hell, neither wilt Thou suffer thine Holy One to see corruption. Thou wilt show me the path of life" (PSA 16:10-11). Peter explains in ACT 2:27-31 that the prophet was speaking these words about Christ, that is, about someone other than himself someone who would appear on earth many centuries in the future. Why then did David use the first person, not the third, speaking about the Messiah as if He were David himself?

This is because believers and the Messiah are not two persons, but one. We are His body, "We are of His flesh and of His bones" (EPH 5:30). The unity between ourselves and Christ could not have been expressed more realistically.

It can be understood figuratively that we are His flesh, but how can one explain symbolically that we are also "His bones"? It is a common expression that the Church is the mystical body of Christ, but it is not biblical. The words "symbolic" and "mystic" never occur in Scriptures.

We are called ~His~ body, period. My body is myself. My legs do not walk: ~I~ walk. My lungs do not breathe: ~I~ breathe.

It is not Christ's members who suffer or rejoice: it is always Christ himself. The identification is complete.

David speaks about the Savior using the first person, exactly as the Savior uses the first person when He speaks about me, the sinner for whom He dies. Psalm 69 is also Messianic. It is Christ himself who speaks through the pen of

David: "In my thirst they gave me vinegar to drink" (verse 21), and "the zeal of thine house has eaten me up" (verse 9).

In the same psalm, we also read the words, "O God, thou knowest my foolishness and my sins are not hid from thee" (verse 5). Christ does not say that He will suffer ignominy for someone else's foolishness and wrongs, but for His own. He has identified with the sinner. Luther writes in his commentary to Galatians, "the Christian is Christ." By the same token, we could say, "Christ is the Christian."

Identified with Him, we must share his fate. "In the day of trouble he shall hide me in his tent"(PSA 27:5 according to the Hebrew). The rule established by the Jewish teachers called Masoretes for writing the "s" in the Hebrew word ~sukkah~, "tent," is that it be exceptionally small, half the size of the other letters, to show that one who wishes to be protected by Him must accept confinement and constraint in a small place just as He himself found solace with only a little flock. (I was in a small cell with space only for two steps to and fro.)

But the letter "m" in ~iom~, "day," in "day of trouble," is written unusually small. For believers, days of trouble are small in comparison with the eternity of glory. We are identified with Him on His cross, but also in His victory.

49 The Undivided Bible

The original manuscripts of the Old and New Testaments are not divided into chapters and verses. The first division into chapters was made by Cardinal Hugo of Santa Clara in 1250, the first division into verses, by the Parisian printer Robert Stephanus centuries later.

In its original version, the Bible is not even divided into words: a whole book of the Bible, sometimes several together, constitute a single word. When Scripture is read in this manner, it makes an extraordinary impression.

In English, "male and female" in GEN 1:27 evokes the picture of two separate beings who are united and can therefore also be disunited. Whatever is compounded can disintegrate. The original version reads, "maleandfemalecreatedhethem." "Maleandfemale" is something so essentially united that the idea of separation is impossible to consider.

In our Bibles, we read, "Peter and Andrew, Philip and Bartholomew, Thomas and Matthew, etc" (MTT 10:2-3). The original has "Peterandandrewphilipandbartholomewthomasandmatthew." It is one indivisible word. There is one God who has revealed not tens of thousands of words, but only one. Not a single part can be omitted without deforming the whole and making it crumble.

The Lord's prayer, in the original, does not begin with "Our Father," which suggests that He might be a Father without being ours, or that He might be ours without having a fatherly relationship with us. The original reads, "Ourfather." We Christians cannot conceive of a god which should not be ours. He is a father toward us or He ceases to be our god. The Hebrew as used by Christ for "our Father" was a single word, ~Avinu~, the possessive pronoun being part of the whole.

A Jew came to a rabbi and asked him to pray that he might earn a decent living. "Unite with God and you will get a livelihood," the rabbi advised. The Jew said, "But I do not know how to unite with God."

The rabbi was amazed. "You do not know how to unite with the Godhead and yet you complain about having no livelihood'? You want a minor wish granted and are not worried about the major problem?"

The main thing is to realize the unity of the Godhead, "thefatherthesonandtheholyspirit," one God expressed in one word, the unity of His revelation, the unity of reality, our unity with the whole of it and with God. Einstein's concept, "The whole reality is one electromagnetic field," is expressed by the manner in which the Bible is written in its early manuscripts.

50 Why Such a Strange Book?

It is strange that for the purpose of our salvation we were given a book which is so difficult to understand, with whole chapters of boring and seemingly useless genealogies or enumerations of persons without importance. Ezra 10, for example, contains a long list of priests conspicuous only for the fact that they had taken foreign wives. The book is also repetitive with some episodes recounted three or four times. Religious writers with the inspiration and clarity of John Chrysostom or Spurgeon could surely have written better literature than the biblical authors.

The Bible is written so as not to be understood at first glance. In ACT 22:11 Paul writes about being unable to see because of the glory of the heavenly light. I have lived in dark prison cells. When I saw the light again it blinded me, and I had to readjust myself slowly. Only those who grow accustomed to dwelling in glory can understand the secrets of the Bible.

The carnal mind longs after limitation, accuracy, precise definitions and well-established borders. It shuns eternity where these things disappear. God prefers to commune with us in silence. The thirty years in which Jesus spent in silence reveal more about God than what He spoke in three years.

Words express only part of reality: the best part of wisdom is that which words cannot contain. The moment a soul speaks, its inner nature is sullied by its transitory passions,

interests, prejudices, surmises or theatricality. The true nature of the soul is desecrated by expression.

The Bible is not a great work of art. Rhetoric begins when the last reality has been drowned. Eloquent style is a sign of degeneration.

The lives of many great poets were unhappy because they spoke too much. Romeo and Juliet spent their first night together declaiming poetry to each other. Could their marriage have been a happy one?

The Bible is a strange, silent caress of the bride by the Beloved. It contains words and whole chapters whose value no one can see. But this is their value. If a bride is reading a passionately interesting novel, filled with exciting detail and embellished with beautiful style, the bridegroom remains uncaressed. But in the the Bible there are whole chapters of endless genealogies and lists of names. One grows bored and puts the book aside. This was the purpose: to put the book down sometimes and entrust yourself to the inebriating silent embrace where the problems of the text cease to exist. You have His kiss. To prepare you to receive it is the purpose of the Holy Book.

51 Bible Monologues

Being in a lonely cell, for many years the only talks I knew were monologues. The Bible contains several monologues of God, for example, "Let us make man in our image" (GEN 1:26), or "They will reverence my Son" (MTT 21:37).

Let us learn from God! Speaking with oneself has a healing value. God put some of His revelations to us in the form of monologue, not because of His need for healing, but in order to teach us how to find it.

None of us is a unitary being. We are all to some degree split between conflicting tendencies in our personalities. Everyone has his ideal self or "I," what the psychologist Jung calls "the animus," and everyone has an evil urge which attracts him as well. "The pastor Hermas," one of the oldest Christian writings, asserts that every man has a personal devil just as he has a guardian angel. We are torn by many influences coming from opposing directions.

As often as we say "yes," there is also something in us saying, "no." This is our inner counterpart with whom it is very important to clarify matters.

I have known men with powerful criminal instincts who overcame them by using the method of the monologue. First they proclaimed aloud to themselves their desire to commit the wrong action; then they pleaded the victim's defense, loudly crying his cry when attacked; they spoke out the reproaches of their wives and children for what they had done, the prosecutor's condemnation, and their own possible defense. At last they determined not to do the deed.

A man was greatly troubled because he had killed an enemy in a bayonet fight during World War 1. He discussed the matter with the victim within himself. He convinced his counterpart that it had been a fair fight in which both had obeyed orders and had been dedicated to the good of their respective fatherlands. He expressed his regret and promised to make restitution by adopting a child from the former enemy nation.

Whenever conscience nags or doubts haunt, it is best not to repress these voices, but to weigh the pros and cons aloud to oneself. The blood of Christ will always be sufficient for past sins. The light of the Holy Spirit will be enough to dissipate doubts.

The purpose of God's monologues differs from ours, but we can learn from Him of their value.

52 The Value of Willing Rightly

"She said within herself" (MTT 9:21). "He spoke within himself" (LUK 7:39).

What is important is not so much what we say with our lips as what we say within ourselves. Whenever we speak to others we look to the consequences of what we say in case we should be held responsible. We might be drawn before court; we might lose our jobs; we can have all kinds of complications. For many reasons we do not outwardly express everything we inwardly feel.

God looks at the heart. He hears our inward speech, both good and bad, and it is according to this that He judges us.

Now a man's inward speech can be as diverse and incongruous as his outward speech. I speak within myself; I also inwardly judge what I say. I may criticize my inward speech or, at other times, approve it. Man is not of one piece. We are always torn between conflicting desires which are expressed by contradictory inner voices. Behind all this strife is the final reality within us which, observing this whole life in serenity, hears our inner talks, but remains silent. This is Christ within us, the one whom the Hindus call, "The jewel in the lotus-flower."

The battle must be won within. Outwardly your talk might be most edifying, but perhaps the Lord's words apply to you: "Ye make clean the outside of the cup and of the platter, but within they are full of extortion and excess" (MTT 23:25).

How can we make the inside clean? Simply by willing. The Lord once said to Mechthilde, "When you have to receive my body and my blood7 will for the glory of my name to have the fervor and all the zeal which the most burning heart has ever had for me. Then you will be able to approach me trusting, having this preparation, because I will look to the fervor which you wish to have and I will take account of it as if you would really have it."

Something similar is told of St. Gertrude. She, upon approaching the sacrament, expressed the desire to receive it with the same sentiments as the holy virgin and the greatest saints. Then the Savior appeared to her and told her: "Now you appear to the citizens of heaven really adorned as you wished to be."

God looks to the best in you. From the whole biography of a Roman officer the Bible records only a few minutes in which he showed strong faith (MTT 8:19). Of the whole degraded life of a Samaritan woman, the Bible retains one day when she was a zealous missionary (JHN 4:30). From everything which you think, if you have the desire to be as holy as man has ever been, God will retain this one inner wish. All your other thoughts will be set aside.

Inwardly formulate the highest wishes even if you do not have the slightest power to fulfill them, and you will receive the highest praise.

Outwardly we can master ourselves only in part. Our strongest decisions are consumed by the fire which we have in our blood. We cannot check the inner movements of our souls while we are awake and we have even less control during sleep.

Have the right desires and do not be afraid. It is written, "The Lord was with Joseph"(GEN 39:2). Not everything Joseph did was right. Anyone who knows what despots the ancient kings were cannot imagine Joseph being prime minister of Egypt without making grave compromises with his conscience. He had to bow before the gods of Egypt, and to conform to the habits of the heathen. But God also knew his moments of victory over temptation. And He knew Joseph's highest desire, which remained valid before Him even if it was unfulfilled in Joseph.

The Lord was with Joseph and will be with you, if beyond outward deeds and inward thoughts, even if not feeling love, you desire to love. If you desire holiness without having the slightest beginning of it, holiness will be imparted to you.

53 God's Thankfulness to You

Cleanse yourself within and God will be thankful to you. God thankful! Such an idea may never have occurred to you, but it is implied in the sermon on the mount: "For if ye love them which love you, what thank have ye?" (LUK 6:32). Now, thanks from whom? Evidently from God. He thanks you if you can love those who do not love you.

The ear of wheat and the flower bow in gratitude towards the earth from whence came the water and minerals they needed in order to grow. And through Christ's descent to earth, God himself bowed in thanks to all those like Abraham, Joseph, Moses, Buddha and innumerable others, who overcame human attachments, lust, greed, and selfishness, who loved those unworthy of love, who did good to those who had given them evil, and who lent without hope of receiving.

Jesus bowed gratefully before the apostles who gave up everything for Him, and washed their feet. He knew that all these apostles had tragic lives and dramatic deaths ahead of them because of their love for Him, and so He bowed before them like a servant and washed their feet.

Cultivate good thoughts toward your fellow men. If they have wronged you, remember that all their evil is "such stuff as dreams are made of." After a few years, you yourself will not remember it. Evil works die as men die and as dreams vanish. The Bible speaks about "dead works" (HEB 6:1).

A man's evil toward you will have passed away but your good thoughts about him will remain. If good thoughts do not arise spontaneously in you, will to have them even though your heart still harbors resentment or hatred. God does not judge the surface of your heart, but looks to your deeper regret that such voices remain inside you.

Take special advantage of the moments immediately after Holy Communion. The King is within you then as surely as He was in the womb of the Virgin Mary. This is the time for inner communion with the inner king.

We often act like madmen. When He is outside, surrounding us, we chatter within ourselves; when He is inside, we are busy gossiping outside. Do not fear the ugly voices which speak within you. God knows what to do about them.

The Rabbi of Berditschev once prayed: "Lord of the Universe, the people of Israel are the phylacteries of thy forehead. When a Jew drops his phylacteries, he lifts them up with loving care, cleanses them of every stain and then, with a kiss, makes amends for their abasement. Lord of the World, The phylacteries are fallen to the ground."

God is closer to you than you are to yourself; He feels your griefs and your joy more keenly than you do. Your evil thoughts stain His holy name more deeply than your own, so He will be sure to free you of them, to keep you holy in spite of them or even to bring some good out of them.

A mother's love for her child is more tender than the child's self-love. Rely on Christ for this too. Think about Him as you would think about a loving mother.

In Hebrew the word for Holy Spirit is a female noun. Catherine of Sienna might not have known Hebrew but she had the right intuition, for whenever she went to Communion she considered herself as a child sucking the breast of her mother.

Your wrongful inner talks are forgiven even before you utter them. It is only righteous that it should be so. Before we are born, before we have done the slightest evil, we are already sentenced to death because of offenses committed by others. Before the Jewish people existed and could offend God in any way, God told Abraham that his descendants would be enslaved in a foreign country for four centuries (GEN 15:13). It is only fair that we be forgiven even before repentance, because of what the new Adam did for us on the cross.

You think forgiven evil thoughts, you speak forgiven inner words. You hear inner voices today which in the spiritual reality have long since been erased. Time is a confusion in your mind. You hear today what belongs to your past. You present is intimate communion with Him.

You can make God rejoice over you with singing (ZEP 3:17). Do not miss the opportunity.

54 The Lord of Hosts

Theologians speak about the attributes of God. The Bible never mentions such a thing. The very word "attributes" implies qualities which are assigned to Him by men. Hindu religion rightly distinguishes between Brahman Nirguna, godhead as it is, and Brahman Saguna, godhead as we see it. The biblical name corresponding to Brahman Nirguna is "El eljon," - "the most high God" (GEN 14:19).

Touch the wing of a butterfly and you destroy the splendor of its colors. The holy contents of the notion "Godhead" are desecrated through investigation. The biblical names of God are equivalent to what Indians call Brahman Saguna and must be accepted with caution. Divine, mysterious existence is encased in the words of a fallen race whose language cannot possibly express the reality of God.

"Lord of hosts" is not one of God's names, but is simply how some men thought of Him during a certain period of spiritual evolution.

Once they called Him Lord of Hosts, certain conclusions followed. He ordered Joshua to set an ambush for the enemy (JOS 8:1-2). "Joshua destroyed all that breathed, as the Lord God of Israel had commanded" (JOS 10:40). By the same command, he "set a city on fire" (JOS 8:8). "Joshua offered burnt offerings unto the Lord," (JOS 8:31) after having killed all the inhabitants of Ai because of such an order.

Calvin believed all these things literally. He wrote, "The literal sense of Scripture is the whole essence of faith and Christian theology. It is better to confess ignorance than to play with frivolous guesses. Allegories are the scum of the Holy Spirit, they are harlots seducing me."

I am a disciple of what is called the typological school. I believe that the accounts of the wars in the Bible are symbols of our own spiritual battles.

God sides with no army. Nehemiah says, "There was no beast with me save the beast I rode upon" (NEH 2:12). We have no enemy except the one within ourselves. The assembling of armies is always a bad sign. Even victorious armies have no real splendor, and to find them glorious implies delight in the slaughter of men. Lao Tsu rightly says that "victories should be treated as funeral rites." A man of God exercises quiet restraint and avoids using weapons whenever possible.

The many accounts of war in the Bible are of great value to us in a negative sense.

Indis Shah again tells the Sufite story: A man got lost in a forest. He wandered for several days unable to find a way out. Then he met a wild, unkempt-looking man whom he assumed to be an inhabitant of the wood. He asked the man for directions. "I myself have been lost in this forest for 10 years," replied the man. "Then you cannot help me," the first said. "On the contrary," said the other. "I can show you hundreds of paths which do not lead out of the wood." Negative experiences have exceptional value. The many histories of war in the Bible teach that nothing is achieved by war.

Jesus is the Prince of Peace. Seek the ways of peace.

55 What is Abraham's Greatness?

Why does Abraham play such a prominent role throughout the Bible? Why are all nations blessed in his seed'? Why can no one be saved except through becoming an heir of Abraham and entering into the covenant which God made with him? He was far from always being a good man. Why did God choose him?

God does not choose the best, but those whom He intends to make best.

God's first lesson for Abraham was to be ready, for his faith, to reject his civilization and form a minority of one. The Midrash, (a Rabbinical commentary to the Old Testament) tells us that Abraham's father, Terah, was a builder of idols. As a boy Abraham wished to test them. He prepared food, put it before the biggest idol and waited to see if it would eat. When it did not, he chopped up all the idols with an axe and put the axe in the hand of the largest. When his father returned home, he found the havoc and asked for an explanation. Abraham said, "I brought food to the gods. They quarrelled over who should have the most, and the big one smashed the heads of the others." The father replied, "Don't be silly. These gods cannot move. Tell me what really happened ..."

Then Abraham said, "Well, if they cannot move, they are not gods," and he chopped off the head of the last idol and ran away from home. At first he worshipped the moon, but when he realized it faded before the sun, he adored the sun.

But the sun too was transitory, so he came to believe in the one unseen God who had made sun, moon and all other things. When this faith of Abraham's was rejected by all his people, he left them, preferring to be with God, even if alone.

Next God taught Abraham obedience. Although Abraham had treated Hagar and Ishmael harshly, he could also be soft-hearted. When God told him He would destroy Sodom and Gomorrah, he pleaded for them.

When he was commanded to bring his only beloved son, Isaac, as a sacrifice, he did not pray for the son to be spared.

We do not know why God asked for Isaac's sacrifice. Perhaps the son had committed an evil deed worthy of such punishment.

In Romania, an officer was suspect of treason during wartime. His father, a general, asked the king for permission to preside over the military tribunal which would sentence his son to death. Abraham might have had to show that one must sacrifice affection for the sake of morality.

In any case, when God asked Abraham to sacrifice Isaac, He contradicted His own law which forbade killing, as well as His promise to establish an everlasting covenant with Isaac and his seed (GEN 17:19). Isaac had no children. With his death, everything would be finished. But Abraham, by fulfilling a commandment which contradicted the law and the promise, put God under an obligation to forgive us when we stray from the law or break our own promises.

Although Abraham might not always have been good, there was surely greatness in him.

56 Why Is God Harsh Against Some?

Before the settlement of the state of Massachusetts, God wiped out the Indians by plague. Winthrop, who was governor of the state at that time said, "If we have no right to this land, yet our God has right to it. If he be pleased to give it to us taking it from people who have so long usured upon him and abused his creature, who shall control him on his terms?"

To a modern Christian reader it might seem strange that I wrote, "God wiped out the Indians by a plague." Well, if not He, then who? I wrote in biblical language. Except for what is written in the Bible, we know about the essence of God as much as a fly knows about the nature of a king.

God says, "I plagued Egypt"(JOS 24:5). God wiped out the Canaanite nations, women, children and all.

Some ask whether this was ethical, but how ethical is ethics when it judges God? God is sovereign.

If the word "morality"can be applied to God, He must be said to employ a different morality from ours. A general remains well protected in the rear while he commands his soldiers forward into enemy fire. Is this ethical? A ruler may sentence a citizen to death, although the citizens are forbidden to kill. As social life differs from private life, even less is the behavior of God meant to resemble ours.

At first glance it might seem unreasonable that the One who condemns us for killing even a single person should lawfully destroy whole populations. But all laws are based only on the will of God. He changes them when He likes. They are not necessary in themselves. Reason and faith are two separate conditions which do not harmonize in all things. There are even two separate logics, the physical one and that of faith. Aristotelian logic does not apply to religion in which 1 is equal to 3, one God a trinity.

The life of believers defies ordinary logic. Every believer should hate war, the killing of God's creatures whom we are taught to love; but we also remember, "Machir ... was a man of war, therefore he had Ghilead and Bashan" (JOS 17:1). Though it is important for a believer not to fight, it is also important that Ghilead should be possessed by him and not by people full of hatred. While we must loathe war, we also had to defeat Hitler, the lover of war. The logic of faith solves such problems.

57 Implications of Our Prayers

The "Our Father" is given us as a warning against using too many words in prayer. Every request of God has many implications.

When we say, "Thy kingdom come," we should not use these words without knowing their consequences.

We say, "Come, Lord Jesus" (REV 22:20) but it is written. "Let no man deceive you by any means: for that day shall not come except there comes a falling away first," the great apostasy (2TH 2:3). Whole nations will forsake the Christian faith; the Christians will be hated by all nations for Christ's name sake. "And then shall many be offended and shall betray one another" (MTT 24:1-10). You wish for the Lord's coming. But have you made your decision? Will you be among the traitors or among the betrayed?

The coming of Christ brings eternal, definitive doom for unbelievers, among whom will be many of your cherished friends. It is written "Woe unto you that desire the day of the Lord! To what end is it for you? The day of the Lord is darkness and not light" (AMO 5:18).

Do you wish Jesus to come? On that day the believers "shall go forth and look upon the carcasses of the men who have transgressed against God, for their worm shall not die, neither shall their fire be quenched" (ISA 66:24). Perhaps among these carcasses shall be members of your own family.

The Jews cannot bear to read this as the last verse of Isaiah and in their synagogues, in public readings, they repeat after this verse the comforting one which precedes it. They also do this after the last verse of Malachi which concludes the Old Testament with the words of God: "Lest I come and smite the earth with a curse."

But however you read it, the situation will be the same. When the Lord comes, all His opponents shall perish.

Although this wrath is beneficent, although their being consumed will show them that God rules in Jacob unto the ends of the earth" (PSA 59:13), nonetheless it will be a difficult day to bear. Are you prepared to bear it?

The answer depends on whether you are born again . For those who have passed through new birth the sight of hell will be a source of joy. St. Thomas Aquinas wrote that the tortures of the damned will be one of the delights of heaven. This is because we will be changed in a manner which we cannot now imagine. "Eye has not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man the things that God has prepared for them that love Him" (1CO 2:9).

After a conversion the things which made you happy before become abhorrent and the things which displeased you become your joy. So, in the glorified body, we will appreciate the righteousness and the wrath of God in a manner incomprehensible for us now. Can an alcoholic believe that he will ever come to hate alcohol? So we cannot fathom that we will ever rejoice at seeing hell. It must be enough for us that it seems good in His sight (MTT 11:26).

It is written that it pleased God to bruise Jesus (ISA 53:10). In our present stage of development this is unintelligible. But if God can find pleasure in the innocent suffering of His Son, knowing the purpose it accomplishes, it might easily be that we will find pleasure in the righteous punishment of the wicked.

"Thy kingdom come." Do not speak these words lightly.

58 The Inerrancy of the Bible

Inerrancy of the Bible is an article of faith for Christians. Reason is insufficient to prove it because there is no infallible mind which, having examined all arguments for and against, can establish the Bible's infallibility.

According to G"del's [Godel] incompleteness theorem, no system can prove its own consistency without recourse to concepts that the system itself cannot generate but which are supplied from outside by a larger system, subject itself like everything else in this world to incompleteness and so on and so on. You overcome this only through a leap of faith. I belong to the Church established by Christ and it is our faith that the Bible is inerrant.

But which Bible? Not only are there numerous translations, but also there are texts which are included in some scriptures and excluded from others.

There are over 5,000 manuscripts of the New Testament. No two agree. Early copies call the robber pardoned by Pilate "Jesus Barabbas." Later copyists found this confusing and offensive and omitted the word "Jesus" from the robber's name.

MRK 16:9-20 and JHN 5:3-4 are missing from all old manuscripts, and MRK 11:26 is omitted by almost all.

When the church historian Eusebius died in 340, only a segment of the Church acknowledged the epistles of Jacob, Jude, 2 and 3 John, and 2 Peter as Scripture. Luther never acknowledged the epistle of James, even though he translated it.

St. Athanasius, who died in 364, was the first teacher to quote all 27 books of the New Testament.

The Sinaiticus, a text of the New Testament from the third century, includes two letters of Barnabas, and a book, "The pastor Hermas," which is excluded from our Bibles.

Books which are so inspired that Biblical authors quote them, "The book of the wars of the Lord (NUM 21:14), "The book of Jasher" (JOS 10:13), and many others are not included in Scripture.

There is also a vast difference in texts among the manuscripts which exist. Here are four versions of 1CO 15:51, all equally correct depending on which Greek manuscript is consulted:

We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed.

We shall all sleep, but we shall not all be changed.

We shall not all sleep, nor shall we all be changed.

We shall all rise, but we shall not all be changed.

In another familiar passage, only one Greek letter makes the difference between the King James Version's translation, "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will to men," and the Revised Standard Version's, "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace among men with whom he is well pleased." Some manuscripts have that letter; some do not. Other Bible verses can be read in over ten different ways.

The discoveries at the Dead Sea of old Biblical manuscripts have complicated the problem even more. The scrolls essentially confirm previous Scriptures, but also differ from them in certain parts.

In the Old Testament, the name Nebuchadnezzar is spelled in seven different ways. Which is the inerrant spelling?

The conclusion to be drawn from this is that God has willed to give us a text with variations, problems, missing parts: a text which should leave our minds perplexed and should be one more factor in convincing us that in faith we do not have to rely on reason.

In Jerusalem there are two places believed to have been Golgotha, and two sepulchres of Jesus. For many other important Biblical events, several sites are claimed. It is because the Biblical events are not merely geographically located: they fill the whole world. Jesus died only once for our salvation. But He is crucified afresh as often as saints fall away (HEB 6:6). The Church is also the prolongation of His life. In this sense, there are innumerable Golgothas and places where Jesus is buried and where He performs miracles. So it is with the Bible. It is inerrant, but it does not have only one text. Christians have lived and believed and died martyrs' deaths for various texts. The truth of God shines through many texts and through various translations.

59 Problems of Punctuation in the Bible

The original manuscripts of the Bible have no punctuation. Sentences without punctuation put our minds to work. The sentence, "Charles I walked and talked half an hour after his head was cut off" is obviously absurd. It acquires meaning when commas are placed after "talked" and before "his." We must also sometimes work hard to guess a Biblical writer's intention.

GEN 22:2, as it stands in the Authorized Version, is incorrect, because of wrong punctuation. We read "Take now thy son, thine only son Isaac, whom thou lovest." But Isaac was not Abraham's only son. If the last comma is omitted, the passage makes sense: "thine only son Isaac whom thou lovest." Ishmael had not been loved.

LUK 23:43 is punctuated in a certain way by Seventh Day Adventists and others who do not believe in immediate entrance into eternal life after death, but think that the dead remain dead until a resurrection on the final day. They read, "Verily I say unto thee today, thou shalt be with me in paradise." The mainstream of Christianity prefers the following punctuation: "Verily I say unto thee, today thou shalt be with me in paradise." Paradise can be entered immediately after death, provided one had faith in the Lord.

Much depends upon punctuation in JHN 14:6 also. As it now reads in the Authorized Version, Jesus says He is three things: the way, the truth and the life. I personally do not understand what being the way means. A primitive in the Philippines, when told by a missionary that Jesus is the way, asked, "What kind of a way? Is it a mountain trail?"

My punctuation would be: "I am the way: the truth and the life." Truth has absolute demands which, if fulfilled, would annihilate life. Life has desires which can be totally fulfilled only through renouncing the truth. He who has come not only full of truth, because mankind could not bear the truth alone, but full of "grace ~and~ truth" (JHN 1:17), showed the way again on the last evening. The way is a loving attention to the demands of both, of life and truth.

ROM 9:5 can be punctuated in at least three ways, giving three different meanings:

(1) "Christ came, who is over all God ..." This is the only text in which Paul declares Christ to be God. The verse was thus understood by the majority of interpreters until the 8th century.

(2) "Christ came, God who is over all be blessed for ever." So Erasmus. It is a doxology to God, not an assertion that Christ is God.

(3) "Christ came, who is over all, God be blessed for ever." Here the praise is divided between Christ and God.

Let us thank God for the diversity of thoughts which are given through the Scriptures. Everything is possible to God, including all the different punctuations and translations of the Bible which express His truth.

60 Does the Bible Teach Literalism?

Due respect must be given to every letter of the Bible, but the Bible has been written with a purpose: to bring men to salvation. Therefore its authors sometimes sacrifice the letter. The purpose is more important than the means.

Paul quotes Hosea as having said, "I will call them my people which were not my people, and her beloved, which was not beloved. And it shall come to pass that in the place where it was said unto them, Ye are not my people, there shall they be called the children of the living God" (ROM 9:25-26). The translation is not literal and does not correspond to any version of the Hebrew text. Paul felt free to adapt the text for his own purpose. He applied to the Gentiles words which were intended by the Jewish prophet for the ten tribes of Israel separated from Judah (HOS 1:4-2:33) and made them sound more forceful.

In ROM 11:26, Paul gives the great teaching, "All Israel shall be saved." Needing some verses from the Old Testament to substantiate the promise, he says, "It is written: There shall come out of Sion the deliverer." But these words are not to be found anywhere. In PSA 14:7, David had expressed a desire, "Oh that the salvation of Israel were come out of Sion." Certain that God has fulfilled this pious desire, Paul modifies David's words so that they no longer express a wish but an assurance: "The deliverer shall come out of Sion."

Paul assures the Jewish believers, "The deliverer shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob" (ROM 11:26), saying that this too is written. The only possible reference is to ISA 59:20 where no such promise is given. There we read that the Redeemer shall come unto them that turn from transgression. It is Jacob who has to turn away from sin, not the Deliverer who will cause the turning. But Paul, when he read Isaiah, realized that men cannot change their hearts through their own endeavors. This must be the work of the Lord. He quotes the verse according to his own interpretation and not literally, as it is in the Old Testament.

We should also remember that many of Paul's epistles were written in prisons where he had to quote from memory, not having the scrolls of the Old Testament at hand.

Matthew quotes in his Gospel (MTT 2:23) "what was spoken by the prophets" about Jesus: "He shall be called a Nazarene." However, these words cannot be found in any prophetical book. The worse for them. They should have been there.

Matthew renders the prophets the favor of putting these words in their mouths. It is like attributing some words of John Chrysostom to a poor preacher whom you wish to uplift.

The sons of Jacob are enumerated in the Bible in 17 different sequences, showing the unimportance of sequences in the timeless sphere to which belief in the Bible moves us.

Value every letter of the Bible but seek fulfillment of the aim which is beyond it: the salvation of souls. Do not be like the child in Khartoum who loved the statue of General Gordon riding on a camel. Every day the lad asked to be taken to see General Gordon. When he reached the age of seven he asked, "Who is the uncle riding on General Gordon?" He had mistaken the camel for the hero. The Bible is not God: it is the carrier of His message.

61 About Angels

It is normal for a Christian to commune with angels. The Lord has said, "Ye shall see heaven open and the angels of God ascending and descending" (JHN 1:51).

This is not a privilege reserved only for children of God, but for all men of prayer. Cornelius, a heathen, "saw an angel of God coming in to him" (ACT 10:3). When telling the story to Peter, he did not express any amazement (ACT 10:30). Why else do angels exist if not to serve men? An angel of the Lord also came to Peter himself (ACT 12:7).

The gap between man and angel is not so big as we imagine. Men are tadpoles of angels. Angels are accomplished believers. The Lord has said that in the resurrection we will be like the angels of God in heaven (MTT 22:30), implying that now we are embryonic angels, sure to attain full growth, because fortunately abortions are unknown in the spheres above.

Why do we not all see angels?

Their appearance can be dangerous for those who are spiritually unprepared, a shock, like touching a high-power electrical wire. The keepers of Jesus' tomb "became as dead" when they saw the angel of the Lord (MTT 28:4). So angels sometimes present themselves garbed as men. Cornelius tells Peter, "A man stood before me in bright clothing." On the ascension day, the apostles beheld "two men in white apparel" (ACT 1:10). They were angels.

You cannot be sure that you have not met an angel.

perhaps you did not recognize him as such. The Bible recommends hospitality. "Thereby some have entertained angels unaware" (HEB 13:2).

Keep communion with angels. Value them, hut at the same time know their limitations. They do not know everything. Each angel has only a certain assignment and can do no more.

If the angel who announced to the virgin that she would become pregnant with the Lord had also told Joseph, there would have been one sadness less. But he could not - he had received only one commission.

If the angel who warned Joseph of the danger to the life of the infant Jesus had also told all parents in Bethlehem about Herod's evil intentions, a mass slaughter would have been avoided. But the angel did not know everything.

Seek therefore communion with the Lord himself.

For mysterious purposes of their own, angels sometimes fight with men. Do not be afraid. Jacob defeated an angel (GEN 32:24-28). This is what prevailing prayer is about.

Even if an angel opposes you, you can win. Only One is almighty. Always submit unconditionally to Him alone.

62 When Jesus Can't

"Christ Jesus ... made himself in the likeness of man" (PHP 2:5-6). He became the most perfect man, but still a man, a being with essential limitations. Certain things He could do; others not.

"In his own country ... Jesus could do no mighty work" (MRK 6:1-5). He had met unbelief. He had brothers and sisters (MTT 13:55-56), but they did not believe in Him (JHN 7:5), and Jesus was not able to bring them to conversion. What an education Mary must have given them; but in vain.

It is usually said that the Lord performed "many" miracles. Blind men received their sight, lame walked, lepers were cleansed, deaf heard, and dead were raised up MTT 11:5). But how many?

A dozen may have been awakened from death, but thousands remained dead and their relatives remained uncomforted. Thousands of sick retained their maladies. He fed hungry multitudes on a few occasions but He did not solve the problem of hunger, not even in little Palestine. Many went to bed without having eaten. Nor could Jesus make all who heard Him preach the Gospel accept it.

All Jesus' mighty works happen on a small scale.

This is because He had become human. You too are human. Why then do you wonder, why do you despair about the many things you cannot do?

"Ye cannot do the things that you would" (GAL 5:17);

you cannot fully overcome the lust of your own flesh. You cannot overcome all adverse circumstances. This state is a characteristic feature of human nature. Angels are also limited. Only with God is everything possible.

If you are converted, God helps you to become a saint, but a human saint, who will bring goodness and love into the world of wickedness as the gulf stream brings warmth to the ocean. But the gulfstream is constituted of water, like the cold ocean surrounding it, and its warmth can penetrate only to a certain distance, no more.

The devil wins through spectacular feats. A man in the country of the Gadarenes who was possessed of devils could pluck chains asunder and break fetters in pieces (MRK 5:4). When Jesus drove the demons from him the man became a disciple. He might later have been thrown in jail for his faith, and worn chains for Jesus, as so many thousands have done throughout history. But he could no longer break the fetters. No instance of a chained Christian accomplishing such feats is known.

The Lord does not raise us above the human, but makes us saints in our human weakness. Accept your weakness and bring to it the warmth of love.

63 Before We Call, He Answers

God says that He will create new heavens and a new earth (ISA 65:17). One of the characteristics of life in these is that before their inhabitants call, He will answer (ISA 65:24). Modern physicists have considered the possibility of an anti-telephone, a device by which the inquirer of the future will get his reply before ringing up to ask the question. What is a theoretical technical development of the future was promised in its fullness to God's children in an age when such technology was not yet dreamed of.

Einstein's special theory of relativity showed that anything traveling at a speed greater than light - which he considered impossible - would go backward in time. Scientists now assert that tachyons, faster-than-light particles, are known to exist although they have not yet been detected. Once man is able to handle them, mankind will be caught in a paradox; It will technically be possible to communicate so that answers precede questions, which would mean the cessation of communication.

Perceiving all solutions in advance, problems will stop arising in my mind.

The child who said that Mona Lisa smiled so beautifully because she had an intuition that da Vinci would paint her, and that da Vinci painted her because she smiled exactly as he wished a model to do, was not mistaken.

The spirit passes light in speed. In exceptional circumstances, a man can perceive in the unconscious of a fellow man questions which have not yet arisen to a conscious level, and reply to them. The one who receives the answer does not even know that it is an answer.

Some believers are sad that they do not feel any fellowship with God. But it is not necessary. The communion is established on a faster-than-light level, and consists in God's granting you things for which you never felt any desire. Many believers testify that they have received salvation or other gifts of God for which they have not sought. The wish was in the depth of the soul and was fulfilled before they became aware of it.

Such will be the rule in the new heavens and on the new earth. Communion with God as between two beings who need to communicate will be replaced by union in love. We will be ~in~ God. Eternity will be an embrace in love. No wind will blow any more. We will no longer cry out for fear of the tempests, and the tempests will no longer need be stilled. Answers will precede requests, which therefore will not be made. All will be calm, all serene. This is eternity.

64 The Body Language of Jesus

Besides spoken language, every man has another, the language of the body, which is in fact more ancient than speech. Whoever can understand this language has a deeper insight into his fellow men. See how many gestures of the Lord are reported in the Gospel: the stretching out of His hand, the lifting of the eyes, the touching of children. His body spoke: could it have been less than eloquent? Was it not the word become flesh?

The pupils of the eyes enlarge when something exciting occurs. An honest man looks straight into another's face. A facial tic or the manner of shaking hands speaks volumes. Warm hands or pale, cold ones, especially those with a little black shadow on the central parts, tell much about a man's character. So does a full, straight, smooth and shining face as compared to a crooked or gloomy one.

Body parts too are character clues. Socially active girls are found among those with slender legs rather than among those with big hips.

Jesus would have been completely unintelligible to His disciples had He not had a very developed body language.

He tells them, "I am come to send fire on earth and what else will I than it should be already kindled?" (LUK 12:49). Any arsonist might have said the same.

When the Salvation Army started its work in India, the governor of Bombay forbade the display of its flag because its motto, "Blood and fire," was misleading. Such

inflammatory words as Christ's, coming direct from the mouth of a man accused of spreading riot among an oppressed people, could be even more misleading.

Under ordinary circumstances, every peace-loving citizen would have abandoned Him when He proclaimed the kindling of fire as His program, since He did not qualify His words or explain that He meant them symbolically or spiritually. But His eyes, His face, His gestures must have spoken. None of His disciples was disturbed when He spoke such dangerous words, or even when He added, "Suppose ye that I am come to give peace on earth? I tell you, nay, but rather division" (verse 51).

Two disciples of John the Baptist, looking upon the manner in which Jesus walked, said, "Behold the lamb of God" (JHN 1:36). It is written about the Jewish king Ahab that he repented "and walked softly" (1KI 21:27). Once I became suspicious that a man was a Soviet infiltrator because of the way he walked. Ensuing events showed that I was probably correct. Jesus walked in a manner apart.

Besides His body language, the intonation of His voice must have been significant. I have already written that the Hebrew Old Testament contains musical notation for every saying and is meant to be chanted rather than recited.

If anyone, even God, had told me as He told Abraham, "Take your only son whom you love and bring him for a burnt offering" (GEN 22:2), I would not have done it. Neither would Abraham. We do not know in what manner God uttered this command. But listen to the words being chanted with transcendent harmonies in a synagogue according to the melody of thousands of years! Abraham, listening, felt peace in his heart and understood it to be only a test, a ritual showing to what length love of God must go, a foreshadowing of God's sacrifice for us. Therefore Abraham immediately fulfilled what was demanded.

We receive guidance from the Lord. Be attentive to its music and to the gestures of the messengers.

65 The Numbers and the Story

Ancient Hebrew and Greek had no written symbols for figures. Letters were used to express numbers. Every word of Scripture can be understood as part of a story or teaching, or it can be considered a number because it is constituted of letters which are also figures. The sum of the numerical values of the letters in a word gives its mathematical value.

The first word of the Old Testament, ~Bereshit~ ("In the beginning") has the numerical value 913:

2 + 200 + 1 + 300 + 10 + 400 = 913

All biblical words can thus be transcribed.

The Bible can be a communication in numbers or in text or both. Which is the primary value of the Bible?

Mankind uses thousands of languages and dialects. French- and English-speaking Canadians, French- and Flemish-speaking Belgians, Afrikaansk- and English-speaking South Africans - all engage in bitter conflicts over which language should be spoken in their countries. But all nations of all continents employ the same system of numerals. No disagreement here.

Numbers probably correspond to a deeper layer of the human psyche. Symbols might have been used as figures before they were used as letters.

In 1965, at the site of the New York World's Fair, a capsule was buried to be opened after 5,000 years. It contains a message of 1,271 figures containing in mathematical formulae the essential information about life on earth. If in that future time the same symbols are used, like in the Bible, for both letters and figures, those who read the formula could encounter double meaning, just as we do when reading Scriptures in the original.

The key figure in the Bible is the figure 7, the symbol of human holiness. There are directions in which a man can move: forward, backward, upward, down, to the right or to the left.

And there exists something more excellent, the holy attitude, to remain quietly at the center, like Mary when she sat still at the feet of Jesus. This is symbolized by 7.

Seven plays an exceptional role in physical reality too. Think of the 7 colors of the rainbow and the 7 musical notes on the diatonic scale.

Two Israeli scientists, Nobel prize winner Isidor Rabi and William Markowitz, discovered "chordmater universal time," a system of defining time which is more exact than astronomical measurement. A second is no longer defined as a fraction of the time in which the earth accomplishes an orbit, but is the time which an electron near the outer edge of an atom of cesium wobbles: 9,192,631,770 times. This figure is a multiple of the sacred 7 which is the mathematical seal of God's creation.

The old Semitic people did not have a decimal system, but a heximal one - six figures plus zero. This system passed into Europe through the Arabs and its remnant survives still in the French language which has no words for seventy, eighty, or ninety. These numbers are expressed as sixty-and-ten, four-times-twenty and four-times-twenty-plus-ten.

Since 6 was the last simple figure in the Semitic system, our 7 was written by them as 10, 8 was 11 and so on, until they jumped from 16 to 20. In this system, 10 (our 7) was the first composite figure. It became the symbol for how great a zero, a man of nothing, could become if he placed before himself the great One, God. Therefore 7 is the figure of holiness, and 6, being the last simple figure, became the symbol of pettiness. The apocalyptic beast is 666, the superlative of 6, a paper tiger (REV 13:18). Do not fear it. Jesus will destroy it with His breath. The numerical value of Jesus in Greek is 888, the antithesis of 666, surpassing the apogee of human holiness. He represents divine sainthood.

There are secrets enshrined in the mathematical structure of the Bible. We read in PRO 1:1, "Solomon, son of David, king of Israel." The value of the three proper names is which, strangely, is the total number of instructions contained in the whole book of Proverbs. It is like an indication for the reader, "Seek sense not only in the text of the Bible, but also in its mathematical form."

Solomon	David	Israel

The Apostles, all fishermen, toiled a whole night and caught nothing. When the resurrected Lord appeared (John 21) and told them where to throw the nets, they caught many fish. The catch was not due to their skill. Every fish caught was a sign of grace. They counted them and found 153 fish. Is it a simple coincidence that the word "grace" occurs 153 times in the New Testament?

Every figure in the Bible has a deep meaning. Nothing in it is superfluous.

66 Why Are So Many Biblical Questions Unanswered?

Having read the Bible, there are a few things we know. Many more questions remain unanswered.

How is it that there is a God? Who made Him? Why did He make man? Why did He allow or ordain him to sin? Why does suffering exist? Why do even fish in the depths of the sea have cancer? Why do beings live on each other? Will we know one another in the life hereafter? How is it that the death of a being 2,000 years ago affects the state of our souls? Why is it important that Fiji Islanders should know the stories of the Jewish kings? Why should some souls suffer eternally in hell for sins committed here during only a fragment of time? And so on and so on.

There is a Mexican story which contains the best solution to the problem of all those unanswered questions.

A dwarf named Tchuda, tired of the world's mockery and derision, decided to end his life by throwing himself into the abyss from the mountain Tchumanda. On his way he met the beautiful Armida who was going to commit suicide because of betrayal by her lover. They were joined by prince Christopher who was on order from the king to seek and kill the bandit Fukinama. This thief would be recognized by the six fingers on his right hand.

The three stopped to rest at an old monastery where they were received by the abbot Timothy. Although Timothy had not been a monk for long, the fame of his holiness had already spread far and wide. When Armida bowed to kiss the holy man's hand, she noticed six fingers. The wanted criminal had become a saint.

And ...

Most people want to know what happened next with the dwarf, the princess, the knight and the king who had ordered the bandit's death. There are some however who do not ask any more questions but are in ecstasy about this one great wonder: the bandit has become a luminous example of love, and when asked how it occurred, he answered, "God performed it through the sacrifice of Christ."

The other questions remain unanswered, forgotten. The elect do not ask them anymore. The Bible contains no answers to satisfy the curious.

I hope you are not among these.

67 The Forbidding of Quarrel

We can discover the facts of nature, we can establish causal relations. We know why certain phenomena will produce others of a predictable nature. We do not know why existence exists, why it is as it is, why there are causal relations and why the effects are these and not others.

One of the basic facts of nature is the struggle for life, a struggle that every living creature has to accept. Every species fights against some other species. The herbivores destroy the life of plants. As for mankind, beginning with the first generation born after the expulsion from paradise, there have always been conflicts, fights, killings.

There is one exception to this rule which God establishes for His children: that even the slightest quarrel must be completely excluded. When elephants fight, the grass is injured, and when Christians attack each other, their souls are doomed for eternity.

The motive of a quarrel is unimportant. An admiral once said to some officers who were clashing, "I know not what the argument is, but I do know that the enemy is out there." "Christians wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places" (EPH 6:12). Internecine conflict for any reason is not permitted.

With a Christian, harsh criticism addressed against him does not produce a backlash. If you must justify your comportment, you can spend your life trying to satisfy your adversary, instead of taking the actions you have chosen.

Every believer who quarrels with another is foolish and forfeits one of the qualities which characterize him as a believer.

During the reign of Henry VIII, Bishop Ridley and Bishop Cranmer, reformers of the Church in Britain, were so opposed to Bishop Hooper, another eminent reformer, that they put him in prison. They found him guilty of ideas about reformation that were too extreme - he refused the invocation of saints in giving an oath, and disapproved of bishops wearing heavily ornamented vestments. A few years later, under Mary Stuart, all three were imprisoned and finally burned at the stake. From his prison cell, Ridley wrote a conciliatory letter to Hooper.

The wise Indian King Asoka, who took the ideas of his country into Asia Minor and influenced the Essenes, cut into rock the motto: "samavaya eva sadhuh" "Concord alone is meritorious."

Struggle for life is the general law of nature, but for saints there exists an exemption. They do not struggle for life, but live to combat struggling.

However a limit to concord does exist. A Jewish ballad tells of a little sardine swimming off the shores of Eilat. He meets a shark, and of course politely says "Shalom" (Peace). One thing leads to another, and to placate the shark, the sardine gives up his tail, some fins from his belly, some scales from his back but nothing helps. In desperation the sardine tells his foe that for a real and lasting peace he is prepared to give everything. Hearing this, the shark relents, utters the magic word "peace," bares his teeth and swallows the sardine whole.

There must be a limit to the desire for peace.

Kissinger reportedly said, "I have gone to the Soviets as the first Christian entered the arena to be devoured by wild beasts, but I was determined to speak to the lion.

When I happily exclaimed, 'You see, we have agreed to communicate,' the lion replied, 'I don't know about your side, but what I have to say is simply the grace before a meal.'"

Do not quarrel, but do not allow anybody to swallow you either. Children of God are too valuable a species: we have to survive.

68 The Truth Is Only in the Whole

There is no single Bible verse on which one can rely absolutely. Only the whole Bible gives the truth. A kidney removed from the body is no longer a kidney, but a piece of meat. Even the commandments given directly by God have meaning only when connected with other parts of Scripture, and augmented by common sense.

Considered alone, the commandment given on. Mount Sinai, "Thou shalt not kill" (EXO 20:13), is unpracticable. Taken literally it forbids all killing, including the killing of animals. It has to be modified by the idea contained in GEN 9:3: "Every moving thing that lives shall be meat for you," for God has given to some animals other animals as food. The prohibition "Do not kill" does not forbid hunting for livelihood, which can be considered, as Aristotle put it, "a just war."

The Commandment also does not forbid killing in just wars for the defense of the motherland, or in defending an innocent person from attack.

Killing is not forbidden absolutely. Augustine taught that God forbids men to kill without himself renouncing that right. God says, "I kill and I make alive," and indeed, the sixth commandment is given by the same God who orders the death sentence many times. On earth the state authority represents God in this: "The ruler is the minister of God, a revenger to execute wrath upon him that does evil" (ROM 13:4)

Suicide is killing, even though the murderer is the person killed, and is considered unlawful. But even here there are exceptions. Samson killed himself in order to kill a multitude of God's enemies with him. Christian virgins, preferring purity to life, killed themselves when compelled to become prostitutes under the Roman emperors. Many believers, when they were unable to bear any more torture, committed suicide in Communist and Nazi prisons to avoid becoming traitors.

On the other hand, the interdiction also includes the propagation of hatred. Streicher, the editor of a powerful anti-Jewish magazine in Nazi Germany defended himself at the trial of war criminals in Nuremberg saying that he never even slapped a Jew. Nonetheless he was justly sentenced to death because his publications portrayed the Jews as so disgusting and dangerous that those who read them became possessed by the desire to kill Jews.

Never stop at the letter of isolated verses, but draw all the conclusions they imply.

69 How Old is the New Testament?

The New Testament is the more reliable the earlier the texts were recorded. With the passing of time, memories fail and subsequent events make men record things as happening other than as they really did.

Are the Gospels late forgeries as some assert? Intelligent forgers, in order to accredit a book with being old, would specially mention things to make it appear so. There is no sign of this in the New Testament. On the contrary, the Gospels contain certain sayings of Jesus which do not square with future events, and which a later writer would surely have modified to prove the teacher's infallibility.

In MTT 24:15-16, Jesus tells His disciples in Judea to flee into the mountains, obviously the mountains of Judea, when they see Jerusalem besieged. However the church historian Eusebius informs us that the disciples fled instead to Pella, on the east side of the Jordan. A late author of the Gospel would have modified Jesus' speech in such a way that their departure to such a distance and, as consequence, their break with Judaism, was foretold or ordered by Jesus.

According to LUK 21:20, Jerusalem would be encircled by armies. This took place during the fall of Judea to the Babylonians, not during the Roman siege. But Jesus was not speaking in military terms. A city attacked by an overpowering army can be said to be encompassed by horror. A later author would have made an exact description of the many sufferings which were to befall the Jewish nation at that time. He would not have missed magnifying Jesus' prophetic role by knowing every detail in advance. However, our only knowledge of the atrocities comes from the historian Josephus Flavius.

In Egypt a papyrus was discovered showing that John's Gospel circulated in Egypt at the end of the first century. The Gospel must have been written before 70 A.D. because it does not mention the destruction of the temple of Jerusalem which occurred at that time. The temple is there described as functioning, and when Jesus speaks of destroying it, the Jews tell Him, "Forty and six years was this temple in building" (JHN 2:20) ... Even the Acts of the Apostles must have been written before the destruction of the temple. Had they been written later, this event would have been used to show what a great prophet Jesus had been: He had predicted the destruction of the temple and, behold, it happened.

The five porches of the pool mentioned in JHN 5:2 were buried under rubble at the fall of Jerusalem. So they remained until excavated recently. The Gospel says " There is at Jerusalem a pool, having five porches."

The devil has tried everything to dispel belief in the Bible. A scholar, who might be sincere and not know for whom he works, could point out that what is called the first epistle of John has 39 Greek expressions which do not appear in John's gospel, whereas the gospel uses thirty words not found in the epistle, etc. Linguistic specialists analyzing my own writings of different periods, books written before and after my imprisonment, would likewise conclude that they are not from the same author.

Those who doubt the authenticity of the authorship of the New Testament would do well to doubt their doubts. We can rely on the Gospels. They were surely written very early by first-hand witnesses.

70 No History Book

There are those who debate whether or not the Bible is a reliable history book. It is a phantom question. The Bible is no history book at all. The word "history" occurs nowhere in it. The word which comes closest is the Hebrew ~toldot~, but this is used only to indicate genealogy or origin.

Biblical personalities are much interested in the past. Joshua wishes to speak to the Jewish people about an immediate question, but begins by enumerating the important events which took place 400 years earlier (chapter 24). When Stephen, the first martyr of Christianity, is charged with blasphemy, instead of speaking in his own defense, he tells the lives of all the forefathers beginning with Abraham (Acts 7).

But the biblical manner of recounting the past does not constitute what modern men regard as history. The succeeding generations are spoken of not as about men of different times, but as all one. Joshua says, "Your eyes have seen what I have done in Egypt" (JOS 24:7). Those who had actually seen God's miracles in Egypt had died in the desert, and Joshua spoke now to a new generation which had never been in Egypt. Still he says, "~Your~ eyes have seen," not "the eyes of your parents."

Jesus says to His apostles, "Ye shall be witnesses unto me ... unto the uttermost part of the earth" (ACT 1:8). The apostles however, did not even know about the extremities of the earth. But it is their teaching and example and spirit which witnesses even now on all continents, after 2,000 years. Jesus makes no distinction between the first apostles and their successors after many generations.

The biblical story cannot be called history, because it mocks objectivity. It pursues an aim, and things are told in a manner conducive to attaining it.

In the books of Chronicles there are 323 verses regarding the arrangement of the temple cult, 73 on David's activities and 100 on Judah's genealogy. The Messiah had to come from this tribe and what happened in the temple was more important than the king's politics.

In 2 Chronicles, 480 verses deal with the very few pious kings and only 342 with the 17 wicked ones. The rulers of the dissident Samaria are omitted completely. Edifying episodes are heightened. The result is more an ideal picture than a real one.

The Jewish writings record the convictions of the writers more than the facts.

The author of Chronicles was probably a Levite. In his books, the Levites are mentioned 100 times, whereas in the books of Kings they are mentioned only once and in those of Samuel, only twice.

In I Chronicles 1-9, all narrative is eliminated. What is important religiously is the transmission of the seed of David from which the Messiah will stem. Therefore in the beginning of the second book of Chronicles there are 102 verses about the descendants of Judah, 81 about those of Levi and only 186 about those from the other 10 tribes.

"But one thing is needful" (LUK 10:42). Do not pursue "objectivity," but rather make your memory and your history serve this one thing, the triumph of the Word of God.

71 Our Attitude Toward Rulers

Every Christian could take as his motto Shakespeare's words, "May that thought when I imagine ill against my king and brethren be my last breathing in this mortal world."

Such loyalty from a citizen puts an obligation on the ruler. Among the Jews, the chosen people, "the king's palace was by the court of the prison" (NEH 3:25). This is the right place for a king to dwell - where he can always have in view how much his sovereignty costs those over whom he rules.

In order for the king to have the majesty and the power of a ruler, others must die in wars under his command. Orphans remain behind. Driven by poverty and lack of education, they end in prison. The king may have neglected to spread morality among his people. His life should remain close to the lowliest of the rejected so he will perceive his kingdom truly.

In Biblical Greek, "to rule" and "to feed" are the same word, ~poimaino~. What matters is not how many state banquets the king attends, but how much care he has taken that the hungry be fed.

In Aramean, the name for Jesus, "lamb of God," is ~talya Aeloha~, which also means "servant of God. "The king can be the first servant of a country only if he has the character of a lamb.

Unfortunately not all Jewish kings had this character. Solomon, although his might as a religious poet is undenied, as king is remembered for two things: his many wives and concubines, and his love of luxury. The heathen king Hamurabi is known in history for his righteous laws; likewise the Indian king, Asoka. But not Solomon.

How did he administrate his country? What was his economic policy? What were the relationships between the different classes of the population? Did he provide for charity? Were his judgments righteous or abusive?

His son, Rehoboam, said to the people about Solomon that his father loaded them with a heavy "yoke" and chastised them with "whips" (1KI 12:14). When you read about the Roman Caesars, some French and English kings, Hitler, or Stalin, a shudder passes through you. Good rulers have always been the rare exception.

If the ruler does not fulfill his duty, the believing citizen has to review his attitude. Every nation has a ruler, but also an angel (Daniel 10). The angel can be in conflict with the civilian authority. Then the believer must obey the highest authority, the angel.

Let us remember that Elijah resisted arrest (2KI 1:10), bringing death upon the officers of an unrighteous king.

The Christian is a loyal citizen of a country, but not a bootlicker of tyrants.

72 Commanded Love

One of God's strangest commandments is that we should love him (DEU 6:5). Can love be commanded? Can a young man command a girl, "Love me and not somebody else"? Could she do this through her own effort?

The imperative "Love" can be expressed in Hebrew in two forms: ~ohev~ can mean only the order to love; ~ahavta~ has a double sense, both the imperative "love" and the perfect tense of the verb: "You have loved." ~Ahavta~ is used by the Bible in this text, not ~olev~." Thus God reminds you, "You come from Me; I shaped your soul; you loved me once; I was your great passion. This was your first sentiment although you may have forgotten it; but now remember, ~ahavta~, you loved me once. Return to this first love!" This is the deep sense of the biblical commandment. It is the only perspective from which God can be loved with the entire heart.

From the earthly point of view, love of God contains a dose of foolishness. I owe Him gratitude for many blessings, and I admire many of His creations. But why did He create the deadly scorpions and the viruses of so many illnesses? Why are there earthquakes and floods and bereavements? Why so much poverty and injustice in a world in which He is almighty? Why is Christianity such a small light? Why do hundreds of millions live and die in darkness? Could the punishment of sinners not be less than an eternal hell?

The fact that my thoughts are not conjoined with His shows that I have no imaginary God. If I had decided how

God should be, I would have chosen Him to create a universe without suffering, age and death. But I know I have the real God because my heart, the heart of a fallen sinner, is in disagreement with Him.

God said to Adam, "Of the tree of knowledge of good ~and~ evil, thou shalt not eat" (GEN 2:17). Man has to choose between good and evil, one or the other - he cannot have them both. God is otherwise, as are those in the heavenly spheres. They know both good ~and~ evil (GEN 3:22). This is the cleavage between us.

The ultimate good is unintelligible for us, so we cannot be commanded, "Love God." Instead we must be reminded that we come from the sphere where things are known otherwise. The Lord says, "Return." Remember, ~ahavta~, you have ~loved~. Return to your first love. Seated in heavenly spheres, the veil will be lifted and you will receive new understanding.

There you will understand an ancient mystical teaching which has never been written, but is expressed in a Japanese dance. Once there was a prince of such beauty that all who beheld him could do nothing else. All activity ceased in his presence. So the prince donned an ugly mask in order for men to live. Perhaps you can understand from this the existence of a beneficent God and yet of so much suffering.

Let us love God as He is known in heaven to deserve. Bernard of Clairvaux said, "The measure of loving God is to love Him without measure." Do not love Him for His special gifts - a certain moment He may withhold them. Love Him without reason. Sometimes He may afflict you. When Israel was young, he loved God and followed Him in the wilderness (JER 2:2). Love Him like this again.

When the Japanese Imperial orchestra plays their own national music, they have no conductor. Harmony is achieved because the musicians breathe in the same rhythm, constituting, as it were, a single organism. This is how we can understand why Jesus breathed the Holy Spirit upon His apostles.

You sense something of this when you read the Bible. Dozens of authors have contributed to it, with no single coordinator to harmonize the writings. But the authors breathed the same air of heavenly spheres in the same rhythm.

The Hebrew alphabet teaches you not so much how to read and write, but how to breathe. Two letters, the ~aleph~ and the ~ayin~ are unsounded. In transliteration the former is represented by the smooth breathing sigh "e" and the latter by that of the rough breathing "e." When these letters are pronounced, you hear nothing: the speaker opens and closes his mouth without making the slightest sound. Jesus said to John, "I am the Alpha and the Omega" (REV 1:8).

These are two letters of the Greek alphabet. But Jesus and John were both Jewish and it is unlikely that they would have spoken with one another in Greek. Jesus must have spoken Hebrew. Might He not have said, "I am the Aleph and the Ayin, which would mean,"I am the silence and the even deeper silence"? Or will He have said, "I am the Aleph and the Tay, the last letter of the Hebrew alphabet, which was written at that time +, a cross? Will the sense have been "I am the silence and the cross"?

The ~yod~ is often silent. "My beloved is mine" says the bride in the song "Dodi li. "In the word ~li~, which stands for "mine," the ~yod~ is silent, one might even say quiescent, giving peace. No need even to pronounce it. She continues, ~veani lo~ (SOS 2:16) and "I am his." ~Lo~, the word for "his" ends with the letter ~vav~, again unsounded, quiescent. What long speeches Romeo and Juliet deliver to each other. Not so here. The mutual possession is so sure and so strong that words cease.

Just as the Hebrew alphabet starts with a silent letter, the Bible is more conspicuous by its silences than by its words. It is silent about the first thirty years of Jesus' life. We know that at the age of twelve Jesus spoke with the priests in the temple but the subjects they discussed are not revealed.
Mary sat a whole night at Jesus' feet and listened to Him, but we are not told what He said.

In many places in the Hebrew Bible, the sign - called ~athnach~ (respiration) divides verses into two main clauses, as for example, in PSA 2:1, "Why do the people rage (respiration) and the people imagine a vain thing?" Omission of a deep respiration in the midst of this verse would result in a reading unfaithful to the Hebrew text. Other readers breathe at the same point and this establishes the harmony of the orchestra.

There are many words in the Bible whose aim is to bring you to the great silence. "The Lord is in his holy temple: let all the earth keep silence before him" (HAB 2:20).

74 Orthographic Errors in the Bible

The renowned American preacher Billy Sunday once said, "If the English language gets in my way, I tramp all over it." This is the sentiment of the biblical authors, too.

There are a few letters of the Hebrew alphabet which are written one way when they occur at the beginning or middle of a word, but which have another form when used at the end.

This rule of orthography is unfailingly respected throughout the Bible with but one exception. A strange "orthographic error" has been perpetuated for 3,000 years in all Hebrew manuscripts and printed Bibles, and never corrected. The synagogue keeps the error in the Bible even though few of the rabbis could provide an explanation.

In ISA 9:6-7, some 700 years before the birth of Christ the coming of a child who will be the prince of peace is announced. "Of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end." The Hebrew expression for "of the increase" is ~lemarbeh~, written with a final "m" in the midst of the word.

The Kabbalah, a collection of old Jewish writings containing mystical thoughts, explains that the coming of this child was prophesied in the Scripture with a final "m," which has the form of a square without any opening, to show that He will be born from the closed womb a virgin.

There is also what we would today call a typographical error in the Bible. In the old manuscripts, as well as in modern scientific editions of the Hebrew Bible, the name Manaseh is written erroneously in JDG 18:30. Since there are no vowels in the original Hebrew, the word is written: MNSH, with the N always appearing above the line of the text.

The explanation is that Jonathan, about whom this verse reports, was the first idolatrous priest in Israel. He was a grandson of Moses, written in Hebrew, MSH. The author of the book of Judges did not wish to shame the great legislator.

He thought that respect for Moses' name was more important than accuracy in the genealogy of an idolater. So he added an N to the name of Moses, thereby changing it to Manaseh. For the few who have to know the whole truth and also to teach us how to communicate a truth in a diplomatic manner, the N is written above the line.

Is the Bible inerrant? Yes, it is, even in its obvious errors. The truth is revealed from them too.

75 Qualified Almightiness

If God is almighty, why does He not free us?

The Bible calls God "Almighty" (GEN 17:1, etc.). The Greek word for it is ~pantocrator~, which means "having power over all things." Jerome translated the word into Latin with "omnipotens," which can be interpreted as meaning "able to do anything." The two concepts are not identical.

There are things which God cannot do. The Bible says, "It was impossible for God to lie" (HEB 6:18). He cannot cease to exist. He himself has limited His sovereignty, and has given a Scripture which "cannot be broken" (JHN 10:35). He cannot act contrary to His own character, or change His mind in essential things and say, "I will not have love anymore," or, "there will be no righteousness and wrath in me." There is therefore a "must" even in God and in His providence.

As with God, so with man - we also "must" pass through tribulations. Jesus says, "The Son of man must suffer many things" (LUK 9:22), and again, "Ye shall hear of wars and rumors of war ... These things must come to pass" (MTT 24:6).

Prayer is important, but its scope is limited. Speaking about the coming destruction of Jerusalem and Judea, Jesus teaches His disciples, "Pray ye that your flight be not in the winter, neither on the sabbath day" (MTT 24:20), when it would be more difficult to find means of transportation. He does not say, "Pray that the calamity itself should not come." One could as well pray that 2 + 2 not equal 4.

There exists a "must." When sins arrive at their peak, they bring with them unavoidable catastrophe, because it is in the unchangeable nature of God to punish sins. You can only ask for an alleviation of it.

God must have a certain character. What has no characteristics cannot exist.

How could we arrive at union with God if we could not be certain that He is on the peak toward which we advance? If there were no "must" with God, we would strive to be holy and He might have changed to unholiness. He might even have changed His desire to be united with us.

God has power over all things. He is as the Bible calls Him, pantocrator, but He has no power over His loving heart to make it cease beating for us. Our eye must be single (LUK 11:34), which means it must be the single eye. His eye and my eye are one.

The eye wherewith He sees me and my own eye are the same. The heavenly bridegroom says to His bride, "Thou has ravished my heart with one of thy eyes" (SOS 4:9), with the eye which is one and the same as His own.

God wished, wishes and will wish unity with us.

"Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, and today and for ever" (HEB 13:8).

76 Should a Christian Defend His Country?

Generally, it is dangerous to try to establish general rules by which a Christian should be guided. God has said, "You shall be turned into another man and then let it be ... that you do what is at your hand" (1SM 10:6-7 after the Hebrew), or as St. Augustine said, "Love and do what you like."

Jesus said to the first generation of disciples, "When ye shall see Jerusalem encompassed with armies ... flee" (LUK 21:20-21). Many of us would have said, "Then enlist in the army." But a treasure of divine knowledge had been entrusted to the disciples which must not be lost. It was more important for the little band to defend this knowledge than defend a fatherland which advanced toward destruction God's decree.

Jeremiah, when the Jewish state was threatened by the Babylonians, delivered speeches which would today be considered high treason. He counseled surrender to the enemy without any resistance. Since the Jews were the chosen people, their mere survival was more important than the nobility of a heroic fight.

The occasions when such choices are necessary are rare. No Christian would defend a Nazi Germany or a Communist Russia.

Otherwise the commandment of God stands, "Let every soul be subject to the higher powers" (ROM 13:1). If your government has decided that a war is in the interest of the nation, you obey. It is not wrong to kill in a just war. "After the return of Abraham from the slaughter of Chedorlaomer ... Melchizedek, king of Salom (a type of Jesus) blessed him" (GEN 14:17-19). Just this time had been chosen by Melchizedek to bless Abraham! Those who have fought against tyrannies are also blessed. The Christian can do much. Abraham with a small group of what we would today call "freedom fighters" conquered world powers.

It is essential for children of God to participate in the fight against evil, even when this fight takes the form of war. Their role is "to sanctify the war. "This is the expression used in the Hebrew of JOE 3:19. They should bring into the war the notions of righteousness and love. But foremost, the Christians' role is to prevent war, bringing the rulers of nations to living faith in Christ and teaching those who believe that the best guarantee of peace is strength.

77 The Name of God

Jesus says to God, "I have manifested Thy name." But which name did He manifest? Was it Jehovah, Elohim, El-Shadai, Lord of Hosts? There can be different explanations. May I suggest one.

When my wife was in Communist prisons, she brought one of her guards, let us call her Nina, to Christ. Sabina taught her the creed and the Our Father. One day this new Christian said to my wife, "I cannot just repeat the Lord's prayer like a parrot. I must understand it. I say, 'Hallowed be thy name,' not knowing what His name is. Could you please tell me!" My wife answered, "God has all names. In the Bible He is called God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. He is also God of Nina. He is your personal God. Nina is His name. Now sanctify it."

The biblical revelation goes even further. In both Hebrew and Greek the Bible text speaks not about a God ~of~ Abraham, ~of~ Isaac and so on, but simply God Abraham, God Isaac, God Jacob. He identifies himself with his friends and believers. It is not enough to believe that God is one. The Jews sing in the synagogue, "Huh echad veein sheni." (He is one and there is no second.) These words occur also in the Vedas. Each believer who comes to the One does not stop at being a second who obeys and adores the first, but becomes one with the One. God is God Abraham, and Abraham is Abraham God. Jesus says it, "Ye are gods" (JHN 10:34).

The notion of oneness in Hebrew differs from that in the European languages. Man and wife shall be "one flesh" (GEN 2:24). In the Hebrew it is written about Samuel that "he shall be Saul to the Lord" (1SM 1:28), which means he will feel so united with Saul that he will mourn when Saul fails. If Saul errs, Samuel will become twice as good to compensate for Saul's mistakes.

When Samuel died and went to the place of the righteous, he could assure Saul who had to die the next day, "Tomorrow shalt thou and thy sons be with me" (1SM 28:19). Where else could Saul have gone after death? He had to be with Samuel because he was one with him. Samuel was Saul before God.

The unity between husband and wife is not a perfect one. Samuel and Saul clashed with each other, but deep underneath there was a unity which could not be sundered. Such is our unity with God. He is God Abraham, God Isaac, God Nina, God Richard and God you. These are His names.

78 Scarcity of Biographical Data

No scrupulous modern biographer would attempt to write a biography of Jesus on the basis of the scarce data which the Bible gives about Him. Even about Jesus' earthly life we know next to nothing. Thirty years are passed over with silence. This is to show us that God keeps files on no one.

Job says, "What is man ... that thou shouldest try him every moment" (JOB 7:17-18)? What a man is in the present moment is what counts. What he has been before can be erased by the grace of God. Never hold past sins against a man, rather hold a man against his past sins.

George Muller, the British philanthropist, founder of many orphanages and renowned as a man of prayer, was in prison for theft in his youth. So was Skrefsrud, the renowned Norwegian missionary to the Santals in India.

St. Vincent of Paul was ordained at the age of 19 although the Council of Trent had fixed 30 as the minimum age. He was silent all his mature life about his invalid ordination and about an adventurous escape from slavery which had occurred only in his imagination. He was also silent about the fact that in his youth he had sought the parishes with the fattest incomes.

What does an ugly past count, when God sees a beautiful present?

79 The Bible Teaches Poverty

When God makes Abraham a declaration of love, Abraham's answer is, essentially, "what will you give me?" (GEN 15:1-22). Let it not be so with us. May we not be only parasites on God. May our relationship with Him not be all asking but also giving.

When you are converted you must become poorer than you were before, for Jesus' sake. Then when you purchase a dress, you can offer Him the difference in price between a plain and a fashionable one. Jesus has given His blood for me. Should I not offer Him everything I have?

Jesus forbids His disciples to have two coats (MTT 10:10). What would He say about those who possess several houses and several cars?

The prophet Hosea had to buy his wife's love with money. Jesus is in the same predicament - He has had to buy His bride. Paul writes, "Ye are bought with a price" (1CO 7:23). The price paid for us is "the precious blood of Christ" (1PE 1:19). Would we sell ourselves to Him for less? Would we give our lives to Him simply because He is right, even if He had no forgiveness of sins, no paradise and no earthly blessings to bestow? Are we His profiteers, or do we find in Him a beloved to whom to give our all?

Jesus said, "Blessed be ye poor"(LUK 6:20). The strongest Greek word for poverty, ~ptohois~, a word indicating abject misery, is used here.

The Lord asks the apostles, "Do you not remember the five loaves ~of the five thousand~?" (MTT 16:9). The superfluous bread does not belong to me but to the poor.

George Muller, who became a legend for the orphanages which he founded and supported by power of faith and prayer, wrote in his diary, "We found the cheapest and plainest rooms in Bristol, but still too good for servants of Jesus. Our Master had nowhere to lay His head."

As Jesus knelt to wash the feet of His disciples, St. Hedwig of Silezia, a princess, gave gifts to the poor, kneeling before them. After such a life, Hedwig was able to say as her last word at her death, "Welcome."

Wealth is especially dangerous for ministers.

A journal of architecture published a photograph of the villa of a renowned American evangelist as being the most beautiful villa of the year. This man might have a better chance of preparing good sermons in a modest apartment.

I have heard sermons in cathedrals in rich countries and sermons delivered in prison by pastors in chains. The latter had the more durable influence upon my soul.

Rabbi Yehiel Mier, having no money to give a beggar, gave him one of his wife's rings. When the wife learned of it, she was upset, "That was a very costly ring with a real diamond in it," she said. Rabbi Yehiel, hearing this, searched the town for the beggar. He came home triumphantly and assured his wife, "I found him and warned him to be sure to sell the ring for a good sum of money."

Let us be souls who freely give ourselves with all we have to Him. Love poverty! Become poor.

80 Dove-Like Israel

Israel and the Holy Spirit are both likened to a dove, as if to say that they belong to the same species. The Holy Spirit is God. We too are partakers of the divine dove-like nature (2PE 1:4).

The Bridegroom says to the bride who is a symbol of His nation, "You have doves' eyes" (SOS 1:15). Why is Israel called a dove? "Song of Songs Rabbah," a Jewish book of wisdom, explains: "The dove is faithful. Israel was likewise faithful to the Holy One, praised be He, at Sinai. For they did not say that ten commandments, or twenty or thirty were enough for them, but they said, 'All that the Lord has spoken we will do and be obedient' (EXO 24:7). The dove is distinguishable among all other birds. Israel is likewise distinguished by deeds. The dove is modest. Israel is likewise modest... The dove does not leave its nest even if someone has taken its brood. Israel likewise continues to visit the temple site even though the Temple has been destroyed. The dove journeys and returns to its nest. Israel likewise 'shall come eagerly like birds from Egypt and like doves from Assyria' (HOS 11:11). Others are attracted to the dove; likewise, converts are attracted to Israel. The dove, unlike other birds, offers its neck for slaughter without struggling; children of Israel likewise give their lives for the Holy One, praised be He. The dove does not leave its mate; Israel likewise does not leave the Holy One, praised be He. The dove atones for sins. Israel likewise atones for the nations of the world."

Belong to the dove, like Israel of God!

81 Humility

One of the main characteristics of a great man is his humility. Abraham is considered the father of all the faithful in the Jewish, Christian and Moslem religions. What was his opinion of himself? "Behold, I am dust and ashes" (GEN 18:27). David was a king, a poet, a man after God's heart, his opinion of himself? "I am a worm, not a man" (PSA 22:6).

We arrive nowhere without a humble acknowledgement of our unworthiness. A politician once asked a bishop, "What can I do to obtain wisdom for ruling this country?" It was raining. The bishop told him, "Go outside in the rain for half an hour and stand with your head up in an unprotected place." The politician did this. When he returned, the bishop said, "Did God grant you some wise instruction?" The man answered angrily, "The only thing I could think about was that I am a fool." The bishop nodded, "Quite a discovery for a first try."

Start like Paul with the recognition, "I am an abortive" (1CO 15:8, in the original). Only then will you be able to take upon yourself the burden of being famous. Sir Thomas Moore, martyred under Henry VIII of England, said, "We must stand fast at the risk of being heroes." Heroism is not something to be sought, but to be accepted though it endangers the more precious virtue of humility.

Remain humble, knowing that whatever your aims and however many skills you employ, you will not attain your earthly aims.

Engels was right when he wrote to the Russian revolutionist Vera Zasulitch on April 23, 1885, "Men who bragged about having made a revolution, always realized next day that they did not know what they were doing, that the revolution performed had no resemblance to the one they intended. This is what Hegel called the irony of history, an irony only few historic personalities avoided."

This applies not only to social revolutions. Not only have men like Lenin and Hitler died disappointed. Certainly the Church is not what the Church fathers intended. How unlike it is to the first church full of love in Jerusalem.

Luther intended a reformation within the Catholic Church and died very unhappy about the chaos which resulted from his efforts. Wesley too was disappointed. Mission founders have similar experiences.

Do not be proud. We are not made for successes, at least not for lasting ones. We are all shaped as vessels for the use of the Master. His purposes are fulfilled in our lives, "It is God which works in you both to will and to do of his good pleasure" (PHP 2:13).

Be humble and remember that even your humility does not come through your own merit. Then you will be a chosen vessel.

82 Strange Commandment

You may sometimes wonder about the commandments God gives His prophets, whom men are taught to regard as models of life for their people. The first word which the Lord ever said to the prophet Hosea was, "Take unto thee a wife of whoredoms and children of whoredoms" (HOS 1:2). Hosea complied. But why should a prophet have to do such a thing?

I believe the best explanation is given in the Talmud (Pesahim 87 a-b):

> The Holy One, praised be He, said to Hosea, "Your children have sinned." Hosea should have said, "They are your children, children of your dear ones, children of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, show them your mercy." However, not only did he not say this, but he said, "Lord of the universe, the entire world belongs to You. Replace them with another people." The Holy One, praised be He, thought: "What shall I do with this old man? I shall tell him to marry a harlot and to beget children of harlotry and then I shall tell him to send her away. If he is able to send her away, I will send Israel away. And it is written, "The Lord said to Hosea, "Go, take to yourself a wife of harlotry and have children of harlotry..." So he went and took Gomer. When two sons and a daughter had been born to him, the Holy One, praised be He, said to Hosea, "You must separate yourself from your wife." Hosea answered, "Lord of the universe, I have children from her. I cannot put her away or divorce her." The Holy One said to him, "Your wife is a harlot and your children are children of harlotry. You do not even know if they are really yours. Yet you refuse to divorce her. How then, should I act toward Israel? They are the children of those whom I have tested, the children of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, and one of the four possessions which I have acquired in My world: the Law, heaven and earth, the Temple and Israel. And yet you tell me to supersede them with another people."

When he realized that he had sinned Hosea rose to ask mercy for himself. The Holy One, praised be He, said to him, "Before you ask mercy for yourself, ask mercy for Israel."

None of the great men and women of God could be completely exempt from sin; they needed it. It was in the Providence of God that they should know it, so that their hearts would be soft for the multitude which sins. Taught by their own experience of life, they ceased to condemn, but began to intercede for those who trespass against the will of God.

You also may have received some strange guidance from God. Perhaps its purpose was to teach you humility.

83 Jesus Incognito

Jesus often wished to keep incognito. He passed through Galilee with His disciples "and he would not that any man should know it" (MRK 9:30). Might some people have Jesus near them even now, without knowing that it is He?

Angels too like to walk among men unrecognized. It is written: "Be not forgetful to entertain strangers, for thereby some have entertained angels unaware" (HEB 13:2).

Jesus is the Lord of angels - He might have taught them to pass incognito.

Like all who wish to remain hidden, Jesus uses pseudonyms. Even "Jesus" is a pseudonym. Isaiah foretold that a virgin would bring forth a son "and they shall call his name Emmanuel" (ISA 7:14). How can someone who does not bear this name be the person who fulfills the prophecy? If Mr. Smith is announced, the arrival of Mr. Taylor is not what you were entitled to expect. But before the birth of this child from a virgin, an angel tells Joseph, "she shall bring forth a son and thou shalt call his name Jesus .... Now all this was done that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the Lord by the prophet saying ... they shall call his name Emmanuel" (MTT 1:21-23). Strange.

Nor is the name "Jesus" the last name which He will bear. Jesus appears to His apostle John saying that he who overcomes in the fight of faith will be made a pillar in the temple of God, and adding, "I will write upon him my new name" (REV 3:12).

In eternity Jesus will have another name. ~Jesus~ (Yeshuah) in Hebrew, means "Salvation." In eternity there will be nobody to be saved. Apart from the name inscribed on those who overcome, "He has a name written, that no man knew, but He himself" (REV 19:12). We say "Jesus," but this is only the name under which He made himself known to us. It is not His only name.

Even during His earthly life, Jesus did not always bear this name. "When eight days were accomplished for the circumcising of the child, his name was called Jesus" (LUK 2:21). Until that time He had no earthly name. He was simply the Son of God incarnate, the Divine child. He could have been called by any name.

Scripture states, "You shall keep my statues and my judgments which if a man does, he shall live by them" (LEV 18:5). It is not written, "which an Israelite" or "which a believer in Christ" does, but "a man," any man. Scripture also says, "This is the law of man" (2SM 7:19 in Hebrew). This is not the law of those who believe in the right name, but in the law of man, correct for all men. Although no man can be saved without knowledge of Jesus, there might be people who know Him and love Him as He walks among them incognito, under another name. There are people in all religions who in reality belong to Him.

84 Problems Connected With Death

I write the things below not as teaching, but to acquaint Western believers with the doubts and tempests in the spirit through which many Christians pass when in solitary confinement, with death reigning around them.

In biblical perspective, death is not something to worry about. Perhaps chrysalises practice some funeral rite when one ceases to be along them, not knowing it had become a butterfly. So the believer passes at death to a higher stage.

We, the living, also remain in communion with them.

Luther abolished public prayers for the dead because such prayers had been abused for commercial purposes. Greedy priests sold indulgences which were supposed to help the dead escape torments.

However, prayer mentioning the dead has a thorough biblical foundation. Nehemiah prayed, "Now therefore, our God ... Let not all the trouble seem little before thee that has come upon us, on our kings ... and on our prophets" (NEH 9:32). When Nehemiah spoke these words, Israel no longer had kings. They were all dead, living in another sphere, but participating in what happened to Nehemiah's contemporaries. The troubles of the living Jews were shared by their former kings who had passed beyond death.

The verse is not always interpreted like this, but it can be understood in this manner.

The living also share in something which seems to be of great concern to the dead. Boaz said, "Ruth the

Moabitess ... have I purchased to be my wife, to raise up the name of the dead upon his inheritance, that the name of the dead be not cut off from among his brethren" (RUT 4:10).

It is important that we perpetuate in honor the names of our earthly predecessors and those who brought us to faith .

When I was in prison, I had the strong impression that three men who had been greatly influential in my conversion and were then dead, Isaac Feinstein, Christian Wolkes and Giuseppe Cavane, were near me, imploring that I keep their good names through remaining faithful in tribulation. Let it be our concern "that the name of the dead be not cut off from among his brethren." Because Boaz took this care, the name of the dead husband of Ruth is mentioned in our Bible.

As a rule, dead saints are gathered unto their people (GEN 49:33). They belong to the same church as we and we work together with them for salvation under our common head, Jesus Christ. The saints who have passed away "are before the throne of God and serve Him day and night in His temple"(REV 7:15). But perhaps there is also another alternative.

We belong to the Body of Christ who gave himself for sinners. Perhaps we too can give ourselves for sinners. Paul wrote, "I could wish that myself were accursed from Christ for my brethren, my kinsmen according to the flesh" (ROM 9:3). Moses also asked to be blotted out from the book of life if God would not forgive the Jewish people (EXO 32:32). In principle this might be possible.

In his ~95 Theses~ which started the Reformation, Luther, who believed in purgatory, approved of the popular belief that Popes Severinus and Paschal were willing to endure the pains of that place for the benefit of the faithful.

This is the concept of the Boddhisatva which is also found in Indian religion. The Boddhisatva is a man who refuses entry into the eternal bliss to which he is entitled, preferring to suffer and pray for those who, enmeshed in sin, have difficulty reaching this aim.

The question of our relationship with those who are on the other shore preoccupied us much in prison. Around us many, just the best, died. We could be killed any moment. This made us to think in a manner apart, which probably would not be shared by Christians who lead the ordinary life.

My granddaughter told me: "I enjoy being prayed for by many. I would not like to miss this joy in heaven." Prayers for the dead might not be of any use to them, but should we do only what is useful?

85 Strange Idiom

In the text of our Bibles, it is apparent that God is the author of all our calamities.

"God sold the Jews into the hands of Sisera, captain of the host of Hazor and into the hand of the Philistines and into the hand of the king of Moab" (1SM 12:9). Why should God deliver His people into the hands of His enemies?

God says through the prophet Jeremiah, "I will cause to cease from the cities of Judah and from the streets of Jerusalem the voice of mirth and the voice of gladness" (JER 7:34). We learned that God is represented by Jesus who changed water into wine to give men pleasure. Yet He boasts of making joy vanish.

To understand those parts of Scripture which blame the evil upon God, we have to remember a peculiarity of the Hebrew language.

The Old Testament Joseph, when in prison with the butler and baker of Pharaoh, predicted to the one that he would be restored to Pharaoh's favor and to the other that he would be hanged. In the Hebrew original it is written that he, Joseph, "restored the chief butler unto his office but hanged the chief baker" (GEN 41:13). In fact, however, Joseph continued to remain in prison and took no part in the advancement of the one man, nor in the execution of the other. However, it is in the nature of the Hebrew language to call one who predicts or warns the "author" of the respective action.

dialect. When He told them, "Whose soever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them and whose soever sins ye retain, they are retained" (JHN 20:23), the words did not have the same meaning for them as they would for us. The words did not bestow upon the disciples an actual power to absolve or not to absolve sins. This power rests with God alone.

The apostles were called to proclaim the Gospel. Those who accepted their message would receive the divine pardon, the others not. The disciples were thus, as in the case of Joseph, the "authors" of the forgiveness or lack of forgiveness of sin.

But now another question arises. The Hebrew language was fashioned by God to be a vehicle of His revelation. Why then does this idiom exist which gives the impression that the blame for evil lies on God just like the authorship of good? There is a deep meaning in it.

We usually hate men who wrong us and retaliate against them. God wishes to exonerate the wrong-doer in our eyes. He wishes that we harbor no bad feelings toward him. So He has formed His chosen language so as to give the impression that the tyranny of a Sisera in olden times or that of a Stalin or Hitler in modern times are His decision. Then we can love even the tyrants and their tools. Our account is only with God, and Him we love.

86 Do Not Brood About Yourself

"Examine yourselves whether ye be in faith" (2CO 13:5) is not the same thing as brooding about the state of your soul. Man is simply what he is just as every other element in nature. If you simply are what God created you to be, a creature in His image, nobody will ever call you to any account. "No reckoning was made" with those who worked at the repair of the temple in Jerusalem "because they dealt faithfully" (2KI 22:7).

Man began to judge his own state and to discover that he was naked only after he had listened to the serpent in the garden of Eden instead of obeying God.

A greater percentage of women get cancer of the breast among those who continually check for it than among those who do not. The same danger lies in the self-examination and dissection of one's soul.

A thorough self-examination is not even possible, because you cannot be a judge in your own cause. This is an elementary rule of justice.

According to G"del's [Godel] incompleteness theory, no system can explain its own consistency without recourse to concepts that the system itself cannot generate. The criterion upon which you judge yourself must come not from your own mind, but from outside. But it remains your own mind which decides which outside criterion to adopt. Thus any attempt to judge yourself is futile. Men of different opinions judge themselves according to various criterions.

Hitler was sure he did well to exterminate the Jews. Jesus' judges were sure that they did well to sentence Him. A sinner sins even in trying to determine his own sin and to evaluate true repentance.

Examine yourself only whether you have faith, as the Scriptures enjoin: whether you believe there is a greater intelligence than your own who has thought about everything, who shapes and directs your life; then enter into a calm attitude of mind.

The Hebrew word ~avon~ means "sin" as well as "punishment." The very fact that you are a sinner is punishment enough, causing you to miss the inexpressible joys of righteousness. Do not add useless autoflagellation to your punishment.

There is a secret in your sinfulness. Cain, after killing his brother, said ~Gadol avoni minso~, which, literally translated, is, "My sin is great by its being borne" (GEN 4:13).

"Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow" (ISA 1:18). The sins become white through the greatness of the sin-bearer. Because sin is in itself such a terrible punishment, Jesus took it upon himself. It was His joy to do so. To be a sin-bearer is His most beautiful crown. By entrusting your sins to Him you add a jewel to His crown.

Examine yourself only to see if you are in faith, if you believe your sins to be white as snow because they now belong to Jesus, and, with this, enter into peace.

87 The Red Dragon

"Behold a great red dragon" (REV 12:3). Why is this dragon, whose intent is to devour the Christ child, colored red?

Sin is also associated with red. It would seem that to speak about the color of sin would have as much sense as speaking about the melody of a fruit, but God says, "Let us reason together. Though your sins be as crimson, they shall be as wool" (ISA 1:18). So sin is red and righteousness is white.

It was no accident that Communism and Nazism, the two great anti-Christian movements of our age, both chose red flags. Not only did they fulfill a prophecy, but the choice also derived from a source deep within the experience of mankind.

The French psychologist Alfred Binet related an experiment with a hysterical woman whose body was paralyzed on one side; When a dynamometer was placed in her right hand she could squeeze it to register only 12 kg. If she was shown a red disk, the pressure of her squeeze was immediately doubled (in "Researches about the alterations of conscience with hysterical persons" ~Philosophical Magazine~, vol. 17/1889, France).

Goethe, who developed a theory of light, also attributed dynamic character to the color red, which he distinguished as being an active color.

Every color is a suffering of light, because colors are produced by light breaking through a prism. Red is its greatest suffering.

Animals can be driven mad by showing them a piece of red cloth. Toreadors make use of this fact in bullfighting. All primitive people have a predilection for red, and so do little children.

White is not actually a color, but the fullness of light, light which has not passed through a prism. The righteous will stand before Christ, the lamb of God, clothed in white (REV 7:9). In contrast to the color of the dragon, white is the color of quietness, of contemplation, the good part chosen by Mary of Bethany (LUK 10:42).

The servants of the red dragon delight in the sight of blood. Persecutors have shed rivers of martyrs' blood. The righteous, on the other hand, are givers of life.

In a world dominated or terrorized by the red dragon, in a world where love is scarce and relationships are icy, the righteous bring the warmth of love.

No scientist can explain how it is that a stream of warm water, the Gulf Stream, flows between the cold waters of the ocean, which, so to speak, form its walls, how that moving hot stream exists within the motionless cold. So the righteous, clothed in white, journey toward heaven through a world inhabited by passionate red monsters, a world which is in contrast with the radiant love of the righteous, icy and cold.

88 Strange Expressions in the Hebrew Bible

Biblical Hebrew is a very poor language, with only 400 word stems. For this reason it contains many homonyms and strange expressions which we often find contain spiritual messages. A few examples follow.

Elisha asks his teacher Elijah, "Let a double portion of thy spirit be upon me." There is of course no quantitative measurement of spirit, so these words might seem senseless, but among the Jews, the eldest son commonly received a double portion of inheritance. Thus Elisha's words imply, "Make me your principal spiritual heir."

Some adversaries of the Jews wrote a letter to the Persian king Artaxerxes, saying among other things, "We are salted with the salt of the palace" (EZR 4:14 in the Aramean original). Salt of the palace is an expression for salary from the king. The English word "salary" also derives from "salt."

We read, "Saul was the son of one year in his reign" (1SM 13:1 in Hebrew). This was a manner of saying that he was childish as a ruler.

The Hebrew has no special word for "period." The word ~iom~ is used for both "period" and "day." So, from the biblical text it cannot be established whether God created the world in six days or in six periods.

~Kavod~ means both"glory"and "heavy." These homonyms express the spiritual truth that it is a glory to carry heavy burdens for the love of God. ~Lekoneh~ means "to get as result of a relationship of love" or "to conceive." Eve says, ~Qanithi~, "I got a man from the Lord," when she gave birth to her first son (GEN 4:1). Later on the word became used for "buying." The Jews did not intend commerce to be a cold, selfish transaction, but rather a relationship in which, governed by love, two parties exchange needed items. Let Christian merchants profit by this teaching.

~Leshaal~ means "to ask" as well as "to lend." Thus, to lend (leshaal) to everyone who asks (shaal) is a teaching inherent in the very fiber of the Hebrew language.

The name of the first king of Israel, Saul (Sheoul in Hebrew) means "lent." Therefore "as long as he (Samuel) lives, he shall be lent to the Lord" (1SM 1:28), could also be correctly translated, "Samuel shall be Saul to the Lord." One man can take another's place before God.

~Hattath~ means both "sin" and "sin-offering." God said to Cain, "If thou doest not well, ~hattath~ lies at the door." It is well for every man who has committed ~hattath~. a sin, to remember that by so doing he has brought Jesus, the sin-offering, near to him, ready to forgive. Thus Jesus, too, is me before God as Samuel was Saul.

The Bible speaks about men baptized for the dead (1CO 15:29). When certain Christians were martyred, others who had wavered until that time, encouraged by the martyrs' example of faith, came to take their place in the church and became baptized.

When a believer fails, another can, through fasting. mourning, praying, and working twice as hard as before, make good the loss which the Kingdom has endured. Therese of Avila taught "When you see a sister sinning, be thou much holier so that God may receive the same amount of love." Samuel practiced this substitution for Saul, and in this sense, Samuel was Saul before God.

You too can be a shield for another before God, replacing through your excellence in faith someone else's frailty.

89 Punishment for Children

Little children mocked Elisha and said unto him, "Go up, thou bald head, go up, thou bald head. And he turned back and looked on them and cursed them in the name of the Lord. And there came out two she bears out of the wood and tare forty two children of them" (2KI 2:23-24).

What the children were mocking was probably not just baldness, but perhaps something like the tonsure of Catholic priests in times before or the tonsure of the Oriental religions, which may have been used by Jewish prophets. But why such a harsh punishment for a childish prank?

Our modern concept is that a child cannot be held responsible for wrong behavior. Everything is blamed on society, family, school, or the police; children's crimes are usually attributed to poverty, although the majority of poor children do not commit crimes, and many offenders have more money than those they rob.

The ancient Jews believed, however, that a child should not commit crimes, a child should not steal, should not mock religion and if he does, he should receive due punishment.

Still, why was the punishment so severe?

Jews believe that Elijah still walks on earth in disguise, and one legend tells of a man who asked to walk beside him to learn from him the ways of God. In beggars' rags, they sought hospitality at a poor man's house. The poor man received them in a friendly way and shared the milk of his own cow with them. In the morning, leaving the house,

Elijah cursed the cow and it died. The second night they asked the hospitality of a rich man. The rich man spoke harshly to them and sent them, without food, to sleep in his barn. In the morning Elijah advised the man to dig in a certain place and the rich man found treasure buried there. Later Elijah and his companion met a child, who kindly went out of his way to give directions. When they passed a bridge, Elijah pushed the boy into the river where he drowned. At last Elijah's companion could not bear it any longer and asked for explanations. Elijah said, "the cow I cursed had anthrax. If I had not killed it, the family would have been poisoned. The rich man whom I made even richer, although he was bad, was involved in big financial speculations. The treasure will encourage him to even wilder schemes with the result that in the end he will lose everything he has. The loss will make him wiser and soften his heart. In the good child I saw criminal tendencies. He would have destroyed his soul and broken the hearts of his parents, had he continued to live. I saved him by giving him death."

There are men like Elijah with special endowments from God who can see criminality in children before it has developed, as botanists distinguish what future flower will grow from what to us is just a seed. Only such enlightened men are licensed to a severity forbidden the ignorant. Elijah was entitled to do what he did as a doctor who could diagnose a fetus as abnormal would be justified in performing an abortion. [I don't understand. CPM 05/03/96]

It is not correct for those who are ignorant to judge prophets. We should rather learn from them to maintain a careful watch over our children and never to prefer our children to God. If they sin, they must be punished, and, in extreme cases, rejected.

Children are responsible for what they do. As St. Therese of Avila sought martyrdom among the moors at the age of seven, so a wicked child must atone for his wickedness.

90 Learn From Flowers

Christians should know something about flowers. Jesus taught "Consider the lilies" (MTT 6:28). He calls himself "the rose of Sharon and the lily of the valleys" (SOS 2:1). Without this biblical teaching, we would never have had Masefield's lyric at the end of "The Everlasting Mercy."

O lovely lily clean,
O lily springing clean,
O lily bursting white,
Dear lily of delight
Spring in my heart again
That I may flower to men.

We can learn from flowers not to be disturbed that the Christians are constituted of so many denominations. There are 35,000 species of orchids alone.

The number of Christian denominations has to increase even more. Our ultimate hope is for every believer to be an Abraham, a friend of God and a man under God's direct guidance, each to be his own denomination. Men differ from each other. Each person will have his own gifts and visions and uniting them will be a profound love which transcends their differences of view.

Flowers do not quarrel with each other. The right relationship between denominations and believers is mutual admiration.

Secondly, every flower is wisdom personified. Orchids are masters in adopting different shapes for the purpose of multiplication.

The Mediterranean's Ophrys resembles a female wasp and emits a similar odor to attract the male wasp. In the wasp's attempt to mate with the plant, he picks up pollen masses, which eventually brush off onto another flower. The Santa orchid has a platform which resembles a nectar-bearing flower, so it attracts bees in search of nectar which it does not have.

Australia's flying-duck orchid springs a trap when an insect lands on its lips. With a jerk, the orchid tosses the intruder into a cup formed by petals around a green column. The escaping insect carries away pollen masses to deposit on the next flower.

Other orchids display other curiosities to attract specific pollinators (National Geographic Magazine).

Christians also wish to multiply. Paul writes, "Unto the Jews I became a Jew, that I might gain the Jew; to them that are under the law, as under the law, that I might gain them that are under the law; to them that are without law, as without law ... to the weak became I as weak, that I might gain the weak. I am made all things to all men, that I might by all means save some" (1CO 9:20-22).

Christianity has an amazing multitude of approaches, all of them correct so long as we pursue the one aim: ever to increase the Church of Christ.

91 Lesser-Known Personalities of the Bible

Paul writes to the Romans, "Erastus, the chamberlain of the city, salutes you" (ROM 16:23). An inscription was found in excavations at Corinth, "Erastus, procurator, aedile, laid the pavement at his own expense." According to archaeological evidence the pavement is from the middle of the first century. The identity of name, location and date make it likely that the subject is the same person ("A Guide to the Excavations of Ancient Corinth," American School of Classical Studies, Athens, 1936). To receive a greeting from such a person, one who does not profit from his position to enrich himself, but, on the contrary, spends from his pocket for a public need, would be an honor indeed.

Gamaliel is the only New Testament name also celebrated by the Talmud, a book commonly opposed to Christianity. It is believed that Gamaliel's father, Simeon, was the old man who took the baby Jesus in his arms and said the prayer, "Nunc dimittis" (LUK 2:25-35). His grandfather was the renowned Rabbi Hillel. Gamaliel was so honored that he is one of seven Jewish teachers to whom the name "Raban" was given, a title also born by Jesus. Magdalene addressed him as"Rabbuni."

Gamaliel was also called "the beauty of the Law."

Unlike other Pharisees, he was not a bigot. It is said that he once bathed in Greece in a place where a statue of a heathen goddess stood. Reproached for this, he silenced his critics by saying that the bath was not built for the goddess, who does not have the habit of washing herself, but for men, the statue serving as ornament.

Gamaliel was Paul's teacher of religion. He also undertook the defense of St. Peter when persecuted.

His attitude toward Christianity fluctuated. After a period of mild tolerance he became its passionate adversary. He composed a prayer against the Hebrew Christians which is still recited three times daily in Orthodox synagogues: "Let there be no hope to them that apostate from true religion, and let heretics, how many so ever may be, all perish as in a moment. And let the kingdom of pride be speedily rooted out and broken in our days. Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, who destroyest the wicked and bringest down the proud" (Home, "Introduction to Scriptures," 8th edition, Volume III, p. 261, quoted in "The Life and Epistles of St. Paul" by W. Conybeare, Scranton & Co, Hartford, 1900).

Archaeologists, however, discovered that Gamaliel's tomb bears a Christian inscription, indicating that toward the end of his life he received Christ as his Savior.

92 Sources of the Bible

The Bible is not entirely a direct revelation from God. It contains quotations from numerous other books, some of which are known.

Jude quotes two apocryphal books in his epistle. The story told in verse 9 that Archangel Michael contended with the devil about the body of Moses comes from the book, "Assumption of Moses." The saying in verse 14, "The Lord comes with ten thousands of his saints to execute judgment upon all," is a quote from the book of Enoch.

In ACT 17:28, St. Paul quotes the Greek poet Eratus. Since Eratus, like Paul, was a native of Cilicia, it was natural that Paul be familiar with his writings. Eratus was renowned for his astronomical poems, and Ovid declared that his reputation would endure as long as the sun and moon. Eratus' only lasting reputation, however, is that Paul quoted from one of his poems: "Thou who amid the immortals are throned the highest in glory, Giver and Lord of life, who by law disposes of all things; Known by many a name, yet the almighty forever; Hail, O Zeus, for to thee should each mortal voice be uplifted. Offspring are we too of thine, we and all that is mortal around us."

How many preachers today would dare quote the Book of Mormon or the Koran as freely as Paul quotes this ode to the heathen deity Zeus, a poem which proclaims that not only men but all that is mortal, including animals and plants, are God's offspring?

Paul also quotes three other Greek poets. From Aratus he takes the words, "In God we live, we move and have our being" (ACT 17:28). The saying, "Evil communications corrupt good manners" (1CO 15:33), is a line from "Thais," a comedy of Menander, and could well have become a proverb.

"The Cretians are always liars, evil beasts, slow bellies" (TIT 1:12) is from Epimenides of Crete (8th century B.C.), whose sayings were considered prophetic. Plato called Epimenides a divinely inspired man and Plutarch called him a man dear to God, but his harsh judgment against a whole nation certainly does him no honor.

Judgmental generalizations about a people should be avoided, but they lose their sharpness if they come from a son of that nation. The Jewish prophets spoke harshly about the Jews, and Luther about the Germans. Their intentions were beneficent.

Even great artists can sometimes write on a low intellectual level. It is correct to show respect towards poets and men of letters not only when they are at their peak, but even when they fail, as Paul shows Epimenides in this instance.

These are but a few examples of the sources from which the authors of Scripture took some of their inspiration.

93 The Phoenicians

Most Christians are aware of their debt to the Jews in matters of knowledge of God. We also owe much to another biblical nation, the Phoenicians. They were among the Canaanites, and are also called in the Bible by the names of their cities, Sidonians, or Tyrians. The Greeks gave them the name Phoenicians. Jesus speaks of them favorably as compared with the sin-fulness predominant in Jewish cities of the time (MTT 11:21).

The Phoenicians were the first people to introduce an alphabet as we now know it, with 22 symbols for different sounds (as in the Hebrew, they had no letters for vowels). This was a great advance over the hieroglyphs of the Egyptians or the cuneiform characters of Mesopotamia.

When you read your Bible, remember that we learned our alphabet from the Phoenicians.

The word for our holy book, "Bible" is a Phoenician word. These people had a town named Byblos which was renowned for its trade in papyrus and for its use of script. Eventually the idea "book" became identified with the name of the town. When rabbis translated the Hebrew writings into Greek for the first time, they gave the book the name "Bible."

The Hebrews had received exact indications from God about building a sanctuary to Him, but they did not know how to construct such huge edifices. They learned it from the Phoenicians, from Hiram, King of Tyre (1 Kings 5).

The Lebanese of today are the successors of the Phoenicians. Remembering in love the heritage we received from the Jews, let us remember in love this people also.

94 The Need for Theological Clashes

Paul quarreled with Peter and Barnabas in matters involving doctrine and church leadership. He taught us to reject heretics (TIT 3:10). Apostle John likewise advises us not to receive into our house anyone who brings a false doctrine (2JN 10).

In later ages the difference between Christian truth and heresy became blurred. At Interlaken, Switzerland, two rivers merge, one thick with salt and mud, and the other pure. For a time they run in the new bed without mingling, as if there were a border between them. But finally they merge. The mud triumphs, invading everything.

It is difficult to distinguish water from mud, but this filtration must be made. Truth alone frees us. Theological error only compounds bondage. Debates and clashes on religious issues were not avoided in the time of the apostles and they cannot be avoided now.

Immediately after the Reformation the newly-founded Protestant church was torn by four main theological quarrels:

(1) The fight against antinomians led by Agricola. ~Nomos~ is the Greek word for law. The antinomians asserted that law should only be the business of magistrates, and should play no role in religion. Luther opposed them, saying that law comes from God and must be respected under the new covenant.

(2) Schwenkfeld and Osiander did not believe that Christ's righteousness can be ascribed to us. They believed that in order to be justified before God, we must have an essential righteousness of our own, and that Christ cannot manifest himself fully in us because of our inherent sinfulness. Luther taught to rely totally on Christ for our salvation.

(3) Professor Major and Amsdorf went so far in denying any human merit in salvation that they declared good deeds as harmful for those who wish to obtain eternal life. Luther believed that good deeds are the natural fruits of faith.

(4) The great synergetic quarrel started by Melanchthon who granted the human will a part in our salvation. Our will for the good, he said, is not dead, but only sick, and can still cooperate with the Holy Spirit. In opposition to him Flavius believed that fallen man can only oppose divine endeavor, and God forces us to be saved. Luther kept the golden middle with his doctrine that our will plays no active role in salvation, but can participate by suffering, receiving, and accepting it.

We have to endure theology and pass beyond it to love our brethren. Theology can only be endured. It is repugnant to make the word of God a matter of debate, most often of low quality. But there are many repugnant things a man cannot avoid. We have to orientate ourselves among the different tendencies in religious thought. If we are unable to recognize heresy, neither will we be able to discern the truth.

We therefore have to accept the strife among believers both in the past and those today, but in this, as in all other matters, right measure is the most important Christian value.

95 The Holiness of Sex

In the modern world the sexual organs are commonly the objects of greedy desire, obscenity and dirty jokes. In biblical times the sexual organ was held in such honor that oaths were given on it, as today some people would swear on the Bible or on the crucifix. "Abraham said unto his eldest servant ... Put, I pray thee, thy hand under my thigh and I will make thee swear" (GEN 24:2-3).

The usual biblical name for the male organ is "vessel," and for the female, ~boshet~, or "shame," in the sense that it is shameful to speak about it in a degrading manner.

These are the organs of procreation. Understand clearly the meaning of this word. We ~pro-create~. We create in behalf of God. When God wishes another human being, He assigns a male and female the high calling of creating it. Among the people of God, sexual union is considered sacred. Isaiah wrote, "I took unto me faithful witnesses to record, Uriah the priest and Zechariah the son of Jeberechiah, and I went unto the prophetess and she conceived" (ISA 8:1-2). In this instance the sexual act was performed like a religious ceremony, under the supervision of a priest.

The standard of social justice in the Bible was high, with the result that there was no occasion for sexual impurity in Israel. Today rich men contribute to sexual immorality not only by overt sexual wrongs, but by driving thousands of girls into prostitution by paying unjust wages.

The New Testament begins by recording a long series of sexual acts: "Abraham begot Isaac and Isaac begot Jacob" and so on (MTT 1:2). Some of these unions were illegitimate, but what distinguished them all from ordinary sexual intercourse was the aim pursued in them. Abraham begot ~Isaac~.

Modern people mate without giving any thought to the personality which might result. But Abraham and Sarah's purpose was to bring into life a child of a certain character who would further bear the seed of the Messiah to come.

Leah, when she was past the age of bearing, gave her handmaid to her husband that the holy seed of Jacob should not be lost. Later she herself gave birth to a son, saying, "God hath given me my hire, because I have given my maiden to my husband" (GEN 30:9-18).

Let us also treat sexuality with deep respect; let us procreate with reverence and for the purpose of bringing new servants of God into the world.

This does not mean however that sexual union should not be pleasurable. Dietrich Bonhoeffer expressed it well when he wrote, "To long for the transcendent when you are in your wife's arms is, to put it mildly, a lack of taste, and it is certainly not what God expects of us. We ought to find God and love Him in the blessings He sends us. If He pleases to grant us some overwhelmingly earthly bliss, we ought not to try to be more religious than God himself."

96 Unusual Letters in the Bible

The original manuscripts of the Bible do not have upper- and lower-case letters; all letters are of equal size. However, there are some exceptions in Hebrew which have nothing in common with English orthographic rules prescribing the use of capital letters for God, proper names or the names of countries. In the German language, ~all~ substantives begin with a capital letter.

In the Hebrew Old Testament, only in some 35 places are letters of unusual size used, either bigger, smaller or above the line, to alert the reader to special paragraphs which were considered very important. For example, in RUT 3:13, the word "lini" which means tarry is written with a bigger "L" because it is very necessary for believers to learn to tarry. Boaz said to Ruth at midnight, "Tarry this night, and it shall be in the morning ..." In other words, do not be in a hurry. Do not try to achieve things under adverse circumstances. ~Tarry~. A beautiful morning will come; Boaz will marry Ruth; David and later on Jesus will be descendants of this marriage. "Tarry" is written here with the only bigger "L" in the Bible.

Jesus believed not in the verbal but the literal accuracy of Scripture. He said, "... one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law ..." (MTT 5:18). Historic events since then have proved that He was right.

St. Athanasius fought against the heretic Arius for an "i." Arius said that Christ is "homoiusios," of similar substance with the father. Athanasius said that he is "homousios," of the same substance. Had Arius' "i" been accepted, the whole Church would have gone astray.

Believe in every letter of Scripture, even the size. It is no accident that the Communists oblige people to write "God" with a small "g," and that Solzhenitsyn refused to have his novel published if the word were not printed with a capital "G."

97 What Is the Truth?

The Hebrew word for truth, ~emeth~, is used for many other notions which, if practiced, bring the truth with them. ~Emeth~ also means "perseverance," "reliability," or"faithfulness." It is impossible to attain the truth without possessing these qualities as well. Persevere in forgiveness and humility, enable God to rely on your self-denial, and you will not have to seek truth. It will seek you.

A girl had an illegitimate child. Wishing to shield her lover from the anger of her father, she accused the pastor of being the guilty one. The girl's father came to church one Sunday morning with the baby, thrust it into the arms of the pastor and shouted, "Here, villain, take your bastard. You are a whoremonger." Astonished, the congregation waited for the pastor to defend himself. Instead he caressed the child and said, "So be it! What a beautiful boy. I will give him all my love." From then on the congregation shunned him. Earning his living by manual labor, he cared for the child. After many years, the girl felt remorse and confessed the truth to her father. The following Sunday the father publicly apologized to the former pastor who now sat on a bench in the rear of the church. "I apologize. I have been misguided; you are completely innocent" the father said. The pastor replied, "So be it. A handsome boy. I really like him. He is mine." Still not a word in his own defense; no explanation!

Faithfulness to the One who, when reviled, did not revile in return, who was silent before Pilate, though accused of the worst crimes. Men like this have the privilege of truth in religious matters.

But how much truth do these have?

What did Jesus mean when He said "I am the truth"? (JHN 14:6).

We have the truth in matters which can be repeated experimentally or about facts which can be documented unchallengeably. We have certain truths in mathematics, physics, etc. In most matters, objective truth is still beyond our reach.

A person must be very daring to assert he has the final objective truth in religion. Northern Europe is Lutheran; the Southwest is Catholic; the East, Orthodox; India, Hindu and the Middle East, Moslem. Can truth be geographically conditioned?

The most murderous influence in religious history has been the assumption of objective truth in religion. We have to live with relative truth, accepted by our minds as result of long heritage, education, climate, circumstances of life, and the interplay of historical events. As in other domains, we must rely largely on probability in some religious matters, too.

Some have broken with their heritage and have converted from other religions to Christianity. But how many religions did one examine before becoming a Christian? Converts are also limited in their choices. Biblical religion was inherited, not a matter of personal choice. Such expressions as "personal acceptance of Christ" or "a personal Savior" do not occur in the Scriptures. One cannot even find the word "personal." This may seem strange for modern believers who scoff when a man is Catholic or Protestant because it is the religion of his parents, without a personal search for the truth.

Biblical religion was also collective. One belonged first to a nation into which one was born, the Jewish one. Later one belonged to a collectivity, the church, which was advised to "bring up the children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord" (EPH 6:4), not leaving them to make the impossible choice among hundreds of religions when they became mature. Jude sets as our aim not a personal but a "common salvation" (Jude 3). At maturity you consciously adhere to what has been infused into you since birth.

Abraham's son, Ishmael was circumcised at the age of thirteen by his own consent. Another son, Isaac, received circumcision at the age of eight days, according to God's commandment. He decided nothing. His parents chose to enter him into the covenant with the Creator.

Reason made Ishmael practice a rite. Reason later caused him to mock his brother, the bearer of God's promises. Isaac received his religion not by personal choice, but through God's grace as bestowed upon a family called to become a great nation. He was God's choice. He possessed the truth.

Jesus is the truth in the sense that He always embodied the truth He taught. Jesus was identical with the road He walked, completely satisfied with the life He led. Therefore He IS the life.

We, on the other hand, are always in conflict with the truth we recognize; we hate the ways we have chosen for ourselves, or to which existence has led us, and we are dissatisfied with our lives. In contrast with this sinful attitude of ours, Jesus embodies complete acceptance of what God allotted to Him as human knowledge and a way of life. He had no inner conflict about the problems of existence. Let us follow Him in this.

If we can be faithful and persevere in following the small truths we know, the greater truth will gladly come to abide in us.

98 The Legitimacy of Questioning

The Bible is full of questions to put to God. Jeremiah asks "Wherefore doest thou forget us for ever and forsake us for so long time?" (LAM 5:20). The book concludes without answer, with the discouraging words, "Thou has utterly rejected us, thou art very wroth against us" (LAM 5:21).

Woe to a faith which does not question. Reason questions everything it sees and hears. Only a reason undedicated to God does not question who He is and what He does and what His intentions are. The answers we receive are as inconclusive as those of science. If matter and its constituent particles, the atoms, are mysterious, the more so is God, their Creator. He has given us a revelation which would not be worthy of Him if it were not also enigmatic.

The whole of reality can be comprehended only with the whole of our being. When we try to understand it with so small a part of ourselves as the intellect, it is unavoidable that we fail.

What is our relationship to God? Has He predestined everything? If so, what is our responsibility?

Jesus tells the parable of the sower. "A sower went out to sow his seed, and as he sowed, some fell by the wayside ... some fell upon a rock ... some among thorns ... others on good ground" (LUK 8:5-8). The harvests were brought in accordingly. In succeeding verses of the same chapter it is clearly revealed that the different types of ground symbolize different types of men.

We have been made to live in different circumstances with different innate characteristics, more or less favorable to spiritual development. Before ever sinning ourselves, we have been sinned against through the genes transmitted to us, through erroneous upbringing, or through others' mistakes. Other people, through no seeming merit of their own, have been privileged in heredity, education and experiences of the world.

God said, "Jacob have I loved and Esau have I hated ..." the children not being yet born, neither having done any good or evil, that the purpose of God according to election may stand (ROM 9:11-13). This means that the essential character (the seed) and the conditions (the soil) are determined.

But if we are destined to fall by the wayside where the fowls of the air can devour the seed, since we have been created with intelligence, could we not erect a scarecrow and save ourselves? If arid soil has been our allotment, could we not irrigate and fertilize?

It is natural that human reason questions whether everything is predestination or if there exists a bit of space for free will. The apocryphal book of Jesus ben Sirah replies: "Do not research thing which surpass your mind, and do not try to know things which are hidden. Reflect about things which are permitted; do not be busy with what is mysterious."

Mishna, a Jewish book of wisdom, says, "For whomsoever tries to solve the following four problems, 'What is above, what is below, what has been before the beginning of the world and what will be its end' - for those who do not respect the secrets of Godhead, it would have been better not to be born."

It is normal to ask questions and normal to shrink back from the depths these questions open. We will never fathom them. Therefore, although we continue to ask, we seek no answers in this life to all the questions, but just trust in a God of love.

If we can also rejoice in the fact that we have no answers, this shows we have reached the great truth known, alas, by few: the whole universe and all of life are great question marks. There can be no replies in this world, but only in the next.

A child in elementary school sometimes asks amazingly profound questions, answers to which cannot begin to be understood until the child reaches the university.

Let us wait patiently for life eternal and in the meantime let us act vigorously in love. All the "whys" and "ifs" will not help. Ask instead, "What can I do?" and "How can I improve on what I am?"

One of the answers you will receive at once is: "Rejoice about the existence of ever-to-be-asked and never-to-be-answered questions, about the whys and whethers. They are proof that we are not made only for earthly life but for eternity. For the time being, let it be with us as it is in the life of trees. To their questions, branches respond with flowers and fruits, not with words. Make roses blossom even on your crosses."

99 Is the First Chapter of the Bible Wrong?

God said, "Let there be light" on the first day of creation (GEN 1:3). Critics disparage the Bible on this account, asserting there cannot be light without the sun, which appeared only on the fourth day. But God, who could make the glowworm, phosphorescent matter and the aurora borealis, could surely cause light before making the sun.

Upon close examination, the words about the creation of light on the first day have a deeper sense, as does the whole first chapter of the Bible. I reproduce below the opening passage in Hebrew with the word-for-word translation in English:

Bereshit bara Elohim et hashamaim ve-et haarets

In the beginning created God (et) the heavens and (et) the earth.

This is the word-for-word translation except for ~et~, a word which has no English equivalent. This was originally written in Hebrew with the mute sound ~alef~ and the ~tav~, which is like our "t." The vocalizations were added in the Hebrew Bible only after many centuries. Aleph-tav could also stand for ~ot~, in which case the sentence would read, "In the beginning God created; a sign of this creation would be the heavens, and another sign, the earth." Such a translation would rightly convey the sense of the text, but would be open to question because, although ~ot~ can be written v, it is usually written aleph-vav-tav.

If we do not accept this explanation of the word ~et~, the problem of its meaning remains. The renowned Jewish medieval commentator Ibn Ezra says, "The particle ~et~ signifies the substance of the thing." Another Jewish scholar, Kimchi, agrees, adding that ~aleph~ and ~tav~ are the first and last letters of the alphabet. ~Et~ therefore indicates the beginning and end of all things (like the Alpha and Omega in Greek).

The meaning of the Bible's first sentence is then, "In the beginning God created the substance of heaven and earth." The Syriac version conveys this idea. St. Ephrtem the Syrian's interpretation is along these lines, too. God did not create a finished universe, but its essence, open to development. Such an interpretation would also elucidate the problem of the creation of light on the first day.

Nothing has a greater velocity than light. Thus God started the essence of the universe by creating the entity which has the greatest speed.

God said, "Let there be light," i.e., "Let us hurry with great speed towards the perfect kingdom!"

Later God said, "Let there be a firmament" (GEN 1:6). The word firmament suggests some kind of fixed vault dividing the skies from earth. The Hebrew text here uses the word ~rakiah~, best translated, "expanse," because it has as its root a verb which means "to stretch out." This rendering of the word ~rakiah~ also ties in with the notion of a universe created in its essence. Far from suggesting a firm vault, the idea of ~rakiah~ is a splendid presentiment of the modern theory according to which the universe is continually expanding, stretching out.

If a source of light is becoming nearer to you, then the whole spectrum of the light is shifted towards the violet; if the source is becoming more distant, then the whole spectrum is shifted towards the red, like the pitch of a train whistle which changes according to whether the train is approaching or receding.

The nearest cluster of stars, which is about 43 million light-years away, and which contains about 2,500 galaxies, has a shift corresponding to a speed of recession from us of 750 miles a second. The most distant cluster so far investigated has a red shift over one hundred times as great, corresponding to a speed of recession which is almost half the speed of light.

Thus does science report exactly what the Bible says, "God created heavens and stretched them out" (ISA 42:5).

The first chapter of the Bible is right. God created the ~rakiah~. Moreover, the fact that the story of creation starts with the making of light before the sun proves the Divine authorship of the Bible, for no human author would want to create such difficulties for himself.

100 About Prayer

Jesus taught us to cry day and night toward God (LUK 18:7). However, God should not be likened to some unrighteous judge from whom justice can be obtained only by wearing him out with insistent pleas.

Why is it written, "Pray ye the Lord of the harvest that he will send forth laborers into his harvest?" (MTT 9:38). If He is full of love, why does He not simply provide the laborers without waiting for our prayer?

We pray in order to obtain clarity. Only a life of prayer will teach you that neither questioning God nor theology have any part in prayer. Prayer will teach you to pass your life in silence, at the bosom of a God whom we cannot fully understand .

When extreme need or threat arises, it is good to cry. Nobody whispers when threatened by a dragon. God says to Samuel, "their cry has come unto me" (1SM 9:16). If the cry is missing, the realization of our great danger in this valley is missing. But after the cry the silence returns.

It is a good biblical custom to ask for signs from God. Jonathan says to his arms bearer, "If the Philistines tell us, 'Tarry until we come unto you,' then we will stand still in our place ... but if they say thus, 'come up unto us,' then we will go up, for the Lord has delivered them into our hand" (1SM 14:9-10). Ask for certain concrete things, as Jonathan asked for guidance in initiating a battle against his enemy. Make it clear what sign you wish and consider receiving the sign as guidance. You can even ask for answers to concrete questions as David does in 1SM 23:10-12.

Let prayer for others, even for great sinners, be one of defense. Rabbi Nehemiah said, "When the Israelites constructed and worshiped the golden calf, Moses sought to appease God's anger, saying, "Lord of the universe, they have made an assistant for you. Why should You be angry with them? This calf will assist You: You will cause the sun to shine and the calf will cause the moon to shine; You will take care of the stars and the calf will take care of the planets; You will cause the dew to fall and the calf will make the winds to blow; You will cause the rain to fall and the calf will cause vegetation to sprout." The Holy One, praised be He, said to Moses, "You are making the same mistake that the people are making! This calf is not real!" Moses then replied, "If that is so, why should You be angry with Your children?" (Exodus Rabbah).

Let your words with God also be wise and convincing.

A man can pray in any decent bodily position. Those with high calling sometimes use what we would call advanced yoga positions, like Elijah who put his face between his knees, which is possible only after much physical exercise (1KI 18:42).

Use your eyes in prayer. I do not know how the custom of closing your eyes in prayer arose. Jesus' habit was to lift them. The bridegroom in Solomon's song says to his bride, "Thou has ravished my heart with one of thine eyes" (SOS 4:9). ("Having ravished the heart" is expressed by the single Hebrew word ~levavtini~, which is the strongest word for uniting two hearts.)

Jesus is attentive to our eyes while we pray. He observed that a publican, "would not lift up so much as his eyes unto heaven," knowing his own sinfulness, and says, "this man went down to his house justified" (LUK 18:13-14).

At other times, believers show God great love through the expression in their eyes. Learn to use your eyes correctly in your communion with God and with men.

[The following is from the back cover of the book:]

'I try to put into these sermons my deepest, perhaps my ultimate dying thoughts. I preach only because it is in my character to do so, as it is in the nature of nightingales to sing.'

Imprisoned for three years beneath the ground in solitary confinement, Pastor Richard Wurmbrand composed sermons, delivered every night to an unseen congregation. He committed them to memory by summarizing them in rhymes.

These previously unpublished sermons, the fruit of Wurmbrand's extreme deprivations, demonstrate in a new, personal and stimulating way the relevance of the Bible for today, and reveal unique insights into the character of God.

Born in Rumania, Jewish Christian Richard Wurmbrand now lives in the United States. He is the author of ~From the Lips of Children~, ~If Prison Walls Could Speak~ and ~Sermons from Solitary Confinement~.

Prologue

This is a book arising from a completely idle life, a life in solitary confinement in a Communist jail in Bucharest. I spent three of my fourteen years of prison alone in a cell, thirty feet below ground, with fifty pounds of chains on my feet and manacles on my hands, without ever seeing the sun, moon, stars, rain, or flowers, without paper or pencil, book or newspaper, let alone the Bible.

I never heard the slightest noise. The guards wore felt-soled shoes, and one could not hear their approach.

I never saw a human face except for the torturers, whose visage was something less than human.

I never saw a color. I forgot that colors exist - violet, blue, red, yellow. Always I saw only the grey walls and my dull grey uniform.

Today thousands of Christians, Jews and other innocents are in a similar situation in Vietnamese, Chinese, Soviet, Mozambique, Ugandan prisons. They have long since ceased to ask themselves the usual questions that are in the minds of men. Instead, they ask, Do I live or vegetate? Is what I experience still existence? Is the whole of life only a nightmare? Does a God exist? Does existence exist? If God exists, so what? What is the good of His existing if He does not help us? If He cannot overthrow evil, how could He make a world?

During my years of solitary confinement I composed 350 sermons. I created them in my mind, because I could not write them down. I delivered them every night to an unseen audience. I also committed them to memory by using the simple mnemonic device of summarizing them in short rhymes, which I repeated again and again.

When I was released from prison I did not sleep until I had committed all of them to paper. I managed to do so for 348 out of the 350.

As one puts a bouillon cube in boiling water to make soup, so I have diluted these very concentrated rhymes and reconstructed more or less my sermons.

It has not been difficult for me to reposition myself again in the atmosphere of that solitary cell, because even while free I continue to live in prison. I read only about the suffering Church. I write and preach about her, I work for her, I dream about her. Though the Jews left Egypt, Egypt did not leave the Jews. Whoever has passed through long years of imprisonment remains a prisoner even after he has been freed.

Some of the sermons I preached to my invisible congregation have already been published in two volumes, ~Sermons in Solitary Confinement~ and ~If Prison Walls Could Speak~, which have been well received. Many readers have said they were edified. This is what encourages me to present a few more sermons delivered under those exceptional circumstances.

These sermons focus on the fundamental questions that torment every man in his subconscious. When one is faced with them under special circumstances as I have been, one realizes that all other so-called "practical" thoughts about material or spiritual life are more often an escape from these ultimate concerns that plague the soul.

Thoreau says, "The art of life, of a poet's life, is, having nothing to do, to do something." Many great works of poetry have come out of a life of idleness, about which others have wondered. My idleness in the solitary cell has helped me to formulate questions. No answers are needed.

A man went to his pastor asking advice about some difficult problems. The pastor replied, "Kneel in church for two hours and you will have the answer."

The man said, "Do you really believe that the good Lord will appear to me in two hours' time and clarify my thinking?"

"No," said the pastor, "but you will realize in that time that you can live well enough with the questions unanswered and keep perfect trust in life."

This is the conclusion I have reached, too.

Jesus asked on the cross, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" No angel came with a reply, but He was enabled to bear heroically the pain of the mystery together with the physical pain and end His earthly life with the triumphant shout, "Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit."

I hope my book will serve you to this end.

page 10 ALONE WITH GOD

page 11 How We Pass the Time

DEAR BRETHREN AND SISTERS

I am sure you would like to know how we spend our time in prison. I must say, it passes quickly.

When I thought about the possibility of going to prison and heard stories of food deprivation and starvation, I was fearful. Now I realize that hunger is easy to bear. Sometimes a well-intentioned rich man thinks about the hunger of the poor more than the poor man thinks about it. Man has often dwelt in situations where food resources were scarce. Hunger has been the rule, satiety the exception. So man has elaborated mechanisms of adaptation to hunger. A Huguenot once survived forty-six years in prison. She probably did not have much to eat during that period, yet she survived.

I am not preoccupied with hunger.

For one thing, I travel a lot. Sometimes I hover for hours over Africa. I can see its darkness, its dense, dimly lighted jungles inhabited by wicked demons. I see Israel, the Arab countries, India, China, the vast ant-hill of Asia, a place of many crimes and few altars. I fly over Australia, Polynesia, the New Hebrides.

I remember reading how Patton brought the New Hebrides to Christ. Has his work remained? For years he preached in vain. Then he dug a well. When the natives asked him what he was doing and he explained, they laughed him to scorn. "Water comes only from above. It cannot come from below," they assured him. But it came. And when they saw it, they accepted Christ and all the teachings of the Church, though there exists not the slightest connection between the drawing of water from a well and the cleansing of sins through the blood of Christ.

Have Communists come in the meantime and shown them some greater "miracle," perhaps a tractor, which might convince them that the whole philosophy of Marx is true? Such are the foundations of vast systems of thought accepted by men. A boy enamored of a Catholic girl will accept the dogma of the Pope's infallibility, of the bodily assumption of Mary, and of transubstantiation. He may believe in it sincerely. He might even be ready to suffer for it later. But the point of departure of his convictions is valueless.

I pass to America, the hope of the world for liberty, a hope which will deceive. I can see Scandinavia, England, Russia, France, Europe, the place of constant senseless wars in which nobody is ready to make the gesture of extending the first hand of real friendship.

But I travel even further. I have this trivial globe, and mankind. There are other stars and other beings and other endeavors to stem the stream of evil.

From my stellar pulpit the whole world is my parish. I pray for all of it, though from a practical standpoint I can be only a rank-and-file soldier on a very small sector of the front.

Nobody can fight without interruption. I tap the Gospel by Morse code through the wall. But I must also have some relaxation. The discussions by code embrace many topics: religion, politics, and stories from private life. Sometimes a prisoner simply entertains by telling a joke.

Tonight I heard a good one:

page 13 ALONE WITH GOD

Three men sat in a prison cell and asked each other why they had been arrested. One said, "I was arrested for sabotage."

"What did the sabotage consist of?"

"I came to my job five minutes late."

"And why are you in prison?"

"I am in for spying."

"And what did the spying consist of?"

"I came to the factory five minutes early, and they thought I was trying to spy on its secrets."

Then the third was asked, "Why are you in prison?"

"Because I came to work punctually, which meant that I must have connections in the West who sent me a good watch."

I pay my dues to human nature and laugh a little. But I weep a little about the tragic background of this joke, because the three persons mentioned really sit in prison. Under Communism all roads lead to jail.

But then I remember that I have better things to do than amuse myself or brood about such things. I can spend some hours in the communion of saints. People usually imagine them to be somewhere far away, although the Bible tells us that they encompass us (HEB 12:1).

So I evoke the story of St. Gerard, a child who once went into the church to the statue of the holy virgin with the little Jesus and said to the Child: "I am so alone; I have no one to play with," whereupon Jesus descended from the statue and played with him. I recall the story of St. Bernard of C1airvaux, who also stood before a statue of Jesus and told Him how he loved Him and how he thirsted after the love of the Savior. His biography says that Jesus again descended from the statue and hugged St. Bernard.

That other men do not have the same experience as Gerard and Bernard of Clairvaux is their own fault! Every man can see outwardly only what he has within. He who harbors no God in his heart does not meet God, and he who denies the possibility of a saint having intimate contact with God neither plays with the child Jesus nor is hugged by Him. For a child, these stories reflect life, just like all other happenings. "Except ye become as little children..." said the Master.

I remember when my son Mihai first told me that he had seen Jesus walking through our rooms. He did not tell me this when it happened because it did not seem extraordinary to him. He told me a few months or perhaps a year later. The supernatural was the natural in our home.

I spend my hour among these beauties. Whoever does not deliberately choose them will pass his time in ugliness. Modern art expresses the ugliness of the human soul that has abandoned Christ and the saints.

It is said that a match-maker introduced a young man and a girl, who were intended to marry. The young man was indignant after seeing the girl and said: "How did you dare show her to me? She has only one eye, her nose is crooked, her lips are lop-sided. She is thick as a barrel but has a very thin neck. Her hands are much too short. I cannot marry such a girl!"

The match-maker replied, "Well, what should I do with you if you are a man who does not appreciate Picasso?"

Communism is to politics what Picasso is to art. As he distorts his models on canvas, the Communists contort the bodies of their adversaries.

A Communist officer told me, "If God created man he created him to be tortured. This is obvious. There are some four or five zones of the human body whose touch produces pleasure. But there is not an inch of the human body which cannot ache. You can torture a man by pulling his hair or by beating him on the soles of his feet. Man is created for torture, and I merely fulfill the Creator's will."

When you ask them why they beat, they laugh and give their standard reply, that boys' tops cease to spin if they are not whipped. And man and a wooden toy are all the same to them! Another standard reply is that the more heads you cut off, the taller you appear yourself! And that is exactly what they did in Romania, cutting off the heads of not only their adversaries but even their comrades who were competitors.

You try to counter with an obvious argument: "You have two sets of doctrines which do not square with one another: on one side Communism, which means even etymologically 'to seek the good of the community,' and on the other hand this treading on human individuals and their rights." The police officers reply indifferently, "What if the doctrines do not square? We have methods to make them square. Everything squares under a whip."

They use this whip a great deal. They enjoy ugliness. I enjoy beauty.

And so between a whipping and a joke, a pleasant journey and immobilization in heavy chains, between hunger and philosophizing that it is easy to bear (if so, why do I have to convince myself about this easiness?) between the communion of saints and the mockeries of devils unleashed against us, the time passes quickly.

Don't worry about us. All things will pass. This too will pass. Amen.

page 16 Desire To Escape From the "I"

DEAR BRETHREN AND SISTERS

In at least one respect I am like St. Anthony the Great. He never washed himself. I did not take a bath in years either. He slept in a tomb in order to remind himself constantly that this is the abode in which all earthly life inevitably ends. My cell is also like a tomb. It is thirty feet beneath the earth. The few planks which constitute my bed could as well become my coffin. I don't fear death. I am in a tomb without having died.

What will be my future?

At this moment I am completely useless. My life consists of eating watery soups and getting endless beatings. The sticks are all alike. They make the same noise when they fall upon my back. The pain does not impress me much any more. Nothing ever happens in my life. Why should I wish to prolong my existence in this world? That I may be released? Of what use can a broken man be in freedom?

And if I recover? I will deliver some sermons again. Previously, when preaching on the subject of the blood of Christ, I had contemplated how to form the sentences more beautifully, instead of feeling the horror of Christ's suffering and living the love which prompted Him to endure it. In one of the first Christian sermons I ever heard, the pastor yawned while preaching about Calvary. How unlike Dickens who, while reporting for a newspaper a speech in Parliament on the sufferings of the poor in Ireland, was so overcome that he was unable to take it down in shorthand.

A man speaks about the sufferings of a poor God and yawns. No wonder the audience yawned too. Pastors and flocks are fed up. They are also fed up with good sermons. They are too wise. Fools for Christ are needed, but I am not one of them. I don't see any point in being free.

Neither do I wish to keep my "I" in eternity. Why should I care for life after death when I have none before death? My "I" has simply become uninteresting to me. I am as little concerned about its eternal destiny as about what will happen to it tomorrow. I wish to be an "I" no longer. I reject my "I." My desire is to be a "he." "When he shall appear, we shall be like him" (1JN 3:2).

I once brought to Christ a Jew who was over ninety years old. He told me of a dream in which he saw himself in heaven and asked, "Where is Wurmbrand's place?" But he received no answer. The question was probably still pending. At least, that was what I thought when he told me his dream. Now I am inclined to think that there will be no "Me" there. Why should I care about receiving a crown, which I will cast at His feet anyway, over-awed by His majesty when I see Him? (REV 4:10). Is it not best to finish completely with the "I" and become "He"?

There was a time when I was obsessed with erotic fantasy. My head was a merry-go-round of lustful images. At first I fought against them in vain. Then I said to myself that if marriage is a symbol of the union between Christ and His Church, erotic imagination and love-play, which are basic to marriage, might also have a holy sense. When I stopped worrying about these fancies, they lost their importance.

Now my conscience has been almost freed from existence. It is independent of the "I" and lives the imaginary life of being "He."

Is this sheer madness, like so many other things happening to me, or am I one of the privileged few who have fulfilled the commandment of Christ to deny the "self"? But if I have denied the self, who is the one interested in knowing if this has really happened? Who then is happy that the denial of the "I" has occurred? We are running around in a vicious circle. One must have a very strong "I" and be a giant in faith to reject his "I," which is not only all that he has but also all that he is. Whoever burns the candle at both ends must have a great and glorious candle to burn. And what happens to the strong "I" who has rejected the "I"?

Jesus did not have the rich psychological vocabulary we have. He could not have spoken in Hebrew about the self, the ego, the id, the many complexes we worry about today.

I have always used Biblical language, speaking exactly as Scripture does about denying the self. In more precise modern language, I imagine that what Jesus meant us to leave was the ego.

In my dealings with people I have discovered that you don't impress them by showing how smart you are. You win them rather by sitting at their feet and giving them a chance to teach you. Even an idiot can teach something. The usual attendance in churches is composed of men of lower IQ than that of a pastor. If the pastor does not know stupidity but only intelligence, he will not be fruitful.

We have to learn from another to raise his ego. The ego is the desire to be superior. It is the high opinion one holds about oneself and one's achievements. I don't believe as does Freud that the strongest desire of a man is the sexual urge, though it is enormous. The strongest desire is to uphold his ego, to appear valuable before his fellowmen.

Respect another's ego, but renounce your own. I believe this is what was meant by Jesus' commandment to deny the self.

There is a tension in us because the ego is torn apart in the effort to present a more beautiful image before the world. Tension ceases when we become indifferent to what people think about us. I have been a pastor much beloved by my family and my congregation, and much hated by anti-Christian Jews because of my missionary work to win Jews for Christ. Now I am only despised and mocked by every man with whom I speak, because I speak only with wardens and interrogators. What do their opinions count? For Juliet it was enough to be loved by one single young man in Verona. Others might have passed near this girl of fourteen without even casting a glance at her. She was happy.

I don't know how much I have achieved, but I wish to lose not the self - I have come to the conclusion that such an endeavor is chasing after the impossible - but self-assertion. The Tao-Te-King says, "Clay is moulded into a vessel, but the ultimate use of the vessel depends upon the part where nothing exists. Doors and windows are cut out of the wall of a house, but the ultimate use of the house depends upon the parts where nothing exists." I wish to become such a useful nothing.

I am in the lowest social category, a man who will probably die in prison, sentenced for crime. But I am content to be so low. I have so little to renounce now. It seems ridiculous even to attempt to give up self-assertion. What have I to assert and before whom?

For a long time I have played with the ideas of what I would do if I were a pope, a king, a polar explorer, again a little child. Then I became pious and thought about the eternal salvation of what I recognize to have been my ego. Now I fancy only to be "He." I don't strive to be He. I believe I am. Psychotherapists would call it the Messiah complex. Well, they would have applied the same diagnosis to Him, and they would not even have been mistaken. He really believed He was the Messiah. And I believe I belong to His body, as much as His brain and His heart belonged to His body during His earthly life. Every part of Him was He. And I am He. Luther wrote "The Christian is Christ." Only this He lives eternally. He does not need the appendix of a little "I."

When Michelangelo finished his Pieta, he exclaimed, "Only the marble separates me from my statue." I would say, "Only 120 pounds of flesh separate me from being fully He."

"To the only wise God our Savior, be glory and majesty, dominion and power, both now and ever. Amen."

page 21 To Know The Holy Thing

MY BELOVED

It is only natural that nobody knows about these sermons of mine. People live during the day on words. I speak silences during the night.

We have been put in subterranean cells, thirty feet below the surface, where no noise is heard. Our captors did not know that ascetics have always sought out solitude, silence, eventlessness, a life in which nothing disturbs the spirit, as ideal circumstances for their development.

For me it is all right to be in a cavern, locked away. Thoughts can pass through thick walls. And it is ideal to have a life without events. A man from a neighboring cell asks, "What day is it?" I can give the answer, "Every day God is my date. I have no other."

Nor is silence a torture for me. Jews have been prepared for silence even through their language.

The Hebrew language has silent letters. The ~Aleph~, first letter of the alphabet, is a scarcely audible breathing, and the ~ayin~ a trifle stronger breathing but still almost inaudible.

The Lord said to John, "I am the Alpha and the Omega" (REV 21:6). This is how the words appear in the Greek New Testament. But Jesus and St. John were both Jews, so they probably spoke Hebrew. How would Jesus have said that he is the ~Aleph~? Would he have pronounced the name of the letter, or would he have simply breathed on the apostle as He had done on another occasion, and would this breath have been the ~aleph~? As for the ~tav~, the last letter of the Hebrew alphabet, it was written at that time as a cross. Would Jesus have made the sign of the cross? When did this sign begin to be used as a holy sign? We find an abundance of crosses in the catacombs, perhaps as a result of this conversation.

There are different signs written below and above the Hebrew letters to make them pronounceable. They are what we would call vowels in other languages. But not all of these can be heard. The ~shevah~, the first "vowel" of the Hebrew Bible, is in reality only a half-vowel. It is a very short "e." A half-vowel (hataph-segol) begins the name of God, ~Elohim~. ~Brit~, the Hebrew word for "covenant," also has a half-vowel at the beginning. It has to be pronounced quickly. It is as if the structure of the Hebrew language itself would teach one to speak little about holy things. One learns most about them in silence.

The name which we spell "Jehovah" starts in Hebrew with a very short vowel almost without forming the lips for it and finished with a silent "h." By the way, Jehovah, like all substantives and names ending with a "h," is a feminine name. Jeshuah, the name of Jesus in Hebrew, is also a feminine name. It is like calling a boy "Helen" or "June."

The earliest evidence of man's religion, outside the Biblical line, is the worship of the female. Archaeologists have dug up a whole galaxy of female figures from about 2500 B.C., usually of naked women, standing or seated, often pregnant. The earliest temple compounds in the whole world, dating from around 3000 B.C. in Mesopotamia were dedicated to the worship of the Mother, some temples even being suggestively of oval form. The first recorded extra-Biblical divine being was a goddess. The word for Spirit in Hebrew, ~ruah~, is a feminine substantive.

I had never thought about these things before imprisonment. Now they have become extremely important to me. Protestants have weighed exaggerated veneration of the virgin Mary against the teaching of the Scriptures. It is like judging the loud cries of tortured men with Bible verses teaching soft speech. This great veneration for and appeal to Mary must have originated with men who suffered terrible deprivations and at the same time passed through a dark night of the soul in which they could not apprehend the nearness of Jesus. In an extremity of torture, prisoners always cry, "Mother."

I have deviated completely from what I had intended to say. It is because for the first time I preach what I think. In the pulpit, pastors preach what they have thought of in their study while preparing their sermons. Congregations would wonder very much if one Sunday morning their pastors were to tell all the wandering thoughts that pass through their minds as they give their prepared message. They have doubts just when they preach certainties, attractions towards a sin just when they thunder against it. They surely would not thunder if it did not exercise such an attraction.

But you must bear with me. I come back now to my subject.

The surroundings of our solitary confinement are conducive to silence. The wardens have felt-soled shoes. We do not hear them walking up and down the corridor. They rarely speak to us. Everyone sits alone in his cell without any book or writing material and, according to his preparation, broods or meditates, loses himself in erotic imagination or makes practical plans for an uncertain future.

Rarely do we hear the cry of somebody being beaten because there are special rooms for beatings and torture somewhere else. Sometimes we hear the ravings of someone who has gone mad. But he would be quickly gagged or given some injection. And then again, silence.

The only real and more constant interruption of the silence is the "telephone," the tapping signals in Morse code through the walls or the pipes of the central heating. Usually the wardens do not disturb this. They know our codes and are interested in listening in on what we communicate to each other. There are always the naive few who allow some secrets to slip through their communications.

The number one topic of all conversations is divining when and how the Americans will come. We set dates by which time we feel we surely will have been freed. With absolutely no possibility of obtaining real information, except perhaps on a bit of paper found in the toilet or from a prisoner arrested six months before, nevertheless we tap to each other estimates and commentaries on the most "recent" sensational events.

Frogs living in a well discuss the ocean they never saw. Insects living only a summer talk about skiing. Men existing in tiny subterranean cells with minds long since gone mad philosophize about the effects of world events on them, events of which they know nothing.

The conversations do not last long. The invasion of sound gives way to the deep silence in which I can meditate I do not desire to be free. I ~am~ free. The tyrant of Syracuse once went to the slave-philosopher Epictetus and told him, "I'll pay the ransom for you and you will be liberated."

page 25 ALONE WITH GOD

Epictetus replied, "Why do you care about me? Free yourself."

"But I am a king," said the amazed tyrant.

"This I contest," was the answer of the philosopher. "He who masters his passions is a king even while in chains. He who is ruled by his passions is a slave even while sitting on a throne."

Real freedom does not depend upon external circumstances. There exists the wonderful liberty of which the children of God partake, even when in straitened circumstances or trammeled by prison walls.

I am not freed of passions but I am free from the desire to know trifles. What matters when I will be free? The period since my birth has been brief. In the millennia before I was born the world went on without considering my presence in it important. I am sure that events continue their course undisturbed by my absence.

Nor do I wish to know other things. I wish to know only "the holy thing" about which Luke speaks in mystery (LUK 1:35). One day of His, one day of being ~with~ Him, is worth a lifetime of knowledge about Him, which is putting into human words the inexpressible.

Why my Beloved keeps me in prison I do not know. But I remember from ~A Midsummer Night's Dream~, which I consider the profoundest of Shakespeare's plays, these words: "The course of true love never did run smooth ... (To be crossed is) as due to love as thoughts and dreams and sighs, wishes and tears." There has never been a great love without its share of enigma and drama. So also is the love between Jesus and me. Let Him do as He likes. Reason will never fathom His ways. Genera11y "reason and love keep little company."

God did not free Daniel. He left him in the lions' den until he was freed by Darius, who threw him there. Perhaps I too will be freed by the Communists, not by the Americans or the miraculous intervention of God. But I do not lose much time thinking about this.

I wish to know God in the supreme sense. The Hebrew word for "to know," ~iada~, and the Greek ~gnosis~ are both used also for union between husband and wife. I wish to know him intimately, to have the beatific vision, to see "the holy thing" in its fullness.

Life and death depend upon this.

I once told a Jewish boy of twelve, "If Jesus is the Messiah and you reject Him, your soul will be eternally lost," to which he answered earnestly, "But it is also the other way around. If Jesus is not the Messiah and you adore Him, you are eternally lost." And so we sat down to find out which of us was right.

The life of Saul of Tarsus, the persecutor, centered around Jesus long before he met Him on the road to Damascus. He had ordered Christians to be killed. Whether Saul was a national hero fighting against a dangerous impostor or a killer of innocent believers in the true Savior depended upon the reality of the vision he had before his eyes.

Mary Magdalene waited at the tomb of Jesus. He had forgiven her many sins. Everything depended on what would happen that Sunday morning. If He were resurrected, the remission of sins granted by Him was valid. If He remained entombed, her sins would return and she would have added to her former transgressions the grave offence of having followed a false Messiah.

I am in the same situation. If Jesus is not the Truth, I will have squandered my life and youth in useless suffering. If He is, I will have gained everything.

Will he come once to free me from my doubts?

No thief could sleep if he knew that a sack of gold lay in the next room. I also spend one sleepless night after another. But some day I will get hold of "the holy thing."

page 27 ALONE WITH GOD

I surely prefer Communists to lukewarm, nominal Christians. If Jesus is not the Savior, if He was a deceiver or one deceived or, as some say, a psychopath, things cannot be left as they are. It becomes the duty of every honest man to go from door to door to warn men of the pernicious influence of Christianity.

He has to give Himself to me totally or I will reject Him totally. I will never be satisfied with glimpses, with possibilities and probabilities of truth. I must know Him. I must live in His embrace, or I will deny Him as One who does not give all He promises.

Tons of lead are shovelled and smelted in the hope of getting one grain of radium. Years of prison are not too much if once one may have one day with Him. His days are rare, as tungsten and vanadium are rare. His day comes slowly, but when it comes it will compensate for years lost in the darkness of prison cells.

On that day words will no longer mask contrary intentions. Truth will triumph. Human and divine natures will marry, as they are united in Him. We will see things as they are. I will know "the holy thing"; whether this happens in prison or in the bosom of my family will make no difference. Amen.

page 28 Morals Apart For The Elect

DEAR BRETHREN AND SISTERS

Truth is revolutionary. It even revolutionizes its own definition.

One thing comes up again and again. At every interrogation I tell the officer fairy tales: I invent stories to lead him astray. When he asks for concrete details and the names of those with whom I worked underground, I give him the names of people I know are abroad, of some who have died recently, or of their own top stooges within the Church. I usually succeed in making my story plausible, at least for a time, so as to delay a beating until they have checked all the names.

When I return to my cell, I am no longer alone. I have with me a preacher, Mr. Morals, who delivers long sermons about how wrong it is to lie. He quotes Spurgeon to me: "It is never right to do a little wrong to obtain the greatest possible good. Your duty is to do the right: consequences are with God." Or, "I have no right to commit a sin to increase usefulness. I have to be righteous even if it undoes usefulness." I wonder why my Mr. Morals is such a boring preacher, always delivering the same sermon. I would like to hear him speak for a change about how stupid it is to betray brethren to the police while leaving "the consequences to God" - such consequences as hungry wives and orphaned children for whom nobody will care.

The authorities consider it complicity with a counter-revolutionist if you give a piece of bread to the child of a jailed Christian. Mr. Morals teaches that nobody should go against the law of the land, because it is wrong to break laws. The main thing to be concerned about is keeping the magnificent "I" righteous. The consequences belong to God. Let Him rain manna again for families of imprisoned Christians.

I have high respect for Mr. Morals. But I believe he delivers his sermon in the wrong place. I would make the proposal that he do some of his preaching to the Communists. Their questioning me about things which are not their concern is surely less moral than my giving deceptive answers.

I am a child of God. In most spheres God's children do not have the same moral standards as common men.

We love our enemies, whereas others consider it right to defeat them. We do the beautiful though unproductive deed: we squander money on costly perfume with which to anoint a Man who will be scourged and crucified tomorrow as a criminal. Others much more practical and better fitted than we to lead charitable, even Christian charitable, institutions condemn such squandering because the money is needed for the poor. Has not God Himself put it in our hearts to provide for them?

We are glad that Jesus is righteous, and we need not try to become righteous ourselves through any deed or attitude of our own.

The others are reasonable, of course. They choose between right and wrong, and they make the proper choice. We believe that all things work together for our good - St. Augustine adds: "even our sins" - and we don't make any choices.

Some have before them two ways: one leading to life, the other to death. We admire them when they step decidedly towards life. But for us death is abolished. The Lord told us, "Whosoever lives and believes in me shall never die" (JHN 11:26). We are utterly disinterested in this constant oscillation between two paths and hundreds of bypaths. Others exercise their will for good purposes. We don't believe in free will. We believe that right choices as well as their fulfillment are gifts from God, often given to those who seek them least.

I lie to my oppressors. Is truth an absolute obligation? Does the Bible always give the facts as they are? Does it not strain some truth, on occasion even yield truthfulness to love and respect?

I remember a verse from the book of Judges (JDG 18:30). I often thought about it, first, when Nazi persecution and, later, when Communist domination obliged us to prevaricate. In it Jonathan, an idolatrous priest in Israel (as a matter of fact the first), is called the son of Gershom. In the Hebrew original, in all the manuscripts, the name Manasseh is written here in a strange manner: [Hebrew characters not printed] The "n" is suspended above the line to show that it is an addition that veils some secret.

Gershom was a son of Moses. The first idolatrous priest was therefore a grandson of the lawgiver. The writer of the sacred book did not wish to do Moses the indignity of publicizing the fact. Therefore he changed the name Moses to Manasseh. In Hebrew it took the addition of just one letter. For the few who might understand the subtleties of Scripture and the reason why a letter would be written above the regular line, a reminder of the real fact was left. But the "n" in this position is not the same as a normal "n." A musical note written above a given line can change the whole tune.

Now, was it truth to call Gershom the son of Manasseh when he was actually the son of Moses? Does it please Truth when a great man of God is put to shame? Does she not rather rejoice when she sees respect for such a man?

Does Truth desire only fact, or is she enamored of other values as well, such as love for the brethren whom I have to protect from arrest? Does Truth consider herself more important than me? Once, using a piece of thread, I cut deeply into my flesh between the toes and did my best to infect the wounds with chalk, in the hope of gaining a better life in the infirmary. Did I offend Truth through this pretence?

The whole matter will have to be elaborated on much further.

The world teaches us to pretend, to be hypocrites. Jesus, too, teaches us to pretend, but with a difference. He does not teach us to show ourselves as we are. When you fast, He says, look like a man who is feasting; when you pray, let people think you are taking a nap; when you give alms, conceal the fact (MTT 6:1-6,16-18). This is holy deceit. Mr. Morals would condemn this. He would insist on the obligation to tell people exactly what you are doing. He would have rebuked the woman from Tekoah who fabricated a heart-rending story in order to convince David he should forgive his son Absalom, who had greatly sinned (2 Samuel 14). Is Truth so adamant in harshness that she would never yield to a fable in order that grace might conquer?

Jesus pretended. When He came to Emmaus, "He made as though he would have gone further," though in reality He wanted to stay with His disciples (LUK 24:28).

It just passes through my mind that if Michelangelo had not started as a genial forger, claiming that a sleeping (Cupid he had made was some old Greek sculpture, today we might not have his ~Pieta~. People might not have paid any attention to him.

Dare anyone condemn Desdemona, who died with a lie on her lips defending her beloved Othello, who had killed her just because he loved too much and had been the jealous victim of intrigue? Jesus Himself strained the truth at love's behest when He said, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." Every one of them knew how painful crucifixion was.

I believe that all the implications have not yet been drawn from the teachings of the Lord. The simple fact that the business of the merchants of religion doesn't prosper should show us that they don't squeeze out of their merchandise - religion - all the profit it can give. If they were to extract more wisdom from Jesus, they could then glean from the public much more interest in religion.

Jesus has given us His Word - one talent. We should make it ten talents. There are still new worlds to be discovered in the realm of Christian thought. To discover them we have to have courage to leave the secure shore of commonly accepted morals. I, on my part, will "lie" whenever necessary in order to protect my brethren.

THE ABSOLUTE DUTY OF TRUTHFULNESS

BELOVED BRETHREN AND SISTERS

A Jewess came to a rabbi and told him her troubles and pains. After weeping and sighing for an hour, she finally said, "Rabbi, I feel better now. My headache has disappeared."

"No, my daughter, it has not disappeared," said the rabbi. "Now I have it."

Since the time the Communists took over our country, we have had to start secret Christian activities, first within the Soviet army and then, when the terror began, among Romanians themselves. Secret activity is not possible without a certain amount of lying and deceit. The consciences of many Christians were troubled about this, but instead of living with their troubles, they put them on my shoulders. Their headaches became mine.

Now I lie at every interrogation. Through Morse code the prisoners from the cell nearby tell me that they do the same, but afterwards they feel as if they have sinned greatly and ask me what to do.

I know you all have the same problem, so I will tell you what I think in this matter.

If an authority, the state or your parent acts unjustly, your duty is to resist and oppose the authority. Don't ask me for Bible verses justifying this attitude. There exists a natural law for which no divine revelation is needed. In the Christian era, some men, like Thomas Aquinas for example, justified even the murder of tyrants in extreme cases. (See "Widerstandsrecht" by Ernst Wolf, in the dictionary ~Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart~, 3rd ed., vol. VI.) Luther also recognized this right of resistance.

Do you think your hands remain pure if you refrain from killing the tyrant? He may kill millions of innocents, as did Hitler, and you will be co-responsible if you could have prevented the carnage by destroying the tyrant and his clique of murderers.

The Lutheran bishop Eivind Berggrav of Norway, who sat in prison under the Nazi occupation, later said before the Lutheran World Federation, "If the authority becomes arbitrarily tyrannical, we have a demonic situation, which means a regime which is not submissive to God. It would be a sin to submit to a diabolic power. In such circumstances we have in principle the right to rebellion in one form or another."

If we have the right to resist the tyrant and to deny him the possibility of continuing to live, even more then do we have the right to oppose his inquisitive delving into what he is not entitled to know - the secret activities of the church. We can lie to the Communist persecutor.

Not that it ever becomes right to lie. But it is wrong to prefer your personal purity to responsibility for your neighbour. If you speak the truth, you put your brethren in prison. If you speak the truth, you make the existence of an underground church impossible and deprive whole nations of the Gospel. In order to avoid the guilt of having lied, we take upon ourselves a worse burden. Bonhoeffer said, "True innocence manifests itself just through entering into the communion of error out of love toward another."

We cannot assume the responsibility of telling the truth to tyrants, because it will help them torture and kill Christians. I will not justify lying either, but I will gladly accept its responsibility before God. I discover that I am able to live with my conscience after having lied.

Here we have a case in which one doesn't have a choice between good and evil, but only between two evils.

Though we sometimes have the duty to lie, still we have the absolute duty of truthfulness. It is a grave sin to trespass against either duty.

The duty to be truthful is obvious.

Christianity presents an incredible message that contradicts the whole of human experience, namely, that a virgin gave birth to the Son of God, that angels appeared and spoke to shepherds regarding the newborn Babe, that stars led wise men to His very house, that Jesus performed miracles as had no man before, that after having died on the cross, He was resurrected bodily and ascended to heaven.

St. Paul, when proclaiming this message to the heathen, offered as proof of its veracity the fact that most of these things regarding Jesus had been predicted by the Jewish prophets. At that time it was no easy matter to become a Christian. It could mean being thrown to the wild beasts. Every man had to think seriously before making such a decision. The most sensible approach would have been to ask the closest Jewish neighbour if his Scripures had really foretold all these facts about Jesus, to which the answer was invariably, "Jesus was a fake, an impostor, condemned as such by our high priests."

One can see the dilemma of Christianity in the Gospels themselves. The prophet Malachi had predicted that before the appearance of the Messiah, Elijah the prophet would come again. When this objection was brought to Jesus, He answered, "Elijah has come - he is John the Baptist." So priests and Levites were sent to inquire of John the Baptist, who flatly denied that he was Elijah, thus appearing to cancel all the claims of Jesus to be the Anointed.

Under these difficult circumstances it was of the utmost importance that every Christian be an example of truthfulness in private life. His character was the main accreditation of his strange faith. That is why Peter was so harsh to Ananias and Sapphira, who with an outright lie had pretended to be more self-sacrificing Christians than they really were. When discovered, each suffered a shock and died on the spot - as do primitive people today who violate a taboo.
Christians should be truth incarnate, in the full sense of the word. The Greek word for truth is ~aletheis~, which means "nothing hidden." The Hebrew word ~emet~ is composed of the first, middle and last letters of the alphabet, indicating that truth exists only when it is all of a piece from beginning to end, without any alteration or misrepresentation. Every half-truth is a full lie.
But somehow life leaves us all forsworn. I don't know a man who would never act or pretend. I can understand Ananias and Sapphira. They loved the Lord and His company. They wanted to belong and for this sacrificed the greatest part of their substance. They also reserved something for themselves because they sensed rightly that the first love of Christians would not last. Very soon financial quarrels would arise among them (Acts 6), and they might find themselves with nothing in their old age. Their thoughts were much too complicated to be told to enthusiastic apostles who had given away everything. Curiously, the name Sapphira means in Hebrew "calculation."

Peter, who had himself pretended to be a hero on the night of Jesus' betrayal, was harsh to them. Some time later, he was rebuked publicly by Paul for pretending to be faithful to the Jewish religion. John, the apostle, was very nearly befriended by the high priest, who hated Jesus. For such treatment he must have indulged in some prevarication.

Life is impossible without the theatre of courtesy, gentleness, good manners – the niceties which never correspond entirely to the state of the heart. So, then, absolute truthfulness is necessary and absolute truthfulness is impossible. How can we resolve this problem?

In a sense, every man's life is a pretence because to be an "I," a separate entity, is a lie. Jesus said you must deny yourself (LUK 9:23), that is, acknowledge the unreality of the "I," which is no more than the point of convergence of a multitude of hereditary features, of social influences, of the impact of good and evil spirits, of works of nature, and so on. A Hindu once asked a child, "Break open that fruit and what will you see in it?"

"Seeds," came the reply.

"Break open the seeds and what do you see?"

"Nothing."

The Hindu said, "When there is a nothing, a tree grows."

Your pretence will cease only with your denying the "I." Then truth will grow on your boughs.

Constantine the Great suffered terrible remorse about having killed his son. He asked all kinds of heathen priests and philosophers if there were forgiveness for him. He received only negative replies. Then he asked the Christians, and they told him how easy it is to receive forgiveness. On whom does the sin lie? On the "I," but the lie of its existence can easily be detected. The "I" can be denied. Then only Christ remains. He gladly bears the responsibility of everything which has ever happened. He is the Lamb which has taken away the sin of the world. He said, "I am the truth."

Therefore, when the "I" is denied, only the one incomparable, indivisible Truth remains, and lies will disappear. To whom should ~the~ Truth lie? Before whom does He ever have to play-act if He is all? Jesus is the intellectual and spiritual expression of reality. He is for me the only "I." If He is my all in all, the truth embodied in Him will accredit itself. It is His concern, not mine.

Jesus is a Saviour to the uttermost. Thus He saves me from the constant nagging worries about whether or not I have spoken or served the truth. I leave Him this burden, too.

A Russian brother told us about an occurrence in Odessa.

The underground church wanted to baptize a group of some twenty individuals. They considered a fish-hatchery at the edge of town to be the best place. The old caretaker was known to go to bed early. Fish would not create a disturbance. There was plenty of water. So the baptism took place there.

The next day, the old caretaker went to the president of the Soviet and asked to be given another job. "Why?" he was asked. "You will never find a more suitable place to work."

"No, I will never go back. The hatchery is haunted." And he explained: "Last night I saw some twenty beings who looked like men, but in reality they were something else. Beauty that was not earthly radiated from everyone. They sang songs entirely unlike anything we sing in our pubs. Then they entered the water one by one, and when they came out of it, I had no doubts any more. They were unearthly. I could not explain who they were. But I won't go back."

The caretaker saw things better than we do when we have a baptism. He observed that we are moved into an entirely new sphere - that of the children of God. The difference between a child of God and a man is much greater than that between a man and an ape.

We are partakers of the divine nature (2PE 1:4) and belong to the world which gives commandments, not to that which strives to obey them. Non-Christians who acknowledge the obligation to be truthful find themselves the victims of inner tension because their fallen nature keeps them from adequately fulfilling their duty. As Christians we don't have the duty of truthfulness: we have its character. We speak it as it is given to us. We can have the full confidence that what we speak is truly what God wishes the other man to know.

We don't have to calculate like Ananias and Sapphira what to give and what to say in order to justify ourselves. Everything has been given. We are just, through the blood of Christ, and never need any further justification. Saving truth emanates spontaneously from our renewed heart.

As children of God we live in a mysterious sphere. Our father in faith is Abraham, who was ordered by God to commit what is considered among men to be a horrible crime: to kill his own son. He was prepared to do so, and he was praised for his willingness.

All human moral standards cease to be valid here. We have as our God a Being who not only bruised His Son but found pleasure in doing so (ISA 53:10). If the salvation of mankind cost so much, the Father paid the price willingly. Why should this Father object to letting me, another child of His, purvey to my interrogators what humans would call an untruth, in order to save the underground church, His messengers of salvation? I have no "I." Let Him decide. Amen.

page 40 The Spaces in the Bible

DEAR BRETHREN AND SISTERS

Until I went to prison I thought I believed that the Bible was the Word of God. If anyone had asked me if I believed the ~whole~ Bible to be His Word, without hesitation I would have answered, "Yes."

I realize now that I was mistaken. I had only thought I believed so. The Bible consists of white sheets of paper (in former times, of parchments), on which are imprinted or inscribed black letters. Around these characters, between the lines and words and in the margins, is a considerable mass of blank space, perhaps even more than that occupied by words. The Bible could not exist without this empty space. Does it also belong to the Word of God, or is it sheer nothing? Does a "nothing" exist? Something that is cannot be nothing. The figure zero never occurs in the Bible.

Is it not possible that the empty spaces in the Bible - its silences - are at least as important as its words? One can find contradictions and debatable matters in the words of the Bible, but nobody can contradict the silence of the depths of its blank spaces.

We are told that when the Lord Jesus was brought to the temple at the age of twelve He amazed the priests with the questions He asked and the answers He gave. I am not very much interested in the amazement of the priests. I would have preferred to know what Jesus' questions and answers were. They cannot be found in the black letters of the Gospel. But keep quiet and you will find them. They are contained in the blank space. In the quiet of a subterranean solitary cell I can read them.

In the prologue to his Gospel St. Luke writes that he first inquired diligently of eyewitnesses about all the episodes in the life of Jesus. In the course of his inquiries he must have gone to the house of Lazarus to ask about the visits of Jesus in Bethany. Martha told him that she had had a quarrel with her sister in the presence of Jesus. Luke may have considered the matter a trifle, he noted it. Then he asked Mary to tell her side of the story. She answered, "Martha chided me for not helping out in the kitchen, but I preferred to sit a couple of hours at the feet of Jesus and listen to Him. I did not wish to lose a word of what He had to say."

"You are the person I need," St. Luke would have exclaimed. "Please tell me the teachings that Jesus gave on that evening."

She surely would have answered, but nowhere do we find this information in Luke's books. We are only told that Mary listened to Him and that Jesus praised her for choosing the good part.

That is to say, we do not find Mary's memories about Jesus' talk in the black letters of the Bible. They are in the white space between chapters 10 and 11 of St. Luke.

There have been centuries of debate about the question of whether the bread and wine in holy communion really become the body and blood of the Saviour. But one thing is above debate: paper takes on a different value when the Bible is printed on it. That is why multitudes of Jews and Christians who have never read the Bible can be seen kissing it in synagogues and Orthodox churches. If the Word can become flesh, sanctifying the womb of the virgin who bore Him, then the written Word can also give exceptional value to sheets of paper on which it is inscribed.

Even stones can become holy. Soviet soldiers told us about the church of the Holy Blood of Christ in Leningrad, closed by the authorities, whose walls bear hundreds of inscriptions: "God, give me love," "Lord, give me happiness," and others like these. Why do people feel instinctively that the right place to inscribe such requests is on the wall of what was once a church? Is it not like any other wall? Why do Jews travel clear around the world just to pray at the wailing wall in Jerusalem? Could they not do the same thing leaning on the wall of their kitchens?

I know a good portion of the Bible by heart and "read" whole chapters from memory in my prison cell, but it is not at all like having the real Book before me. Its very paper is a marvel. In every fibre there are as many atoms as there are drops of water in the ocean or blades of grass on the whole earth. And the atoms are constituted of smaller particles. Electrons travel at the speed of 10,000 miles per second. While I read a page of the Bible, they will have travelled the distance from Bucharest to Tokyo countless times, while keeping the Word of God inviolate. The electrons constituting my own eyes also travel, perhaps lovingly chasing those of the Bible. The piece of paper is not dull and dead. It is one of God's mysteries; it is a cyclone of energy.

Paper has a dramatic history of its own. It was once a tree in the forest. Sunbeams played through its branches, birds made their nests in it and chirped, ants and insects scurried over its bark, lovers kissed each other in its shadow. Then rude men felled the tree. Seeing the wretchedness of slave labourers, it would not have known for whom to weep. It could almost forget its own tragedy at the sight of prisoners who were hungry, dirty, poorly clothed, unskilled in this work, often injured, and who were forced to do this hard work under the surveillance of wardens with whips. A part of the tree became paper on which pornography or hate literature was printed. A part of it became Scripture. There exists a chosen people of God; there exists the elect of God in every nation; there are chosen walls; there exist chosen sheets of paper.

Mad thoughts? Perhaps. Which thoughts of a prisoner are not mad? Many of my ideas are foolish, although frenzy has not completely seized me yet. Otherwise I would not know that my ideas are foolish and I would not feel unhappy.

My observations about the travel of electrons applies to all paper, not only to that used for printing Bibles. True, but it is only through reading Holy Scripture that one gains an awesome respect for matter. Materialists do not love matter. They have no sense of its "earnest expectation" (ROM 8:19), do not sympathize with its "bondage of corruption" (ROM 8:21).

Listen! Maybe I will hear the ringing of church bells outside. It is a Sunday morning. Bells. Men have made brass express adoration for God. Materialists cannot make matter radiate the praises of atheism, of the nonexistence of God. The Word becomes not only flesh but matter. Jesus Himself as an incipient embryo was matter before becoming flesh.

The atom is mysterious; the world is mysterious; the Bible is also mysterious. If its meaning were plain, it would be the work of men. But it comes from another sphere. Let us take advantage of what is clear in Scripture and trust for the rest. One day we will be in the light, and then we shall no longer see "through a glass, darkly" (1CO 13:12).

Never stop at the black letters of the Bible. If you were to ask me which Bible verses support me the most today, my answer would be, "The Bible verses which comfort me most are two verses which are not in the Bible."

First, I am happy that the Bible never mentions Jesus' asking anybody what sins he had committed, how many, of what gravity, under what circumstances, with what complicity. He met sinners and told them, "Be of good cheer, son or daughter, your sins are forgiven."

Second, what I appreciate is that the Bible records no instance in which anyone apologised or asked Jesus for forgiveness during His earthly life. On the last evening before His crucifixion the disciples had forsaken Him and one had denied Him. Afterwards, when they met their resurrected Lord, they should at least have said, "I'm sorry." But whoever looked into the face of Jesus saw so much kindness, so much love, such a willingness to forgive, that he knew there was no need to ask.

And so I say, read not only what the Bible records in black on white, but read its white spaces. Listen to its silences. They are eloquent. You are not asked what sins you have committed, nor are you commanded to utter long prayers of repentance. Rather, believe that His blood has cleansed you of all your sins, and rejoice.

Where we don't understand a part of the Bible, it is the simplest thing to say humbly, "I can't understand," and to reflect that we are acquainted with only the fringes of reality. The Author of the Bible can be trusted.

The proof of God's existence is that He has produced the Bible, and the proof of the Bible is that so marvellous a book could have been produced only by God.

Communists and some scientists claim that the world was not created by God. And if they were right? There would be reason enough to adore Him if He had produced only the Bible.

A man who has lost, in addition to his beloved ones, all his belongings, his health, his reputation, his liberty or even just a needle, must seek these things in the Bible. He will surely find more than he has lost - the conviction of the irrelevance of the things lost. One thing is needed. Following the Bible, you will have chosen the good part. And you will find the Beloved. Amen.

page 46 Sins Are So Small To Him

There is an abyss of sins in every one of us, the muck of generations.

On a certain Sunday I had preached twice and by evening was tired and in need of rest. But I felt a strong impulse to go to the pub which was just opposite my parsonage. When I told my wife about it, she objected vigorously.

"You spoke twice today against drinking, and now all the neighbours will see you going to have a drink. You can't do such a thing. You'll be slandered."

"Come with me," I replied, "so they will slander us both."

When we entered the pub, I understood why I had been brought here. In the midst stood a Russian captain with his finger on the trigger of a revolver, threatening to shoot everybody. He was drunk and had asked for more liquor. It had been refused him, and now he was terribly angry. People had hidden behind the bar and under tables. They could not parley with him, not knowing Russian. I could speak the language.

When I asked him what was happening, he quieted down a little and explained his demand. I assured him that I would take care of it if only he would keep quiet. I went to the pub owner and promised him that my wife and I would sit with the captain and entertain him so

there would be no further trouble. "Give him one bottle

The pub owner was so happy he exclaimed, "Pastor, you have saved my life! I will always remain grateful. Henceforth in my bar you can drink as much as you like free of charge."

The Russian captain, my wife, and I sat down at a table. A bottle of wine and three glasses were served. He was polite. He filled the glasses. My wife did not drink and I did not drink, but he showed courtesy. He would empty all three glasses. He was drunk, but he was used to drinking. He could reason and understand.

So while he drank, I told him the old, old story about the Son of God, who came down from heaven, was born of a virgin in a stable, taught love, led a life of sorrows, in the end was crucified for our sins, was raised from the dead, ascended to heaven, and is preparing for every repentant sinner who puts his confidence in Him an eternal abode in bliss. He listened attentively while drinking.

When I finished, he said, "Now that I know who you are, I will tell you who I am. I am an Orthodox priest. When, under Stalin, 80,000 priests were killed, I was terribly frightened. And so I accepted the offer which the Communists made to become an atheist lecturer.

"Though believing in God, I agreed to go from town to town, from village to village, to convince people that there is no God, no Christ and no eternal life. I have destroyed the faith of many people, including my former parishioners. I could not conquer fear. My punishment from God has been that with this hand with which I gave holy communion before, I have had to shoot Christians who refused to serve in the Red Army.

"And now I drink and drink to forget what I have done, but I cannot forget. Waiter, bring another bottle."

Silently I adored the Holy Spirit, who brings us to the right place at the right time.

I asked the captain, "Do you still know the creed?"

He vaguely remembered it. Many years had passed since he had said it last.

So I began to recite in Russian, "I believe in one God, the Father almighty," and so on until I came to the words, "I believe in the remission of sins." I asked him, "Do you believe in this article of the creed?"

"I made it clear that I believe the whole Christian faith," he answered. "It was only fear that made me deny it."

I insisted, "Do you believe in the remission of sins?"

"Yes."

I pressed hard, "Do you believe in the remission of your sins?"

"Oh, no!" he shouted. "My sins have amounted to crimes and have been far too many."

"The creed does not state that only small and few offences are forgiven, but everything, all sins, without counting the number or looking at the size. When John the Baptist saw the Lord Jesus, he said, 'Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world.' If you alone had committed all the murders, thefts, lies, perjuries, and adulteries committed by all mankind from the beginning but now believe in Jesus, behold, He is the Lamb of God who takes away the sins of the world. Do you believe in the remission of your sins?"

In tears, the officer repeated again and again, "I believe in the remission of my sins." Jesus had performed a masterwork. He had found not a lost sheep, but a lost shepherd.

I never saw this captain again. It was wartime. On the next day he had gone further towards the front with his regiment. What did he do afterwards?

On the first day of her conversion the Samaritan woman brought the population of a whole town to Christ. What did she do later? Did her enthusiasm last? Did she continue to win multitudes as in the beginning, or did she pass into the arms of another husband? Jesus praised a Roman centurion for having faith such as one could not find even in Israel. What deeds did he perform with this faith? Or, once satisfied with the miracle he had expected, did he return to his duty, which was training soldiers to kill? Zaccheus promised to return everything he had extorted and give fourfold to everyone he had defrauded. Did he keep his promise?

I like EZE 20:3: "As I live, saith the Lord God, I will not be inquired of by you." He wanted us to know a part of the story. Let it be enough for us. This captain, the Samaritan woman, the centurion, and Zaccheus all had ~one~ good moment when they put their trust in Jesus. The rest is not our business.

The Russian captain had been cleansed. What looked to me and to him like a mountain of sin seemed to Jesus, who sees things from highest heaven, an insignificant mound.

In Old Testament times the Jews went astray by believing in Moloch. In Hebrew, Moloch means "the king who has reigned." Too often we have our souls fixed upon ugly events in the past. Christians believe in Jimloh, "the King who will reign." Worshippers of Jimloh believe that the past is forgiven and also repaired. Christians also believe in a holiness towards which we evolve. "He which hath begun a good work in you," writes the apostle Paul, "will perform it until the day of Jesus Christ" (PHP 1:6).

towards a fellow man, and ~asham~ for the sin of a man towards God, such as breaking the Sabbath or disobeying some ritual law. But ~asham~ meant also the restitution which a thief had to make for what he had stolen. In ISA 53:10, it is said that Jesus will make his soul an ~asham~, which means not only an offering for sin, but also a restitution for it. In some mysterious ways the Almighty will restore all I have done wrong.

In Shakespeare's ~Hamlet~, a wretched Claudius seeks to pray:

> O my offence is rank, it smells to heaven!
> It has the primal eldest curse upon 't;
> A brother's murder. Pray can I not.
> Though inclination be as sharp as will,
> My stronger guilt defeats my strong intent,
> And, like a man to double business bound,
> I stand in pause where I shall first begin,
> And both neglect...
> My fault is past. But, O, what form of prayer
> Can serve my turn? 'Forgive me my foul murder?'
> That cannot be, since I am still possess'd
> Of those effects for which I did the murder,
> My crown, mine own ambition, and my queen.
> May one be pardon'd and retain th' offence?

I reply: "Claudius, I can give you the answer. We can now speak freely with each other, both belonging to the same unreal world. You were buried after you died. I am buried alive. It doesn't make much difference. We can communicate. Yes, Claudius, you can be forgiven too, though you can repair nothing. If you were now to send away your wife whom you obtained in a criminal manner, you would bring upon her new unhappiness and new temptations. If you renounced the crown, one who never prays might pick it up. Leave things as they are and believe in Jesus, the ~asham~, the restitution."

You can begin every day anew, unburdened by the past. And don't be afraid today of repeating the same old wrongs. Rather, be pleasantly surprised if it happens otherwise. God knows that your piano is bad and that you cannot make it produce good melodies. Only your inner state counts. God judges you according to your will only. Would Menuhin's concert be as pleasant to the ear if he played a gypsy's violin instead of the Stradivarius he uses? God looks at what you will, not at how much you can fulfil.

Your sins are remitted. Amen.

page 52 Measure In Delicacy

DEAR BRETHREN AND SISTERS

Mary Stuart accidentally stepped on the toes of the henchman when she was on the scaffold. It is said that her last words were, "I beg your pardon, sir executioner." She was a queen. Her good breeding was instinctive .

Likewise Christians, children of the heavenly King, show meekness when they are ill-used.

Christians simply love and shine. They do so even when, like their Master, they wear a crown of thorns and have in their hand a reed for a sceptre.

Believers also show kindness to those doomed by God.

God said to Moses, "Rise ye up, take your journey, and pass over the river Arnon: behold, I have given into thine hand Sihon the Amorite, king of Heshbon, and his land: begin to possess it, and contend with him in battle. This day will I begin to put the dread of thee and the fear of thee upon the nations that are under the whole heaven, who shall hear report of thee, and shall tremble, and be in anguish because of thee." And Moses "sent messengers out of the wilderness of Kedemoth unto Sihon king of Heshbon with words of peace" (DEU 2:24-26).

Moses had been given the order to destroy a king. But as in the case of Pharaoh, God allowed Moses to proffer peace and an amicable agreement to the heathen king.

page 53 ALONE WITH GOD

It is permissible to send words of peace even to those utterly rejected by the Creator.

The Christian is engaged in warfare as long as he lives on this earth. But his role can be compared to that of a military physician. He has to give medicine and comfort to the wounded on both sides.

Such Christian delicacy has produced changes in the heathen world.

Mahatma Gandhi wrote, "It was the New Testament which really awakened me to the rightness and value of passive resistance and love towards one's enemies." In 1908, when he was almost murdered by a Moslem, he did not prosecute him nor give evidence against him. This forgiven murderer became a disciple of Gandhi.

A similar story is told about the Christian Mrs. Rathenau. Her husband, finance minister of Germany, had been killed by a Nazi only for the crime of having Jewish blood. Mrs. Rathenau cared for the murderer in prison and defended him. During the war, this murderer became a leader of the Gestapo in Marseilles. He atoned for the evil done in the past by helping multitudes of Jews escape, with the result that in the end he was hanged.

Edmund Campion, English Jesuit, betrayed by a Catholic turned Protestant, was thrice tortured on the rack. Then he was sentenced to be hanged, drawn and quartered. A ~Te Deum~ was sung at this occasion. But the traitor had come to death row asking forgiveness. Campion gave it. He helped his denunciator escape the pursuers who sought revenge: he gave him a letter to a German nobleman recommending him for service.

These are the attitudes God likes. They are at the opposite pole to that of the Spanish patriot Narvaez who, when asked on his deathbed by his confessor if he had forgiven all his enemies, replied, "Father, I have no enemies. I've shot them all."

But there is a limit to Christian forbearance and charity. In the end, Moses killed Sihon and his subjects because they were not responsive to delicacy. At times we have to have measure in love. One single devil whom we have pitied can destroy a paradise.

One day of softness and a nation can lose overnight happy institutions built up through generations of struggle .

Do not think it virtue to be delicate only. When occasion demands, tell a devil in high position that he is a devil.

The good pastor is the one who has the proper measure even in love.

We read in REV 20:3 that after the Devil has fulfilled a thousand years of prison, he will be given a period of amnesty for "a little season." But once free, he will start his wicked deeds again, gathering together the nations of earth for another world war, which only God will bring to a fiery end.

Jesus is full of grace. One cannot find the right expression in English for saying how full of grace He is. In Hebrew the singular "mercy" does not exist. The word is plural: ~rahamim~ - "mercies." Nobody can obtain from God only one mercy, because He has only indivisible bushels of it. In the New Testament, the corresponding Greek work ~oiktirmos~ is also used frequently in the plural form.

Shakespeare wrote, Troubles come not singly, but in battalions. Likewise, a sin never occurs alone but in the company of many others. And graces abound even more. But a plurality of mercies does not mean that there is no limit to them. The universe is constructed mathematically. We might not know how many stars there are, but there is a certain definite number. Jesus taught us to forgive much, and He told us exactly, mathematically, how much to forgive. He taught us not to remit indefinitely, but exactly 490 times (MTT 18:22). Where there are figures, we have a very exact teaching.

Jesus was not full of grace alone, but of "grace and truth" (JHN 1:14). Now, John thought in Hebrew. In Hebrew the letter "v," which stands for "and" is part of the following word. John wrote "andtruth" as a single word. Grace which is not limited by the supreme interest that truth should triumph is a dangerous fancy.

A man can love many things. He can have a passion for only one. Results are achieved only if that man desires one thing exclusively and does not squander his energies simultaneously on a hundred other things. I admire the Communists for concentrating all their efforts on the fulfilling of their supreme passion. Our passion is the triumph of Christ, the establishment of His kingdom, which necessarily includes the overthrow of everything which opposes it. We have a place for delicacy, for genuine-love towards the enemy, but only in the measure to which this would not defeat our main purpose. To love the enemy so much as to enable him to overcome us is idiocy.

I love my enemy, but I do not forget that while I spend my time preparing a series of good deeds for him, he prepares weapons to destroy my church. He might strike quickly and unexpectedly while I indulge in sentiments of love.

In extreme cases in the heat of battle, the military doctor might be forced to shoot. He also is a warrior. We Christians have to adopt the military mentality, remembering how many are the metaphors about warfare in the New Testament: "the weapons of our warfare" (2CO 10:4); "Put on the whole armor of God... we wrestle ... having on the breastplate ... taking the shield ... the helmet ... the sword of the Spirit" (EPH 6:11-17); "Let us put on the armor of light" (ROM 13:12).

In war I don't admire so much the hero who dies for his fatherland as the one who lets the enemy die for his. A live hero is worth more than a dead one. Truth is exclusive. With Christ as our Commander, right is on our side, we must conquer.

We allow ourselves gestures of delicacy, we nurture love for all men, including our enemies, with one limitation: we must be victorious. Every gentle act which does not hinder this is welcome.

I remember the first Soviet officer I met. I asked him if he believed in God. I would not have minded if he had said "No." Freedom is given to every man to say "Yes" or "No" even to God. But he gave me the most amazing answer: "We have no order to believe. If we get such an order, we will."

I had met the typical Soviet man, a being who has been robbed of the highest gift made by God to man: to be an individual in his own right. He had been changed into a robot who waited for orders about what faith to embrace or reject. The Communists don't allow any sphere in which the individual is free. One has to be a Marxist even in art and science. Because of Einstein's discoveries, the universe we live in bears his name. Yet his book ~The World As I See It~ is forbidden in Communist countries because he expresses his belief in God - an incredible irony.

Such a regime has to disappear. Brethren, do everything you can to this end. Don't ask, "What can I, a single man, do?" If everyone asked himself this, no collective good would ever be achieved. The regime ~must~ disappear.

Therefore, love the Communists and be gentle towards them only in the measure to which this does not conflict with the main purpose. Robots must be changed into men again. Christ must be proclaimed and accepted freely. His kingdom must come.

After having prayed and fasted many years, the fathers in the desert - the first generation of monks who fled to the wilderness of Thebaide from the corruption of the church which had become a state institution in the fourth century - gathered for counselling. St. Anthony the Great asked them, "Let everyone say which Christian virtue he considers the highest."

A few arose immediately and said, "Love." Others said, "Humility." Some said, "Obedience." Some put "Silence" on the highest level. In the end they asked St. Anthony, who had listened attentively to their debate, which in his opinion was the highest virtue, and this would prevail.

"All these virtues you have mentioned are excellent," St. Anthony said, "but the highest is to have in all things the right measure."

Measure therefore your delicacy.

The same Bible that teaches love and gentleness also forbids one even to greet certain men (2JN 10, 2JN 11). Saying "Good morning" to such men (whom John describes) makes one a partaker of his evil deeds. John the Evangelist is said to have fled naked from a public bath when he saw Cerintus, the heretic, entering. He did not wish to remain under the same roof with one who taught false doctrine.

Delicacy, then, to a point. But uncompromising staunchness in matters of truth. Amen.

DEAR BRETHREN AND SISTERS

One of Jesus' promises has surely remained unfulfilled. He said that if we have faith as large as a mustard seed, we will be able to move mountains. I don't expect so much. But again and again I have ordered a mere prison wall to move, and it has not. It is written, "This stone ... has heard" (JOS 24:27). Why then did it not move? Is my faith smaller than a mustard seed? But what about the faith of my fellow-sufferers? Around me are important saints and bishops. None of them can move even a wall, much less a mountain.

And if one promise of Jesus does not hold true, what should we think about all the others? I shout again and again in my folly, "Wall, move! Wall, move!" It does not move.

For a while I forgot where I was. I shouted loudly. The wardens heard and gathered around my door to ask what was happening. They mocked me when I explained.

I fell down on my bed in despair, overcome with the realization that I was still in prison. And - far worse - that my faith in His Word was gone.

But slowly I quieted down. A thought flashed through my mind. How is it that I could be so mad? Jesus had been very explicit. If we have only a little faith, the size of a mustard seed, then we will move mountains. But a great God gives a great faith, not tiny coins. Just as the great steel demolition hammers used in industry to smash concrete walls are no good for cracking a nut, so our God-given faith, which is huge, cannot move mere mountains. The only requisite for removing mountains is mundane faith in engineering technology. Our God-given faith does greater things. We leap upon the mountains, we skip upon the hills (SOS 2:8).

Eventually we may tire of such things. For if I jump over a mountain, I only come upon another valley which lies in the shadow of death. Our great God provides power for more than this.

The woman in Revelation was given the wings of a great eagle (REV 12:14) and could soar over mountain peaks. Whitefield entered in his diary, "I prayed God this day that God might make me an extraordinary Christian." And his prayer was fulfilled.

Nothing of the ordinary Christian life fully satisfies us, not even the gift of snowy whiteness of soul or joy like that of a marriage feast. Whiteness and marriage belong to the created world. We are partakers of the divine nature, and nothing less than oneness with the Creator can satisfy us.

Remain, prison walls, where you are. We fly towards the Infinite.

We can do so because for this we were born.

A whole life's work will not enrich a proletarian. Neither will revolutions. With very few exceptions, only that man is rich who is born rich. Those who have acquired wealth are often too old or jaded to enjoy it. A good birth, therefore, is more advantageous than a lifetime of hard work. As for us, everything is ours without working. For as the eagle takes its little ones on its wings, so does our God.

Remain, Communist world and Christian world, where you are. I hate the first. I am sceptical about the second. The old story repeats itself. Men of one and the same generation were pagans under Diocletian, Christians under the emperor Constantine because it became the fashion, Arians under Constantius because the king, a tyrant, thus decreed, and apostates in Julian's time because the emperor willed it. Then they returned to Christianity in Jovinian's time.

In my generation, men of our province, Transylvania, started out as loyal subjects of the Hapsburgs but afterward became loyal subjects of the Romanian kings. All those who had sworn faith to King Charles II were forsworn when he was deposed. These same men became legionnaires, then anti-legionnaires when the former were overthrown by Antonescu.

Bishops who would have refused ordination of men who did not want to swear loyalty to King Michael swore loyalty to the Republic when the king was overthrown. A mass of Christians, headed by their bishops and denominational leaders, passed to the side of the Reds. The same patriarch who had called upon us to fight the Bolshevik dragon celebrated a thanksgiving liturgy for the advent of power of this dragon. Many have left their faith altogether.

Why should I remain in this world, in this Communist state, in this Christianity, in a prison cell or even at liberty? God has smuggled through the locked door of my cell the wings of a great eagle. I fly to the Infinite. Nothing less will do.

I consider myself as having attained nothing while anything remains unattained.

Can it be that when I have reached a certain height I will fall? The devil is a good hunter and hurls darts that travel far.

The Lord has told us that not a sparrow falls to the ground without our Father (MTT 10:29). I have seen many sparrows that have fallen. I even saw one eaten by a cat. The Father willed that this sparrow should have a tragic end. I may fall, too. But if, in the future, sins destroy me after I "have tasted of the heavenly gift, and [been] made partaker of the Holy Ghost" (HEB 6:4), others will learn from my failure and will do better. So I will have served, notwithstanding.

I don't accept as my religion anything apart from union between bride and bridegroom. All other religion is fornication, idolatry. I will soar where the Truth, which sages on earth call by different names, is one.

It is not a certainty that I will fall, though many have. By His grace I may reach the height. Others have; why not I?

I am in the communion of saints. Welcome, St. Catherine, to my prison cell. You were very unlike me. At the age of six, when I had the first vision of what I know now to have been the devil, which shattered my life, you saw Christ blessing you from heaven and apostles standing around you. While I in my youth indulged in gross sins, you had a plank for a bed, a wooden log as a pillow, and you spent your time in prayer and mortification. And you arrived at a spiritual marriage. Christ placed a ring on your finger.

But you give the impression of not seeing any difference between you and me. Maybe I am wrong, but you seem to have even a touch of envy as you look at me. Jesus said, "To whom little is forgiven, the same loves little" (LUK 7:47). Except for original sin, there must have been almost nothing to be forgiven you. You have travelled another way, but you assure me - and must have assured Jesus - that, although God has preserved you from much actual sin, you still love Him passionately.

How beautiful it is to commune with you. You speak my language. You were a prisoner too. I sit in a Communist cell. You spent almost all your life in the inner cell of your soul. You were like all the brides of Jesus, "a garden enclosed ... a spring shut up, a fountain sealed" (SOS 4:12).

You too know actual prison life well. "Don't be surprised at my visit. I had the habit of visiting prisons from an early age," you said, reminding me how you attended barbarous executions when young in order to comfort the condemned and their relatives.

I know from the Bible that "we are compassed about" with a great "cloud of witnesses," men and women who have given their lives to Jesus, the real saints (HEB 12:1), but I imagine that, when they make themselves felt so clearly, they must have a certain precise intention. Before asking St. Catherine about it, I tried to find out something from her that interested me most:

"I have brought to Christ a Jew of over ninety. He told me once that in a dream he had asked Jesus to show him my place in heaven. He got no reply. It is said that you have an exceptional sensibility about the inner state of a man. You can 'smell' his integrity or corruption. I vacillate between states in which I feel myself a beloved child of God and other states in which I want to warn all men not to be at the last judgment as I am. Can you tell me the truth about me?"

She smiled and remained silent.

But I could remember clearly what I had read about her criticizing the luxuries of the church of her time. Still, I had not changed my style of life, which surely had been luxurious compared to that of many of my colleagues.

"Catherine, you have changed much. In times past, you did not mince words even when speaking to a pope. You wrote to Gregory XI, 'Don't be a boy, be a man. If you are not willing to use your power for cauterizing the ills of the church, it would be better for you to resign.' You had called cardinals 'poor mean knights, afraid even of their own shadows, poisoned with self-love.' How is it that you don't give me a word of reproof, if you have come for this? Well, it is probably because I am neither a pope nor a cardinal.

"You have come just to remind me that a Christian can reach seemingly unattainable heights. You could write to Charles V, 'When will you fulfill the will of God and me to make peace?' Your will and God's had become identical. You could speak about the two in the same breath.

"Silently you have fulfilled the purpose of your coming. I receive the gift, and now I will soar on eagle's wings.

How beautiful is the communion of the saints. You enjoy it only when you accept its full silence, a silence like that of this prison cell, interrupted only from time to time by the agonized cry of someone who is suffering. I see something with my spiritual eyes. I wonder if I have seen. Perhaps there are drugs in my food. I see so many mad fancies. I had known a madman in an asylum, one of the best men I ever knew. He was a religious maniac. He often saw St. Birgit. He had painted her image on the wall of his cell. I asked him what she told him in their encounters. He smiled, forlorn. That was all. Well, he was mad.

But mad or not, what does it matter to me? I wish to arrive at the spiritual marriage at least in my fantasy. Madmen who dream of being Napoleon or some saint feel so happy. Marriage with Jesus must be glorious even if it is only in imagination.

An ancient sage sent his son to a Bible teacher. When the boy returned, the father asked him, "What did you learn?" The son told him all the subject matter. "This is nothing," the father replied. "Go and learn more." The son returned one year later. This time he boasted of having learned other disciplines. The father sent him back a second time. When the son returned again, his face shone. The father embraced him. "You knew theology before. Now you know God."

If my marriage to Jesus is only imaginary, perhaps men around me will only imagine that my face shines, but this will make them seek God as if I had been truly glorified.

So for their sake, I love you, heights. I come! Amen.

DEAR BRETHREN AND SISTERS IN CHRIST

Today a particularly offensive upstart gave me a beating with special mention that my being a Jew played a role in my torment. Heavy chains were put on my legs.

Sometimes I have slept off the beating. It is amazing how well one can sleep in spite of the pain. Sometimes I have whistled. Now I remember a Bible verse: "It shall come to pass, that ten men shall take hold out of all languages of the nations, even shall take hold of the skirt of him that is a Jew, saying, We will go with you: for we have heard that God is with you" (ZEC 8:23).

This is God's promise. But men take hold of the skirt of a Jew for different purposes. Mrs. Potiphar "caught [Joseph] by his garment, saying, Lie with me" (GEN 39:12). Many catch Jews by their garments to have them as business partners. Here in prison they catch you by your skirt and hold you fast during a beating. The Communists mistreat everybody, but Jewish prisoners always get a double beating.

Some of the officers of the Secret Police are turncoats, former members of anti-Semitic organizations, who give vent to their real feelings when they have a Jewish prisoner in their hands, to compensate for being compelled to stand at attention before the Red high officials of Jewish descent. The Jewish officers of the Secret Police also take pains to exhibit special harshness towards Jewish prisoners to avoid the suspicion that they are partial.

I am Jewish. I had to suffer under the Nazis for the double crime of being both a Jew and a Christian. Now it happens all over again. What is it with us Jews? Even when I was a child, teachers and pupils hit me for being Jewish. What is it with me?

Are we the withered boughs that have to be broken off, as Isaiah prophesied (ISA 27:11)? After the Nazi defeat, Christians felt themselves in bad company when accusing us and abandoned the charge that we sentenced Jesus to death. Many church leaders change their opinions as the political winds blow. Those who have cooperated most with the anti-Semitic killers to avenge our ancestors' crucifixion of Christ now assure everyone that Jews were no guiltier in this tragedy than the Romans. They ignore the fact that the Jews had prophecies about the coming of Christ, which the heathen did not have. Ezekiel says about the Jews, "When they entered unto the heathen, whither they went, they profaned my holy name" (EZE 36:20). St. Paul's rebuke is also justified: "The name of God is blasphemed among the Gentiles through you" (ROM 2:24).

But I belong to another category of Jew. At Golgotha the Jewish people divided into two parts: those who had asked for His death, and those who wept for Him and eventually constituted the first church. I belong to those about whom Jesus said, "Salvation is of the Jews" (JHN 4:22).

Why do they take hold of my garment, too, only to beat me? What is it with the Jewish question?

Hegel said there was one thing his philosophy could not explain and that was Israel. Should I then explain it with a reason confused through great suffering?

To fathom such a mystery, I would have to think logically. "Logic" comes from ~logos~. To be pleasant to Christ, the ~Logos~, you must think and act logically. In the original Greek we are asked in ROM 12:1 to bring to the Lord "a logical sacrifice." Clarity and accuracy in thought are expected of Christ's disciples. But for a long time I have lacked these qualities. Hunger, the remembrance of tortures, the fear of new ones as often as the cell is unlocked, the whole atmosphere of solitary confinement in a subterranean cell, all combine to make logical thinking impossible. Perhaps there are also drugs in my scanty food. I cannot tell you what it is exactly with the Jews.

You cannot become a Jew by practising the Jewish religion, just as you cannot become a lion by roaring or devouring raw flesh. I am sure that birth cannot make you a Jew any more than being born in a garage can make you an automobile. To be a Jew is more than belonging to a nation. It is a calling which you do not get by natural birth. Born a Jew, you must realize your calling.

What makes the Jew - the man who is essentially Jewish and really deserves this high appellation, the man who is loyal to the King of the Jews - dangerous for the world and difficult to bear even for the children of God from among the Gentiles, is that the Jewish Christian is a restless fighter.

He has learned from Abraham's experience. Abraham met Melchizedek only after his return from a slaughter in which he had bathed his sword in blood (GEN 14:17). He had not met him during prayer, nor when he brought sacrifices. He met him after a fight. Battlefields are our tabernacles. Captains of hosts are our priests. Our liturgy is a clashing of swords. Our incense is the smoke of burning Sodoms. Jews and Christians have burned on stakes long enough. Our priestly cassocks are armor. Thus clothed we enter Jehu's chariot. We are Jonadabs, his fellow-warriors. Our icons are living soldiers to whom we pay our homage. Our God is a consuming fire.

This is the religion about which I am passionate. This is how I feel my role as a Jewish Christian. If there is no place for me in such a tabernacle, I would like to live at least in its shadow, but the churches of the Gentiles are too well-ordered, calm, settled, boring for me.

A Jewish Christian loves his nation as Esther did. Therefore Pharaohs and Hamans, as well as cowards among the believers, tremble at our approach.

So many genial Jews have missed the mark in serving foreign masters. Joseph served Egypt, Daniel Babylon, Marx the world proletariat, Disraeli the British empire, Leon Blum social democracy and France. Some of these were children of God, others the opposite, but in either case their earthly benefactors soon forgot their services. Those who embody what is essential in the appellation Hebrew-Christian would never serve any other cause than that of the people of God.

In their relationship with God, they are not satisfied with forgiveness of sins. They want their lives changed.

Our responsibility is entirely different from that of other believers. St. Paul writes "Unto them [the Jews] were committed the oracles of God." Every line in the Bible was written by a Jew. That St. Luke might have been a Greek is an invention. If he were not a Jew he could not have been a Biblical author. This thought outdoes all guesses about his origin. Luther contested the authority of the ecumenical councils because they were not constituted of Jews. Once they were composed of Gentiles, their decisions could not be considered the oracles of God, compulsory for Christians. Jewish Christians are called to evoke the truth as it was in its nakedness, before being clothed in parables.

Today many parables have become obsolete.

Outside, farming has been collectivized. No man possesses a hundred sheep any more. Who cares if one is lost? It is state property. Fathers don't have inheritances to impart to profligate sons. When they get into trouble, there is nobody who possesses swine who might hire them. They have to be state employees, and they would not be free to leave their job to return to the father. Kings cannot arrange marriage feasts for their sons any more. They have been dethroned. Beggars can no longer hope for alms at the door of rich men. The capitalists have been expropriated, deported to some slave labor camps. They would be willing to beg for a piece of bread themselves, but for a situation epitomized in a little joke:

What is the difference between a pessimist and an optimist? The optimist says, "With this regime, we will all become beggars," to which the pessimist replies, "But from whom will we beg?"

Jesus' parables presented eternal truth clad in episodes taken from social life, which has changed completely. The Hebrew-Christian divests truth of its temporary clothing and sees it as it is.

The real Hebrew-Christian does not remain satisfied with what he is told about Jesus, even by the saintliest of teachers. St. Luke writes in his Gospel (LUK 1:2) about some who had been eyewitnesses of the events. Who had been an eyewitness of Mary's virgin birth, of the pre-existence of Jesus, of His solitary nights of prayer? The Greek does not have the word "eyewitness" but ~autoptes~, a word composed of ~auto~ (self) and ~optes~ (those who have seen).

Luke speaks about men who have seen things themselves or (LUK 1:3) who "have had perfect understanding of all things ~anothen~," which means literally "being looked upon from above."

There are men who are seated in heavenly places, outside of time and space. They see what is happening in heaven and look down upon what has happened and is happening on earth. They also see things which normally remain hidden. Luke was such a man; so were the other Evangelists. Do you really believe that there are no more seers in Israel?

They see, and when given even by Jesus the choice of having Himself or the Holy Spirit, the Comforter, who does not come unless Jesus departs from us (JHN 16:7), they do not fall into the trap: they do not ask for more fullness and more gifts of the Spirit. For them the Spirit is no Comforter. There can be no comfort for the absence of Jesus.

Rachel, when her children were slain, wept for them and would not be comforted (MTT 2:18). What unnatural mother a woman must be to accept comfort when what she needs is her child returned to her.

The Hebrew Christian has all due respect for the Spirit but desires Jesus. Without Him, honey tastes like gall. The Spirit is a spirit of truth which testifies about Jesus. But they do not desire even a true testimony about an absent Jesus, not even one of divine origin. They wish Jesus Himself.

Having the Spirit, we could rightly solve many problems. But we do not wish to solve problems. Mary Magdalene did not seek solutions. Rather, she sat quietly at His feet. Time somehow solves problems without our intervention. We just wish to see His sunny face and hear His melodious voice.

The real Hebrew Christian is a man apart, even within the church. The time when people will take hold of his skirt in order to be taught the Word of God may be far away, but he will never compromise, he will never lower the standard in order to win popularity.

Tomorrow I might be confronted with something entirely different: "Take off your shirt in order to be beaten with a whip." I will comply. A paper containing a statement that I renounce my faith and denounce my brethren could free me. What really separates me from my beloved ones, then, is a paper wall, not these heavy quarries which I see. So for many centuries a book has separated the Jews from other peoples.

I will remain, by the grace of God, on this side of the paper wall. But I am thankful for the high calling of being a Jewish Christian, and I will not capitulate. Amen.

page 72 The Beloved Communists

BELOVED FLOCK OF CHRIST

I would poison myself if I thought of Communists only with malice.

Once while beating me the captain amused himself by singing tango music. I would have been simply unfair to writhe under the beating without appreciating the other aspect of reality. He had a beautiful voice and the tune was pleasant to the ear. If I resented the beating, I had to be thankful for the music. It is a rare treat for a prisoner to hear somebody singing beautifully.

If only we could always appreciate the dual aspects of reality, the fact that it takes both sides to make a whole! When I feel a pain, there is always the joy of being a living "I" who feels. The "I" may feel pain now, but these same nerves are capable of feeling caresses too. It is admirable to have sensitive nerves. It is wise to appreciate the joy of possessing them even while suffering pain.

The Jews are a chosen people. It is also a chosen thing to have a Jew as a torturer. He accompanies his wickedness with such splendid jokes. At a certain moment, when I could bear no more, I cried, "Leave me, leave me!" I had difficulty breathing.

My torturers consulted with each other. The Jew among them told a joke: "Two men entered a tram. One held onto the strap. The second was small and kept his stability by holding onto the beard of another man. The man protested. 'Let go of my beard!' The Jew asked, 'Why should I? Are you getting off at the next station?'

Why should we leave Wurmbrand alone? Will he die?"

I hear their songs, their jokes. I enjoy them. I owe them gratitude.

But most of all, I owe them pity.

The Communists have never pondered Shakespeare's words, "Uneasy lies the head that wears the crown." They took the crown from legitimate authority, King Michael. They hoped to become happier through this. They have only become busier. Now they have to scheme day and night how to maintain and consolidate their positions.

Actually, I have it better than they. Discharged of all responsibilities, I can lie quietly in my cell and be happy as much as I decide to. For a time, I disturbed my own happiness by spying on myself and tore myself to pieces for every false thought. But to spy upon yourself is as wrong and impolite as spying upon someone else. I have given it up.

Now I listen attentively when Communists speak to me during my interrogation sessions. I am learning an art which I should have learned long ago, the art of allowing the adversary to say everything on his heart, even when he is wrong.

Once back in my cell, I make the Communists the subject of my meditation and prayer. I also think about the many others around me who are oppressed by the Communists because they believe in God. I think about what this does to God.

In the Hebrew original it is written, "The Lord's soul was shortened for the misery of Israel" (JDG 10:16). A God whose children are persecuted is an amputated God. Look at North Africa, which was originally one of the foremost centres of Christianity. The Moslems conquered the provinces, and for centuries millions have passed through this earthly life without coming to a knowledge of salvation. Could He not bring the Gospel to them without the church? He could not.

He is a handicapped God and needs help like any other amputee. Deborah sang, "Curse ye Meroz, said the angel of the Lord, curse ye bitterly the inhabitants thereof; because ~they came not to the help of the Lord.~" And as if these words were not enough, the angel repeated, "to the help of the Lord against the mighty" (JDG 5:23).

The Lord needs help. Yes, He needs help. He will never succeed without our help. And we sit in chains. How can I decide to be happy, knowing this? If this is the situation, I have to be concerned. I have to give up what I had decided a few minutes before, that is, to whistle joyfully and to dance around in my cell.

My minds gets confused again. How do I know? Because again I made the mistake of spying on myself to find out how my mind is. I'll leave it as it is, and I will think about the Communists whom I love.

Long ago the Lord had predicted "upon the earth distress of nations, with perplexity:... Men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth" (LUK 21:25,26).

These words have had a multiple fulfillment: at the destruction of the Jewish state in AD 71, at the close of the sixth century when hordes of heathen warriors swept down upon what was left of the decaying civilization of the Roman Empire, during the Moslem invasion, and at the end of the eighteenth century in the French Revolution. Now it happens again.

The actual catastrophes could have been averted. Unsolved social questions have brought upon us the great crises of our day. One could very well deduce that the Christian's response should be activism, militant participation in the struggle against evil. Popes, Orthodox priests, and Protestants have warned against what might happen if Christians defaulted.

Arnold Toynbee once told a meeting of working men, "We Christians have neglected you. Instead of justice, we have offered you hard and unreal advice. But I think we are changing. If you would only believe it and trust us! There are many of us who would spend our lives in your service." The audience jeered and yelled, "Nobody wants you to." Toynbee was stung to the heart, went home, and died.

The Orthodox priest Gapon had been the first to organize a demonstration of St. Petersburg's proletariat. With ikons in their hands they marched towards the palace of the Czar to assure him of their loyalty and to ask for the improvement of their life. The police shot at the demonstrators. Then the Communists took over the movement. They hanged the Orthodox priest.

The church has lost the opportunity to win the proletariat to its side. We have given them into the hands of the Communists, because we preferred a comfortable life. We were not ready to fight in order to win souls.

The story is old. When Gideon told an army of 32,000 Jewish warriors, "Whosoever is fearful and afraid, let him return and depart," two-thirds of the army took advantage of the proposal (JDG 7:3). We want to be Christians without being involved in battle.

But it is written about Jesus that He will lead captivity captive, which means that His love will captivate those who are now Satan's captives.

I don't know how. The Vulgate adds to the Hebrew of JDG 5:8: "The Lord chose a new species of war and Himself subverted the gates of the enemy. Ten thousand men, scarcely armed and led by a woman, defeated a strong and well-equipped army." When the Lord willed, He sent an angel to take a peasant, Gideon, from the threshing floor and make him a general. Many centuries later, a peasant girl, St. Joan of Arc, who had never ridden a horse nor held a sword in her hand, led the French army to victory. God chooses the most unlikely instruments.

Dear brothers and sisters, He might have chosen the most unqualified of you to bring to Christ a multitude of Communists. We must be as intent on attaining our purposes as they are on attaining theirs.

In the free world, it is customary during a strike for men to picket the entrance to a factory. They often use violence to keep from entering workers who choose not to join their actions. Likewise we Christians must decide to boycott hell, picketing the entrance with determination.

When I was a boy of fourteen, a friend took me for the first time into a bordello. I was so ashamed and frightened that I fled. But why were there no priests, pastors, or Christian laymen picketing the entrance to such houses of perdition, stopping every teenager and telling him the risks he will incur to his soul?

We must learn to picket. We must surround hell with a cordon and simply not allow the Communists to enter in. If they insist, they can enter the abyss only by stepping over our dead bodies. Our opposition should be that strong.

God will not abolish hell if we think like this. If He had none, His laws would not be authoritative. But perhaps it will remain empty.

Following His dire predictions for our day, Jesus added, "When these things begin to come to pass, look up, and lift up your heads; for your redemption draws nigh" (LUK 21:28). From these words one might conclude that the Christian is to shun activism and lead a contemplative life. Therefore, don't try to stop the onward rush of events; don't look around wondering whom you might save. Whatever these dreadful events may bring to others, to you they bring eternal salvation. Keep this joyful expectation in the midst of calamity. "Behold the fig tree, and all the trees; when they now shoot forth, ye see and know of your own selves that summer is now nigh at hand" (LUK 21:29, 30).

The Lord compares these awe-inspiring events, these political and social cataclysms, with the budding of soft green leaves in spring. You can enjoy them and lead a quiet life. It is not up to you to change God's decree if He has decided to punish this world.

I cannot take this attitude recommended only to some. There are different characters, different callings. Some are called to battle, some to still waters. I could not tell you which of these two ways is more legitimate. But for myself, I cannot help choosing the first.

DEAR BRETHREN AND SISTERS

As a pastor I used to make daily house calls. I was much impressed by a story told by Bishop Latimer to his clergy during the Reformation:

> It would be too much to ask you to be pastors such as Jesus was. I would propose another model of a good pastor: Lucifer. He visits his whole parish daily, every house, rich and poor. And when he enters a house, he does not speak only to the adults. He has a story or fairy tale prepared for every child, suitable for just his age. Before leaving, he also enters the kitchen and says something nice to the maid. Learn from him how to perform your pastoral duties.

So preaching and writing books or articles were not my principal tasks. A pastor is not a maker of sermons but a maker of saints. Only the people I visited know how frequently I have been in their homes.

Brother X is now in the same row of cells with me. He recently reminded me on our "wireless" how he had backslidden at one time.

When I rang the bell at his house (it was on a cold winter's day), he opened the door and told me, "I won't receive you any more. I don't want to have anything to do with pastors." With this he slammed the door.

page 79 ALONE WITH GOD

I shouted loudly, "Well, I'll wait outside until you change your mind." So I waited, standing in the snow. He observed me from behind the window curtain. After a time he came out to the gate and shouted, "Go away! I won't receive you. You'll catch pneumonia."

"What I have to tell you is very important," I replied. "It is worth the risk. I can wait."

In the end, he allowed me in and gave me a cup of hot tea. Now he is probably happy to be on the way of the cross.

As a pastor I also visited with God several times a day. A Christian can have fellowship with Him. With boldness he can "enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus" (HEB 10:19).

God also has a habit of visiting people. He walked and talked with the first couple in the Garden of Eden. He visited Abraham and Jacob, Moses and Joshua.

Though I had visited with men and God, there was one person in my parish whom I had neglected completely. I had never visited myself. It is written about the prodigal son that "he came to himself." How rarely this happens! Men travel the world over to visit other cultures and meet new people but never knock at the gate of their own person and say, "Good morning, dear sir Myself. I have come to talk to you a little while." For the prodigal son, coming to himself meant a return to true thinking. One visit with himself was enough to send him back to his father. How many times I had read this story without coming to this conclusion.

Richard III had visited himself before the fatal battle of Bosworth. He discovered much of himself (in words given to him by Shakespeare):

Is there a murderer here? No. Yes, I am:

page 80 ALONE WITH GOD

Then fly. What? From myself? Great reason: why?
Lest I revenge. What? myself upon myself?
Alack! I love myself. Wherefore? For any good
That I myself have done unto myself?
O no: alas! I rather hate myself
For hateful deeds committed by myself.
I am a villain. Yet I lie; I am not.
Fool, of thyself speak well. Fool, do not flatter.
My conscience hath a thousand several tongues,
And every tongue brings in a several tale,
And every tale condemns me for a villain.

And so, like the prodigal son and Richard III, I decide to visit myself.

"Hello, Me, how are you doing? I wish to have a chat with you. We don't speak the same language. In my language I tell you I wish to speak with you. You would interpret it as me wishing to speak with me. But let us not lose ourselves in semantics. Here am I and here are you, the 'me.' Let us visit for a while."

"What would you like to know from me?"

"First of all, what is your real name? In Hebrew your name is Reuben; in Romanian, Richard. You have written under the pseudonym Radu Valentin. The jailors changed your name to Vasile Georgescu. You have had so many nicknames. And then this common name 'Richard' sounds so different when pronounced by different persons. Since you were thrown in this cell, you have heard a voice giving you a new name. After a long time the same voice gave you another name. You are more distinguished than the conquerors in the book of Revelation, who are promised ~one~ new name (REV 2:17). You are far from being a conqueror, and heaven has already given you two."

"Don't be so harsh. Araunah (2SM 24) is called in

page 81 ALONE WITH GOD

God's Word by several names. Also, one and the same king is called Uzziah and Azariah in 2 Kings 15, and he is called Ozias in Matthew 1. God Himself has many names. But as to your main question, I cannot answer it. Once I told the Lord in prayer that since I was alone, without Bible or other religious books, without sermons, without brethren, He should speak to me directly. If He could speak to Pharaoh and Nebuchadnezzar, He could speak to me, too, even if I were the last of evildoers. Then I heard His voice (His sheep normally hear it) asking me the same question you ask: 'What is your name?' Now that you mention it, I wonder if I was wrong in attributing the voice to the Lord. Perhaps it was just you. I do not seem to realize yet how split I am. I might interpret as external voices, as revelations from God or whispers from the devil, what are just internal dialogues of a personality divided in two."

"What did you answer the Lord?"

"Stop being hypocritical! You know the answer to that. I can't be fooled any more. It was you who put the question, and it was 'me' who gave the answer. But as you wish to play this game, I'll tell you the story. I did not know the answer. I can introduce myself to everybody as Richard. But how do I tell Jesus that my name is Richard? Am I worthy of this name?

"St. Richard was an English peasant who, in a time of fierce persecution, was ordered to be imprisoned for his faith. When the arresting constable mounted his horse to ride to him, the animal went berserk, throwing his rider and injuring him fatally. So now Richard was charged with murder. The prosecution had a clear case. If he had not been a believer, the constable would not have mounted the horse to pick him up and so would not have fallen and died. As you see, Communist justice has had its predecessors.

"And now Richard was on the gallows. The hangman had difficulty fixing the noose of the rope. Richard, who was so good he could not bear to trouble anyone, bowed to the executioner and asked, 'May I help you? I am a peasant skilled in these things.' Allowed to do so, he fixed the noose, thanked the hangman graciously for his kind permission, and passed away. For this loving attitude toward the executioner and for his gentleness in all things he was given the name St. Richard. How could I dare to tell Jesus that I bear the same name as this man?

"Should I tell Him that I am a Christian? With the proud words ~Christianus sum~, 'I am a Christian,' the first disciples fearlessly entered the arena to be devoured by lions. I have often stood before a cage of lions at the zoo and asked myself honestly, 'Could I do that?' My answer is always, 'No, I would rather recant.'

"Well, to finish my story, I bowed to Jesus and told Him, 'Lord, I have no name. Allow me to take Yours and to say like Paul that it is not I who live, but You in me.' So He allowed it. At least, that is what I thought at the time. Now I know that it was all a mistake. You allowed it; that is, I gave myself the kind permission to be called by the name of Christ. I am unsurpassed in humility, it seems."

"Keep to the rules of the game. We are two different persons. I am I and you are you. If you say that you are no longer you, but that Christ lives in you, let us draw the ultimate conclusion. Perhaps you have no individual soul any more. Buddhists deny its existence. Salvation consists in being freed from the illusion of having a soul. Would you agree now? Ha, ha. I caught you there. If you answer, you live still. And if you don't answer, I have triumphed in this discussion. I could do this only because I am. And as you and I are one and the same person, we continued to live - unlike Paul, who asserted that he had ceased to be."

"I have nothing to answer. I cannot tell you in words anything about myself, not even whether I exist. A man described in words is not the real man, any more than a God described in words is the real God. It is useless to continue along these lines."

"Then may I ask you another question? Do you have the Holy Spirit?"

"I surely have Him, but He does not have me. The union is an unhappy one. But you are comical. You are a prisoner. So am I. And here we sit discussing metaphysics when my mind is obsessed with just one thought: I am terribly hungry. I would eat acorns, grass, mice - anything. My wife must also be in some cell. Her predominant obsession must also be hunger."

His talking about hunger reminded me of my stomach. The visit ceased without even a polite word of parting. I simply was alone again. As usual, the physiological was victorious. I am hungry, and I am indignant against the churches of the West, about whose riches I have heard, some of which spend on chandeliers what could feed us all for a whole month. And I am angry with those who keep us hungry. Love, like every other spiritual energy, is food transformed and sublimated. When you are very hungry, how can you love the one who starves you?

I am sorry I could not finish the discussion I had when I visited myself. I would have liked to ask myself just one more question: "Do you approve of violence against atheist tyrants?"

You have eaten. Visit God, visit your brethren, but never forget to visit yourself too. The prodigal son "came to himself." Amen.

HAPPY NEW YEAR, MY BELOVED FRIENDS

Outside, the wardens interrupt the silence. They wish one another a happy new year. It is midnight. The year 1948 has passed. I cannot congratulate Jesus. It has been 1915 years since He was crucified. The 1916th nail will now be driven into His cross.

I know that every doubt of mine causes Him more pain, as if a new dart were piercing His heart. But He has asked us to go further than that, if necessary, in order to have life. He invites us to eat His flesh and drink His blood, as lions devour an innocent victim, as if it were only by disembowelling the Godhead that we can find out what it is. He wishes to be known more than He wishes to be caressed. Excessive desire to know the truth is not a vice. I cannot live without knowing God. I don't consider modesty in questioning Him a virtue.

There was a time when Jesus "had no fault, or I no fault could spy, when He was all beauty or all blindness I."

But now, since I have nothing left in this whole world but my wit to live by, it has begun to value itself very highly. All else seems of little importance. My wit has questions to ask and I cannot stop it.

I have liked very much the story of St. Christopher. He was branded with red-hot irons, roasted over a fire, and cooked in boiling oil, but suffered no pain and was not bothered by this kind of treatment. Observing this, almost fifty thousand persons were converted. A drop of the saint's blood healed someone who was accidentally injured while watching Christopher's execution.

I like a God who does miracles of such magnitude.

I realize now that the New Testament had never satisfied me really, because I found the miracles recounted there much too small for the Son of God. Three people were resurrected, but millions of corpses remained dead. Only three families had the comfort of seeing their beloved ones restored to life. Many widows whose only sons died remained without consolation. Jesus stilled a storm, but on so small a lake as Galilee. Tempests on the ocean sank countless ships, and men drowned. He did not help them. On one occasion 4,000 and on another 5,000 (plus women and children) had a good dinner through miracles performed by Him. What about the next day when they were hungry again? And what about the millions who have starved throughout the ensuing centuries?

He sent an angel to free Peter from prison. The incident stands alone. James was beheaded, and since then thousands have been martyred. Why?

How can the world go on? It is New Year's Eve. Everywhere people speak to each other, trying to spread joy among themselves.

Solomon sacrificed in Gibeon, a place forbidden by law because the tabernacle was not there (1KI 3:4).

You did not mind but spoke words of goodness and blessing in that place to the man who, even after he had a vision of You, continued to do many wicked things. I might be wicked, too, but have pity on a lonely man. I know You do only small miracles. Do just a very little thing more. Speak to one single prisoner out of thousands.

page 86 ALONE WITH GOD

I don't understand You. Don't You have power enough? Don't You have the will to wipe away all tears? Could You make only a couple of big saints like Christopher? Why did he not suffer pain when he was burned? Why did St. Lawrence engage in pleasantries while roasted on a gridiron, whereas I feel intensely even the pain of a slap or a kick? Over 45,000 were converted at Christopher's death. Even this does not satisfy me, as I always decried the boasting of evangelists about how many decided for Christ at their meetings. I compared their figures with those who had decided on the same night for pubs, gambling houses, places of perdition, and heathen religions.

Love is compared with death in SOS 8:6. Death is satisfied with nothing less than absolutely all men. Till now only two have escaped death: Enoch and Elijah. But some say they will come back to earth and will be the prophets that are slain, about whom we are told in Revelation 11. If so, they will have to pay their tribute to death, too.

As death wants everyone, so I want all men for the Kingdom.

I made a crucifix out of bread, an ugly crucifix. I had never modelled anything before. And the bread was darker than most bread.

I look to You hanging on the cross. You are silent. Again I have to guess what Your answer may be.

If I were in the pulpit today dressed in a beautiful cassock, I would speak about the one great miracle, that a lonely Galilean who hung upon a horrible cross became the subject of thousands of confident songs, that the painful execution of a Man deemed a criminal proved to be the means of salvation for the whole world.

But inwardly I would be dissatisfied. What you have done is beautiful, but too little for an almighty God who could make the whole drama cease at once. Why are You silent?

Perhaps it is not good for me to know or to escape suffering. Perhaps suffering is the way to the other shore. But are You not almighty? Could you not have made an easier way, so that men might get to heaven by passing through valleys in which roses and lilies grow?

Probably ~I~ am too small - not Your miracles. I am a disciple of Yours. But Christianity is the only profession in the world in which men remain disciples for life and never become independent workers. As for the few workers, they don't strive to become master builders (1CO 3:10), as were Paul, Peter, Thomas, Catherine of Siena, Calvin, and Luther. How could an architect explain his designs to a disciple? Only a master builder could understand him.

If I grow, I will know. You are like Gulliver among dwarfs. Even You cannot bow so low that we may be able to understand something. We have to take the word of Augustine: "Whatever right reason suggests to you as more perfect, you may be sure that God has already made it, for He is the creator of all things good." I suppose that all the beautiful things I crave exist, but I cannot see them yet.

We must also reject the mistaken notion that a whole can be perfect only if each of its parts is perfect.

Iago is vicious, an intrigue-maker and a liar, but he is a necessary part in a perfect work of art, Othello. For my part, I am in a small cell. We are all confined to too small a world. Imperfections seen by me can be a useful part of a perfect reality.

Thank You for one more year. I will try to use it well for growth. Perhaps I will question You less next New Year's Eve.

page 88 ALONE WITH GOD

Happy and enlightened New Year to you, my former congregation.

DEAR BRETHREN AND SISTERS

After producing many beautiful compositions, Robert Schumann began to hear bizarre noises in his head. He spoke about "a splendid music, played by instruments which give more beautiful tunes than those existing on earth." He tried to write them down. The result was cacophony. But he desired only that music. One day he threw himself into the Rhine. Fishermen saved him, but his mind was gone. He died in an asylum.

Suicide or madness will probably be my end too, because I have also heard strange music. I can't even try to notate it, not being skilled at composing music, so I will try to explain it in words. Pray while listening. But be careful it is music that invites you to leave this world.

A Russian brother related to us how he once explained the Gospel to a young girl. He told her about the Paradise that awaits the believer. She put her trust in Jesus. One stormy winter day she left the house. The next morning she was found frozen to death, with bared breast. Did she undress herself in order to die and go more quickly to Paradise? We shall never know. But strange things happen in mysterious, holy Russia. We had given Bibles to Russian soldiers. Later, one of them entered a church and slaughtered a lamb before the image of Jesus. This was the little he had understood from the Bible, and he acted upon it without hesitancy.

The music I hear is an invitation not to wait for a paradise after death but to come to it immediately. If you want to see this music in an image, look at a statue of Krishna dancing and playing a flute to invite girls to come to his temple. But don't think you have seen an idol. Rather, it is an archetype of the collective unconscious. It is music that invites you to do the most foolish and unacceptable things because that is how it impresses you. The explanation for what you felt you had to do comes later. It was the music that caused the Jews to say at Mount Sinai, "Naase venishma" - "We will do and we will hear" (EXO 24:7). The doing comes before the hearing - not the contrary.

But there is also something else in this music, something terrifying, that drives you mad.

For a long time I have made it a habit to be awake only during the night. Great spiritual battles are usually fought at night. You sense in the darkness the occult forces that inspire murderers and thieves, who also perform their works of iniquity during the night. Stalin worked during the whole night.

I pray for a time and then just listen. From immeasurable Satanic depths, fiery darts are thrown at the soul. St. Marguerite Alacoque once saw the virgin Mary, who told her, "I wish to put in your heart a few of the darts which hurt me and my Son." The devil also wishes to make you share his pain. Once his dart enters your heart, even manna becomes tasteless to you. You prefer to remain hungry rather than eat something that comes from God.

During the war a badly wounded SS officer fell prisoner to the British. He urgently needed a blood transfusion. He asked, "What kind of blood will it be?" He was told, "British." His reply was, "I prefer to die rather than have non-German blood introduced into my veins." He stuck to his convictions till death overtook him.

This tune is the counterpoint to God's music. You can never hear the latter without Satan's accompaniment to it, which is even more attractive to our hearts than the angelic choir.

"Commit Suicide," this music commands. "You are called to be great. Why do you need Jesus as your Messiah? What if you are the Messiah? Or, if you consider the place of the Messiah already occupied, the role of Antichrist is still free. He will rule the world. People once described you as a fascinating preacher Thus your fascination could be increased. Just try."

And then you hear serene, calm, angelic playing on harps. It is so beautiful you remain in ecstasies before it, but it does not convince. It does not satisfy desire like the first.

Once I had the experience of speaking with a messenger of a Satanist conventicle. I had never seen him before. Even now I could not explain how it happened that one day I found myself sitting before him. What he told me and what he proposed to me was so terrible that I never told it to anyone except saintly Bishop Muller, who I knew would take the secret to his grave. Does this conventicle have the means of pursuing me by telepathy even in my subterranean cell? But it is those with a persecution complex who feel themselves pursued by inimical forces. So perhaps I am already a madman. On the other hand, I cannot see how one can be as badly persecuted as I am without being paranoid.

How about my beginning to persecute them? If they can influence men to evil from afar, I could pursue them with good on condition that I become a great center of spiritual energy. Here you have megalomania following the mania of persecution. Where can I find the answers?

With God? Then isn't it best to commit suicide and go ask Him directly, since here on earth He leaves my mind blurred?

Here or in some other world I want to spread good far away. To love my neighbor is too little for me. Jesus promised that the righteous will shine like suns in the kingdom of the Father. A sun gives life to billions of beings. He has promised this, and I will not accept less. I have become righteous through faith in Jesus. He did not say that the righteous will have to wait decades until they die and then become suns. I have to become a sun immediately, to fill the world with light and goodness, to bring whole nations to Christ.

Theologians would tell me that it is not my responsibility to do this, but it must be done by the church universal, of which I am only a small part. But theology ceases at the threshold of this prison and on the threshold of madness.

I wish to be a Christ in miniature. The words "a miniature" are a concession on my part. This call, too, is in the music I hear. I cannot put it in words, even as Schumann could not put it into notes. He went mad and threw himself into the river. After hearing this music, you tell Jesus, "Give Yourself to me wholly, or leave me wholly." Amen.

DEAR BRETHREN AND SISTERS

Preachers in the pulpit should be very careful about what they say and how they say it. They must be selective. I must not. Why? King Abimelech and Phichol, the chief captain of his host, said to Abraham "God is with thee in ~all~ that thou doest" (GEN 21:22). I can say all I think. I am blessed in everything.

A fly once sat quietly on the horn of a bull. After a while, overcome by scruples, it said, "Mr. Bull, it may be that my presence here displeases you. If so, I apologize and will leave."

"Don't feel bad," the bull answered. "You can bring your whole family to live on my horn. It really does not matter to me."

Peter was called a rock (MTT 16:18). It is a matter of indifference to a rock from which side the wind blows.

I have become hard like a horn. Therefore, come, thoughts of whatever kind; better plague me instead of plaguing someone else. I can bear you.

I can even bear the proud feeling that I am important. Not only can I bear it, I have to evoke it, because pride is an essential part of megalomania. I have decided to be mad. I have not yet chosen my specific kind of madness. But I incline towards this.

There are two extremes. King Lear prayed, "O, let me not be mad, not mad, sweet heaven. Keep me in temper, I would not be mad." His prayer was not answered. He became mad. Rimbaud, on the contrary, had made it his aim to practise a long, tremendous, and reasoned derangement of all his senses in order to reach the unknown. If reason proved itself unable to reach the unknown, he concluded, how else could it be reached than through disordering reason intentionally? He never became mad, though he did become very vicious.

Jesus, St. Paul, and the apostles must have worked upon their characters in a certain way in order to convince so many men that they were mad or drunk.

The Beghards in the thirteenth century must have done something, similar to what some Pentecostals do nowadays, to help spread the rumor about them that they made wolfish howlings in their fits of religious raving.

In a sense, everybody is mad. Some are mad for money, others for sexual partners. The Communists are mad for power. I wish definitely to be mad for God. Just as one has to work oneself up to the other kinds of madness, one has to work oneself up for this, too. It seems that it is human destiny to become mad. If it is our fate to be drowned, then rather in a sea of perfume than in a ditch of mud.

There exists also a mad loyalty. One of Shakespeare's fools said:

> That, sir, which serves and seeks for gain
> And follows but for form,
> Will pack when it begins to rain
> And leave thee in the storm.
> But I will tarry, the fool will stay
> And let the wise man fly.

If I remain reasonable, there is a good chance that I will end by betraying the underground Church. Only fools can remain loyal when they are so terribly hungry.

I am quite determined to become mad. My madness will be to believe that I have the Godhead living in me. Whoever thinks like this is called by others a megalomaniac. And the accusation is not even false. Such a man really considers himself great.

The commandments on Moses' tablets are given in the singular form. Not "ye" but "thou" shalt not do this or that. God tells ~me~ how to behave. Christ says, "Blessed art ~thou~" (MTT 16:17) to the man to whom it is revealed that Jesus is the Son of God. ~My~ defects are criticized in the Bible. So I must be important. The Bible is God's dialogue with ~me~.

The renowned Jewish philosopher Spinoza once wrote, "There is no foe to progress like self-conceit and the laziness which self-conceit begets." But prison life is not favorable to the development of humility.

Just because we are continually abused, dressed in what looks like zebra-skins, beaten, insulted daily with obscene words, an over-compensation takes place in our minds. I must be very important if such a powerful movement as Communism, which rules unchallenged one third of the world, considers it absolutely necessary to keep me in an isolated, subterranean cell and endeavors to break my body and mind. If they did not do so, my life in liberty could endanger their existence.

I am unspeakably hungry. I think sometimes about those who survived the Nobile expedition to the North Pole and were suspected of having eaten the corpse of one of their comrades who had frozen to death. I wonder if I would not have done the same thing.

There is mould on my bread. It is green. As often as I get it - once a week - it reminds me of PSA 23: "He makes me to lie down in ~green~ pastures." My whole body has tremblings which I cannot control.

I cannot speak well any more. I have not spoken for years. I stutter when I report in a few words a need to a warden. One of them told me, "You're an idiot. Don't you see that you can't even formulate a sentence?" He said this to one who remembered being considered a good preacher in times past.

I could easily yield to the strong impulse to become a madman in the full sense of the word, if I did not know that I am surrounded by the love of a multitude of Christians, by a real wall of prayers, as many other Christians are not. What makes me so important in their eyes?

What in my preaching and in myself is so great that the Communists have to warn men against my influence and seek to break me?

Am I really great?

I believe I am. I vaguely remember the name of Bernhard de Palissy as the inventor of porcelain. He was a Protestant, and the French King Henry III, a Catholic, to whom he had endeared himself, said to him one day, "I will be compelled to give you up to your enemies unless you change your religion."

Palissy answered, "I pity you for having given utterance to the words 'I shall be compelled.' What unkingly words! No power in the world can compel me, a manufacturer of earthenware, to change my convictions because a mob wills it."

All my torturers are compelled to torture me. They know that if they refuse they will share my fate. I am beyond compulsion. So are all my brethren in faith. Therefore we are the only ones who really exist. I ~am~, because I am myself. And I am great, because I am ~I~.

There is a hymn "How Great ~Thou~ Art." In the maddening circumstances of the solitary cell, I could almost compose a hymn, "How Great ~I~ Am," I, the Bible's only concern.

The Bible tells me about my salvation, about God's being amazingly eager to have me in His Heaven.

Scripture does not solve national problems. A scrap of newspaper found in the toilet informed us that the state of Israel was founded. Judaism will not have solved its worries through this event. The new state will have its trouble, just as Romanians who were never scattered have had theirs, going from one distress to another.

Empires have passed away without ever having their problems solved.

The Bible does not solve the problem of the division of mankind into social classes. "The poor always ye have with you" (JHN 12:8).

The Bible does not solve religious problems. Two thousand years after Christ there are still hundreds of religions. Christianity itself is divided.

The Bible speaks about me.

I must be important if my captors strive so hard to break me and God strives so hard to uplift me.

The Bible speaks about me as being a god (JHN 10:34), a sinner (ROM 3:23), a seed (1CO 15:42), and the ground (MTT 13:8). The Kingdom of God is within me (LUK 17:21). Would you like to know where Christ lives? I can give you His exact address: "Christ lives in me" (GAL 2:20), within ~me~, the abused prisoner kept in prison cell No. 7. I am dust (GEN 3:19), but a dust apart, which will live eternally (JHN 11:25).

If a man renounces everything for Christ's sake, everything becomes full of Him. How can one be humble when he fills the universe? How can one be humble when he can speak the seemingly blasphemous words which put him on an equal footing with God, "I can do all things" (PHP 4:13)? Let the addition be "through Christ who strengthens me." Whatever the circumstances that make me so powerful, it still remains that I am great. "I can do all things."

In modern languages "God of Abraham" or "God of Isaac" are three words. In Hebrew the corresponding expression ~Elohei-Abraham~, united by the orthographical sign called ~mappekh~, makes "God of Abraham" a single word. God can leave me only if He takes me with Him, so united have we become. The Kabbala says, "God with Israel is God. God without Israel is not God."

I pace up and down my small cell. It has room for three steps. I do not allow my captors to dictate how many steps I should walk; I always walk just two steps. This limited space I occupy falsely tempts me to consider myself small and insignificant. We all live in too-small inner universes. We are great. When Jesus arranged the miraculous draught of fish, He allowed only ~great~ fish to enter the net (JHN 21:11).

We are one with God through Christ. God is one. He is so much one that in giving birth to a Son, in emanating the Spirit, in uniting with millions of men, He never abandons His absolute oneness. Schiller complained, "Two souls live within my breast." He should have thrown them both out and allowed himself the privilege of an indestructible oneness with God. Then he would have been great without ever having written a poem or drama. There would be no need of a pedestal any more in order to seem great.

I sit hungry, with chains on my legs, in a subterranean cell. I stutter when I speak some banality and I am great.

As children of God we are so great that we do not have to fear the supernatural world. It fears us. St. James wrote, "Resist the devil, and he will flee from you." The devil did not flee from the archangel Michael but battled courageously against him (REV 12:7). From me he simply flees. The disciples of the Lord can drive out demons with a few simple words.

The Indian Christian mystic Sadhu Sundar Singh once found himself in the Himalayas and entered a cave to rest. But as soon as he lay down, he observed in the depths of the cave the glimmering eyes of a tiger. Sadhu begged God to save him and walked out softly. He succeeded. The beast had not moved. But once outside he was filled with remorse. He was a child of God. He should not have walked out. The tiger should have yielded to him. So he prayed for this, re-entered the cave, and this time the tiger walked out leaving Sadhu alone.

But the marvel is that we have power over not only evil forces, but also over good angels. Jacob fought with a good angel and prevailed (GEN 32:24, HOS 12:4). Our heavenly Bridegroom Himself says to the faithful soul, "Turn away thine eyes from me, for they have overcome me" (SOS 6:5). The faithful soul is of such irresistible beauty in God's sight that He is conquered the moment He hears our voice. Jesus promises, "Ye shall ask what ye will, and it shall be done unto you" (JHN 15:7), which means that we will have the victory in every conversation with God.

I believe in God. I have this power. I am something. And here in my prison cell, which might as well be a psychiatric ward since to a certain extent I have long since gone mad, knowing what the grace of Christ has made of me, I will dare to sing the song that expresses what every Christian thinks in the depths of his heart but does not dare to say in so many words: "Then sings my soul, my Savior God to Thee? 'How great I am, how great I am.'"

That I feel unworthy and weak does not count. When Zacharias, the father of St. John the Baptist, hesitated to believe the promise of God saying, "I am an old man" (LUK 1:18), he received this reply from the divine messenger: "I am Gabriel." In Hebrew the word "I" has two forms, ~Ani~ and the amplified ~Anohi~. Somewhere there might be a little "I" named "Richard." But it has been amplified by angels and by Christ Himself, and now it is great.

Mock me as much as you like, torturers. Your abuses have had just the opposite effect from what you expected. You have not humiliated me. You have shown me my greatness.

"I will praise thee; for I am fearfully and wonderfully made" (PSA 139:14), says David, uniting words of self-admiration with words of gratitude towards the One to whom we owe our greatness.

I thank you, God, that I am great. Amen.

DEAR BRETHREN AND SISTERS

My blurred reason swings like a pendulum from one extreme to the other. I know that my sermons are not well balanced. Yesterday I was full of admiration for my great "I." Such a sermon I would never have delivered from a pulpit. If it reaches you from my prison cell, take it with reservations. Not all sermons are the expression of objective truth. Sometimes they just reflect a transitory mood of the preacher. Just as a song is not a succession of single notes or chords but is heard in between, unwritten, so God's revelation is not in any one sermon, but runs as a theme between sermons.

Now I feel just the opposite of the way I felt yesterday. How could I admire myself?

If there were a human being with the right to self-admiration it was the Virgin Mary. She was of a purity which all the lilies on earth and all the stars in the sky could envy. She was filled with passionate love for God. I do not know any human being who might have been as God-like as Mary.

She had the dual honor of being a princess and a virgin, not only in body but also in spirit. She was a great poet. Her song is outstanding. Referring to her words, "Henceforth all generations shall call me blessed" (LUK 1:48), Spurgeon said, "I suppose Protestant generations are among the 'all' who ought to call her blessed" (Charles Spurgeon, ~Christ's Names and Titles~).

Legend says that it was St. Luke's hobby to paint pictures of Mary. One is supposedly in Italy. This legend might not be true. But it is certain that Luke painted a beautiful picture of her in his Gospel. To contemplate this picture is ennobling.

An angel spoke directly to her, but she never said the foolish words which I said yesterday, "How great I am!" While Gabriel showed her his respect, she called herself a "handmaid of the Lord" and was humble in her dealing with the divine messenger. She responded, "Be it unto me according to thy word" (LUK 1:38). Luther writes "Mary, after the annunciation, does not boast does not shout, 'I have become the mother of God,' she asks for no honor, but works in the house like before, milks the cows, cooks, washes dishes, sweeps and is busy with little, despised things, as a maid or housewife should do and as if she would disdain the great gifts and graces. Women and neighbors don't consider her as something higher than before. Neither did she ask for it but she remained a poor woman among the little people."

She had understood the full depth of his words, "The power of the Highest shall overshadow thee" (LUK 1:35). When God intervenes in the life of a man, he begins to love the shadow. The bride in SOS 2:3 says about her beloved, "I sat down under his shadow with great delight."

"In the shadow of his hand has he hid me," says Isaiah (ISA 49:2).

Self-admiration is false. How the wardens and officers take pride in their uniforms. They are as sure that they prepare the future happiness of mankind as their enemies are sure that the Communists are devils. Every nation, religion, party and caste sees only ideal qualities in itself and chops off the heads of others in order to appear taller.

How horribly wrong were my feelings yesterday. I was enamored of myself. It was only after I delivered the sermon that I remembered ROM 15:3, "Christ pleased not himself." He would not allow a young man to call Him "good." Neither did He have a bias for the religion of His childhood. He called the temple a den of thieves. I do not think He is much in love with what is commonly called the Christian Church either, although it bears His name. He sees His picture painted on walls and stained glass windows. Inside, a priest or pastor fulfils the role of a businessman, and even this he does not do well. Proof of it is the fact that the "grocers" who attempt to sell spiritual commodities increasingly lose customers.

Jesus did not please Himself. The virgin Mary did not. Should I congratulate myself because I did the Lord the kindness of repenting of my sins and receiving His forgiveness?

Did I even really repent? The Bible speaks of sackcloth and ashes as the outward evidence of true repentance. I try in vain to remember even one acquaintance who ever repented like this. What man is there who, in order to think uprightly, to believe only what is based on fact, to have faith and not credulity, to avoid any uncontrolled thoughts, to judge dispassionately, in a disinterested manner, resisting any pressure, hatred, preference, fear or illusion, even if this meant being stripped of everything - what man chooses to be clothed in nondescript rags and to have, instead of a warm fireside, only the ashes of a fire quenched long before?

Where is the man who has repented so deeply that he is willing to renounce even eternity if he thought it a hindrance to the fulfillment of the Kingdom? Who has repented so whole-heartedly that Jesus and only Jesus counts?

We repent of our sins and then commit the sin of admiring our repentance, instead of repenting of it as of a trespass because it is superficial.

Yesterday my torturers secured my legs with a rope. Then they wedged a stick between the bonds. The stick was turned until the rope, tightened to the breaking point, bit deeply into the flesh. Their torture prejudices us against them so that we cannot concede that they are right in their thinking. Holiness is the same thing as ideal Communism. Holiness means to have nothing of your own, no material goods, no sin, no righteousness of your own, not even repentance of your own. Holiness is perfect communion or sharing with Jesus and the saints. Our lives should have been Jesus and only Jesus. Then the Communists would have become Christians.

An artist sang ~Rigoletto~ badly. People booed her. Indignant, she said to her colleagues, "What an uneducated audience! They dare to jeer Verdi!" They did not jeer the composer but the performer. I believe that those who beat us opposed not Christ but us Christians who admired ourselves without reason.

Every man's energy budget is fixed. The more he spends on one activity the less remains for something else. It is vain to spend energy on self and self-admiration when we need all our energy for things of eternal value. I know that today's sermon is just the opposite of yesterday's. A pastor would never dare contradict himself so obviously in the pulpit. He is under compulsion to be consistent in order to be respected. But I am free simply because I am in a solitary cell. Contradictory thoughts and sentiments pass through my mind just as they do through yours. I give you all of me.

The whole philosophy of the Christian mystics is contained in the following parable. Once there were three beautiful birds in the same tree. The one in the topmost branches was serene, enthroned in majesty, immersed in its own glory. In the lower branches, the second was agitated because the fruit it tasted was bitter, while the third found the fruit tasty, but the sweetness lasted only as long as the food was on its little tongue. In their common disappointment, the two latter birds hopped higher and higher on the branches until they approached the serene bird. Losing themselves in its glory, they discovered that there had never been three birds but only one - the majestic one.

I told you in one sermon my feeling of being exalted, in another my humiliation. While composing the first I felt well, but alas, for such a short moment. Humiliation on the other hand is bitter. With my false glory and worthless humility I came to the divine bird that wishes to gather her little ones under her wings. Here both states of heart disappeared. There is none other than the one Jesus. All the rest is illusion, not worth mentioning. Amen.

page 106 The Shadow Has Been Brought Backward

DEAR BRETHREN AND SISTERS

King Hezekiah of the Jews was sick. The prophet Isaiah had promised him that he would recover and, yielding to his request, promised him a sign that this would happen. Now, Hezekiah had a sundial. Isaiah prayed, and the Lord "brought the shadow ten degrees backward" (2KI 20:11).

Many find it difficult to believe that the shadow went backward ten hours, but the Bible does not claim this. It is written "ten degrees," not "ten hours." The degrees could have been minutes, or even less.

Neither must we suppose that, for the performance of this miracle, the earth would have had to turn backward on its axis, contrary to its natural course. The phenomenon could have occurred by means of refraction. A ray of light is refracted from a straight line by passing through a medium of another density. Because of the refracting power of the atmosphere, the sun, when rising or setting, seems to be higher above the horizon than it really is. The miracle could have been performed by means of refraction.

The Jewish sundial had a unique form. In 2KI 9:13 it is written that the friends of Jehu, when he was proclaimed king, "took every man his garment, and put it under him on the top of the stairs." The Targum of Rabbi Joseph (a Targum is an Aramaic translation of a book) here used the words ~lidrag sheaiya~, meaning the hour-steps. The division of time was shown by a shadow projected on stone steps, gradually ascending to a certain height.

This also gives meaning to the title of Psalms 120 through 134, "Songs of Degrees." They are Psalms through whose meditation you can advance in time, but also return to former times on certain occasions.

Try to understand what a gift Hezekiah received. Not only did the shadow on the sundial return but also the time indicated by the shadow. He was younger. A few minutes or hours were as if they had not passed yet. All hours and days belong to God, and He can let you relive today an hour from thirty years ago.

At Cana, Jesus changed the water into "good wine" (JHN 2:10). Good wine is old wine. So Jesus changed water not into a liquid which immediately became wine, but a liquid which had become wine long before. When a man is converted, not only are his present and future transformed, but also his past. He is changed into a man who has always been elect and righteous in God's eyes.

The shadow has gone backward on my sundial, too. I am a child again. Life is before me as if I had not lived it yet, and now I am free to change decisions that I think were wrong. Hindsight is always better than foresight. At my present age I know better what I should have done in childhood and in youth. Now I can go back and do it. Time is reversible for the faithful. We sing the songs of degrees and ascend and descend freely on the steps of time.

I am eight years old again. Until then I had never heard about Christ. On this particular occasion I came from school with another child. He stopped before a Catholic church and asked me to wait while he delivered a message to the priest. I preferred to enter with him and so found myself in a Christian church for the first time.

I understood absolutely nothing of what I observed. I saw someone hanging on a cross and wondered what horrible deeds He must have committed to be punished like that. I saw a beautiful lady with a child in her arms. You will say that I saw only the statues. It might be. I remember seeing the Crucified and a Lady. Now that the shadow has gone back on the sundial, I see that my memory is correct. Only blind men see crosses and statues in churches. There was the lady and a multitude of other beings looking benign, calm, loving (as people never look ordinarily). I wondered who these were and why they stood in this half-dark house in complete silence.

The boy spoke with the priest. I had not the slightest idea what a priest was. But this then came to me and caressed me on my head. Why don't priests do this more often? We bring our children to pastors that they might teach them. Children were brought to Jesus that He might touch them. The right touch of a man who knows how to bless is worth a thousand teachings.

He asked me, "What can I do for you, little fellow?" I answered, "Nothing. I just entered with my comrade." Then this priest (I found out after almost fifty years that his name was Giuseppe Cavane) told me, "I am the disciple of One who has taught me never to allow anybody to pass near me without doing him at least a little bit of good. It is hot outside. Would you allow me to bring you a cup of cold water?" I have drunk many beverages since then, but none tasted like this water.

I was stupid then. I left the priest without questioning him further. But now I am again a boy of eight. And I sit down near the priest and ask him more and more about this mysterious One who does good to everybody and teaches people to do the same. I would have heard that He is the One crucified for His goodness, that the beautiful lady was His mother, and that the beings with wings are his angelic host. Today I can become a disciple of Jesus from the age of eight.

I don't think that I would have listened to the priest very long. He probably would not have spoken much. It is so wrong to interrupt the silence of churches even with sermons and splendid music. Often nothing more is needed than just looking to Jesus. If he had explained to me that it was for my sins He suffered, it would have been enough.

And now I stand near the sad mother at the foot of the cross.

When I first saw her standing there, a scene flashed through my mind. I had been sick with typhus at a very early age. The doctor, who could not possibly imagine that I knew French, said to my mother in this language, "There is no hope. The child will die." I asked my mother, "What is death?" and she began to weep. She did not tell me. She did not know herself that it means a return to God. But Mary knows. She is sad, but confident. She looks much younger than He.

A sword pierces her heart. I will take it out of her heart. But how? I am so small and weak. Oh, if the shadow could advance faster on the sundial. I wish to grow, just enough to be able to do what I wish. Then I would ask her how we could help Jesus not to hang on the cross.

Mary, speak now and tell me that the whole dreadful scene has passed, that He is resurrected. How strange that I should have grown up as a Jew among Christian children and yet no one ever told me this until now. But He did suffer, and she, too.

I can make decisions anew. I will never again leave this building. How wrong it was to start Christian activities, to become a missionary, to accomplish rituals. One thing is needed: to sit quietly in this hushed place and to live the oneness.

A Russian soldier told us about an atheist lecturer who had come to an underground meeting. The Christian preacher asked him at the exit, "How many do you think were here?" He answered, "A hundred." The preacher replied, "This is what you saw. Actually, we were one, one soul and one heart. We are one person who bears the name 'hundred.' We are one who soars towards heaven, and heaven inclines towards us with all its beauties. If you could feel for one moment the rapture of this oneness, not only with our fellowmen but with the whole creation and with God, you would leave everything in the world for it."

No more is needed than to be just one. I can start life again. It will no longer lead an active but a contemplative life: the quiet enjoyment of oneness.

But no, it seems I am not made for this.

The priest in the church teaches me the who and the what of life. I grow up in the Church. The shadow on the sundial advances again, but slowly. I have time. The Church, a loving mother and teacher, also shows me how to lead the Christian fight. In my other life I had to guess at it and made many mistakes.

We know from the episodes of Gethsemane that the disciples of Jesus were armed. It is natural to have defensive weapons when you are threatened. Peter carried a sword but had no idea how to handle it. He cut off the right ear of the high priest's servant. What was the good of that? A policeman with a cut ear can still arrest your beloved. Don't fight - but if you have decided to fight, hit your adversary right on the head. Jesus then points out that the sword is not a toy, that you can perish from it. Whoever has inhibitions about the enemies of the Church and cuts off only ears had better keep his sword in its sheath.

God said, "The seed of the woman shall bruise thy (the serpent's) head." Instead of this, we sometimes tickle the serpent on the belly and make him laugh. It is all because we have not learned the "how." But I am young again and learn to handle the sword of the Spirit.

I have terrible pain. I seem to bear an aching skull, not a head. But this is from my other life. Now the sundial has gone back. It has reversed itself only for me. A whole generation of Christian fighters can arise. Those who have neglected their duty or have fulfilled it wrongly can make things right as of forty, fifty, or sixty years ago.

David was a man in whom God was pleased. But listen to his last words before he died. They were about Shimei, a man who had cursed God's anointed. David said to Solomon, "His hoar head bring thou down to the grave with blood. So David slept with his fathers" (1KI 2:9, 10). From the beginning of the Christian life to its last breath, the enemies of God have to be destroyed. Every man meeting you is given the dramatic alternative: either he will be saved or he will perish - if not by your hand, then through the faithful word which you told him and which he did not receive.

I had so many quarrels in my other life, even with brethren. I pace through my cell humming in Hebrew from memory the Psalms of Degrees. Now "I am for peace" (PSA 120:7), "My soul is even as a weaned child" (PSA 131:2).

In a democracy you must win the majority of people or of a congregation to see your will fulfilled. Not so with God. It is enough that two should agree on earth as touching anything, and it shall be done for them by the Heavenly Father (MTT 18:19).

But if couples disagree about contrary matters, don't they have to argue with each other? Now, by hindsight I can see that it is not necessary. The Father has unlimited time. He can move the shadow on the sundial forward and backward as many times as He likes. He also has a multitude of worlds. All couples will see their will fulfilled even if they differ.

Last night I dreamt that a monk complained to me that his superior was wicked, a kind of Torquemada. He told me this with joy, explaining that his superior, through making him suffer innocently, had accomplished something similar to opening a large bank account for him. All the cheques he draws are covered because God looks on the credit side. He has suffered.

In my former life I had shunned many sufferings. I had preferred to prevaricate rather than endure pain. A new opportunity has been given to me. Here you have my body and soul, all those who wish to hurt me. Do me a favor. I have a new life before me. It will be one of suffering, of renunciation.

I am free here of the necessity of being consistent in my preaching. This need causes preachers to leave great potentialities unused. No one is all of a piece. The part that you repress is also valuable and could also praise God.

In his autobiography, Charles Darwin notes that, as his interests became increasingly absorbed in science, he lost the pleasure in poetry and the plays of Shakespeare which had formerly been a prominent feature of his life. He might have done better in these than in biology. In freedom I, too, had given up parts of my interests in life.

Here everything is aflame.

How should I continue this sermon and how should I end it coming back to its main subject, the sundial? But why must the end of a sermon correspond to its beginning? Why must it have a logical conclusion?

I am tired now of preaching. Life will go on even without a continuation of my sermon. Good night, dear brethren. Amen.

page 114 A Religion Without God

DEAR BRETHREN AND SISTERS

There are many things we know that we don't know we know. The Lord said to His disciples, "Whither I go ye know, and the way ye know," to which Thomas replied, "Lord, we know not whither thou goest; and how can we know the way?" (JHN 14:4,5). Thomas knew but did not know that he knew. Jesus said of John the Baptist that he was Elias, the prophet of old, who was to come. John, when asked, said that he was not Elias. This man did not know the essence of his own being. How could he have known what his being knew?

It is only in the narrow limits of the circumstances in which I now find myself- alone for years in a solitary cell without any book or any impression from the outside, dependent upon my own inner resources to occupy myself - that I find a large unexplored field existing in my mind to which I have access.

Without any material to read, without anything happening to stimulate my mind, I think new and strange thoughts. I am conscious of knowing more than I knew before. From whence did I acquire this new knowledge? It is not through drawing further conclusions from what I knew before, through a process of reasoning. Who can reason when hungry and beaten? No, I had known these things for a long time. But one thing was missing: I had not ~known~ that I knew them.

Plato was right: "To know is to recognize."

Being alone is the prerequisite for plumbing your own depths. I would be much alone, aloof from you, the most dearly beloved, even if I were not in prison. Jesus said, "That the world may know that I love the Father," I leave the world and go to the Father (JHN 14:28,31). How would the villagers know that the bridegroom loved the bride if he amused himself with his friends while she was kept waiting for him? Jesus has to leave all his friends so that they may know He loves the Father.

Loving Him, He reveals to you His mysteries.

Do not believe the pastors who are constantly busy around you. Believe those who declare, "Hereafter I will not talk much with you" (JHN 14:30), as they contemplate their own depths. They might very well discover ultimate truths. You may not be aware of the fact. Their faces will not shine, because they will veil them as did Moses. They do not speak of these hidden experiences.

I am on my way to this contemplative state.

Last night I dreamt that an Orthodox Jew with a beard and curls asked me, "What is the other world?"

I answered, "It is where one has the answer. This world is the world of asking questions."

But I am already at the border of the other world. I begin to have the replies.

We have our first reply in the Bible. But scholars know that the Bible is like reality as defined by Planck and Heisenberg in modern physics, a wave of probabilities. You can never say what and where an elementary particle is and what it will do. You handle it by working on probabilities.

As for the Bible, we do not have such a book. There are countless manuscripts with many variations among them. The Hebrew language itself is very imprecise. It has no tenses. The same form of the verb can be used as a curse or only as a declaration that something bad may happen.

For example, in PSA 83:15 one and the same word can be translated as an imprecatory prayer, "Persecute them with thy tempest," or as a prediction, "Thou wilt persecute them with thy tempest."

A single Hebrew word sometimes has contrary meanings. ~Baruh~ means "blessed" and "cursed." ~Kedoshim~ means "saints" and "Sodomites." Much is left to the arbitrary decision of the translator.

There are parallel texts in many parts of the Hebrew: the ~Ketub~, the writing, and the ~Keri~ the rule of reading, which might differ greatly from the former. In 2KI 20:4, for example, is the ~hatser~, which means "yard." But the masoretic rule is to read ~hair~, which means "the town." The difference is great. In the first case, the prophet Isaiah is very near King Hezekiah, in the latter he is far away. The ~Ketub~ plus the ~Keri~ form the Hebrew Bible.

The situation is similar in the Greek. We can translate the word ~afes~ so that the Biblical text reads, "Forgive us our trespasses," or "Leave us our trespasses," in which case we would have a prayer to continue in our favorite sin.

Most of us read the Bible in translation. Every translation is a treason, even the translation of sentiments into words, but especially the translation of Hebrew or Greek words into another language or another mentality.

For the Nunggubaya in Australia the expression "Holy Spirit" could not be translated. They have nothing similar. So the translators have used instead "the pretty witch doctor in the sky." Consequently, in their Bible they read that when Jesus was baptized, a pretty witch doctor descended upon Him from the sky, and that those who believe and are baptized will have this pretty witch doctor on their side, which seems very curious to us.

But even the English is faulty. The words "Holy Spirit" are as curious and as inadequate as the words "pretty witch doctor," because "holy" comes from a word meaning "whole" and "spirit" comes from the Latin ~spirare~ meaning "to breathe"; therefore, "Holy Spirit" means to breathe deeply involving the whole lung.

In MRK 16:16, Jesus said, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved." For the Nunggubaya the expression "saved" was translated ~aniladi-in~, which means in their language "to receive a hard job." So whosoever believes will receive a hard job. The missionaries wondered why they preached and preached about being saved and had no converts!

Even in the original, the answers of the Bible are like the answers of science: every answer raises new problems.

But I am bound to this world only by a thin umbilical cord. My thoughts belong to the world of answers. I have always had them in me. I had not known that I had known them.

There exists a world in which man has no God because the separation has ceased. The Godhead exists. It created man. And man had a God. But when man returns to his Source there is union. In this context, you see that the holiest book in the Bible is Esther, in which the world "God" never occurs. For the obvious, no words or names are needed. Here you understand the Lord's prayer, "Hallowed be thy name." The original Greek is "Aghiatheto to onoma su," which, literally translated, means, "May thy name be taken away from the earth," so that instead of many names we would have the unnamed reality. (In Greek "a" = "un," "ghea" = "earth").

The Bible mentions a multitude of holy books inspired to proclaim the name of God. They have been lost. We no longer have them. They disappeared to indicate that there is a higher reality than a mere book: the ultimate reality about which it can only babble.

In Esther the word "God" is never mentioned. Not even in EST 4:3, in which we read that there was fasting, weeping, wailing, but no prayer to God. His help was taken for granted. Not many words are needed in intercourse between the "me" and "me." Jesus promises conquerors that they will sit with Him on His throne, just as He has conquered and now sits on His Father's throne. What God does a being have who sits on the throne of God from which worlds are created and ruled?

God's name is blasphemed because of our sins. His reality is beyond attack. In Him everyone lives and moves. There is no one to attack Him. The Communists rebel against His name, against what they fancy Him to be, against the manner in which we have represented Him. But there exists no real rebellion against Him. The Communists are not worse than Satan. Yet Satan himself could not touch Job without asking humble permission from God.

There also exists this sphere of the one reality, without an "I" and a "He." The book of Esther is its best expression.

I know only that this last reality is terribly, unbearably harsh. I know it, therefore I cannot live with it.

I prefer the first day of faith, when I knew that God is the "God of pardons" (NEH 9:17, in the original). But how can one receive forgiveness when he lives on the knowledge of unity with Godhead?

Having a God, you can reduce your obligations. The law of Moses prescribed that every Jew should give half a shekel to the temple annually. We read in the book of Nehemiah that the Jews were allowed to give only a third, contrary to the law. They had become poor after long years of slavery in Babylon. The laws of God are not implacable. The laws of reality, on the contrary, know no bargaining. When you fall from a height, you smash your head and that is that. When the clock runs out, you die.

So I prefer to turn off the knowledge of what I know and say like Luther, "I will have nothing to do with an absolute God. I will not try to study Him as God. I know that I cannot look at the sun. I must have a tinted glass to look through. I must have the person of the God-man to take away the blinding glory of the invisible God, invisible because too bright for my eyes to gaze upon. I must have God in Christ. I will not try to study anything else."

But perhaps we are unjust towards the book of Esther. Is the notion of God really absent from it? It is written in the Talmud, "In every place where you find the imprint of men's feet, there am I." Mordecai and his cousin Esther have left deep imprints in history. God is in the book. Amen.

page 120 Should I Pray to be Freed?

MY GOD

I know how to say "Our Father" but do not know what to add. Should I ask you for freedom? If so, why?

Once a businessman from Boston told Mark Twain, "I have attained much in life, but one great desire has remained unfulfilled, that is, to make a pilgrimage to the Holy Land."

"What will you do there?" asked Twain.

"I would like to ascend Mount Sinai and there read the Ten Commandments in Hebrew as they were given by God."

Mark Twain replied, "That's too complicated. Would it not be much more comfortable to remain in Boston and fulfill the Ten Commandments?"

It is not necessary to go to holy places in order to be pleasing to Thee. But neither is it necessary to be at liberty. Which commandment could I keep better in freedom than in a prison cell? Why should I move around? The lily stays in the same place and exhales its perfume.

What does it count that I am alone? I had this problem when I was pastor of the church. I had inherited from my predecessor a church with a small attendance. In the beginning I was sad about it. But then I quieted my heart and told the brethren, "Instead of worrying about those who are absent, let each of us multiply his zeal and fervor and love. It is for these that God looks out. If He finds one man with as much love as only a hundred men would normally have, He is satisfied."

In my solitary cell I am undisturbed. I can work on my character to develop the virtues of thousands.

I will not pray to be freed.

The apostles were afraid during a storm and wanted to be rescued. Jesus fulfilled their pleasure, and so they escaped drowning. In exchange they were later martyred. In this world rescue from temporary troubles cannot have any other result.

I will not pray for peace of heart. I have some kind of peace.

Conscience is like a triangle of metal in my heart. If I am good, it stands still and does not bother me. If I am bad it begins to circle and the angles hurt. If I am very bad, the angles lose their sharpness through much circling, and again I am not bothered. At this moment I am not troubled. What peace I have I cannot judge for myself. Neither do I have anyone with whom I can consult.

But either way I know that I am loved, because I suffer, and it is written, "He that has suffered in the flesh has ceased from sin" (1PE 4:1).

In his book about the Virgin Mary's song, Luther tells of a vision. Three virgins knelt before an altar. During the service a beautiful young man appeared and hugged the first girl and kissed her. He did not kiss the second, but smiled at her with great friendliness. As for the third, he hit her and pulled her hair. With this the young man disappeared.

Later the vision was explained. The first virgin symbolizes the selfish, unregenerate souls. God must do much good to them. He must fulfill their will towards them, not His own. They cannot live without receiving many blessings from God.

The second virgin represents those who have started to serve God but still need, at least from time to time, a friendly gesture from Him. They cannot simply love Him without expecting anything in return. They cannot simply love Him, whatever He does and however He behaves.

The third virgin, the Cinderella, represents the saintly soul who loves God without any ulterior motive. She simply loves. She is happy if He does good to others. Mary would have sung the same beautiful Magnificat if she had been told that another girl, yes, one who despised her, had been chosen by God to be the mother of the Lord. Such do not need the caresses of the Lord. They are happy to bear their cross for Him and pass through a dark night of the soul. If He wishes to abandon them while they undergo suffering, they do not complain. Everything is right only if it is His good pleasure. For these souls God multiplies the chastisings. "Whom the Lord loves he chastises, and scourges every son whom he receives" (HEB 12:6).

A great Master like You would not scourge someone personally. Therefore, the Communists might be Your tools for this purpose. If one were to judge by the number of beatings I have received, I must be very much beloved.

That would be good, but if I knew it and took undue satisfaction in it, I would not be like the third virgin. In the end, atheists also pass through suffering. The whole matter is too complicated for my poor reason.

The simplest thing is just to leave it and remain in peace, not trying to distinguish with my blurred mind if it is the right kind of peace or not.

I will sit still in this my hidden cell and look to You, the hidden God, without bothering You with any request.

I have given up the popularization of religion as contained in the creed, which speaks about God only as a creator. You are also the preserver and the destroyer. If it is not You who destroys, who does? You are not simply the Creator who left creation to develop as it would; You are the Creator of all things, including the angel called the Destroyer (EXO 12:23). You also created the microbes that kill. You are described as destroyer in Lamentations 2. You continually destroy lives that You have created. "The Lord kills and makes alive. He brings down to the grave, and brings up" (1SM 2:6). Both these activities bring You honor. I love You whatever You choose to do.

In Maramuresh there is a place called "the humorous cemetery," which expresses even today what the Dacians of history (the ancestors of Romanians) believed about death. They dressed in white and rejoiced when someone died. On every cross in this cemetery is carved some joyful scene from the life of the buried man. They knew that You destroyed this life in order to create another one.

I owe you the happiness which I had in my family and church. From Your hand I also receive the destruction of this happiness, which was necessary in order to replace it with the happiness of sitting in a subterranean cell, completely free of everything that disturbs, and of looking to the hidden God; the happiness of having passed from the holy place of the temple to the most holy place.

When Gehazi asked the Shunammite woman after her son had died, "Is it well with the child?" she answered, "It is well" (2KI 4:26). She would have said the same words on the day of the child's birth.

If I get tired looking at You and my mind is distraught, it does not matter. You never slumber nor sleep. You look at me.

When my son was small he asked me, "Father, what should I do? I am bored."

I told him, "Think about God."

His reply was, "Why should I think about Him with this little head of mine? Let Him think about me with His big head."

The apparatus at the great observatory of Mount Palomar is so sensitive that the heartbeat of the astronomer disturbs it. The simplest thing is to efface oneself completely, not to be bothered about what happens. I think it is never reality which bothers us; we are bothering reality. I will stop doing so. I have You as Father in Heaven. I lovingly called You "Father." This is all. No other prayer is needed, and no request.

I will not ask to be freed. Amen.

GOD

Mankind is innocent, if looked upon from a certain perspective. An X-ray of a pretty girl's cranium doesn't look any better than that of a gorilla.

The Bible is full of good news, including Paul's declaration, "All have sinned and come short of the glory of God" (ROM 3:23).

If this is true, then before I ever sinned I was a man much sinned against. "There is none righteous, no, not one" (ROM 3:10). Thousands of ancestors have transmitted their heredity to me through the genes, programming almost all of my future characteristics. And not one of these ancestors was righteous. Then all my heredity must be terribly bad. I have been educated by grandparents, parents, teachers. Of what quality were they? The same apostle says, "There is none that does good, no, not one" (ROM 3:12). I did not have one to give me the right instruction.

"Behold, I was shapen in iniquity," says the Psalmist (PSA 51:5). Since when does any reasonable person hold it against a statue for being ugly? Only the sculptor is responsible. "All have sinned." Absolutely every man with whom I have come in contact since early childhood has sinned against me. I was buffeted to and fro long before I said or did the first wrong thing. So, God, looks upon me not so much as a sinner but as a man sinned against, who, under continual provocation and surrounded only by bad examples, commits some iniquitous deed. Even a human court acquits in such a case.

I used to ask people who confessed some sin, "Tell me something about your parents and grandparents."

Often enough it was to give them some relief. One had quarrelled. His parents had been choleric, quarrelsome. A preacher had fallen repeatedly into adultery and justified it on the basis that Abraham, too, had been a polygamist. He had not realized the connection between this and the fact that his father had been jailed for a sexual crime. It helped one who fought against the impulse of gambling to know that his father had been a compulsive gambler.

It is worthwhile trying to learn the beginnings of a man's sin. There is always some seducer, some bad book, some tendentious movie. A mountain of sin has fallen upon us and crushed us morally before we ever sin.

"All have sinned" - this is the comforting news that You give us. It is not that I alone happen to be a wicked evil-doer or that I alone, though living in a pure paradise and surrounded only by angels and saints, have started to sin out of pleasure or perversity.

Nor is it only the influence of other men that has made me sin. I belong to nature, a nature that is not morally neutral. "The creature was made subject to vanity" (ROM 8:20). It is in the "bondage of corruption" (ROM 8:21). There is something in my body, in my very nerves, that compels me to sin.

I will remind You of an extreme case.

Robert Ledrue, who had been in his youth one of the foremost detectives of France, was given the assignment to investigate a murder that occurred in Le Havre. A man who bathed in the sea at night was shot when he came out of the water. Nobody knew the motive for the murder. But the murderer had left prints in the sand and a bullet in the victim.

Ledrue investigated, went to the head of the police and asked to be arrested. He had found out that he himself had been the murderer. It was a unique case. The bullet had been shot from a special kind of revolver possessed by only four men. He was one of them. The imprints in the sand showed that the murderer lacked the big toe on the right foot. Ledrue's had been amputated. The detective was sure that he was the murderer but did not remember having killed anyone and knew no motive for doing so.

He asked to be kept permanently under surveillance by police. They discovered that he was a somnambulist. Later he shot at another person while wandering around at night, completely unconscious of what he was doing. Fortunately, the police had filled his revolver with harmless bullets. After shooting, he returned quietly to his home and went to bed, with no idea of what he had done.

For murder while in a state of somnambulism, Ledrue was sentenced to lifelong isolation on a solitary farm under police surveillance.

What is our state when we commit crimes? Jesus said of His executioners, "They know not what they do." St. Peter said, "Ye killed the Prince of life ... I know that through ignorance ye did it, as did also your rulers" (ACT 3:15,17).

How much is a man responsible for what he does? St. Paul wrote, "The evil which I would not, that I do. Now if I do that I would not, it is no more I that do it, but sin that dwells in me" (ROM 7:19,20). In this passage sin appears as a foreign intruder against whom I am helpless, just as I am helpless against a massive attack of tuberculosis microbes. It is not something I have courted deliberately with my reason and will.

Benjamin was found with a stolen cup in his sack, put there not by himself but by Joseph's servants (GEN 44:2). So what appears as my sin, the stolen cup in my character, is the result of innumerable actions of men, all sinners, who shaped my life, all abetted by what has become disorderly in nature. The apostle continues: "I find then a law [who has established it?], that, when I would do good, evil is present with me ... I see another law in my members, warring against the law of my mind" (ROM 7:21,23).

Sin and guilt are not the same things. I can commit a sin without being guilty of it, as for example under extreme coercion, inner irresistible impulse, complete ignorance, etc. You have told us, "There is nothing covered that shall not be revealed" (LUK 12:2). This is a fact of everyday experience. In our dreams when rightly analyzed, in daydreams, in slips of the tongue and under hypnosis, hidden things become manifest. They will also become manifest in the other world. All the ugly deeds will be known there. But we don't have to be afraid. There they will be known by beings who are no longer as we are now. Everybody will be full of understanding, insight, compassion, and power to repair wrongs. Sometimes a child weeps over a catastrophe that has happened to him. Father observes. However, to him it is not a catastrophe, and so he makes the broken toy work again.

Jesus referred to sinners as sick men who need a physician instead of a judge. He heals sin with a medicine, His own blood shed for us.

I was in the same cell with a man sentenced to death for numerous sadistic murders. He confessed to me and answered my questions. His father had been an alcoholic. The only remembrance he had of him was that he came home drunk, beat him and his mother, stole all the money that his mother had earned by sewing, and left home to drink again. When the child was hungry, his mother would beat him for crying.

At the age of fourteen, attracted by the uniform and by songs that seemed to make sense, he joined a Fascist anti-Semitic organization. For this, the royal government put him in prison. Since there were no separate juvenile facilities, he mingled with all sorts of criminals, who thenceforth were his educators. Though the royal regime was later overturned, the Communists never forgave anyone. And so for the crime of being a Fascist at the age of fourteen, he was imprisoned again and beaten. Then he was offered the chance of being freed if he would torture other prisoners to death. He accepted the offer. It was his only chance for survival. After he had served as henchman for a long time, the same Communist masters sentenced him to death.

If you were to ask me today, "What is the sum of your experience with mankind?" my immediate reply would be, "Father, they are not guilty; they don't know what they do." I would include my torturers in this appreciation. We are meant to be the defenders of men, not their accusers. We even have to defend desperate cases. To accuse is the devil's business.

Every fibre of my heart believes in strict determinism. Omar Khayyam wrote:

'Tis all a chequer board of nights and days
Where destiny with men for pieces plays,
Hither and thither moves and mates and slays,
And one by one back in the closet lays.

Luther once said that whoever erased the words "free will" from the human dictionary would render the greatest service to mankind. Everything has been predestined, even Lucifer's and Adam's falls. God had willed that it should be so. Judas was a traitor because God had designated him as such. Spinoza, one of the profoundest souls which the Jewish people has ever produced, was also the first to apply to all human thought and sentiment and action the determinist constraint. Einstein believed like him. As for the Bible, it is clear "God works in you both the will and the fulfilling" (PHP 2:13).

Among those things I am determined to do is to make decisions of my own free will. I am determined to have a sentiment of responsibility. I am determined to feel the dread of the judgment, even though I don't believe we are free to do otherwise than we do. I can see constraint in every sin, and I cannot do otherwise than defend the sinner. May someone else defend me if I am mistaken.

Your thoughts are not like mine. When I speak, I have to express my thoughts. My plea with you is that man, while surely responsible for all he does, is not responsible for being responsible. Therefore, I plead, "Acquit!" Amen.

DEAR BRETHREN AND SISTERS

To know God is not enough. We must know the enemy, too.

Even Jesus did not avoid a face-to-face discussion with the devil. If we don't bring to the bar of reason the temptations of Satan, they will enter the depths of the subconscious, where the great decisions are made, and ravage the soul.

I would not recommend this to everyone, but I have studied the tenets of the Satanist sects. One must have special grace to tackle this subject and not be overcome. Satan's words seemed good and were convincing to Eve, though she lived in God's paradise. How much more do they lure us, her fallen progeny. Our sinful nature responds all too readily to the great claims of Satan and his followers. They can be studied only with a constant struggle to resist their baleful influence on one's character.

I remember the chill that went down my spine when I read the secret formula disclosed only to initiates during the introduction to the third degree: "Let my will happen in all things." The formula was not new to me. It tapped into the huge drive for self-assertion which we all have in us. It is just the contrary of the teaching of our Lord: "Whosoever will come after me, let him deny himself" (MRK 8:34).

Human nature says "no" to this command of Jesus. But if the grace of God comes and you are inclined to fulfill it, be aware that Satan can disguise himself and make of conversion to Christ an initiation into the Satanic rite. If you were to express in clear words what happens in such a case, it would be as follows: "I must be a man with a very strong 'I' to be able to decide even the rejection of the 'I,' the only great treasure I possess. So let ~my~ will happen in religion, too. My will is to deny myself."

Afterwards you can go to great lengths of self-denial. You can go even as far as giving away all your possessions and being burned at the stake for your ideals. It is the "I" that will have chosen poverty or martyrdom. Without knowing it, you will have been faithful to the formula of initiation: "Let my will happen in all things - even in matters regarding my relationship with Christ."

"Deny yourself" is one of the many laws of Scripture. They have not been given to be fulfilled. As a man born in sin, you cannot fulfill them. You can only take cognizance of them, seeing in them, as in a mirror, how far away you are from what is beautiful and right. You then acknowledge your sinfulness, at which point Christ can work in you. He changes you from glory to glory. But every human work you engage in by yourself, even a very holy one, is extremely dangerous.

Every day I have to decide whether to yield to torture or not, whether to deny Christ or not. It might be not a consecrated attitude but a devilish one to say, "Let my will he done, and my will is that I should be a hero of the faith."

The Lord wants some to be such heroes but he also allowed Peter to pass through moments of cowardice and then return with repentance, thus giving an example throughout the centuries to Christians who might fall in times of persecution that they can rise again.

I decide nothing about what I will do tomorrow at the interrogation.

A rabbi once stood at the window of his study and called to the first Jew who went by. He asked him, "Suppose you find a wallet containing much money but also the card of the man who lost it - what would you do?"

The Jew answered, "You know, rabbi, that I have many children and am very poor. I would consider it as a gift from God. I would throw away the card and keep the money."

The rabbi said, "You are a thief. Sit there."

He then called a second Jew and put to him the same question. The reply was, "I would return the money immediately to its legitimate owner."

The rabbi said, "You are stupid. Sit near that other man."

He called a third Jew: "What would you do in such a case?"

The reply was, "I don't know. Everything depends upon the grace I will have from God at that moment."

The rabbi embraced him. "This is the right answer."

The devil is often with me in my cell. His first proposal was that I should decide to deny and be freed. When I refused, he appeared again in the guise of an angel of light: "Decide to die rather than yield to the Communists. Stick to this holy decision. May it happen as you decide." It was necessary to refuse this second subtle injunction too. Jesus had said in Gethsemane, "Not my will, but thine be done."

In the eighth degree of one of these occult initiations, you have to accept as a rule of life the sentences, "Believe nothing and dare everything," or its variation, "Nothing is true; everything is permitted."

When Marx was asked what maxim he preferred, he replied, "Doubt everything." I know it is not easy to believe something. Every religious, political or moral attitude has arguments for and against. I have spent long hours over the books of Zen, the Upanishads, Buddha, Zoroaster, the Talmud, the Kabbala, the Koran, as well as atheist philosophers. There are so many interesting thoughts and persuasive proofs scattered throughout all of them. The sinner must choose with a limited, biased, unreliable mind that is only partially informed. But if a lost sinner has perforce a mind which cannot think rightly, he also cannot then believe that we are all lost sinners who cannot choose as we should.

If everything is only relatively true, the assertion about relativity is also only relatively true. There must be in relativity somewhere a kernel of the absolute. Life obliges you to dare, though what you do can produce enormous harm or good to someone else. I know a man who had taken in an orphan and given him a warm home. When this orphan grew up and married, he adopted another orphan child who was happy in new surroundings. So it is also with evil deeds. They reproduce endlessly.

In order to dare, I must have a standard of what is right and true.

Many religions offer ways of life. Jesus is not one of the ways. He says, "I ~am~ the way." The definite article is one of mankind's greatest devices. I am sorry for nations like China and Denmark that lack it.

Well, devil, you ask me to believe nothing. So I will turn this weapon against you and I will not believe that nothing should be believed. You say, "Nothing is true."

So the assertion that "nothing is true" is not true. You wish me to believe that "everything is permitted." All right, I will believe that it is also permitted not to believe that all things are permitted.

There were plenty of reasonable arguments for Romeo not to give his life for Juliet. Verona had many beautiful girls. He himself had been enamored first of Rosaline. But a lover does not make his love the subject of arguments and counter-arguments. I hate your logic, devil. I love Jesus. I love His will. Let it be accomplished in my life. I love His laws and am always sorry whenever I break them because of my human weakness.

With me you have lost. The discussion with you has become boring. Goodbye. I prefer to go to sleep.

DEAR BRETHREN AND SISTERS

On the first day of my arrest I had been told, "You are no more Richard Wurmbrand, but Vasile Georgescu. You are never allowed to mention to anyone your former name." I had been kidnapped from the street, and the simple fact that I still exist somewhere is a state secret. A warden might disclose it if he knew the name.

Today I protested against the mistreatment, saying, "Even if I don't belong to you, I am still a person, a man, and have the right to be respected."

They answered in a laugh: "What conceit! You are no longer a person. You simply are not. One thing exists: the proletarian state. Men belong to it. They are each a little wheel or a screw in its complex machinery. Whoever does not support the state simply is not. We don't even shoot him. There is nobody to shoot. We allow nothingness to rot away in a cell."

"I am not." "I am a nothing." Some philosophers say that the nothing exists somehow. If it does not exist, whose existence are we denying?

I remember the famous resume of Buddha's doctrine from Vissudhimagga:

> There exists only the suffering, not the sufferer.
> There exists action, not its author.
> The nirvana exists, but not the one who pursues it.
> There is the way, but not the traveller.

page 137 ALONE WITH GOD

I have had the shock of being told that I am a non-person. Now the non-person, no longer able even to wish to be a person, resigns itself to its new phase of existence. There is no more a man of sorrows in the cell; only the old, old sorrow is here, impersonal. My cell is old. Many generations of prisoners have experienced its sorrow before me, and many more will consider it their own after me. But suffering grants no one a monopoly. It wishes to be shared by everyone. Who has escaped its embrace?

Murder has existed since the time of Cain, but most murderers are unchronicled. Adultery has thrived down through the ages, but the Gospel does not even give the name of the woman caught in the act. What difference does her identity make? Lying affected the human situation in Paradise, before the Fall. Whoever utters a lie only adds his poison to the well.

Heaven also exists. If you pursue it, you do not have it. There should be no "you" and no "I." If these disappear, the pursuit ceases and heaven is within. It has always been there. The barrier has been "you" and the condition put by the "you," that your highest desires must be fulfilled. Heaven is the fulfilling of One's desires, the unique God. It might be His desire - it might be my heaven - that I lead the most annoying life in a solitary cell.

A heaven in which I do not rejoice? The Bible has told me to deny myself. I have neglected to do so. Now the Communists tell me that I have become a non-person. So who is the "I" that has the claim of rejoicing in heaven? Heaven is a place without distinction between the subject that enjoys, the object enjoyed, and the sentiment of joy. It simply exists. You are seated in "heavenly places" without striving for something beyond. For the first time a place where you really sit without any remorse for not doing something, without any need to move or fill your time with something else. It is rest, perfect rest.

When I was declared a non-person this morning, I told the captain, "Christ will be the victor through the patience that He gave us. A man with patience can do everything."

He laughed, "Can patience help you carry water in a sieve?"

I was disconcerted for a fraction of a second. Then I answered quietly, "For a certainty, if only you wait patiently for the water to freeze."

There is hope that they will make even living water freeze. It is terribly cold in the cell, though outside it must be the beginning of spring already. How I would like to be in the country and pick flowers, wild ones, hawthorns and violets and forget-me-nots. It is written, "Every one that loves is born of God" (1JN 4:7). But does anyone love if he does not include flowers in his love? Is it enough to love men?

I remember reading about an American black revolutionary, John Brown, who fought against slavery. His whole mature life was spent on riots. When he was led to the gallows in a cart, he said to the soldiers surrounding him, "How beautiful is this land." He had had no eyes for trees and flowers before. If I were free now, I would leave men alone and walk among foxgloves and daisies and dedicate myself to the good deed of loving flowers.

Flowers exist for us en masse. We don't attribute personality to them. Except for the florist when he sells them, we don't even give them a number. They don't worry about being non-persons. But they are loved by

page 139 ALONE WITH GOD

Jesus. He compares Himself to them: "I am the rose of Sharon, and the lily of the valleys" (SOS 2:1).

If you wish to pluck them, they don't flee. If you trample them under your feet, they reward you by giving you their perfume. Jesus teaches us to learn from flowers. If I had been like one of them, I would not have cared about being appreciated.

I remember Feinstein, the man who played a big role in bringing me to Christ and who died a martyr's death under the Nazis. I asked him once, "What is the pride of life mentioned in 1JN 2:16?"

He replied, "Stop asking silly questions, you idiot."

I shouted, "How do you dare to speak to me like that?"

His answer: "Now you know what is the pride of life."

I believe that it is still a remnant of the pride of life that made me resent so vividly the words which I was told today - that I am a non-person.

I will accept my new status. Amen.

page 140 Does God Avenge Himself?

DEAR BRETHREN AND SISTERS

We Christians speak to our torturers about love. They speak only about hatred and revenge.

You can never understand any Communist if you don't see his wickedness as the result of intense suffering. No one becomes a trouble-maker unless he is greatly troubled himself. He takes revenge ultimately against being. He is without the desire for life itself. An absurd existence has been imposed upon him. He believes that a man is nothing more nor less than a random agglomeration of molecules. Among these molecules are those that constitute nerves, which sometimes produce feelings of joy (always transitory) and at other times transmit pain.

Communists cannot account for the fact that they have to endure suffering nor that eventually they will be eaten by worms. Therefore, they must make haste to enjoy life, power, and material advantages. In opposition their presumed felicity are other agglomerations of molecules called class-enemies, which must be destroyed. Marx's favorite verse was, "There is no greater joy than to bite your enemy."

Our torturers see us as obstacles to their squeezing out of a senseless life the maximum of pleasant moments. Their conscience is not bothered by the fact that they beat human beings. When we ask why, they answer:

"Did you have any remorse when you hammered a nail into the wall or when you cut wood? We all handle matter at pleasure. Man too is only matter. You can't make an omelette without breaking eggshells. You can't cut wood without producing chips. You cannot make revolution without handling the class-enemy roughly. We know no forgiveness. We take revenge on our enemies."

Revenge sometimes arises from great depths. Marx once wrote to Engels, "If Titus had not destroyed my fatherland 1800 years ago, I would not be an enemy of all fatherlands."

When I am left alone in my cell, Bible verses come to my mind, but now they are different. A voice whispers, " Don't mind your sufferings. They don't pass unnoticed. The Lord will take revenge."

Again revenge? I cannot suffer the word any more.

Should You, the Good, stoop to the same level as the Communists? Should heaven be reduced to the state of mind of a Communist torturer? I cannot believe these words about revenge, even if a St. Paul states them.

Should You, like Hitler, have burning ovens with unquenchable flames - no, even worse than Hitler, because his flames consumed the victims in a moment, whereas yours burn but never consume? Forgive us, but those in hell cannot accept the justice of hell. It is acceptable only to the man who sits in church after a good breakfast.

It might be that hell causes joy among saints. Saints are men, and nothing evil in men surprises me any more. But You are goodness personified. You can know happiness only through loving everybody, providing salvation, understanding, forgiving. If there is a hell, surely You must have the desire to quench its fire.

There certainly is a hell. You discharged in Yourself the lightning of wrath when, torn by grief, You bruised Your Son and burdened Him with all the evil ever committed.

Yes, vengeance is Yours. As the sea absorbs the mighty rivers, You absorbed our rivers of wickedness and expiated them Yourself. This revenge is terrible. Because the death of Jesus on the cross burns the elect. This is the burning bush which is never consumed. It finishes with sin.

We know You to be love. You are our Father; Your Son, our Brother. Those who were once cold now burn with an eternal fire. It is the fire of love which has lit them.

I would believe You to be a God of love even if it were not reality. You are as I will You to be, not as You are. Love covers sin, and if I knew that You were vengeful, I would hide this fact from men. But no, You are forgiveness.

How torn I am. I began by not believing what St. Paul writes. Now I don't believe what I preach. The Word of God cannot be contradicted. It speaks clearly about an eternal hell. What kind of heaven would it be with Hitler and Stalin in it, with all the robbers and seducers and liars who have remained unregenerate to the end? One serpent in the Garden - and mankind lost Paradise. How will heaven remain unsullied if men who are not born again invade its precincts?

The idea that men will be tormented forever is unbearable to me. But are the unrepentant sinners men? I have no remorse about killing tuberculosis microbes. I am happy that DDT wiped out vermin. A sinner, yes, even a criminal, has something human in him until the last moment of his death, after which he ceases to be human. His wickedness alone remains, self-conscious utter wickedness. We cannot imagine this, but the whole of reality is unimaginable. The atom is unimaginable. It is not in vain that God told us not to make ourselves images of things. God considered it proper that strange beings like this, for whom we will feel no affinity at all, should burn eternally.

And then, hell might not be as unbearable and terrible as we think. St. Paul said, "I could wish that myself were accursed from Christ for my brethren" (ROM 9:3). This means that perfect saints can renounce heaven. In Buddhism, the perfect, the Boddhisatvas, refuse to enter Nirvana before drawing all men with them. Likewise saints who have experienced the rich love of God can bear hell. Saints around me bear the hell of Communist prison. Some of them bear it joyfully. I think that hell accepted with love ceases to be hell. St. Paul would not have feared to be accursed. He would have taken the doom with passionate love in order that it might profit others.

Christ Himself was damned and abandoned more than all the saints. So for the children of God there can be a heaven in hell. The terribleness of hell is only for the others. God for forgives everyone His fit place - water for fish, air for birds, jail for criminals. Hell is the fit place for unrepentant sinners.

We will never be able to accept it until all our fixed ideas about God and eternal things are broken up and discarded, even the notion that God is good, a notion that is false if God's goodness is separated from His many other attributes that qualify it, as, for example, His righteousness. "The kingdom of Heaven is like unto treasure hid in a field" (MTT 13:44). "Your life is hid with Christ in God" (COL 3:3).

There exists the unintelligible in Godhead. We must believe His Word even if it contradicts our notions of what we consider right for God to do. The virgin Mary was told that her Son would be given the throne of His father David, and this she doubtless accepted at face value. Instead, He was mocked and He descended into hell. St. Augustine, contrary to the prayerful expectations of his mother Monica, descended deeper and deeper into sin before God not only answered her prayers for his conversion but made of him a great Christian teacher.

We cannot understand God's ways. We must believe in His revelation. I cannot understand hell. I would send nobody to an eternal hell. But happily God is not like me. If He were, He would not give me paradise. I have to sacrifice the intellect. I believe in eternal hell. I believe that God avenges Himself. "To me belongeth vengeance, and recompence," "Vengeance is mine; I will repay, saith the Lord" (DEU 32:35; ROM 12:19).

May God keep me from being the object of His revenge. Amen.

DEAR BRETHREN AND SISTERS

As usual, I start my night-vigil by singing softly Mozart's Requiem:

On that great, that awful day,
This vain world shall pass away.
Thus the sibyl sang of old,
Thus has holy David told;
There shall be a deadly fear
When the Avenger shall appear,
And unveiled before His eye,
All the works of men shall lie.

Hark! to the great trumpet's tones
Pealing o'er the place of bones;
Hark! it waketh from their bed
All the nations of the dead,
In a countless throng to meet
At the eternal judgment seat.
Nature sickens with dismay;
Death may not retain his prey,
And before the Maker stand
All the creatures of His hand.
The great book shall be unfurled,
Whereby God shall judge the world:
What was distant, shall be near,
What was hidden, shall be clear.

page 146 ALONE WITH GOD

To what shelter shall I fly?
To what guardian shall I cry?
O, in that destroying hour,
Source of goodness, source of power,
Show Thou, of Thine own free grace,
Help unto a helpless race!
Tho' I plead not at Thy throne,
Aught that I for Thee have done,
Do not Thou unmindful be,
Of what Thou hast borne for me;
Of the wandering, of the scorn,
Of the scourge, and of the thorn.
Jesus, hast Thou borne the pain,
And hath all been borne in vain?
Shall Thy vengeance smite the head
For whose ransom Thou hast bled?
Thou? whose dying blessing gave Glory to a guilty slave:
Thou, who from the crew unclean
Did'st release the Magdalene:
Shall not mercy, vast and free,
Evermore be found in Thee?
Father, turn on me Thine eyes,
See my blushes, hear my cries;
Faint tho' be the cries I make,
Save me, for Thy mercy's sake,
From the worm, and from the fire,
From the torments of Thine ire.
Fold me with the sheep that stand
Pure and safe at Thy right hand.
Hear Thy guilty child implore Thee,

Rolling in the dust before Thee.
O, the horrors of that day!
When this frame of sinful clay?
Starting from its burial place,

page 147 ALONE WITH GOD

Must behold Thee face to face.
Hear and pity, hear and aid,
Spare the creatures Thou hast made.
Mercy, mercy, save, forgive:
O who shall look on Thee and live?

(English translation by Thomas Macaulay; in ~Seed Thoughts for Public Speakers~)

Though the ~Requiem~ had been commissioned, Mozart composed it for himself. During that time he was already very sick, as I am now.

I could say about myself what Mozart wrote when he created this music:

In my soul I have chaos. I can gather my thoughts only with difficulty. I see unceasingly the face of one unknown. He insists. He asks me to work. I continue to do so, because to compose music wearies me less than inactivity. I feel my hour has come. I must die. The end comes before I can show fully my talent. How beautiful is life! But I must finish my burial-song. I would not do right to leave it unfinished.

I also try to put into these sermons declaimed in a solitary cell my deepest, perhaps my ultimate, dying thoughts. Such thoughts I could not propound from the pulpit, because there one has to preach according to dogma and the taste of the audience, with the goal of attracting new souls into the church. Here I have absolutely no aim, no purpose. I preach only because it is in my character to do so, as it is in the nature of nightingales to sing.

Mozart did not finish his ~Requiem~. I might die or, perhaps, be freed before finishing my task. The worst, I think, would be to regain freedom and resume preaching conventional sermons.

While lying on his deathbed, Mozart could ask his friend Sussmeyer to finish the ~Requiem~. Sussmeyer was able to transcribe some of the tunes from the lips of the dying man. I am absolutely alone. I can convey to no one my thoughts. Jesus left this world without having delivered all His message. On the last evening spent with His closest friends, He said, "I have yet many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now" (JHN 16:12).

While Mozart lay on his deathbed, he was afforded the consolation of having his unfinished ~Requiem~ completed by a couple of friends. I will probably never see anyone feeding on these my sermons. At his burial, the burial of a beggar, there was no organ music, no ceremony, no money even for a grave-marker, much less a tombstone. Unmarked, too, are the graves of prisoners.

There were rumors that Mozart had been poisoned. He himself suspected it. But in his ~Requiem~ there is no complaint. He thinks only about his own sins and the judgment that lies before him, to which he will answer. There are probably drugs in my food. I become weaker and weaker. But I will not think badly about my enemies. I will not think about them at all.

In the Philippines, people have been found still living in the stone age. It pleases me that they have no words for "enemy" and "war." They can't be taught to love their foes. They have none.

I will sing my requiem while lying on planks that might later be used for my coffin. My soul is far from my body. There is no doubt that the soul lives after death. I am the proof. My body has long since been dead. But I live.

Rather, it is not the "I" which lives, but a huge regret for what I have been, with tears running from the eyes of a corpse. The Orthodox believe in some weeping icons of the Virgin. Others say that it is a priestly trick, with some tubes and a pump hidden behind the icon. But why should wood not weep when a corpse can?

Oscar Wilde had been in my state when he composed "The Ballad of Reading Gaol." I begin my requiem with music to the words of his first stanzas:

Yet each man kills the thing he loves,
By each let this be heard,
Some do it with a bitter look,
Some with a flattering word,
The coward does it with a kiss,
The brave man with a sword!

Some kill their love when they are young,
And some when they are old;
Some strangle with the hands of Lust,
Some with the hands of Gold:
The kindest use a knife, because
The dead so soon grow cold.

Some love too little, some too long,
Some sell, and others buy;
Some do the deed with many tears,
And some without a sigh:
For each man kills the thing he loves,
Yet each man does not die.

I also love men. Since my youth I have loved on sight every man I ever met. But I loved with a deadly love, because all my beloved have died or at least suffered much because of me. I don't believe like Wilde that each man kills the thing he loves. But I have. My one joy now is to have the world isolated from me so that I can no longer harm anyone.

Am I now being punished by God for my sins? The answer to this question is contained in the Persian poem ~Rabbia~, which I remember. Set to melody, it is the second theme of my requiem:

Rabbia, sick and abed,
Was visited by two saints:
The pious Malik, the sage Hassan,

Men venerated in Islam.
One said, "You'll be able to bear
The chastising God sends you
If your prayer is pure." The other,
Profounder gave his opinion:
"If it is accepted with love,
You rejoice about the punishment."
Rabbia discerned traces Of egotism in these maxims.
"Good men," he replied,
"When one sees the face of the Master
In his prayer, he cannot Remember that he is punished."

Before the Lord I simply am what I am, without any why. Why was I born? Why was I born a sinner? Why did I suffer? Why did I produce suffering? Why do I die? Why have I the gift of composing a kind of requiem? What is the good of composing it while alone in a prison cell? My God, my God, why have You forsaken me? Whys are futile. There is never any answer.

I am not being punished. Neither am I a martyr. How can I know what counts more in the depths of my heart: fanatical devotion to the anti-Communist fight or love for Christ? And even if it were martyrdom, what would be its value if it is based on a love which kills - a sentiment unworthy the name of love? Calvin said that where this love is wanting, "the beauty of all virtue is mere tinsel, is empty sound, is not worth a straw, nay more, is offensive and disgusting." Martyrdom minus genuine love equals zero.

Punished criminal or martyr, my last song is about Jesus, except that in my requiem, unlike Mozart's, it is not a song of fear and trembling. It bespeaks confidence.

When asked to descend from the cross, Jesus did not move. Were nails more powerful than the hands of the Son of God? On several occasions when large crowds had sought to molest Him, He escaped. Yet alone, armed only with a whip, He had challenged the unholy practices of a courtyard full of merchants guarded by the temple police - and escaped unharmed. He said "I AM" in Gethsemane, and a company of soldiers fell to the ground.

No, it was not nails that kept Jesus on the cross, but His love for me. For me, a non-person. Jesus loves the Father and He loves me. "The Son of man is come to seek and to save that which was lost" (LUK 19:10). I prefer to be a lost sinner rather than a martyr, because it is lost sinners He came to save.

Listen to me. The one who calls is one who always killed those he loved, who made people shed tears and blood. You who give life to those who hate, save one who spreads death even upon the most beloved.

The power fails me to continue. I am hungry. I have a high fever. My mind goes blank. I cannot put in song Jesus' answer to my cry.

This will remain my unfinished requiem. Amen.

These sermons have had one subject: God as reflected in deep human suffering. Only God is the subject. Narrowness of scope is the only way to ensure critical focus in spiritual matters. The waters of human nature run deep, but if they are spread over a wide area, of necessity they become shallow. With too many subjects to cover, a man disperses his energy and dissipates his vitality.

It is better to do one little thing well than to do many things badly. Therefore I have striven to do just one thing, to say what God is like when observed from the perspective of an isolated subterranean prison cell and to focus on the rapport that existed between Him and a creature abandoned to hunger and torture. I hope this might be helpful to others who pass through pain and sorrow and who encounter problems of another kind.

I meant also to awaken in believers and men of good will outside Christian circles the desire to do something for the many thousands who are still imprisoned for their faith.

What could you do?

I once told Isaac Feinstein, who died a martyr's death under the Nazis, "The words of the Lord that He is 'the way' are not of much practical use. After reading them, you still don't know the next step. Now tell me plainly, what is 'the way'?" He answered, "Go away." The words would have sounded insulting were it not for his unequalled smile. His face and gestures gave to his words the meaning, "There is no answer to the question 'What is the way?' Jesus intended us to walk in it, not to inquire into it."

Before Jesus said "I am the way," He had already said, "The way ye know" (JHN 14:4). He is not a way we have to learn but one with which we are acquainted. We might not know the whole of it. We surely know the next few steps.

I will not tell you what to do in order to show compassion to those who today pass through the outer and inner tempests I have known. The simple fact that you have the desire to be helpful indicates that you need no guide. Your own compassionate nature will guide you.

Every step in this direction will also become a restraint not to act. From an eternal point of view, all activity, even holy activity, is counted among the vanities. How can someone do something without mixing into his purely idealistic endeavors some egotism, some calculation, some desire to impress? Busy yourself with good works, and you may suddenly stop walking in the way in order to sit like Mary at the feet of Jesus, choosing "that good part, which shall not be taken away" rather than the busy work of Martha. You then become a passionate lover of God, seeking to adore Him even if He allows you to pass through terrible circumstances, such as I have known.

The next step? You have stopped walking, and there will be no more steps. Adoring Him, you will realize in time that you have become more than a mere believer, because a believer is not satisfied with worship. A young man will not simply adore a girl lifelong. He will be satisfied with nothing less than possessing her, uniting with her. So you will pass from adoring God to being one in spirit with Christ and, through Him, with the Father. It will be God who suffers in you for His creation, but through Him you will be at last triumphant.

With this the aim of my book will have been achieved. God has kept these sermons in my memory in spite of brainwashing and doping with drugs. In jail I lost all my knowledge of music and mathematics. I forgot even the Bible. But I remembered these sermons, because God willed you to read them and be changed from glory to glory in the likeness of His Son. Praise be to Him!

The words "Praise the Lord" occur in the Bible 366 times, once for every day of the year, including leap year. The Lord had to be praised in cells infested with rats and vermin, in days when we were badly beaten. The Lord should be praised daily by you, too, amid the troubles through which you pass.

~Praised be the Lord!~ When you say it, you will realize you knew the next step in "the way."

p001 Questions People Ask Me

I have been in the free world for ten years. During this time I have received at least half a million letters as a result of my sermons, lectures, and the books which I have published.

Most of these letters show enthusiastic support for the cause of the Underground Church in Communist countries, the cause that constitutes my life. But many contain questions not related to Marxism, the persecution of Christians, and the methods of aiding these victims: they are from people who have entirely other concerns.

A man who has been a pastor for decades asks me, "What is the destiny of life? Do we go to a completed heaven of heavens, with no work to do and no creative abilities needed? Are our mansions above furnished, arranged beforehand, and will we not have to give them a personal touch? Why does God allow evil to tempt young men? He knows we are weak and frail. Who can stand against Satan except Christ? What is this school of life and suffering for? Why does the Revelation consist only of general statements, without specific explanations?"

This pastor had to dispel the doubts of many for long years. He first had to listen to the doubts, and while trying to heal others, he himself was contaminated.

A soldier writes that he will commit suicide unless he gets answers to the things that trouble him. "What is it that makes me torn between two emotions - hate and love? What is it that makes me afraid of my fellow man because he may be of a different color or social standing?

p002 Answers to Half a Million Letters

"If the Bible is the truth and the whole truth then what about all the Jews, Buddhists, Moslems, Hindus, etc? Will they automatically be excluded from the kingdom of God, whatever that consists of? What about the millions of people who were born and who died before the time of Christ, such as the Romans, Greeks and Babylonians? They could not have been all bad. What about the pygmies and the primitive people in South America and various parts of the world who have never heard of Christ and most likely never will?

"If the Bible is the truth, then I am in deed in need of forgiveness, for while I have never killed anyone or committed other such crimes, I have, in my heart, hated others, have lusted and have been jealous, have nurtured false pride, lied, cheated, and more. That being the case, I have much to atone for, yet still I remain a paradox. I could become a Christian (if that's what I am supposed to become), and tomorrow if I were sent into battle somewhere, which could well happen, I probably would kill not once, but many times over. Yet I would feel disgust at myself and would probably go insane. Christ wouldn't strike back; in fact he went meekly to the cross. The Fifth Commandment says, 'Thou shalt not kill.' Then what should I do if faced with an armed enemy? Stand still and let him kill me?"

This letter is a proof that in spiritual matters analysis often leads to paralysis. Here it could have led almost to suicide.

Another man asks: "How can we, how dare we (the United States, Britain, France, Germany, etc.) send missionaries to Africa to convert the so-called heathen while in Europe these Christian nations spilled each other's blood in two world wars with a cruelty that would make an animal disgusted with the human race? Who is the heathen and who is the Christian? What about people who are supposedly insane and confined to asylums? What happens to them? Are not years in an asylum a living hell here on earth?

"What happens if I become a Christian and then am tempted by a woman and once more fall into sin? Do I pick myself up and start over again? And if that is the case, then why tell people that only by obeying God's Commandments will we share in his kingdom? Would it not be more sensible to say that by trying to keep God's Commandments we shall share in his kingdom? I believe that love is not merely an illusion, that it is real and therefore in that sense God must be real, but it still disturbs me - who is God? I have been told to pray for understanding, to approach the Bible in prayer, etc. But I can't accept that. Before I pray I want to know who I'm praying to. I can ask a woman for the next dance, but I know who I'm talking to. She takes shape and form. My eyes tell my brain, 'This is a cute girl'; my brain then replies, 'Well, don't just stand there - ask her to dance.' I hope you see what I'm trying to get at."

From a third letter: "A thing that has always disturbed me is the constant ~don'ts~ I hear from Christians. Don't do this, it's a sin; don't do that, it's a sin; don't look at a pretty girl too hard as she passes by, it's a sin; don't go to a Rock-'n'-roll concert, it is a sin - until my head reels with don'ts. What about sex? It's supposed to be a sin outside marriage, yet it's the same act in marriage or out. Does an ordained minister have to declare them married? Can it not be just another human being? And who ordained him? And if that is so, why cannot I and some girl just declare ourselves married? Why all this ceremony with a pretty dress and a white cake?

"And if I come to believe that Christ is our Saviour and know who God is, then what must I do to be saved? Go to Romania and allow myself to be put in prison and be tortured like Reverend Wurmbrand? I couldn't do that; the very thought of it chills my blood. Then should I go to Africa and heal the sick? (I can't even take care of a simple cold when I catch one myself!) And besides, many blacks today are aware that much of our so-called Western civilization has been built at their expense, by their sweat and blood. Many of them hate white people,and I can well understand why. I don't relish the idea of ending up mutilated like some white nurses in the Congo.

"If neither of these two, then should I stand on a street corner with my Bible and scream at passersby to repent and preach to them? (I personally feel that most people are turned off by street-corner preachers; however, I can only speak for myself here.) Should I, if nothing more, have a minister pour water over my head and, mumbling a few words, baptize me, making me feel good (physically speaking), much as an Englishman who, upon winning a tennis match,is congratulated by the Queen?"

Mormons, Seventh-day Adventists, Ahmedian Muslims, and adherents of different trends of the Evangelical faith write, putting tears and the blood of their hearts into their letters, to convince me that I must receive that true revelation which only they have. I can discard none of these religions as stupid or unbiblical and be done with them. Different religions could never have arisen if they did not correspond to some specific disposition, some fundamental psychological experience.

As for the variations within Christianity, I remember that once when Rabbi Shammai quarrelled with Rabbi Hillel about the sense of some Scripture, a voice from heaven said, "Both are words of the living God." There exists within Christianity a place for variations in non-essentials.

I side with Jesus. I could never make up my mind with which religion to side.

Nominally I am Lutheran, but this religion is not old enough for me. It was founded by a former monk in 1517. There are trees in California much older than that. Anglicanism exists because a pope would not allow King Henry VIII to get a divorce. Presbyterians and Congregationalists are denominations approximately the same age as Lutherans. Methodism arose in the eighteenth century. Mormons, Seventh-day Adventists, the Salvation Army, Christian Scientists, Pentecostals, and Jehovah's Witnesses are all like little girls. A religion not much older than a hundred years has not yet passed the test of time. Why should I be a Mohammedan? Where was the truth before the appearance of Mohammed in the seventh century A. D., or before the appearance of Buddha in the sixth century B.C.?

I have decided to believe in the Holy Trinity which exists outside of time and to share the faith which Adam had before the Fall, the faith of righteous Abel and of all generations who have adored God in spirit and in truth. Letters trying to convert me to another religion find no echo in me.

A beautiful girl of nineteen sends me her picture. She has fallen in love with me through reading my books. She is worth a million. Would I not marry her? She knows I have a wife, but after thirty-five years of marriage I might have become tired of her. For fairness' sake, I must say that my wife has received a similar letter from a student, except that he had no million to offer. An old British lady writes, "I gather from your books that you must be a very good man. Help me. I am seventy-one and seek a husband. I would accept even a non-Anglican. You know many people. Recommend somebody." I have long since forgotten to laugh about such letters. They express the suffering of a creature of God as much as any other letter.

"Now, when the visit to the museum is almost finished, I ask for questions," a guide said.

"I have a question." A lady lifted her hand.

"Please."

"I would like to know what you use to clean the floor."

Questions like these are sometimes asked of me, too, after people read my books or hear my sermons about God, Christ, the persecution of Christians in the Communist camp, and the heroism of the persecuted.

Let us not fool ourselves. In many parts of Africa, blacks listened to missionaries and might even have asked questions about religion. But for them it was a pastime. What they liked about the missionaries was that they mended guns and brought beads. In the New Hebrides, all the population was converted when the missionaries had successfully completed the first well and provided good drinking water. With this all the questions in their minds about whether they should believe in the spirits and witch doctors, or in one God in three Persons, revealed in the Book they could not read, were solved.

We are not better than they. In thousands of cases friendship with a nice girl or a handsome boy leads to conversion. The religion of the beloved is accepted and later propagated with zeal.

When someone is over-zealous in trying to attract me to his faith, I ask him, how he happened to hold to his beliefs and discover that he needs my approval for beliefs with which he has become connected only as a result of some biological accident.

A spiritually ignorant Russian from outer Siberia heard a Russian broadcast from Manila which the organization "Jesus to the Communist World" had sponsored for a long time. "You said over the radio that God has come to this earth," he writes. "Could I have a picture of him? I would very much like to see the living God. What is his address?" Such a letter, if written by a Westerner, would be a mockery. From Russia it is genuine.

A Catholic nun writes, "After having read about the martyrs in the Communist camp, I regret for first time my vow of poverty. I would like to have much money to give. But I say like Peter, 'Gold and silver I have not; what I have I give.' I promise prayer and penance for them." She had read about Baptists killed in Communist prisons. A Baptist minister writes, "Why do you worry so much? Let God take care of the martyred Baptists. They are not my concern. I have other tasks from God."

A letter from a child in Russia says, "Father returns from prison after four months. Both of his feet are gangrenous. I am so small. Why is my life so dark?" A letter from Ghana says, "Can you tell me the reason why God allows Christians to suffer in Communist lands?" An American lady whose first husband had been a drunkard and whose second husband has been paralyzed for twenty-six years asks, "Why am I singled out for sorrows?" A child who has given up candy to help Christian prisoners writes, "Does it always hurt to do something good?"

A Jewess in Israel read about me in a French newspaper. She had heard me preach once in a shelter thirty years ago during a raid over Bucharest. She had witnessed my arrest by the Fascist police for this crime and thought me to be dead. She had innumerable questions about me and wanted to know why a Jew should believe in Christ. Why don't the Christians defend the state of Israel?

A letter from New York asks, "Why should a good God torment any of His creatures forever when you know that ~you~ would not do anything like that yourself?"

"I am seventeen years old and was a member of the Communist Youth organization." This is a letter from a South American country in which Communism is against the law. "Now my eyes have been opened and I am born again. I promise to defend the faith against my former comrades. To enable me to do it, please answer the following questions." Following were some thirty questions about Marx, Communism, and atheism.

A Russian living in the United States writes, "There is so much suffering in your books and in your life. Would you not like to laugh a little bit? Why not tell you a joke? You will surely enjoy the following one:

"A soldier was on duty before the monument of Lenin in a small Soviet town. At midnight he heard Lenin's voice: 'Tell Brezhnev and Kosygin they should send me a horse. I am tired of standing. I wish to be shown on the statue riding a horse, like Peter the Great and Napoleon. I have achieved more than they. I shook the foundations of the whole world. Tell them to bring me a horse.' With this, Lenin turned and ascended the pedestal again.

"The half-dead soldier reported to his officer. The officer did not believe, but decided notwithstanding to be with the soldier at the statue the very next night at midnight. Lenin again appeared alive asking for a horse. So eventually the request reached the top leadership. Brezhnev and Kosygin arrived at midnight before the statue, together with the officer. Lenin descended from the pedestal and shouted in anger at the officer, 'I asked you for a horse and you brought me two asses.'"

I laughed at the joke, but I must have associations of ideas apart. While laughing, I remembered Kundry's words in Wagner's ~Parsifal~, "Are animals not sacred here?" I understand why there are jokes about the Russian Prime-minister, but why should asses be made a subject of mockery in this joke? Jacob, when praising his son Issachar, called him an ass, a being which carries heavy burdens for others.

A lady writes from Colorado, "I read in your books about children taken from Christian parents by the Communists and brought up in godlessness. How could I keep myself in such a case from killing my children in a merciful fashion rather than risking their going to hell? (In my book ~The Soviet Saints~ I documented the fact that Ana Nevelinaia and other mothers did this.) Would it be right? What if I had to prove under torture how strong is my faith in Christ? I worry very much about where my breaking point would be.

A woman from Ohio asks "a few brief questions": "If the Communists should come over here to the United States, or before they come bomb us, would a Christian be justified in taking his life? I could not help thinking of all those other people who have turned the gas on and willingly taken the lives of their whole families because they could not bear religious persecution and torture. Will they go to heaven? I could not bear to face the torture you speak of; I have no courage to stand up for my faith under insurmountable situations such as those you describe. Would I go to heaven if I took my life because of this? I want to live very much, and it would certainly be a death forced on me by the Communist enemy.

"How does a human being start to develop the Christian fortitude and courage needed to go through - willingly - such inhumane, indescribable torture? How? And how can a Christian here on earth, seeing what he sees from day to day, believe in God so completely - even though he has never seen Him or had a spiritual experience?

"I know I am a coward. There is no courage in me or strength to fight for Christ in the face of torture. I am shy, afraid, scared, and I know I could never face what you have faced. Is there no salvation for people like me? I hear all the time about your kind, but what about my kind - the kind who never die for their faith, who do not have the courage even to suffer a little bit for it? Is heaven made only for those who are willing to face these hardships? If so, I will never go to heaven. Please help ease my troubled mind about these questions."

A Christian from another country asks, "Should I continue to give tithe to my church, which is rich? Would it be better to give the money to families of martyrs who hunger?"

I wrote him that it is much more important to realize that no sin is rebuked in the New Testament so often as that of ~pleonexia~, more "having." The rich man in the parable went to hell. Lazarus, while poor, had a much greater chance to reach Abraham's bosom. Therefore, don't have many things; don't have many questions either; and don't take on more work than you can quietly do. Don't load your head with superfluous knowledge. Be rich in the only sensible way. Rich indeed is the one who enjoys the state in which he happens to be.

A letter from Australia says, "Why do you react with such apprehension to any rapprochement between China and the Western world, be it on a political, social, or economic level? Why not cultivate it? A comparison between your publications and the anti-Capitalist invective that one picks up at Chinese and Russian

information services is unavoidable." A similar letter from Britain says, "The Communists are bad guys. Yet why not try a policy of great patience which, one day, after many disenchantments, may finally be rewarded?" Then in a letter from the United States we read, "St. Peter taught one to be obedient even to a Nero who oppressed terribly. Should we not do the same?"

On the other hand, the Romanian exile magazine ~Vatra~ writes just the contrary. "Pastor Wurmbrand has an undeserved generosity with the enemies of the human race. The love shown by him surpasses even that shown by God, who, instead of sharing His bread with Lucifer, chased him from heaven with a fiery sword. He was not gentler with Adam and Eve when they trespassed, but showed them the door by which they should leave paradise. Jesus, when he met the merchants, took the whip."

A Swiss Christian wishes to get advice: "With the many Red pastors, we have the same experience which we had in Nazi times with the German Christians. The betrayal starts with the World Council of Churches and with the beautiful flats of pastors. Should I protest by leaving the church, or would I render a better service by remaining in the church and protesting from within?"

I have been arrested many times, by the Nazis and by the Communists. I have been interrogated up to vivisection. "To be questioned" has a sadic connotion, when it happens under a totalitarian regime. Inquiry and inquisition have arrived to be ominous words. When I came to the West, I was sure that now I have escaped questioning. The contrary happened. I am questioned more than ever before.

p013 Answer to Half a Million Letters

What should I do about so many varied letters which swamp my desk daily? I cannot answer everyone individually. I would not even if I could.

Questions about facts in the material and intellectual world have to be answered with facts or their explanations.

Regarding spiritual questions, the choice is not between a right and a wrong answer. There is danger in answering at all. You can destroy a soul by making him listen to you.

Yajnadatta, of an Indian legend, was handsome, and he knew it. He would spend much time admiring himself in the mirror. One morning his image was not reflected in the mirror which he had before him. He thought his head was missing and went around asking himself, "Where could I have put my head"? How could he have found it? The head for which he was searching was the head which did the searching. Through carelessness he looked at the back side of the mirror. After this he used his head to look for his head. The more he sought it, the less chance he had of finding it.

Never seek the answer to spiritual questions from somebody else. Look into the right side of the mirror and you will find it existing in yourself. "The kingdom of God is within you," says Jesus, but every kingdom has a king. If I should answer your letters, I would have to put words next to each other. But the Hebrews, through whom the Word of God was given to mankind, had no distinct word in their language for "word." They used for it the expression ~davar~ which means "thing." The introduction to the Gospel of John in Hebrew reads, "In the beginning was the real thing, and the real thing was with God, and God is the real thing."

Words cease at the limits of life. Only substance remain. The last words of a man who died near me in prison were, "So it is true." What was true? If he had been able to speak, he could not have put in words what he experienced. He had experienced the ~davar~, the reality, in the deepest sense of the word. Here words cease.

We are happy about every man who has ultimate things as the object of his thoughts. But how many think about thinking? How much is it worth? How reliable is the thinker? What are his limitations? Is he competent enough to think about the ~davar~? Would it not be better to live the reality? We are not called to mediate upon eternal life, but to enter it. When my son was five he once told me, "Father, I am bored. What should I do" I answered, "Think about God," to which he replied, "Why should I think about the big God with my little head? Let Him who has a big head think about me."

When you think about your thinking process, you despise it. It is bound in the straitjacket of what happens on a minuscule speck of dust called Earth during a limited period of time. (Astronomers are the privileged ones who think about many bigger specks of dust.)

Don't you realize that it is wrong from the start to confine yourself to time? Tuiavii, chief of a tribe on the island of Upolu in the Southern Ocean, was brought to Europe for a visit. When he returned, he mocked the whites, the Papalagi, as they were called. He said, "They cut the day into small pieces which they call seconds, minutes, and hours. They all have some tick-tocks with which they observe how many pieces of time they have lost. Why did they not keep them better? When a greater piece of time has passed, a finger on something which they wear on their left wrist shows them how wrong they are. Sometimes a bell rings to alarm them, 'You have done wrong to cut the time in pieces.' It dies away. They walk on wheels and fly like birds to make the pieces of time not pass so quickly. If only they had not divided the time, it would never have passed away. They would not have had to worry." (Saemann, 9/73)

There are as many answers to philosophical, theological, religious, and spiritual questions as there are strawberries. But it is wrong for me to give answers. You can pick some berries yourself.

St. John writes, "Ye have an unction from the Holy One, and Ye know all things." (1JN 2:20)

The Talmud says that Rabbi Joshua ben Levi came upon the prophet Elijah and asked him, "When will the Messiah come?" The prophet's answer was, "Go and ask Him yourself." The Lord Jesus, after having healed a leper, straightly charged him (in Greek ~embrimesthe~, which means "sternly enjoined" him), "See thou say nothing to any man." Jesus begs, "Don't make Me the subject of vain words. Become a reality which puts men in touch with Myself. If you speak beautifully and wisely about Me, people may remain for life enjoying your enticing talk and never reach the Saviour."

If the enemy cannot turn us from Christ by means of vain thoughts and sinful ideas, then he brings back into our minds good things we have been taught and fills us with beautiful ideas so that one way or another he may lure us away from Christ, whom he cannot bear. It is called "a theft from the right-hand side," and in it the soul, putting aside its communion with God, turns to find satisfaction in communion with the good in himself or with created things. Do not admit during times of prayer even the most lofty of spiritual thoughts. If you see that in the course of the day time has been spent more in improving thought and talk than in the actual hidden prayer of the heart, then think of it as the loss of a sense of proportion, or a sign of spiritual greed. This is above all true in the case of beginners, for whom it is most needful that much more time be given to prayer than to the other facets of the devout life.

My answer to the spiritual questions would be, "Don't ask questions." Who is the questioner, the questioned, the One about whom you ask questions? The thinker, the thought, and the one thought about are one. Tauler wrote, "The eye by which I see God is the same eye by which God sees me. My eye and God's eye is one eye and one seeing and one knowing and one feeling."

Jesus' first request of a disciple is, "Deny yourself." You must deny everything, including the tendency to ask questions. Give life a "let go." Give reality, the ~Davar~, "the Word," a chance to operate in you freely. Does a surgeon stop every other moment to present his diploma and to explain what he is doing? To deny yourself means to have times not only of inaction but also of non-thought. One of the highest signs of faith in God is to rest, thinking about nothing in particular. If you have to think all things out, what do you leave for Him to do?

Count Zinzendorf said, "We should die completely

p017 Answer to Half a Million Letters

to reason, reflection and spiritualization in matters of truth belonging to the heart, and should achieve the blessed simplicity. We should know nothing except what we hear from Him."

Even the wisest words of the best teacher are only fingers which point toward heaven. Gazing at the finger, you may miss heavenly glory. The father image of a pastor, upon whom you are childishly dependent, storming him with questions, can keep you forever away from the Father.

Jesus teaches us to become like children. Like how big a child? Luther says, "Like a child yet unborn." He is right. But I will yield. Be like a sleeping babe. He does not think about past, present, future. He does not fancy. He is like Chief Tuiavii. His spirit is in the natural state. Jesus was surrounded by children. They never asked Him questions, though children usually do. But why should they ask Him questions? He was the answer. Do not analyze. I repeat, analysis is the beginning of paralysis.

My answer to your questions is that you have the answer; the head is right on your shoulders. Don't go around looking for it. And even allow your own head to rest.

Many wish to attain different aims in life and ask my advice. I even had an inquiry from a burglar who repented of having chosen such an ugly, dangerous profession. A burglar could be shot if he gets caught. He asked me if it would not be preferable to start a new life as a pickpocket. It is a cleaner job. Since I had spent so many years in prison, he would rely on my words. Others who write to me have higher aims. They would like to do well in politics or in the ministry. They have thousands of questions. I can tell all of them, "Whatever aim you choose might end in disillusion, even if your aim is to become a big saint." Don't worry and be troubled.

Mary Magdalene, when Jesus entered her house, sat at His feet and heard His words. After having listened for an hour, she did not rush to fulfill them. She sat another hour to hear more. Heaven is to hear His melodious voice. So begin your eternity in heaven now. She did not pursue aims She had even forgotten about her existence separate from Him. He was her all. She had chosen that good part, which was never to be taken away from her.

Sitting still, you will need no more answers about becoming a pickpocket or a missionary. People will put their money at your feet as they put it at the feet the apostles (ACT 4:35) and souls will flock to you without your having to run after them.

Many moral questions are asked of me. I wonder what good they will do. Nobody becomes more moral by asking moral questions. The Talmud tells us about a category of Pharisees nicknamed ~Mah hovati?~- "which is my duty?" Instead of fulfilling what they knew to be right, they would go from teacher to teacher asking questions about the right moral and religious attitude, with the hope that they would find one who would make the way easier for them. The rich young man who came to Jesus asking him, "What must I do to inherit eternal life?" might have belonged to this category.

Jesus told his disciples before they even asked any question,"Whither I go ye know, and the way ye know." (JHN 14:4) Nobody would ever ask a moral question if he were not bothered about the fact that he has the sure answer but does not wish, or does not have the power, to do what is right.

An elderly Christian lady had the habit of drinking a little glass of whisky every evening, just to warm her up a little. She had doubts about whether this should be the last act of a child of God before falling asleep. But she said to herself, "What is wrong with it? We old people feel cold. I do it in my bedroom and take just a little bit. I don't get drunk. I do harm to no one. I don't lose my mind. It is just for warming up my stiff bones." But then she doubted again if it was right. One evening she smashed the bottle and the glass. From that moment on she knew that she had been wrong.

If you have doubts about moral matters, smash the bottle.

In these problems, as also in religious and spiritual matters, it is always important to know how to doubt. Everyone who debates a question within himself is already divided, and he should not be. There is in him the questioner and the questioned. If you are in this predicament, doubt on the right side. You can believe in God and sometimes doubt His existence, or disbelieve God and wonder sometimes, if He does exist in reality. Doubt being a believer. You might practice pre-marital sex and doubt if you do not sin. You might keep yourself chaste and doubt if sex should not be allowed. Doubt on the right side. Smash the bottle with the glass and you will have the answer. You don't need me as an adviser.

I don't discourage anyone from asking questions. On the contrary, I am happy to have received so many letters. I am happy to know that most of the writers have asked not only me, but surely also many others. When he was young, Jesus asked questions. (LUK 2:46) My position will be made clear by the following age-old story:

A man asked a sage for the path of truth. The sage answered, "You need truth; I need a carpet. "Bring me a carpet and I will give you what you need." The man had no money. He went to a carpet shop and explained his predicament - that he badly needed a carpet in order to obtain truth. The shop owner said, "You can get it from me if you bring me a bundle of threads for weaving carpets." So he begged a spinner woman to give him threads so that he might obtain a carpet in exchange for which he would be taught truth. The woman did not care about truth. She said, "Bring me some goat hair from which to make thread, then I will serve you."

When he asked a goatherd for hair, the goatherd said, "Bring me a goat. Without a goat, whence should I get hair for you?" He found a man ready to give him a goat but with a problem in that he did not have a place to keep his animals at night. "You seek truth. I'm not interested in it. You provide me with a pen; you'll have goat hair of which thread will be spun, of which carpets are made, and for the carpet you will get the truth. So we will both be served." The man found a carpenter able to make a pen, but not very willing to work at that time. He was sad because he wished to marry and nobody would accept him because he was too ugly. "Find me a wife and I will build the pen." The man inquired and found a woman who told him, " I know a girl who would like a husband who is a manual worker just like the one you

described. I'll give you her name if you give me what I want, knowledge." "This is fine," the man answered, "but knowledge you can get only in exchange for a carpet made out of threads spun from goat hair. I was promised such hair in exchange for finding a carpenter who would make a stable, but it so happens that that carpenter will not work until he finds a wife." "Stupid," the woman answered. "I wish knowledge and not your foolish stories." The man left her in despair.

One evening, he slept in a foreigner's home. His daughter was sick. In her delirium she spoke about a carpenter whom she loved. It was just the carpenter of our story. So he told her the carpenter would be happy to marry her. Our man got the goat hair and threads were spun. Finally, he took the finished carpet to the sage in the hope of receiving the truth. The sage told him, "I have no truth to give you. You have had it the whole time. It was the giving up of all selfish aims in order to have the one precious jewel."

What higher truth do you wish than the continual digging after truth? You want answers. But most of the revelation of God consists of questions.

There are so many competing religions. Some souls desire ardently to know which is the bride of Christ. The question is asked in the Bible. Solomon asks, "Who is this that cometh out of the wilderness like pillars of smoke, perfumed with myrrh and frankincense, with all powders of the merchant?" (SOS 3:6) The answer is only a question mark. In the original Hebrew even this is missing. Every believing soul would like to have an authority on whom he can rely as being the leader of the church ordained by God, obedience to whom would surely be the right way. We ask what Jesus asked, too: "Who is that faithful and wise steward, whom his lord shall make ruler over his household, to give them their portion of meat in due season?" (LUK 12:42) The answer is again only a question mark.

The kingdom of God is within you. Where you don't have the answers, be content with questions. God does not owe you anything, not even answers. The Archangel Michael's name is an unanswered question. Michael in Hebrew means "Who is like God?" Perhaps God's revelation to you and His will for you in a certain matter is that you still remain in the questioning stage. On the cross Jesus passed through this stage for a time. The revelation of God to Him and through Him was a "Why?" with a question mark at the end. "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" The answer was a new wave of mockery from men, with no response from His Father. Do you wish to be greater than your Master?

There are situations in which it would be a disaster for a soul to have answers to his questions. He would be obliged, because he knows the answers, to do deeds for which he was not at all prepared. Teenagers ask me to tell them the secret of happiness. But they should first ask themselves if they are entitled to happiness. There should be no happiness without righteousness, and even the righteous have to wait. Are you prepared to be a saint?

What about accepting heavy suffering as the norm for you instead of happiness? St. Afra, the first female Christian martyr of Germany, had been a loose woman.

p023 Answer to Half a Million Letters

When she was threatened with flogging and burning she told the governor, "My body deserves to be tortured. May the flames cleanse my soul." Accept your handicaps and sufferings in this spirit.

For most of us the best thing is not to have answers. The Lord says, "If ye were blind, ye should have no sin." (JHN 9:41) God in His grace, keeps us in blindness in many matters. You wish answers. Are you prepared to accept them?

A man sought a lamp shop, having been told that there he would find a device which enables a person to read in the dark. Somebody told him, "There is a prerequisite. In order to read by means of a lamp you must first be able to read." The man answered scomfully, "I was not told this by my first informant." And he spent his money for a lamp which proved to be of no use to him in reading. Answers to your questions might prove useless to you, too. Have you fulfilled the prerequisites?

Instead of clarifying matters, every answer might raise new questions. I would rather tell you some things about me, the person questioned. Perhaps I will have my wife's good fortune. She told some things from her life in a book called ~The Pastor's Wife~. Nobody asked her anything after having read her book. She received a letter from a Christian lady: "I found in your life the answer to all questions which I have asked myself for twelve years."

There are many questions. My son Michael was five years old when he asked, "Who created the devil?" The story of Lucifer's fall did not satisfy him. He had a second question. "Why doesn't God kill the devil?" The moment you interrogate God, you take the place of a superior in relationship to Him. What kind of God would He be if He did not do things which are strange in men's eyes?

Reason will never find answers to its many inquiries. Love rests because it never questions what the beloved does.

Be quiet, worship, and love. This is all.

WURMBRAND _ THE QUESTIONED

I have had a message from God to tell the free world about the sufferings and the heroism of the Underground Church, its needs, its longing for liberty. This message has gone out to all continents, and missions in fifty countries work continually to spread it and to organize relief.

I feel that I have essentially fulfilled my duty and that now it is time for me to withdraw into a shadow and anonymity.

Years have passed since my first appearance in the West. They have not come to be counted, but to count. Every year has been marked by the formation of missions to the Communist world in a few more countries. It has been marked by articles, new books, big rallies. It was natural for men to ask themselves, "Who is Wurmbrand?"

To answer would mean to embed him in words, to compare him with other persons of the Christian world, to show the similarities and differences, to categorize Wurmbrand. This is not possible.

p025 Answer to Half a Million Letters

My early life was such that I could not emerge polished, kind, and open-minded, or without great self-confidence.

Without the latter characteristic, I would not have been able to create our fellowship of missions. I am atypical.

I was atypical in my activities as a pastor in Romania. I would go from one house to another to tell people about Christ. Some would not receive me. Then I would stand in front of the house for hours in the snow, in bitter winter, praying for those inside and waiting in case they might change their minds. The owners would see me through the window. They would come out from time to time and tell me, "Go away. You'll freeze to death. I am not interested in what you have to say." I would answer, "But I love you, and I know that you will be lost eternally if you don't accept my message. I will not leave." In the end, they would pity me, call me in, and give me some hot tea. Not many pastors proceed this way.

But I have been atypical in my sins, too. They have amounted to crimes. Many would be interested in knowing their details. We know that St. Paul beat the Christians and cast his vote for them to be sentenced to death. These were the first martyrs of Christianity. How much we would like to know their stories, their names. There must have been beautiful episodes of faithfulness to Christ unto the end. Why are their stories not told? Why don't we have their precious names? We only know that their torturer was later converted.

It took many Sabeans to be robbers so that Job would shine in righteousness. What made them into robbers?

p026 Answer to Half a Million Letters

What happened to them after they enabled Job to become a saint? You have your head right on your shoulders. So don't seek the answers from me. But the same reasons which made the authors of the Bible silent in these matters keep me from recounting what has been recorded on the videotape of my life. Furthermore, my sins have been erased by the blood of Jesus. Jesus has forgiven. If I don't die a sudden death, my last word will be addressed to men - "Forgive."

I have told the story of glorious saints and martyrs who are suffering or dying for Christ today in Communist prisons. This created a kind of halo around my head, too. Many identify me with the beautiful souls about whom I write. The praise which I have received is undeserved.

I was permitted to be put in prison because God considered that to be my place. He hoped that others would pastor my church better than I had. I had a chance to flee from Romania but remained there knowing that I would go to prison. But it is not true that I stayed only because of faithfulness to my duty as a pastor. Pride played a big role in my decision. At that time I could not have foreseen how much and how terrible was the suffering that awaited me. If I had known, I probably would not have remained.

I did not suffer as much as others did. Think only about the fact that when I was released I was greeted by a loving wife and son who had waited for me. The Orthodox priest Popescu found his wife re-married. His daughter, whom he had left behind as a girl of ten, had also married in the meantime and had become a Communist.

p027 Answer to Half a Million Letters

When her father knocked on her door after having sought her much, she received him with curses, slapping him and driving him out of the house. He spent his first night in the waiting room of a railway station.

From the day that I left Romania, I knew I had to fulfill an exceptional calling. I knew that it was my calling and nobody else's. At a presidential nominating convention Truman said, "During the next four years there will be a Democrat in the White House, and you are looking at him." I had this self-confidence. I had the gift from God of finding great men of God in many countries who had confidence in the message which I brought.

God has used them to build up the International Fellowship of Missions to the Communist World. I personally did not do much for its creation. God says, "I will raise up a prophet." (DEU 18:18) False prophets rise through their own endeavours. Those who know the history of our mission realize that its leadership has reached its position on the crest of the wave of enthusiasm of believers, in whom God dwells, from the whole world.

I had to write a multitude of books. But my English was poor. God brought into my path a journalist of exquisite style, Mr. Charles Foley. We met in London. I had to go to Devon the next day. He said, "I'll go with you to Devon." I replied. "You had better come with me to heaven." He edited my books and my wife's. The books spread. One followed another. So I became known.

My books were generally very well received. ~Christianity Today~, USA, of October 2, 1972, said about them: "Wurmbrand is rapidly writing an appendix 20th-century style to Fox's ~Book of the Martyrs~."

Huge crowds listened with intense emotion to the story of the Underground Church told at rallies in America, Europe, Asia, Africa, and Australia.

The average reader or listener had no difficulty in believing what I told. After me the Soviet Communist Mrs. Ghinzburg, who had spent eighteen years in Stalin's jails herself; Roy Medvedev, a member of the Party, in his book ~Let History Judge~; and more recently Solzhenitsyn, the Nobel-prize winner, told exactly the same facts of horror which I had related: salt water sprinkled in the throats of prisoners, pepper applied to the raw skin of men who had been flayed, female officers of the Secret Police beating men over their sex organs, and all the other "beauties" of the Red paradise. Former Romanian prisoners confirmed my report about prisoners being compelled to eat their feces and drink urine.

In my book ~In God's Underground~ I recounted the fact that, when a delegation of Western ladies visited the prison of Gherla, a lunch was prepared for us in the Hilton Hotel. Solzhenitsyn had not read my book, but it was as if he had plagiarized me. He told the story of Mrs. Roosevelt visiting a Soviet prison and seeing inmates neatly dressed, enjoying libraries, attending religious services, eating dainties - everything an ~ad hoc~ comedy.

My sermons and books were received with enthusiasm by the masses of Christians and many church leaders. Some of the latter were put in an embarrassing situation. The rank-and-file believers asked them why they had not been told these things before, why decades had passed without even a prayer being offered for the persecuted brethren in the Soviet camps. So they had to belittle my sayings. They attacked me.

Though many bad words were said, they amounted to almost nothing compared to what bishops had said in times past about Therese of Avila or Joan of Arc. The latter were canonized. The names of the bishops who insulted them are no longer remembered. Livingstone was accused of no less than raping black women, killing his co-workers, enriching himself through his book, and being ruthless to his own family, along with a whole catalogue of other crimes. Today his body lies in Westminster Abbey. And who remembers the names of the leaders of the Baptist Union of Britain who opposed Spurgeon?

I have considered it best not to answer accusations in any other way than through deeds: unceasingly helping the persecuted church and unceasingly showing the corruption or naivete of church leaders who compromise with Communism.

We had to try to drag some out of the ditch.

Whoever does this must get dirty. Brooms can sweep out dirt only by becoming soiled.

I have overcome these things, too. But a sadness has remained. I show more mirth than I am master of.

I have also received some, though very few, letters expressing doubts about what I have written. There were people who could not take it. ~Vanterland~, Luzern, of April 22, 1972, reminded its readers how difficult it was to get men to believe the Nazi atrocities. This was the first newspaper to tell them.
Some of my readers pointed to discrepancies in my books which could have arisen only if not everything that I said in them was factual.

I myself have contributed to these doubts. In my books I have said that I find it legitimate to lie to Communist interrogators who would like to know these secrets of the Underground Church. And I have enlarged upon this problem and have disapproved of persons who are so sincere that they would tell a hostess who had worked hard in preparation of a meal that her dinner was a disaster. About some of the things I wrote I can say with Shakespeare, "I moralize two meanings in one word." (Richard III) A Christian broadcaster wrote to me, "Once you state your belief in stretching the truth under such circumstances, I find myself wondering how much of your book you also stretched for what you consider good and just purposes. Would you, please, respond and let me have your thinking on this?"

My answer is simple:

The Gospels contradict each other. There are sometimes contradictions within the same Gospel. proves to me their truth. Perfectly consistent stories are usually made up.

But what would be wrong if I had not been factual in everything I told in my books? Goethe published his biography under the title ~From My Life - Truth and Poetry~. I believe that every autobiography is like this. I have listened to many people telling the story of their conversion. A grain of idealization or dramatization could easily be perceived. We have the parable of the prodigal son as told by Jesus. If the prodigal himself had told the story, he would not have been as blunt as to say,

p031 Answer to Half a Million Letters

"I returned to the father because the food cooked in his kitchen was good." There is nobody who does not repress some material, who does not avoid certain issues, who does not express in age-old symbols the reality which he cannot bring himself to say. The drive for symbols is as powerful in us as hunger, sex, or the desire to be a somebody.

I don't believe that anybody has the right to ask from me the videotapes of what I have done and spoken without allowing me any modifications. Where I had to erase something, I have filled the empty place with music. The truthfulness of the books is seen in the fact that they contain music and that this music is so beautiful that it has brought souls to conversion.

But because the very few who question are so insistent, I will do more than satisfy their curiosity. I will tell them the most intimate side of the life of a man: my dreams. In them those who inquire about many matters will find perhaps the reply they seek. If not, they might find the way to discover the reply within themselves.

I personally see no reason why dreams should be considered less real than impressions received when one is awake. On the contrary, dreams often affect one much more than the humdrum events of daily life. They can be more significant than ordinary perceptions.

The New Testament begins by telling us a series of dreams and finishes with a vision. So they must be important. God often speaks through dreams.

In 1902, a rascal in Italy, Alessandro Serenelli forced a girl of eleven, Maria Goretti, to submit to him or be killed. He held a knife to her throat. She answered, "I cannot yield, because the deed is evil. You would go to hell." He stabbed her several times. Before dying, she forgave him and said, "I would like to have my murderer near me in heaven." After his sentencing, he displayed the most obstinate hardness and cynicism, until he had a dream: "I thought that I was in a garden full of flowers and the whitest lilies. And there I saw Maria Goretti, radiant and clad in white, gathering them and making them into a garland. She offered them to me, saying, 'Take them!' I took them, and then very gradually I saw them change into little flames in my arms...flames that glowed like candles."

p032 Answer to Half a Million Letters

In 1910, he was won over to a lasting and sincere repentance. In a letter to the priest who visited him, he wrote: "I weep over my misdeed...for I have taken the life of an innocent girl whose one aim was to save her purity, shedding her blood rather than give in to my sinful desires. I publicly retract the evil I have done and beg pardon of God and of the stricken family. I dare to hope that I may obtain that pardon as so many others have done on this earth."

On Christmas Eve, 1937, and on the following Christmas morning a scene took place such as we find only in the annals of Christianity, and perhaps we would have to turn back many a page to find its parallel.

Alessandro had become truly penitent and had served his sentence. On his release he had taken up honest work and tried to live as a good Christian. But since that July afternoon in 1902, the mother and the murderer of the child had never met.

Assunta was now the housekeeper of the Archpriest of Corinaldo. Accompanied by him, Alessandro sought her out. He cast himself at her feet and humbly begged her forgiveness.

The old mother's voice broke as she fought back the tears.

"Maria forgave you, Alessandro," she answered, "so how could I possibly refuse?"

The following morning, Christmas Day, the parish church at Corinaldo was filled to overflowing as Assunta and Alessandro entered side by side. Together they received Holy Communion, and at the express wish of Assunta, as well as that of the Archpriest, Alessandro spent his Christmas in the rectory.

Maria had won his soul, a victory that could come only from heaven. Heaven knew the facts that history is somehow inclined to pass over, in its horror at the enormity of his crime, and the innocence of his little victim. Heaven must have understood that Alessandro had never known a mother's love and that he had received but little love from a worthless father; that he had led a roving life in his boyhood, with no religious or moral training worth speaking of, and that bad companions from the start and then obscene and pornographic reading material did the rest, and made him what he became.

But the gentle Maria, the sweet child of only eleven years, eight months and twenty days, obtained from God the grace to thaw his frozen soul. He ended his days quietly, prayerfully, in a monastery in Italy, employed as a gardener. Surely the final story of Alessandro is one of the most inspiring aspects of the beautiful story of Maria

Goretti.

Dreams can radically change a man.

Sometimes they are relatively clear as in the case above. Sometimes they are obscure. The Bible tells us twenty-one dreams, many of them with their interpretation, which, thus, is also considered important. We know nothing about the dream life of most of the personalities of the Bible. We know no dream of Jesus. As a rule, dreams don't occur for the purpose of being remembered. Such dreams are a rare exception. Ordinary dreams create the mood for the next day or two. The dreams of Jesus were such as to enable Him to live as truth and Beauty incarnate in a Man of Sorrows.

I am attentive to my dreams. All those who have spent many years in prison are. It was part of the ritual of prison life for us to tell each other our dreams every morning and then some experts would interpret them. Their unanimous explanation was always that we would soon be free. But some of us had our own thoughts about their meaning.

If you have no self-knowledge your knowledge will be blind...No useful, deep self-knowledge is possible without the knowledge of your dreams.

I will tell mine not only because some of my questioners would like to know the intimacies of my life, but also for another reason. Over the years a certain woman asked me all kinds of deep theological questions. I knew that someday she would tell me what was really bothering her. It was apparent to me that she had difficulty in expressing her real need. But I could wait. One evening she told me of the tragedy which obsessed her. After that her need to have answers to theological problems ended. They had been a pretense.

I would like to put what I have to say in the language of dreams. Dreams hide nothing. They have no moral implications. They are the vacation of the soul, of the organism. What is an illusion or a fear for my conscious mind becomes a happy or grim reality for the unconscious which expresses itself in dreams.

I had a series of interesting dreams while planning this book. When I finished the first draft, they ceased.

So, in the chapters to come, we will communicate on the subliminal, subconscious level. You will find out here that you had the answers you seek. Your head is right on your shoulders "For the past twenty years," Rabbi Israel H. Leventhal pointed out in 1929, "students of psychology, influenced by Freud, gave all their time to searching the subconscious realms. It is true that the subconscious reveals much of the mystery that can explain human actions, but not all of our actions. It can explain the abnormal, but not deeds that are above the normal. The latest psychology, sponsored by the French schools, has discovered a new region in man, which it terms the superconscious. In contrast to the subconscious which represents the submerged currents of our nature, it reveals the heights to which our nature can reach. Man represents a triple, not a double, personality; our conscious and subconscious being is crowned by a superconsciousness. Many years ago the English psychologist, F. W. H. Myers, suggested that 'hidden in the deep of our being is a rubbish heap as well as a treasure house.' In contrast to the psychology that centers all its researches on the subconscious in man's nature, this new psychology of the superconscious focuses its attention upon the treasure house, the region that alone can explain the great, unselfish, heroic deeds of men."

Before telling my dreams, I have one other thing to do, and that is to tell you the methods I use to impress upon you my ideas. We will communicate on the subconscious and superconscious levels which express themselves in dreams, too.

HOW TO COMMUNICATE

I receive criticisms; I receive compliments. The most frequent compliment is that I am a powerful preacher. A Christian magazine calls me "the most dramatic preacher known today." A young pastor who would like to proclaim the Gospel well, asks me, "What makes big crowds flock to you, while our churches stand empty?" A prison warden writes, "How can I find the words and understand so that I can convert a non-believer?"

I don't consider it important to be what men call "a good preacher." Livingstone, who opened the center of Africa for Christ, had been a poor one. On the other hand, many golden-tongued spellbinders have done much harm. People swallow without discernment their false teachings.

But I consider it important for every man to be able to tell others what he thinks, so as to bring home to them the truth he holds. The art of earnest preaching is none other than earnest witnessing for your faith, or the art of communicating with other men so as to influence them. I do not write the present book for the pleasure of writing but because I wish you to accept my thoughts. I will tell you how I learned to preach and to write so as to influence souls. My experiences might be helpful to any man in any profession. The following thoughts concern not only pastors, but also those who must choose from which pastor, political leader, or educator they wish to learn. They might help you to teach others, at least your children, what you know.

Most of what is learned in seminaries – Latin, Greek, Hebrew, church history, dogma, hermeneutics – unfortunately does not serve the supreme purpose. Sometimes it may even go so far as to cripple future pastors in their task of winning souls for Christ. Something else is needed.

When I was a very young pastor, a renowned Romanian actress attended our Sunday services. After three or four weeks she gave me a call: "Please, come and have a dinner in my home. But I would prefer that you come without your wife." I wondered about this condition but accepted it.

She received me considerably dressed and considerably undressed. On the table there were all sorts of imaginable dainties. We two were alone. Together we enjoyed the food, talking banalities. After the meal she told me:

"You are wondering why I invited you. It was for a definite purpose. There is a story which I would like you to know.

"In the time of the Reformation in Germany, thousands came to listen to Jacob Bohme, a self-styled Christian philosopher, I believe a shoemaker by profession. He preached the newly-discovered Gospel with such power that thousands wept and laughed at his command. The rumour spread: ~A great man from God has risen among us.~ Bohme got used to being highly appreciated by his audience.

"One Sunday, he observed in church a man who looked like Jesus as shown in holy images. Bohme could read on the face of this young man that the sermon did not satisfy him, but rather grieved him. The next Sunday and the Sunday after, the same thing happened. Bohme could not bear it. He stopped this man at the end of the service and asked him.

'You seem dissatisfied with my sermon - is it so? What do you dislike?'

'Your sermons are much too beautiful to be true,' was the reply. 'Two and two are four. This sentence is not beautiful, but it is absolutely true. You wish to win souls. Your purpose is good. But in your enthusiasm, you launch yourself further and further. Two and two become four and a half and five, then six, eight, and ten. Truth is simple, prosaic. How simple are the Ten Commandments and the Beatitudes! God is truth. He does not agree with your sermons. Neither do I.'

"These words made a great impression on Bohme. He could not forget them. And as often as he got worked up in his peroration, he would feel as if somebody were whispering to him, 'Is what you say really so? Do you speak the truth?' He would begin to stammer, to lose his train of thought. People wondered what had happened to the eloquent preacher of times past. He must have lost his gift. Fewer and fewer people attended his sermons.

"Finally, the one who had been beloved of thousands came to church one Sunday to find only a few old women and this one Jesus-like person. At the exit, the latter told Bohme, 'Now for the first time you have preached the naked truth. Your future task is not to allow it to remain naked and to tremble. Clothe the truth in beauty. No ornament is too costly for truth. Clad it in jewels.'

"And Bohme again preached beautifully. But now he preached the ~truth~ beautifully."

"I have heard you preach several times," the actress continued. "You are young and you preach beautifully. So I thought it would do you good to know this story. I called you without your wife, thinking you might feel ashamed to be criticized for your sermons in her presence."

I had believed her to have other intentions.

After my many years of prison, she visited me in the hospital. She also had suffered persecution. From her I learned much about preaching and writing, but above all, how to communicate with my fellowmen simply and effectively.

The directives for a good sermon are: Read yourself full, think yourself clear, pray yourself hot, and then you will have the truth. Once you possess it, do not have the slightest scruple about dramatizing and ornamenting it. Know that you fulfill your duty to truth by covering it with the most costly jewels. Tell as beautifully as you can one illustration after another to embellish it.

Another important aspect about preaching and speaking to men regarding earnest things I learned from Garrick, the former century's renowned actor, interpreter of Shakespearean characters.

I read his correspondence with a young pastor who had questioned him. "You are a master of the spoken word. People vibrate at every word and gesture of yours. Teach us as pastors how to handle the word. Supposing you had to play on stage the role of a priest who preaches, how would you do it? What would be the modulations of your voice, the expressions of your face, your movements?"

Garrick answered by saying that he lives his roles. When he plays Othello he is jealous, when he plays Hamlet he is torn by doubts, when he plays Romeo he is enamored. He transposes himself into the state of heart of the personalities he has to reveal. "So," he continued, "if I had to preach on stage, I would transpose myself into the following state of mind: I am a young physician. Before me lies, deathly sick, my beloved bride. She may have a chance to recover, but only if she takes a drug which I have specially prepared for her. She is in a bad mood and does not wish to take it. I plead with her, 'Take this medicine, otherwise you will die, and with you my happiness too. Life without you means nothing to me. If you take it, you will live and we will both enjoy unspeakable felicity.'"

Garrick wrote to the young pastor, "Think like this when you preach, and you will not have to care about the right intonation, gesticulation, expression."

Hundreds of books and courses about the art of preaching have not played such a decisive role in my manner or delivering the Word as this letter of Garrick's.

p041 Answer to Half a Million Letters

At the start of my career as a pastor, I was usually only the preacher. The liturgical part was taken by someone else. I used the time when others sang or said their prayers to project in my mind a definite image: ~Those before me are eternal souls, all born in sin, all doomed to perish, unless they agree to take the medicine I offer them.~ I loved every one of them. If it were a small congregation, my look would pass from one man to the other, and I would pray for each one: "Save this man. If not, he is lost, and I cannot be happy without his being in the Kingdom." When I spoke before thousands, I would pray for the right side of the gallery, then for the left side, then for those in the rear, those in the front rows, those who stood. I would love them with the feelings of Rachel, who said to Jacob, "Give me children or I die."

A third episode.

When I was a young pastor, I was very proud. I was considered a handsome young man and the cassock suited me well. I was tall. When I entered the church, I saw people looking toward me with love, admiration, and great expectation. I am Jewish. A Jewish Christian pastor is a rarity. Christians make the mistake of spoiling Jewish Christians, showing them an affection apart.

An Orthodox monk, a friend of mine, who had heard me preach observed how things were. At a dinner he told me a story, saying that I could use it as an illustration in a sermon:

"On Palm Sunday, when the Lord entered into Jerusalem riding on a donkey, he was received with shouts of 'Hosannah, son of David!' and with the waving of palm branches. On that evening, the donkey told his fellow

p042 Answer to Half a Million Letters

donkeys in the stable, 'If only you could have seen with what honours I was acclaimed in Jerusalem!' They called me "Son of David, King of the Jews." I had never before known the name of the ass who was my father. I was very pleased to find out that he was called David. And the crowd seemed very determined. They wished to make me king. They threw their clothes before me on the pavement, that I might walk on softness. I suppose they will come tomorrow to enthrone me. I imagine that when an ass becomes king, he gets plenty of hay and is not made to carry burdens any more!"

The monk finished, "Poor donkey, he did not know that the fuss had been about Jesus, not about him." He looked at me significantly. "There are quite a few such donkeys. Young pastors are prone to believe that the honour they receive is for them."

A preacher has to be humble.

If he has natural abilities, it is surely a great asset. But you can do without. Neither the sermons of St. Peter or St. Paul nor the speech delivered before his death by St. Stephen showed rhetorical abilities. They also have shortcomings as regards scholarship. My examiner in hermeneutics gave me a bad mark. He was sure that I would never do as a preacher. Perhaps the apostles would have failed his tests. St. John Vianney, the curate of Ars, was a man with a low I.Q. Notwithstanding, he was a very effective preacher, because he was humble and never pretended to have what he lacked.

My son delivered his first sermon as a seminarian with the words, "From this pulpit many great preachers have spoken. One of them sealed his sermons with a martyr's death. Don't expect much from me. I cannot preach like them. I cannot give you deep teachings. But I point toward One who will satisfy all the needs of your soul and your intellectual demands. This is all I dare to do. I enter the shadow and let Him speak to you." The audience listened to him attentively because he had been modest.

I knew a preacher who was greatly loved because he would say in the midst of his sermon, "Wait a little - I have forgotten what I had to say further. I remember it was something important. Just be patient a little bit."

With most preachers such a thing would not happen. They would fill a gap in their memory with empty words. Humility wins. Everyone has enough trouble with his own price. He will not swallow yours.

Goethe said, "Genius is 1% inspiration and 99% perspiration." I believe the same. In order to be a good preacher, a man has to work hard. The sermon must be the result of the labour of a whole Christian life, not of a few minutes or even a few hours of preparation.

The worst ink is better than the best memory. I write down every significant dream, every significant word I hear in a sermon or private conversation or read in the Bible or a newspaper, every episode from my life or that of others which can be used as an illustration. For every idea, I have one sheet of paper. I put on top the Bible verse with which I believe it could best be used. And then I classify them from Genesis to Revelation. A man who makes ten notes a day will have 30,000 notes after ten years. I once had hundreds of thousands. Some were confiscated by the Communist Police. Some escaped.

p044 Answer to Half a Million Letters

When I have to deliver a sermon on a given subject, I go to the respective drawer and usually find far too many illustrations, plus linguistic and theological explanations. I have plenty of choice. People wonder afterwards about the richness of thought in the sermons. Well, it is not the thoughts of this week, but those I have gathered across the years.

What I have said in this chapter applies not only to pastors, but also to every man who wishes to witness effectively for Christ, to everyone who wishes to communicate on a spiritual level.

Pastors should not preach only on Sundays. Bishop Latimer recommended the devil to his clergy as an example of a good pastor. He visits his whole parish every day. He speaks not only with the chief of the household, but also with the wife and with each individual child and then he enters the kitchen to say a word to the maid who might be there, too. Do the same when you pay a visit as a Christian. Have a story prepared for every child according to his age. Prepare yourself for a private conversation as you would prepare yourself for a sermon before thousands. I was won for Christ in a private conversation. Since that time, thousands have been influenced for Christ through me. Who knows the value of the one man or child to whom you dedicate your time? He might be a future Spurgeon or a great saint in process.

Consider that every sermon or simple conversation may be your last one or the last one heard by the man before you. It is a sin to give less than the best of which you are capable. Never care what your bishop, your board of elders, or the audience will think about your sermon or what the world will think about your talk. Simply deliver the message which you have from God, always adjusting it to the level of understanding of the people to whom you speak.

DO WE HAVE TO FEAR A COMMUNIST TAKEOVER?

And now I will tell you a couple of dreams, along with some interpretations.

All men are partially illiterate. Not everyone knows how to read musical notes, symbols used by atomic scientists, or chemical formulas. Very rare are those who can read the subliminal language of dreams.

But perhaps you will find in their symbols peace for what troubles you and makes you ask me questions.

All men when awake are in a common world but when asleep are in a world of their own. Dreams are the most personal episodes of our lives. And when communicated and explained they awaken what is the most personal in the reader. Within each person is an unlimited reservoir of energy and creative intelligence which can be tapped to fulfill the potential of the individual. In order to reach this reservoir, however, the mind must be able to transcend thought. There are different means to achieve this, such as the repeating without concentration of prayer of the heart in Orthodoxy, "Jesus, Son of God, pity me a sinner." But communication of dreams and attempts to understand their symbolism might have the same liberating effect.

First Dream

~I am with Gerald Ford, then Vice President of the United States. He prays with a loud voice. (The day before, I had watched his swearing-in on TV) I intend to propose that a regular hour of prayer be organized in the Senate. At once an army storms the place. It is Russian Cossacks with their swords drawn. They arrest all those who have no money, among them Ford and me. I don't even have a shirt on. I laugh about the new situation on which I am placed.~

This dream is indicative of my continual concern about a possible take-over of the United States and the whole free world by the Communists. In the year 1973 alone, revolutionist groups stole from the United States military barracks 628,488 guns and revolvers, enough to start a small guerrilla army. In the last five years, leftist organizations have been involved in some five thousand armed attacks, robberies for political reasons, and blasts.

Why should I be so concerned about a Communist takeover?

It is not because they are atheists. In a certain sense, Christians are the same. Justin Martyr wrote, "We confess that we are atheists as far as gods of demonic sort are concerned, but not with respect to the true God, the Father of temperance and other virtues." Many who call themselves atheists are such only with respect to the false image of God which has been presented to them. But Communism denies any possibility of God. Lenin wrote, "Marxism is materialism. It is relentlessly hostile to religion."

p047 Answer to Half a Million Letters

Now, in fair competition it would be very easy for us to defeat materialism.

A Communist lecturer once explained that man is matter, only matter. No spirit, no soul, no angel, no eternal life! We are matter and we decay when we die. A Christian stood up and, as if in anger, threw his stool on the floor. He straightened it, then stormed onto the platform and slapped the atheist. The atheist began to shout, "You have insulted the Party which I represent here! Police, arrest him!"

The Christian very quietly replied, "There must be a misunderstanding, comrade. Did you not say that we are matter just like the wood of the lectern before you? You saw me throwing the stool to the floor. Stool, are you angry at me? Stool, do you wish to retaliate? Comrade, matter has no emotions, it does not love, it does not hate. It does not know wrath, it does not avenge itself. The fact that you call the police shows that you yourself are more than matter. You have a soul. See that it is saved."

Tragically, the story does not end here, because in Communist countries one is liable to go to prison for contradicting a materialist lecturer. The Communists oblige all to think alike, which means that practically nobody dares to think at all.

When I consider the Communist danger, I see before me more than the prisons, which are almost as numerous in Russia as motels in the United States; I see more than cells with moldy walls in which Christians, Jews, Moslems, and Buddhists, reduced to simple numbers, sit in abject despair, more than the spiked box in which they sometimes are forced to stand, lacking not only food but even air. I see more than the mockeries.

I see the sufferings of the Communists themselves. An officer of the Communist Secret Police told me, "You are a pastor. Wherever you go, you leave behind you comfort. When I enter a house, children ask me, 'Why do you leave us without a father?'" I think about poor Trotsky, the founder of the Red Army. He had promoted permanent revolution. During this unceasing revolution, two of his children were killed by Stalin; his brother, his sister-in-law, and his niece were deported to Siberia; and he himself was killed with an axe by the order of his own comrades.

Zinoviev was the president of the third International. Under Stalin's tortures he confessed to having been a counter revolutionist and spy. He and his interrogator who had squeezed his confession out of him wept together when Zinoviev signed it. His last words before being shot were, "Listen, Israel, your God is the only God." He said the words in Hebrew, as he had been taught in childhood.

I was in prison with officers of the Communist Secret Police who had fallen afoul of the Party during a purge. They told us how during their training in ruthlessness they were made to shoot, using consecrated wafers for targets. They had an Orthodox or Catholic background. Some of them felt they had actually aimed their revolvers at Christ.

Solzhenitsyn writes in ~Gulag Archipelago~ that it was the habit of Iagoda, former head of the Soviet Secret Police, and his friends to shoot at ikons.

I think about whole peoples wiped off the face of the Soviet Union: the Chechen, the Kalmik, the Tatar, the Tinu-Tawus. It is like deporting all the Welsh to some island in the channel and allowing them to starve there.

I see the triumph of hatred.

In ~Message to the Tricontinentals~ Che Guevara wrote, "Hatred is an element of struggle; a relentless hatred of the enemy, impelling us over and beyond the natural limitations that man is heir to, and transforming him into an effective, violent, selective, and cold killing machine. Our soldiers must be thus; a people without hatred cannot vanquish a brutal enemy." Lenin in 1922 wrote, "The time has come to put an end to opposition, to put a lid on it. We have had enough opposition." In ~State and Revolution~ he quotes Engels as saying, "If the victorious party does not want to have fought in vain, it must maintain this rule by means of the terror its arms inspire in reactionaries."

I am serious when I say that all the Bible's lurid descriptions of hell are a picnic compared to Communist hell.

My utter concern for a Communist takeover of the West, expressed in this dream, was one of the motives for the creation of the International Fellowship of Missions to the Communist World. In 732 A.D. Charles Martel, king of the Francs, turned the tide and threw Islam out of Western Europe. I suppose that "The Christian Mission to the Communist World" has been created by God for a purpose like this.

You have many nagging questions? Give them up and do your share so that Christian civilization may not be swallowed up by the Red dragon.

p050 Answer to Half a Million Letters

In my dream, the Communists arrested only those who had no money. I didn't have even a shirt.

First of all, it is a fact that almost all those who filled Red prisons were poor. Millionaires, as a rule, had fled the country or were used by the Communists as skilled professionals.

But the dream expresses my belief that Christians should be poor. In the dream I laughed heartily when I saw myself without even a shirt. What is best in me would like me to be so. The image comes from Romanian folklore, according to which a rich man who was sick was told that he would be cured only if he could put on the shirt of a perfectly happy being. He sent his servants to find such a person, but everyone questioned lacked something. In the end they found a wood-cutter who sang heartily. They promised him much money for his shirt. He had to tell them that, unfortunately, he had none to give them.

St. John Chrysostom preached, "Every rich man is a criminal or the son of a criminal. You say to me, 'When will you cease to speak against the rich?' I answer, 'When you cease to oppress the poor."

Under Savonarola's rule, Christians burned all articles of luxury in Florence. Then Pope Alexander Borgia ordered that Savonarola be burned. But Savonarola had been right as far as Christianity is concerned.

The Jewish law commanded that a woman who had given birth to a child should bring a lamb into the temple for a burnt offering. If she was not able to bring a lamb,

p051 Answer to Half a Million Letters

then she should bring two "turtles" (or "turtle-doves," see LEV 12:8), which Mary the mother of the Lord did. She was poor. She could not afford a lamb except her Son, who was the Lamb of God. Why should we be rich?

Jesus was crowned with a crown of thorns. Should Christians wear gold, pearls, and jewels?

Do we wish the Communists to be God's tools in fulfilling a prophecy given to Isaiah? Just listen: "In that day the Lord will take away the bravery of their tinkling ornaments about their feet, and their cauls, and their round tires like the moon, the chains, and the bracelets, and the mufflers, the bonnets, and the ornaments of the legs, and the headbands, and the tablets, and the earrings, the rings, and nose jewels, the changeable suits of apparel, and the mantles, and the wimples, and the crisping pins, the glasses, and the fine linen, and the hoods, and the vails. And it shall come to pass, that instead of sweet smell there shall be stink; and instead of a girdle a rent; and instead of well set hair baldness; and instead of a stomacher a girding of sackcloth; and burning instead of beauty." (ISA 3:18-24)

Rabbi Akiba said that poverty suits the daughters of Jacob as a red harness suits a white horse.

Not only is the wearing of jewels wrong. Whoever overeats denies to somebody else the necessities of life. Every kind of comfortableness is an enemy of Christianity. Children of God make their lives more difficult through ease and comfort. Jesus could not stretch His limbs on the cross. For us no armchair is relaxing enough.

p052 Answer to Half a Million Letters

Westerners are persecuted with the easy life. It is a terrible persecution. It kills the Christian life much more readily than the truncheons and pincers used by the Communist torturers. It is so easy to follow a life of apathy and ease and refuse to take up one's cross and follow Jesus by getting involved.

It would be better for us not to exist than to renounce sacred poverty. We would renounce a blessing. Jesus said, "Blessed be ye poor." (LUK 6:20) We must be radical in this regard. The poor must be our teachers. We should abhor the disgusting ownership of things. We should despise money. We should seek the lowest position and happy to be despised.

The Christian life without at least some measure of ascetic practices is false. Simone Weil renounced sugar for six years in order to give it to the soldiers on the front. Tens of millions are hungry in Africa, Latin America, and Asia. We should at least be willing to give up ice cream.

It is a shame that even some American missionaries live pretentiously, loudly with ostentation.

The mother of Ludovic of Thuringia complained to him that his wife, St. Elizabeth of Hungary, had made a leper sleep in his bed in his absence. Ludovic looked and saw Jesus in bed. He thanked Elizabeth.

This is how I think. Such examples inspire me, and because I don't live up to my ideal, I appear to myself happy at least in my dream when I am poor, without a shirt, under arrest.

The selfishness of life under Capitalism prepares the way for atheistic Communism.

p053 Answer to Half a Million Letters

Many ask if this or that in which they indulge is permissible. My answer is, "Be very poor. Never use money for drugs, alcohol, clothing which excites." Jesus uses for "poor" the Greek word ~ptohois~, which means abject poverty. Choose this and sinners will not accept you in their company.

The "Pateric" tells us that a young monk came to a father of the desert and asked him what he should do against the temptation of the flesh. The father answered, "I don't know the temptation and therefore can give you no advice. Ask somebody else." So the monk went to another elder and told him the negative reply he got. This elder said to him, "Return to the one who sent you to me and ask him why he does not know the temptation." He received the explanation, "Because I eat little."

Prison was a place of terrible sexual obsessions and fantasies. These disappeared in times when our food was very, very scarce.

Twenty percent of mankind eats eighty percent of the food which is produced. And then they spend money on postage asking about their moral problems. They will never get a satisfactory answer. After Jesus had fasted forty days, the devil could tempt him only from afar, as it were, and found not the slightest echo in Jesus.

To thousands of letters asking complicated sexual, marital, and moral questions of all kinds, my answer might seem to be a foolish one, "Eat less."

The priest in Cronin's ~The Keys of the Kingdom~ tells a rich lady who bored him endlessly in the confessional to lose weight if she wishes to enter the Kingdom of God. Its gate is narrow.

SHOULD WE ALWAYS SPEAK THE TRUTH

Second Dream

~I am in the office of an organization which leads a secret work behind the Iron Curtain, but whose methods of promotion I consider unfair. Its director shows me the picture of a Hebrew Christian lady, a friend of mine. She has a terrible wound. Her breast has been cut off. I ask, "Who has done this?" He replies, "Her husband." "He has been dead a long time. I say, "You can't publish this as a proof of Communist atrocity. They have not done it." He replies, "I will publish the picture without saying expressly that the crime has been committed by the Reds. People will draw their own conclusions. So I will not have lied." I tell him, "Lying is not what you say, but what you make others think. When Abraham told Pharaoh that Sarah was his sister, this was true. She was his half-sister. But he suggested that she was an unmarried girl."~

In my dream life I always object strenuously to lying. This is because I had to say much untruth in the underground work under Nazism and Communism in Romania. I cannot see how you can lead this work without lying.

Churchill was right: "In war truth must have an escort of lies." The church wages a war: "Onward, Christian Soldiers, Marching as to War." How can you lead a war telling an enemy where, when, and how you will attack him? So much the more in the underground fight.

I believe that everyone who asserts that he leads a secret work without lying is telling the biggest of lies.

I had to use lies during interrogations. I had to lie in prison. Many prisoners would have died of despair if we had not supported their hope. To support it with the hope of paradise was not enough. They would not have survived if I had not assured them again and again that Americans were coming to free them, that as a matter of fact they were already on their way to Romania.

There exist white lies. A father and son were in prison near me. The father always lied that he did not feel well and could not eat so as to increase the starvation ration of the son. The father died and saved the son. There exist saving pretences. In prison a mother almost went mad after hearing the truth that her daughter had died. A Christian lady recently arrested told her the white lie that she had seen her daughter alive. Thus she saved the mother's sanity.

In ISA 32:5, after the promise that once "a king shall reign in righteousness," it is said that then "the vile person shall be no more called liberal, nor the churl said to be bountiful," which implies that under unrighteous rulers it is acceptable to give good names to bad people in order to keep your life. Jacob gives Esau the impression that he has seen the face of God in order to make Esau afraid.

To preach the Gospel as you would teach a scientific truth in the university is also impossible. When the professor writes popularized science, he draws a picture of the atom or of the universe which my imagination can seize. He knows that matter is not picturable. St. Paul writes, "To the Greek I have become as a Greek, to the Jew as a Jew, so that by all means I might save some." He spoke what was efficient, not unadulterated truth. But God desires ~truth in the innermost parts~. (PSA 51:6) This creates a tension in the soul of everyone which expresses itself in dreams like this. In the dream self-reproach takes the form of reproaches addressed to others.

p057 Answer to Half a Million Letters

The acknowledgment of the state of tension as normal will free you from many questions.

CHRISTIANS AND THEIR PASTORS

Third Dream

An artist friend of ours presents me with two paintings, telling me - so I remembered vaguely - that they are works of Goya. I tell this in her presence to a brother in Christ. She does not contradict me, but when she leaves, he accompanies her a bit. When he returns, he tells me that I have heard falsely. The paintings are not Goya's. He adds, "You must speak only what you know exactly." I object to the principle. There are legitimate ways of speaking other than what one knows with certainty, I say. There is exploratory talk, in which one makes all kinds of suppositions. Jesus spoke sometimes about things he did not know. "When the Son of man cometh, shall he find faith on the earth?" (LUK 18:8)

At once, the man who is before me is my son Mihai. He tells me that the Biblical book Ecclesiastes predisposes the reader toward skepticism. We read in it, "Who knows if the soul of man ascends at death and that of the animal descends?" I answer that these words are not an expression of skepticism, but of assurance that there is Somebody who has the answer to the greatest questions. But Solomon did not know who this was. This is Jesus. The Kabbala tells us that in Divinity there exists the sphere of the Mah (what) and that of the Mi (Who). Many see what happens but don't know the Who, the Person who makes things happen and therefore has also

all explanations.

Now I am in the presence of one of the greatest preachers of Romania. He is dead. Knowing in 1947 that I was threatened with arrest by the Communists, I had consulted him as to whether I should leave the country. He urged me to go. So had all the other pastors from whom I sought advice. I now saw again in a dream the discussion with him. I come home and tell my wife, "If all the pastors had told me that a good shepherd does not leave his flock when the wolf comes, we could have fled, knowing that we were leaving our congregation in good hands. But if they all advise me to flee, they show what they would do if they could. So I consider it my duty to remain."~

With this last dream I have reached the problem of the relationship between Christians and their pastors.

A multitude of the letters which I receive complain about things happening in churches, about pastors and priests, about the World Council of Churches and the Vatican. Some of my correspondents have changed denominations, as a man would change a shirt, in the hope of finding satisfaction for their souls, and they are still unhappy. "My church is as empty of spirit as the Communists would like it to be," a Christian writes.

What is wrong with the churches? Just nothing.

Jesus said to his disciples, which constituted the first church, "You are the light of the world," not "you should be," or "you should strive to become the light of the world." He also said that the church is ~the~ light, not one of many lights. Those who seek a church which should be the light of the world are again like the man who vainly sought his head when it was upon his shoulders.

The church is Christ prolonged in time, passing through history. Innumerable men had lived in the nearness of Christ, had seen Him eating, studying Scriptures, boiling glue, bargaining when He bought and sold (there is no trade without bargaining in the Orient). Sometimes it was apparent to every onlooker that He was tempted to sin. People would not know if He yielded to the temptation or not. He was known to get angry and said the harshest word, "Satan," even to somebody who would later die for Him. He trembled in Gethsemane, He despaired in suffering. But He did not have to strive to be the eternal Son of God. This is what He was. It was not easy to recognize it.

Neither is it easy to recognize the church, with its many human weaknesses which sometimes amount to terrible crimes, as being the light of the world. But this it is. That Jesus is the Son of God is an article of our creed and therefore indisputable. It is an axiom. If we step down to arguments, we will be swamped by counter-arguments which Jews and Moslems and infidels bring. The same creed says, "I believe in the one, holy, catholic and apostolic church." We have a faith given by God. We keep it as it has been given to us.

And we, members of this church, don't cease to belong to it because of something foolish we think or do. Thoughts or acts don't exclude from the body. We are what we are ontologically, not psychologically. We are members of the body even in moments of disbelief.

During His earthly life, Jesus passed through many stages of evolution: an embryo, a babe, a child, an adult. He passed through many situations: greatly beloved, respected, humiliated, transfigured, crucified, risen. He had different moods. With the church, Christ prolonged in history, it is the same.

Just now she is passing through a spiritual ice-age. Jesus must have suffered from cold. You shiver for cold sometimes even in churches situated under the warm California sun. The weather outside is warmer than the sermons. But look only on the good side. You will see snow flowers breaking the icy shell and gladdening souls with beauty.

There are microbes in the baptismal water and on the cup of Holy Communion, billions of them, more than the sins in the church members. Does this lessen the value of the sacraments?

If all the church members were all righteous, why would they need a church? Is not the church a school for sinners?

It is a school apart. Its teachers are also pupils. They also have to learn what is the subject of the church's teaching: to become like Jesus in miniature. Without this, no sermon or ritual will help.

As pupils in school are punished by their teachers with reproof and bad marks, so church teachers have to be reproved and given bad marks by other teachers who know better.

Diotrephes mentioned in III John [3JN] had probably been a bishop. Otherwise he could not have done all the evil for which he received the apostle's rebuke. But he had behaved so badly that St. John does not even give his title. He was not worthy of it any more. Some very harsh epithets have been used against men with high functions in the church. A crook must be called a crook, whatever his position in religion. There exist people whose correct title is His Eminence the Crook, His Grace the Infidel. Faithfulness to the church demands opposition to the renegade leaders.

St. Peter Damianus called Pope Gregory VII, founder of the world position of the Curia, "Saint Satan," " wolf," "tiger." He spoke about the "Sodom and Gomorrah of the clergy."

On the other hand, it would be wrong to expect them to be perfect. They are human.

They are themselves victims of a false system. They are Christians because they are descendants of men who became Christians because of a royal edict. Prince Vladimir gave an order and the whole of Russia was baptized. Emperor Theodosius of Byzantium commanded: "All people over whom our rule extends shall live in that religion which was revealed to St. Peter. We give orders that all these should adopt the name 'Catholic Christian.' The rest we shall let pass for fools, and they will have to bear the reproach of being called heretics. They must ~come first under the wrath of God and then ours~." (Codex Theodosianus XVI) Many bishops, priests, and pastors have never had a personal encounter with Jesus.

How has Latin America become Christian? Indians who knew only their primitive language were gathered and "the Requeriniento" devised by the navigator Fernandez de Enciso in 1513 was read to them solemnly in Spanish or Latin. This set forth a history of the world since its creation, followed by an account of the institution of the papacy, and concluding with the grant of the territory by Pope Alexander VI to the kings of Spain. The Indians were then required to recognize the church, as sovereign and mistress of the whole world, the high priest called the Pope, and the King; and to allow themselves to be taught the Christian religion in Latin. If the Indians did not submit, their masters had the right to reduce them to slavery as idolaters, to take away their property, and to treat them as badly as possible - it would all be their own fault. This frightful theology was enforced with ships and weapons.

Today's Latin Americans know how they have been Christianized. Therefore the church is passing through a terrible crisis.

In Brazil recently forty percent of the decreasing number of priests were foreigners. On the whole continent there's a steady rise in the number of priests abandoning their mission. In four years the number of newly-ordained priests declined by a half. The number of nuns also dropped. Only twenty percent of Catholics practice their faith. The number of Catholic baptisms has not changed though the yearly population increase is seven percent. The number of confirmations dropped in four years from 1,500,000 to 500,000. (New York Times, Feb. 2, 1973)

This situation is typical for many Christian countries. The times when St. Patrick brought Christianity to Ireland, St. Boniface to Germany, and St. Willebrord to Holland, from which it went to Sweden, the days of the Pilgrims who had come with the Mayflower, or of the Cambridge seven who scattered to different lands to bring Christ to the world, are no more.

Neither do we have any more an institution bearing the name of church which is the pillar of truth. It has been replaced by "my-views" churches which I can change when I dislike them. We no longer think, "Thus the church teaches, and I have to submit, even if it is difficult for me to understand." We do not accept the Scriptures any more, as did St. Augustine, simply because the authority of the church enjoins us to do so.

Montmartre (in French "mount of martyrs," so called because there saints suffered a martyr's death) is now a favourite place of Parisian debauchery.

In the apocryphal "Acts of John" we read that the apostles encircled Jesus and danced, singing Psalms. This is what we expected. He called religion a marriage feast. Now it is cold in the churches. And when persecution comes, many leave. Millions of laymen, but also many priests, left the church when the Communists seized power in different countries. Under the Nazis, the majority of Christians and their pastors cried, "Heil Hitler."

I was counselled by all pastors from whom I sought advice to leave my flock when the wolf came. (It is unfortunate that I sought advice only from the wrong ones. Among the others were many bishops and pastors who died for Christ.) This taught me that radical changes have to take place among the clergy.

I would say that the one necessary change is to have pastors who are more stupid. The Hebrew word for "righteous" is "tamim,"a superlative of "foolish." In my eyes, the clergy are much too wise. They know far too many things.

The story is told that St. John Chrysostom, lacking a priest for a village church, ordained an uncultured peasant who had received very superficial instruction.

Returning to his bishopric in Byzantium, John feared that he might have committed a big mistake.

He arranged, therefore, to visit that church on a Sunday morning. Entering it unobserved, he hid behind a column, wishing to see if this new priest were worth his salt.

But he was overtaken by emotion. The prayers were said from the very depths of the heart. The song was like that of the angels. The reading of Scripture was reverent. The sermon was simple but inspiring. It was the service of a priest on fire.

When it was finished, the bishop went to the altar, knelt before the priest, and asked his blessing. The poor priest was afraid and said, "You must bless me, not I you." The bishop insisted, "I have never seen a priest serve God as whole-heartedly as you do," to which the stupid and uncultured priest replied, "But, your Eminence, does anybody serve God otherwise?"

We need such ignorant priests.

Most of what is taught in seminaries as theology, the hours lost on Greek and Hebrew, which most pastors forget once they have passed the exams, are more than useless if the primary aim of pastors is other than the conversion of souls.

Some do not ever learn to read the scriptures well in church. I know a pastor who read from the pulpit GEN 12:1 - "The Lord said unto Abram, Get thee out of thy country," - with such conviction that several in the audience decided to leave the church - this before hearing the end of the sentence let alone the rest of the sermon. Why don't all pastors read the Scriptures like this from the pulpits?

Of all doctors of divinity, I prefer Dwight L. Moody, the salesman who spoke such ungrammatical English that the undergraduates in Cambridge set fire to a pile of chairs to protest his speech. Afterwards many were converted. Some of them became great men of God.

When Rembrandt was in his first phase as an artist, he was a master in every detail. Once his reputation was established, he became neglectful. Some pastors are like that.

A good pastor is so rare that many have to say with Savonarola, "You, Jesus, are my superior, pastor, bishop, and pope."

In his "To Christian nobility of the German nation" Luther writes: "If a number of devout Christian laymen would be arrested and banish to a desert, not having with them a priest consecrated by a bishop, and they would agree to choose one of them – if he be an honest man or not – and would entrust him with the office to baptize, to say mass, to absolve and preach, he would be as truly a priest as if all popes and bishops had ordained him. Through Cannon Law, they have deprived us and made unknown to us this great grace and power of baptism and of the state of a Christian... Whoever has been baptized can boast that he is already consecrated priest, bishop, and pope, though not everyone is called to this office."

When I have quoted this to individuals, they have reproached me saying that I contradict myself. I state that there is nothing wrong with the church that she simply is the light of the world and does not have to strive to be something better. I also state that some things are wrong with the priests and pastors.

I am 76 years old. I have had the rare privilege of doing nothing but think during years of solitary confinement. I could never find out what is wrong with contradicting oneself. All the prophets have said contradictory things. I will put some in two columns:

HOS 14;6 [Israel's] branches shall spread, and his beauty shall be as the olive tree.	HOS 9:16 Ephraim ... shall bear no fruit: yea, though they bring forth, yet will I slay even the beloved fruit of their womb.

AMO 5:2
The virgin of Israel is fallen; she shall be no more rise.

AMO 9:11
I will raise up the tabernacle of David that is fallen, and close up the breaches thereof; and I will raise up his ruins.

HAB 1:2
O Lord, how long shall I cry, and thou wilt not hear! even cry out unto thee of violence, and thou wilt not save!

HAB 3:13
Thou wentest forth for the salvation of thy people.

Beware of every man who does not contradict himself. A rectilinear position is always cant.

But where is the contradiction in this case? The church is substantially Christ prolonged in history. But is there any substance which throws no shadow? Jesus threw a shadow when he walked on earth, a shadow without colour, without beauty, sometimes grotesquely small or huge, according to the position of the sun. There exists even a shadow cast by the Almighty (PSA 91:1). This makes atheists of many. I believe that every man or institution which does not have a dark side is not whole. The wrongs of the church belong to its shadow, not to its essence which is without stain.

As for what happens in the shadow, you mention it casually and are not worried about it.

What is the right thing to do in view of these evils in the church? Should one step out of the large denominations involved in ecumenism?

I like the grave wisdom contained in some jokes. A man went to the doctor every month, whether he was healthy or sick. He explained, "The doctor has to make a living." Then he would order from the pharmacy the drug prescribed. "The pharmacist has to live." He never took the medicine, because he also wished to live.

The churches have to exist. So they will get my attendance. "To whosoever asks you, give," says the Lord. So I will pay my church contributions. I will listen to the sermons. The priests and pastors have to have an audience. I will take care about following what they say, because I have to live eternally. Therefore, I will check everything with the Scriptures. I will remember that not all men who have the title "right reverend" are right. Not all eminences are eminent.

I need teachers. They are not hard to find. St. Polycarp is a good one. When at a late age he was asked by the Roman pro-consul to worship the emperor and blaspheme Christ, he said, "Eighty-six years I have served Christ and He has never done me harm. How then shall I blaspheme my King Who has redeemed me? I am a Christian. If you would learn the basis of my faith, set a day on which I may instruct you." As he was led away to be burned at the stake, he prayed, "Lord God, Almighty Father of thy beloved Son Jesus Christ, through Whom we have received grace to confess Thee, God of the angels and of all powers, all creatures and all believers who live as before Thy presence, I praise Thee for having counted me worthy to share in the cup of Thy Son Jesus Christ. Take me up before Thy presence as a pleasing sacrifice which Thou hast prepared for Thyself."

I can choose as teachers St. Timothy and Maura.

Timothy, so the story goes was young, son of the priest Peekolpos. His wife was seventeen when he married her. Twenty years later they were brought before Arian, governor of the bloody Emperor Diocletian.

Timothy told him courageously, "I am a Christian."

"Don't you see these instruments of torture which we will use against you if you don't sacrifice to the gods?"

"How about you? Don't you see the angels of God surrounding and strengthening me?" Timothy answered.

They blinded him, so he saw the beautiful, eternal kingdom of God and praised Him. They hanged him head down, with a heavy stone attached to his body. His father, the priest, was in the crowd and prayed for him.

The governor asked for Maura to make her husband yield, promising her much gold for doing this.

She said to her husband, "Beloved Timothy, why do you bring upon me such sorrow? I cannot see you suffering. I cannot look upon your ordeal. I weep. My heart aches. You leave me a young widow."

Timothy replied, "O Maura, make with me this beautiful adventure. Let us die together for our Lord, and He will give us crowns in His Kingdom."

Maura answered, "When I came to you, I still loved this transitory life. But now I love what you love. I desire what you desire."

"If so, go and tell it to the governor."

Supported by the prayers of her husband, she went to the governor and said, "You dishonest ruler! - You promised me gold if I convinced my husband to sacrifice to the gods. You wished to destroy my soul. Now I don't fear your sentence. I hope that my heavenly Bridegroom will help me bear the torture."

They tore out her hair, they cut her fingers. The saint said, "Let my hands, which I used to ornament with useless rings, suffer." She did not feel the pain. Then she was thrown into a kettle of boiling water. Before this she said, "I thank the Lord that He washes me from my sins, that I may come to Him with a clean heart." From the kettle she told the governor, "How cold is the water in which you throw me! I don't feel any heat." The ruler, angry because they put her into cold water contrary to his command, ordered that some of this water be shed on his hand. When a little bit of that water was sprinkled upon him, he jumped because of the pain.

For a moment Arian was impressed and exclaimed, "Blessed be the Lord God of Maura, and there is no God beside Him." He wished to release her, but the devil got the upper hand and the order came to throw her in boiling tar. St. Maura answered, "Fire is for me like the morning dew descending from heaven to earth."

So the ruler changed his mind and ordered both to be crucified. While they were on their way to death, the mother of Maura encountered her and said, "My daughter, I have sought you everywhere. Don't leave me alone. Who will wear all your jewels, your beautiful garments? To whom will I give your gold?" Maura replied, "My gold will pass away, my garments will be eaten by moths, my young face will be full of wrinkles, but the crown which I receive from my Lord is eternal and unfading. I wish to die on the cross as did my Lord."

Timothy and Maura, it is said were crucified one opposite the other. They hung on the cross nine days and encouraged each other. St. Timothy taught her during the day. During the night, she would speak words of comfort. One night the enemy showed himself to St. Maura in the shape of an angel of light and led her in the spirit to a river flowing with milk and honey, enjoining her to drink. The saint recognized that it was the enemy and answered, "I will not drink water, milk, or honey, or any earthly beverage until I finish the cup of my suffering, the cup of death for my Lord Jesus Christ." When she had said these words the enemy and the river disappeared, and she had a heavenly vision.

She saw before her an angel indeed with shining face. He showed her a throne on which lay a garment white as snow and a crown. He told her, "This is your reward." Then he showed her another throne situated higher in heaven. "This is prepared for your husband." She asked, "Why are the thrones not together?" He answered, "There is a big difference between you and your husband. He convinced you to suffer for Christ. Thanks to him you received the martyr's crown. In the morning other angels will come and bring you here."

The last words of St. Maura were addressed to the crowd, "My brethren and sisters, the Lord gives us, His servants, eternal crowns. Serve the Lord and He will crown you, too." And so they both passed away.

Such teachers of Christianity live outside of time.

The church is never without good teachers. We can learn from Polycarp, Timothy, Maura, and thousands of others like them.

We can learn from the martyrs of our own century.

Ivan Moiseev, a Soviet soldier, was a Christian who brought his comrades to conversion. The Communists forced him to stand for two weeks on the ice, clothed only in a summer uniform, in order to make him deny his faith. He refused. They put him in an inflatable rubber suit, then inflated it so much that he could scarcely breathe. His faith resisted. Under torture he wrote to his mother, "They will kill me. I might not see you again on earth. But I am unafraid. I have seen angels and they have shown me the heavenly city." Angels are transparent. When you have an angel before you and somebody else stands behind him, the presence of the angel does not keep you from seeing the other man. On the contrary, looking at him through the angel, you see him beautiful, radiant. Afterward, they stabbed him six times in the region of his heart and then drowned him.

Here you have another good teacher in Christianity. From him we can learn to look at our fellowmen through the angel.

And if you will look well you might find some good teachers among the pastors around you. It might not be the one you have in your parish. But if it is true that not all those called "Eminence" are eminent, it is also true that not all "Eminences" are by definition not eminent.

In any case, I being a pastor myself must be modest in criticizing other pastors.

Fourth Dream

~I dreamt once that the French magazine Literary Life (which means a magazine dedicated to fiction) had praised me. The subconscious told me thus that praises heaped upon me are based on a myth. In the dream, I kept a poor actor from playing his part. The subconscious criticized me because I, who also am acting, hindered less gifted pastors who have no greater guilt than mine. The dream ended with the fact that I lost the magazines praising me. I sought for them, but they remained lost.~

Beware of "know-better pastors" who criticize their colleagues. You might find a good pastor among the humble ones.

But beware also of being a pastor or having as pastor a man who never gets indignant about sin nor fervent about God, who is neither very good nor very bad.

And don't accept as pastor somebody who does not share the sufferings of persecuted brethren.

Fifth Dream

~I dreamt one night that I reproached Billy Graham with tears for not sharing the sorrows of Communist prisoners. I told him, "You do not love them." He then asked a guard to bind him and put him into a straight cell where he could scarcely stretch his body. There he fell asleep. When I visited him, I observed that his chains gave him freedom enough to stretch himself. I told him, "How privileged you are. The brethren are tied with their hands behind their back and cannot stretch themselves."~

I awoke. It had been a vain dream. Evangelists of renown usually don't submit themselves to being in bonds, though HEB 13:3 would oblige them to do so: "Remember those that are in bonds as bound with them."

True teachers are not only those who die for Christ, but all those who love Him so much that they would be ready to die for Him if occasion demanded. Look well around you. You might be able to find a true teacher and true brethren for fellowship. If not, then you must become the nucleus of such a fellowship.

This is how I have solved the problem for myself.

You tell me in your letters that my answers are not specific enough and don't give a clear indication about what you should do. Why should I give you clear indications? Why do you seek your head on me? It is right on your own shoulders.

LOVE PARDONS THE ENEMY

Sixth Dream

~I attended a patriotic meeting in the United States and complained to a person near me that military matters are not kept secret. He told me that he works in a top secret military institution, which he invited me to visit. I refused, expressing my wonder that such institutions can be visited by foreigners. The patriot to whom I spoke at the meeting answered, "We are an open society. We are not used to secrecy."

I left the meeting with a Jewish doctor. He reproached me for being a Lutheran. He said, "Luther forced Jews into slave labour." I replied, "He was an anti-Semite, but he did not personally commit acts of violence against the Jews. He was a product of the spirit of his time. Every man is blinded through his main concern. Luther, always busy to disclosing what was wrong with the Papacy, simply could not see that anti-Semitism is also wrong."~

I awoke from this dream afraid. I asked myself if I am not in this position. I write and speak constantly about the evils of Communism. But there are so many other evils. God, keep me from being blind regarding them.

p078 Answer to Half a Million Letters

Seventh Dream

~I dreamt I saw Lucretiu Patrashcanu, the Communist leader who brought the Reds to power in Romania and who was afterwards shot by his comrades. But he was before me alive and honored. I asked him if he had had some religious experience in prison. He replied, "I put to myself the religious problem, but I did not reach any conclusion." Then I read a memorandum written by him while in prison in which he asked for my release for the good of the cause of Christ.~

A Communist asked that a Christian be released for the good of the cause of Christ!!

I love my enemies. Do I love the whole of my enemy? Do I love also what makes him my enemy, which is an essential part of his personality? If I don't love this part, I don't love him, the whole man. For humanitarian reasons, I have protested publicly against the anti-Communist terror in Indonesia and Chile. Would I ever have asked for the release of an imprisoned Communist for the good of the Marxist cause? The dream left me thinking. Would Christ have died for sinners so that they, knowing their present, past, and future sins would be forgiven, might sin without being disturbed by remorse?

St. Peter preached to the Jews, "Ye killed the Prince of life." (ACT 3:15) He finishes the same speech with the words, "Unto you first God, having raised up his Son Jesus, sent him to bless you..."

God blesses first those who killed his son - a preference for the worst of enemies. This shows us that we should treat our enemies as if they were our best friends.

I cannot forget Bishop Hirta, a Greek-Catholic with whom I was in prison. He had been very pleased that I had taken the defense of the Virgin Mary against a Protestant pastor who had belittled her. He told me, "As a reward, I wish to serve you with a powerful anti-Catholic argument. I wonder why Protestants never use it. Jesus taught that if a person has sinned, he should say, 'Our Father who art in heaven,...forgive us our trespasses.' He did not say 'Go and obtain absolution from the priest."

He had loved my whole person, including its anti-Catholicism.

The principle is that love for one's enemy must be total. This means that the satisfaction and security of any other person, including that of my enemy, must become as significant to me as my own satisfaction and security. It is only then that the state of love exists.

One of the oldest sermon illustrations, in the catacombs of Rome, is the following:

A rich man with hundreds of slaves had one by the name of Paulus, whom he trusted fully, making him steward over his whole household. One day he went with Paulus to the slave market to buy some new men. Before bargaining, they examined the human merchandise, observing their musculature to see if they were worth their price. At once, Paulus saw exposed for sale a weak, old man. He implored his owner to buy this slave. The rich man, Proculus, answered mockingly, "But he is good for nothing."

"Buy him. He is cheap. And I promise that the work in your household will go as never before."

So the owner yielded. And it really was true that all the work went better than ever. But Proculus observed that Paulus now worked for three men. The old slave did nothing. Paulus tended him, gave him the best food, and made him rest the whole time.

Proculus asked Paulus, "You know I value you. I don't mind your protecting this old man. Tell me only who he is. Is it perhaps your father who has fallen into slavery?"

Paulus answered, "It is one to whom I owe more than to my father."

"Is it your teacher?"

"No. Somebody to whom I owe more."

"Who is it, then?"

"This is my enemy. He is the man who killed my father and sold us, the children, as slaves. As for me, I am a disciple of Christ, Who has taught us to love our enemies and to reward evil with good."

This is what a Christian feels in his heart. Nobody is accepted unless the very worst in him is accepted.

I had in my congregation in Bucharest a blind Jewess married to a blind man. They had never seen each other. After a time he chose another woman as the object of his love. She suffered much because of this and decided to commit suicide. She gathered together a great quantity of sleeping pills and diluted them in water. But when she brought the glass to her lips, she, the blind Jewess, saw Jesus in a vision.

"What you do is sin," He told her. "I will show you a better way. Love the mistress of your husband. Love her as she is, as the woman who destroys your happiness.

p081 Answer to Half a Million Letters

Bring her into your home. Let them embrace each other in your home, and you serve them with meals and with tea. Wash for them. Be their servant."

She, the Jewess, obeyed this strange injunction as few Christians would have done. She loved like the Communist leader in my dream. She loved the adulteress in such a manner as to make her feel freer in her relationship to the man. This love conquered. The husband abandoned the other woman and was again hers. The other woman remained her friend.

LOVE TOWARD RUSSIA

Eighth Dream

~On April 1, 1973, I had a dream in Fort Wayne, Indiana. In this dream I prayed, "God, if you don't save Russia, you are not my God."~

I had never before known that I was so bound to Russia. I knew I had a preferential love for Romania, my country of origin, the United States, my actual home, and Israel.

The dream made me realize what a big role Russia played in my life.

I love it because it is the country which in this century has given the greatest number of martyrs, just as Rome was the most honoured place for Christians of the first centuries. When love fears to bleed, it ceases to bless. Russia has given and still gives rivers of blood. There is an appearance of atheism in the population but only because the atheists rule with an iron fist. When the armies of the Axis invaded Russia and reopened the churches, 100 percent of the population attended religious services. The people streamed to baptism, confession, religious marriage, and religious instruction.

In a Siberian camp, the Commander Naploef calls imprisoned nuns "bitches" and tears down the ikons which they put on the walls of their cells. Their fellow prisoners had given them names like "the angels of heaven, the holy Ukrainian virgins." They had baptized a hundred adults in the camp. On a winter's day, when the thermometer registered 50ø below zero Celsius, the commander presented them with a declaration to sign: "We, the following nuns, renounce our orders, our religious propaganda, and our activity among other prisoners," and they were told that if they refused, they would be put in frozen isolation cells for a week, receiving for food only one slice of bread and a cup of hot water. "If this does not suffice, you'll be exposed for three hours to the Siberian frost, dressed only in your shirts, all the inhabitants of the camp being present. We will see who is more powerful: God or winter."

The nuns resisted the ordeal of the isolation cells. They were made to stand barefoot and naked on the ice with 2000 criminals looking at them.

"Sign, or you'll become an ice block in a couple of minutes."

The nuns knelt in the snow and said the rosary with loud voices.

"If you don't sign in five minutes, we'll unleash the dogs against you. They'll tear you in pieces."

Then the nuns loudly recited the creed. The dogs were unleashed and ran as directed. At two yards from them, they stopped and sat down quietly like sheep in the snow. There was no more barking. The criminals began to shout, "Miracle! Glory to the heroic sisters! Shame to the henchmen!" Naploef ordered the criminals and the sisters back into their respective barracks.

It is because of such nuns that I love Russia.

The Mennonite Pastor Klaassen has been in prison for six years. He has seen many miracles in his time.

p085 Answer to Half a Million Letters

Criminals incited by the Communists prepared a big kettle of boiling water in which to throw him. They ordered him to undress while they put more wood on the fire. Klaassen undressed himself, but the kettle exploded and killed the murderers.

On another day a warden entered his cell with a big dog trained to jump at prisoners and bite them. The guard removed the muzzle, but, surprisingly, the dog jumped at the guard, not at the prisoner. The keeper succeeded in shooting the dog and for some mysterious reason – perhaps remorse at seeing this miracle of God – shot himself, too.

After passing through all these years of starvation, torture, and such traumatic experiences, Klaassen can still write: "First I counted the years, now I count the days until my liberation. And then...we can prepare ourselves for new tempests, because these have not ceased. Yesterday we received the news that three other brethren have been sentenced to four and five years. I remembered the story when Paul took leave of the brethren in Ephesus, telling them that he knew about persecutions and bonds awaiting him in Jerusalem. But he was ready not only to bear chains, but even to go to death for Christ's sake. Thinking about this, I began to sing. The way is red because of the blood of martyrs, and should I walk on roses? Others passed through the sea; should I stand on the shore? He who wishes to triumph must fight. My Saviour, give me the strength to fight, to suffer in silence as a true soldier. My cell is for me a garden of roses full of fragrance. Here I meet my Saviour and hear His voice."

It is for men like Klaassen that I love Russia.

p086 Answer to Half a Million Letters

Sasha is only six years of age. He wires his first poem:

I have a father,
He prays for me;
Christ will not forget
Though Papa is in prison.

Children who live far away from Sunday Schools and go by train to other villages are attacked by gangs of Communist hooligans and badly beaten up when they return. Next Sunday they go again to Sunday School.

It is for children like these that I love Russia.

Some parents walk hundreds of miles to find a priest who will baptize their child. These parents know that if they bring up their children in the Christian faith, these same children might become martyrs. They don't educate them to become lawyers, engineers, or doctors, but rather chained prisoners.

It is for them that I love Russia.

I love Russia for its youth who, though ignorant in matters of religion, inscribe their prayers and their seeking after God on funeral stones, hoping that the dead will intercede for them.

A Russian mother was dying when her son was arrested. Relatives wished to hide the news from her. But she guessed the sense of his absence and thanked God for his faithfulness. Dr. Olga Skrebetz quit the Communist Party because of religious convictions and in protest against the rape of Czechoslovakia. As a result, she was interned in a psychiatric asylum.

Because of women like this I love Russia.

p087 Answer to Half a Million Letters

I love Russia for men like Wiebe. His last letter from the prison in which he died says:

I love Russia, the country in which Christians kiss the locked doors and walls of closed churches because Christ once dwelt in them.

I believe Russia to be the most spiritual country of the Christian world, and even while attending services in a Western church, I share in spirit the religious service held by a pastor in some mine in a Russian concentration camp. The lamps of the miners are the candles. They sing with soft voices. The electricity does not function. Short circuits happen at just the right time. This liturgy is much more solemn than the mass at St. Peter's.

I love Russia because the Christians tortured in it are patriots.

~Vestnik Spasenia~, the secret magazine of the Soviet Baptists (February 1968) published a poem composed in a slave labour camp:

My love and my song are Russia.
For your happiness, I am ready to give my whole life, my young forces.
Saying with joy while dying,
My love and my song are Russia.

I feel much nearer to the author of these primitive verses than to the renowned Mme. Guylon, who wrote in prison:

To me remains no place or time,
My country is in every clime.
I can be calm and free from care.
On any shore since you are there.

RIGHT RELATIONSHIP WITH GOD

But is it right to speak to God shameless!y like this, "If you don't save Russia, you are not my God"? I would never have said such words consciously. The subconscious mind has its own conceptions.

The conscious mind understands and speculates too much. Luther warned against this: "Living, nay, dying and being damned you become a theologian, not understanding, reading and speculating."

The song "How Great Thou Art" addressed to God is very popular. But nobody gave the answer to it telling us how great God is. I would like rather to compose a hymn on the subject "How Unknown Thou Art."

Sanomdes, when asked who is God, pleaded a day's time for meditation, then one more, then one more. "The more I think about God, the more unclear my notions become," he said. God is a mystery.

When I first saw Heisenberg's formula of the world, I shuddered:

[Hebrew characters in the book cannot be printed]

(quoted from "Biblische Verkuendigung in der Zeitwende," Don Basco Verlag, Munich.)

Multitudes of particles in combination with each other but their sum is 0. The particles are no more than observational positions. They are intellectual fiction. If this is all we can say about the world, what could we say about the Godhead?

p090 Answer to Half a Million Letters

We call him Father, Lord, King. But these are kindergarten pictures. Kings and fathers are mortal. We have to take away these names to behold the splendor of God. Justin Martyr writes in his ~Second Apology~, "To the Father of all that is unbegotten, there is no name given, for by whatever name He be called, He has as His elder the person who gives Him the name. These words, 'Father,' 'God,' 'Creator,' 'Lord,' and 'Master,' are not names, but appellations derived from His good deeds and functions." God is not a name.

Origen writes, "If I can confess the precise truth, God is unintelligible and cannot be known." St. Cyprian writes, "God cannot be seen - His light blinds the eye;

He cannot be understood - He being too pure for our reason: neither can we measure Him - He surpassing our possibility of comprehension. Therefore we say something right about Him only when we confess that we don't understand Him." Gregor of Nazianz taught, " Let us worship the truth of the Divine being only through silence. It is inexpressible, above every thought..."

The Indian name for God, ~Brahman~, comes from a Sanskrit word which means prayer. God is a longing, more than a knowledge. Meister Eckhardt says, "Whoever wishes to see God must be blind." The Indians call him ~Neti, neti~ - "no, no." The Kabbala calls Him ~Ein~, the nonexistent, because He is nothing of what we attribute to Him. The God whom we imagine is unexisting. ~Tantiryakka-Upanishad~ calls Him "the one from which words and thoughts return without finding him."

We laugh about what Luther wrote 400 years ago,

p091 Answer to Half a Million Letters

"One of the masterpieces of God is that nine-tenths of men die as children and have no occasion for dangerous temptations." After 400 years others will laugh about the thoughts we connect with God.

I believe that Simone Weil came closest to expressing it when she said that God cannot be present in His creation other than through His absence. Tauler did not wish to think about God: he wished to think in a divine manner. It is not true that the one who knows God knows something more than other men. He knows things differently. No conversation of his is prosaic any more. When he speaks about cabbage or hay, these objects have a new significance for him. He has a godly manner of giving a cup of water and of working in a factory.

There exists this hidden God about Whom the mystics knew. The only thing you can say is that He is. With Him we communicate through silence. It is important to meditate - more important than to brush our teeth. But about Him we meditate only in the intervals between our meditations.

Never seek to obtain anything from Him. The pupil of the eye receives light only because of itself it is dark.

Dance for joy as often as He takes something away from you. It was surely a barrier between you and Him. You prove your love toward the Godhead by defending Him against yourself, against your insistent demands and pettiness.

You reach this God only by denying all false gods. You search for the little which can be obtained by searching and adore the Unsearchable. You reach Him by denying yourself, which means to realize that there exists no "I," but only God. Reality transcends dualistic intellectual analysis, the differentiation between an I and a Him.

To Him the words of Sophocles' Oedipus apply; "No man in the world can make gods do more than gods will."

I cannot say to the Godhead, "Save Russia or you are not my God." He is my God, if I wish Him or not. He is God whether or not He saves Russia. Many countries have no testimony of the Gospel; many generations have passed away without knowing Christ. He owes us no answer. He is good, of a goodness apart. If a human father behaved like Him toward his children, leaving them without essential knowledge, we would not have called him good. God belongs in a category apart.

But Luther teaches, "We must leave God unsearched as He is in His majesty and essence. With Him we have nothing to do. Neither does He wish us to have ought to do with Him. The hidden God in His majesty does not mourn and does not take away death. He causes life and death and all in all. Here God has not limited himself in His word, but has kept Himself in liberty over all."

He recommends that we distinguish between the hidden God and God as revealed, i.e., between the Word of God and God himself. "We have to go after His Word, not after His inscrutable will... We should not strive to discover the high mysteries of the Majesty Who dwells in an impenetrable light."

The hidden God and the revealed God? But is God not one? It is very important to uphold the oneness of God, the oneness of the source of truth. Whoever believes in many gods will get different inspirations and have a confused mind.

But when I say that God is one, it means that He has the qualities of the figure one, within which is also divisibility. If God is conscious He is already multiple; His oneness is no more simple. There exist His reality and His self-reflection, the subject and the object of this knowledge. The Father is the known, the Son the knower. He says, "Nobody knows the Father except Me." If God loves Himself, there exist again the loved, the lover, and the love which unites them, the Holy Trinity.

The one mysterious Godhead has revealed itself through the Son who works within us through the Holy Spirit.

God has revealed Himself. We can find Him. If we open in our hearts a door for Him as big as the point of a needle, He will enter with cartloads of blessings. He makes us strong personalities on our own. He gives us back our "I," which we had denied. He returns it to us as a reality. Therefore, the creed starts with the words "I believe." I believe this, whatever others may believe. St. Athanasius quarrelled with a council of bishops and the whole world about one "i" in the creed. He allowed himself to be excommunicated under slanderous accusations. He knew the sense of the words "I believe." Nobody can dictate to me what to believe.

This "I" can come daringly to God, though knowing that He is almighty. It is He who has made the amoebas. They can be seen only under mighty microscopes. Everyone is constituted of 100 quadrillions of atoms, of which the principal ones are carbon, hydrogen, oxygen, and nitrogen. This number of atoms could not have met together accidentally in a correct ratio. Each amoeba contains millions of genes with genetic information. If written out, it would fill a thousand volumes.

I can believe about such a God that He can make everything happen. To this God I can cry, "Father," until He becomes a Father to me.

One day some thirty years ago, a girl of thirteen, pale poorly dressed, thin, entered my office and told me, "I have heard about you that you are good. I have no father. My mother is a drunkard who beats me. I am hospitalized for spinal tuberculosis. I have nobody. You will be my father henceforth." I called my wife and introduced her to her daughter. And that was it. In the same manner I came to God and declared Him to be my Father.

This Father of mine can blow adversaries away like a heap of dust. He can also give me the strength to do it. Hugo writes in ~Les Miserables~ that Napoleon was defeated not because of Wellington, but because he embarrassed God.

God said to Abraham, "After a year I will return, and Sarah will have a son." He seemingly did not return, but Sarah gave birth to a son, Isaac. Later on in the Bible God is called "the God of Isaac." This is in our English Bibles, not in the original. The Hebrew and the Greek have "God Abraham, God Isaac, God Jacob." God had returned in the sense that He had identified himself with the new-born babe.

He identifies Himself with me and with all believers. He will save Russia through our fight, our prayers, our activity, and He will be my God.

Against whom do the Russian Communists fight if there is no God? A Russian farmer was asked if he believes in God. "How come?" they mocked him. "Have you ever seen him?"

"No," he replied, " but neither have I ever seen a Japanese. I only know that in the last war Russia fought the Japanese, so they must exist. And you, the Communists, have been fighting God for half a century. You are not mad. You surely don't fight someone who does not exist."

A country in which farmers can give such answers and which sheds so much blood for the cause of God will be saved.

As for ourselves, let us not allow science to shake our belief in God. Men in times past had the key to a lock whose structure they did not know. Now scientists minutely describe the lock but have not the key - which is faith in God. They are like men who would deny the existence of a painter because he is not on the canvas. The canvas could show nothing without the artist.

Believe in God. Communicate with Him. If only ten percent of mankind were to meditate on His Word and pray to Him, the greatest threat hanging over us all would cease to exist. Global peace would permanently ensue. God can be adored. But He is also the greatest Power we can use in our service.

You can use Him first as a power to start a new life.

A pastor rode in a train, in a packed compartment. A teenager disturbed all the passengers by continually leaving and re-entering the compartment. The pastor asked him, "Don't you see that there is no place for so much going to and fro? Why don't you stay in one place like everybody else?"

The teenager answered, "I am the prodigal son of the Bible. I have heaped shame on my family by going to jail for theft. Today I was released. From jail I had written to mother asking her to intervene with father to forgive me. I told her that if he does, she should tie a white handkerchief to the cherry tree in front of our house. Our train passes the house. If I see the handkerchief - I wrote - I will return and try to make restitution for my past evil. If not, no other way remains open for me than to rejoin the gang. Our train will soon approach the house, and I am nervous. I don't even have the courage to look through the window. What if there is no handkerchief on the tree?"

The pastor told the young man to stay in the corridor. He would look out on his behalf and tell him. After a few minutes, the pastor, who had gotten the necessary explanations about the house, cried to the youngster, "Sorry, my friend, there is no white handkerchief on the tree - but instead the tree is full of big white sheets! So much does your father wait for you."

Our heavenly Father loves us even more. As a token of His love, He sent His only Son, Jesus, to die for us on the cross. Through believing in Him we can have forgiveness of all our sins.

Use this goodness of God. Get all the forgiveness for all your trespasses. Squeeze from God the maximum of forgiveness. What is less then the maximum is not from Him.

As for persistence in our relationship with God, it sometimes works. Jesus encourages us to use it in the parable about the widow who by persistently troubling an evil judge got what she required. (LUK 18:1-8)

Now, when I think about this dream, I say that a God who would save Russia would be my God, whom I love. A God who does not save Russia would also be my God, a God whom I would have to accept, before whom I would bow as before an ineluctable fact and a mystery. And I still must love Him.

THE HEAVENLY MOTHER

Christians always speak about their heavenly Father. But is there not also a heavenly mother? Jung says that the belief in it constitutes one of the essential parts of the collective unconscious. The Hindus call her ~Kali~ and have an amazing devotion for her. I saw her adored in Asia under the name of Kun-Yin.

Catholics and Orthodox would call Mary their heavenly mother. Jesus had said to John from the cross, referring to her, "Behold, thy mother." Pope John XXIII, when visited by Adzubei, son-in-law of Khrushchev, and his wife, presented to the latter a rosary. He told her, "I don't expect you to use it for saying prayers. But it should remind you about a perfect mother." Mrs. Adzubei wept.

Protestants would do well to remember that the Scriptures speak not only about a heavenly Father. St. Paul writes in GAL 4:26, "Jerusalem which is above is free, which is the mother of us all."

The Mormons are not mad when they sing:
In the heavens are parents single?
No, the thought makes reason stare.
Truth is reason, truth eternal
Tells me I've a mother there.

The Bible compares God's sentiments toward Israel with motherly love: "Can a woman forget her sucking child...?" (ISA 49:15) The church in its sermons has also referred to this similitude.

There is a story, often told in churches, about a poor woman who brought her only daughter into town so that she might find a position as a maid. From what she could earn, they would be able to buy in time a field and some cattle. The girl was very beautiful and intelligent. She found out quickly that a person with her attributes could earn more money by not working than by working. So she passed from one set of arms to another and eventually gained luxury, cars, furs, rings. In the process, she forgot her mother.

After ten years, the moment of great awakening came. "How could I have been so hardhearted as to leave mother without even news about me?" She took a train and arrived at her village late at night. Approaching the gate of her mother's home, she found that it was open, a very unusual thing. She knew her mother was very careful about locking it up in the evening. Looking up, she saw a light burning in her mother's bedroom. Mother usually did not keep the light on when asleep. As she stepped over the threshold, her mother's voice called, "Jeane, is it you?"

"Yes, mother. But how is it that your gate is not locked?"

The mother's reply was gentle. "For ten years, ever since you left, the gate has always remained wide open."

"And why is your light burning?" the daughter questioned.

"Since you left, the light has never been turned off. The loving heart of a mother waited for you."

The simple fact that Christians call God the Father, and not the Author or Creator, identifies him with a sex. How can there be a father without a mother?

p101 Answer to Half a Million Letters

Some explanation to this problem is found in Jesus' words: "For whosoever shall do the will of my Father which is in heaven, the same is my brother, and sister, and mother." (MTT 12:50)

It is easy to understand that we are called brothers and sisters of Jesus. But how could I be Jesus' mother through doing the will of God? Mother's love is the highest form of love. The love of a child toward his parents has a mixture of self-interest. Father gives pocket money and mother candies. Wives love their husbands. They also have his protection and his caresses. Husbands love their wives. They also enjoy her attentions, her cooking, and her care. Only a mother's love is completely disinterested. Mother loves even after her child had gravely sinned against her.

We can have such love, the highest type of love, for Jesus. Mary was granted the privilege of such love. Jesus had lived in her womb, as He is meant to live in our hearts. She had taken care of all His needs, as we could do, too. Christians with such a love are called His mother by Jesus Himself. If you have found such a mother of Jesus, honour her. Be such a mother yourself.

JESUS

Ninth Dream

~When I was in the prison of Tirgul-Ocna, I dreamt a short poem in Romanian. In English translation it would be:

Speak about nobody but Him
And caress Him day and night.
May laughter and weeping be indifferent to you:
Endeavour only not to lose Him.~

I will tell very little in answer to questions about Jesus. But this book of mine is purposely written on a subliminal level. It appeals not to the conscious. It has the subconscious as its target. The more it has reached the subconscious, the less conscious you will be of the answer you receive. "The Lord said that he would dwell in the thick darkness." (1KI 8:12) In this darkness, which is so dark that you are not even aware when light penetrates it, your questions about Jesus will have been answered. The proof will be that you will stop asking questions.

A man came to a Zen-master and demanded, "Purify my heart." The master answered, "Give it to me. I'll do it." The man replied, "I cannot give it." "Then it is pure." A heart which cannot be handled by anyone, not even by its owner, could not have been polluted by anybody. Where there is no self there is nothing to be purified.

Unfortunately, life is not as easy as this. We have selves and they are defiled. We need a saviour. He is Jesus Christ. The Chinese ideogram for him is Tsi Tu, meaning "supreme foundation." [In the book, Chinese characters appear here.]

When St. Jerome, living in Bethlehem, first translated the Bible into Latin, Jesus appeared to him in a vision in the form of a child. Jerome felt such a love for Him that he said, "You give to my heart great sweetness. I would like to present You with a gift. What would make You happy?"

The child smiled. "What can you give Me? Heaven and earth belong to Me."

Jerome insisted, "I must make You a present. Should I give You all my money?"

The child, still smiling, replied, "If you have spare money, give it to the poor. I don't need silver and gold."

"I will not allow You to pass by without accepting at least some little thing from me. Tell me what You would like most to have from me."

Now the child became earnest and said, "If you really wish to gladden Me, give Me all your sins, passions, and lusts, and I will die for them on the cross. There is no more pleasant gift that anyone can give Me."

Jesus died for us on the cross.

We in the Christian world have become so accustomed to this sentence that it no longer touches us as it should. I once overheard a Russian praying before a crucifix. He had not seen many churches before. "Poor Jesus," he prayed, "how the arms must ache. And You cannot walk anymore. I feel the pain of Your hands, Your feet, Your head. How ashamed You must have felt hanging naked. What a grief to see Your mother weeping. And this all for my sins."

I have always wondered why the commandment that we should not make ourselves images is considered so important that it comes before "Don't kill" and "Don't steal." When I heard the Russian, I understood. Holy images are transparent and they show so much innocent suffering that life would be simply impossible for the true believer if he had them around. We know we are guilty of Christ's death. What murderer can bear to have constantly before his eyes the pictures of his victim?

Many thousands were crucified in Jesus' time. What makes His crucifixion so important is that He is God.

Through the Virgin Mary, God allowed His creation, the mineral, vegetable, and human spheres, to participate in the eternal birth of His Son. And what happened in eternity, what happened in the stable in Bethlehem, can happen in you. Bohme writes, "The Father brings forth His only-begotten Son in the soul as truly as He brings Him forth in eternity, neither less nor more."

And once He has been born in us, we recognize Him. He had never been entirely foreign. The beauties of this world had been Christ's gentle smile passing through matter.

When we have Him, we have the truth. The Jews have preserved a legend about Him. When He was a boy His teacher taught Him the ~Aleph~, the first letter of the Hebrew alphabet. When he wished to teach Him the second letter, the ~Beth~, the child refused. "I have not yet learned everything about the ~Aleph~. I cannot go on to the next step." He was a thorough learner. He grew in wisdom. And He was a thorough teacher.

He taught from simple things. "Look at the lilies," He said. And the disciples watched Him looking at lilies. He smiled silently, gazing at them. This was discovery enough. Some understood.

He taught men a simple prayer, the "Our Father." "Give us this day our daily bread." In Greek the word for daily is ~epiouson~. Jerome translated it, ~Panem nostrum crastinum~ ("our bread for tomorrow"), the bread for life which follows. We have to ask it from the Heavenly Father.

"Forgive us our trespasses." The Greek word ~afes~ is deep. It expresses exactly the contradictory currents in the soul while we pray. It means on the one hand "forgive, remit" and on the other hand "leave us our sins," "suffer them to be." Is not the complexity of both the real prayer? Who does not desire to remain with his sin while praying for its forgiveness?

And then the deeply human wish not to suffer. "Lead us not into ~peirasmos~," that is, temptation, test, persecution.

Jesus also performed miracles. They are confirmed by the Talmud, the holy book of the Pharisees, Jesus' worst enemies.

He went from place to place doing good, though always under stress because of His consciousness at being the Son of God while at the same time acknowledging the self-limitations of His human nature. Sometimes He felt embarrassed about His grandness. In His human nature, He did not know everything. He confessed this Himself. It was because God did not want Him to miss one of the great joys: surprise.

Then came the last Passover. All the Jews rejoiced, remembering the deliverance from Egyptian bondage. He could not rejoice like the others.

As the Midrash tells the story, when the Jews had passed miraculously through the Red Sea and the Egyptians had been drowned, angels joined the song of the liberated slaves. God chided them for this. He said, "It is understandable that Jews who had been under such terrible bondage should be jubilant now. But I expected better from you. The Egyptians are also My creatures, and My heart aches for their sufferings as much as for those of Israel." Jesus remembered the innocent Egyptian children killed on that night, as well as the children killed in Bethlehem at His birth. Innocent people have to die. He knew that He would be next.

He had already been betrayed by Judas. Judases are human characters encountered very frequently. After World War II, 100,000 Frenchmen were executed summarily, and another 100,000 after legal proceedings, for collaboration with the enemies. One tenth of the population was arrested under this accusation. The percentage was the same in Italy. In Holland it was even more. Four hundred thousand men were sentenced for treacherous acts. In Belgium 200,000 were sentenced. In the Korean War thirty percent of the United States prisoners under the Communists joined the side of the enemy. We too betray our wives, our employers, our friendships. There is a Judas within every one of us.

Jesus was brought before the High Court. He was asked, "Are you the son of the living God?" His life or death depended upon the answer He gave. He said, "Yes, I am." So He was crucified and mocked by men. On the cross, He also endured the pain of knowing Himself forsaken by God. But whoever knows Himself to be forsaken is not forsaken. Those who are forsaken more often imagine themselves to be God's favourites.

And He died on the cross - one of the most beautiful moments of human history. It is the tragic which gives us most movingly the feeling of beauty: Rigoletto, Aida, Romeo and Juliet, and above all, Golgotha.

Something great had happened on Golgotha. Jesus, the Son of God, was made perfect by His Father through suffering. (Golgotha was an inter-trinitarian event, a dealing between the Father and Son. The Son had loved a bride, as Radames had loved Aida. Radames betrayed his fatherland for her. This could not be said about Jesus. But He left His heavenly kingdom for the bride He loved. He had to suffer for this. He bought her with a price - His own blood. And ever since, He has passed through the permanent tragedy of having as a bride only souls whom He has bought, for whom He paid a price, which He has to cover again and again with gifts. His bride would not love Him without His gifts. This was foreshadowed when God said to the prophet Hosea, "Go... love...an adulteress... So I bought her to me for fifteen pieces of silver, and for an homer of barley, and an half homer of barley." (HOS 3:1,2)

We can, however, outgrow this low type of relationship with Jesus and have what the New Testament calls ~agape~ - unmotivated love, love for love's sake.

Jesus died. This did not make the world better. It had not been Jesus' intention to improve it. Rather, He came to save those who truly believe in Him. He warned that the chances of a man's salvation are slim: He said, "Strait is the gate, and narrow is the way, which leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it." (MTT 7:14) Jesus' death on the cross does not give us a smooth entrance into heaven. Even after putting your faith in it you are like a man who takes hold of a branch by his teeth while his body hangs suspended above a precipice. Don't ask a Christian many questions. He is in no position to reply, except as you take his holding the branch by the teeth as an answer. When the Christian has passed this stage and is safe in the arms of Jesus, he receives His ardent kiss. A mouth cannot speak when the lover's lips press it. So don't ask questions of real Christians; rather, imitate

The death of Jesus has an effect on all those who believe. We are by nature fallen creatures. Bohme writes, "In the essence of my soul and body, when I was not yet the I, but Adam's essence, I was indeed there. I have forfeited myself, my felicity in Adam. This fallen nature has committed sins and crimes. But washed in Jesus' blood, the most heinous things become blessed mistakes, which brought me to the Saviour."

When Luther translated the Bible and worked at the Reformation, Satan appeared to him in a visible manner and mocked him: "You scum of the earth, who have committed the gravest sins, you translate the Bible?"

p110 Answer to Half a Million Letters

Luther took a long sheet of paper and said to Satan, "Tell me my sins and I will write them down." Satan began to dictate until the sheet was filled. Then Luther wrote in red ink over the whole paper, "The blood of Jesus Christ cleanses me from all sins," and threw the inkwell at Satan's head.

This is what Jesus did for me, too. He freely forgave everything without asking anything in exchange. Grace which is not gratuitous is not grace. The gate is narrow and faith is bound with many difficulties simply because we cannot accustom our minds to the idea of free grace. We are used to purchasing things.

Jesus puts Himself over our sinful lives and makes us appear righteous in the eyes of God. And when this happens we do not simply become righteous from the moment we believe: He makes us appear to have been righteous always.

At the marriage feast in Cana He changed water into good wine. Good wine is old wine. He did not change water into a liquid which should be wine henceforth. He made it to have been wine always. At creation, He made trees and the first animals and Adam. But the trees must have had rings indicating a certain age. How old was Adam when he was created, and did he have in his chromosomes genes containing hereditary information? If not, the procreation of his children would have been miraculous and not natural. Therefore, as creator He did not make a universe which should be henceforth, but one with a "past."

We meet Jesus today and become men who have always been righteous. And He also changes our character

p111 Answer to Half a Million Letters to fulfill henceforth their true role.

Plato said in ~Timaeus~, "God placed the soul of the universe crosswise (as a ~chiasma~) in the universe." Jesus is the soul of the universe revealed to us. His cross has been erected at the crossroads of life. And He makes us resemble the love which He revealed on the cross. From the species "man" we pass into the species "children of God."

And now we embrace with love everybody and everything. Two disciples on their way to Emmaus after the resurrection of Jesus told Him about the things which had come to pass in those days in Jerusalem. He asked, "What things?" He was interested in all things, in some new ball or doll which a child may have acquired, in the meal prepared with love by a lady, in the earnings of some carpenter, in the difficulties in some marriage, in the oppression of an innocent person, in the health of a Roman oppressor. All things belong to Him and belong now to you, too. He was interested in knowing what had happened to the corpses of the two thieves crucified with Him. He wondered why Joseph of Arimathea had not asked Pilate to give them, too, a decent burial. Had any one of His disciples thought to comfort their mothers? But they, poor creatures, when He asked "What things?" show that their minds were preoccupied, as they should not have been, with only one thing: the fate of Jesus.

This Jesus we love because He is lovable, not because He can answer our questions. It is His privilege to remain silent. I do not agree with those who have not yet clearly formulated questions when they proclaim, "Jesus is the answer." He is not.

p112 Answer to Half a Million Letters

When Annas, the high priest, asked Him a very reasonable question, He, the One called in the Bible "Wonderful, Counsellor" (ISA 9:6), gave the reply,

"Why askest thou Me?" This is also my reply to your many questions.

Stop a bit to analyze your motives for questioning me. Annas' life was very bad, Jewish sources tell us. How is yours? Might it not be that you wish to stifle your conscience through discussions about other men and about doctrines, or through letters on such subjects? If such be the case, what answer of mine could help you? You have to help yourself.

Jesus said to Annas, "Why askest thou me? Ask them which heard me, what I have said unto them." (JHN 18:21) Tragically, His hearers had understood almost nothing; not even the disciples understood. And furthermore, just at that moment they were not available for answers. The mob was thus easily incited and quick to shout, "Crucify Him!" The disciples had fled. One denied him. The other had sold him.

Jesus does not give you the answer. Men, even Christians, do not have it. You have only one solution: stop asking questions, come to yourself, be born again, have Christ living in your own heart, and life will become luminous. The impulse to ask questions of other people and in your own mind will have disappeared.

When the disciples had drunk the wine of Cana they simply believed on Him. (JHN 2:11) It is this wine which gives inner and outer quietness. We wish to drink of it.

There was an atheist meeting in Russia. Attendance was compulsory. The lecturer, who had before him a white vase full of water, told the people, "In times of old, people were ignorant and easily believed in miracles. But look here, I have some powder in my hand. I put it in the water. Do you see how it has become ruby-red like wine? This is what Jesus did. He must have had a powder like this hidden in His sleeve. I can do even better than He. Here is another powder. I pour it into the wine. It has become water again. And now a third powder. I have changed it again into wine. So this is the explanation of the miracle in Cana."

A Christian stood up. "Comrade lecturer, you have amazed us with your skill and almost convinced us. We ask of you just one more little thing: Please drink a glass of this water you have changed into wine."

"Unfortunately, that would be impossible" the lecturer responded. "The powder which I have used is poisonous."

"Well," said the Christian, "this is the whole difference between you and Jesus. He gave us a wine which gladdens us and brings.us to full rest. Your wine troubles the mind and soul and makes millions weep."

The Greek New Testament uses in many places instead of the personal name Jesus the generic name "the Jesus," showing that it speaks not only about a historical being, but also about a type of man. We have to be men of Jesus type, men who follow Him implicitly.

I did not wish to tell you too much about Jesus. My subconscious mind whispered in a dream its view:

Speak about nobody but Him,
And caress Him day and night.

p114 Answer to Half a Million Letters

May laughter and weeping be indifferent to you.
Endeavor only not to lose Him.

I find this view attractive. Many contemplative souls whom I admire have gone this beautiful way. But my conscious mind tells me that Jesus is interested in all things happening in the universe. I should not speak only about Him. I should not be caressing only Him. Speaking about all things and caressing everyone I meet with at least a look, I may allow the light of Jesus to shine through my speech and behaviour, as He intends.

Tenth Dream

~I saw Pope Paul VI very sick on a hospital bed in prison. They had just shaved him. I wished to gladden him by telling a joke. But then I observed that he was wearing an oxygen mask. These were his last moments. So instead I spoke to him about heaven, about Jesus and Mary. He told me that he believed.

A second afterward, he was on his feet. There was no more oxygen mask. Suddenly he was on the balcony of the Vatican from which he gave the blessing "Urbi et orbi" and he told me, "There are verbal angels. As often as you tell somebody a word which honours him, even if you call him only by an honourable title, like Sir or Pastor, you send him a verbal angel." I turned to my wife who was also there and said to her, "Communists fear nobody. They let the Pope die in prison."~

The last part of the dream is certainly true. In Romania, my homeland, almost all Catholic bishops died in prison. The Communists hastened their death through hunger and torture. This would be the Pope's fate, too, if Italy were taken over by the Reds.

But the words about "verbal angels" gave me much food for thought. Christ was "the Word." Could not "words" be angels? Of what are angles made? Do my words create angels or devils? Or are they just worthless chatter?

p116 Answer to Half a Million Letters

A sense of urgency as if I had very little time left often pervades my dreams.

Eleventh Dream

~I dreamed I was in a prison dining room. Judges sitting with me at a table told about a Nazi serving as waiter who overheard these words about himself: "He has committed a crime. He has shot someone. He'll get fifteen to twenty years of prison." I took his defense. "He is not the sort of man who shoots people." The Nazi was thankful that I defended him. He went with me toward the station. There I saw my wife, but I observed also that I had left my jacket and hat in the dining room. It was eight minutes past three. The schedule showed that the only train would leave at nine minutes past the hour. The Nazi ran to bring the things I forgot, but the dining room was far away. Fortunately for me, the train did not leave on time.~

It is quite normal for me to take the defense of a Nazi. They don't represent any actual danger any more. To punish them today is only retaliation. I would not have taken the defense of a Communist who was in power.

One of the characteristics of the Gospel according to St. Mark is the frequency with which he uses the Greek word ~euthus~, which means straightway.

The supposition is that he had been the rich young ruler who asked Jesus what he should do in order to inherit eternal life and went away sadly when required to impart everything to the poor. Later in his life he regretted not having obeyed. Many years had been lost. The regret for this made him constantly repeat the word ~euthus~, straightway.

Every moment of hesitation in fulfilling your duty is sin. When Jesus called some fishermen to become apostles, they were so concerned about the fate of their fellowmen that they immediately left their occupation. They had no promise of financial support.

Work with a spirit of urgency. Death comes all too soon.

The Communists have been able to jail and kill many preachers. But nobody can forbid the greatest preacher to deliver his message, the message of death. What first brought me to think about things eternal was lonely walks through cemeteries. I said to myself, "Some day you will lie in a grave. Snow will fall over it. People will pass near your grave site, most of them not casting even a glance to decipher the name on the stone. What will all the affairs of the world mean to you then?"

A nurse was arrested in the Soviet Union. The interrogator reproached her; "You propagate these old ideas about God and eternal life at a time when we fly to the moon and build socialism."

The nurse replied, "I serve in a ward where people die of cancer. Around their death beds are their beloved ones. How should I comfort them? Should I say to them, don't let it bother you that your son or husband is dying, because man has walked on the moon and Socialism will reign after a couple of generations? Don't you see that you have no word of comfort? I have. I can speak to the mourning about a living God and a resurrection from the dead."

p118 Answer to Half a Million Letters

Use your seconds well. You will be responsible for every one of them.

Once while riding on a train in Romania, I found myself thinking about the shortness of life. Intrigued, I took out a notebook and pencil to calculate how many seconds I had lived and would have to account for before God. There were some sixty million. A poor peasant seated near me was wide-eyed. Finally he asked me, "What is your business that you have to make your accounts with so many figures? As for us, everything has been taken away. We work for a small salary. Do millions pass through your hands?" I explained to him my accounts. He begged me, "Please write down everything you told me. I wish to show your accounts to our pastor so that he might warn everybody to guard his time. You are the first man to speak to me about this."

We are all mortal, but after the age of fifty men become consciously mortal. The older they get, the more they realize the value of seconds.

One evening a man was walking along a river. It was dark. He hit his foot against a bag filled with stones. He picked it up and amused himself from time to time by throwing a stone into the water. When he arrived home, he had only two stones left. Then he saw that they had been precious stones. In similar fashion we all carelessly throw away the pearls called "seconds." Some realize only on their death beds how much they have lost.

I thought about this when I received a letter from a member of the Salvation Army. "I am after a sleepless night searching the Scriptures to find out if the devil is omnipresent like God. If he were so, there would be no need of demons. What do you think about JOB 1:7 where it is said that Satan goes to and fro in the earth? Does this not mean that there are places and instances when you don't have to worry because the devil is in some other place?"

I answered, "While you pondered about these things and sent me the letter, other Salvationists went around in pubs saving the lost. Your brethren made words 'verbal angels.' You make annoying speculations of your words. You could have spent your time better."

Christianity is not a business of knowing all the answers but of spreading the light we have. Could you not have used your time better than to ask me many questions in letters?

Strangely, three days after my dream about the Pope with the oxygen mask on his face, I had a heart attack. An ambulance drove me to a hospital and the first thing they gave me was oxygen. I put to myself the questions which I had asked of the Pope: whether I believed in God, in Jesus, and in the Virgin Mary. Like the Pope, I answered affirmatively. Then I waited for death. I was very calm.

Later a relative asked me how I could have been so calm. "Did you not realize the danger you were in?" I answered, "I was in no special danger. If God wishes to take me away he needs no heart attack for it. Every second is potentially the second of death. Let us therefore try to make our words 'verbal angels.'"

Twelfth Dream

~In front of the Lutheran Church of Bucharest was a table with books for sale. Someone expressed a doubt if my son Mihai's book should be sold because it spoke about goodness. This man was of the opinion that the wicked must be destroyed. I sat down with him, desiring to tell him examples of goodness which I had encountered, but I could not remember them. I intended to tell him that if the wicked were destroyed, I would be among them. Mihai said to me, "He has doubts. If you present arguments for goodness, they will have the counter-effect of strengthening him in his convictions."

We entered into the church. The pastor, with a bottle in his hand, recited a parody in a Saxon dialect I did not understand. I stood up and asked him to speak plain German. "How will I be saved if I don't understand?" He tried to question me. I insisted, "Tell me in German how to be saved." A multitude of women whom I met in the yard told me that they would never come to this church again. Mihai was in the courtyard, indifferent to what had happened.~

Thirteenth Dream

~I dreamt that I was in Solomon's town, which means in Hebrew the town of peace - my ideal world - but I found no way to reach Jerusalem (the realization of the ideal). l did not even think to ask somebody in the hotel, which I guess symbolized the church, because they would not know. But I wished to reach my brothers who live in Israel. I met S., a deacon of the Orthodox church, with whom I had been in prison. He told me about his fight for the rights of former prisoners. But I discovered that his fight was a farce. His real aim was selfish, to get a job with a higher salary. He wished to be employed as a librarian, though he failed to attain his desire. I realized that he did not serve either his own true interest or that of others. As I wandered around, a beggar stopped me. I gave him nothing (which was wrong). l awoke with the clear conviction that to give to those who ask would have been a means of going from the ideal to its realization.

I was in a prison cell with an ugly woman. I had the desire to possess her. I justified myself by saying that this was a subconscious drive and the subconscious is not moral. At once my wife Sabina was also there. She gave me a sad kiss. Wardens called her out of the cell, as if for an interrogation. I told her, "You'll return. " She answered, "You know how it is here. It is questionable if I will return." I asked myself, "Is it like this that we are taken to the eternal prison?"~

I have received tens of thousands of letters regarding moral questions. I wonder why they are asked of me. I don't feel prepared to give the right answer. It is a fallacy to believe that you are qualified to answer all questions because people ask you so many. Should not anyone who inquires about morality first find out how moral is the man from whom he asks advice? Are you sure that the one whom you ask has no running abscess? Is he fit to perform a surgical operation? His words might cut deep into your heart. Is he the right man for this?

Because I do not consider myself either an example or an authority in matters of morals, I will make just a few remarks on this subject.

I have addressed this book to your conscious mind. The subconscious is not moral. And my conscious level approves of its not being moral.

The endeavour to be moral springs from the idea that we have gone astray and that there exist rules of conduct for returning. We compare ourselves with the prodigal son of the parable, who took his journey to a country far from where his father lived. This can happen in our relationship with an earthly father. But what country is far from our heavenly Father, who is omnipresent? Christians are the light of the world, and not only when they are on the mountain peaks, but also when they pass through very deep valleys. They are in the paradoxical situation of being called to enter a place which they have never left.

Christians do not have to work at being moral, saintly, Christlike. Whoever tries to become Christlike has a great chance of becoming Devil-like. Christians are men who have denied their "I," who have no "I" to become good or holy. The moral problems do not exist for them. They are Christlike by believing in Christ.

The eighth century Zen-master Huai Jang ground bricks in the yard of a monastery. When asked what he was doing, he replied, "I make mirrors." The monks mocked him, "How can you make mirrors by grinding bricks?" To this he retorted, "How can one become a Buddha by practicing meditation? Whoever is not a Buddha will never become one." It is as vain to become a Christlike being through striving, as to strive to become an elephant. Goethe once said, "You are already everything you become."

The first ~koan~ (riddle) which is usually given to the Zen disciple to solve is, "Show me the face you had before your parents were born." Some disciples spend years in meditation seeking the right answer. During this period they are allowed to sleep only four hours a day. Then the moment of illumination comes: "There is no before and after for the enlightened. There exists no other man to whom I can show something and me the one who shows. Our worst enemy is the intellect which discriminates subject from object, aims from being. There is no being who can resolve to show something to the master. You simply are what you are and don't have to worry about the absurd demands of the Zen-master."

Christians are moral through simply believing. St. Paul advises a group of men who came from the degraded heathen world, "Reckon yourselves to be dead indeed unto sin." (ROM 6:11) Once you reckon this to be an accomplished fact - and only in this case - you will be able to oppose sin and to fulfill the commandment, "Let not sin therefore reign in your mortal body." (ROM 6:12) So you will be "made free from sin." (ROM 6:22)

But in order to be dead unto sin, free from it, must I not have a fixed, absolute, detailed, generally accepted code of things which belong unto righteousness and of things which are opposed to it? Such a code does not exist.

The Bible tells us about a general by the name of Sisera who had fought against the people of God. He was defeated and fled. A woman by the name of Jael went out to meet him and said to him, "Turn in, my Lord, turn in to me; fear not." She gave him milk to drink, covered him, and he fell asleep. Then Jael "took a nail of the tent, and took an hammer in her hand, and went softly unto him, and smote the nail into his temples...So he died."

(JDG 4:18-21)

Now Jael acted exactly like Lady Macbeth, yet the Bible says, "Blessed above women shall Jael be." (JDG 5:24) The motives were the same. Her act was in accord with the will of God. The prophetess Deborah in blessing Jael knew what is more, than the interest God's chosen nation. Because this was what Jael had in mind, a stratagem and a murder in cold blood were approved. Jael had represented the cause of God.

It is not true that meekness is always good and violence always condemned. A prophet told Jehu, "Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, I have anointed thee king over the people of the Lord, even over Israel. And thou shalt smite the house of Ahab thy master." (2KI 9:6-7) Jehu was very thorough in uprooting this wicked dynasty. "And the Lord said unto Jehu, Because thou hast done well in executing that which is right in mine eyes, and hast done unto the house of Ahab according to all that was in my heart, thy children of the fourth generation shall sit on the throne of Israel." (2KI 10:30)

God is above all things. He is not tied to any moral rules. He has placed in us the subconscious which also is not moral.

To kill your son can be right if God commands it. God said to Abraham, "Take now thy son, thine only son Isaac,...and offer him there for a burnt offering." God orders men to go to battle, he orders them to kill those who entice men to serve other gods. (DEU 13:6-9)

Christianity as a whole has accepted with enthusiasm a book by Brother Andrew called ~God's Smuggler~. There exist God's smugglers who smuggle Bibles into Communist countries. There exist God's spies, like those whom Moses sent to find out the secrets of Canaan, or the Soviet Colonel Penkovsky who gave his life to avert a nuclear war at the time of the Cuban crisis. There exist the devil's spies who try to subvert the free world. There exist white lies, which I have spoken about already. There exist red lies.

The Bible makes a distinction between sins of different colours, which seems to our conscious minds as senseless as fruits of different melody. But sins have a colour. We read in ISA 1:18, "Though your sins be as scarlet, they (the sins, not the sinner) shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool,"

Christianity has no fixed rules of conduct. Christians live in communion with God, who tells them what to do sometimes things which a moral man would normally do, sometimes things contrary to the general opinion even of good men.

It is not a matter of indifference how a man lives. Solomon concluded that everything which happens under the sun is vanity, including good or bad conduct. He was not a skeptic, a nihilist. He wished to destroy the false world that is under the sun, in which not even the sun is included, in order to prepare us for a new world. In this world, the decisions I make are of the utmost importance, because I am all-important.

Morals are a poor thing. They tell a man what he should do. His actions should correspond to an inner necessity. But they do not. Jesus does better than moralize. He gives a man a sense of value. The consciousness of his worth makes him grand in his attitudes without waiting for "shoulds" and "musts."

A prostitute told a pastor who preached a sermon on morality, "Your rope is not long enough to save me." Christ tells the prostitute drowning in sin, "You are a purchased being, beloved by God just as you are, intended to sit some day with God on his throne, ruling the universes." As a result she refuses ropes which will take her to the shore of a morality as repugnant to one who realizes his eternity as the raging sea of immorality. She simply is safe. She has always been safe. She will ever be so. The awareness of what she really is will change her life.

Once I realize who I am, I no longer judge myself harshly. I belong to eternity. Fifty or seventy years of sin have been less than one second of going astray in my eternal existence. During this eternal existence, I have come to stay for much less than a second in a life in which men have no choice other than between grosser or subtler sins, between the sins of an adulterer or those of a religious man. "All our righteousnesses are as filthy rags." (ISA 64:6) I have sinned much. Thanks be to God that it was not worse. I was born in sin, and nothing better could have been expected of me.

The sexual drive is almost irresistible. If we apply Jesus' standard that "whosoever looketh on a woman to lust after her hath committed adultery with her already in his heart" (MTT 5:28), nobody is chaste, except perhaps cloistered monks and nuns. But it seem that even they have sinful fantasies.

All marriages would break down if each partner could read all the thoughts of the other.

Truthfulness should be one of the foremost of moral duties. The journalist Brooks said in 1910 (~Corruption in American Politics and Life~): "If anyone of us would have the inspiration to write the truth, he would be unemployed the next day." This also applies to pastors. If we were to fulfill the duty of truthfulness and not hide our insufficiencies, who could keep his position? I personally have had to hide continually from my co-workers my insufficiency for the task of general director of the Misssion to the Communist World.

Accept the fact of your sinfulness. External and internal circumstances deprive you of the choice of being other than a sinner in this world.

The Bible contains rules. It also tells us their purpose, "that we may live by them," not in order that our whole life might become a burden. Let life live. Don't try to control everything.

A Russian farmer who had spent five years in prison for his faith once prayed after his release, "God, help me fulfill your one request, "Be ye perfect, even as your Father

p129 Answer to Half a Million Letters

in heaven is perfect." He heard an inner voice asking him, "Are you ready to go back to prison for Me?" The Christian shrank back, "Lord, ask of me anything but this. I could not bear it again. The chains, beatings, hunger - ...not to be able to see my family...the endless years...Lord, ask of me anything but this." The voice replied, "Give up the hope of becoming perfect. Spiritual perfection consists of unconditional surrender to My will." A fight started in the heart of this man. After a few days, he yielded: "Lord, Thy will be done. Send me wherever You like, only make me perfect."

Soon after this, he was imprisoned the second time for having taught children about Christ.

While detained in solitary confinement, he corresponded with his fellow inmates by tapping in Morse code on the walls. One day, a new prisoner told him that his name was Grigoriev, which was his own name.

"Your baptismal name?"

"Alexander."

It was his oldest son who, encouraged by the heroic example of his father followed in his footsteps, worked in the Underground church and also came to be a prisoner of the Communists.

Later, when the father was in a common cell, he succeeded in smuggling out a letter in which he told how happy he was that his son was a confessor of Christ.

Morality cannot be an achievement in this life: it can only be a tendency. We work at our own characters, saying "no" to Satan's "All things are permitted." We oppose this pernicious doctrine with God's "Thou shalt" and "Thou shalt not."

p130 Answer to Half a Million Letters

But we don't set our aims too high. The Bible says, "Be men." Not every biped is a man. Many men are more like animals than men. Kant wrote, "I wished to teach what you should do to be a man."

But does not the Bible also demand, "Be ye perfect"? Well, it does, but those who have this calling don't seek advice from me. Mozart was asked by a musician, "Teach me how to write a symphony."

"If you don't know," came the rejoinder, "why don't you try to compose just a simple song?"

"Should I be satisfied with a song? You compose symphonies."

"Yes," replied Mozart, "but I ask nobody."

The present book is written only for those who ask questions. For them it is enough to strive for the time being to be men.

At a given point in time, a man can do only the things for which his character has been prepared. Do therefore the little moral duties which you can fulfil, instead of asking advice about great achievements which are beyond your capacity.

Work with the moral material you have. If you wish to learn how to advance, learn from thieves. I have been with them in prison for many years. I learned from them some simple lessons which have helped me considerably.

Thieves do much of their work during the night. Jesus used His nights for prayer. He instituted holy communion late at night. It is still called the Last Supper - not the last breakfast. Gamblers play more during the night. Drunkards stay awake till late at night. Use your quiet nights for good reading, meditation, self-analysis the sort of thinking which will produce in you some little improvements.

p131 Answer to Half a Million Letters

If a thief does not succeed in making his break-in one night, he will try again some other time. Never be discouraged. Be persistent. Be like the thief whose failure impels him to try again.

Thieves unite in a gang to get what they want. Gather with like-minded people, men who desire to become more loving and truthful, who have the same problems you have. In unity there is strength.

Thieves risk their lives to gain a few thousand dollars. Gamblers put at stake even the bread of their children. Decide what you wish to achieve. But don't set your goals too high. Calculate how much you are willing to risk to attain your goals. Then invest straightway the capital of energy, money, time, or renunciation which you feel is needed.

Curiously, even Jesus compared Himself to a thief: "Lo, I come as a thief in the night." There is something to be admired in thieves too. In a Romanian prison, a thief was brought back from interrogation. He had been badly beaten. As soon as the guard had locked the door, he said to me, "It is in vain that they beat me. I love stealing. I will never give it up." It was a lesson for me.

Just as we should be straightforward in doing what is right, so we should be hesitant in doing what is wrong. When you don't know what to do, do nothing. When you are not sure, delay. Herod hesitated to accept the preaching of John the Baptist. But later, he showed no such procrastination. When Herodias counselled her daughter to ask for John the Baptist's head she wanted it to be brought immediately. And Herod yielded immediately. He did something wrong which he might not have done if he had thought things over. Bergson is correct when he says, "Think like a man of action; act like a man of thought."

Sometimes it is easier for us to do His will, sometimes more difficult. We are not sheltered from the moral climate which surrounds us. It is surely harder to heat a house in winter. But we are called to do His will. We are not wolves and do not have to howl with them.

He may call us to a normal, moral life. This is what He usually does. We then perform moral actions, not because they are moral but because they are His will. He may call us, in exceptional circumstances to acts considered immoral. In both cases difficulties will attend us. We know that there is a hardship in doing His will, because though ideas influence conduct, it takes much time and repetition for them to do so. A person is not apt to give up something wrong all of a sudden just because he discovers it is unreasonable or unbiblical. And criticism rarely helps.

So it is that much more can be obtained through prayer than through human effort. God's children can get much from Him. St. Augustine used to pray, "God, give what Thou commandest and command what Thou wilt." He also taught: "God does not ask the impossible. Do what you can and pray what you cannot do."

Bring your impulses consciously to the bar of reason. Think for a long time before doing. We often desire things inordinately when we haven't thought through the outcome or alternatives.

p133 Answer to Half a Million Letters

We all know the myth of Prometheus, the god who stole fire from heaven and gave it to men. ~Pro-methee~ means in Greek the one who thinks before. Most of us are ~Epimethees~, men who think after we have acted. Then we realize that we have acted badly, and our minds, which should serve as a light to illuminate our paths, are instead like a stepmother nagging us about things which can no longer be changed.

Sit down and think before you act. Consider a range of choices. Don't be the captive of a single point of view or assume that spontaneous reactions are the right ones. Consider that security may be your greatest enemy. A Biblical personality, Sisera, felt secure in the bed of a women named Jael. She graciously offered him milk to drink. When he had fallen sound asleep, she cut off his head. I believe there is validity to the expression "you lose your head" when you give free rein to your emotions. Your head is too precious to lose.

Enrich your knowledge; learn to apply with precision the rules of logical and dialectic thinking. Passions can distort the workings of the mind. Therefore work at your character. Whoever wishes to have a bed of lilies must do a lot of spadework. Take into consideration the possible consequences of your actions. Remember that you will be judged by your own conscience, by your fellowmen, and eventually by God according to your deeds.

Religiosity will not help you then, any more faith which did not prove its genuineness by deeds.

When Jerusalem was besieged by the Roman hosts in 71 A. D. and starvation had driven despairing people

p134 Answer to Half a Million Letters to acts of cannibalism, Rabbi Jokhananben Zakkai succeeded in sneaking out of the city and reaching the tent of the Roman General Titus. He begged him, "Master, have pity upon the city, inhabited by so many innocent women and children."

Titus replied, "You lie, rabbi; your first word was a lie. You called me master. If I am the master, why don't you open the gates of the city for me? Why have you not prepared an arch of triumph for me? If I am the master, where is your obedience?"

When we call Jesus "Lord, Lord," might we not receive the same rebuke?

In order to think rightly, put some distance between you and your thinking. Think about yourself as about a third person.

St. Paul asks, "Who is Paul?" not "Who am I?" By phrasing the question this way he had a better chance of getting the right answer. Jesus very often speaks about Himself as about a third person, as little children speak. He says, "The Son of man" instead of "I." If I think about what a certain Wurmbrand has done or has to do, I come to an entirely different conclusion than when I think about ~my~ achievements, mistakes, or duties.

In this short span of life you have far to go. Watch and be careful.

You would not think of giving your body to just anyone to be handled at will. Why then do you allow other men to manipulate your mind and injure your soul? Choose carefully the people with whom you are disposed to speak or correspond. Select with care your topics of discussion and the movies and TV programmes you

p135 Answer to Half a Million Letters

watch. Read only newspaper articles and books which will enable you to pass your "final exam." A student does not waste his time on cheap novels before his finals.

What you read and hear should be to your soul what the exquisite perfumes and spices were to Esther, who thus prepared herself for a whole year to win the love of King Ahasuerus.

Doing good is not the first step in achieving morality. This is difficult. Start with avoiding what is obviously evil, remembering that you strike God as often as you hit a fellow man. The fact that the fellow man is bad is no excuse. In Dostoievsky's ~Crime and Punishment~ Raskolnikoff wished to kill only a parasite, a usurer. But circumstances obliged him to kill her lovely sister also, because she happened to enter the room at the wrong time and could have been a witness against him. Can you kill a guilty man without making an innocent mother weep and wronging his children?

How would you feel if the evil you do to others were done to you?

Beware of doing evil, and always remember, "In the beginning was the word." Judas said a word of denunciation. This was all there was at the beginning: a word. An arrest and murder resulted, and Judas himself committed suicide.

For every word written in Hitler's ~Mein Kampf~ 125 men were killed; 4700 for every page; 2,200,000 for every chapter.

Jesus was tempted in all things like us. But He mastered His passions. So can you if you follow in His footsteps.

p136 Answer to Half a Million Letters

I don't see how a human being can live without doing some evil, but he must never seek to justify it. The man who does indecent things is not necessarily indecent, but the man who enjoys doing them is.

From fighting evil within, you will progress toward the good which is love. Heaven and earth endure only because they don't exist for themselves. The excellency of water is that it benefits all men and seeks the lowest places. There is a great need for unselfish love. I have known children who have never been kissed. Be a lover. Be among those ready to die for the beloved.

Tolstoy once told a little story. In a time of drought a child went to bring a jug of water to her mother. But she could not find any water and fell asleep in the field. When she awoke, the jug was full of water. The girl was tempted to taste it, but she remembered her mother and decided not to. Running with the jar toward home, she fell over a little dog and overturned the jug, but the water did not spill. Then she gave some to the dog, but the jar remained full - except that the vessel was no longer earthen, but silver.

When she brought the water home to her mother, the mother said. "I die anyway; you drink it." At once the jar turned to gold. The girl was just about to drink when a thirsty traveller entered and like a king demanded the water. The girl gave it. Then seven diamonds came out of the vessel and brooks issued from every one of them. The diamonds ascended higher and higher and became the seven stars - the great bear.

Love does not seek to prefer one above another. A Jewish merchant once supported a rabbi, and the more he gave to the rabbi, the more he earned. One day when he came to bring his gift, he was told that the teacher was not at home.

"Where is he?"

"He has gone to the Rabbi of Meseritch, who is the one from whom he learned the law."

The merchant then said to himself, "If by helping a little rabbi I was enriched, how much more will God bless me if I support the great Rabbi of Meseritch." So henceforth he brought his tithe to the latter. But the more he gave, the less he gained, until he was on the threshold of bankruptcy. He went back to his rabbi and asked him how this happened. The rabbi answered, "As long as you did not choose but gave to your first teacher of religion, God did not choose either. But when you began to make distinctions, God began to make them too. Why should He give good profits to you? Cannot He find somebody worthier than you to whom to impart His favours?"

Christians should love everybody without making distinctions.

As for Jesus, they reserve the best for Him.

The emperor of Japan, upon hearing that one of his samurai bred splendid orchids in his garden, told him that he wished to see them.

On the appointed day, the emperor arrived. The samurai took him directly to the garden.The earth was plowed. Not one flower was left. The emperor said nothing. The samurai invited him into the tea room. Here in a vase on the table was one orchid of indescribable splendour. The samurai said, "I have kept the most beautiful flower for the worthiest of emperors. The other flowers had no right to live."

Bring to Jesus the most beautiful flower.

This most beautiful flower need not be some great deed. We can love men in an exquisite manner in small deeds.

In Burma men made a shrine to an American lady who taught old people to put a handle on their brooms. Until then they had swept with bent backs, which ached as a result. Do some small thing profitable to men. For example, instead of pointing an accusing finger, cover somebody's sin. The ~Pateric~ has a story.

Father Amnon was told that a monk was hiding a woman in his cell. When the guilty monk saw the brethren coming to search his cell, he hid the woman under an overturned tub. Upon entering, Father Amnon observed some movements under it. He sat on the tub and ordered the brethren to seek. They found nothing. He told them, "May God forgive you your suspicions." They left. When the two were alone, he told the sinner, "Beware, and sin no more. Now send the woman away."

Show yourself meek even toward a murderer, remembering that you are worse than he. You are guilty of the blood of the Saviour. St. Paul, referring to holy communion, writes, "Whosoever shall eat this bread, and drink this cup of the Lord, unworthily, shall be guilty of the body and blood of the Lord." (1CO 11:27)

Did you ever take communion unworthily? If so, how can you look down on a man guilty of shedding the blood of mere man?

Jesus taught, "Love your neighbour," not only those far away. We praise missionaries who go to distant lands.

p139 Answer to Half a Million Letters

We praise those who show an unusual love for their enemies. Start with loving your fatherland. Patriotism is a high Christian virtue.

A nation is not simply a historico-geographical entity. It exists by the will of God and will exist in eternity. In the heavenly Jerusalem there is provision for "the healing of the nations." (REV 22:2) But be thoughtful about your patriotism, which is a virtue that has often been misused. Caiaphas said, "It is expedient for us that one man should die for the people." (JHN 11:50) Since that time, other rulers have concluded that it is expedient for them that tens of millions should die for the people. The nations have not profited thereby.

Your moral life will have the privilege of sowing seed. The life of others around you will thus be improved.

It is only the saint who is moral in the absolute sense of the word. The saint denies self, knowing the simple truth that it is only the empty part of a vessel or room which can be used. Therefore he divests himself of "I" and entrusts to God his naked soul. He serves God as if he were His only servant.

He does not despair about the weakness of the flesh. It will be saved too. "If flesh were not in a position to be saved, the Word of God would not have become flesh," says St. Irenaeus.

Bear with your weakness. Keep it to yourself, remembering that by confessing your sins to others you might destroy confidence in men.

In the last part of the dream in which I saw my wife departing, I asked myself, "Is it like this that we are taken to eternal prison?" Great thinkers of the church, Origen,

p140 Answer to Half a Million Letters

Maxim the martyr, St. Ambrose of Mediolan, St. Gregory of Nyssa, believed that eventually all reasonable beings will be saved. This teaching shows their loving heart but proves nothing.

The doctrine of hell as taught by the church is not only Biblical, but also of great practical value. Only men who believe that a sinner will go to everlasting destruction feels real pity for him. In ~The Brothers Karamazov~ the abbot Zosima bowed before Smerdiakov the parricide, explaining that he bowed before the endless sufferings which awaited him.

I read recently a highly interesting study about the subliminal method used in American advertising. It is a form of advertising which does not appeal to the conscious part of the mind.

A film projector with a high-speed shutter flashes messages every five seconds at 1/3000th of a second. These flash messages are super-imposed over motion pictures in theaters and on television. The high-speed messages are invisible to the conscious mind, but plant an order such as "Eat popcorn" in the viewer's subconscious mind. As a result, the sale of popcorn in the foyer of the respective theaters increased in six weeks by fifty-seven percent.

Fourteenth Dream

~During the night I dreamt that I was reading the foregoing study and asking myself if this subliminal method could be used for preaching the Gospel. The Bible opened to Matthew 1. I said to myself, 'How

p141 Answer to Half a Million Letters

unappealing to the mind the beginning of the New Testament is. No writer would have started a book like this, with a dull genealogy. "A thought flashed through my mind: But does it not appeal to the subliminal?

I think about it in my dream. A casual reader would just pass over the genealogy with a glance. It is meant not to be studied but just to be looked at superficially.~

The glance is enough to entice the subconscious mind of an unbeliever: "son of Abraham, a polygamist; son of David, a known adulterer and murderer; son of Solomon, the husband of one thousand wives." There will be plenty of sex and crime in this book. It is worth reading.

I never doubt the authenticity of the Bible. If it had been a late invention, why should the readers be taught to greet each other in the Aramaean language with "Maranatha" the Lord comes? None of them knew this extinct language. The Bible does not consciously set out to prove its authenticity. Two or three Aramaic words in the text are sufficient to assure the subliminal that it is on firm historic ground.

The Bible is open to misuse. The Gospels, for instance, were not intended to be the biography of Jesus. His features are never described. Thirty years of his life are passed over in silence. The Evangelists say themselves (LUK 18:34) that they spoke about a subject they did not comprehend. They certainly failed to understand the necessity of the cross of Jesus. What appeals to people, therefore, is not always "the merchandise" in the Bible, but rather its "advertising" that stimulates the appetite to want the "merchandise."

p142 Answer to Half a Million Letters

The Bible makes a perfect appeal to the subliminal by arousing its curiosity. Why should the accepted manuscripts contain so many orthographic mistakes, and why have these been perpetuated for hundreds of years? Why have they never been corrected? Day after day even now, Jewish writers of the Law copy with fidelity these obvious mistakes. Why?

And why should the Bible have a text with such a confused meaning? Its great assertion, the creed of the Jewish faith, ~Shema Israel, Jehovah Eloheinu, Jehovah echad~ ("Listen, Israel, Jehovah our God is one single God") can be translated correctly in at least three ways. And which, precisely, is the "Lord's Prayer"? The texts in the Gospels which mention it are not identical. God choose for His first revelation the Hebrew language, in which the verbs "to be" and "to have" are not used, in which there exist no clear past, present, and future tenses. Much, therefore, remains open to the imagination of the reader.

It is said twice in [2CH 21] that King Jehoram died at the age of forty. Then how could his son Ahaziah have been forty-two when he succeeded him to the throne? (2CH 22:2) In II Kings 8:26 [2KI 8:26] this same story is told again. But according to this author King Ahaziah was twenty-two years of age when he began to reign. Which is true?

In this case, there is a good explanation for the apparent contradiction. In the Hebrew Bible the literal translation of 2CH 22:2 reads, "Forty-two years of old Ahaziah in the kingdom." Many commentators feel that the forty-two refers to the age of the godless reign of the house of Omri in Israel. Ahaziah's father was Jehoram, who had taken to wife the daughter of King Ahab in Israel and therefore introduced the godless idolatry of Ahab to Judah. The short reign of the house of Omri was forty-two years: Omri six, Ahab twenty-two, Ahaziah two, and Joram, the last one, twelve years. This totals forty-two years. Ahaziah was really twenty-two years old but became king in the forty-second year of the house of Omri.

There probably exists a satisfactory explanation for every puzzle of the Bible. But in order to find it, one must be a scholar and must know the Hebrew language and ancient history.

The above-average reader who compares one passage with the other but is not thus equipped finds himself in a state of confusion. His conscious mind is paralyzed. Then the subconscious enters into its work. This is just what is intended. The Bible appeals to the subliminal, through which much more can be achieved.

The Hebrew in which God gave His first revelation was a very poor language. One and the same word often had the most diverse meanings. It was a tool which made precise thinking impossible. God wished the subconscious to be powerfully at work. If someone were to tell his fellowmen that Jesus was born in a stable, he had to use for stable the word ~naveh~. His listener could understand it in two ways: either that Jesus has been born in despicable surroundings among animals, or that He had been born in pleasant circumstances, because ~naveh~ means also what is pleasant. The aim was to leave the listener's conscious mind perplexed. The Almighty, the One who could provide for His son better than we earthly parents can prepared for Him a pleasant place of birth - a stable.

The Bible through its very language gives wide scope to the natural tendency of the human mind to create myths and legends, which are useful to express veneration for a founder of religion. Religion is a subject which lends itself readily to the use of metaphor.

The Bible begins in Hebrew. From time to time it reverts to Chaldean, then returns to Hebrew. In the thick book of Jeremiah, all in Hebrew, just one verse, [JER 10:11], is in Aramaean, and for good reason. Even in this verse the last word is in Hebrew again. Then in the New Testament the Bible passes to Greek, but the Lord spoke Aramaean. From the beginning we have His words in a Greek translation, with great variations among the Evangelists and variations of texts in the manuscripts.

The change of language is intelligible. Rainer Maria Rilke composed his poems in German. Toward the end of his life he felt that he had exhausted the possibilities of the German language to carry his feelings, and he changed to French. Thus one can also explain the changes in the Bible. But do not expect scientific accuracy in these circumstances. There is none. The name of the king in Judah is spelled in four different ways: Hezekiah, Hizkiah, Hizkijah, and Ezekias.

The contents of the Bible are often puzzling. Reason is sometimes shocked.

The Lord states that the very hairs of our head are all numbered. (MTT 10:30) But in Communist and Nazi and Moslem prisons unnumbered Christians have had their hair pulled out. The Bible tells us to honour father and mother. The Bible also tells us to hate them for Christ's sake. Would you like to know something about the prophet Hosea? He prophesied for forty years: Were his prophesies valuable? How is it then that only a few pages of them were preserved? And why did God command him to take to wife an adulteress, thus diminishing his influence? Why should God put His prophet in such a difficult position?

Why could God not bear to see Abraham offer up his son Isaac as a sacrifice, and yet was pleased to see the crucifixion of His own Son? It is written in Isaiah 53, "It pleased the Lord to bruise him." What kind of God is this? The conscious mind is bankrupt before such thoughts. One cannot form any image of this God. And that was the purpose of the authors of the Bible.

Sir James Jeans contests our right to expect that the real universe be picturable. If we compose mental pictures to illustrate quantum physics, we are moving further away from reality, not closer to it. By the same token, neither are spiritual realities picturable, or even explicable. Sinclair Lewis points out rightly that Biblical expressions such as "we died in Adam," "we live in Christ" imply that man as he really is differs a good deal from man as our categories of thought and our three-dimensional imaginations represent him. The separateness which we discern between individuals is balanced in reality by some "interanimation" of which we have no conception.

Every Bible verse understood is a Bible verse misunderstood, because only to a small extent does it appeal to the understanding. And even this is conveyed not simply by reading the Bible, but by the teaching ministry instituted by God.

Reduced to essentials, the Bible has one aim: to drive you to Jesus, who will not give you the answer, but who is the answer, because when you have met Him, you cease to ask questions. Why should you care about them when you gaze in adoration at Beauty incarnate, when you are taken into His embrace and receive His holy kiss?

For our reason, it is enough to know that He loves us, as we read in REV 1:5. This word was spoken to unloved slaves. He loves us to the depths of our soul. Religious life is a marriage night between bride and bridegroom. Reason has to remain outside. She is not received into this intimacy.

If reason is sanctified, she knows that she has another role. EXO 19:1 in the original sounds, "In the third month, when the children of Israel were gone forth out of the land of Egypt, ~on this day~ came they into the wilderness of Sinai." In DEU 26:16 it is written, "~This day~ the Lord thy God hath commanded thee to do these statutes and judgements." The Bible says "in this day," not "on that day." Reason must not think about Biblical events as pertaining to history. They have to become actuality in the conscious life.

For this purpose, the English Bible has seven mono-syllables in one sentence (LEV 18:3), "You shall not do as they do," and again in MTT 6:8 an even shorter sequence of monosyllables, "Do not be like them."

In the practical side of life, by warning against heathen practices and directing one to follow the statutes of God, reason fulfils its role in religion. All the rest is for the subconscious, sometimes called in the Bible the heart. It pleases the Lord to sit in thick darkness.

The Bride of Christ meditates, not so much about the text of the Bible as about what is missing from it. She ponders the words of Jesus, "I have yet many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now." [JHN 16:12] She wishes to strengthen herself to be able to carry heavy burdens and to hear the words which Jesus could not tell the apostles on that last evening. She wonders what St. Paul had in mind when he wrote, "The time would fail me to tell of Gideon, and of Barak, and of Samson, and of Jephthah; of David also, and Samuel, and of the prophets." (HEB 11:32) She wishes to learn from Paul what he would have taught if time had not failed him. Jude (JUD 3) tells of his intention to write about the subject of common salvation, but there is no record of his having done so. These are the things we wish to know.

We get to know them through personal communication with Jesus, who impresses them on our heart, or as we would say today, on our subliminal mind.

He impresses us through His words. He also impresses us by showing us the uselessness of words.

The two Bible verses that I find most beautiful are verses whose beauty consists in their absence from the Bible.

The first verse: Never did Jesus ask anybody what sins he had committed, how many, of what gravity, under what circumstances. Rather, He said again and again, "Be of good cheer, son or daughter. Your sins are forgiven." I appreciate the fact that there exists no such questioning in the Bible.

p148 Answer to Half a Million Letters

The second verse: Never during His earthly life did anybody say to Jesus, "Please forgive me. I am sorry. I apologize." When disciples met the risen Lord after having deserted and denied Him in His crucial hour, none of them as far as we know ever apologized. It was not necessary. Whoever looked upon Him could see on His face so much goodness and love that His forgiveness was self-evident.

Learn from Bible verses. But learn too from the beautiful absence of certain verses.

Fifteenth Dream

~I have just come back from prison. I meet Pastor Solheim, with whom I had worked in times past in the Norwegian Mission to Israel in Bucharest, and also my fellow prisoner Pastor Milan Haimovici. I tell them that I need a salary. They tell me, "Voluntary workers are much more effective." I answer, "Pastors with a salary are always eager to have voluntary workers and voluntary workers eager to get a salary."

I see myself with Marcel Pauker (an important Romanian Communist leader shot by Stalin) and his wife Anna (Romanian foreign minister, later dismissed in a Party purge and arrested). They ask me to act as a translator at an upcoming large congress of salesmen. I am still very young. I tell Marcel Pauker,

"I fear that there exists a social heredity just as there exists a biological heredity. The Socialist society is born of the Capitalist. Will it not inherit its injustices? Even when the state disappears, someone will always have to lead the textile or the metallurgical industries. will he not misuse his position? Kamenev was a top Bolshevik leader. He was dismissed by Stalin because of his oppositionist views and given a low assignment. When brought before the court for Trotskyite activities, he was asked by the judge, 'Why did you not confine yourself to the modest job given you instead of meddling in big things which were no more your concern?' He answered, 'He who has once been in a high position cannot become a small man again.'

How then will dictators ever willingly give up being dictators? Socialism has inherited from Capitalism. You and I, we have been in both Capitalist and Communist prisons. The latter were the worst." He nodded sadly.

He tells me that the girl in the home in which we stay adores me for having such distinguished friends as Marcel and Ana Pauker. But she does not know their real identity.

I wonder that Pauker does not offer me salary for translating. I could not leave my present job without this.

I have been imprisoned recently and am worried because I left my family with debts. I would have a chance to escape from prison, but it would be difficult to find somebody to hide me. He would be discovered. At the headquarters of the police in Bucharest, an officer said he would free me if I gave him 10,000 lei (the Romanian currency) as a bribe. I think that this would make my financial position even worse. He tells me to deny everything and even gives me a written document to this effect. Several are implicated in my trial, including women, among whom is one by the name of Niculina (I don't remember ever having known anyone by that name). I hear someone in the crowd shouting, "Merchants, unite! Merchants, unite!"

I am in prison. Somebody from another cell has come to visit me. One of my cellmates asks me who it is. I say, "A former high judge," though I did not know what position he had had. When I remain with this man, he asks me to lend him some money, since he is very poor. I promise to bring the money to his cell. When I am on the way, a priest who is also a prisoner reproaches me for being a miser. I understand the respective Romanian word which he did not pronounce correctly as "slanderer." He corrects himself, "You rather commit blackmail." I ask him for proof. I argue with him. When I go to bring the money to the other prisoner, his door is barred. The whole prison is almost empty. It seems I have come too late. In the end I find him and can give him 100 lei. I return immediately to find out what the priest can prove against me. I find him with many other priests who sing together, "We are the inventors of God." I am reminded of Luther's words, ~Fides est creatrix dei~ - "Faith is the creator of God."~

You will have observed that almost all my dreams are about prison or prisoners. My dreams are in black. I see myself writing on dark indigo paper. I am imprisoned almost every night. While in reality I have left jail, jail never has left me. Almost all my reading, conversation, writing, and preaching is about suffering.

Though today I am free, in my dreams I am almost every night in prison. While in jail I always dream that I was free. I lived enchanting nights. Now my nights are dreadful, restless. We live on two planes - the night life being the compensation for what is missing during the day to make one a whole person.

But those who know me consider me a happy man.

The Talmud says, "The glory of God rests only in the man who fulfils a commandment in a joyful spirit."

p152 Answer to Half a Million Letters

Savonarola preached, "The first sign of repentance is jubilating joy. The truly penitent is joyful and patient in all things."

I once knew a Christian who lived up to this. He was Surbianu, an Orthodox priest. He had been arrested at the age of seventy. One of his sons died in prison. Another son, his daughter, and his sons-in-law were sentenced to fifteen and twenty years. His whole family was destroyed. Yet he always had a smile on his face. His greeting was " Always rejoice!"

But he felt no great physical pain. I consider it out of the question that Savonarola had jubilating joy when he was tortured. There are always some who are being tortured. Therefore Christians never laugh unreservedly. While I laugh, some of many brethren in Cuban prisons might be in what they call "the incubator," an upright coffin with a 400-watt light bulb reflected from mirrors above, and refrigerated pipes to freeze the feet beneath.

What is the sense of this and so much other suffering? This is a question I am often asked.

When the ~Titanic~ sank, some people chose to put women and children on a lifeboat at the cost of their own lives. For these men the values of honour and chivalry meant more than life without them. The sense of suffering might indicate the same values.

Chains are used in prison for despicable purposes. But in Communist prisons, we used chains as musical instruments to accompany our songs of praise. Thus they became sacred treasures. This might be another clue to the sense of suffering.

It is the self which suffers. But we are made sit with Him on His throne. The self is too simple a throne for a personality like myself. Therefore I have to be made to leave myself, even if it is through suffering.

Those who have suffered are best able to differentiate what is true from what usurps the appearance of truth. This is how the church in Rome, the city which provided the largest number of martyrs during the first centuries, became predominant in Christianity. This is why the Underground church of Communist countries will soon have a more decisive voice in the church universal.

Don't be afraid of suffering. On the cathedral in Chartres (France) there is an inscription, "God created man with great awe." He handles us respectfully. He never inflicts unnecessary pain.

Don't be sad about your sufferings. An Orthodox priest with whom I was in prison under terrible conditions said, when I asked if he were sad, "I know only one sadness; that of not being a saint."

"To Him be glory both now and for ever," says St. Peter (2PE 3:18). The times when we glorify Him should not alternate with times of complaint and dissatisfaction.

The father of the Soviet Christian David Klaassen, who was in Soviet jails for ten years, wrote: "I cannot thank God enough for all His grace toward us." When the Czech Salvation Army officer Korbel received the coffin containing the body of his twenty-year-old son who had been shot in the army because he had witnessed for Christ, the family began to sing, "Jesus, Lover of My Soul."

p154 Answer to Half a Million Letters

Count your suffering of no great importance. St. Augustine wrote, "Two loves have made two cities: self-love in contempt of God made an earthly city; love of God in contempt of self the heavenly city." Show contempt for yourself with its sorrows.

The question arises, will we have the power to suffer? Many who have read my books ask me how they can get the power to endure if called upon to suffer. My answer is that the ability to endure is not specifically Christian. Everyone is capable of suffering much for what he loves much. In Singapore at the Hindu festival of ~Taipusam~ the image of the god Subramaniam is pulled through the city on a silver cart, followed by penitents who have hooks biting into their skin and a small spear piercing through their lips and tongues. Others are burdened with a large and heavy ~kavadi~ - a metal framework with peacock feathers which holds darts and needles against the skin. Every moment is torture. They love the god Subramaniam. If you love Christ, you will surely be able to endure everything for Him.

If you choose to be one of Jesus' disciples, see that you become a beloved disciple, for such a one has many privileges, according to Scripture. He lies on the bosom of Jesus. He knows beforehand the names of traitors and cannot be easily deceived. He stands faithfully near Christ's cross when others flee. He has the mother of the Lord entrusted to him. He is the first to arrive at the tomb of Jesus to see that it is empty, but he also yields to another by allowing him to be the first to enter the empty tomb. Being a beloved disciple will make it easier for you to suffer.

p155 Answer to Half a Million Letters

I am asked many Biblical questions. For instance, people ask me if I believe that all the miracles which the Scriptures report are literal.

This reminds me of a Salvation Army officer who rode in a train. She was young and attractive. A man sitting opposite wanted to have a chat with her but could not because she read the Bible for a long time. Finally he exploded:

"I have been watching you for an hour. You are bent over this silly book. You have such an intelligent look. How can you believe all these fairy tales? Do you really accept the fact Jonah was swallowed by a sea monster, arranged himself comfortably within its belly, and was then able to compose a prayer in beautiful literary style? Then the monster or fish or whatever it was travelled in three days the whole distance from the Mediterranean around Africa to what is Iraq today and spat him out just on the right shore? After such an adventure Jonah did not go to a clinic to be examined, he took no pills for his headache, and he received no injections. He felt just fine and could preach without a loudspeaker to the many thousands of inhabitants of eh, and they were all converted. Can you buy this?"

The Salvation Army officer answered, "To tell you the truth, I myself find if difficult to accept the story. I will have to wait till I get to heaven. There I will surely seek out Jonah and ask him for more details."

The man got mad. "What kind of an answer is this?

p156 Answer to Half a Million Letters

How do you that Jonah is in heaven? We know he was obedient to God that one day of his life. Who knows what wicked things he might have committed afterwards? Perhaps he is in hell." The Salvation Army officer was undisturbed. "Don't worry," she said, "If he is in heaven, I will inquire of him. If he has gone to hell, you will have the opportunity to ask him all these questions yourself."

Biblical problems should not give us headaches. The rich man from hell had the opportunity of asking Abraham all the details of his life. Those who go to heaven will have this privilege many times over.

Let us not make the Bible a subject of vain questioning. It is a book which shows us the Saviour and offers us a chance to get rid of our sins so that we may become citizens of Paradise.

The world goes toward destruction. Every day erodes my life. I am in the body, as in a sinking vessel which will inescapably go down. When water has already half filled the ship, should I analyze its chemical composition or seek a means of escape?

Others ask me political questions. All the problems of our century have come from men who believed they knew the answers: Marx, Lenin, Hitler, Stalin, Churchill, Roosevelt, Nasser, Ben-Gurion. They have all proven to be wrong. Some have not only been wrong, but have committed great crimes against humanity under the conviction that they thus assure the future felicity of mankind. How wonderful it would be if political leaders would simply acknowledge the fact that the problems of the world have become much too complicated for solution.

Jesus Himself predicted that there would be "distress of nations, with perplexity." (LUK 21:25) Let us pray together that God may guide in the affairs of nations. One common night of prayer on the part of Prime Ministers and Presidents of respective Nations do more for the peace of the world than hundreds of parleys at the U.N. My answer to all political problems is that I have no answer. Let God fulfill His plans.

The range of questions which I get is very broad. I have even been asked to name a lucky lottery number. Just for fun I indicated a number. It won. The incident became known and now I am in demand. People now ask the size of my collar, shoes, hat, my height, weight and so on, so that they can compose numbers from these. I am told that they are lucky.

WHAT ABOUT THE CHURCH UNITY?

I am asked much about church unity. We all assert when we recite the creed that we believe in one church, but ~contra factum non valet argumentum~ - against facts no arguments are valid. The church is divided.

It has been divided from the very beginning. At Pentecost cloven tongues appeared (ACT 2:3). They were cloven, but from one root. Everyone heard the apostles speaking in his own tongue. But tongues are so different, their possibilities vary so much, that they cannot all have understood the same thing. Those present said, "We hear them speak in our tongues the wonderful works of God." For "wonderful" the Jew heard the word ~pala~, which evokes the meaning "hidden." (It is used in this sense in DEU 30:11). In Greek they heard ~megaleia~. which means "great." For "works" the Jews heard ~melakha~, which is akin to "angelic," "royal." Greeks heard ~energeia~ (energy), ~logos~ (word), or ~poiema~, which would have evoked in their minds the idea of a wonderful poetry of God. And so on and on. As for the Parthians, Medes, Asians, what would they have heard? Only professional translators can tell you how difficult it is to put a word or an idea into another language.

But the different messages had something in common. The proof of this is that three thousand of all different nations were baptized on that day. They were of one soul and one heart, though surely not of one understanding. One understanding is impossible among men belonging to different races, cultures, and levels of education, and having different ages, temperaments, languages, and experiences of life. A cultured British Catholic approaches holy images with sentiments different from those of an African Catholic in the jungle for whom the ikon is only a new fetish.

The first Christians had a unity in diversity. The diversity has grown since then, first, because such a great mystery can never be discovered by following only one avenue of research, and second, because different churches passed through very different situations and were exposed to different influences. If the church is to influence the world, she cannot do so without exposing herself to the influences of the world, which vary very much.

There is nothing wrong with the increasing diversity within the church. It was unavoidable, but it displeases Christians that unity and mutual love did not grow along with this diversity.

Unity is necessary. Christians are weak as reeds. It is easy to break a reed. But you cannot break a bunch of reeds well tied. These considerations created the ecumenical movement. They provided the starting point of the World Council of Churches, as well as the ecumenical tendencies among Orthodox, Catholics, and Protestants. But I believe that the wrong method has been chosen.

I have no high esteem for ecumenism, and I don't believe that it will achieve anything. Cardinal Bea said that the door leading toward church unity is so low that it can be entered only on your knees. The way to unity is not through mergers, conferences (always accompanied by countless luncheons), and theological debates, but through uniting to spend hours kneeling in adoration before the Holy Trinity. When we are outwardly and inwardly silent, we all agree. The differences arise when we talk. Then what good are the talks?

I am against ecumenism for the following reasons:

1) The heretic Marcion met the future martyr Polycarp. He asked Polycarp, "Do you know me?" Polycarp's answer was, 'Yes, I know the first-born of the devil."

Saints have always made a distinction between Christians and heretics. Being a heretic is as grave a matter as being a murderer. It is said about both that they will not inherit the kingdom of heaven (GAL 5:19-21).

Who unites with whom in ecumenism? Can it be that Christians unite with heretics? I must have the real treasure and not be deceived by what only seems to be gold.

Many theologians are at work in the ecumenical movement. But there is not necessarily a close connection between theology and Christianity. In fact, there are Christian theologians who are not Christian. They lack the one thing by which you recognize a Christian. You don't feel that they marvel at the wonderful works of God. Their books are more often cold. The Gospel has not made them either glad or sad or mad. What does it profit the church if such theologians of different denominations come to an agreement? They will agree never to rejoice and never to weep, since they have never done so before.

Their talks might result in some kind of unity. But unity around whom or what? What a soul needs is an infallible rule of faith. St. Ambrose wrote, "Adversus regulum nihil scire omnia scire est" - To know nothing which is against the rule means to know everything. Can a reliable rule of faith be obtained through bargaining, the one party yielding in one point, the other party in another?

~Didache~, the first Christian book written after the New Testament, enjoins us to receive the legitimate envoys of the church as the Lord Himself. Who will be the legitimate envoy after all the parleys? Who will accredit him as legitimate?

2) The ecumenical movement tends to modernize the church, which means to howl with the wolves. "Be not conformed to this world," says St. Paul (ROM 12:2).

The world changes its fashions. We have an unchangeable truth.

The church is a living organism which needs renewal, as renewals take place continually in our bodies. This renewal is effected not by adaptation to the requests of the world, but by a change in hearts and lives, according to the pattern of apostolic times.

The ecumenical movement cannot change hearts; only the Gospel can do that. The Good News about eternal salvation through the blood of Jesus Christ is replaced in the World Council of Churches with the so-called Social Gospel, which puts the cart before the horse. It asks a renewal of social institutions on the part of men who have not become children of God through the new birth. These strivings are doomed to failure. They are useful, though. They might remind the real saints not to forget that the oxen were meant to drive a cart. Christians must get involved in fighting social injustice.

3) The ecumenical movement has opened the door to Communist influences in all denominations.

An Australian newspaper reported that a black American nun arriving at the Brisbane airport gave the black power salute and declared that violence is justified. (~Courier Mail~, February 17,1973)

A Soviet diplomat was invited to lecture in a Baptist church in Washington about the (non-existent) religious liberty in his country.

The Cuban government forbade the feasting of Christmas. Soon after that the papal nuncio declared that the relationship between the Vatican and the government of Castro was good. (~Replica~, January 1973)

Since I have been in the West, many articles and books about me have appeared - some highly favourable, some unfavourable.

I will not comment on them. As I spoke so much about my dreams, I will rather tell some interesting visions and dreams about me.

A Mrs. Nina Schwarzkopf from West Germany, 717 Schwabisch Hall, Sulmeisterweg 27, wrote to tell me that before I had appeared in the West or she had ever heard about me, a voice told her while she was cleaning the bathroom, "Pray for Wurmbrand." It was a name unknown to her. After a while she heard about my meetings and books in Germany.

A Romanian sister, mother of six children, writes, "I dreamt that you were with us. You were on one shore of a river and we on the other. It was an unusual river. Its whole bed was of white marble. One block was put above the other, so you had the impression of stairs. The water was crystal clear. You bowed again and again, took water from the river and then let it fall back from your hands, which gave you visible pleasure. In the meantime, you repeated without interruption, 'Complete your work before everything is finished. It is very important to do so.' You never explained what we have to complete. My mother said, 'The brother is right, because so it is written in the book of the prophet Joel,' but neither did she say what was written."

p166 Answer to Half a Million Letters

After a fortnight she had another dream: "You had come again. It was like winter and I was sick. While I lay in bed, I heard your voice in the courtyard. I said to myself, 'It is his voice. But how is it that he came? Perhaps I am in error. But no, it is his voice. I know it too well.' Then you entered the rooms with a great bouquet of chrysanthemums in your arms. The flowers were exceptionally big and of all colors. When I realized it was you, I jumped from bed, embraced and kissed you, asking again and again, 'Did you really come?'

"Then I told you the dream which I had had two weeks before. You listened to me attentively and asked me if I knew its meaning. I kept silent. Then you explained, 'The blocks of white marble which form the riverbed represent us, the believers. The flowing water represents the Word of God. The water remain pure only if the stones amidst which it flows are clean. If they are dirty, the water gets polluted.' You said that however much we would call men to God by telling them the Word, it would be of less value than the fact of being clean and of keeping the Word of God undefiled. This will have the greatest effect. You said that the stones are clean because of the water and the water because of the stones. I rejoiced very much in my dream about the explanation."

EPILOGUE

With this I have finished my book.

I know you will say that the most important questions have remained unanswered. It is like the complaints of many that their prayers remain unanswered. Every prayer is answered by God. With many of them the answer is No.

No question of yours has remained unanswered. To most of your questions my answer is, "You have asked plenty. You will remain without reply." Why? Angelus Silesius finishes his book ~The Cherubic Wanderer~ with the words, "Friends, it is enough now. If you wish to read more, go and become yourself the writing and the essence." That is why you have your head on your own shoulders. It makes no sense to go around seeking for it.

Enlightenment is like the bottom of the tub falling out. Jesus offers you not the solution to problems, but freedom from your problems. These problems belong to the self, which Christians transcend.

The human mind is an inexhaustible source of questions, but it has very few answers.

Instead of seeking answers, you should seek the right questions. The formulation of a question is its solution.

Somebody asked me once the meaning of the words of the Bible, "The Lord comes from Paran." It reminded me of the story of the Monk Hong Chou, who asked the Zen master Ma Tsu, "What is the meaning of Boddhi-Dharma (founder of Zen) coming from the West?" Ma

p168 Answer to Half a Million Letters

Tsu answered, "Bow down to me." When Hong Chou did so, Ma Tsu gave him a kick in the chest. Hong Chou asked, "Why did you hit me?" to which Ma Tsu replied, "So this is your real question!"

Who is interested in knowing why a verse in Deuteronomy is written as it is? People ask this question and busy themselves with many intellectual problems, while actually they are bothered the whole time by one thing: Why did life hurt them so much? What is the sense of all the trauma they suffer? If you must formulate questions, be willing to forego any answers, just as Jesus asked a tragic "Why?" on the cross and died without reply. The answer was the resurrection. This will be the answer for you, too.

But must I not have clarity now in order to have reasonable attitudes? My reply is, "No." Great decisions in life have more to do with instincts and other subconscious factors. You will try in vain to apply to them the criterion of reason. The hours in which the mind can function intelligibly are few.

Don't try to attain clarity now. To feel that you have all the answers now is the surest sign of having gone astray.

The king of Nineveh, when told by a prophet that his city would be destroyed, said, "who can tell if God will turn and repent, and turn away from His fierce anger, that we perish not?" (JNH 3:9) With only a "Who can tell?" he and his people changed their hearts, fasted, and obtained forgiveness. Why do you need more than questions?

You consider yourself blind if you don't have all the

p169 Answer to Half a Million Letters answers. Jesus met a men born blind and added to his blindness by covering his eyes with clay. You add to your problems the willingness to forego solutions. Predigested spiritual advice might be harmful. The day will come when the clay will be washed away and you will discover that the eyes beneath it have regained sight.

What more could I give you as answer than these poor words? What can words explain or define?

Hindenburg once asked a philosopher, "What is a brush? Would you say that a piece of wood with five hundred threads of swine's hair would rightly be called a brush?"

"Yes, and a big one."

"What about a piece of wood with only twenty threads. Would it also be a brush?"

"Well, a small one"

"And if it had only ten?"

"This would be no brush."

"So a brush would be a piece of wood with at least eleven threads?"

This whole book was not written in order to impress you with words. I wrote it on the subliminal level.

I have a special veneration for the Joseph of the New Testament, whose name appears fourteen times in the Bible. Not one single word of his is recorded. He worked as a carpenter, knowing that human work is the continuation of creation, its perfection. He was good and honest and a saint. He had been so righteous that angels guided him at every step. But he was absolutely taciturn.

Knowing that the intellect has no answer to the biggest questions, the ancient sages of India evolved

Yoga as the technique to get rid of them. We propose Joseph's Yoga: quiet, modest work and silence.

I wrote this book in the hope of leading you to the great silence where questions get no answers. Their foolishness becomes so apparent that you give up asking them. I have passed through such silence during my years of solitary confinement.

And after death will come the great thank you to God, who has suffered so much from us. With Him we will have light.

PREFACE

Looking back on my life, I, too, am astonished how much I have been through.

For a Christian, life is not retrospective: he wastes no time writing obituaries about what is past; instead, he writes, in the hearts of men, with the pen of the Holy Spirit, the preface to a bright and eternal future. As a rule, memoirs are written by people who no longer have a satisfactory, rich present.

But I have a different reason for recording my memories.

A quarter of a century has passed since I started the work of preaching the Christian message to Jews under particularly difficult circumstances - Fascist terror, war, and later on the Communist regime in Rumania. I have endured the heat of battle in a most important part of the battlefield, where the eternal struggle between light and darkness is waged.

"Thou hast chosen us from amongst the peoples," the Jews declare daily in their synagogues. "Salvation is of the Jews," said Jesus (JHN 4:22). "The dirty Jews are the cause of all our troubles," say the anti-Semites. The "international" Jew has been copiously depicted in literature.

Some people find in Christianity their true happiness: others hate Christianity and would like to see it destroyed. It is a Jew, Jesus, who is the cause of their happiness or their fury.

Some people benefit from capitalism; others feel they are exploited by the capitalist system, and would like to see it overthrown. No one would deny that the Jews were instrumental at an early point in time in founding this system, and that they still play a highly important role in economic and financial life, out of all proportion to their numbers. Whether you feel attracted or repelled by capitalism, your attitude will to a large extent be determined by Jews, whom you will probably never have seen face to face, as the people who have the final say in the capitalist world are almost always anonymous.

Communism may be to you a source of joy or suffering; it derives from the Jew Marx and a host of Jewish champions of this idea, without whom the revolution in the East would have been impossible. The fate of a farmer in Vietnam, who has never seen a Jew in his life, will, in the last resort, depend on whether he reads the book about the Jew Jesus or the book about the Jew Marx. Whichever triumphs, either the Christian civilization or the Marxist world, both are closely bound up with a Jewish name.

Some people place their confidence in modern science, whose peak achievement is in atomic physics, a science capable of enabling mankind to live in a Utopia. Others wait, in fear and terror, for the destructive atomic war which they believe will be the final result of this science. In both the West and the East, atomic science is to a large extent in the hands of the Jews. Einstein gave the United States a start in atomic weapons. The Jew Teller is the father of the nuclear bomb. The Rosenbergs, Jews, gave atomic secrets to Russia. In scientific books the universe is named after a Jew: we speak of Einstein's universe, as though we lived in this universe as the guests of a Jew.

And this is really so, for we are in very fact the guests of a Jew; only his name is not Einstein, but Jesus Christ. He is a human being and a Jew, but also God – a marvelous God, of whom we read in His holy book, in Paul's Epistle to the Romans: "... of whom [the Jews] as conquering the flesh Christ came, who is over all, God blessed for ever" (ROM 9:5). A people from whom God came!

Mine has not been ordinary missionary work; I have worked among those people who in the holy book of the Christians are called "a chosen people," a people from whom a God has come, but who nevertheless are ignorant of this God, a nation which is either blessed or cursed by millions of people – as the source of their happiness or their misery – a race whose fate has determined and will determine, more than any other nation, the fate of the entire world.

The Jewish people have given to the world the Bible, consisting of the Old and New Testaments, a book written by Jews, but which is at the same time the Word of God – the only book capable of satisfying the spiritual needs of the world. And it will satisfy these needs when it is once again in the hands of those who have written it, and when they gather round Him who is the chief subject of the book, Jesus, the Messiah of the Jews and the Saviour of nations.

The overwhelming majority of mankind lives in dire sin, bereft of the true faith. Murder, exploitation, oppression, fornication, defeat, envy, debauchery and slander are widespread. Mankind is bound to suffer speedy destruction unless it is converted and rouses itself from the spiritual death in which it now lies. But the Scriptures tell us that the conversion of Israel will be life from the dead (ROM 11:15).

Jesus and the Jews are indissolubly linked to one another. "Where is He that is born King of the Jews?" the Magi enquired when He came into this world (MTT 2:2). "This is Jesus, the King of the Jews," was the inscription on the Cross (MTT 27:37).

The Old Testament prophecies have the same message. Moses told the Jews: "The Lord thy God will raise up unto thee a Prophet from the midst of thee, ~of thy brethren~" (DEU 18:15). Isaiah, who prophesied the birth of Jesus eight hundred years before it took place, declared: "Unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given" (ISA 9:6) - "us" meaning the Jews. When he foretold the new covenant which Jesus would establish by shedding His blood on the Cross, Jeremiah declared: "Behold ... I will make a new covenant with the ~house of Israel~, and with the ~house of Judah~" (JER 31:31).

Jesus himself said: "I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel" (MTT 15:24). He also declared that he was the Saviour of the world, but in the passage above and in similar statements he established his special relationship with the Jewish people.

The intention of my entire missionary work, of which I give an account in this book, was to make Israel conscious of this relationship, a relationship which can never be broken, however much we may oppose it. The Jew today is no longer what he was two thousand years ago; he is not even the Jew who lived in the ghettos of medieval Europe, from which the French Revolution liberated us. We have made progress in science, art, literature, and in social life: only in religion there is stagnation, or, at least, the progress is not so rapid as in other spheres.

Those Jews may perhaps have had good commonsense reasons for rejecting a carpenter who declared that He was the Saviour of the world. But we are in a much better position than they were to realize who Jesus was. Had He been an ordinary child born outside the bonds of matrimony, an enthusiastic dilettante - as some people believed He was - He would not have conquered as indeed He did.

People of brilliant intellectual powers have paid homage to Him.

The Jew Spinoza declared: "Jesus is the highest symbol of Jewish wisdom."

Rousseau wrote: "If the death of Socrates was the death of a sage, then the death of Jesus was the death of a God."

Strauss, who wrote several works in order to prove that Jesus is not God, nevertheless declares that He is the highest goal to which we can aspire in our thoughts."

Ernest Renan, who caused a great many people to doubt the divinity of Jesus, says that His beauty is eternal and that His kingdom will never come to an end."

Some find it difficult to believe what His disciples said of Him, but let us at any rate believe His enemies, such as the Pharisees who declared: "Master, we know that thou art true, and carest for no man: for thou regardest not the person of men, but teaches the way of God in truth" (MRK 12:14). Judas confessed: "I have betrayed innocent blood" (MTT 27:4). Pilate said: "I am innocent of the blood of this just person" (MTT 27:24). The captain of the guard, in charge of the crucifixion, declared: "Truly this was the Son of God" (MTT 27:54).

Belief in Jesus gives the believer confidence. True belief in Jesus turns stubborn minds into hearts burning with love. True belief of Jesus breaks down barriers between races and nations.

The Court of the Gentiles in the Temple of Jerusalem was separated from the Holy of Holies by a fence, on which was written in three languages: "He who is not a Jew and passes further will be punished by death." The Christian religion breaks down national boundaries, and makes God's house a place where all peoples meet in prayer.

But someone will raise the objection: If belief in Jesus transforms us into love, how are we to explain the violent conflicts that take place within a Christian congregation, and the disputes between the various confessions? And if Christianity makes the people of every nation brothers, how are we to explain the murderous wars that are waged between Christian nations? Do not the naked facts refute the claims of Christianity?

The answer is that we are still living in prehistoric times, as far as the Christian Church is concerned. The various confessions are merely parts of the framework of the proud and magnificent building which will one day arise.

The task to which those Jews are called who have been converted to belief in Jesus, is to give the world life out of spiritual death. The Scriptures declare that the purpose of saving the Gentiles - who have given what they could - was to make the Jews jealous for their God. The Jews have been called, and specially equipped by God, to give a real inner meaning to the Christian Church. Don't look at the church as she is, but as she will be when the Jews whom she expects will have become Christians, and will give her an unequalled beauty. Then she will be one and burning with love.

God has called me to brings Jews to Christ. When He calls, He always gives a man the capacity and the facilities to obey His call. Every human being possesses spiritual powers of which he himself is ignorant. When he pledges himself in love to Jesus, he discovers what powers are latent within him. Even I, at the beginning of my Christian life, had no idea for how many works I would be used.

For these were not ~my~ acts: the Christian believer is like a child who is allowed by the driver to hold the steering-wheel of a car, while the driver himself keeps his hands over the child's. The child is delighted to be driving a car – without being able to make a single mistake – because there is someone who is in charge, and knows everything. Even while we are carrying our burdens, we ourselves are borne aloft on eagles' wings.

He who works through His children is the same God who scattered the stars in the firmament of heaven. Within us we have His power enabling us to sacrifice ourselves, that same power which was in the Son when He was crucified for our sakes. Through us the sanctifying power of the Spirit is at work. In us it moves like a mighty storm, and through us this storm arouses others to passionate zeal, because God dwells within us. It is as though the fulness of His grace all but shatters the vessel which is too narrow for Him.

When I look back on these past years, I can seldom discover any logic between what happened and the attitude I adopted at the time. "The heart has its reasons, which reason does not know." The birth of a man's deepest conviction is not the result of a process of thought; the subconscious cannot be trained, and does not behave in a logical way. It does not think in conformity with the ordinary laws of reason. It is in some dreams that one can see the magnitude of man's hidden values. This subconscious is the darkness where God likes to dwell: here He has openly done things through me that even I cannot understand. Beyond the world of phenomena perceived through the senses, lies the real, invisible world, the essential world. This is where the divine works; and what is seen in our nature is governed from it.

I do not understand everything that has happened to me, but I believe that my whole life, and the life of all His children, has been planned by God, down to the smallest detail. Our lives are planned in eternity; our lives serve God's purpose. I can be confident, even when I understand nothing.

When I first became a follower of Jesus, I did not want to have quarrels with anyone, I merely wanted to rest from all that had gone before. Religion must put an end to striving, it must bring calm. But a calm life, lived only in love and in the interpretation of the truth, raises new storms; one's religion is attacked, one must defend it, and so, without having wished it, one is at war again. We have to actively put into practise faith and love, and only God knows why, as sons of peace, we do not bring peace, but a sword.

I have come into conflict with many of the Jewish people of whom I am a part. Jews often call Christian Jews traitors to their people. I shall not dwell on this terrible term. It could be said more simply, and with greater love, that the Christian Jews use a different scale of values.

But is it really one's own people who constitute the supreme value? Both the Old and the New Testament depict as holy a priestess of a Canaanite temple, where religious prostitution was practised. Her name was Rahab. At a point of time when the Jews were going to war, with a view to the complete destruction of the Canaanites, Rahab concluded a pact with the Jews, against the interests of her own people. Was she a traitor? Was she thereby degraded? No, she was a woman who put the new religion - represented by the Jews - above the interests of the people to whom she belonged. In this way she became one of the ancestors of Jesus. She is also honoured by the Mosaic Jews.

We love our people wholeheartedly; but we consider the glory of Christ of more value than our own people. And, faced with the alternative of choosing between Jesus and our people, if they demand that we should renounce Him, we choose Jesus because we know fully that those who do not in truth serve Him, cannot serve their own people best.

When my wife and I became Christians, we found beloved brothers and sisters in all confessions; but no single one of these possesses the unadulterated truth, nor a truly burning love. Many Christian pastors are not what a pastor should be; a person in whom Christ is present, an ardent soul who sees the truth, declares it, and carries it out, a man through whom God himself speaks. The sheep are not listened to. The gifts of grace possessed by members of the Church are not sufficiently utilized. They stand unemployed in the marketplace, or else their strength and their ability are not given full scope. The work of the Church lacks the co-ordinated action in which all God's children should take part.

We are the most poorly organized army. Jesus's melancholy remark, that the children of this world are wiser than the sons of light (LUK 16:8) has not inspired us to change things. In the old days a Christian army was recruited in order to win an empty tomb. Why do we not organize an army to win living souls?

When we, who were new to the Christian faith, raised these problems, Christian leaders became angry with us.

There is a club for dwarfs. Membership is open only to persons who are not more than four feet tall. Dwarfs say that they are closest to human perfection, because the first men were taller than those of today; hand in hand with progress, the human form has become smaller. We could in fact set up a club for Christian dwarfs, with a great many members. It is the dwarfs of Christianity who are regarded as the standard, while the giants are considered to be fanatics. The dwarfs, the cold and indifferent, are considered the ones who are wise. I find myself in opposition to people who think along these lines.

Even more, I was opposed to the atheist world. The bodies and souls of many Hebrew Christians bear the scars of wounds received in this struggle. But only the soldier who risks his life is a true soldier, and scars are a soldier's badge of honour.

For twenty-five years I have had one single task, because I knew that it is only the man who concentrates on one goal who can accomplish great things. Amateurs do not make great athletes; nor are those clergymen the best pastors who, apart from being clergymen, are also devoted philatelists, football players, chess players, musicians, politicians, and a great many other things. You may have many gifts, but they must be all subject to the same aim.

I have done only one thing. I have worked for Christ. I am not satisfied with what I have accomplished. If I were, I should not be able to make any progress. But I know that Jesus will forgive me if I have erred in my thought and sinned in my life. He has not abandoned me, and He will help me to do better in future.

And because this is not the work of an individual - the true Christian belongs to the assembly of God's children - I have written this book, in order that what has been right and what has been wrong in what I have accomplished, may serve as a lesson to the Church and to the Jewish people, in order that others may do better.

I SET OUT ON THE ROAD

~A German carpenter shows a Jew the way to Christ~

It was 1937. Hitler was in power.

In a small village in Rumania, a German carpenter was spending the remaining years of his old age. His name was Christian W”lfkes.

During a revivalist campaign in the Evangelical Lutheran Church, conducted by Pastor Scherg, he had been converted to Christianity. Later on, he joined a congregation of brethren who called themselves "Christians according to the Gospel."

W”lfkes realized that a Christian who is not a missionary, even if on a very small scale, is not fulfilling his duty, which is to be a light for the world. One night when he was seriously ill, a Christian Jews watched by his bedside. In gratitude, from the depths of his heart, he now longed to be used to bring Jews to Christ.

His daily prayer was: "O Lord, I have served Thee on earth, and on earth I desire my reward. I pray that I may not die before I have converted a Jew to the faith. But there are no Jews in this neighbourhood, and I am old, sick and poor. I am not able to go and look for them elsewhere. Thou are all-powerful. Bring a Jew here to me in my village, and I promise I will do my utmost to convert him to the faith."

The first Jew who came to the village that spring was myself. I do not know if there was ever a girl so passionately wooed by her lover as I was wooed by this old man, who saw in me the answer to his prayer.

He gave me the Bible to read.

I had read it before, but it had not made any impression on me. But the Bible I now held in my hand was not like any other Bible: later I discovered its secret. W”lfkes and his wife were spending many hours daily praying for the conversion of myself and my wife. Actually, I couldn't really read it; rather, I wept over it. My tears always started to flow whenever I compared my selfish and wretched life with the life of Him who went around going good.

W”lfkes allowed the Bible and his own prayer to work in my heart. He hardly talked to me at all. Instinctively he knew, what so many trained missionaries do not know, that the most effective missionary method lies in reticence, silence, concentrated meditation, so as to give peace to the soul you wish to win; so as not to arouse love precociously; to pray ceaselessly, to be content to scatter a little seed, and allow it to take root and grow in its own time.

A long time passed. One evening the old man asked me: "What do you think of the Bible?"

I answered: "I was left an orphan while I was still a child, and we were very poor. Sometimes I would stand for hours on end in ecstasy outside a baker's shop, gazing with burning desire at the cakes. I would say to myself, 'These are not for me. I shall never be able to eat anything like this.' The Bible brings back these memories. Once again I can see wonderful things, but I know that they are not for me, because I am a Jew. I know that there are Jews who have been converted to Christianity, in order to marry Rumanian girls, or in order to escape anti-Semitic persecution. But I have not yet met a Jew who believes in Jesus."

From that moment W”lfkes became God's instrument to tear the veil from my eyes. He spoke to me in simple words, words that came from the heart, about things that a Jew should have known, but that I did not know: about the fulfillment of the messianic promise in Jesus; of Jesus's tender summons with which he called his people; of the love which God still has for the Jews, for the sake of their forefathers who were bearers of the faith ...

God opened my heart, so that I was able to believe the gospel.

page 18 CHRIST ON THE JEWISH ROAD

W”lfkes introduced me to a number of Christian Jews, who were so full of purity - even in their very looks - that I could never till then have believed in the existence of such people.

This humble carpenter provided the first impetus for my conversion. Later, my wife also joined the faith. She brought with her other souls, who in turn brought others, and so on, until a Christian Jewish congregation was formed in Bucharest, which flourished actively for many years.

The existence of this congregation, which was the fruit of his soul's work, was the carpenter's great source of comfort in his last years.

He died during the war. I had to fight on, and later I spent many years in prison. Meanwhile, practically all the Rumanian Christian Jews emigrated, and they have formed congregations in several towns in Israel.

After my release from prison I attended a large meeting of Christians in a village where hundreds of brothers and sisters had come together. I was not strong enough to be able to preach, but I was asked to tell in a few words the story of my conversion. While I was describing it, I noticed that a very old man was weeping. After the meeting was over, I started to talk to him. He told me that his name was Pitter, that he was a wheelwright, and that it was he who had brought W”lfkes to the faith. Up to then he had believed that all he had ever accomplished in life was to convert a carpenter. Now he realized that he had contributed greatly to the struggle of the Christian Jews for Jesus in Israel, and that he was a great-grandfather in the faith to many souls.

Hitler killed the Jews. German Christians worked so save the Jews. Here were two different worlds. When I think of these humble Germans, who gave me spiritual birth, I am reminded of what Martin Luther wrote to a Jew by the name of Jesel:

"Would it not be right for you to believe that because Gentiles and Jews have always been mortal enemies, we should not even bend the knee to the best of your kings? So much the less to such a Jew, crucified and cursed, unless this revealed the power and work of God, He who with His strength implanted them in our proud Gentile hearts? You Jews would never worship as Lord a dead Gentile who had been crucified or suffered some other shameful death. For this reason you must not consider us Christians to be fools or geese, but you must one day realize that God will lead you out of the misery which you have endured for more than fifteen hundred years - but this he will not do unless you, together with us Gentiles, accept the beloved Jesus, the crucified."

It is a miracle, with no logical explanation, that even amid the fierce anti-Semitism of Hitler's oppression, there were Germans who believed with all their hearts in the crucified Jew as their Saviour, some of them suffering profoundly because the Jews remained indifferent to Him who is the glory of His people Israel.

~Rabbis help to dispel my doubts~

Though the rabbis are the shepherds of the Jewish people, I had reached my twenty-seventh year without experiencing their leadership. They did not lead me into green pastures, nor by still waters. I do not know what other business they had; but they did not come to find the lost sheep. It might have been just my misfortune. There probably are rabbis who fulfill their duty.

Sometimes I would go to the synagogue, but I understood nothing of what was chanted there. Nor did the other Jews. The cantors realized that we could not understand Hebrew, but still they sang for hours on end in that language. It was obvious that they cared little if we knew anything about God. Indeed I wonder whether they themselves were "in God." Reformed Judaism was unknown in Rumania.

But I must not be unfair: Christian priests and pastors made just as little effort to seek me out. Priests and pastors generally have other things to do than to look for lost souls where they are to be found, in pubs, in brothels, in gambling dens and among the atheist organizations. I was found by a carpenter, a man whom priests and pastors of the official denominations would have called a "sectarian."

The rabbis did not begin to take an interest in me until their opportunity was past, and I had been sought and found by Israel's great shepherd, Jesus of Nazareth, of whom the Jewish prophets had prophesied.

page 20 CHRIST ON THE JEWISH ROAD

I was sitting in the house of a rabbi who was one of the outstanding personalities of Rumanian Judaism. I had come to tell him why I believed in Jesus as the Messiah.

Rabbi H. officiated at my marriage: I was married in the synagogue, for the family's sake. He knew then that I was a militant atheist and an anarchic element. Yet he made not the slightest attempt to tell me anything about God. He carried out the ceremony, and that was all.

Now that I had come to God by way of Jesus, he was displeased. He asked me: "What makes you believe in Christ?"

I told him that the prophecy of Isaiah, about eight hundred years before Jesus, had particularly struck me. Reading this prophecy, in the fifty-third chapter, I had the impression that, centuries before the birth of the Saviour, the prophet had foreseen His entire life, and had depicted it in outline, so that the Jews should recognize Him when he came.

The rabbi stroked his beard, and said to us (my wife was also present): "You should not have read that. That chapter is forbidden to you."

I have subsequently verified this ban in the calendars issued by Orthodox Jewish congregations, which give the texts from the prophets to be read at public services in the synagogue (the so-called ~Haftorahs~). After the part of the Law of Moses called ~Shophtim~, Isaiah Chapters 51 and 52 are to be read. On the next Sabbath there follows Chapter 54. Chapter 53 has been omitted. The prophecy about Jesus contained in this chapter is too revealing.

The rabbi urged us: "My children, leave these things alone!"

I answered: "I should like to do so, but the prophecies will not leave me in peace. What other interpretation of this part of the Bible can you give me?"

The rabbi shook his head sadly, and dismissed us without trying to give an explanation. I don't know why.

Several years passed. In 1940, in the course of a pogrom, the Fascists killed two of his sons before his very eyes. They also fired at him, but failed to hit him.

Rabbi H. personally conducted his sons' burial services. It greatly moved all those present to see him place his hands on both coffins, and to hear him begin his sermon with the words of the psalmist: "The Lord is righteous in all His ways, and holy in all His works" (PSA 145:17).

Thousands of Bucharest Jews were present in the cemetery: I was also there, though I was ostracized because of my Christian faith. I stood by myself at the entrance to the chapel. After the ceremony was over, as the rabbi was leaving, supported by two Jews, he caught sight of me, and called to me from a distance: "Richard!" He embraced me in the sight of all who were present. Among the thousands of Jews he had chosen me to whom to pour out his sorrow.

I have met him several times since then, and he has always listened to me lovingly when I have told him about my faith. I have never tried to force myself upon him. The man who had organized the murder of over a hundred Jews in the Jilava Forest, and hanged about forty others in the municipal slaughterhouse under a sign "Kosher Meat," had been a Greek Orthodox priest. It is difficult to bring a Jew to Christianity.

The other rabbi with whom I spoke about Jesus at the beginning of my belief, while I was still doubting and suffering intellectual scruples, was Rabbi R. from Satu-Mare.

I met him one evening in a synagogue. When I mentioned the Saviour to him, he answered: "If you are prepared to listen quietly to me for half an hour, I will free you from this delusion."

I answered: "I am prepared to listen to you, not for half an hour, but for many days."

He came home with me, and we agreed to read the New Testament together, so that he should have an opportunity of interrupting me from time to time, and of pointing out anything that was incorrect. We read together from eight in the evening until one o'clock next morning. He listened attentively, interrupting me from time to time, always with the same exclamation: "~Oi, vi shein, oi vi shein! Dus hob ich nich gewist~." (Ah, how beautiful! How beautiful! I never knew that.) Not once did he contradict. That night he slept at my house. Next day, as we left the house together, he asked me: "Please don't tell anyone in the synagogue what has taken place." I agreed, but added: "I think it should be a point of honour for you to tell the Jews that you consider the New Testament a wonderfully beautiful book."

Rabbi R. did not do that. Later, he moved to Cernauti. A year later I visited him, and found him sitting among his pupils. When I mentioned Jesus to him, he reviled Him with ugly jokes.

During the war he was killed by the Nazis.

When he heard that I was a lost sheep, Rabbi G., who was the successor of a well-known dynasty of miracle-working rabbis, called me to him.

He was an impressive figure, an old man with a white beard and white hair and a lofty forehead. His face shone with goodness. He apologized for having asked me to come to his house; had it not been for his advanced years, he would have come to mine. He asked me what it was that attracted me to Christianity.

I told him briefly the story of my life in sin, and of the peace I had achieved in my conscience through the certainty that my sins are forgiven through Jesus. "Jesus gives me peace in my soul, and joy. I know that He has given peace to millions of people. I know of no evil that He has done. Tell me, Rabbi, why should I abandon Him?"

The rabbi answered: "Jesus did no evil. On the contrary, through Him many people have been saved from the worship of idols and made to know the true God. But you are a Jew. It is your duty to remain in the Jewish religion."

"No," I replied vehemently. "The Jewish religion is false because it is Jewish. Religion must provide men with an exact knowledge of God, and of how man can achieve unity with Him. Just as there can never be a Rumanian theory of physics or a German theory of mathematics, so there can never be a Jewish religion. There is only religion or non-religion. Religion is either true for everyone, or else wrong for everyone.

"In religion we must apply the same principle as in justice. No form of justice to which we give a prefix such as race, caste, class, military, emergency, can be true justice. Justice stands by itself, without any prefix. And for the same reason I accept no prefixes in my belief. I am seeking for contact with God and union with Him. Any religion which has a prefix may prove an obstacle in this search for a union. The Jewish religion binds me to Judaism, the Orthodox and Roman Catholic religions to certain traditions, the Protestant religions to the ideas of their reformers. All these are horizontal unions, not vertical unions with God. It is this vertical union that I seek."

In amazement the rabbi asked me: "I must say with great regret and profound sympathy - not with scorn and malice - that in you I see a person uprooted from his people. Do you not hear within you the voices of your forefathers, calling you back?"

I replied: "Yes, every Jew with sidecurls, the music of a synagogue, the mere sight of the letters in the Hebrew Bible - all these remind me of my forefathers. It is almost like the sight of Abraham with his family, coming to Canaan on his camel. I see before me the scenes from the Bible. I feel myself experiencing the departure of the Jews from Egypt, all their difficulties in the desert, the miraculous event when the Jews received the tablets of the law through Moses. I experience the whole shattering history of my people. But personal biographies and history are one thing, objective truth another.

"The most profound philosophers, politicians and religious thinkers have always offered as objective thinking a system which was nothing but the result of the tragedy of their own personal lives, and they themselves sometimes admit this. Marx wrote in a letter to Engels: 'If Titus had not destroyed my fatherland, I would not have been the enemy of all fatherlands.' One must not allow oneself to be guided by a criterion of this kind in deciding whether to be a patriot or an anti-patriot. And so, even in the religious sphere we must not allow ourselves to be guided by feelings, but we must seek the true religion. That is what I want."

The rabbi shook his head sceptically. "Which 'is' the true religion?"

My reply was: "I don't know yet. But I think I have made a long step towards discovering it, in so far as I have discovered the religion which is certainly incomplete. That is the religion to which I belong by birth. In my opinion it is absurd that religious convictions should depend on the results of sexual association. A man of the Mosaic faith enters into a union with a woman of the same faith. The child born of this union is regarded as an apostate if he does not believe in Moses. One of his neighbours is a man who is the child of a marriage between a Catholic man and a Catholic woman: he believes that he is compelled to abide by all Catholic dogma. The same applies to a Protestant, or a Mohammedan, or a Buddhist, and the result of this is incomparable confusion. This kind of religion is obviously not the true one, and I do not intend to abide by it."

The rabbi answered: "Jesus did not do what you are doing. He followed in the paths of His forefathers, He kept the sabbath the laws pertaining to food, and the other laws. He worshipped God in the synagogue. Why do you not do the same?"

I replied: "Jesus was a unique person with a unique vocation. The revelation He made was new; He presented a new and eternally valid truth. In order to win the good will of those who heard Him, He did what every sensible creature does, He clothed His teaching in a form that was acceptable and attractive to His listeners. This is how we can understand His conformism. But through Him the prophecy of Jeremiah, in Chapter 31, is fulfilled: 'Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that I will make a new covenant with the House of Israel, and with the house of Judah; not according to the covenant I made with their fathers in the day that I took them by the hand to bring them out of the land of Egypt; which my covenant they brake, although I was an husband unto them, saith the Lord: but this shall be the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel; After those days, saith the Lord, I will put my law in their inward parts, and write it in their hearts; and will be their God, and they shall be my people.'

"We are no longer governed by an old covenant, but by a new revelation, which I can characterize in a few words: freedom in our daily life, and love. One of the renowned Christian teachers, Augustine, declared that the Christian norm in the conduct of his life is: 'Love, and do what you will!' I no longer find Jewish customs imperative or necessary."

To my amazement, the rabbi answered: "I cannot recall such a passage in Jeremiah."

I asked him to take the book from his shelf, and I showed him the reference.

page 25 CHRIST ON THE JEWISH ROAD

Some rabbis in truth neglect the prophecies because they are continually concerned with the Talmud, the Kabbala and numerous commentaries. As a rule, the Books of Moses are the only parts of the Bible they know well.

Among Christian clergy, some of whom have doctors' degrees in theology, it is even worse. I have often come across a profound ignorance of even the simplest Bible texts. If they are Catholics, they are well acquainted with Thomas Aquinas, and if they are Protestants with the works of Karl Barth or Bultmann. They are as a rule ignorant of the theological writings of the great Christian mystics, nor do they know the Holy Scriptures.

The rabbi tried to put an end to our discussion: "I realize that there is no point in arguing. I shall never be able to convince you that you should return to Judaism."

"You do not possess the truth, and therefore you have no confidence either," I replied before I left him. "You have given up all hope of bringing me back to the Mosaic faith, to which I never subscribed. But I shall never give up the hope that one day you will become a disciple of Jesus."

The rabbi shook hands with me hurriedly, and dismissed me.

As a result of what Christians had told me about Jesus, I was still in doubt as to whether He really was the Saviour. The rabbis removed the last shred of doubt on this score, thanks to the complete inability they showed in contradicting the Christian arguments.

~The path of belief from reason to the heart~

The Jews have an ancient story, so old that Jesus as a boy may have heard it, perhaps from His mother.

One day, a taxidermist caught a beautiful bird, which he intended to kill and stuff. But when he raised his knife to plunge it into its body, a miracle occurred. The bird began to talk to him in human language, saying: "Spare my life, as I have young in my nest. If you will do so, I shall give you three simple pieces of advice, which will prove of great use to you."

The taxidermist thought to himself: "There are many other birds in the woods which I can stuff. But what I am now experiencing is a miracle from God. Who knows what advice I may get?" And so he promised to liberate the bird, if the advice he received was good.

The little bird pronounced three words of wisdom: "If anyone tells you anything absurd, don't believe him, whoever he may be. If you do someone a good turn, you must not regret it afterwards, but rejoice that you have acted benevolently. Do not attempt to reach what is too high for you."

The taxidermist recognized the value of this advice. He had often made the mistake of listening to the counsel of people merely because they were well known. He had often regretted spending money on charity, and he had wasted a great deal of time and energy trying to attain what he could not reach. He released the bird, saying: "Go with God, little bird, because your words were clever."

The bird flew off, to perch on the nearest branch. Then she called out to the man: "Fool! Why did you release me? I have a large diamond in my belly; if you had killed me, you would have found it, and you would have been rich for the rest of your life."

When the taxidermist heard this, he regretted freeing the bird, and began to climb the tree to catch her again. But it is no easy job to catch a bird with bare hands! When he reached the lowest branch, the bird flew off to another. When he reached the second, the bird was yet higher up, and in this way he went on climbing up the tree, until he missed his footing, fell down and broke both his legs.

As he lay groaning at the foot of the tree, the bird hopped down on to the lowest branch and called out to him: "Fool! Did I not give you three good pieces of advice, which you knew in your mind were correct, and admitted with your mouth were good? The first was that you should not believe anything absurd, whoever told you to believe it. How, then, could you be so foolish as to believe that a bird had a diamond in its belly? The second was that you should never regret doing a good turn. You acted charitably by sparing my life. Why did you regret this afterwards? And the third piece of advice was that you should not try to reach something that was too high for you. You know very well that it is impossible to catch a bird with your bare hands. But there is always too great a gap between the human head and the human heart, between the human mouth and the human ear. You saw that my advice was good, but you did not listen to your own words, and you did not believe in the value of your thoughts. A few minutes after approving of my advice, you did the exact opposite of what I had taught you."

Today, we can hear what people are saying and singing on the other side of the world, but our own words are lost, and we live as though we had never pronounced them. Our understanding is one thing, our feelings something quite different. I was to experience the truth contained in this little story.

With my understanding I knew that Jesus is the Saviour; but my life, instead of conforming more and more to His teaching, became, if anything, worse. To my horror, I discovered that I possessed the will to do good, but not the power to carry it out.

"For the good that I would I do not; but the evil which I would not, that I do...

"I find then a law, that, when I would do good, evil is present with me...

"For I delight in the law of God after the inward man ... But I see another law in my members, warring against the law of my mind, and bringing me into captivity to the law of sin which is in my members..." (ROM 7:19-23)

There were two aspects to my inner conflict. On the one hand I knew - or rather I felt - instinctively that conversion would mean that I should have to live a life of suffering and conflict. I should have to take my stand against some of my own people, against their customs and ideas which had survived for thousands of years. I knew that - while it was my duty to remain patient and mild - I should have to suffer abuse and condemnation, and yet remain unbowed in every storm.

I should have to be prepared to oppose my people, the people in which I was rooted with all my soul. I heard a voice inside me saying: "Are you, you alone, wiser than all your people? The Jewish nation has fostered so many geniuses, so many mystics, so many men of action, and countless martyrs for the faith of their forefathers! Are all these people wrong, and only you - a small group of Jesus's disciples among the Jewish people - right?" It was not until later that I was compelled to realize that the multitude and the famous men who support a cause are of no argument against God's unequivocal word.

And then, what prospects were in store for me when this conflict had been resolved? Assuming that the Jews were prepared to be converted, where should they go? Later on, I shall relate some of the disappointments I experienced with the various Christian confessions. Very soon I realized that in this world there was no house of the Father to which Israel, the Prodigal Son, could return.

All these thoughts compelled me to compare myself to some Don Quixote going forth to a meaningless battle. The sin in me exploited the difficulties, preventing me from being born anew. "Eat, drink and enjoy yourself, for youth is fleeting," it always whispered.

It was in this period of conflict that I experienced the presence of Jesus for the first time. I cannot say that I saw Him: He had no outward appearance, but He was present. This phenomenon was repeated for several days running. It was at midday; I had cast myself down on a sofa. The tears ran down my cheeks: it was as though I heard a voice calling me - not with words - but if I were to describe what I felt, it would be something like this: "Come! I will give you happiness. All your sins will be forgiven. Unspeakable joys await you." My wife was at my side, saddened by the conflict within me, which she shared with all her heart. But I answered: "No, no, I shall not come. You are calling me to tread a heavy path. Too much renunciation, too many sufferings await me. I do not want them. Depart from me!"

May God forgive me if, without wanting to do so, I appear to blaspheme: I had the impression that Jesus, the Lord of Heaven, was kneeling before me, a sinner, instead of the other way round. And He begged me to turn to God. I felt that my heart would burst with the weight of His sorrow, but I could not. My answer was always "No."

I did not accept, because I was evil. Nevertheless, I believe that some sermons and Christian books on which I fed my soul at that time were in part responsible for the answer I gave. In these sermons and books the picture of Jesus was falsified: He was shown as a police officer, demanding rigid obedience to hundreds of laws. These laws started by insisting that one should renounce smoking and the wearing of jewelry, and ended by insisting that one should sacrifice one's life for Him. The emphasis was on all these "don'ts," and on our duty to give to God, instead of depicting Him as the giver of gifts of immeasurable worth - forgiveness of sins, peace of heart, communion with God, truth, life in the Light, the Spirit which gives power and holiness, the joy in fighting the good fight - with the angels fighting on your side - an eternal life of glory, and so much more - and all these gifts bestowed without any conditions.

In one of the Talmudic writings, we read that any love which depends on a thing ceases when that thing ceases to be; but a love which is not dependent on a thing, never ceases. If the salvation which Jesus gives us depended on a state of soul, it would not endure because the state of our soul varies. The salvation bestowed by Jesus is free, unconditional; it does not depend on what is in us, or on what we do. It springs from His loving character, and for this reason it is eternal.

Christian preaching is often bound up with "don'ts" and demands, and this gave me a false idea of Jesus. But what restrained me, more than anything else, was the fact that I was in bondage to sin: love of money, love of illicit pleasures, hatred, evil, dishonesty, and much besides. I continued to commit grave and gross sins, even after I was intellectually convinced that Jesus is the Saviour.

But what Luther said happened in my life: "Sins do not destroy the saints,* but they stifle only those who are without God." There are two reasons for this. The first is that the saints believe in Christ, in whom they are completely absorbed, and through whom they rise again (even though in their ignorance they do many things for which, without God, they would be condemned), and in whom they are preserved. They do not fall into mischief, as Solomon says (PRO 24:16). For those who have never experienced it, it is inconceivable how great is the power

[Footnote]
*The word "saint" is not used here in the sense that the Roman Catholics use it to describe a person who has been canonized, but is a title which, according to the New Testament, all believers bear.

that faith will give, especially where sin is concerned. Those who are without God sin, even if they were to do the deeds of all the saints. The other reason is that the saints, through faith realize that they depend only on God's mercy: yet they recognize in the depths of their hearts that their deeds are sinful and futile. This humility and this testimony prevents them from being destroyed by their sin, ignorance or evil, because God cannot abandon such humble people. The mercy he shows to those who confess their guilt is all the greater. This was true of Bernard of Clairvaux, when he exclaimed in his grief: "I have wasted my time, for I have lived a life which deserves condemnation!" It was true of Augustine when he said: "Woe to the lives of all men, however holy they may be, should they be judged without mercy!"

~Isac Feinstein and my rebirth~

The man who was to play a very special role in all this was Isac Feinstein, one of the most glorious triumphs the grace of Jesus has won among the Jewish people.

At the time of his conversion he was a minor business executive. One evening, in a Christian gathering, he heard the message of Jesus. Immediately he believed. When he came home, he ran up to the bedroom of his parents, who had already retired for the night, woke them up and exclaimed: "I have found the Messiah!"

From that evening he never wavered in his faith, although he encountered great resistance from his family.

His father, a pious Jew, tried to persuade him to deny Jesus. When this proved unsuccessful, he arranged for the ceremony to be carried out which is prescribed by rabbis in cases of this kind. He declared that his son was dead, carried out a symbolic burial with a coffin in which the branch of a tree was placed, tore his clothes, and wept for his son together with his family, sitting on the floor for seven whole days.

All this time the "dead man" rejoiced in a life which was richer than ever, and he grew in grace and knowledge of God.

After he had been a Christian for some time, he prepared to work heart and soul to spread the gospel among the Jews of Rumania. He took a missionary training in Poland, and on his return to Rumania he entered the service of the Norwegian Israel Mission in Galatz.

This man had an unlimited capacity for work. He published a periodical for adults and one for children, as well as countless Christian pamphlets. He preached all over the country, and wrote numerous letters. He became an outstanding personality among the disciples of Jesus in Rumania, a pillar of God's temple.

But in order to assess a man's real value, one must consider the conclusion of his career. Napoleon wrote: "Great men are meteors which are extinguished in order to give light to the universe." But Napoleon gave no light to the universe; on the contrary, he caused the world to bleed and weep, by creating a science without which the world would have been a better place - the science of warfare.

Meteors do not bring light to the universe: even the biggest meteor merely leaves behind briefly a transient stream of light which the vast universe does not even notice. The people who are the light of the world are those who add sacrifice to sacrifice - just as islands are formed of coral, one tiny body upon the other. They are the people who are seldom known, who generally remain anonymous, who play a humble role in raising children, running a household, in art, in political, economic and academic life; these are the people who shine with truth, love and faith, shedding a light on those around them. Feinstein was such a burning light.

Feinstein was still a young man when war broke out. He was thirty-seven years old, a pastor in a Jewish-Christian congregation he had formed in Jassy, and from here his benevolent activity spread over the whole country.

The atmosphere in Jassy was infected with anti-Semitism, with the ever-present overhanging threat of a pogrom. Feinstein was on a short visit to Bucharest, staying in my flat. I suggested that he should not return to Jassy, where death lay in wait for him. "We could send a Rumanian brother to bring your wife and your six small children back to Bucharest."

He answered: "The shepherd's duty is to die together with his flock. I know they will kill me, but I cannot abandon my brethren. I am returning to Jassy."

A few days after his return, on June 28th, 1941, the pogrom broke loose. The number of Jews killed was eleven thousand. Rumanians, too, were killed if they looked like Jews. Christian Jews were also killed by the Fascist authorities and by the incensed populace, who maintained that the country was waging a holy crusade.

Feinstein was among those arrested. He was taken at first to the police prison. Criminals who were in prison at that time have recounted since their release that Feinstein told the Jews not to have any illusions. He knew that they would be killed, and he exhorted them to be converted in order that they might prepare to meet their God.

Thousand of Jews were crammed together in sealed cattle-trucks, and sent off beneath the scorching sun, without a drop of water, with the result that most of them were suffocated. Among these was Feinstein. The few survivors were interned in a concentration camp.

Some of these related how, when Feinstein realized that death was at hand, he turned to a rabbi who was standing near him and said: "It is time for us to sing the psalms!"

He died while the rabbi was reciting the psalms aloud, and Feinstein was explaining what they foretold about Jesus. When death came with suffocation, his head was resting on the rabbi's shoulder. The rabbi himself died only a few minutes later - a Mosaic Jew and a Christian Jew were the victims of the same hatred, the hatred which in Rumania was doubly vile because it masqueraded behind the name of "Christian."

Not a single man from the Jewish-Christian congregation in Jassy survived; all were killed in the pogrom. Only a few girls escaped with their lives.

I have described Feinstein's death - a martyr of the Christian faith who was of the Jewish race.

This outstanding man, who had a shepherd's heart such as I have seldom come across since, played an important role in the spiritual crisis through which I passed.

He used to visit our home and I would talk to him about my sin, and how impossible it was for me to rid myself of it. He explained that Jesus's words, "Judge not," referred not only to other people, but also to myself. "In spiritual matters any form of self-diagnosis is wrong. When you raise your right hand in front of a mirror, the mirror will show you that you are raising your left hand, and when you stand in front of a mirror with your face towards the south, it will show you standing with your face towards the north. Your conscience mirrors your spiritual condition, and for that reason your conscience will distort reality unless it is illuminated by the Holy Spirit.

"The Gospels tell us of two men who went up to the temple to pray: one was a Pharisee, the other a publican. The first man diagnosed himself, and was sincere when he came to the conclusion that he was good because he fasted often, and gave generously to the temple. The other man did the same thing, but he discovered that he was sinful because he lived on ill-gotten gains. The self-diagnosis of both men was wrong. God does not take account of what is seen on the surface, but of what is hidden in the hearts of men. In the depths of his heart the first man was a proud person, condemning others, while the publican was humble, and confessed his sin."

"Don't judge yourself," was the advice Feinstein always gave me. "Don't distress yourself, don't worry yourself about your sin. It is written, 'Take no thought for your soul' [MTT 6:25, in the original Greek version]. The care of the soul is Jesus's concern. Just tell Him quite simply about your sin, and from that moment it will be His concern to deal with it.

"Our own understanding is the hypocrite whom Jesus reproaches for observing the mote in his brother's eye, which is the sin of brother flesh, a result of our heredity, a faulty upbringing, the pressure of social circumstances, the influence of the devil, and a large number of imponderable factors. But the hypocrisy of the understanding lies in the fact that it does not come down from the lofty pinnacle from which it judges all things and all men, in order to observe the beam in its own eye - its false criteria of truth, its selfishness, its passion, its ignorance of condemning oneself, the fact it is not to be trusted. The proof that the beam is in the eye of reason, is that reason cannot remove the mote from its brother's eye, but is merely content to reproach him for it, and make life intolerable for him.

"Try to conquer sin by making an indirect attack on it. In the heart, Satan is strong, because he provides the heart with pleasures. Here it is difficult to overcome him. In the reason he is weak, because here he creates only difficulties. 'Be ye transformed by the renewing of your ~mind~,' says Paul (ROM 12:2). Jesus fought His battle at Golgotha, which in Aramaic means 'The Place of the Skull.' This is where you, too, must fight your battle. Make every thought a captive, in obedience to Christ. Accept Him as the criterion of truth. Superficial truth, which is easily grasped, will not change men's hearts. The daily truth which you ponder deeply, which you constantly chew over until it is transformed within you, will undoubtedly change your life.

"The Talmud tells the story of the rabbi Akiba, who as a young man was both ignorant and profane, and whose intelligence was not fully developed. But he had a wife who had great faith in God and who asked her husband to sanctify himself and become teacher of the law. Akiba used to object: 'But I have no talent for this.' She took him to a well, on the parapet of which the rope had worn away the stonework, so that there was a small depression. 'Can you see this groove in the stone?' she said to him. 'The rope is much softer than the stone, yet for many years it has worn away at the hard stone, and formed a depression. Be like the rope - up and down, up and down, always the same motion: the Scriptures and prayer, the Scriptures and prayer. Even if the heart and mind are as hard as stone, they will eventually be penetrated by the Word of God.'

"Akiba listened to the words of his wife, and became one of the great lights of Judaism; he was finally crowned with a martyr's death. Do as he did! Be zealous in thinking what is right and Christian, and you will not need to run away from sin, for sin will run away from you."

It was thanks to Feinstein, who had a beautiful singing voice that I was for the first time in my life introduced to Bach's hymn "O sacred Heart." The song went straight to my heart.

One afternoon in 1937, the day before Yom-Kippur, the

Jewish day of repentance and fasting, I was in Feinstein's office. My soul was greatly troubled, as indeed it had been from my earliest childhood years. I said to Feinstein: "The demands of Christianity are too extreme, they are impossible to fulfil. It is written in the Bible that he who says that he is Christ's must also live as Jesus lived. But is that possible? It's like asking a wolf to live like a lamb, and then condemning it for not succeeding. Since I have not been Christ through all eternity, since I was not born of a virgin, since I have not had Jesus's especially chose and holy upbringing, since I have no clear perception of spiritual realities, nor do I have His mind, since God's angels are not continually ascending and descending upon me, since I do not live in celibacy, nor am I carpenter - how, then, should I be able to live as He did? Must the snail run like the hare? From the little I have seen of Christians so far, conversion for some means merely making Jesus an interesting subject of conversion; it does not mean that they are converted to be a Jesus in miniature. At any rate I have not seen people of Jesus's type."

Feinstein answered with his inimitable smile: "Don't allow yourself to be guided by what you see, because it is possible that you do not see very well. The Jews who lived two thousand years ago didn't see in Jesus anything that made Him worthy of honour, despite the fact that He was the incarnation of God. Unless a man is born anew he cannot see God's kingdom, even though it is perfectly incarnate in the man who is standing face to face with him.

"But is it not expected of us that we should be like Jesus, that we should live like Him? The verse in St. John's Epistle to which you referred - 'He that saith he abideth in Him ought himself also to walk' (1JN 2:6) - does not make our belief absurd, it is merely a warning to those who go round proudly declaring: 'I am in Christ.'

"There was once a country in which there were two great painters. The country was divided into two: one half of the population preferred one painter, the other part preferred the other. The king of that country was asked to pronounce his verdict. He had the marble hall in his palace divided into two by a curtain; then he summoned the first painter, and ordered him to paint anything he liked on one wall of the hall. He summoned the other painter and ordered him to paint on the opposite wall. The first painter, who was just as talented as he was conceited, immediately set to work and painted a great many beautiful things assisted by his pupils. The painter on the other side was a humble man. He said to his pupils: 'It is foolish for me to try to compete with my excellent rival. I cannot paint as he can. But I shall ask you to do something else. Stay here from morning to evening and polish the marble until it shines.' And so it was done. On one side of the curtain they painted, and on the other side they polished the wall. On the appointed day, the king came to see the work of the two painters. He admired the work of the first, and declared that he had never seen more beautiful pictures. Then he ordered the curtain to be pulled to one side, so that he might see what the other painter had done. He stepped back in amazement. The pictures painted by the first artist were reflected in the marble which had been polished by the other, and their beauty was dazzling. The second painter received the prize.

"The moral of this story is very simple. Only a very proud person could imagine himself capable of living like Jesus. The commandment to live like Jesus did, like all the other commandments in the Bible, was not given to us so that we should fulfill it but merely so that we should understand - as a result of our constantly unsuccessful attempts - that it is impossible for us to accomplish it, and so that it should reveal to us the depth of our sinfulness. We should not attempt to live like Jesus, but we should daily 'polish' our hearts by concentrated meditation and by faith, and then the beauty of Jesus will be reflected in us - it will give a still more beautiful picture than the picture of his own life, because the living Christ, incarnate in a human being who had been broken and had gone astray, is more beautiful than the Christ incarnate born of a virgin."

"No, no!" I cried, with tears in my eyes. "I do not want a Jesus who has been calculated, explained, and believed in, but a real Jesus. And the hope of ever having this Jesus seems to me to be an impossible ideal." So saying, I ran out of Feinstein's office, without taking leave of him.

He ran after me; I could not escape from him. I went into a shop - he followed me inside. He was so insistent that he persuaded me to accompany him that very evening to a prayer meeting which was being held by a small group of Christians in Bucharest, in the hall of the Anglican Mission to the Jews.

There, after most of the congregation had offered up prayers, I was involuntarily lifted up by the Spirit. I was astonished to hear myself for the first time praying aloud in a public gathering. I heard my own words, but they did not seem to be words that I had formulated. They sprang from the depths of my soul, to which as a rule my ego cannot gain access. Proof that the depths had been stirred was the fact that I prayed in Yiddish - the centuries-old language of my people in their suffering, a language which in other circumstances I never spoke.

I consider the eve of Yom-Kippur 1937 as the day of my rebirth, because - this is obvious - the teaching of Jesus cannot be written clearly on a page which already bears some other writing. What is required is a complete break with the past, and a completely new beginning, the starting point of which is a constant and uncompromising siege of one's thinking.

The person who was most astonished at this change, a man who had once been a militant atheist and an active participant in the worst anarchic disturbance, was myself. My will was not free when this change occurred. My hand was forced. Everything is of the grace of God.

I believe that just as there is in nature a biological timetable which governs the time when a young bird has to emerge from its egg and when it has to migrate to another country, and to return at a definite date, and just as there is a biological timetable in man's physical life, so there is a spiritual timetable which is also determined in the same way. For every person who is chosen by God, there is a particular foreordained hour when he discovers the Son of God, who has always been in him but who has waited patiently for the moment when He is to reveal Himself. In that particular hour, internal and external factors, which have been prepared a long time ago, come together in order to produce this rebirth.

~Difficulties with some Christian traditions~

I had determined to be faithful to Jesus. But the man who has made this decision must discover the true face of Jesus among the countless forgeries that have accumulated in the course of time; he must decide for himself on one version of this face, in order to be able to serve Him wholly and entirely, and without doubting that he has chosen the right confession. I was very interested in the difference between the confessions: I was anxious to be well-informed before I commenced my life as a Christian.

But it was not easy to make a choice.

Throughout Church history there has been much vexation of spirit, and striving for riches. In Jassy there is a Greek Orthodox church which is so crammed with golden ikons, candlesticks, and vessels that the only way they have discovered of guarding all this wealth has been not to open the church for services. In this way the words of St. Augustine have been fulfilled when he says that religion has produced riches and fortunes, but the daughters have consumed their mother.

There was striving for fame; there was the blind rage felt by a theologian when he was contradicted or eclipsed by one who was more attractive than himself; there was a storing up of feuds and hatreds which lasted a whole lifetime – even several centuries – without any respect for the beautiful proverb from the Babylonian Talmud: "The sun has sent and the day is clear." The teaching of God has been made into a "crown to glorify oneself with, and a spade to dig with," as the Talmud says. The word of God has been used to promote transient political interests, and to stifle the truth with misdeeds.

The different ways of thinking, which could have led to a very fruitful competition in the study of the word of God if only the royal law, the law of love, had been kept, combined with repulsive sins to replace the Church, the one Church, with many confessions, some of which allow themselves to be guided by the arrogant slogan formulated by Hitler: "Where we are, there is no room for others."

Between the various confessions flow the rivers of blood shed during religious persecutions, not only in the past but also in own generation. During the last war the Rumanian Orthodox Church violently persecuted not only Jews, at the killing of whom priests assisted, but also what they call "sectarians," that is to say, Baptists, Brethren, Adventists and the like, thousands of whom were imprisoned.

The convert seeks in vain for the "the House of the Father," the Church that was founded by Jesus. In its place he finds many other churches with barbarian names, which the one-time carpenter, Jesus, would not even have understood: Catholic, Orthodox, Lutheran, Baptist, and many others.

As far back as the fourth century St. Epiphanius, when he spoke about the Audians - members of a sect, founded by a certain Audius, who insisted that God has a body like that of a man - declared: "It is a terrible thing that a member of the Church should change the name of the Christians while the Church only rejoices when Christians bear the name of Christ and reject all other designations. But instead of bearing the name of Christ, they bear the name of the founder of their sect, and as a sign they have the name of a human being. This is inadmissible."

This warning went unheeded: we still have confessions that bear strange names, and the soul of the bride wanders around like one who has lost her way, while she seeks her bridegroom.

One wonders whether the astronauts would have ventured into space if twenty scientists had submitted their calculations, all with divergent results, and had told them contradictory things from the world of physics. They were launched into space relying on the accurate data of science and mathematics. But how should we fly to the Throne of God, when the trumpets of the different confessions produce such discordant noises, and each one destroys confidence in everything that the others have said?

It was in this labyrinth that I had to find my way.

Let me describe a few episodes. I trust that the reader will forgive me if, in doing so, I cite some examples of human frailty. One of Melanchthon's biographers wrote: "Anyone who considers it shameful to discover anything worth criticizing in great and famous men, entertains too high an opinion of human beings, since God alone is privileged to be faultless. Human nature is incapable of this." As the reader will soon discover, I find a great deal of good, too, in the various confessions and their leaders, just as my experience with rabbis was not always unfavourable.

page 40 CHRIST ON THE JEWISH ROAD

I was once in Sinaia, with one of my brothers-in-law, who was later converted. We were visiting the Orthodox monasteries in the town. It was the day after Easter Monday. We knocked at one of the gates, and an old monk admitted us.

"What do you want?" he asked.

"Father, we have come to ask what we must do to be saved."

"You are unlucky, because today of all days I have drunk too much."

"It is Easter, Father. Have you not found a worthier way of celebrating Easter than by getting drunk?" I asked, no longer concerned with my original errand, which was to seek enlightenment from him.

"Young man," the monk answered, with a merry laugh, "I have drunk according to the commandment of the Scriptures, since I have not drunk alone but in company with two or three other brethren. For it is written that 'where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them,' as the Saviour said."

I had come to learn, but I was now compelled to assume the role of teacher, and to teach him the most elementary things.

"Father, I believe that when Jesus said that He would be together with His people, where two or three were gathered, He was referring to a gathering of people who had come to do good deeds or to pray, not to get drunk."

With a humility which impressed me, he answered: "Do you know, young man, you are right?" and he invited us into his cell, as we had been standing talking on the threshold.

This monk was a man accustomed to drinking. The wine had not gone to his head, and it was possible to talk to him.

I repeated my question: "What should I do to be saved?"

"Are you rich?"

"I am neither rich nor poor. I have what I need. But why do you ask?"

"The rich man is easily saved. He gives money to the Church and to the needy, and he goes to Heaven. But it is difficult for a poor man to be saved, since he has nothing to give."

The man to whom I had gone in order to learn the way of Jesus was saying the very opposite of what Jesus had taught.

page 41 CHRIST ON THE JEWISH ROAD

I asked him: "But what role does Jesus play in our salvation?"

He answered: "I know nothing about that."

Once again I asked: "But Father, do you not say in the liturgy: 'This is my blood, the blood of the new covenant, which is shed for many for the forgiveness of sins'? Is it not true that the blood the Saviour shed on the Cross cleanses us of our sins?"

The old monk started up and exclaimed: "Do you know, young man, you are very enlightened?"

There was obviously no point in asking him to guide me. A Christian Jew, who was still trying to find the way, had helped the old monk to take the first steps along this very road.

I was in the office of Bishop X. At his side were two of his advisers, priests. I told him who I was, and of my wish to be guided in the labyrinth of the many different confessions.

When he heard that I was a Jew, the bishop burst out laughing: "Ha, ha, ha. Dumb Jew! Have you ever heard a more presumptuous dirty Jew, wanting to be a Christian?" The two priests at his side joined deferentially in his laughter.

I was prepared for a reception of this kind. Feinstein had told me of another bishop who raised his crozier to strike him when he heard that he was a Christian Jew.

This was not surprising. Bishops and priests had been nourished on the so-called holy tradition, on the writings of the Church fathers; that is, if they had ever read them. But many of the "holy Church fathers," often so-called quite fraudulently, were rabid anti-Semites.

St. Cyril personally conducted a pogrom against the Jews. The houses of Jews were destroyed, and their inhabitants driven out of Alexandria. As an excuse for this "holy" bishop, it may be mentioned that he did not persecute only Jews: he behaved just as outrageously against his own colleagues in his see. He was also involved in the murder of the philosopher Hypatia in a church.

St. John Chrysostom declared: "I know that a great many Christians have a certain reverence for the Jews and their ceremonies. For this reason I consider it my duty to root out opinions of this kind, which are fraught with danger. I have previously declared that the synagogue is worth no more than a theatre." He then proceeds to call the synagogue "a whorehouse," "a den of thieves," and so on, and concludes: "In their shamelessness and greed the Jews exceed even the pigs and the goats ... The Jews are possessed of demons and delivered into the hands of unclean spirits. Instead of greeting them and doing them the honour of addressing a few words to them, you must turn your backs on them, and avoid them like the pestilence and a plague to humanity."

St. Ambrose insisted that the Jews, as the enemies of Christ, cannot claim just treatment - they are not under the protection of the law. Ambrose threatened to excommunicate the Emperor if he sided with some Jews who had been unjustly treated. The mild Bernard of Clairvaux was furious, and lodged an official protest, when Anacletus II was elected Pope, because one of his grandparents had been a Jew. The doctrine held by another Church father is briefly set out in the Abb, Gayragand's book on ~The Antisemitism of St. Thomas Aquinas~: "The Jew is the enemy of Jesus. In a Christian country Jews must be treated as a foreign and hostile race, and must be deprived of every political right accorded to the citizens. They must, however, be allowed to practise their religion without being punished for it, since they are living testimonies to our Lord's suffering. For this reason they are scattered about in all the countries of the world, suffering just punishment for their terrible crime, so that they can witness to our redemption." Until recently, every Good Friday worshippers in the Catholic Church prayed for the "perfidious Jews." This formula has now been omitted from Roman Catholic services, but in the anti-Semitic writings of their Church fathers future priests continue to imbibe this doctrine.

It was normal for the disciples of the "holy" father to laugh at me. In so doing they were following in the footsteps of their teachers.

I rose from the chair in which I was sitting, strode over to the bishop's desk, and struck it with my clenched fist. "Aren't you ashamed of yourself? You are a Christian bishop, and yet you laugh at a Jew because he believes in Jesus. What nationality was Jesus? And His Mother? And the Apostles? You fill your churches with pictures of 'dirty' Jews, yet you laugh at Jews. Do you not fear God?"

The bishop was a little man, and I am very tall. When his advisers saw me gesticulating violently, they were afraid that I might strike him, and they got ready to restrain me. But the bishop waved them aside, and called out: "Stop! Let him be! There is good in this young man. I wish to speak with him."

The conversation which then ensued was calm. He congratulated me on the new path on which I had set my feet. He was also anxious that I should win over other Jews to Christ. But there would have been no point in asking him in any detail about this path.

The Orthodox priest in the parish to which I belonged was sitting in the yard in front of his house. When I told him I was a Jew who believed in Jesus, he set his dogs on me.

I could describe numerous encounters of this kind with Orthodox priests, but it would be pointless. Such men have no right to the title of shepherd, instituted by Jesus to lead the Church of Christ. Anyway, I am convinced that Jesus never instituted a separate clergy. All disciples of Jesus are priests.

I have studied the dogma taught by the Greek Orthodox Church, and have found that it contains a great many falsehoods. Personally, it would never have occurred to me to join this Church. Its ritual used at the baptism of a Jew compels the convert to spit three times and declare: "I deny, curse and spit on Jews," in other words on his own parents, brothers and sisters and all his family. I know of cases where the person who was being baptized fainted during the ceremony when compelled to pronounce this curse. One Jewish man was quite incapable of uttering a word.

Furthermore, as soon as the Fascist regime had been established in Rumania, the Holy Synod of the Greek Orthodox Church declared that no Jew should be received into the Church. What wretched person can have placed this barrier in the way of the Jews, to prevent them entering the Church of Jesus? He, after all, once said: "I am not sent but to the lost sheep of the house of Israel" (MTT 15:24). In fairness, I must say that I have since met Orthodox priests who were saints, but my early experiences were bad.

In my search for the right Church the facts which proved to my satisfaction which was not the true Church proved an important step in the right direction.

People call me a Lutheran. The Lutheran Church is a remarkable one, a Church which exists against the wishes of the man who founded it.

This is what Luther wrote: "To establish and to follow many sects and multitudes in the faith is tantamount to dividing God into many gods, and to giving Him many names. A sect is nothing but a schism, which is forbidden by God, from the true, universal, invisible Church, an act committed by an earthly being. I do not approve of the doctrine and the people that are called Lutheran, and yet I must suffer that God's word should be mocked in this way by my name. I pray that my name may not be mentioned, and that men should call themselves not Lutherans but Christians. Why should I, a putrid bag filled with maggots, deserve that the Children of Christ should bear my wretched name? No one must say: 'I am a Lutheran' or 'I am a Papist,' for neither Luther nor the Pope died for us, and neither of them was our teacher, but Christ alone was our teacher. For this reason we should call ourselves Christians."

In his table talks he said: "Let the Devil take Luther, if he can. Christ shall live."

Nevertheless, the Lutheran Church exists, and from Luther it has inherited anti-Semitic doctrines which come to light as soon as appropriate conditions exist.

You cannot ask a Jew to be pro-Hitler. How can you expect him to be a Lutheran, when Luther wrote in a letter to his wife, who also despised the Jews profoundly: "I must now deal with the expulsion of the Jews. Count Albrecht is their enemy, and he has also opposed them, but as yet no one is dealing with them. If it is God's will, I shall assist Count Albrecht from the pulpit, and I too shall oppose them. I am drinking Naumburger beer ... and I like it very much."

page 45 CHRIST ON THE JEWISH ROAD

I have selected a mild passage; there are others in which he openly incites his readers to kill Jews - just as he had incited them to kill Catholics, peasants and Anabaptists. He criticized the Inquisition because it had not subjected his former friend Thomas Mnzer, to sufficient torture.

When I was converted, the bishop of the Lutheran Church in Rumania was a pro-Hitler man the name of St„del, who preached a combination of Christianity, racialism and National Socialism. Anyone who entered the vestry of a Lutheran church was greeted with a "Heil Hitler" - "Heil to the murderer of millions of Jews."

In truth, this Church did not represent Christ either.

The Lutheran churches in Scandinavia and Holland rose gallantly to the occasion during the difficult years experienced by the Jews, and this is to their credit. But in doing so they were obeying another Luther.

Luther was something of a split personality. He also wrote some very beautiful things about the Jews: "We should not treat the Jews so badly, because among them are future Christians. If we were to live in a Christian manner and bring them to Christ with goodness, this would be the right thing to do. Who will become a Christian when he sees Christians acting in such an unchristian manner towards men? Not so, dear Christians. Let us tell them the truth with goodness. If they do not want it, give them peace. We give peace to so many Christians who do not care about Christ and do not listen to His words ... If I had been a Jew and had seen such fools and idiots leading and teaching the Christian faith, I would rather have become a pig than a Christian. If the apostles, who also were Jews, had treated us, the Gentiles, as we treat the Jews, no Gentile would ever become a Christian."

I will not tell of my experiences with Catholicism, which is changing so much just now, even beyond what Luther would have hoped. The Second Vatican Council has absolved the Jews of the guilt of killing Jesus. The Crucified had absolved them long before with the words, "No man taketh [my life] from me, but I lay it down of myself" (John 10.18). The fathers of the Vatican Council would have done better to have apologized for killing the Jews over the centuries. To be fair, I should add that it is not only Christians who have hated and killed Jews. It has also sometimes been the other way round. Jews such as Trotsky in Russia, Rakosi in Hungary and Ana Pauker in Rumania killed many Christians, though not from religious motives. And in any case, hatred on one side is no excuse for hatred on the other.

As time went on, all the great Christian confessions seemed to me to be a Babel. They bore no resemblance to the Church that Jesus left behind, as described in the Acts of the Apostles: "And the multitude of them that believed were of one heart and of one soul: neither said any of them that ought of the things which he possessed was his own; but they had all things common. And with great power gave the apostles witness of the resurrection of the Lord Jesus, and great grace was upon them all. Neither was there any among them that lacked: for as many as were possessors of lands and houses sold them, and brought the prices of the things that were sold, and laid them down at the apostles' feet: and distribution was made unto every man according as he had need" (ACT 4:32-35).

"And they continued steadfastly in the apostles' doctrine and fellowship, and in breaking of bread, and in prayers. And fear came upon every soul: and many wonders and signs were done by the apostles ... And they, continuing daily with one accord in the temple, and breaking bread from house to house, did eat their meat with gladness and singleness of heart, praising God, and having favour with all the people. And the Lord added to the church daily such as should be saved" (ACT 2:42-43, 46-47).

The great confessions are not the historical successors of the first Church. But the glorious beams from the light of Jesus penetrate even the densest cloud. The gospel breaks through the obstacles which these confessions have set up, and brings salvation to men and women, even to those who follow an erroneous religious system. But the great church congregations cannot prove effective instruments for the salvation of Israel. Israel will never come to Christ through them.

I felt, and still feel, at home in pietistic circles. Even before I was familiar with the Protestant doctrine of the invisible Church,

I felt a sense of brotherhood with every child of God who had been born anew.

I found brothers and sisters of this kind in "The Army of the Lord," a religious movement within the Orthodox Church. I have met brethren in the faith among Roman Catholic priests and laymen who loved Christ with all their heart, and who did things which I considered wrong, merely because they thought Jesus had prescribed them. In the same way I have met many brethren in the Lutheran Church, and in other Protestant denominations.

Could I ever forget the Greek Orthodox Archimandrite Scriban, who throughout the most violent anti-Semitic persecutions was ready day and night to help us, intervening on our behalf on countless occasions? This man, who had been head of the theological seminary, and most of whose former students were now priests in Bucharest, rebuked those at the head of the Ministry of Culture whenever they made life difficult for us, dismissing us as "dirty Jews." "Is this what I taught you?" he would ask. "Was not Jesus, too, a 'dirty Jew'? And was not the Mother of our Lord a 'dirty Jewess'?"

Among the Lutherans, could I ever forget Bishop Friedrich Mller, the staunch friend of Christian Jews? Or the Norwegian Lutheran clergyman Magne Solheim, head of the Norwegian Israel Mission in Rumania, whose life consisted of nothing but preaching the Word of Christ to the Jews from morning till night, and exerting every effort to help them in their hour of misery?

I have no space to mention the many who acted as these did.

God's children, no matter to what denominations they belonged, were close to me. But I have felt most at my ease among those who have left the great denominations. The hard facts I discovered in the big denominations destroyed the picture of Christ which I had in my heart: I rediscovered this picture in the small Christian groups.

That they were not numerous was no disadvantage as far as I was concerned. I knew that God looks at the heart of man, and not at the number of men. Gregory of Nazianzus declared: "God hath no delight in the majority. Men may be counted by their thousands, but God counts those who accept salvation. Men count insignificant dust, He the instruments of grace."

The pietistic circles which exist within the large denominations and in the sects are the only Christian groups in Rumania whose hands are not soiled with Jewish blood. During the persecutions they assisted, sheltered and rescued Jews. With them it is easiest and best to preach the gospel of Christ to the Jews.

But even among them there were disputes. People of profound faith disagreed among themselves on trivial interpretations of Bible texts.

Believers quarrel over things about which they really know nothing. I have heard that in the Middle Ages there were two believers who were condemned by the Inquisition to be burnt at the stake. They asked to be bound back to back, so that they should not look one another in the eye, as each of them regarded the other as a heretic.

When I heard this story, I thought it was an exaggerated legend. Later on, in prison, I saw people who gave their lives for the same gentle Jesus, but who would not even say "Good morning" to one another, because they belonged to different confessions, or to two different groups within the same confession. We all allow such things to be done, without realizing how difficult it will be for us to give an account of the sin we have committed, the sin of making it difficult for those who seek the truth to find it.

I, and the other Jews with me, were almost in despair when we tried to find our way through the chaos of religious differences.

So far I have not discovered a single Christian organization which is qualified to tackle the task of preparing the world for the Kingdom of God, and making disciples of all nations. Not a single one of them takes this task seriously, striving towards it according to a definite strategic plan. Many of their efforts are wasted in trivial everyday affairs.

The grace of God helped us to overcome these difficulties, prevented us from losing our way in petty things, and helped us to understand the most important passages in the New Testament, which are so clear, and which alone by their teaching and the practice of this teaching, can bring the Jews to Christ:

page 49 CHRIST ON THE JEWISH ROAD

"Love is the fulfilling of the law" (ROM 13:10).

"For all the law is fulfilled in one word, even in this: Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself" (GAL 5:14).

"Therefore all things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them: for this is the law and the prophets" (MTT 7:12).

"Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind. This is the first and great commandment. And the second is like unto it, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets" (MTT 22:37-40).

Despite the fact that the Bible contains numerous passages which state that God commanded circumcision, we know that Paul rejected these holy words, declared the commandment null and void, and wrote: "For in Christ Jesus neither circumcision availeth any thing, nor uncircumcision, but a new creature" (GAL 6:15).

Should not we, too, be in a position to maintain that the various doctrines which separate us, although they are based on important passages in the Bible, really mean nothing? Instead, we must become "new creatures," people who rebuild their lives on the principle of love, the principle which Jesus gave us an example to follow. If Luther was able to write as much as four centuries ago: "Jesus did not command us to confess, but gave us all liberty, so that he who so desired could avail himself of confession ... You will not be condemned by God if you do not confess ... All sacraments must be free; he who does not desire to take the Holy Communion, is entitled by God not to do so," how much more should we in the twentieth century be able to distinguish what is most important in the doctrine of the Bible - love - from what is less important!

The spiritual condition of most Jews, especially young people, may be described as religious indifference. Our theological discussions will surely not help to stir up enthusiasm in them. Our sermons leave them indifferent. Dogmas do not move their hearts.

But it is not in these dogmas that Christianity if to be found.

The divine teacher declared that love was the sign by which

His disciples should be recognized. Love leaves no normal person indifferent. The Jews, more than any other people, are thirsting for love. If love were our religion, then their indifference would melt away.

For my own part, after seeking long, to right and left, I have found what I am seeking: my confession is love. My brothers and sisters are all those who love one another, no matter to what denomination they belong. My Lord is Jesus, because He is the incarnation of love. "God is love" and "every one that loveth is born of God" (1JN 4:8,7).

The Cross of Christ demonstrates the catastrophic results of violating the law of love. Hate crucified truth and the Deity. But at the same time the Cross of Christ is an expression of God's love. Because He loves, Christ takes upon Himself the sins of His murderers, and gives them opportunity of starting life afresh. This truth, of which I have been allowed to partake, has given me freedom with regard to Christian confessions. I can decide as I like whether I wish or do not wish to join any one of them. They provide the background against which I can exercise the religion of Christ, the religion of love. I am now in a position to worship in churches and assemblies belonging to all confessions. On one and the same day I have preached to Orthodox, Catholics, Lutherans and Pentecostals.

If you want the truth, you must renounce attitudes and opinions, for every attitude and opinion is also a blind spot which makes you quite incapable of understanding other views and opinions apart from your own. Reality knows itself, because their is spirit in it. Christ is the truth, He is the reality, as it knows itself, without being distorted by being looked at through prisms or from different angles.

Most of the Christian Jews who have subsequently comprised our congregation, have adopted the same interdenominational attitude, despite the fact that our church was formally Lutheran. It was known as "The Church of Love." Pastor Solheim's greeting was "Love." We were the only church in Rumania which - long before the modern ecumenical trend - had men of all denominations kneeling together at the Communion rail.

~I am baptized and my wife is won for the Lord~

In my wife I have truly found what the Bible describes as "a helper who is his like." There is a certain value in celibacy, but I have also noticed that the competence of many labourers in God's vineyard has been to a large extent due to the fact that they had found an excellent helpmeet in their wives.

St. John Chrysostom cannot have known our wives, otherwise this holy father could never have recorded the monstrous statement that "woman is a necessary evil and a deadly fascination."

It is obvious that a woman is a worthy helpmeet if her husband does not browbeat her. We could all take Adam as an example of a good husband. Because of Eve, he lost a paradise, but he did not say a word of reproach to her - whereas we abuse our wives for the merest trifle.

At first, I had difficulties with my wife. When I left home to be baptized, she wanted to commit suicide. My mother fainted when she heard of my decision. Thus I grievously offended two beloved persons when I went to receive my baptism.

At that time I thought it right; I should not advise anyone now to behave in the same way. If one is to witness and to suffer for Christ, it is not right to renounce this for the sake of another person. But some Jews are not so prejudiced against Jesus as they are against baptism. They have too many painful memories of the time when the Inquisition dragged the Jews by their beards to baptism, under the threat of death. They remember so often that their forefathers cut the throats of their own children, after pronouncing a blessing, in order to save them in this way from forced baptism. All to many Jews allowed themselves to be baptized in order to deny their people. This resulted in an emotional antipathy which can be easily understood. I once knew an old Jewess, who was a faithful follower of Jesus, but who had a strong antipathy against pronouncing the word "baptism." She used to say: "I still have to fulfill this matter."

Complexes of this kind must be carefully dealt with. The duty to love is greater than the duty to be baptized. A person should never be in a hurry to be baptized, before his family is familiar with the idea, and realizes what it involves and means. The baptism should not be given unnecessary publicity. We should witness not for the sign of baptism, but for Him who gave it to us. It is wrong for a missionary to make it a point of honour to baptize as many Jews as possible.

But at that time I was of a different mind. I went to my baptism, leaving behind a weeping wife and a sorrowing mother.

I cannot say into what confession I was baptized. My baptism took place in the chapel of the Lutheran Norwegian Israel Mission, the head of which was a Free Church Christian, Feinstein. The act of baptism was carried out by Brother Ellison, who had been an Anglican priest, but had left that Church after being baptized a second time as an adult. He continued nevertheless to conduct services in the Anglican mission. Chaos has become a commonplace in Christianity, as Jesus's last plea is ignored: "I pray ... that they all may be one" (JHN 17:21).

It was sufficient for me to know that Ellison was a true-hearted disciple of Jesus, as were the others who assisted at my baptism.

Two other Jews were baptized with me. One of them, Blitzstein, was a former Communist. The other was a much abused man. He was small of stature, and was married to a wife twice his size, who would assault him every Sunday on his return from the service. The wretched man continued to attend our meetings, and was regularly beaten up. After his baptism I saw to it that his hair was thoroughly dried in front of the stove, so that she should not realize that he had been baptized. Had she guessed, she would almost certainly have killed him.

One Sunday, late at night after he had gone to bed, Feinstein heard a knock at his door, and when he opened it he was this brother standing there, as pale as a ghost. He asked what had happened. The man answered, completely heartbroken: "I have forfeited my salvation. Today my wife beat me more than ever before. I could stand it no longer, and I slapped her face." With a twinkle in his eye, Feinstein replied: "Well, seeing you have forfeited your salvation, why didn't you at least give her a proper beating, so that she would have something to remember you by?" Later on, this Xantippe was also baptized, but she did not remain steadfast in the faith.

Our baptism took place in a very cordial atmosphere. Ellison, who was of a high spirituality, warned us: "You have now received robes of white, and it is your duty to keep them pure." Feinstein, who was more down-to-earth in his approach, also preached: "You are human beings, and you will still sin like all human beings. You will not keep your robes white, but when you do sin, go immediately to Jesus so that He can cleanse you of your stains."

After the ceremony was over, late that evening when everyone had gone to bed, I was unable to sleep. That night I read "The Mysteries of the Cross" by Tohoyiko Kagawa, a Japanese Christian who had devoted not only his entire fortune, but [also] his life and all his knowledge, to help the poor of Japan.

The house where my baptism took place is no longer a chapel. The Communist State now uses it for an entirely different purpose. I am sad to think that I have not been able to see it for many years. Saint Louis, King of France, used to make an annual pilgrimage to the village church at Poissy, where he had been baptized. He used to say: "In this place I received the Crown of Life, while in Rheims I received the royal crown - which has only occasioned me much labour and many cares."

When I returned home after my baptism, I found that my wife had altered. During my absence she had carefully examined her life, and had now taken a big step forward. I still took her with me to secular gatherings, whenever she wanted to go, but she felt more and more out of place there. Late one evening, on our return from a party of this kind, she said to me: "I should like to wake the pastor, so that he can baptize me, and cleanse me of all my impurity."

Not long after this, Ellison baptized her, too. She has been compelled to suffer a great deal since that time. She spent some years in prison; she was separated from her husband for as many years as Jacob served for Rachel. All the sufferings and sorrows of the Christians were hers, too, but she considered that all her worries had been of a few days' duration, because she loved.

2 JEWS WHO WITNESSED FOR CHRIST

~Clarutza~

At the time of my conversion there were small groups of Christian Jews in Bucharest, Galatz, Jassy and other towns. Among them were souls who had reached a very high spiritual level.

In Bucharest, the Anglican Church Mission was active under the guidance of the Reverend J. Adeney, a clergyman with a rare depth of faith and spirit of sacrifice.

Gradually the number of Christian Jews grew. The first soul I won for the Lord was Clarutza, a young girl of about sixteen. Her great-grandfather had been a Greek Orthodox priest, who had been converted to Mosaic Judaism during a movement of Judaizers which originated in the Ukraine at the beginning of the last century. (A similar movement exists to this day in Rumania among peasants who originally belonged to a branch of the Adventists. Native Rumanian peasants are circumcised and worship in the synagogues with a more burning zeal than the Jews, many of whom, truth to say, show no particular enthusiasm in carrying out their religious duties.)

This girl had been chosen by God to make good her great-grandfather's error, by becoming a Christian. As soon as she started attending our meetings, her parents began to persecute her. They forbade her to meet with us. Then she decided to start a hunger strike. She refused to eat until she was allowed to go and visit her brethren in the faith. She fasted for three days; on the fourth day, when her parents saw how weak she had become, they told her she was free to go. "Not at all," she answered. "I shall continue my hunger strike, and I shall not go until you come with me." After she had fasted for another day, her parents yielded on this point too, and from then on they regularly accompanied her to our meetings.

Clarutza was young in the faith; but I, her spiritual father, was also young in the faith. I, who had not yet been cured myself, began to cure others. It was bound to have consequences.

One day, while she was having a meal at our house, she suddenly asked: "Brother, do you take a ticket in the lottery?" I had a ticket in my pocket, but for a long time I had been engaged in a spiritual struggle, because an inner voice had told me that God's children are not allowed to indulge in a game of chance - while at the same time the prospect of winning a large sum tempted me considerably. My conscience had not been appeased. Before I had time to consider, the answer came from my lips: "No," when I should have said "Yes." This was not the only lie I told at this time. Lying had become second nature to me, and even after I had been converted it played many tricks on me.

How I wished I could unsay the lie that had escaped my lips, but it was no longer possible. Never in my life have I regretted things I have not said, but I have often regretted words I have said. It is a good thing to keep the door locked, and not to let a word slip out. The man who does not take care to reduce the volume of his spoken words, has not been converted.

Pride, and maybe fear too, fear of undermining the confidence which this young girl had in me, prevented me from putting things right immediately. For a week afterwards I found it impossible to pray. When I knelt down to recite "Our Father," I seemed to hear a voice answering: "Liar."

It is said that when Roman general Titus, who afterwards became Emperor, was besieging Jerusalem in the year A.D. 71, and starvation and plague broke out in the city, the rabbi Johanan ben Zacai, one of the Jewish leaders, broke through the lines and made his way to Titus's tent, where he knelt before the general and said: "Lord, spare this city, where there are so many women and innocent children!" Titus answered: "You are lying, old rabbi!" - "But what lie have I told?" the old man asked in astonishment. "The lie," answered Titus, "is the first word you said. You called me 'Lord.' If I am Lord, why do you not open the gates of the city and receive me with triumphal arches and flowers? If I am Lord, why do you not obey me?"

In the same way, the first word we offer in our prayers is a lie. We say "Father" to Him whose commandments we do not fulfil. We lie, although the Father offers us the truth.

In the anguish of my soul, I went to Tudor Popescu, who at that time as the "senior" believer among us in Rumania. He had once been an Orthodox priest, but like Luther he had had the courage to oppose his Church's hierarchy, and to preach the true gospel. For this reason he had been expelled from the Church.

But thousands of believers followed him, and he was now a leading personality in Christian circles in Rumania. He was a sincere friend of Christian Jews, and he preached to the Jews with great blessing.

I told this old brother of my affliction, and asked him what I should do. I told him of my fear that if I confessed to the girl that I had lied to her - I who had planted the seed of the love of Christ in her - then perhaps she would lose her faith.

Tudor Popescu answered: "You are right to be afraid. The least sin a man commits may prove a stumbling-block to another soul, and condemn that soul to perdition. For this reason you must be more vigilant another time. Nevertheless, my advice is that you should simply confess to her that you have lied. If, as a consequence of this, the girl loses her faith, then this will show that she was not one of the chosen ones of the Lord. You, on the other hand, will continue in the way of the Lord, fulfilling His commandments."

This experience revealed to me how profitable it is for believers to confess their sins not only to God, but also to a wise brother, who can give them advice. The biblical word for confession is ~exomologeo~, which means "to confess outwardly." It is not wise for us to wallow in our own sin, and allow it to remain within us until it chokes our spiritual life.

I called Clarutza to me; I placed her in a comfortable chair facing me, told her what had happened, and asked her humbly to forgive me. She listened earnestly, and said: "This time I shall forgive you, but you must not do it again."

Full of joy that the burden had fallen from me, I related this to all who were present at the meeting the following Sunday. Immediately, one after the other, Christian Jews stood up and confessed various lies, dishonesties, and thefts, and this confession proved a great blessing to us all.

If a believer from another nation had been present and heard all these confessions, he would have received a very poor impression of the moral standard of the Christian Jews - and he would have been right.

In judging the moral condition of Christian Jews, one should first consider what is its cause. The great Christian church communities, with their many faults, have one indisputable good - they educate men and women in the belief that Christ is the Saviour. If a longing for God is aroused in the average Rumanian, Frenchman or German, he should have no problem in finding the road that leads to God. It is quite natural for him to turn to Christ as the Saviour. It would not occur to him to have to make a choice between Christ, Krishna or Mohammed.

Those who have not had the advantage of being born of Christian parents are in an entirely different situation. When a longing for God is aroused in them, they are offered the way of their own religious tradition - Mosaic, Mohammedan, Buddhist or Hindu. If they hear the gospel, a large proportion of their spiritual energy must be employed in overcoming the old prejudices against Christianity and the love of the religion into which they were born. They must overcome great intellectual difficulties before they can accept what must appear sheer madness to the human mind and logic - that my sins have been atoned for by the death of a carpenter on a cross two thousand years ago; because this carpenter, who made glue and doors, and sold his goods, just as all carpenters do, was really God, incarnate in man. And what is more, those who believe in Him are regarded by God not as sinners who have been forgiven, but as though they had never sinned. In the sight of God they are regarded as though they had been as obedient to His commandments as Jesus Christ himself, says the Heidelberg Catechism.

Still more spiritual energy is wasted when a Jew becomes a Protestant, because no one Protestant speaks with sufficient authority, and you cannot therefore simply follow in his footsteps. From the pulpit and in their writings Protestants fight against other Protestants. What one says is contradicted by others. Thus a Jew inevitably wastes a great deal of his spiritual energy before he discovers the truth. People who are Christian by birth are saved a great deal of this trouble.

No man, however, has unlimited stores of spiritual energy. The more energy he spends on one thing, the less he has left for anything else. The consumption of spiritual energy which is required to liberate him from traditional emotions derived from the religion of his people, and to solve the intellectual difficulties that face him, is so great that little is left for the struggle on the moral front.

Anyone who reads the Epistles of Paul carefully will note that this was the situation among the converts in the first congregations. Even Paul himself, a great believer, complained about his thorn in the flesh. [2CO 12:7 Dido]

The low moral standards of Christian Jews, of converts from other non-Christian religions and from atheism must be understood and accepted as an inevitable reality. The strong souls, those who have reached a high moral level - some because they have centuries of Christian influence behind them - must patiently and lovingly welcome the weaker brethren who are making their first steps on the new road of love. They belong to a race which for two thousand years has been separated from its Lord. Older Christians must not be frightened by the many and grievous lapses which the Jewish Christians suffer, nor by any relapse.

Clarutza gave us great joy.

Once she went with us to the summer resort of Sinaia. I went to call on the abbot of the monastery, and asked for permission to sell gospels and other Christian literature outside the church on Sunday morning. He was far too lazy to investigate whether our literature was Orthodox or not. The Greek Orthodox Church compared to the Roman Catholic Church, is like a village without any dogs. Its priests have fallen asleep. This allows great scope for evangelical work within its walls - occasionally, too, under the protection of its leaders, who take no interest in what is going on under their roof. So we set up a stall with Protestant literature right in front of the church entrance, where those who came to worship at this time of year belonged to the ,lite of Rumania, since Sinaia was the King's summer residence.

Our stall was surrounded by a great crowd. They were astonished, having never seen a gospel, because the Greek Orthodox Church does not place these books in the hands of believers. I had copies of St. John's Gospel, beautifully bound. Churchgoers, even monks, asked whether it had been written by John the Baptist, of whom they had heard. Clarutza stood by my side, and our books sold like hot cakes; we could hardly satisfy the demand.

On several occasions a police constable patrolled the fringe of the crowd. We looked like suspicious characters. It is a highly debatable point whether all criminals have typical characteristics, but at that time in Rumania one was justified in assuming that faces so typically Jewish obviously suggested that a crime was in the offing; and the two of us looked decidedly Jewish.

The police constable came nearer, and asked me politely what my name was. I answered him pointedly: "Richard Wurmbrand." He was somewhat taken aback, as it sounded German. It was a name I might well have borne in common with any of Hitler's supporters. He retired, with a salute.

A little further off he paused, and looked back at us. Our faces were hardly what he would have described as typically Aryan. He approached once again, and asked us to produce our identity cards. This was our undoing. At that time our identity cards specified our ethnic origins; and we were guilty of having the same ethnic origins as Jesus, whom the policeman, too, worshipped.

It is hard to describe the uproar that followed. He started to shout at the top of his voice: "These dirty Jews have desecrated our church and our gospel!" A crowd soon gathered. When the people inside the church heard the noise, they came out, and when they heard that the gospel had been desecrated by Jews they demanded their money back, as they refused to read anything written by a Jew. The hubbub increased. One Orthodox lady who knew us, had the courage to stand up in public and call out aloud to those who were standing on the church steps: "You should be ashamed of yourselves! Instead of rejoicing with Jews who belong to the same people as Jesus, who love Him, and give us His gospel, which our priests have not given us, you are picking a quarrel with these innocent people!" The others refused to listen to her; the abbot, to whom we had appealed, excused himself and vanished. The result was that we were arrested, and accused of the serious offence of daring to sell Christian literature, that is, gospels written by Jews, despite the fact that we were Jews.

We were taken to the police station. As it was Sunday morning there was only one officer there, and we were left in his charge. He told us that the police inspector would arrive and determine our fate, and handed us over to a third person, omitting to tell him that we were under arrest. The telephone rang, summoning him to the scene of a traffic accident, which left only Clarutza and myself, and a junior constable who did not know why we were there. I asked Clarutza: "Are you frightened?" – "Far from it," she replied. "I am enjoying myself. It is lovely to have an experience of this kind with Jesus." Calmly we awaited the arrival of the police inspector.

When he arrived, without asking the permission of the constable, I went up to him. I introduced myself, without mentioning that I was a Jew, or that I had been arrested. I told him: "I've come to sell religious literature in your town, and the I want to ask your permission first." "Have you a permit from the Ministry of Culture?" he asked me. "No," I answered. "Then I'm afraid you cannot sell your literature," the inspector declared. I said: "Then I'll take my literature with me and go." "Very good," he said, instructing the constable accordingly.

Without waiting for him to say any more, we disappeared. We stopped the first taxi and left Sinaia. Later on, we had many a good laugh when we thought of the face the inspector must have made when he discovered that we had already sold our literature and had been under arrest.

Clarutza was baptized. Shortly after her baptism she emigrated with her parents to the Soviet Union, to escape from Fascism, which was then flourishing in Rumania. She wrote to us from Russia. Not long afterwards, the Fascists penetrated deep into Russian territory. The Rumanian brethren, who were of one mind and heart with us, went to look for her in the ghettoes that were set up by the Hitlerites. In answer to our prayer the Greek Orthodox Bishop Antim Nica and other monks went through the ghettoes, giving help to the Jews, an act of mercy that might well have cost their lives. They found no trace of Clarutza.

~Alba~

Life had dragged Alba into the mire of sin. But Christ saved her while she was still a young girl, perhaps about twenty years old. Seldom have I met such an ardent soul as this daughter of Israel.

One day she came to see me, and said: "Brother, you cannot guess where I have been." I knew that she did unusual things, and I was prepared for anything. "Brother, I've been to see the renowned Rabbi X."

"What should you want of him?"

"I told him I was a great sinner, and asked him what I should do to be saved. He was not used to questions of this kind, but looked at me in astonishment over his glasses, and said: 'If up till now you have done many evil things, then from now on you must do good things.' I said: 'For the simple reason that God has given me this day as a gift, I owe it to Him to do as many good deeds as possible. But how can the good that I do today atone for the evil I did yesterday? This will not appease my conscience. What can I do?' The rabbi answered: 'The only thing I can tell you to do is to do good.' I then put this question to him: 'Is it not true that the blood shed by Jesus on the Cross cleanses me of my former sin?' The rabbi, who had grown suspicious, answered with another question: 'Is it not true that you have come from Wurmbrand?' 'Yes,' I answered, 'I have come from him. He preaches that the sacrifice which Jesus made on the Cross purifies us from all our sins, and I have come to ask you whether what he preaches is true.' Shaking his head, the rabbi replied: 'Beliefs differ. Some believe in Moses, others in Jesus, others in the Buddha or Mohammed. Everyone according to his wish.' 'No,' I answered, 'Jesus cannot be compared with any of the founders of other religions. It is written of Jesus in the Song of Solomon: "My beloved is the chiefest among ten thousand" (SOS 5:10). All honour to all the founders of the great religions: they are not Jesus's competitors. Jesus cannot be rivalled. The Scriptures call them the Saviour's companions, as in the SOS 1:7, but Jesus is unique among them.'"

Such was Alba.

She was always present at the street meetings which we held at that time, and which in Rumania were an entirely new and unusual phenomenon. She was tireless in the work of distributing gospels to Russian soldiers, and in front of the synagogues.

One of the pamphlets we distributed caused a considerable stir. It was called ~The Meaning of the Easter Ritual~. On the Jewish Easter Eve a ritual is carried out by the master of the house in every household; this ritual is called ~Aifkoimen~. An evening meal is prepared, and everyone in the house, including guests, partakes of it. The meal is called ~Seder~. During this meal the master of the house takes a dish containing three pieces of ~matza~ or unleavened bread, which up till then have been covered with a towel. A special prayer is said; the first piece of ~matza~ is placed to one side. The second piece is broken (in Poland it was customary to pierce it). The children are sent out of the room, and then the broken piece is hidden. The children return. All the grown-ups taking part in the meal have to drink three goblets of wine, but before the third goblet is drunk, the children are told to look for the hidden pieces of bread. When they find them, they are given presents, and cries of delight are uttered.

The pamphlet we distributed commented on this custom, and gave the explanation which we knew: the three pieces of bread represent the Father, the Son and the Holy Ghost; thus the second piece represents the second person of the Deity. The breaking of bread signifies the body of our Saviour broken on the Cross, the hiding signifies the burial. The three goblets represent the three days he had to spend in the tomb, and the rediscovery of the bread and the shouts of delight represent the joy of the Resurrection.

It was then explained that Israel had received prophecies foretelling the Messiah, both in writings and in symbolical acts. ~Aifkoimen~ is a symbolical act which has survived from the pre-Christian era. Owing to their religious conservatism, the religious Jews continue to practise it, but it is now an empty husk, stripped of its contents. The Jews carry out this ritual act without realizing that it symbolises the sufferings and resurrection of the Saviour. The pamphlet concluded with a request to anyone who had a better explanation to let us have it.

Our pamphlets had a very attractive appearance. On the outside was printed: ~Jewish Religious Library~. If we had put ~Christian Library~, no Jew would have read them. The cover was in the national colours of the Jews, white and blue, with the Star of David.

Alba and the other brethren and sisters sold great quantities of this pamphlet on the Eve of the Passover in front of the synagogues.

The Jewish community and the Zionist papers, which reviled me in practically every edition, fumed with rage, but in a way that was very gratifying to us, for under the heading "A New Lie from Pastor Wurmbrand" they repeated the essential points of our arguments, and in this way those Jews who had not read our booklets learned what it contained. After the text had been reproduced, there followed such words of abuse as "traitor," "mercenary lackey," "disgusting" and so on, words which also convinced us of the need to examine ourselves spiritually, and provided a serious warning from God that we should beware of treading the slippery path to which these terms of abuse might lead.

Alba could not bear the thought that her elder brother should be insulted. Without a word to us, she went to the editor of the newspaper and asked to speak to the author of the article attacking me.

She told him: "I have read your article, and I should like to know what is the real interpretation of the Aifkoimen ritual."

"It is not the interpretation given by that traitor Wurmbrand"

"So I understand from your article. I should now like to ask you respectfully if you could give me the true interpretation."

"It is quite different from the one which that disgusting Wurmbrand has given."

"Would you be so kind as to tell me what it is?"

"Mr. Wurmbrand is a man who has sold himself."

"That may be so, but what is the true interpretation of the ritual?"

Neither he nor anyone else could disprove our statements, neither in this respect nor in any others. All that remained was their abuse.

At night Alba and the others fixed posters on the walls of houses and on fences, calling on the Jews to be converted. During the cold winter nights placards were posted, bearing the title: "Christmas - the National Holiday of the Jews." The text underneath stated that every nation gladly celebrates the birthday of its great men, of whom they are proud. It was at Christmas that the greatest man, He who is celebrated and worshipped by all peoples, was born to the Jewish people. Everyone honours the greatest Jew, only the Jews remain indifferent to Him who is called in the Bible "The glory of His people Israel." The posters advised the Jews once again to relent, and to rejoice with other peoples at the Christmas festival.

We were now the target of a new and furious attack.

A Zionist paper wrote: "Mr. Wurmbrand wishes to introduce Christmas and other Christian customs among the Jews. As he is very importunate, it is possible that he might finally convince us. We shall adopt the various customs, including that of ~coliva~ (a cake which is distributed at funerals in the Greek Orthodox Church). And the first coliva we shall eat will be at Mr. Wurmbrand's funeral."

This was a threat of death.

page 65 CHRIST ON THE JEWISH ROAD

Alba lived by our side: she shared with us in all our struggles, all our dangers, and in all our battles she was in the front line.

A poor alcoholic, a profoundly religious man, asked me to heal him of his affliction. At that time I was still ignorant of the technique of healing alcoholics by faith, which is very simple. I was unsuccessful. But Alba would not give up. She went to visit him in the tavern, where he was sitting in a drunken stupor, and talked to him until he was converted and was healed. He has since converted other souls to the faith, and these again have converted others.

Let me at this point make a few general observations.

People with a burning desire to carry out missionary work are apt to hurt the feelings of Jews, often causing a violent reaction. It has been questioned whether this kind of missionary work can be right. Even Jesus warned against proselytising when He said: "Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! For ye compass sea and land to make one proselyte, and when he is made, ye make him twofold more the child of hell than yourselves" (MTT 23:15).

But all these considerations, both for and against, cannot prevent people like Alba from being what they are at a particular stage in their development. Lamartine wrote:

> ~Je chantais, mes amis, comme l'homme respire, > comme l'oiseau g,mit, comme le vent soupire > comme l'eau murmure en coulant.~
> I sang, my friends, as a man breathes
> As the bird laments, as the wind sighs,
> As the water murmurs when it flows.

The many Albas of this world speak about Jesus because it is their nature to do so; no argument can make me stop breathing; no argument can prevent those who love Jesus from witnessing for Him, just as no argument can prevent some people reacting violently to their witness instead of taking it calmly.

There are many different psychological types among human beings; the extrovert, when he is converted, becomes a missionary, the introvert becomes a contemplative. God's law is one: "Therefore all things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them" (MTT 7:12). With all my heart I long that any man who is convinced that he possesses a truth which can make me blessed here and in eternity should spare no effort to tell it to me. We consider as normal compulsory schooling, compulsory vaccination, forcing a child to eat something good, even though he may not appreciate it. Why then should we consider missionary activity as morally unjustified? I am grateful to old W”lfkes because he showed me the way, and it is my conviction that the children of God ought to exercise their missionary activity likewise.

We, too, say to Jesus the words which Abner, the captain of the host, once said to David: "I will arise and go, and will gather all Israel unto my lord the king, that they may make a league with thee, and that thou mayest reign over all that thine heart desireth" (2SM 3:21).

The memory of Alba reminds me of something else: we must have patience with a soul. Alba grew in grace from day to day.

In Leviticus we read whoever touches the carcass of an unclean animal shall wash his clothes - and be unclean until the evening (LEV 11:25). Even after you have washed your clothes, you are still unclean for a while. The salvation which Jesus gives is like medicine: one must wait a little while after taking it before feeling its effect. With some people it is necessary to wait longer than with others. The seed that falls on good ground brings forth good fruit; but we sow in spring and gather the fruit in autumn. However good the soil may be, it is impossible to harvest as soon as we have sown. Some trees produce fruit only after several years.

During the period of growth we must be grateful for the small fruits these souls produce, or for the future fruit that is still developing. The whole intention of Leviticus Chapter 5 is to teach us that, if we cannot offer the Lord as much as we should like to, we must offer whatever we can, at every stage of our development. All categories of believers have the same chances of finding favour with God.

page 67 CHRIST ON THE JEWISH ROAD

New-born babies are usually ugly. A new-born soul who appears beautiful is probably striking a pose.

Alba not only overcame against sin, but in time she also wore the garment of great virtue. Those who were like her learned to understand a legend about Jesus which I often made use of in my sermons.

It is said that Jesus sent a message to one of his disciples, telling him that He would visit him together with His apostles. The man who received the message was very glad, and said to his son, who also loved the Saviour: "I shall make my house ready, and you must tidy the garden, so that the Lord will find it clean and swept."

The boy set to work energetically, sweeping and watering the garden. When everything was ready, his father came to see how his son had carried out his orders. He said to him: "Well done, my dear son. I can see that you have worked with great zeal. You have made the garden beautiful and tidy, but it is not tidy enough for the Lord. Work at it a little more."

The boy, who felt that this was a reproach, tidied up the garden once more. This time he gathered up every withered leaf, spruced up every drooping flower, and did all he possibly could to remove the least traces of disorder.

Once again his father inspected his work, and this time he said: "Very good; now it is really tidy, but it is still not tidy enough for the Lord."

The boy, who did not know what else he could do, asked: "But how does one make a garden neat for the Lord?"

His father's answer was: "If you work for His sake, it is not sufficient that you should remove all untidiness from the garden - you must also decorate it with everything that is beautiful, and which has not been grown in it so far. Go to the neighbours, and see if you can find some new plants that you can put in the ground; hang up beautiful carpets, and light lanterns. That is the way to make everything pleasant for the Lord."

This is precisely what Alba did.

It was her privilege to trace me to the prison where I was being secretly held under an assumed name, and she was the first to tell my family that I was still alive.

page 68 CHRIST ON THE JEWISH ROAD

I did not see her for many years. Before I was released from prison, she left for Israel. But after coming to the West, I met her again, the same faithful, loving woman.

~Mircea Petrescu~

One day, Alba was sitting on a bus; opposite her was a man who, judging by his appearance, was an Orthodox Jew. She was filled with the desire to speak to him of Jesus.

We never missed an opportunity on the bus, in the marketplace, on the street, wherever occasion offered.

The thought that all people could become like Jesus, but that they do not know this and die in affliction; the thought that man is second in rank after God Himself (angels are the ministering spirits of mankind), and that he nevertheless lives without being aware of the truth, made us weep. Our prayer meetings were harrowing, and many tears were shed.

My suffering became unbearable; when I walked in the streets it was like a stab in my heart every time someone passed by and the question arose: "I wonder if he has been saved?" One of our sisters in the faith, who is now dead, always had tears in her eyes when she thought of the eternal fate that awaited the people she met in the street. I prayed God to take this suffering from me, or I should not be able to live, and the Lord heard my prayer.

Alba did not weep; she always smiled her winning smile, a smile which had the same source as my suffering. She said to herself: "Since bad girls attract men with their smiles, why should I not use my smile to convert men to good?"

But however would she be able to get into conversation with this Orthodox Jew? These men are serious, sober citizens, not in the habit of opening up a conversation with an unknown woman. It is written in the ~Pirkei Abot~, the Teachings of the Parents, in the Babylonian Talmud: "Do not speak to a woman." The rabbis say: "This refers to one's own woman – how much more to another's woman!" For this reason the wise men said: "As often as a man speaks to a woman, it shall be his misfortune."

Alba therefore decided to sing in the crowded bus.

page 69 CHRIST ON THE JEWISH ROAD

The message of her song, she hoped, would go straight to the heart of the Jew.

To her amazement the man asked her: "What sort of song is that?" She answered his question, and told him about the Saviour who had given His life on the Cross. He listened to her with the closest attention, and finally expressed a wish to hear more about our faith. She asked him to leave the bus with her, and to accompany her to my house.

And so it came about that they both walked in through my door.

When the Jew introduced himself, I expected to hear a Jewish name, but instead I heard a rattling good Rumanian one. And the story he told me was a strange one.

Despite his highly Jewish appearance, he was not a Jew, but a Rumanian who had been converted to Judaism and had adopted Jewish dress and all Jewish customs.

This man, who was a talented painter, told me how it had happened. While he was still a small boy, he was incensed when he saw Christian children hitting Jewish children. He defended the Jews, and his reward was that he was persecuted together with them.

When the war broke out and he realized that it was not a question of defending his fatherland only, but of committing crimes and sacrilege by murdering innocent Jews who were killed in their [sic] hundreds of thousands together with their women and children, he deserted from the front, at the risk of his life. He would rather die than be a murderer. He loved the victims of this cruel and senseless persecution, and he asked himself: "If Jesus were in Rumania now, whose side would He be on: on the side of the Jews or of the Christians who kill Jews?" There could only be one answer to this question: on the side of the victims.

The Pharisees, who hated Jesus with a violent and profound hatred, remembered vividly His burning love for Israel, how He once said: "Salvation is of the Jews" (JHN 4:22). This clearly emerges in a fantastic and unattractive, but highly significant story in the Talmud, the holy book of the Pharisees.

In the ~Gittim~ we read of Onkelos bar Kalinikos, a grandchild of the Roman Emperor Titus, the man who destroyed Jerusalem. This young man wished to adopt the Jewish religion. But before he did so he summoned the spirit of Titus, and asked him: "Which people is most highly thought of in the other world?" "Israel," answered Titus. "Shall I join them?" Titus replied that they had too many rules and regulations, which cannot be fulfilled. "It would be better if you persecuted them, for then you would be great. For it is written in the Book of Lamentations that 'her [Israel's] children are gone into captivity before the enemy'" (LAM 1:5). Titus was then asked what his punishment was, and he said that he had brought his punishment down upon his own head: every day his ashes were gathered together, he was brought to life, he was condemned, he was burned again, and his ashes spread over the seven seas.

After this Onkelos summoned Balaam, the false prophet, and asked him: "Which people is most highly thought of in the other world?" "Israel," answered Balaam. "Shall I join them?" Balaam answered: "You must not seek their fortune or their prosperity eternally all your days." Then Onkelos asked him what his punishment was, and Balaam replied that he had boiling filth poured over him. (As Balaam had failed to carry out the command of Balak, King of the Moabites, to curse the Jews, he advised the Midianites, who were the neighbours of the Moabites, to send their daughters into the Jewish camp, in order to lead the Jews into sin, and in that way bring down the wrath of the Lord upon them. Hence this punishment.)

Then Onkelos summoned the spirit of Jesus (this name occurs only in the old editions of the Talmud, which were not censored by the Inquisition. The censored editions, instead of using the name Jesus, have inserted the phrase ~Poshe Israel~, the Sinner of Israel) and asked Him: "Which people is most highly thought of in the other world?" Jesus answered: "Israel." "Shall I join them?" Jesus answered: "You must seek to promote the best interests of Israel and not its destruction. To destroy Israel is to destroy the light of God's eyes."

Even Jesus's bitterest enemies repeat the undeniable fact that Jesus loved Israel.

Petrescu loved Jesus: for this reason it was natural for him to side with the Jews, against anti-Semitic Christians.

Only that human soul who receives no help from the grace of God cannot abide by the golden mean, but lapses into extremes. Petrescu was right to deny a false Christianity, a Christianity full of hatred. But in denying it, we must also realize the secret of the great decline of the Church, the Church that Jesus had promised He would be with all its days.

In Matthew's Gospel, after the account of the healing of many who were sick and possessed of devils, we are told that in this way Jesus "Himself took our infirmities, and bare our sicknesses" (MTT 8:17). (The literal translation is: He assumed our weaknesses.)

When Christ was made man, He subjected Himself to all the circumstance of life; He could exert his influence through the Word, but He was also able to be moved by others. He healed thousands of their sins, and destroyed the hatred with which thousands of others were consumed. But the sin and hatred which He took away from others fell on Him. All the weaknesses which people have taken with them into church, all the sins which Christians have committed for two thousand years, have become His weaknesses, His powerlessness. A refusal on His part to accept the weak would mean lack of love; to receive them would mean that He assumed the shame of their weaknesses and sin - it meant in fact allowing the crimes of Christians to fall upon His head.

Leviticus contains the phrase "all these abominations" (LEV 18:27). The word for "these" is ~Eleh~; but the text actually contains what no translator has dared to translate, ~toevot ha-El~, which means nothing less than - ~horribile dictu~ - which means "God's abominations." The serious thing about any abomination committed by someone who worships God, is precisely that it redounds to the Holy Name, and in the eyes of men it passes for an abomination of God. And is it not so that people judge God unjustly for the injustices which they, who pass for His worshippers, commit?

A Latin proverb says: ~Qui bene distinguet, bene docet~, which means, "He who distinguishes well, teaches well."

page 72 CHRIST ON THE JEWISH ROAD

Sins are only reflected back on Jesus - they are associated with His name. He bears them, but He is innocent. Nobody should reject Christ because of crimes committed by Christians.

In this respect the Jews created confusion in the sentimental heart of our artist friend. A Kabbalistic rabbi caught him in his net, and persuaded him to abandon the Christian faith, and adopt the Mosaic. We endeavour to turn Jews into Christians; he had been converted from Christianity to Judaism.

The struggle was a difficult one, because we were dealing with an idealist, and a person with high moral standards. It is always difficult to convert someone who knows himself to be a decent person. Step by step, I showed him the prayers of the synagogue, and asked him if he accepted them, because - credulous as he had been - he had been made to say them while at the same time he had failed to realize that in entering the synagogue he had made a clean break with the Jesus who had taught him to be good and to love.

Every morning the Jews say: "Blessed art Thou, Jehovah, King of the World, because Thou hast not made me a 'goy' (gentile), a slave or a woman." I asked him: "Do you accept the belief that you are an inferior creature, lower than every Jew, merely because you were born a Rumanian? What else is this but racial prejudice? At the Feast of the Passover the Jews stand up to pray to God: ~Shfoh hamotha al hagoim asher lo iediuha~, that is to say, 'Pour out Thy wrath over the peoples that do not know Thee!' Do you agree with a prayer of this kind? Is not Jesus's advice to His apostles superior, to go to all people and preach the gospel, and in this way teach them how to escape the wrath of God and to start a new life in love?"

I also showed him the inconsistencies of the Jewish prayer book. There were prayers used in the ritual of the great Day of Atonement which had been inserted by Jews who believed secretly in Jesus. They ask God that these prayers may be received ~al-iad Jeshu Metatron~ - through Jesus standing before the Throne. ~Metatron~ is the Kabbalistic name for the Messiah.

On the same day another prayer is offered up, which has not yet been translated in any of the vernacular editions of the Hebrew prayer books. This starts with the words ~Az milifnei beresit~. The rabbis have good grounds for leaving this prayer untranslated, because it says: "The Messiah, our justification, has forsaken us. We are defeated, and there is no one to bring us justice. He has been killed and pierced for our sins. We have been healed by His wounds. The time for the victory of the new creation is at hand. He ascendeth on high in a chariot. He shines forth from Seir to hear us for a second time on the mountains of Lebanon."

It is obvious that He who has been pierced for our sins, in order that we should have forgiveness, can be none other than Jesus. The synagogue sins hymns of adoration to Him, although it rejects Him, in the same way as some priests, while singing of repentance in every liturgy, are furious if anyone mentions repentance to them.

Gradually a light dawned in Petrescu's heart. He realized that the Mosaic religion is of necessity a false religion, because it is an autosoteric religion, that is to say, a religion in which one's salvation depends on one's own exertions. Autosoterism is lack of humility; neither sin nor salvation comes from us. Men's fates have been determined a long time ago, and from a long way away, and eternal life is a gift of God, just as sin comes from Satan and is not an act of free will.

One Christmas Eve, when the candles were lit, Petrescu said calmly: "Today, Jesus has been born in me, too."

Petrescu is unique: he is a pure Rumanian, and at the same time a Christian Jew, seeing that he has come to Christianity from Judaism. Later he also became chairman of the board of trustees in our church. He is still a steadfast brother and a faithful friend. He is married to a Christian Jewess.

One day I was preparing my sermon in a park; I was reading the Bible, and a young girl beside me was also reading a book. I tried to see what it was. It was a novel by a Rumanian author. I said to her: "I have read your book, but do you know my book?" Thus started a conversation which ended with the young lady's conversion - and subsequently that of her mother. I baptized the mother at the height of a violent bombing attack. The girl is now married to Petrescu, and they are living happily together.

Spurgeon says that when God closed the gates of Paradise, He did not entirely close them; He left a small corner of it, a truly Christian marriage. Their home is a corner of Paradise just like that.

~Holy Moishe~

Let others praise their intellectuals: I should like to praise the fool whom God chose to shame the wise.

Our brother Moishe was by trade a pall-bearer at funerals; he suffered from a gentle form of madness, which was not dangerous to others. At our meetings he would weep copiously, and make an awful din when the preacher spoke of our Saviour's sufferings, and laughed aloud when he spoke of His victory.

The other believers in the congregation considered Moishe a disturbing element. One of them promised him - he was very poor - that if he would only keep quiet during the services, he could come and dine at his house every Sunday, and enjoy roast meat, cakes and fruit.

For one whole Sunday Moishe kept comparatively calm; but the following week, when the preacher spoke of the Resurrection, he stood up in the middle of the sermon and shouted: "Roast or no roast, hallelujah!"

In 1939 an anti-Semite fired a shot at the Chief Rabbi Niemerover. The intended victim was not hurt, the bullet passing through his overcoat, but the excitement made him ill, and he was forced to stay in bed. A great many Jews called to congratulate him on his lucky escape. Among these was Moishe. He said to the rabbi: "Don't you see, Your Eminence, that God does not want sinners to die, but He wants them to be converted and saved?"

He came to our house to dinner, and as we were about to start he said to my wife: "Sister, will you please remove my knife. I know that I am mad, and I have promised God never to touch a knife, lest in an unguarded moment I should injure someone. After all, Adam and Eve ate without using knives."

page 75 CHRIST ON THE JEWISH ROAD

I reflected that a great many wise men had a lot to learn from this madman.

In January 1940, a revolt took place in Bucharest led by the Legion of the Archangel Michael, a Fascist organization. A great many Jews were killed; some of them were flayed, and suspended on hooks in the slaughterhouse under the inscription "Kosher Meat."

Moishe was sitting in a cheap teahouse when a gang of Fascists burst in. Their leader shouted: "All dirty Jews clear out!" The Jews went outside, where they were herded into lorries, to be driven to the woods and shot. Moishe, who was easily recognisable as a Jew, sat quietly drinking his tea. The leader of the greenshirts shouted at him: "You dirty Jew, didn't you hear me? I told you to get out!" Moishe answered calmly: "Dear brother, dirty Jews are those who do what Judas did - they sell Jesus. I am an Israelite who loves Him." One of the leaders of the gang exclaimed: "Leave him alone. You can see that he is a preacher." And they left him in peace.

But Moishe, instead of departing, said to the man: "I can see that you are good and merciful. God will reward you for this. But don't stop at half measures; let the other Jews in the lorry go home, too." Mad people often possess tremendous powers of suggestion, and I believe that Moishe had this power, but from another source. At any rate, the greenshirt ordered the other Jews out of the lorry, and allowed them to go home.

Now Moishe was thoroughly scared; he went home and remained in hiding throughout the time that the pogrom lasted.

All the Jews he had saved told this story of Moishe to everyone they met, and because he had vanished, and was believed to be dead, he was referred to as "Holy Moishe."

He later suffered a tragic fate, dying of jaundice in a concentration camp.

~Bertha~

Christian missions have often been reproached for giving material help to poor Jews, and in this way buying souls.

This is a difficult problem.

Many of the Jews lived in poverty, and our work was directed especially to assisting these needy persons. How could we avoid helping them materially? How could we avoid helping Jewish refugees out of Hitler's Germany? It is written that Jesus had compassion on the multitude. This compassion is also a characteristic of His true followers. Jesus had compassion on men and women because they were hungry, not only because they were not saved. He was concerned with the problem of feeding them. If we help a person and at the same time preach the gospel to him, these two things will be associated in the minds of onlookers, and of those who obtain relief. Jesus encountered the same difficulty. He preached the new teaching, but at the same time He gave bread to the poor and hungry. The result of this was that many people came to Him only to receive loaves and fishes, which He also gave them.

There is a very old Jewish legend about Abraham. One day he invited a beggar into his tent. H wished to show him hospitality and prepared a meal for him. But when he said grace, the beggar began to curse God, declaring that he could not bear to hear His name. The pious Abraham drove the beggar away; he could not stand hearing anyone cursing his heavenly Friend in his own tent. But God appeared to him, and said: "This man has cursed me and reviled me for fifty years, and yet I give him food every day, and could you not show him hospitality for one single day? You might at any rate have waited to drive him out until after he had eaten."

If we must feed those who curse God, how much more those who pretend they are worshipping Him! Also, it is very difficult to be certain whether a man is pretending, or whether he is really a believer.

In Jesus's well-known parable the prodigal son returned to his father for material reasons, and yet he was received with the greatest love.

page 77 CHRIST ON THE JEWISH ROAD

Truth is weak; it has never triumphed unless it has been able to offer material advantages, unless it has dressed itself in beautiful apparel, and unless it has been able to make an appeal to the emotions.

Old Simeon said of Jesus: "This child is set for the fall and rising again of many in Israel" (LUK 2:34), in other words not only for raising up but also for a fall.

Some Jews who were shown Christian charity in the form of material assistance, were thereby raised to unexpected heights of belief. Such was Bertha.

One might say of Bertha what Disraeli once said when he was reproached for having married for money: "Yes, when I married I knew so little about my wife that I would not have taken her without money. But now that I know her so well, I would be willing to marry her even if she were poor."

Other Jews, on the other hand, have suffered a disastrous fall as a result of material help, which brought a corruption to their souls from which they have never been able to recover.

A certain sculptor who was profoundly moved by stories of the first Christian martyrs had made up his mind to create works of art which would immortalise the Christians who had been thrown to the wild beasts. He sculpted a young man and a young woman - the man holding a cross in his hand - and then started to work on a lion, crouched ready to hurl himself at the two figures.

One day he called his friends to his studio to show them his work. The lion was still only an unshaped lump of clay.

One of his friends said: "You are a poor man. How can you see this work? There are many artists who make sculptures like this, and no Jew would buy a work of art with a cross in it. Remove the cross, and replace it with a key. The key is a holy symbol in many religions. It might remind you of the keys of St. Peter, but it is also a holy symbol for spiritualists and other occultists. This will make it easier for you to find a buyer."

And so the sculptor changed the cross into a key.

Then a wealthy American walked into his studio and exclaimed: "What a magnificent work of art! It symbolises thrift. The little lump of clay might represent a money-safe and the young man with the key teaches people to be thrifty in spending their money. I will give you a thousand dollars for this work."

In this way a sculpture which was originally intended to extol martyrdom was transformed into a work in honour of money.

There are many souls who are inspired at first with the love of Jesus, but as they are poor and receive material aid, the picture of the Master is gradually blotted out. What really concerns them is how much help they can get, and where they can get it, and above all, whether anyone else has received more than they have.

But this only happens to some.

Bertha openly confessed that, to start with, she came to us because she was attracted by the rumour that we helped poor Jews. But after she believed in Jesus with all her heart, she never again appealed to us for help, although she was very poor.

She was married to a German citizen, who was half-Jewish. He was not converted. They had three sons. In 1943 the German legation in Rumania published an order to the effect that all German citizens were to be repatriated. She stayed behind in Rumania. He and three children, who according to the racial thinking at that time suffered the great tragedy of being three-quarters Jewish, made their way to Germany.

In Germany an informer revealed that the husband was not only half-Jewish, but was even married to a Jewess, and that his children therefore had mostly Jewish blood in their veins, and only a drop of Siegfried's blood.

They were all imprisoned by the Gestapo, and over their head hung the threat of the death camp. In order to save his life, the man told a lie, declaring that his wife was Rumanian. The German police offered him the chance of writing home to ask the authorities to forward documents to show that his wife was of Aryan extraction. If this could be proved, the children would be three-quarters Aryan, and they would be saved.

page 79 CHRIST ON THE JEWISH ROAD

In those days in Rumania, everything could be arranged with the help of money. Bertha's family obtained papers showing she was of pure Aryan blood - more Aryan than Hitler, whose origins, according to rumour, were a little mixed.

I was in her home when her relatives brought her the false documents which would save her husband and three children from the gas chambers of Auschwitz, and I witnessed a scene which I shall remember to my dying day. She tore the false documents to pieces and declared: "Abraham was willing to sacrifice one child to God; I shall sacrifice three children and a husband, but I refuse to tell a lie!"

She had no further news of her husband and children.

Meister Eckhardt wrote that he who leaves behind things in the form in which they exist - empty, haphazard - will receive them back in their pure essence, in the eternal essence. He who leaves things in the lowest form, in which they are mortal, will receive them back from God in their true form. Bertha will have her family restored to her in glory.

Bertha will never know how magnificent was her gesture: she is a humble sister. The brethren do not know of her sacrifice, because she has not breathed a word of it to them. And, what is more, when she discussed with the brethren the case of someone who had obtained false documents in order to escape persecution, she declared: "Let us not judge him! Every man must follow his own conscience."

Did Bertha do right or wrong? She judges no one, and in this way she is raised above the judgment of men.

This raises the question of whether we should always speak the truth.

Christian writings from the fourth century record the lives and meditations of the first generation of monks. These monks lived in the desert of Thebaid, where they had fled from the corruption which entered the Church when Christianity became the recognized religion. In this book we read that one day

Father Agathon asked Father Alonie: "How shall I contrive to keep my tongue from telling lies?" The answer was: "If you do not lie you will commit many sins." "How is this possible?" And he answered: "Lo, two men have committed a murder before your eyes, and one of them has taken refuge in your cell. Then comes the judge, seeking him, and he asks you: "Was a murder committed before your eyes?" If you do not lie you will condemn a man to death. It is better that you should let him be judged by God, since He knows everything."

Luther says that to lie to protect someone else or in jest is not a lie. For myself, I believe that there is a confusion between the concept of a lie and an untruth. ~Faust~, ~Othello~ and ~Parsifal~ are not the truth, but neither are they lies; they are art. The fairy stories we tell our children, or the jokes we tell grown-ups to amuse them, are not lies. They belong to an entirely different sphere, the realm of fantasy and play. Is it a lie to tell an untruth in order to save the life, honour or property of an innocent person who is being hounded by an executioner who persecutes truth and purity? Should we give such an unpleasant name to an action which springs from love?

A lie is the untruth I speak in order to injure my neighbour. "Love and do what you will," says Augustine. Is good better than truth; and an untruth that saves a life is better than a truth that destroys it. In the dictatorial, anti-Christian countries, this is an everyday and acute problem for believers.

But what about Abraham's sacrifice of Isaac? There is a sphere of sanctity where our practical judgements lose their power.

I wonder if truth could have survived in the many labyrinths of life if, here and there, there had not live anonymous heroes of the calibre of Bertha, who sacrificed all they held dear for the sake of truth? I have often heard superficial sermons, in which the preacher asked: "What would you lose if you became a Christian? Only the brandy bottle, your clothes, the stick with which you beat your wife, your name and reputation, your bad conscience, or the hell that exists in your home!" No, there are people who for the sake of their Christian conviction are prepared to lose their fortune, their freedom, their health, and even the persons they love most on earth!

page 81 CHRIST ON THE JEWISH ROAD

~A witness in our family~

My wife comes from an orthodox Jewish family. After she was converted, she was unable to sleep at night for the thought of her parents, who were pious Jews. We travelled to Cernauti in order to talk to them, and we arrived on Friday evening, the start of the Jewish Sabbath.

The table was set for the ritual feast; the candles had been lit. The three sisters, who were younger than my wife, and my little brother-in-law who was only eight years old, looked at us respectfully. The parents' delight was unbounded; after all, I was the husband of their eldest daughter.

My father-in-law rose to his feet and recited the ~Kidush~, the blessing of the wine. He was very surprised when he noticed me - whom he knew to be an atheist - joining in the singing the old prayer based on GEN 2:1-3: "Thus the heavens and the earth were finished, and all the host of them. And on the seventh day God ended his work which he had made; and he rested on the seventh day from all his work which he had made. And God blessed the seventh day, and sanctified it: because that in it he had rested from all his work which God created and made. Bless art Thou, Jehovah, King of the World, that hast created the fruit of the vine."

After this, the bread was blessed, and the meal started. When it was over, and only the candles cast their shadows on the walls, I began to say: "It is written that God completed His work on the seventh day; and it is written again that on the seventh day God rested. What was it that was not perfect in all that had been created in the six days? What did God complete on the seventh? How did He complete it while He was resting?

"What He created in six days was not complete. Man still needed one thing: rest. God created this on the seventh day, and in this way He filled His world with His own rest.

"The Law of Moses may be compared to the first six days of the Creation. The Law contains six hundred and thirteen commandments, which do not give us rest, but which torment our conscience. We are constantly transgressing the Law. Who can maintain that he has kept at least two commandments: to love God with all his heart and all his soul and all his might and to love his neighbour as himself? The Law cannot be kept. It is only a mirror in which we see our own sinfulness, and how impossible it is for us as human beings to live apart from God, the God whose laws are just and holy and which have become a burden which we, sinners, cannot bear.

"In the old days the Jews could not be saved by keeping the Law - all the great men in the Bible describe how they themselves have often transgressed it - but by the sacrifice of atonement which was made in the temple. There was no forgiveness of sins without bloodshed. Sin was transferred, by the laying on of hands, to an innocent animal which symbolically represented the sacrifice which the future Messiah would make by His death for the sins of man. By slaughtering the animal the Jews appeased their conscience; it was brought as a sacrifice for their transgressions of the Law. But now we have neither a temple nor a sacrifice. How, then, can we be saved?"

My father-in-law answered: "The rabbis have taught us that if we recite daily a chapter of the Law of Moses dealing with sacrifice, God will count this as though we ourselves had made the sacrifice."

I answered: "I know that. One day a Christian walked into the shop of a very orthodox Jew, and started to talk to him on the subject we have just been discussing, the sacrifice, and he got the same answer as you have given me. This man did not continue the argument, but said: 'Every man should hold to his own convictions. I have not come here to discuss religion, but to buy goods.' And he asked for three shirts, six pairs of socks, a dozen handkerchiefs, and various other articles. Finally he asked the shopkeeper to give him a bill specifying all that he had purchased. The shopkeeper, who was delighted to have done such good business, wrote out a bill, and wrapped the purchase. The Christian read the bill aloud, took the parcel in his hand, and walked out of the shop.

The shopkeeper called after him: 'You have forgotten to pay!' The customer answered: 'Didn't I read the bill to you? 'Yes, but you never paid.' To which the customer replied: 'Isn't reading the bill the same as paying it?'

"If we reduce this to its purely practical meaning, we may say that the merchant was not satisfied with precisely the same approach as he used in his religion. The sacrifice must be made; reading about it is not enough."

I spoke with my father-in-law about the Messianic prophecies, which were fulfilled in Jesus. But acts speak more eloquently than verses in the Bible. The Jews are God's chosen people, chosen to bring the Light of God into the world. Millions of people who in ancient times worshipped Zeus, Jupiter, Wotan or other idols, today worship the true God, and regard the books written by our great prophets as their holy book. Who has raised the nations out of polytheism, and converted them to the worship of the only just, good God, the God of Israel, who demands a moral life? Jesus! Through Him the Messianic vocation with which our people had been entrusted was fulfilled. Through Jesus's sufferings, life and death as a servant of God, through His existence as a man of suffering, as Isaiah had foretold, He has caused mankind to give their hearts to our God, and caused those who believed in a Saviour who died and rose again, whether they called him Adonis, Osiris, Dionysus or Heracles, to know the fulfillment in history of these ancient myths.

Jesus is the King of the Jews, the Messiah of Israel.

I told the children a great many other stories, and they listened to me with the deepest respect. My father-in-law became pensive. That evening my mother-in-law knelt in prayer with us.

The children began attending Christian meetings regularly; not long afterwards they embraced the truth. The old man was ashamed of being seen at a meeting, but as the time to go came nearer, he would call out in a loud voice that re-echoed through the house: "Hurry, hurry! Everyone gets there in time; my daughters are the only ones who are late!"

My little brother-in-law, who was receiving religious instruction from a great rabbi, resisted stubbornly. I have often been forced to wonder at the independence of thought and action shown by Jewish children when they are small. They are living examples of Blaise Pascal's remark: "Man is born as an original, and dies as a copy."

~Converting anti-Semites~

The community of Christian Jews was the very place where a great many anti-Semite persons found Christ, during the period when Nazism reigned.

One anti-Semite who attended our church took part in the ill-treatment of a number of Jews on his way to a meeting; he had not been told by the person who had invited him that a Jew was going to preach. He became converted that very Sunday. He has never since that day struck a Jew.

Once, when a Rumanian sister brought another anti-Semite to our meeting, I preached a sermon based on Jesus's saying: "I am not sent but to the lost sheep of the house of Israel." (MTT 15:24). It was a sermon meant to call the Jews to conversion; so I quoted biblical texts which aimed to prove that the gospel is first and foremost a message addressed to the Jews: "Go not into the way of the Gentiles, and into any city of the Samaritans enter ye not: but go rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel" (MTT 10.5-6). "Repentance and remission of sins should be preached in his name among all nations, beginning at Jerusalem" (LUK 24:47). "The gospel of Christ ... is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth; to the Jew first, and also to the Greek" (ROM 1:16).

When the meeting was over, the sister reproached me bitterly: "You know very well that we often bring to our meetings people who are not Jews, and who usually hate you. Why do you preach like that? The Rumanians would be offended by your sermons, which are too pro-Jewish."

Our anti-Semitic friend went home after the meeting, and argued to himself as follows: "Did you hear what the Bible says? The Jew first, and then the other nations. But where does the hater of the Jews come in? Nowhere." He gave up his anti-Semitism, as well as his other sins, and was converted. He became an enthusiastic fisher of men, and a true friend of Jews and Hebrew Christians.

The Jews were often offended at the warmth and love with which we treated those who hated Jews; they were shocked, and often left our meetings when they heard us praying openly for the anti-Jewish authorities. They were angry because we maintained good relations with anti-Semitic clergymen and laymen.

Pope Gregory VII once said: "Just as a spiritual thing cannot be seen except through its earthly being, and just as the soul cannot function without a body, so religion cannot work without a Church. But if the Church has a body, then it also has its sins and weaknesses." Anti-Semitism is one of the many weaknesses suffered by the body of the Church; but it is not an isolated phenomenon. It has its diametric opposite: Jewish chauvinism and contempt for Christian people and for Christian Jews.

We must tolerate the weaknesses of the weak, and endeavour to cure them with love. In some cases we have succeeded in doing this. We believe that love can triumph over hatred.

Confucius wrote: "I have seen a man trying to put out a great fire with a cup of water. He failed, and concluded that water does not extinguish fire. The fool! A cup of water cannot extinguish a fire, but a great deal of water can."

The drop of love which we possess cannot extinguish evil in this world, but a great deal of love will do so. In any case, we do not believe that there is any sense in being angry with the stick from which you receive your blows. Be indignant with the man who wields the stick. Your enemy is driven by hatred; hatred must be hated, but not the man.

There are reasons why people turn against the Jews; one of these reasons is to be found in the sins of which Jews, like other nations, are guilty. There are undoubtedly many more reasons, which have their source in the evils of the anti-Semite's heart. We need understanding, and must try as far as possible to remove the causes, but we must not hate the anti-Semites.

In many cases I have seen that it is sufficient for a number of Jew-haters to encounter Jews who are devout Christians, for their anti-Semitism to disappear as though it had never existed.

How many of us are personally prepared to subscribe to the old saying that an enemy is a treasure that has fallen from heaven? We must care for him as a means to aid our own spiritual progress. Without anti-Semitism, the state of Israel would never have come into being; Theodore Herzl, the founder of Zionism, was aware of this. Without anti-Semitism, the Jewish Christians would never have had an opportunity of practising the valuable virtues of patience and love of one's enemies. Our enemies are our benefactors. They are in truth only their own enemies, because they are preparing their own hell.

As far as the slaughtered and tortured members of our people are concerned, we are every bit as distressed at losing them as other Jews are; but our sorrow is appeased by the hope of resurrection and the hope that in the Kingdom of God all injustices will be made good.

~Christ's martyrs among the Jewish people~

I have said something about Feinstein, who in his death testified to his faith. I believe that in the better world to which he went, he is still interested in me and in the work which he set on foot. How else am I to explain the remarkable coincidence that on two occasions before I was sentenced to protracted terms of imprisonment, I preached on the Sunday prior to my arrest in Jassy of all places, from the pulpit where he had preached; and I lived in the house which was still permeated by his spirit, and received strength from his example? I must now mention other Jews who in their love of Jesus set little store by their lives.

The first of these was Vladimir Davidmann. He was the son of a rabbi in Balti. It was intended that he should follow in his father's footsteps, and become a teacher in Israel.

page 87 CHRIST ON THE JEWISH ROAD

Being indifferent, as are most Christian Jews, about the conflicts between the various Christian confessions - which arose at the time when the Jews were not yet incorporated in the Church, and which they consider they would be better advised not to participate in, unless they can bring about conciliation - he joined the Greek Orthodox Church, at the time the dominant one in Rumania. Such was the nature of his soul that he would have felt equally at home in the Lutheran Church, or among the Baptists, because he was attracted by the essence of Christianity, and not by its conditioned history. He regarded the principles separating the various confessions as a disguise to conceal pride, material and political interests, and personal ambitions, which are the real sources of schism.

From his earliest years he had been taught to read aloud the long and daily prayers of the Jews, in which the thirteen articles of faith of the Mosaic belief are pronounced. One of them runs: "I believe in perfect faith that all the words of the prophets are true." But he noticed that some of these words, which according to this pronouncement were supposed to be true, were concealed from him, for instance the fifty-third chapter of Isaiah. Vladimir's teachers ignored this passage, but Vladimir himself read it, realizing that the prophecies concealed a mystery.

One day, out of curiosity, he entered the Greek Orthodox cathedral in town. The magnificent service made a deep impression on him, and he repeated his visit. First of all he pondered these things, and later on he realized that there was a connection between the service he had witnessed in the church and the fact that the Jews suppressed some of the texts in the Scripture, and he was convinced that the promised Messiah had come. Jesus was that Messiah.

Not surprisingly, the rumour spread in the town that the young Jew with ringlets and a kaftan was often to be seen in the Greek Orthodox church. When he refused to obey his family's demand that he should put an end to this "aberration," his father kept him locked up in the house for six months. As soon as he was released, he sought contact with the priests, left home with nothing but the clothes he was wearing, and made his way to the monastery at Dobrovft. Here he was baptized. On the day he was to be baptized, he was lying in bed suffering from pneumonia. Nevertheless, he went through with the ceremony, and emerged from the cold baptismal water completely restored.

His parents, who had made great efforts to locate him, discovered his hiding-place. They abducted him from the monastery, and brought him back home. Several orthodox rabbis were gathered in the house, and they decided to punish the "traitor" with death. But that very night thieves broke into the house of the Rabbi Davidmann. In the ensuing confusion, Vladimir managed to escape. He made his way to the monastery of Neamtul in Moldavia.

One day, as he was walking near the monastery, his young brother, a fanatic, who had tracked him down, attacked and wounded him.

When he had recovered, he made his way to Bucharest, so that his family should be unable to trace him. Here he was admitted to a school where he was to learn church music, subsequently continuing his studies in Cernauti.

In 1937 he was on his way to this town to take his final exam. In the train he was reading a book of prayers, while his travelling companions were discussing various worldly matters. They noticed that he was reading a prayer book, and occasionally making the sign of the Cross, and they began to mock him. Thereupon Vladimir knelt down, and started to read the prayer book from the first page, this time aloud. The mockers were silenced. When he had finished, they apologised for their behaviour, and asked him, as a sign that he had forgiven them, to read the whole prayer again.

The night after his arrival in Cernauti he had a dream, in which he saw a desolate landscape filled with repulsive animals. He was riding on the back of one of these animals. In the face of another monster he recognized an uncle, who bit him with all his might. Suddenly he saw a saint, dressed in shining ecclesiastical robes, descending a luminous ladder. He recognized him as St. Seraphim, whose ikon he had seen in the monastery. In his hand the saint held a chalice, on which were the words "Consuming Fire," inscribed in Yiddish. Flames poured out of the chalice, filling the air. Then the vision vanished, and Vladimir saw nothing but a beautiful green meadow. When he awoke, he wrote a letter to an acquaintance in Bucharest, in which he recounted what had happened on his journey, and described his dream.

The next day, Vladimir was shot and mortally wounded by his uncle who was inflamed by religious fanaticism. He lived for only a few hours. The matter was widely reported in the newspapers. But the system of "hush money" was firmly established in Rumania in those days: the authorities and the press were bribed, and no one was punished.

The death of Vladimir Davidmann was not without its fruits: as he lay dying he was nursed by his sister, a girl of about seventeen. She was converted when she saw her brother's steadfastness in the faith, while dying the death of a martyr. She, too, was baptized into the Greek Orthodox Church.

She figured in an unusual episode which deserves to be mentioned.

When the Germana-Rumanian troops occupied Cernauti in 1941, this girl, together with thousands of other Jews, was deported to Kamentz-Podolsk in the Ukraine. Suddenly, SS troops arrived on the scene and set about massacring the whole camp. But killing ten thousand people is no easy task: graves had to be dug, and the bodies of the murdered Jews had to be buried by those who were awaiting their turn to be killed. This took two or three days, and Maria Davidmann, with the others, was awaiting her turn. Unexpectedly, a German officer came up to her, and without any preamble asked her: "Are you a Christian?" Astonished, she answered that she was. The officer then told her: "You are not going to die. Follow me." At the risk of his own life, this officer took her back to Cernauti, thus saving her from an almost certain death.

It is possible that a German soldier, a Christian, who was on duty at the time, heard her talking about Jesus to the other Jews who were waiting to be slaughtered. As she was speaking in Yiddish – a language which is akin to German, and which Germans can understand – he would have realized that she was a disciple of Jesus. He must have reported this secretly to his commanding officer, whom he knew to be a Christian (I also have met a Gestapo officer who was a child of God), and this man made up his mind to save her, even at the risk of his own life.

From Cernauti Maria was taken to Bucharest – far from the theatre of war – where she was safe.

I have often talked to her. She was a simple Christian, not remarkable for any special gift of grace or virtue. Most clergymen would have regarded her as one of the weaker vessels. I have often wondered why God performed this miracle for her. Could it have been for the sake of her brother? The apostle Paul writes that in his day the Jews, who were not even weak Christians but the enemies of the gospel, were loved for the sake of their forefathers, who had lived two thousand years before their time – Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. Is it possible that today, too, there are those who are loved and predestined by God to fulfill a special purpose, for the sake of a relative or a close friend who was strong in the faith? In the gospel we read that Jesus healed a man sick of the palsy, not for his own sake, but for the sake of the faith of his friends, who had carried him on a bed and placed him before the Saviour. Should we not learn to believe and love greatly for those who cannot do so? Theirs would be a great blessing.

But Feinstein and Davidmann were not the only ones: the Christian Jews had several martyrs. In Chishinau there lived a group who were very active. Their leaders, the engineer Tarlev, Trachtmann and Schmil Ordienski, were deported to Siberia because of their faith when the Russians arrived in Bessarabia in 1940, and there they were killed. In the hope that it may serve as a lesson to others, I will mention that this group lived in a state of acute conflict with the Baptist Church in the same town, a conflict which was based on purely personal grounds. The passions aroused in the leaders acerbated the conflict to the extent that members of the two groups would cut one another in the street. But in Siberia, leaders of the Jewish Christian died side by side with the pastor of the Baptist congregation in Chishinau, Bushilf, for their faith. Why do we have to wait for the enemy to make us see reason?

I remember young Friedmann, a Christian Jew from Jassy, who was killed in the pogrom. The Jews were herded into a cattle truck, which was bursting at the seams. Friedmann peeped out through a little window, and someone on the platform who happened to catch sight of him told us later that his face shone like an angel's. A German soldier fired at him, and mortally wounded him.

During the war, Jews were forbidden to travel. It was not until later that I was allowed to make my way to Jassy to reorganize the Christian Jewish community there, which after the pogrom consisted only of women. On this occasion I visited Friedmann's mother. I tried to comfort her, and to tell her of Jesus. It proved impossible. Her husband and all her four sons had been killed on one and the same day by people who called themselves Christians. Her heart was like a stone.

God, who inspired the author of Exodus to write: "And Moses spake so unto the children of Israel: but they hearkened not unto Moses for anguish of spirit, and for cruel bondage" (EXO 6:9), and also inspired Job to exclaim: "Oh that my grief were thoroughly weighed, and my calamity laid in the balances together! For now it would be heavier than the sand of the sea" (JOB 6:2-3), would also find an excuse for this woman, whose heart had been completely hardened. She had but one answer to everything: "If God existed, then he would have restored at least one of my five dear ones to me."

I could not persist, but withdrew, in deference to this unspeakable sorrow.

Shall I tell the story of Marica? When the Kallai government ordered the deportation of Hungarian Jews to the death camps of Auschwitz, Treblinka and elsewhere, exceptions were made of Christian Jews who had been born to baptized parents. Marica, who had studied theology at the Reformed Faculty, was one of these. But she withheld the secret of her birth, which would have given her this privilege, and voluntarily reported at the assembly point from which the Jews were to be deported. She wished to accompany the others to the death camp, so that right to the end she could bear witness of her faith to the victims of anti-Semitic persecution, and then die with other members of her race. Marica was one of the few who survived Auschwitz. Together with other women survivors she made her way through Bucharest en route for Israel. They called her "Saint Marica." In Israel, the unavoidable psychological reaction after the strain of such a heroic deed followed. The Bible does not tell us what happened to the three young men after they left the fiery furnace. It is better so. But God is not unjust, and has not forgotten her sacrifice. A simple understanding of the laws of psychology would have saved her from much depression.

Christian peasants from Cetatea Alba, who were forced to stand by and watch, helpless and in tears, while SS troops executed Jews from this town, have described how a young Jewess, hitherto unknown to them, called out to other Jews as they faced the firing-squad: "We are expiating the sin of not receiving Jesus, the true Messiah of our race. But believe in Him and you will awake happy in His paradise."

There are many Christian Jews who suffered imprisonment for their faith. Pastor Milan Haimovici was imprisoned for many years under the Communist regime because of his faith, and those who were imprisoned with him, including anti-Semites, had only words of praise for him, calling him a hero. When he was released he was met with indifference, and even hatred, by his colleagues, for whose sake he had even suffered the torture of having his feet placed on glowing coals, but without informing against them. His martyrdom was disparaged even by those who preferred not to suffer for Jesus, but this only makes his suffering all the more glorious.

It would of course be impossible for me to mention everyone. Suzana Golder was arrested when she was only seventeen because she preached the Word of God to some Fascists, who promptly took her off to their headquarters. The commanding officer started his interrogation by giving her a violent blow across the face. She immediately turned her other cheek, and asked: "Won't you hit me again?" - "What sort of question is that?" the officer asked. She replied: "Jesus, whom you say you worship, commanded that when a man strikes you on one cheek, you shall turn the other." The man who had struck her was so astonished that he immediately ordered her to be set free.

This is not the only incident of this nature. Another Christian Jew, Bianca, was forced to undergo great suffering because she distributed the gospel to some Russian soldiers. It would be unjust not to remember Rumanian brothers and sisters, who names cannot for obvious reasons be mentioned at the present time, who spent years in prison because they had faithfully helped the Christian Mission to the Jews. Countless young Christian Jews were ill-treated by their parents on account of their Christian faith.

Generally speaking, Christian Jews are forced to suffer a great deal. They suffer at the hands of some of their own people, who do not understand them. They are forced to suffer at the hands of the "Christian" anti-Semites, in whose eyes they are, and will always remain, "dirty Jews"; and they suffer at the hands of the atheists.

Hebrew Christians are often humiliated by their co-nationals, but this should not surprise us in view of the attitude that so-called Christians, with their disgusting anti-Semitism, have stirred up in the souls of the Jews. The most important anti-Semitic organizations in Rumania were named the Legion of the Archangel Michael (despite the fact that in the Bible the Archangel is referred to, in Daniel, Chapter 12, as the protector of the children of Jewish people) and the National Christian Defence League.

I asked one of the leaders of an organization of this kind what he meant by the word Christian. His definition was: "Being a Christian means being against the dirty Jews." And this man was against the Jews not only in word but also in deeds, with his stick. It is not surprising, therefore, that at the opposite pole, the idea has arisen that being a Jew means being opposed to Christianity.

The human mind is perverted by noxious complexes of many kinds, and we Christian Jews, who stand at the crossroads where many a violent storm rages, are compelled to suffer at the hands of many people.

But is this suffering not for our own good?

St. Gregory of Nazianzus wrote of the Christian Church in the fourth century, which was liberated by Constantine the Great: "We have lost the greatness and the strength we had during our persecution and troubles."

Jerome wrote in similar terms: "From the time of the coming of the Saviour until now, that is to say, from the time of the Apostles up to the present, the congregation of Christ, after being born and growing, became great during its persecutions and was crowned with martyrdom. But since the Christians have become strong, this congregation has in truth increased because of its tradition and wealth, but has decreased in virtue."

I am convinced that the humble position of the Christian Jews is ordained by God. Through many tribulations they are prepared, not only to enter into God's kingdom, but also to play a leading role in the work of establishing it. The Apostle Paul tells us that the receiving of the Jews, their conversion to Jesus, will be life from the dead (ROM 11:15). If carrying a heavy cross today did not mean preparation for future glory, our good Lord would not allow us to endure so much suffering.

Might it not be true that many Christians in the western world are no longer persecuted because they no longer frighten Satan, because they are unfaithful to Jesus? The Christian Jews should be grateful to God for persecution and for the martyrs they have fostered in so many parts of the world.

One Christian Jew, the well-known professor of theology, Neander, has written: "Oh, what soft-minded and weak witnesses, with what cold feelings, we are, who nevertheless still call ourselves Christians! We must feel ashamed when we remember the days of Ignatius and Polycarp [Christian martyrs of the second century who were devoured by lions] and others, and we shall wish that we had died a thousand times for Christ. Most of us, even the greatest theologians, are very different from the martyrs. We do not like to be looked at askance, we push aside any difficulty we may have with regard to the truth, and yet we are people of reputation and great theologians, but only in words - not in deed."

God grant that both the Christian Jews and the Gentile Christians will take these reproaches to heart, and openly condemn the crimes of this world, at the risk of having to suffer the martyr's death!

We are proud that among the Jews, too, the blood of martyrs has been shed for the sake of Jesus. Let us learn from these our noble pioneers to carry our cross, and to carry it with joy!

3 ARGUMENTS FOR THE RESURRECTION

~Encounter on a Train~

The year was 1939. I was travelling by train from Cernauti to Bucharest, and on the seat opposite sat a renowned rabbi from Cernauti. When he saw me reading the Bible, he asked me who I was.

"A Christian Jew," I told him.

He was highly astonished. "If you are a Jew, why did you become a Christian?"

"Because I believe that Jesus is the Saviour."

"But, young man, how can you maintain anything of the kind? What makes you believe that Jesus was our Messiah?"

"In this Bible there are many proofs, and I can't read them all off at once for you in the train. But there is one proof above all others: His resurrection. If Jesus had been a deceiver, or a man who deluded himself, God would not have performed the miracle of raising Him from the dead."

"I should like to see that happening, a young man convincing a rabbi that Jesus rose from the dead. Go ahead, young man, I'll give you twenty minutes."

Here are some of the main arguments I quoted to the rabbi.

"What is the source of our knowledge of ancient history? The historians of their age, among them men like Homer, Herodotus and Julius Caesar. What is the source of our knowledge of the doings of Jesus? Contemporary historians: their names are Matthew, Mark, Luke, John, Paul and so on. Why should we believe some historians and not others?

"Our intelligence should behave like an impartial court of witnesses. In evaluating evidence we must consider not only what the witness says, but also his character and his trustworthiness. The credibility of the historians who described the life of Jesus is undoubtedly much greater than that of other historians. For who were the latter? Generally, they were paid to write by a royal personage, and their aim was not to make known the truth. They desired to flatter their master, their people, or the social class to which they belonged. By contrast, the historians who wrote the Gospels are of an entirely different stature. They risked loss of liberty and death for what they wrote. Matthew died as a martyr in Abyssinia, John was condemned to slave labour on the island of Patmos, and Paul was beheaded in Rome. Peter was crucified head downwards. No impartial court would lightly dismiss the evidence of witnesses ready to suffer much hardships for what they assert. All of them declare unanimously that they were convinced by seeing, hearing and touching, of the reality of Jesus's resurrection from the dead."

The rabbi attempted to interrupt. I reminded him that he had promised to let me have my say.

"I know that this argument can be contradicted. What the other historians relate are things that can easily be understood and believed. They write about wars, court intrigues, kings' favourites, plots, murder, things that happen even today, whereas the writers of the Gospels tell us of things that run counter to our human experience. Among other things, they write about a virgin birth, of the healing of lepers by a simple touch, of walking on the water, of the feeding of a great multitude with a few loaves, of men rising from the dead, and finally of Jesus' own resurrection, which was followed by His ascension into heaven. All these things come into the category of miracles, whereas we are modern people who no longer believe in miracles."

Tradition tells us that Jesus spoke from the time of His birth. This has been regarded by rationalists as pure fantasy. Had this conversation taken place thirty years later, I could have told the rabbi that in the 1960s, papers all over the world reported that a child had been born in Yugoslavia which spoke and answered questions from the day it was born. The evangelists were cautious men, and anxious not to make the gospel difficult to understand, and they did not record whether Jesus spoke from His birth. How people would have mocked the Gospels if they had written this! But today an event that is so unusual in the natural order of things has taken place before our very eyes.

In 1963 the newspapers reported that a French boy of about sixteen, when his abdomen was opened up, was found to be "pregnant." What should have been his twin had developed inside his body. How the rationalists would have laughed if the evangelists had written that a man had been pregnant!

"As to the miracles that Jesus performed," I told the rabbi, "they occurred in the sphere of the exceptional, whose existence cannot be denied. In everyday life it is not only ordinary things that occur. A man who does not believe in miracles is not a realist.

"Furthermore, men consider as miracles things which a person with greater than average intelligence or muscular power can do, and which a weak person with an ordinary intelligence is incapable of doing. Missionaries who have worked among primitive tribes record that the savages regard them as miracle-workers; and this is not surprising, since primitive people spend hours rubbing two pieces of wood together in order to produce a spark, whereas the missionary knows how to produce fire from a box of matches. He can even make stinking water burn. How is the savage to know that this stinking water is petrol? The writer Pearl Buck tells us that when she told peasant women in backward parts of China that in England there were houses built on top of one another, and that carriages moved through the streets without being drawn by horses, one of the women whispered: 'What a lie! That sort of thing is impossible.' With sixty Spaniards under his command, Cortez conquered the powerful Aztec kingdom, because he appeared to the people he conquered to be a miracle-maker. In the first place, the very appearance of the Spaniards was miraculous. Never before had the Aztecs seen white men. Secondly, the newcomers possessed miraculous firearms. And so a huge kingdom fell into the hands of a few adventurers without a struggle.

"Jesus had a spiritual force such as no other person has ever possessed. It is not surprising that He was capable of performing miracles. Being exceptional, He could do unique things, which would have been impossible for ordinary men.

"It is foolish to be prejudiced, and declare that miracles are impossible, and to reject them without carefully examining the evidence of people as trustworthy as the apostles. Rabbi, you cannot avoid miracles. Either you can believe in Jesus's miraculous resurrection from the dead, or you have to believe in another miracle which is still greater - namely, that an effect exists without a cause, because if Jesus did not rise from the dead, the existence of the universal Church would be such a miraculous happening.

"Let us see how things stand: Jesus wrote no book, nor, while He lived on earth, did He establish anything but a very insignificant sect within Judaism, a sect consisting of a few people who were unlearned, and who were not considered reputable citizens - sinful men, publicans and fallen women. Finally, one of his closest followers betrayed Him, another denied Him, and the others deserted Him. He died on a cross, abandoned, and apparently despairing, because as He hung on the cross He cried out: 'My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?' After His death He was buried, a large stone was placed in front of His sepulchre, and guards were posted. Meanwhile, His former disciples remained in hiding, behind locked doors, and their only concern was to escape a death similar to that of their Master. This was how Jesus's life on earth ended. If Jesus did not rise, how has the Christian Church come into being?

"We have an explanation. On the third day, Jesus came back to life from the dead, and appeared on numerous occasions to His apostles, assuring them that it was really Himself they saw. They came together again; the risen Jesus worked with them, guiding them and giving them power to do signs and wonders. The very same cowardly Peter who had previously denied any knowledge of Jesus with curses and oaths, stood up in the marketplace in Jerusalem, courageously testifying that he had seen the risen Jesus. The other apostles did so, too. Risking death, they travelled from one country to another, sealing with a martyr's death their conviction that Jesus had risen. In this way, the universal Church was born, it has grown, and it has survived, despite persecution and the unworthiness of its members. If you are not prepared to admit that Jesus has risen from the dead, then this tremendous effect, which the Christian Church represents - a Church that has survived for two thousand years, and has millions of members - is an effect without a cause. It takes a greater naivety to accept the existence of such an effect without cause than to admit that Christ has really risen.

"When a man enters a tall building, it might be a good idea, before climbing the stairs to the tenth floor, to go down first into the cellar and make sure that the foundations are sound. But why should it be necessary to do this? The fact that the building is standing is proof of the strength of the foundations. The foundation stone on which the Christian Church was built is the resurrection of Jesus. The large, well-known building founded on this stone has stood for two thousand years, and has resisted tremendous earthquakes. After all, in every sphere of life, it is common practice to draw conclusions from effect to cause. The existence of the Church is a proof that Christ has risen.

"Let us proceed to another argument with regard to the resurrection of Jesus. Nowhere do we find that the enemies of the primitive Church at any time denied that the sepulchre of Jesus was found to be empty on Easter morning. It would have been quite natural for an investigation to have been set on foot, to discover whether the body had been stolen or desecrated. The reaction of the Jewish priests does not contradict the assertion that the grave was empty; they merely told the soldiers who had guarded the sepulchre to spread the rumour that His disciples had come during the night, while they were asleep, and stolen the body. Now, if they were asleep, then how could they have identified the thieves? Augustine rightly asks: 'Does the synagogue introduce us to witnesses who were asleep when this deed was carried out?' If the Jewish priests really believed that Jesus's disciples had stolen the body, why were they not arrested, interrogated, and punished?

"A strong movement must be carried forward by a strong impetus. The strong movement that has lasted for two thousand years, and which has had a world-wide effect, based on the belief in the resurrection of Jesus, cannot have been the product of hallucination, as none of Jesus's disciples were men who suffered from hallucinations, certain not Doubting Thomas and the practical businessman Matthew, nor such men of the sea as Andrew, nor the cautious Nathaniel, nor Peter with his weak character. Only an event as tremendous as a real resurrection could have produced an impetus capable of starting a movement of this kind. Nor must we forget that during the first thirty years after this event, most of Jesus's disciples suffered a violent death, and many of them were condemned to death precisely because they maintained that Jesus had risen from the dead. These things cannot have been invented.

"Under the very noses of the Jewish priests, Jesus's apostles start to preach to the Jewish people, and in this way they come into conflict with the authorities, as they declare that Jesus is the Messiah, a fact which was proved by His resurrection. Any sensible person may ask: 'Would it be possible to launch a movement of this kind, and recruit thousands of supporters in a single day, if the dead body of Jesus had really existed?' Peter preached his first sermon only a few hundred yards from Jesus's sepulchre. If Jesus's enemies had been in a position to prove that His body was still there, the sermon would have been a failure, and would never have persuaded thousands of people to be baptized. But their enemies were powerless: Jesus was not in the tomb.

"The apostles did not visit the tomb of Jesus, because it had no significance as far as they were concerned, and because they would not be interested in it. (Saul of Tarsus, after he was converted, came to Jerusalem and met the apostles, but was not concerned with visiting the tomb, not even out of mere respect.) Nor did His enemies investigate the tomb, to convince themselves and convince others that Jesus was still there. This is yet another proof that Jesus really rose from the dead. A great many people undertake pilgrimages to the tombs of minor saints. Even though the first apostles knew of this custom in Israel (MTT 23:29), they were not interested in visiting Jesus's tomb, because they knew that it was empty.

"All this was so universally accepted that the disciples started preaching, not in a provincial town, where it would be difficult to check their statements, but in Jerusalem itself, arousing the enthusiasm of thousands of people and - what was still more remarkable - facing enemies who were powerless, because they were not in a position to deny that Jesus's tomb was empty. When the priests maintained that the body of Jesus had been stolen by the apostles, anyone could have answered them: 'Why don't you arrest and sentence the men who have carried out this theft?'

"The suggestion that Jesus did not die on the cross, but merely fell into a deep swoon, and recovered consciousness in the cool tomb, is still more ridiculous. How could He have pushed aside the stone, and overpowered the guards, after so much suffering? Could He have gone anywhere, naked as He was? He could have sought shelter only with one or other of His disciples. Had He done this, however, His disciples would have realized that He had not risen from the dead.

page 103 CHRIST ON THE JEWISH ROAD

Would they have really given their lives for a lie which they themselves had hatched?

"We are compelled to believe what the Gospel writers say, because they reveal such naivety when relating terrible things about themselves. What induced the apostles to spread abroad by word of mouth and in their writings that their leader, Peter, was a man whom Jesus had called Satan, and that he had denied Him on the night that He was betrayed? The only motive I can discover is that they showed an uncompromising regard for the truth. The band of apostles is a collection of men who are guided by the truth. We can trust their evidence.

"The remarkable thing is that when the apostles affirm the resurrection of Jesus to an audience of doubters (even in those days people were sceptical about stories of angels, resurrections and so on, as we can see in Matthew, Chapter 22, verse 23, and Acts, Chapter 17, verse 32), they merely affirm, without producing a single confirmatory piece of evidence. This was possible because what they maintained was well-known and undisputed fact among the inhabitants of Jerusalem. The risen Jesus, after all, had at one time appeared to five hundred persons, and these must have had about twenty thousand relatives and friends whom they told about it.

"The resurrection of Jesus can also be proved by two very famous conversions which could not be explained in any other way.

"The first was the conversion of James, the brother of Jesus, to a faith in Him as the Messiah. While Jesus lived on earth, James did not believe in Him, but considered Him to be mad. Josephus Flavius describes James as a very upright man. How was it possible that he became an apostle and martyr after the death of Jesus? Anyone reading James's letter (the Straw Epistle, as Luther calls it) will note that this is a Jewish letter, without any Christian characteristics. This leads us to realize that it was not the teaching of Jesus that made impression on James, and brought about his conversion. What was the cause? It can only have been what we are told in the New Testament, that Jesus after His resurrection appeared to His brother, and that the latter admitted his mistake, and in remorse wrote the chapter in which he condemns his own former sin of judging and speaking about his brother.

"The second conversion was that of the rabbi Saul of Tarsus. This man had a vision on the road to Damascus, in which Jesus appeared to him and spoke to him, whereupon Saul immediately became a disciple. Would this have been possible on purely psychological grounds? Even though Mohammed were to appear to me ten times, I should tell myself that I was suffering from hallucinations, and I certainly should not become a Mohammedan. Why should things have turned out so differently for the man who was to become the future apostle Paul? He knew that Jesus's tomb was empty, without being able to find a plausible explanation for this fact, unless he admitted to himself that Jesus had risen. This was the crux of the matter: when he saw Jesus, the last shred of doubt disappeared. He was converted. He later made his way to Jerusalem, but he had not the slightest intention of going to the tomb in order to shed tears of remorse there. He knew it was empty. He discussed with the apostles how to preach the resurrection. It would have been a psychological impossibility for the apostles, being the sort of men they were, to discuss how best to preach a lie.

"And here is another argument: millions of sinners in the history of mankind have changed their mind and become holy people. This miracle is happening daily in the Church. If you ask these people how this miracle of rebirth happened, their answer is always that Jesus did it. It is certain that it is a living Jesus, not a dead one, who has brought about these new births. I am one of these people.

"The cumulative force of these arguments compels me to believe in the resurrection of Jesus. But let me turn to an argument from a person of real authority. Professor Theodor Mommsen, the great historian of the Roman Empire, wrote: 'The resurrection of Jesus is the event in ancient history which has been more conclusively proved than any other event.' That is all I need to tell you.

page 105 CHRIST ON THE JEWISH ROAD

"There is something more. If a woman's husband is missing in a war and believed to be dead, and then one, two, three, four people, in fact countless people, come and tell her that they have seen him in a prisoner-of-war camp, then the wife will trust those people. We are in the same situation. Those who believed that Christ was dead, heard the witness of the women, of the apostles, of the disciples on the road to Emmaus, of five hundred people who had seen Him on the same day. After this it was only normal for them to believe that Jesus was no longer dead, but alive."

After I had finished speaking, the rabbi was silent for several minutes. Then he got up, opened the door, and said to me: "Even if He has risen, what has that to do with me?" And he walked out. When he returned to the compartment, neither he nor I spoke a word still we reached Bucharest.

During the tragic events of the war, this rabbi was killed by the Fascists.

Many years passed. One evening, during a week of evangelistic mission, the church was full to bursting. Instead of preaching a sermon, I told my listeners of my conversation with the rabbi. When I had finished, a young Jewish woman student came up to me and said: "You have convinced me, too, that Jesus is risen, but for me it means a great deal."

The same arguments affected two persons quite differently.

Returning for a moment to the rabbi, I must add that, generally speaking, I have found many rabbis very ill-prepared to answer our arguments. I once talked to one of the Berlin rabbis, who had fled to Rumania. I showed him the text in the ninth chapter of Isaiah, which foretells the coming into the world of the Messiah, declaring: "For unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given: and the government shall be upon his shoulder: and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, The mighty God, The everlasting Father, The Prince of Peace. Of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end ..." (ISA 9:6-7). This passage contains an orthographical curiosity. In Hebrew, the letter M is written at the beginning and in the middle of a word with the sign ["character"], and only at the end of a word as a closed square. This orthography is rigidly adhered to throughout the Old Testament, except in one particular case. In this verse, in the word ~lemarbe~ (increase), a final M, [ ], appears in the middle of the word. This orthographical mistake has never been corrected. A final M, [ ], which should occur only at the end of the word is written in the middle of one.

I asked the rabbi if he could explain this, but he could give me no answer. I then told him of the Kabbalistic tradition, that Isaiah put a [ ] in the middle of the word, in order to show the reader who was destined to understand it that the Divine Child of whom this prophecy speaks would be born of the closed womb of a virgin.

Many other arguments, which I personally consider more conclusive, would have made a far smaller impression on the rabbi than this one. He had no further counter-argument when I told him that the Messiah is the man who was born of the Virgin Mary, and when I explained that because the Messiah bears our sins, which according to the prophet Isaiah results in His being bruised, every person who recognizes that the Messiah is killed for our sins will no more bear his own guilt.

Among other rabbis I have even come across sympathy for Jesus. When I told an old rabbi that Jesus is the Messiah whose coming Isaiah had prophesied, he shook his head and said: "No! Jesus does not need to be accredited by Isaiah. Compared to Him, Isaiah is small. It is not because of Isaiah that the world believes in Jesus, but the other way round; because of Jesus, millions of people also appreciate Isaiah. Jesus is the sun[?]."

Then there are other rabbis, who are rabbis merely by profession, as are many Christian priests and pastors.

I once spoke to a rabbi who was a liberal, and tried to convince him that Jesus was the Son of God. After listening politely, he answered: "You wish me to believe in the Son, but I don't even believe in the Father. If God existed, He would not have allowed my family to be killed in Auschwitz."

~We discover modern theology~

The moment came for our first encounter with English books of modern theology. We had not even known that modernists existed: the Bible was dear to us because it contained the message of Jesus. We accepted it, and regarded it as the word of God. We did not dissect it, or criticize it, but rather we allowed it to criticize us.

Now we heard and read about various human sources of the Bible which even contradicted one another, and that the Bible contained some things that were later additions. It was denied that Jesus had done wonderful things, or else His miracles were interpreted in such a way that in the end there was nothing left.

I was profoundly shocked. I know of a former preacher who, after reading a book by a Christian modernist, completely lost his faith, and even went so far as to write anti-Christian, atheistic book himself. This man was separated from God for years. Other people, including myself after I had been released from prison, were able subsequently to help him to recover his faith.

Marx began as a Christian. Two liberal theologians, Bruno Bauer and Strauss, destroyed his faith.

Rumanian Christians are fundamentalists. I do not know a single modernist, nor do I know what benefits we could derive from modernism.

It is true that the Bible exhorts us to "sing unto the Lord a new song" (PSA 96:1). Every century must compose its own song of praise to God in its own particular style. It is written in Leviticus, Chapter 19, verse 3, [LEV 19:3] that the animal which is brought to the temple for sacrifice must be a ~benshana~, "of the first year." I do not live in the first century nor in the Middle Ages, and it would not be normal for me to have religious ideas belonging to those times. There must be progress in our thinking about God, too.

So modernism is not modern: it is very ancient. The Syrian Codex Sinaiticus, a New Testament manuscript from the second century, refers to Jesus simply as "the son of Joseph," and omits the story of the virgin birth, about which the man who wrote it probably knew nothing. Augustine considered it blasphemous to believe in the first three chapters of the Bible as the literal truth. Origen stated that the story of the Creation, as it stands, is absurd and contradictory. Luther said that he did not believe that God created man "~in einem Hui~," all at once.

There are, of course, passages in the Bible which are very primitive. Who would condone the methods used to diagnose and cure leprosy as described in Leviticus Chapter 13? Even the fundamentalists permit themselves their own modernism.

The fault of the real modernists is that they go too far: all of a sudden the liberties they take can no longer be distinguished from others merely quantitatively; they are different in quality.

Modernists deny miracles. In the twentieth century, when the word "impossible" no longer exists, they declare that miracles are impossible! The virgin birth, the miraculous healings, the feeding of the five thousand, the physical resurrection from the dead; are these so impossible? In nature, it is not only the usual that exists: Mozart, after all, was composing music at the age of four.

Christ belongs to the sphere where the unusual is natural.

The American biologist L”bhas fertilized sea urchins, and produced live specimens by chemical means, without the use of male semen. Would it not be possible for God to create out of man what the biologist can create out of a lower form of life?

At the beginning of this century there lived in the Ukraine a rabbi by the name of Hofetz Haim. When the first world war broke out, one of his disciples was arrested as a result of anti-Semitism, on the false charge that he was spying for Germany. The rabbi was summoned as a defence witness. He was ordered to take the oath, but he refused, saying: "I can never remember having told a lie in my life, but I refuse to take the oath, as I do not want to bring God's holy name into a testimony, as an untruth might slip in against my will."

The prosecutor was delighted to be rid of an awkward witness. But the defence needed him badly, and so the lawyer, a Russian, asked that the rabbi should be listened to as a source of information, and he declared: "Your honour, allow me to relate one episode from the life of this rabbi, so that you may understand that he is an outstanding man who can be believed, even without taking the oath."

The president gave his assent, and the lawyer continued: "One day the rabbi went from one Jewish shop to another, collecting gifts for poor Jews. A thief lay in wait for him. That evening, when his collecting-box was full, the thief approached the rabbi and said to him: 'Perhaps you could change ten rubles?' The rabbi, who was glad to be rid of so much small change, opened his box, but with a swift movement the thief seized it, and ran off with it.

"The rabbi was horrified, not because he had lost the money - he immediately made up his mind to make good the loss from his own pocket - but because of the serious sin the thief had committed by stealing the money that belonged to the poor. He ran after the thief as fast as his old legs could carry him, and cried out: 'You have not stolen this money, it is yours. I have given it to you as a gift. I have got the poor people's money at home.'"

In amazement the president of the court interrupted the lawyer and asked him: "Do you really believe this story?" The lawyer answered: "No, I don't." The judge interrupted him angrily: "Why do you tell us stories that you do not believe yourself? You are quite out of order."

The lawyer answered: "Your honour, please do not be angry. Has a story of this kind ever been told about yourself, about the prosecuting counsel, or about me? Several stories are told about us, but these are in tune with our characters and our habits. It may be said of me that I have chased a lot of women, that I have often been drunk, and that I have cheated at cards, more than I have really done. What a just and holy man this rabbi must be, for such legends to circulate about him!"

The significance of this story is clear enough: no medical commission has ever established Mary's virginity; there is no written evidence, submitted by scientists, to support the miracles performed by Jesus. But this does not mean that we can reject the stories in the Gospels.

One day, when my son was so small that he could not possibly know anything about sex, or what a virgin is, he asked me: "Daddy, how was Jesus born?" I answered: "But I've told you many times – he was born in a stable, and laid in a manger." "That's not what I want to know," the child answered. "You always say: like father, like son. If Jesus was born just like us, then He would have been bad, like us. So He must have been born in quite a different way."

The men and women who knew Jesus had precisely the same feeling as my son. Those who believed in Him were convinced of His virgin birth.

If He was so good and innocent and pure, if He was such a unique person, why, then, should He not also have been born in a unique manner? Why should he not also have risen from the dead?

One day a distinguished personality in the Lutheran Church came to see me on an administrative matter. After we had settled the financial problems, I asked him if he believed in Jesus. He was horrified that I should have asked him, one of the country's leading laymen in the Church, a question of this kind. I asked him to overlook his annoyance, and answer my question. Finally he said: "There is no valid juridical proof of Jesus's resurrection." I submitted the same evidence to him which I had submitted to the rabbi from Cernauti. I asked him to assume the role of judge, and to evaluate the juridicial quality of the arguments I had submitted. He confessed that he now believed in the resurrection, was converted and also brought his wife into the faith. Later he reproved the bishop for having nominated him to such a high church office before making sure that he was a true child of God.

If you, too, analyze the evidence, you will realize the truthfulness of what the Gospels tell. The Bible in itself contains proof that it is telling the truth. Modernism sins by reducing Jesus to a human personality who was nothing more than a great leader, a martyr to the truth, but about whom we know really very little, since the Gospels are not to be trusted. Modernism is negative: it takes away people's faith, and gives them nothing in return.

Of course, criticism of biblical texts is necessary, but not in the sense understood by the liberal school of theology.

It is assumed that the Old Testament text has been violated by rabbis.

For instance the martyr Justin, the Christian philosopher from the second century, maintained that the original of Psalm 96, verse 10, is: "The Lord has become King on the tree," but that the text was subsequently modified by the Jews. And after Ezra, Chapter 6, verse 22, there should have been a passage which ran as follows: "And Ezra said unto the people: this Passover is your Saviour and your refuge. And if you believe, then it shall come into your hearts, that they shall humiliate Him in spite of the signs that He has done, and that afterwards we shall hope in Him again, and this place shall never be laid desolate, saith the Lord God of Hosts. But if you do not believe, and do not hear these words that are spoke of Him, you shall be despised of the heathen." It is hard to believe that Justin should have invented this passage.

The Talmud also relates that the seventy rabbis who produced the Greek translation called the Septuagint, although they all worked in separate places, were inspired by the Holy Spirit to alter certain passages, all in the same way, in order not to offend other nations and races. In this legend, as in all others, there is undoubtedly a grain of truth: the texts of the Old Testament have undergone various modifications with a view to concealing certain facts. Strangely enough, the Septuagint still exerts a strong influence on practically all the translators of the Bible, who are thus translating the texts wrongly, as the rabbis had intended in days gone by.

Anyone comparing the manuscripts of the New Testament from the various centuries will note that here, too, there has been a gradual tendency to discard more and more of the various revolutionary and social characteristics of the primitive church.

But we possess the most important texts dealing with the life, miracles, suffering and resurrection of the Saviour, the texts dealing with the way to salvation. The efforts of some people to undermine the faith of millions are merely to be deplored.

But the honesty of the modernists is useful, even if their teachings are not well received; they stimulate others to seek the truth elsewhere.

We sought it in Christian mysticism.

The Bible is in part only a handful of notes of discussions which God entered into with Abraham, Moses, the prophets and Jesus, and of conversations which Jesus had with the apostles, when He lived on earth and after His glorification, and of the thoughts with which the Holy Spirit inspired them.

But has God become dumb? Is it not possible for us to hear His voice today also? Perhaps we, too, can become pure in heart, so that we can see Him?

I had already read a great many other theological books, but now I also read the modernistic ones, and I got the impression that their ideas were superficial. There is a great deal of vanity in these, as in any other profane books. Theologians quote one another, instead of purging their spirits of all that is unessential in this qualified history which has accumulated in the course of centuries, and going back to the original source of power.

In the second place, I got the impression that this Christian theology at best stops at Jesus. But Jesus Himself said: "No man cometh unto the Father, but by me" (JHN 14:5). He declares that it is not He Himself, but the Father, who is the goal. If we have come to the Father, whom the Mosaic Jews also seek, we should be able to give them a helping hand. We should be able to prove to them that Jesus is the way they must follow to reach their desired goal. If we get no further than Jesus, whom they contest, then our witness is of little interest to them.

page 113 CHRIST ON THE JEWISH ROAD

Up till now, the Scriptures had been windows through which we could see the reality of God; now we had opened the windows, so that we could look on the God of reality.

Some of us called the new experience the Baptism of the Holy Spirit; others called it the second blessing, or any other name. Suddenly our eyes were opened, and we saw the nature of things, instead of knowing merely by logic and intelligent conception. We now saw many of the things which normally are invisible. This meant that like butterflies or angels we fluttered from one flower to another. "The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh, and whither it goeth" (JHN 3:8). For this reason we were often misunderstood.

As it is with God, our thoughts became reality. In Hebrew ~davar~ means both "word" and "thing." The words of the Bible became more and more a reality in which we lived.

We broke away from the cycle of sin - forgiveness - fresh sin, in which many believers pass their whole lives. Like Paul, we forgot what lay behind us. Paul never forgot that he had been a persecutor of the Church, and he regretted it. But the power of the past to influence his present life became less and less. And in the measure in which he became a new creature, the old sins seemed less to have belonged to him, but to somebody else, to the old Saul of Tarsus who was dead. In the same way, we "forgot" the past, with its ugly sin. We lived a present with God.

When Jesus washed His disciples' feet, He also wiped them with a towel, because wet feet always indicate that they were once dirty and needed to be washed. But once they have been dried, feet are clean. The Bible tells us that in Canaan Jesus turned water into the best wine; but old wine is the best. Jesus transformed water not into new wine, but into wine that was already old, that had been in existence for a long time. We were not justified by being converted, but in our conversion our eyes were opened, so that we could see a purity which we had already possessed long ago: we saw that we had always been pure in His eyes.

Our ideas took a new turn: we realized that we now partook of eternal life, not by believing in Jesus, but that we had always had a special form of life, eternal life, because we were destined from eternity to be God's children. It is impossible to distinguish, at an early age, the embryo of an ape from that of a man. At a certain moment the difference becomes visible, but it has always been there. Mary Magdalene, during her life of sin, was indistinguishable from any other courtesan, but she had always been one of God's elect. Her conversion was the moment when the difference was seen. We suddenly recognized, when the veil was taken from our eyes, our elder brother, Jesus, whom we had known long ago. "To know is to recognize," said Plato. We had proof of this.

We all live without remembering anything of our very early childhood, of our dreams or even of seventy-five per cent of what we do when we are awake. Why then should we nurture only the remembrance of our past sins?

Just as Jesus never made any mention of His early life before He was thirty years old, so we, too, did not stop at what had been, but every day we entered rejoicing into the holy of holies.

In me this release was caused by a very simple event, which I now recount for the first time. I was sitting writing in my study. In the room was all I held dear on earth: my wife, my children, my books. Suddenly the light went out; there had been a fuse. I could see nothing, and a great fear came over me. "One day," it flashed through my mind, "everything will be dark, I shall die, and my eyes will be closed. I shall be lost to all I now love." It is difficult to explain rationally the feeling of fear that flooded over me for a split second. But at once I realized the great store of riches I could enjoy in the darkness as well as in the light - the consciousness of I, the blessing of thought. Feverishly I examined myself. God, Christ, the angels, hope of eternal life, faith, all remained, even in the dark. They would be with me, too, at the moment when my eyes closed in death.

Like lightning, the thought struck me that things in this life are like the fabric of a dream; they are very easily dissolved.

page 115 CHRIST ON THE JEWISH ROAD

It was then that I realized that the true nature of things is this quality of not being.

King Lisimachus surrendered when he was surrounded by the Scythians, forced to do so by hunger and thirst. After eating, he exclaimed: "How brief was the pleasure for which I sacrificed life and freedom!" So, in that fraction of a second, I realized that the soul tends to be attracted by the body, and neglects its great partner, God, who loves us with eternal love.

At that moment I passed over to the state where I lived the truth about the relative value of things, instead of merely knowing it. What I love in my human existence is transient, and one day it will have to be left behind. But the Divine Being, in which I have received a part through Jesus, is eternal. I experienced the reality of this myself, and for me the light would never be extinguished.

The words of the Scriptures: "Ye are gods (PSA 82:6), became a reality to me.

Light also represents a certain mass: when light falls on a plate, it brings a certain amount of power to bear on it.

Sunbeams bring with them the mass of the sun: light is not an insubstantial messenger of the sun, but a part of the sun itself which comes to us. In many ways, likewise, we are not merely heralds of God's light, but God Himself; in a humble form we are divine sparks scattered about the world to bring light.

This conviction of the majesty of God's child has never since left me. I thought, as did the first Christians, from whom we have received the expression: "He who sees a brother, sees God."

When I thought of Jesus, I no longer thought of Him from the verses of the Bible. I entered into a reality where His majesty was visible. As long as there are Jews, Jesus will be their king, whether they recognize Him or not.

This experience had a different starting-point in the case of other brothers and sisters; but many were raised by the Spirit to new faith.

A Catholic priest, who was present at one of our meetings, said: "I have spent an evening among the first Christians."

page 116 CHRIST ON THE JEWISH ROAD

The talks we had together in our gatherings took a new turn. We no longer talked about God, but from God.

Jesus now appeared to me in a new light. The sacrifice in the Jewish temple were consumed with fire. The sacrifice of Jesus, too, was consumed with the fire of love, which made us one with Him. Fire transforms all things into flames. In this way His sacrifice ceased to be a sacrifice made by one person for another. We are in Christ Jesus. As His elect, we were in Him also when He hung on the Cross.

When we looked at His Cross, we no longer thought of the use our souls could make of His suffering, for then we should have been like the soldiers who divided His garments among them. With such a good Saviour, salvation follows of itself. We asked ourselves another question: What are the reasons for which He allowed Himself to be crucified, so that we also may sacrifice ourselves for them and "fill up that which is behind of the afflictions of Christ in my flesh" (COL 1:24)? In other words, how can we recruit for His service a host of loving followers, who are prepared to suffer?

From now on a fire burned within us, as it did in the disciples on the road to Emmaus. "Snowflakes cannot fall on a hot stove," says an Indian proverb. The coldness of this world could no longer harm us, although we had to pass through bitter times.

We tried not to let love be frittered away in sentimentality, endeavouring rather to manifest it in what St. Francis de Sales so beautifully described as "the ecstasy of acts."

Religious meditation now received still greater emphasis. We knew that the time spent in meditation was not wasted. It is, after all, better to think for a whole day than to work in vain for a whole week.

In the supreme moment of bliss the object of meditation, the meditation itself, and the person meditating, became one in such a way that meditation no longer became a conscious act. God was working in the unfathomable depths of the soul, which never reach to the surface of our consciousness.

Those who have had an experience of this kind are often asked: "But do you no longer sin?"

page 117 CHRIST ON THE JEWISH ROAD

In our congregation great sins were still committed; I, too, committed great sins, even after I had had various mystical experiences. I shall not explain this, as I am much too small a person, but instead I shall let Meister Eckhardt speak: "Sin which is committed is not sin if we repent of it ... He who has truly subjected himself to the will of God need not even wish not to have encountered the sin into which he fell. Not of course to the extent to which the sin is directed against God, but because through it you are in bondage to a still greater love, and you are cast down and humiliated ... But if a man arise and entirely abandon his sins, faithful God will ensure that that man will be as though he had never fallen into sin, and He will not for a moment punish him for his sins. Even though his sins should be so numerous as those the whole of mankind might have committed, God will never punish him, and his relationship with God will be as intimate as God has ever entered into with any man. If man is prepared to do that now, God will not consider what has been.

God is the God of the present. He is prepared to accept you as you are today. In this way He receives you not as the person you have been, but as the person you are now."

There is no danger in this doctrine, provided we do not draw Luther's conclusion from it, "~Peccator fortiter~" - Sin greatly!

The Holy Spirit of God, on the other hand, reminded me that at a time when I had been a high official in a certain company, I had often acted incorrectly. But the Devil prevented me from making a clean breast of things. When I went to see my former boss, in order to confess, I found him in a despondent mood. He greeted me with the words: "You were the only honest employee I had. Today I have been told that one of my confidential clerks has stolen a large sum of money from me." This man had suffered a great blow, and this was obviously not the right moment to speak to him about my former dishonesty. But I was anxious not to have it weighing on my conscience. After a few days I wrote a confession, and offered to return what I had appropriated dishonestly, bit by bit.

Not only did he refuse to accept the money, but he told the big-time Jewish millionaires with whom he was on friendly terms, of my conversion. He became a Christian, together with his wife and son. Throughout the whole war I was able to devote my energies to preaching the gospel, because he, as well as a number of others, had arranged for me to receive a small monthly allowance.

4 THE FASCIST PERIOD

The beginning of the persecution

When old Pastor Adeney left us, he was replaced by a young man, Pastor Stevens. Both he and his wife were Christians who led very pure lives, and wished to spread the light around them. Their way of life testified to that correct Christianity which was common in England, but unknown in our part of the world, where even people who had been converted permitted themselves to do things which in the West would have been considered unworthy of a Christian. Their fairness and sincerity gave us much food for thought. We keep thankfulness to them. They left for what was meant to be a short vacation. But they could not return any more. Rumania had been taken over by a gang of anti-Semitic fanatics, whose hands were stained with a great deal of Jewish blood. They called themselves the Legionaires.

At that time the head of the Anglican Jewish Mission was a young priest called Roger Allison, a man we all remembered for his great humility. The humble man is strong in the Lord: by reducing himself to nothing, the humble man, joined with God, makes not two beings but one.

During the time he was our shepherd, our little community increased greatly. But we were also in great danger. If we went into town, we never knew whether we should come back. The Legionaires were hunting the Jews in the streets, and arresting them on all sorts of trumped-up charges. On many occasions I was only a hand's breadth from death.

I should like to relate two episodes.

One Sunday afternoon I was sitting in my flat. A meeting young people was taking place in the church. Suddenly a breathless young man burst into my room, shouting: "Come down to the church at once! There is a terrible disturbation going on!"

As I entered the church, I saw two young men. One of them whom I immediately recognized as a Jew, was shouting "Jewish brethren! Let us make our way to Russia! There we shall find happiness and freedom! With the victorious Soviet Army we shall return and overthrow the Fascists!"

Bessarabia, a province which up till then had been Rumanian territory, had been occupied by the Russians, and the Jews were fleeing ~en masse~ because of the anti-Semitic persecution. But the government of Rumania at the time was Fascist; such talk in our church might lead to arrests. It might even result in a great many people being killed.

I tried to stop the two young men, but it was impossible. They attacked me, shouting: "You are a traitor to the Jews! You are on the side of the Fascists!" It was impossible for me to call in the police to put an end to the commotion, as that would have meant informing on the two young men, and condemning them to a certain death. So I broke up the meeting, and asked everyone to leave the premises and go home, speaking to no one on the way. They obeyed me.

Next Sunday this scene was repeated. I did not know what to do. I thought of closing the church.

During those days a Legionaire was killed in the capital. No one knew who had killed him, but the Jews were afraid that they would be accused, and that there would be reprisals.

One evening, as I was sitting at home, the two young men who had caused the disturbance in the church, came to see me. "we have something on our conscience we should like to confess to you."

"Go ahead," I said.

Then they told me that it was they who had killed the Legionaire. Involuntarily I exclaimed: "How could you commit a crime like that? Did it not occur to you that this man had a mother or a wife?" They replied: "He deserved to be killed, because he was a Fascist." I said to them: "I can understand you coming to seek advice from me if you feel oppressed by the crime you have committed. If you are proud of it, then there is nothing I can do for you. But now that you have told me what you have done, I repeat: You have committed a crime. A Fascist, too, is a man, and must be respected as such. If he is our enemy, we must repay his hatred with love, and not kill him."

Thereupon they went away.

After the Legionaires had been overthrown by General

Antonescu, one of the young men, the one with the Jewish face, came again to see me.

"I must tell you how you escaped certain death," he said. "I am a young Communist who was captured by the Legion police while I was distributing illegal pamphlets. I was tortured, and to escape further ordeal I agreed to act as an ~agent provocateur~ for the Legionaires. The other man who was with me was one of their commissars. The idea was that he would pretend to be a Jew, and I was to go round with him, and enter the synagogues, Zionist organizations or wherever Jews were gathered together, and start pro-Communist discussions, insulting the Legionaires as much as I could. Anyone who fell for this trick, and agreed with me, would then be arrested by the Legion police and beaten. As an ~agent provocateur~ I came into your congregation, too, and I visited you in your home to confess to a murder which we had not committed. When I left your house, the Legion commissar exclaimed: 'I never thought I should hear a Jew say that Legionaires should be loved!"

An answer based on Jesus's teaching that we should love our enemies had saved me from certain death. This was not the only time.

We were faced with the problem of how to get our community recognized by the Legion state authorities, because they did not respect the old authorisations. But how were we to get a new one? It was dangerous for a Jew merely to try to enter a public building in order to apply for it.

Finally, Mr. Allison and I decided to visit a priest who was a member of the Legion, and had been appointed an inspector in the Ministry of Cults. We went to his home, but did not find him there. His wife asked us to wait for him. All the time, Legionaires were coming in and out of the house, with their greeting, "Long live the Legion and its Captain!" If they had known who we were, they would have torn us to pieces.

At last the priest turned up. When he heard my name, which sounds German, he was very pleasant, and asked us with a great show of kindness what we wanted. Great was his surprise when I told him: "I am a Jew who believes in Jesus, and represent a congregation of similar Jews. We have come to make two requests. In the first place, we do not want any exception to be made of us when anti-Semitic measures are set on foot, whether this involves confiscation of property, deportation or death. I don't want our Christian faith to bring us any material advantage. The second is this: the synagogues are operating freely, and we too would like to have the right to exercise our form of worship without interference."

The priest, who was known for his violent nature - on one occasion, at the head of a group of Fascists, he had demolished with an axe a Baptist church in his district - burst out laughing, shaking all over with mirth. "There are no such things as Christian Jews," he said. "The old Metropolitan Pimen once baptized a Jew in the Bahlui river in winter. A hole had to be cut in the ice, and when the Metropolitan dipped the Jew for the third time in the water" (this is Greek Orthodox practice) "he slipped out of his hands, slid under the ice, and vanished. The Metropolitan exclaimed: 'This is the only Jew who has been baptized and died a Christian!' Other Jews baptize only their skins, and lead an un-Christian life. I do not believe that you are Christians, either."

I answered: "You have every right to reproach us. It is presumptuous of a man to declare that he is a Christian when it is written that whoever says that he is in Christ Jesus must live as Jesus lived. We have tried to do this, but as yet we have not made a great deal of progress. So we are not angry when other real Christians, who are Jesuses in miniature, reproach us for the mistakes we make in our lives. But we beg you to give us a chance, and we shall do our very best."

He continued for a long time to insult and mock us, but we answered by confessing our sinfulness humbly, and not defending ourselves. Our answer was always the same: "Yes, we are wicked, despicable hypocrites as you say we are. But we have a faith which will save us from sin. We are liars, but our faith is the true faith. Give us an opportunity to prove it!"

I remembered one of the beautiful incidents related in the Patristic writings. It was said of Father Agathon that a great many people came to see him, as he enjoyed the reputation of being a good man. Some of them tried to make him angry, saying: "Are you Avva Agathon? We have heard of you, that you are an adulterer and a man of great pride." And he answered: "That is true, that is so." And they said to him: "Are you the Agathon who speaks ill of others?" And he said: "I am." And they said again: "Are you Agathon the heretic?" And he answered: "I am not a heretic." So they begged him: "Tell us, why did you admit everything we said to you, but refuse to admit that you were a heretic?" He answered: "I admitted the first charges, as this is useful to my soul. But the word 'heretic' means separation from God, and I do not wish to be separated from Him." When they heard this, they were amazed at his integrity, and they left his presence uplifted.

Defending oneself when faced with accusations is not worthy of a Christian. Neither Joseph in the Old Testament, nor the Virgin Mary, defended themselves when they were accused of things they had not done. Hold your peace, and God will defend you! You will be defended by the future development of events.

As the priest continued to rain down insults upon us, we answered his accusations against Christian Jews by admitting that they might be true, but we defended our faith. The result was that the priest suddenly changed his threatening tone: "I have been deliberately testing you, and I have discovered that you are worthier of bearing the name of Christian than we are. I shall expect you early tomorrow morning at the Ministry, and you will get the licence to continue your work."

The next day I was received by him in his office like a brother, and was given the authorisation that I had never dreamed I should obtain.

page 124 CHRIST ON THE JEWISH ROAD

Soon after this we lived through the bloody days when the Legionaires quarrelled with their friend General Antonescu and the Jews had to pay the bill for this.

Some people wonder whether the Devil really exists: the terrible chapters in the history of mankind are the best proof of his existence. Where a doctor diagnoses debility, subnormal temperatures, coughing, spitting, and strange noises in the lungs, he is no longer in doubt. This illness is caused by an invisible agent, the Koch microbe. And when I see misery spreading all over this world that has been blessed by God with all His good gifts, I assume the presence of an invisible agent, the Devil.

Jewish blood was a commodity of no value. Jews were collected wherever they were to be found, and taken to the woods or to the slaughterhouse and killed.

But anyhow the Legionary government was toppled, and now it was their turn to be arrested and killed. Our little Christian Jewish community was now in a position to help the families of the arrested anti-Semites. One family, in great distress, was just about to commit suicide when we managed to come to their rescue.

The Jews have often reproached us for extending our love to include the enemies of the Jews. We shall answer them with another story taken from the life of the Jews.

When the rabbi Susia from Anipole was still unknown, a Jew from the country used to visit him, bringing gifts. This Jew's prosperity grew from year to year.

On one occasion, when he returned Anipole, he found the rabbi away from home. On enquiring where he was, he was told: "He has gone to Meserici, to visit his great master."

The Jew thought to himself: "The best thing for me to do would be to visit the famous teacher myself. Then I could receive a blessing from a greater authority than the rabbi Susia." So he made his way to Meserici, gave a gift to the teacher, and received his blessing. But from that day good luck deserted him and his house: his fortune gradually decreased, his business affairs went from bad to worse, and finally stark poverty started him in the face.

In his distress, he went to see the rabbi Susia and told him everything. The rabbi answered: "Our wise men have said that God requites on the same scale that we offer to him. You must know that as long as you made no choice, and gave help to poor Susia, God did the same to you, and He gave you riches. But as soon as you started to have preferences, and took a gift to a great man, then God too worked by preferences, and gave His help to someone who was more worthy than you."

We must not be selective in our good deeds. The enemy we have conquered must also have our help. But any help given to an enemy while he is in power is wrong, because it makes us his accomplices.

Of course we owe Christian love to everyone: as Christian Jews we must learn to show humanitarianism also to suffering and defeated anti-Semites, and to do this in deeds and not merely in empty words.

"~What shall I do to be saved?~"

Now, under Antonescu, another anti-Semite government was in power. Our permit to worship, given by the Legionaires, was no longer valid. When Britain broke off diplomatic relations with Rumania, the English pastor and all the teachers had to leave. The English Church Mission was dissolved. The buildings which had belonged to the Mission had been administered by a German. He closed down the assembly hall, and ejected us from our flat.

Our little congregation, which now consisted of about one hundred adult members, was left without a shepherd who cared for a small flock of converted Jews.

The leader of the Lutheran Church was a Nazi bishop who had acquired a certain notoriety as a result of a sermon in which he declared that mankind had three great models - Jesus, Beethoven and Hitler, but that Jesus was greater than Hitler. In keeping with the ideas of his own idiotic sermon, instead of using the old greeting, "Praised be Jesus," he stuck to "Heil Hitler."

Baptists, Pentecostalists and Adventists were also persecuted.

page 126 CHRIST ON THE JEWISH ROAD

The Greek Orthodox priests had persuaded General Antonescu to dissolve their congregations and confiscate their meeting houses, many of which were converted into dance halls and cinemas. Hundreds of brethren who belonged to these confessions were sentenced to as much as twenty years' imprisonment, and this at a time when we were told that the country was waging a holy crusade against Bolshevik atheism. The main accusation against all these religious groups was that they had become Judaised. The leaders of the Baptist congregation implored us: "Please don't come to us! If we receive a large group of Jews, we shall be still more bitterly persecuted."

Among the Greek Orthodox priests and hierarchy there were some who were my faithful friends. One priest published my articles at a time when anti-Semitism was at its peak. The Patriarch Nicodim himself intervened on our behalf. The old Archimandrite Scriban was tireless in our defence, and the same was true of others. But the bulk of the Orthodox priests were anti-Semitic. In their churches sermons were preached whose aim was to stir up the people against the Jews.

The Wandering Jew has no resting-place on earth; nor did the Christian Jews have anywhere to rest their heads within the Christian Churches. As time passed we were forced to accept this situation, and to regard anti-Semitism as a cross that would have to be borne patiently, gladly and without a murmur.

Nothing glorifies God more than the Bible does. Thomas Mnzer says that through the Cross you also learn the bitter Christ, and not only the sweet.

We could not decide what confession we should belong to. We were forced to accept the hospitality that was offered. Besides, we were not interested in denominational conflict. The Swedish and Norwegian missions to Israel, which were Lutheran, gave us their protection and their name. We were grateful for this.

And now we had to solve the problem of obtaining permission to hold meetings in our church.

I sent my visiting card to Mr. Sandu, a cabinet minister and head of the Ministry of Ecclesiastical Affairs. Thanks to my German name, I was admitted, and I started with the same approach as I had used a few months previously in my interview with the Legion priest: I expressed the hope that no exception would be made in our favour when anti-Semitic measures were set on foot, but said that until then we wanted to be allowed to practise our religion, in the same way as the Mosaic Jews were allowed to.

The Minister tried to brush me aside, suggesting that I should speak to the Director for Minority Groups, the Reverend Zenovie. I told him that I had just been to see Zenovie, but that I had not spoken to him. I had waited in his ante-room for a chance to talk to him, and I heard him send his servant to the devil because he had bought a different brand of cigarette from the one he had asked for. "He sends people to the devil, I bring them to God," I continued. "We two cannot understand one another. I do not wish to have an interview with him."

The Minister answered: "The Germans are in our country. We cannot give a permit of this kind to Jews."

I told him: "Mr. Minister, then I shall withdraw my application. We shall nevertheless continue to meet, at our own risk. But before I go I should like to tell you something. Priests of all denominations come to see you, to obtain assistance in the administrative problems. I wonder if a single one of them has spoken to you about your soul. A day will come when we shall no longer be ministers of state, clergymen, or anything else; we shall all stand naked and trembling before the Throne of God. We shall then have to answer for our deeds. Consider then what you may have to answer for, because you refused to help Christians to assemble peaceably in order to worship Jesus."

At that moment God had taken from me all my powers of reasoning, so that I completely forgot that I was a Jew, without any rights, in an anti-Semitic atmosphere, in the office of a minister of state. All he had to do would be to ring his bell, and I should have been arrested and should have vanished without a trace.

But the Lord invested my feeble words with authority. The Minister was not furious; on the contrary, I witnessed a scene which might be compared with something from the Bible. The Minister rose, and face to face with a Jew, he asked: "But what shall I do to be saved?"

I was not able to talk to him about Jesus.

From then on he was our friend and our protector. A Jew who believed in Jesus had removed a thorn of anti-Semitism from the flesh of a minister of state in an anti-Semite government.

The famous Christian-Jewish poet, Franz Werfel, relates that in 1938 in an Austrian village the German troops collected all the Jews for deportation. With them went a Christian chaplain, who was unwilling to desert them. On the way an officer of the Brownshirts had a diabolical inspiration. He stole a cross from a churchyard and made a swastika out of it. He placed the swastika in the hands of an old rabbi, and ordered him to kiss the blasphemous symbol. The rabbi took the spurs from the cross, and gave it to the chaplain. A bullet struck the Jew who had restored the cross to its true shape.

On many occasions God used Jews for such purposes.

Now once again we had our permit; but this, too, was of short duration. Soon afterwards, together with my wife and a group of Christian Jews, I was arrested. A Rumanian woman reported to the police officer on duty, and demanded to be arrested together with the brethren of Israel. This request was granted.

When we were released, the Minister had been replaced by another, and our permit was annulled.

Underground religious activity

Within every man who has been born again there is a desire to retire from the cares and worries of external things, to calm the storm which sometimes disturbs even meditation, to achieve peace, to pass beyond the ego and to rest undisturbed on the breast of the Saviour. He desires only to remain poor, without knowing or desiring anything but his hidden God.

But we were not to be yet allowed contemplative lives of this kind: it was not until later that I could savour such joys, when I spend many years in prison.

We were now buffeted about in a tempestuous existence, without much time to strengthen the inner man. Our meetings were prohibited; we met illegally in various home, thereby running the risk of up to twenty years' imprisonment. On occasions as many as a hundred of us gathered together in this way. We had developed the technique of secrecy.

Only on one occasion were we surprised during a meeting. The police had made the mistake of not surrounding the house, but walking through the yard and knocking at the door. We let them wait for a while before we opened up. After we had opened the door, we delayed them in the entrance, asking them who they were, what they wanted, and insisting that they identified themselves. When they finally entered they discovered that the report they had received of an illegal meeting was false. The household consisted merely of the family. The flat was on the ground floor, and all those present had in the meantime jumped out of the window.

The police were furious: they were sure that we held our meetings, but they had no proof. But in the end they were lucky, and obtained the proof they were after.

Towards the end, our meetings, which had aroused some interest even among a number of Rumanians, were attended by a Greek Orthodox man who lived by selling poultry, which he brought from the Soviet territories occupied by our troops. His frequent journeys to this part of the country aroused the suspicion of the police, who summoned him to their headquarters one day, in order to ask him what was the purpose of his travels.

He answered: "I assume that you suspect me of espionage. But you forget the proof I have that I am engaged in trade. This is the sole purpose of my journeys. Besides, you ought to know that converted Christians do not stoop to spying. I am a convert: you have only to ask the Reverend Richard Wurmbrand, and he will confirm that I attend the meetings he holds at various houses."

The police no longer suspected espionage; but they now questioned him about our religious meetings. Our brother had let the cat out of the bag, and he was now trapped. The police cunningly concealed their real purpose, and pretended that they wanted the names of those who took part in the meetings merely to convince themselves that the trader was really a convert, and above all that he was now no longer suspected of spying. In this way they secured a great many names.

At about eleven o'clock one night, I had gone to bed and was making notes for a sermon against the war, which was then raging at its fiercest. Suddenly my wife walked into the room, with a smile on her face as usual, and said: "The police have surrounded the house!" I just had time to throw my sermon down among the pile of papers on the table by the bed. A group of policemen pushed their way into the house, and declared that I was once again under arrest.

I hastened to get dressed and leave the house, as one of our three rooms was full to the ceiling of crates containing food which was to be distributed the next day in the women's prison, where about two hundred women believers - Baptists, Pentecostalists and Adventists - were interned. (We had taken upon ourselves the task of taking aid to the imprisoned brethren, as some of the heads of the different denominations had not sufficient courage to do so, while others had not the necessary initiative to set about it. When we had approached them with the suggestion that aid of this kind should be organized, they had backed out.) If the police had found these crates, how could we have explained the situation? Helping prisoners was a serious offence. Besides, we should have had to tell them where we had obtained the money. If we had refused to say for whom the food was intended, we might have been accused of economic sabotaged by hoarding food. In either case, we should have been punished. But God closed the eyes of the policemen, and they never entered the room where the food was stored. They merely collected the papers on the table, and bundled them together. They took me with them. The same evening they arrested ten other believers, including a young girl of only sixteen, who was not yet converted, but who attended our gatherings.

When we reached the police station, we met the brother who was responsible for our arrest. The thought that he was the cause of our going to prison for many years made him quite desperate. The first thing we did was to console him, and try to dispel his gloom. We succeeded, and to this very day he is one of the brethren. We told no one of his mistake. Later, I was to officiate at his marriage.

The young girl was struck by a police commissar because, when asked what her religion was, she answered: "I love the Lord Jesus, but what this religion is called, I don't know." She could not possibly have given a better answer.

The situation might have ended tragically, had not God sent a man to intervene on our behalf - the Swedish ambassador in Rumania, Patrick von Reutersw„rde. He was a deeply religious man, who was always doing good. His door was always open to anyone who is in need or who was persecuted, no matter to what nation, race, class or denomination he belonged. He helped Jews who had been unjustly treated, just as he afterwards helped Germans who suffered when the situation underwent a complete change.

The Swedish Israel Mission had taken us under its protection, and in this way we had made his acquaintance. As soon as he heard that we had been arrested, he intervened on our behalf, although this meant a breach of diplomatic rules, because we were Rumanian citizens, and he really had no right to interfere. Nevertheless, his intervention proved successful.

We were also fortunate in being able to quench the policemen's thirst for bribes. We decided not to worry with pangs of conscience, because we were giving our money to bandits and blackmailers. We could not distinguish between a bandit and a policeman persecuting us for our faith and presenting us with the choice: "Money or several years in prison." Out of love of money, too, the police gave me back my papers without looking through them.

On this occasion we spent only about fourteen days in prison.

While the war was at its height, when I was being persecuted both as a Jew and as a preacher of the gospel, I was able to publish several religious books under the pseudonym of Radu Valentin. It was under this name, too, that I became known among Rumanian believers. I had stumbled on a censor who was so addicted to drink that he was even prepared to allow the publication of a book condemning alcohol, provided he received a barrel of wine for his services.

Pastor Magne Solheim and his wife

Pastor Solheim, who was head of the Norwegian Israel Mission in Galatz, was constantly being molested. The authorities would come at night and search his house. He was tireless in visiting Jews in their shops, in their homes and in their camps, preaching the gospel at the same time as he gave them consolation and physical help. Finally, the authorities closed his church.

In his zeal he was a model missionary, never losing heart because of the cool reception he received from the Jews and the lack of understanding from the Christians. His wife Cilgia, a Swiss teacher, proved a faithful helpmeet.

An army captain once said to him: "What is the point of going to the Jews to preach the gospel? They only laugh at you." Solheim answered: "When you receive an order, what do you do? Do you discuss it or do you carry it out?" - "I carry it out." - "So do I. The leader of the Christian Army, Jesus, has ordered us to preach the gospel to all mankind. I am carrying out His order. The results are not my business, but His."

His devotion made a great impression where one might have least expected it. Here, the saying of the Christian martyr Ignatius became a reality: "Christianity is not a matter of persuasion, but of greatness." Out of the clay vessel of a devoted man shines a treasure in all its beauty, and this treasure attracts others.

When Feinstein was arrested (at the time we did not know that he had been killed), we wondered how we could intervene on his behalf. Finally, we decided that we should go to the murderers to plead on behalf of their innocent victim. We would go to the German Legation. Hitler's gang ruled in Rumania, constantly inciting the people to slaughter the Jews. It was in this situation that a Christian missionary and a Jew made their way to the German Embassy to help another Jew. We were received by a certain Herr Dietrich. When he talked to Solheim, he was astonished and said: "You need a large dose of idealism to leave your ideal country of Norway and make your way to Rumania to preach to Jewish shopkeepers who are only interested in money and pleasure." It was obvious that Solheim's plea had aroused his sincere admiration. And a miracle occurred: Hitler's faithful servant promised to do everything possible to save Feinstein's life. We were subsequently convinced at the police station in Jassy that the German Embassy had in fact phoned repeatedly with this aim. But it was too late. Feinstein was dead.

The burden placed on the shoulders of the missionary who is not himself a Jew is a heavy one. As a rule, the Jews are indifferent, or even hostile. Anti-Semites mock them; the Christian clergy are often indifferent, too. In addition, there is the deep disappointment experienced when dealing with some Christian Jews.

There were some Jews who were baptized in the vain hope that in this way they would escape persecution; these people were excellent actors but had no really deep faith. I remember a Rumanian brother once asking me to go with him to visit a number of converted Jews whom I did not know. We were very well received, and for a whole hour we talked with enthusiasm. We knelt down and we all prayed. I was extremely happy. Then the Rumanian brother, who had some business to do, rose and left us. After he had gone, they began to laugh: "The ~goy~, the fool, he really believes we are Christians!" They were convinced that I, too, was merely acting, and so they revealed their real feelings.

Faced with people like this, one tends to lose courage, even though one understands people who consider baptism a mere formality and a means of defending themselves against anti-Semitism.

Missionaries who work among Jews constantly come across people who have been baptized out of fear, or in order to marry a Christian, or to remove from their consciousness the fact that they are Jews. We tried to counteract this tendency by constantly maintaining the Jewish character of our community, and not allowing our members to change their names.

There are also difficulties with serious converts from Judaism. The Bible declares that our people are a peculiar people: and there is something peculiar about the Jew, which leaps to the eye, and he finds it difficult to assimilate himself into another environment. He takes this special trait with him into the Church.

The message of Jesus is universal and has eternal validity. The apostle Paul says that in order to win them, he will make himself a Jew for the Jews and a Gentile for the Gentiles, but he only "makes himself" the one or the other. In actual fact he has passed into the sphere of pure truth, where there is neither Jew nor Greek. Just as mathematics is the same all over the world, so is the true religion. The difference is only in language and method. It would be impossible to instruct the child of a Bushman in the same way as a Scandinavian child.

But merely because of the fact that Jesus was born a Jew, some Christian Jews assume that they are closer to Him than their Gentile brethren, and tend to look down on other Christians and patronise them. The belief in the Jew Jesus becomes just another kind of Jewish chauvinism, which is as intolerable as all chauvinism. This often results in conflicts, hidden or open, between the Gentile missionary and certain Christian Jews. A carpenter is not nearer to Jesus than a tailor because Jesus was a carpenter, nor is a man nearer to Him than a woman because He was a male. Neither has a Jewish Christian any superiority over a Gentile, though he often claims it.

Missionary work among Jews offers little spiritual satisfaction, and quickly wears missionaries out. Nevertheless, Solheim worked at his task for thirty years, assisted by his splendid wife, and many others.

A Norwegian deaconess, Olga Olaussen, worked unobtrusively but under great difficulty in Jassy during the war. Her father, who had been a fisherman, was once thrown out of his boat during a storm. For hours he wrestled with the waves. In his distress he promised God that, if he were saved, he would dedicate his children to missionary work, and this he did. "Schwester Olga" devoted all her life to the Jews, selflessly tending the sick and bringing up orphaned children. After the murder of Feinstein she worked alone with a group of Christian girls, as all the men in the congregation had been killed. She brought up these souls in the spirit of faith.

On one single occasion during the war I was given a permit to visit her congregation on a Sunday. Here I found a small group hungry for the Word of God. Knowing that I had only a day to spend there, I preached for eleven hours, from eight in the morning till eight in the evening, with an hour's break for dinner. Throughout these eleven hours the entire congregation kept their eyes and their attention riveted on the preacher.

Having written something about Pastor Solheim and Scwester Olga, who belong to the Norwegian Israel Mission, it might of interest to describe how this Mission came into being.

During the first half of the nineteenth century, the Norwegian Lutheran Church made great efforts to spread the gospel among the heathen. One day a Christian lady asked her pastor: "Do you not think the time is now ripe to start the special task of spreading the gospel among the Jews?" The pastor replied: "No. According to the Bible it is now the time of the heathen. Israel has been rejected." The answer brought the lady to the verge of tears, but she held her peace, and bided her time.

A few months later she approached the pastor once again. "I would like to have your advice. A relation of mine had an only son. But he behaved so badly that finally the parents had no option but to send him away from home. To console them in the unhappy old age, they adopted a boy, giving him everything their own child had enjoyed, and making him heir to their possessions, even though blood is undoubtedly thicker than water. They treasured a picture of the child who had been born to them, constantly remembering him and shedding tears at night in their longing for him. The adopted child grew bold, and as time went on he started to abuse his foster-parents: "I don't want to see the picture of the other boy on the wall! How dare you mention his name? I don't want to hear you pining for him!"

At this juncture the indignant clergyman interrupted the good lady's story: "He is an impudent boy, and does not deserve to stay in the house. They should send him away!"

Then the woman said: "Is not Israel the genuine son of the Heavenly Father? He was driven from home because he had been disobedient, and we, the other peoples, were adopted in his place. But God's heart is still fixed on Israel. Heaven, too, sighs for him. Is it right that we, the branches, should consider ourselves greater than the trunk, and refuse the Jews salvation?"

The clergyman now admitted his sin, and became the founder of the Norwegian Israel Mission.

For many decades now this mission has carried out work of great blessing in several Rumanian towns.

~Difficulties of our position~

The Jews suffered so greatly during the war, that had we followed our feeling only, we should have done nothing but embrace them and console them. God helped us to do something to assist the Mosaic Jews who were deported to Transnistria. Through our Rumanian brothers we sometimes succeeded in abducting some of the Jewish children from the ghettoes, and restoring them to their parents.

But we could not be satisfied with this. The prophet Jeremiah lived during the violent attacks of the Babylonians which marked the beginning of the destruction of the Jewish state, and at that time he blamed the Jews for their sins. Jesus, called by some a new Jeremiah, did the same at a time when the Jews were suffering under the unjust rule of the Romans. Both were considered by their contemporaries to be traitors to their people.

In the writing known as ~Baba Metzia~, the Babylonian Talmud accuses the prophets of sinning in their reproaches of Israel. The ~Shir Raba~ states that Moses, Isaiah and Elijah were punished by God for accusing Israel before the face of the Lord. Christians think the prophets were right.

We were in the same situation as the prophets of old. Despair, cruel servility and their terrible sufferings turned the hearts of the Jews to stone. Constantly the cry went up: "Let God choose another people. We are tired of being His nation!" On the other hand, the small group of Christian Jews was convinced of the truth of Jesus's saying that salvation must come from the Jews, that the Jews have a task to fulfill and that they are obliged to fulfill it.

The Jews could not understand why we should make them, the victims of the Fascists, co-responsible for all the evil that was taking place in the world, in this way apparently joining forces with their accusers and persecutors.

Our reasoning was simple. As far back as four thousand years ago the Jews were given the Ten Commandments, the basis of morality. It was revealed to them that God is One, and that God demanded from mankind a brotherhood of free men and women, a community guided by love and truth. He also promised a Messiah who would ultimately establish such a kingdom. The Jews were the people chosen by God to bring this revelation to all peoples. God endowed them with the qualities necessary to carry out their mission.

Almost two thousand years after Moses, the world still had not heard of this revelation. Julius Caesar wrote in his ~De Bello Gallico~ that the Gauls, the ancestors of the modern Frenchmen, still drank wine from the skulls of their conquered enemies. The Teutons and the Slavs, too, were savages at that time.

Today, the Jews form only 0.33 percent of the world's population, yet they hold key positions in the economic, political, scientific and cultural life of a great many countries. The position of the Jews in these fields of influence is out of all proportion to their actual numbers.

This is a heavy responsibility for the Jews.

If the teacher fails to carry out his duty, and his pupils are hooligans, even going so far as to ill-treat their own teacher, who then is responsible - the pupils or the teacher? On countless occasions I have seen both Rumanians and Germans open up their hearts when Jews talked to them of the love of Jesus. Often, this has quite disarmed their anti-Semitism. When a Jew accepts the solemn task that God has given him, of being a light and of bringing this light to the nations, this generally produces a profound effect.

But Jews are not assuming this task: on the contrary, I know from my own experience how often Jews have done their best to undermine the Christian faith. When the man who has lost his faith in Christ and His teaching of love strikes a Jew, we are sorry for the victim, but we cannot absolve him from his guilt.

We had converted a Greenshirt, an anti-Semite, who was a chauffeur by trade. This man, overjoyed at the treasure he had found in Jesus, went to the great Jewish industrialist, Goldenberg, by whom he was employed, and told him of his experience, and about the Saviour, and asked Goldenberg to accept Him. Goldenberg made fun of him: "How silly you are, Augustin! All this is nonsense. The important thing is to live, to have money, to drink, to enjoy life with women, because on the other side there is nothing."

Goldenberg was a shrewd man, who had succeeded in life. Augustin was a simple country lad. The result was that Goldenberg's words plucked the tender plant from Augustin's soul. Many Goldenbergs have worked in the same way, through the medium of newspapers, magazines, books, lectures, and through their influence in political and economic life. Is it surprising, then, that men like Augustin should return to the tavern and, inspired by the example Goldenberg has given them, try to lay their hands on money? And how are they to get hold of money, except by knocking Goldenberg on the head?

And when Goldenberg suffered, like anyone who suffers greatly, he was not prepared to listen to sermons of reproach, but we were forced to show him his guilt.

It was a divine miracle that among those who were struck down by the anti-Semitic tyranny and who were in great distress, there were some who received faith in Christ. To all outward appearance they were wretched, degraded, reduced to depths of squalor, yet they were people who had discovered the great mission of the Jews. They had accepted Jesus as the King of the Jews, King of the people whose mission in life it was to spread the Light of God through the world. These Jews regretted the years they had wasted by failing to do their duty, and now joyfully witnessed to their new faith, together with their brethren - Rumanians, Hungarians and Germans - who with them had become the spiritual Israel.

The Jewish people are not the only chosen people. God has given many people special vocations. The Indian people have given the world the highest metaphysics, whose influence can be recognized even in the Bible. The Roman people were chosen to give justice to the whole world. Even today, the leading minds in matters of law, such as Lombroso, Enrico Ferri and Pendi are Italians. All over the world, wherever justice reigns, Roman law is supreme. Wherever Roman law does not exist, injustice rears its head. The Greeks were chosen to give the world philosophy. It is said that since the death of the great Greek thinkers no new ideas have emerged in philosophy, but instead men have ruminated, again and again, on the wisdom of the ancient Greeks. The Germans and Italians have given the world great music; the Germans and Anglo-Saxons have given us modern technology. The Swiss have been chosen by God to show the world how different nations, who are enemies in other parts of the world, can live together in harmony. The British were chosen to begin all the big missionary enterprises and to give the Bible to all nations.

It is the duty of every nation to discover its special mission.

But the Jews have not remained faithful to their vocation. They have rejected, and still reject, their Messiah, who has been proved by history to be the person who has fulfilled to perfection the mission entrusted to the Jews, to be a light to lighten the world.

The Jews having failed in their spiritual mission, the task they should have fulfilled has been left to others. According to the prophecies of Jesus, the vineyard has been handed over to another people. From every nation, those who walk in the footsteps of Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Moses, the prophets and Jesus, constitute the spiritual Israel. They have taken over our neglected inheritance, and are now spreading the light throughout the world. In this chosen band, this royal priesthood, this international brotherhood of love, there are also a number of followers of Jesus from among the Jewish people.

During the bitter war years we could not make many converts. Nor were we surprised that the Jews, who were oppressed, hounded, starved and dogged by death at every step, should not have opened their hearts to the gospel, just as we are not surprised that the lame man cannot dance and the dead man cannot move. We thanked God silently whenever He occasionally performed a miracle and a Jew, overcoming all inner and outward impediments, embraced the faith.

We did not ask too much of the new converts: we did not ask that they should walk in a new way, and deny all they had believed in up till then. After all, the Jewish religion has values which cannot be rejected; and we did not expect them to become model Christians overnight. The fish in lakes needed thousands of years to effec the transformation from salt-water to fresh-water creatures. A human being is equally incapable of changing in a few weeks, even in a few years. We had to be patient with our new converts. We were not afraid when we saw what a small grain of faith some of them had, provided this faith clung to the Great Saviour, because we knew that He who had planted the good seed would make it grow until His coming.

The converts did not come from celebrated circles of Judaism; but nor did Jesus gather His apostles from among the highest in the land. Mary Magdalene was a prostitute. We too had women of this kind. Matthew and Zacchaeus were embezzlers and traitors to their people. Saul of Tarsus had committed murder. Most of the apostles were unlettered artisans.

We did not consider that a person's past, however degraded it might have been, had any significance. God judges a man as he is at this particular moment. The only important thing to us was whether a man believed in Jesus's blood and suffering, whether he loved Him, whether he wished to be saved through Him, whether from now on he would follow Him.

It was not only Jesus's right hand, the one He stretched out to the relatively good, pure, people which was pierced, but also His left hand, the one He stretched out to all those who were degraded, the pariahs.

We recalled one of the sayings of Meister Eckhardt:

"Everyone is most concerned to remove what disgusts him most. The greater and more hideous our sins are, the more quickly and with the greater love does God forgive them, because he is greatly repelled." Many people who were burdened with great crimes received consolation, and we set their feet on the right path with thoughts such as these.

We did not as a rule have long conversations with people. We proclaimed the truth, we did not discuss it. We revealed a truth which fundamentally all of us carry inside us without knowing it, because the human soul is Christian by nature. We spoke to the conscience, not to the understanding. Those who had been chosen from the beginning to be saved, came to us. What was obvious to everyone was that they had been anointed with the oil of joy, above all other Jews.

I remember the day when the decision to confiscate Jewish house property was published. In the Mosaic families affected by this order there was great sorrow. Our brethren in the faith sang and rejoiced, for they knew that in heaven they had a better treasure which no one could take from them.

~Two old people~

One day my wife and I went for a walk. Hardly had we gone a few steps before my wife noticed an old Jew on the other side of the street. An Orthodox Jew by outward appearance, he shuffled along, walking with difficulty. My wife said to me: "That man has not long to live. Go and speak to him about the Saviour! I shall return home. We can go for a walk later."

I crossed over to the other pavement, and approached the old man with the request: "Would you please tell me what portion of the Law of Moses will be read in the synagogue next Saturday?" He told me, and then asked: "Do you believe in Jesus?" I answered, a little surprised: "Yes. Why do you ask?" - "Because I realize that you were looking for an opportunity of speaking to me. Young Jews don't stop people to put questions of that sort. How old are you?" - "About thirty," I told him. "You are young. I have believed in Jesus for forty years, and I have spent just as many years in Satan's prison."

His answer left me speechless. We exchanged addresses, and I promised to go to visit the old man. And what was the story I subsequently heard?

This man, a tinsmith, had heard the gospel preached forty years ago in the Anglican Mission, and he had believed in Jesus. Ever since that day he had pored over his Bible, which he knew better than I did, and had led a regular life of prayer. But he had not confessed his faith to anyone, nor had he been baptized, for fear that he might lose his customers, most of whom were Jews.

The years went by, and he stubbornly refused to heed the advice of those who urged him to side openly with Jesus, in whom he believed in secret.

The devil rewarded him, as only the devil can: to secure his livelihood he had refused to be baptized, and in his old age he was reduced to beggary. Once again he was unable to bear witness to his faith, lest he should be forbidden to ask for alms from his fellow Jews outside the synagogue.

That was the position when I ran into him. For many months I struggled with this man, who believed that the Bible was the inspired word of God, and I asked him to bear in mind the words of the Epistle to the Romans: "If thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus ... thou shalt be saved." (Rom. 10.9). He knelt with me, we prayed together, but he always had the same reply on his lips: "Where shall I get my food if the Jews discover that I believe in Jesus?" All around us were Christian Jews who had publicly confessed their faith, and he realized that we all made a living, but the devil had persuaded him that baptism for him would mean starving to death.

I never ceased insisting that he should allow himself to be baptized. Finally he came to see me, and said: "I have made up my mind. Next week the great autumn festival starts, the new, and the Festival of Atonement. The synagogue will be visited by a great many rich people who otherwise never come near it. I shall get a great deal of money. And then I can be baptized."

I asked him how much money he expected to get, and he told me about five hundred lei, which was a lot of money for a beggar.

I continued to question him: "Do you believe that God created heaven and earth?" - "I do." - "Do you believe that God gave the Jews in the wilderness manna from heaven and water from the rock?" - "I do." - "Do you believe that Jesus fed thousands of people with a few loaves and fishes?" - "I do." - " Do you believe that Jesus can give you five hundred lei, so that you no longer need to postpone the fulfillment of God's commandment?" - "How can Jesus get the money for me? I must put off being baptized until after the religious festivals."

Without thinking, I said something which caught me unawares: "God will not receive you after the festivals are over. For forty years now you have bargained with Him, and now you let Him wait for a mere five hundred lei. God is a great God, and He will not allow Himself to be mocked. You will be received by Him today, or never."

When he left me the old man was angry, because he thought I had spoken harshly to him.

The day after the Day of Atonement, the old man's daughter came to ask me to go to him immediately at his house. He had been standing outside the synagogue in the cold autumn rain, and was stricken with double pneumonia. I ran as fast as I could, but it was too late: when I arrived he was already at the point of death. I went to find a doctor and asked him to restore the old man to consciousness, if only for a few seconds, so that he could express the wish to be baptized. But it was impossible. He died without receiving baptism.

It was my fault, too. At that time I did not know that in such a case as this, the dying man could have been baptized, on the assumption that he was a believer. The mere fact that he had sent for me in his last hour was significant.

I knew another case involving a Jew who in his younger days had heard the Word in Jerusalem, and had accepted the faith. Later he came to Rumania. Every time the question of baptism was broached he postponed the idea, declaring that he wished to be baptized in the Jordan. Several decades passed before he was able to make the journey. In his old age he finally set off on his pilgrimage to the Holy Land. He died on the way, in Istanbul, before his wish could be fulfilled. His daughter, who was also a believer, told me this with tears in her eyes, but she did just what her father had done. She was converted thirty years ago, but has still not been baptized. The young learn nothing from the old.

Horshani was the direct opposite of the old man whose story I related above. Horshani had served the synagogue all his life. He was now ninety-one, and had been pensioned off. Once a month he used to visit the members of his former congregation, and all of them would give him small gifts.

One day he went to see a man who had a young daughter, who was a fervent believer. She gave him a New Testament. His joy was indescribable. Despite his advanced age his mind was perfectly clear. He recognized in Jesus, of whom he read in the book, the Messiah for whose coming he had prayed all his life.

I went to visit him, but there was little for us to talk about: with all his heart he believed simply through reading the book.

Not long afterwards, he started dreaming dreams in which, night after night, he saw two people clad in white who advised him to make haste, because his days were numbered.

One day, during the bitter winter of 1941, he made his way with great difficulty to my home. I was surprised to see him. "What brings you here, Grandfather?" - "I've come to be baptized."

Neither the girl nor I had ever spoken to him about this. The decision was his alone.

At his age, prolonged baptismal instruction was out of the question. Nevertheless, I wanted to know what was passing in his heart, and so I asked him: "Why do you wish to be baptized?" - "Because Jesus commanded it," was his prompt reply. In order to test him, I asked again: "And why do you feel compelled to fulfill the commandments of Jesus?" He was very angry: "Fiddlesticks! Jesus is the Son of God and we must all obey Him."

I continued to question him: "Have you told your family that you are going to be baptized?" (His children were dead, and he was cared for by his grandchildren.) "Yes," he replied. "And what does your granddaughter say?" - "She said she would throw me out of the house." - "What would you do at your age?" If she really throws you out of the house, you will not be able to fend for yourself." - "I shall stand out in the snow in the street with Jesus, but all the same I shall fulfill His commandment."

The old man had passed his examination with flying colours. I at once made all necessary preparations for the ceremony. A young Christian Jewess, who up till now had hesitated to take the step, happened to be in our house at the time. She also decided to be baptized when she heard old Horshani's answer, and I baptized both of them.

Thanks to the intervention of neighbours, his granddaughter did not throw her old grandfather out that very evening, but the next day he had to leave. He did not sleep on the street for a single night. God, who had given manna to the Jews in the desert, also took care of Horshani.

I procured him a Bible with large print, so that he could continue his reading. Whenever I went to see him, I would find him with either the Bible or a hymn book in his hand. As he could only walk a short distance, he was unable to attend our services, and so he did not know our hymn tunes. But this did not bother him. He sang the hymns to tunes he knew from the synagogue.

Horshani was an enthusiastic witness for his Lord, and was constantly telling others of his belief. He lived for another two years. In the end, his granddaughter took him back into her house, out of respect for the neighbours, but she treated him badly. He did not care. He often used to tell us how he saw heaven in his dreams.

One evening a neighbour came to tell us that Horshani was dying. Sister Olga and I immediately went to the house.

In a corner of the room where the dying man lay stood a cantor, who had been hired by the family, saying in his name the ~Vidui~, a special formula of recantation of faith for Hebrew Christians. But Horshani's last words were: "The Lord Jesus is good; I am going to the Lord Jesus."

Antonescu's government had decreed that all Jews, even those who were Christians, should be buried in the Mosaic cemeteries, presumably in order to prevent the dead being racially corrupted. And in the Mosaic cemetery the administration would not allow Christian funeral services to be held, out of deference to the finer feelings of the Mosaic dead. During this period we were allowed to bury neither Horshani nor any other Christian Jews. Cantors sang beside their graves, but their souls were already with the Saviour, whom the cantors did not know.

5 ADDING TO THE CHURCH

~The gambler and the police informer~

When he was in prison, Oscar Wilde wrote that if Jesus had said nothing but "Her sins, which are many, are forgiven; for she loved much" (LUK 7:47) and "He that is without sin among you, let him first cast a stone" (JHN 8:7), then this would have been sufficient for us to believe that He was God, for these words express thoughts so lofty that no human spirit could have conceived them.

Another of Jesus's outstanding sayings is: "The Son of man is come to seek and to save that which was lost" (LUK 19:10).

Wherever we came across a repellent sin, we did not sit in judgement. We considered how we might cure the disease. A good tailor never throws away a scrap of cloth. Society must not reject people merely because they have fallen. It might be society's fault, too.

One day a young girl who was a Christian came to me in tears to tell me that her father, an inveterate card-player, had stolen her mother's money, which she had scraped together by working long hours as a dressmaker, and had gone out to gamble the money away in some inn, which one she did not know. We systematically visited all the inns in our part of town. At last, very late, we ran him to earth in a tavern which was also involved in a smuggling racket. He was absorbed in a game, and after he had lost, I tapped him on the shoulder and told him I wanted a word with him. We went into an adjoining room, and sat down at a table, the three of us - the gambler, the girl and myself. I spoke amicably, I spoke harshly; every approach was fruitless. I talked about humanity, I talked about religion.

There was one single thought in his head: he would go on gambling, to try to win back the money he had lost. In vain I argued that in these games the only person who came out the winner was the innkeeper. I told him I was resolved not to leave the inn until he agreed to come with me. He now grew insolent, and started to shout: "What rights have you over me? I am a Jew. Let the chief rabbi come to fetch me. I am not a member of your congregation, and I must ask you not to interfere in my life." He shouted so loudly that all the other cardplayers heard it, and they too began to threaten me.

I said: "Do you want the chief rabbi? I'll go and fetch him."

His daughter and I stopped the first taxi we could find and drove to the home of the chief rabbi, but he was not in town. So we went to the house of another leading rabbi, and rang the bell. After a long wait a sleepy servant opened the door. I said to him: "Please wake the rabbi, as a great misfortune has befallen Israel."

This took place at a time when anti-Semitism was raging. The servant imagined that I had come with news of some new law against the Jews. I assured him that the matter was very important.

A few moments later we were ushered into the rabbi's bedroom. He was sitting up in bed, waiting anxiously to hear what had happened. I told him of the great tragedy, that a sheep from the chosen flock of Israel was losing money, as well as endangering the sacred prestige of the Jewish race in the inn, and that he had demanded that a rabbi should come and fetch him. "There's a car waiting outside. Please come with me."

The rabbi looked at me as though I were mad. "Have you woken me up only for this? Tell the gambler that he can come and see me tomorrow, and I will talk to him." I answered: "It is not for the lost sheep to come to the shepherd. The shepherd must seek out the lost sheep. The gambling dens, the taverns and the brothels are full not only of Rumanians, but also of Jews. I visit these places to look for lost souls, but I never meet any rabbis there. Nor for that matter do I find any Christian clergymen. Do your duty as a shepherd and come with me!" He muttered a few derisory words, and rolled over in bed to go to sleep.

The girl and I returned to the inn, which was in the Jewish quarter, and told the gamblers, many of them Jews, what had happened. This gave me an opportunity of speaking to them of the Saviour, who left the ninety-nine sheep in the fold in order to look for the one which was lost. I pleaded with them to cross the gulf which a heedless priesthood of all religions had placed between Jewry and Jesus.

The gambler went back to his family. And the news of what had happened that night was talked of in all the inns.

On my wanderings into the world of the outcasts I ran into Farcash. He was a Hungarian Jew, whose name means "wolf," and he was a wolf by profession, a paid informer. He went round among the Jews, worming out of them how much foreign currency, gold or other valuables they had hidden away. With this information he went to the police commissioner, with whom he had an arrangement. The police would arrest the guilty man, and extort his gold from him by threats and torture. He would then be released, and Farcash and the policeman would split the loot between them.

Farcash's wife was a believer, and she was stricken with grief at her husband's misdeeds. At her request several of the brothers spoke with him, but he merely listened without responding.

But the seed was not lost. One day Farcash said to his wife: "Get a bath ready for me. I want to clean myself outwardly and inwardly, and become a new man."

He took a bath, and then he went to the police commissioner, and told him: "I have been born anew. I deeply regret the wrong we have done together, and I have decided to have nothing more to do with it." The result was that the police commissioner had him interned in a concentration camp at Tirgul-Jiu, for fear that he himself would be exposed.

Every third month a commission visited the camp in order to interview the internees. Farcash was one of those brought before the commission. He reported with a Bible in his hand, told them of his former life, and confessed his new faith. One police inspector grabbed the Bible and flung it to the ground. Farcash told him: "You have brought misfortune on yourself by mocking this book. Now all the curses mentioned in it will fall upon you." His fate was now apparently sealed. He had forfeited any chance of release.

But that evening the commandant, touring the camp, chanced to peep into Farcash's cell, and saw him kneeling in prayer. Out of curiosity he opened the door, and asked him who he was. Farcash told his whole story, concealing nothing. The commandant was so impressed that he promised to intervene on his behalf, and shortly afterwards he was set free.

The policeman who had torn the Bible from his hand later suffered many years of imprisonment under the Communists. Farcash was baptized. Soon afterwards he made his way to Hungary, where he was probably killed by the Nazis.

~The struggle for a soul~

Mrs. S. had decided for Christ, but her husband was violently opposed to her conversion. Finally, he forced her to accompany him to a rabbi, so that she could be shown the error of her ways.

She told me the time of her appointment, and I walked up and down in front of the synagogue, praying. I was afraid that the joint exertions of the rabbi and the husband would weaken her decision.

I kept it up for a while: finally I could stand it no longer, and burst into the rabbi's office. I told him who I was, and insisted that the interview with the lady should take place in my presence.

I am tall and of an athletic build; the rabbi was small and thin. He was clearly nervous. He offered me a chair, and then went on to address the lady: "Christianity is the opposite of the great message of the revelation 'Hear, O Israel, the Lord thy God is one God.' If God is one, the Father, where do we get the other gods, Christ and the Holy Spirit?"

I intervened in the discussion: "Rabbi, this assertion that God is one is part of the mystique of numbers. It contradicts the assertions of the dualists that God is two, and of the polytheists that there are many gods. If God is identical with the number one, He must have qualities in common with this number. This shows how useful mathematics is to an understanding of the divine truths. All the philosophers, from Plato and Pythagoras to Augustine and Boethius, have maintained that no man who is ignorant of mathematics is capable of understanding divine things.

"You persist in maintaining that God is one, without realizing what the term 'one' involves. There is no such thing as absolute one. 'One' simply represents a synthesis of conflicting forces. Man is one because he is a synthesis of body, soul and spirit. These again are syntheses of other entities. An atom is a synthesis of conflicting elementary particles.

"You talk about the oneness of God. But the Mosaic faith is based on a misunderstanding of the Bible meaning. The Hebrew language has two expressions for the word 'one': ~iahid~, which means 'absolute unity'; and ~ehad~, which means composite unity, as in the book of Genesis, Chapter I; '~vaihi erev vaihi boker, iom ehad~ - and it was evening, and it was morning, the first day, one day.'

"In the Bible, God is called ~Ehad~, a composite unit. In his thirteen articles of faith, Maimonides jumped from ~Ehad~ to ~Iahid~ without any support from the Bible. It is in his work that for the first time we find God portrayed as an absolute unit, which is absurd from both a mathematical and a philosophical point of view.

"We might say that the confession of faith which thousands of Jewish martyrs had on their lips at the moment of their death should, correctly translated, run as follows: 'Hear, O Israel, Jehovah our gods' - ~Eloheinu~ is a plural word - 'I am Jehovah of a composite unity.' Can you deny this, Rabbi?"

The rabbi was downright astounded. Although he was a very well-read man, he had no acquaintance with Christian apologetics, applied to the Mosaic faith. At this moment his intellectual curiosity gained the upper hand: "What you are saying is new and very interesting to me. Please go on!"

Mrs. S. glanced in triumph at her confused and shamefaced husband.

I continued: "If I maintain that God is one, I maintain that He is divisible, because the number one is divisible. He can be the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit. Even the words of Jesus which he addressed to men and women, quoting from the Psalms, 'Ye are gods' (John 10.34), are plausible. All God's children share His divine nature. The number one is also capable of being multiplied. But it is unlike all other numbers because, however much one multiplies it by itself, it always remains one. We men and women, too, are made gods, but God remains one. Likewise, the number one is the only number whose square root is equal to itself. That is why Jesus, a man, was able to say: "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father" (JHN 14:9). That is why we have retained the saying used by the early Christians: 'Every time you look at a brother, you look at God.'

"God has been called one because every number is a quantity related to one. In this way the whole creation is related to God. At any rate, you cannot use the fact that God is one as an argument against the Christian faith."

In the rabbi's office there was only one picture - a reproduction of "The Last Supper" by Leonardo da Vinci. Why precisely ~this~ work of art? I put the question straight to the rabbi.

Somewhat shamefacedly, he answered: "I admire Jesus because He was a great Jew, just as I admire Plato, the great Greek. They were both important thinkers and good men. I also believe that we should bring back Jesus to the ancestral heritage of the Jewish nation. But if Jesus had been asked what His religion was, He would have answered: 'The Mosaic faith.' Jesus was a Jew, not a Christian. I have nothing against this lady loving Jesus, but that love should be an extra stimulus to help her to remain wholeheartedly what Jesus was too, a Mosaic Jew."

I answered: "Since you have mentioned Plato, I think we had better remain in the pure sphere of philosophy. In heathen religions, divinity could not be worshipped in any other way than according to concepts which people hold about its very nature. But the Christian and the Mosaic cults, too, are in danger of degenerating into idolatry if we attribute to the divine an image that springs from our own understanding. So let us move from cult to philosophy, from images to the final realities!

"As a rule, we do not draw conclusions from what we say ourselves. You tell me that you admire Plato, probably for his teaching. But if you consider this teaching correct, why do you not adopt it?

"Platonism had many of the ideas of Christianity before the time of Christ. Plato demonstrated the philosophical necessity for a logos as an intermediary between God and man. He called it ~Nus~. No cause can produce an effect which is not related to it. The Invisible God could not simply produce the visible world. What first emanated from Him was the invisible idea which, because it contained within itself, in an ideal manner, everything that can exist as a reality, and because it was essentially active, created the universe."

The rabbi answered: "The idea of a logos is acceptable to us also; it is not especially Christian. We have it from Philo of Alexandria. But the ~logos~ is not God. You say that it was born of the Father; if it was born, then it cannot have existed before its birth. It is not eternal, therefore it is not God. God is only one. Perhaps Jesus will come to be appreciated and recognized as one of the great prophets of Israel. Perhaps our judgement of Him will be revised. But we shall never accept the Trinity."

I explained our position to him: "The Word was born logically, not chronologically, from the Father. He is eternal. And the word 'Trinity' ought not to shock you. When we talk of divinity, our words are inadequate. Human language is the result of men's need to understand one another in their working, family and social lives. How could we have words for the metaphysical realities? Even Christians use the word 'Trinity' with a certain amount of reserve. As Augustine said, when you start to count the Trinity, you abandon the truth. And Luther, who constantly used the expression 'The Holy Trinity,' wrote: 'The name "The Holy Trinity" is not to be found anywhere in the Scriptures, but has been invented by men. For that reason it has a cold ring about it, and it would be better to say God than Trinity . . . There exists a Being of divine nature; the strongest union between body and soul is not as united as God is united . . . Not only do we believe in and learn about a unique God, but a God of the simplest simplicity and the most united unity.'

"On the other hand, even the Old Testament has been unable to avoid the figure three, which is the measure of everything. Here, too, we read of the Son, for example in PSA 2: 'Kiss the Son, lest he be angry, and ye perish from the way,' or in ISA 9, where we read of a child who is to be born, whose name is to be the Mighty God. And there are countless passages which speak of the Spirit of God. Virgil wrote: 'the unpaired delights the Divinity.' In God we must look for the source of everything, for the means by which He receives again what He has created, and for His purpose, which is sanctification and perfection. In order to describe God in human words we need the term 'Trinity.'"

The rabbi cut me short: "Holiness means being faithful to the past, to a treasure which was entrusted to Israel several thousands of years ago. God appeared to Moses as one; everything else is human speculation.

"Madam," he went on, turning to the lady, "I cannot recommend that you should follow the adventurous road of the Christians. Remain on the ancient rock of Mosaic belief!"

Mrs. S. and her husband, both of them intelligent people, had attentively followed the discussion without speaking. Now that she had an opportunity to speak, the woman gave the conversation an entirely different twist, as she said to the rabbi: "You are speaking against the Christian faith. You advise me not to embrace it. Rabbi, do you wish Christianity to disappear? Do you realize what a catastrophe would overwhelm the world if it were to contain nothing but Hitlerism, Communism, and terrible suffering? What would be left of the world, what would become of Jewry without the thousands of converted people among the Gentiles who, out of love for Christ, spread love around, and spread what the Jews neglect to spread - the Jewish Bible, the Revelation given to us by God so that we in turn might give it to other nations? There is no alternative to Christianity, because the Mosaic faith is nationally isolated. In fact, it is passive within the Jewish race also. The Mosaic faith cannot give light. Moses was made known in the world because of Jesus. I ask you once again, Rabbi, do you want Christianity to disappear?"

The rabbi made a deprecatory gesture, and exclaimed: "God forbid!"

"Well," continued the woman, "if you want it to survive, and if you want it to survive as the religion of perfect love, then you must want Jews to be converted to it. Because the Church of Christ needs Jews, just as lungs need air. And we, the Jews, need Jesus, our King. Just as a swarm of bees, separated from the queen, loses its sense of direction, so we have lost our sense of direction without Him. I wish to become a Christian."

The rabbi turned to her husband: "Let her have her way! I can do no more."

As we left, I said to the rabbi: "What you and I said about God might seem contradictory, but any statement about God is fraught with danger, because we attribute to Him human concepts. We find God only on the ~via negationis~, the way of negation, by denying what the human imagination has woven around Him. We are on opposite sides, but let us both know God as the place where opposites meet. In Him, in Him alone, because He is eternal, the difference between a straight line, a triangle and a circle vanishes. In infinity all geometrical shapes are alike, and religious differences disappear. Only love unites the lover with the beloved. The more men love and understand one another, the more they acquire of the Divine Being. When we reach the heights where love dwells, we find that the King in the kingdom of love, He who showed us this road in the most sublime way, and who Himself suffered death for love of His creatures, is Jesus."

The rabbi was friendliness itself when he shook hands with us and we departed, leaving him alone in his office to gaze at the picture of the Last Supper. Shortly afterwards, the woman was baptized.

page 156 CHRIST ON THE JEWISH ROAD

~A soul lost and a soul found~

A gentleman came to see me, introducing himself by a Rumanian name. He said he was on the verge of suicide: I was the last person whose advice he was seeking before taking his life.

He told me his sad story. He was a Jew, who had been baptized twenty years previously, without a shred of belief. He had merely wished to escape the sorry fate of being a Jew. He had joined the Greek Orthodox Church, had adopted a Rumanian name and married a Rumanian lady. He had been lucky up to now.

The anti-Semitic government now in power was not interested in a man's religion, but in his race. When they discovered that our friend was born a Jew, his house was confiscated, and he was expelled from the Law Association of which he was a member. When he lost his source of livelihood, his wife and his Rumanian friends abandoned him. He had long been a stranger to the Jews. Now he was desperate and unhappy.

I told him that I had a very influential friend whom we could consult immediately. I was certain that this friend would help him. He thanked me warmly, and assured me that he would repay me handsomely. Great was his disappointment when I told him that my friend was Jesus Christ, and suggested that we should kneel together and speak with Him.

"But how can anyone talk to Jesus? He died two thousand years ago."

"Don't you believe that He has risen from the dead?" - "No." - "Don't you greet your friends every Easter, as is the Greek Orthodox custom, with the words 'Christ is risen'?" - "Yes." - "Then if Christ is not risen, you are a dishonest man, because every year, when in answer to this greeting you declare, 'He is risen indeed,' you are telling a gross lie. You must decide: either He is in truth risen, or you are a patent liar. If you believe neither the gospel nor the Church, then at any rate believe in what you have so many times declared.

Choose: either Christ is risen, or you are a base liar, a man without honour." - "Christ is risen." - "Did He die again after His resurrection?" - "No." - "Then He is alive, and we can talk to Him." - "How can He be alive?"

Three times our argument went round in a circle. Again and again he was faced with the alternative which must be faced by all who confess the Christian faith without believing: either Christ is risen, or you have been living a lie. But I could not get him to believe in Jesus Christ as a living Saviour and counsellor.

He did not commit suicide: he did something much worse.

He had done his national service as a wireless operator, and now he volunteered for the army. Although Jews were not normally accepted, his application was successful because he had been a member of the Orthodox Church for a long time, and also because he was a much-needed specialist. At the front he distinguished himself by committing atrocities against Jews and raping Jewish girls. After the fall of the Nazis, he was sentenced as a war criminal.

This should not surprise us. There were other Jews who took part in the Rumanian anti-Jewish atrocities. Mrs. Marin, who was sentenced to death after the revolt of the Legionaires, during which more than a hundred Jews were killed, was a Jewess. Every nation has its traitors. The Jews are no exception. Marx was an anti-Semitic Jew, so are some of the Communist Jews who are leaders of Rumania today, such as Leonte Rautu and Cornel Manescu.

An old Christian Jew had a shrew of a wife who hated

Christian Jews with all her heart. When her husband, a poor man, wished to attend our meetings, she hid his only pair of trousers. When he left the house, she would call out through the window: "I hope you break your leg, you renegade!" Whenever he brought home a Jewish friend and testified to him of his Lord, she would interrupt: "Don't believe my husband. He has sold himself!" For years the old man had to put up with this treatment. Meanwhile, his children grew up. One of them did very well for himself, and had an important job with a foreign oil company. He loved his father, and invited him to stay for two months' holiday.

When I heard of this, I had an idea. No one had been able to talk to his wife. Several of the brethren had tried, but she would seize the first thing that came to hand and throw it at them. Now I saw an opportunity of reaching her. I asked her husband to entrust me with the task of collecting his monthly wages and taking them to his wife, who would be informed of this plan. She was in such need of money that she would have to receive me.

On the first day of the following month, I turned up. She expected me to hand over the money at the door. But I was in no hurry. I told her I was thirsty, and asked for a glass of water. In this way I managed to get into the house, where I sat down on a chair. She waited for me to hand over the money. I started to talk about the hot, dry weather we were having. I asked for another glass of water. Then I told her that I had heard of her aversion to the Christian Jews, and I quite understood her attitude. I had been one of them for several years, and I realized what a collection of sinners I had joined. She pricked up her ears. I launched into a long speech about the number of hypocrites and renegades among them, how inconsistent they were, and how their words and their deeds were poles apart. We were now on common ground. I had touched on a subject which found an echo in her heart.

She too expatiated on the sins of the Christian Jews she knew. I joined her in condemning their transgressions. We got on very well. I gave her the money. I now had access to her house, because she recognized in me a kindred spirit.

I returned several times. The first time, I merely talked to her about the wickedness of Christian Jews. The same thing happened on the second occasion. Then I added, almost as an afterthought: "Of course, we are all sinners. Have not you and I also sinned?" At each visit she had a little more opportunity of thinking about ~our~ sins and a little less about other people's.

After a while, I had made such good progress that I managed to persuade her to attend one of our meetings. She was very embarrassed, because she knew her reputation. But I had carefully prepared the brethren, and told then how to receive her. One of them was to give her a hymn book; another was to see that she got a seat near the window. One of the sisters would ask after her rheumatism, and would tell her that the seat near the window was no good, as there was a draught. All the young people were to greet her with great respect. She was enthusiastic when the meeting was over. Soon she was converted.

Her husband knew nothing about this. When he returned, she asked him, with tears in her eyes, for forgiveness. As he had suffered patiently for twenty years, when he heard this and knew that there was no longer any need for him to hold his peace, he gave her the scolding which he had not dared to give her in the past.

She was not dismayed; she became a loving and believing sister, and in many ways surpassed her husband.

God chooses people by whom the world does not set great store - simple souls who have stumbled, and who in their ignorance have become a prey to wickedness. Our congregation consisted mostly of simple men.

Jesus said, "I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, because thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes." (MTT 11:25). Why should this be? I believe that God is anxious that His message should not be perverted, this message which is destined to play such a great role in these days. Intellectuals are seldom capable of conveying a message just as they have received it, without giving it a personal twist; whereas the simple, ignorant people transmit it faithfully. But although there were not many intellectuals in our ranks, that does not mean that there were none at all.

~Practical action~

In the conditions under which we lived, our mission embraced a wide range of activities apart from our main task which was to preach the gospel to the Jews.

When the German army occupied Rumania, we considered it our duty, out of love for our enemy, to print a special edition of St. John's Gospel, and distribute it free to German soldiers. When they received these handouts on the streets, they admitted to our brethren that they had been prepared for quite a lot in Rumania, but they never expected to find Jews giving them the Word of God as a free gift!

When Bucharest was bombed, I started systematically preaching in air-raid shelters, thus reaching both Jews and Rumanians with the Word of God.

When the first Russian air raids took place, I and six other brethren were under arrest. We were just being interrogated when the alert sounded. We were taken to the shelter under escort of armed guards, and the judges, lawyers and members of the public joined us. When the first bombs began to fall, I suggested: "Let us all kneel, and I shall say a prayer." They all knelt, including the officers and guards. They crossed themselves as I prayed aloud. Then I preached a sermon on the necessity of being prepared to meet God. They all listened reverently.

When the all-clear sounded, the guards seized us by the collar and escorted us back to the court. Once again I stood in front of the judge who only a quarter of an hour before had knelt at my command, and answered his questions.

After we had been released, every time we heard the air-raid warnings we would run as quickly as we could to a large shelter, and preach. Once we ran with Sister Olga to a shelter in a large block of flats. Though it was forbidden to be in the streets once the warning had sounded, I was seized with a sudden impulse to leave the building and we made our way to another shelter. The house we had left was destroyed by bombs, burying a great many people in its ruins.

During another raid a sister and myself were arrested on a charge of spreading anti-war propaganda under the pretext of preaching. We were released after once again having to pay a considerable bribe.

Our activities were many-sided. One of them was to help our brothers whom the Greek Orthodox Church called sectarians. Because they were Adventists or Baptists, they were sent to prison and sometimes suffered terrible tortures. We managed to procure the intervention on their behalf of the Swedish Ambassador.

Much of our time was spent helping the Mosaic and Christian Jews who were forced to do heavy manual labour without being paid a cent. Occasionally some of them were able to scrape a bare pittance during the hours of the night. I also had to ease the conscience of our brethren in connection with this work. One of them had an illegal workshop, where he produced crates for fruit. All day long he worked, without any form of remuneration, for the state, which did not even provide him with food. How was he to provide for his five children?

One could not help admiring some of the brethren who, in these circumstances, carried out their civic duties and were unwilling to break a single one of the rules imposed by the Fascist government. But I had to explain to them that according to the Scriptures the authorities were instituted to punish evil and reward good. If they did the very opposite, then we were absolved from our duty to obey them.

Besides, all this time we were busy doing things which according to the law carried the death penalty, such as helping a number of Jews from Hungary to cross the frontier illegally, and rescuing children from ghettos.

Towards the end of the war our little community in Jassy was in danger. We were afraid that the Germans, as they retreated, would start a new pogrom. The trains were crammed with Rumanians fleeing before the approaching Russian army. Jews were not allowed to travel. An acquaintance of mine, a high-ranking military officer, arrested all the members of the community on a fictitious charge. One brother, who was a soldier and armed with a rifle, was ordered to escort the "traitors to the state" in a carriage especially reserved for them. At the railway station in Bucharest the order of arrest was torn up, and the arrested persons were handed over to the charge of my wife. Many Rumanian brethren risked their lives to help us on this occasion.

As far as courage is concerned, the Babylonian Talmud says: "The words of the Torah [the Divine Law] are only in the keeping of him who is prepared to die for their sake. For it is written in the Book of Numbers: 'This is the law, when a man dies . . .'" (NUM 19:14).

~In-fighting~

Jesus taught the people in the synagogues. He expects His disciples to do the same, and He warns them: "They will scourge you in their synagogues" (MTT 10.17). This presupposes that we shall speak to the people, and annoy our listeners with sermons which intentionally attack their prejudices and superstitions.

This is precisely what we did.

It was a Friday evening: the Jews were assembling early in their synagogues to read from the Holy Book or to debate among themselves before the start of the service.

I sat down next to the rabbi and asked him, loudly so that those who were sitting near us could also hear: "Rabbi, I have been told that there is a book written by a Jewish prophet called, so far as I can remember, Isaiah. Is it a good book, worth reading?"

"What a question!" he answered. "If only you would read it! It contains nothing but pure gold."

"Rabbi, I have read a great many books where I imagined I would find valuable things, only to discover that I had been fooled. Won't that also be the case with Isaiah?"

"Young man, the very thought is a sin. In fact, it was not Isaiah but God Himself who wrote it. Isaiah was merely the pen."

"Rabbi, where can I find the Book of Isaiah?"

He fetched it down from a shelf and gave it to me. Before opening the book, I asked him again to assure me that it contained God's own words.

Then I opened it at Chapter 53, and asked him: "Rabbi, to whom does this refer?" and I read out aloud the passage describing the Suffering Servant. "This description tallies exactly with Jesus," I said. '"He must be the Messiah."

page 163 CHRIST ON THE JEWISH ROAD

The rabbi exclaimed: "You should not read that passage. You ought rather to read Chapter 11."

I turned to the Jews. "Dear friends! You have heard the rabbi confirm that every word in this book is God's own word. Then this description of Jesus's sufferings must also have been inspired by God."

The rabbi angrily left the synagogue, banging the door behind him. He thought I would be polite enough to leave too; but I let him go, and stayed behind with the Jews, explaining Isaiah's prophecy to them.

Another Friday several of our Rumanian brethren came with us to the synagogue where another celebrated rabbi was going to preach. When the service was over, one of them asked aloud: "Please tell me what the inscription on your synagogue means. I am a Rumanian, and I do not understand it." The rabbi answered: "It is a verse from the prophecies: 'My house shall be called a house of prayer for all nations.'" Our brother asked in a puzzled voice: "But if your synagogue is intended to be a house of prayer for all nations, why did you mumble in Hebrew all this evening - a language which not even the Jews can understand? Perhaps you are concealing truths which you should be giving us, too." The rabbi left the synagogue.

Then another Rumanian stood up and preached the good news of Jesus. I mingled with the Orthodox Jews, whose knowledge of Rumanian was not very good, and translated the sermon into Yiddish. We were well received, and listened to attentively.

The Bible tells us that if we behave like this we shall be scourged in the synagogues. This did not happen to us. Instead, a number of our enemies among the Jews got together and planned to scourge us in our own church.

Pastor Solheim came to Bucharest, where the Norwegian Israel Mission established a station. We had taken over and decorated the building that had formerly belonged to the Anglican Mission to the Jews, and we were now going to dedicate the church. We invited one of the leading pianists of Bucharest to play to us, and we had posters put up all over the city, inviting the Jews to come to our inaugural ceremony.

On the Sunday morning, the church, which could accommodate up to five hundred people, was crammed with Jews. One could sense that some of them had come with evil intentions, and were even organized.

Solheim preached in his usual calm way, and was listened to attentively. I seized the bull by the horns, and told the Jews what God meant when He declared through the mouth of the prophet Isaiah: "Why should ye be stricken any more?" (ISA 1:5). Our old people had been gassed, our children burned in the furnaces. This could not happen to a people chosen by God, of whom it is written that whoever touches him, touches the apple of His eye, unless a serious conflict had arisen between him and his Creator. "In the prayer book of the synagogue the worshippers constantly repeat that sufferings have overwhelmed our people because of our sins. Turn then from the great sin of rejecting the Messiah, given to us by God in order that we might turn God's wrath from us. Listen to what is written in the Law of Moses: 'The Lord [not the Nazis] shall send upon thee cursing, vexation and rebuke, in all that thou settest thine hand unto for to do, until thou be destroyed, and until thou perish quickly; because of the wickedness of thy doings, whereby thou hast forsaken me.' (DEU 28:20).

"The Torah tells us that the disaster which strikes us down is because of 'our wicked doings,' and not the wickedness of our persecutors. Surely our refusal of Jesus, the incarnation of God, is the greatest sign of our being in error?"

The Good Samaritan bathed the wounded man's injuries with oil and wine. Solheim's task was to apply oil, to soothe pain. Mine was to bathe wounds with alcohol. One is no good without the other, but it hurts to apply wine to open wounds.

At a pre-arranged signal, shouting, whistling and a general hubbub broke out, reminding us of the passage in the Bible describing how Stephen's accusers, when they heard his witness, "gnashed on him with their teeth" (ACT 7:54). The din was terrific. A group of Jews rushed across to strike me. But my wife, having foreseen what would happen, had organized a solid phalanx beside the pulpit. They could not reach me. Pastor Solheim whispered to me delightedly. "It is good that this should happen, that the word of God has moved them. It is far worse when the audience is indifferent."

It was not the first time in the history of our mission that this sort of thing had occurred. In the days of Pastor Adeney, young Jews had smashed the windows during a service, and danced in the church. We were used to this kind of incident, and we did not lose our heads. When our brethren tried to calm them, the troublemakers leaped at them. But the brethren were not prepared to give in. One sister, a stout woman, removed her shoe and laid about her with might and main. The result was a regular rough house, which lasted for nearly two hours.

In the afternoon we had a repeat performance, and this went on for the next few Sundays, until we were forced to enlist the aid of the police, who restored order.

While all this was going on, I realized why, when the Jews stoned Stephen, someone had to look after the clothes of the murderers. It is true that they were zealous of the Law of Moses, but they would not stop at stealing a colleague's clothes, if they could. During the fighting, various articles disappeared belonging to our attackers, who came back to look for them; but in vain, as their own people had taken them.

When we were at last left to ourselves, I reproached the brethren for their violence, and reminded them of Jesus's teaching about turning the other cheek when anyone strikes you. They replied: "When anyone strikes you, yes, but when anyone strikes your pastor, then you must teach them a lesson they won't forget!"

The use of force is the touchstone which proves whether a man is in truth determined to fight for justice. On one occasion I gave two slaps to someone who was disturbing our meeting. St. Nicholas gave Arius a slap on the ear, too, and he was not angry. Now and again one must use violence for the sake of one's faith.

One Sunday I took hold of a Jew, who had long been attending our meetings but who refused to be converted, and forced him to his knees. I told him: "You won't be allowed to stand up until you have surrendered to the Lord!" He said a prayer. Twenty years have passed since this happened, and he and all his family are believers. What gave us strength during this period of in-fighting was that at this time we were in the habit of fasting often and spending whole nights in communal prayer. In prayer, something like an echo takes place. When you strike a note on the piano, corresponding strings in all the other pianos in the room start to vibrate. It is just the same when we express a pure wish in our ardent prayers: all around us we mobilise angels who are inspired by the same wish.

The so-called parapsychic phenomena, such as telepathy, clairvoyance, visions of various kinds, spiritualism and so on, are today objects of scientific investigation in several university faculties. It is accepted that there are means of perception other than through the senses. Through what sense did the learned Russian Lomonosov perceive, at a distance of thousands of miles, that his father had drowned, and that his body had been washed up on an island where, in fact, it was subsequently discovered?

The fact that extra-sensory perception exists explains how it is possible for the soul to survive after separation from the body. If the soul can transmit only by the physical senses, then after separation from the body it must enter a state of suspension, without pleasure and without pain, without perception, without any possibility of growth. Investigations into parapsychic phenomena have shown that this is not so, that the soul has its own sources of perception and information, since it has joys and sorrows which are not conditioned by the state of the body. After death, the soul can live an independent life.

Christians live in the world of miracles. I should like to recount some of the remarkable things that have happened to us. I know that to people who do not inhabit the same world as us, these experiences will seem impossible, but we should remember Hamlet's words: "There are more things in heaven and earth . . . than are dreamt of in your philosophy."

One winter's night I was walking home with my wife. The stars were shining with extraordinary brightness. I said: "On a night like this, when the stars are shining in the sky just as they are now, God took Abraham out of his tent and said to him: 'Look up at the sky and count the stars! I shall make your seed as numerous as the stars in heaven and the sand on the seashore.'"

We were both seized by the Spirit of God. Dumb with wonder, we ran home as fast as we could. The splendour of the promise given to our ancestor Abraham was almost more than we could bear.

We lived on the ground floor, with the windows facing the street. One night, at about two o'clock, we were both awakened by something. We both thought we had heard someone knocking on the window and shouting, and we whispered: "It sounds like Anutza," who was one of our sisters in God. But at the same time we were frightened that it might be the police. We listened. All was quiet. We went to sleep again. After a while we were awakened once again, with the same strange feeling. Once again we went to sleep. We were awakened a third time, and we both distinctly heard the words: "I love you with an eternal love."

One morning I was lying on my sofa. It was after my first imprisonment. I suffered from tuberculosis of the lungs and spine, and had to spend a great deal of time lying down. I had a terrible feeling of the presence of an invisible evil power. In my terror, I cried: "Out, out, and as a sign that you, Evil One, have been here, you shall bang the door behind you!" The door opened, and closed again slowly, untouched by human hand. I was free!

One day I was walking through one of the narrow streets of Bucharest, at about eleven in the morning, a time when the streets are crowded. Suddenly I felt an irresistible urge to take out my fountain pen and writing pad. I leaned against a post, and started to write, as though I were taking dictation. I was amazed at what I wrote. After half an hour I had completed the draft of a book, which was excellently received and ran through three editions in Rumanian. It is called ~The Mirror of the Human Soul~, and deals with Christian psychology, a branch of science which held no special interest for me at that time.

An article of mine which was most favourably commented on was ~The Shepherd on the Rock of Error~, which I dreamed. All I had to do was to write down my dream.

One night I dreamed a complete sermon on the subject of contention among Christians. This dream proved prophetic, as shortly afterwards our congregation was rent by a conflict.

One day, several Christians belonging to different confessions were gathered together. My son, then about four years old, was playing in the room. The brethren started a lively discussion on confession, contradicting one another violently. At the height of the discussion my son, who was still playing, called out: "~Kardia kai psyche mia~" (a phrase in ancient Greek from the Acts of the Apostles, where the first Christians are described as being of "one heart and one soul"). The brethren cut short their argument and asked me what the words meant. I explained, and the quarrel ended. The words had come just at the right time.

I can think of only one explanation of the incident. I had read the New Testament in Greek, and as I liked this expression, I had read it to my wife and explained it to her. This explanation lay hidden in the subconscious of my child, who was very interested in religion from his earliest years, and who must have been present in the room at the time. The amazing thing is that he should have used these words at precisely the right moment.

On one occasion I had a vision. I saw myself walking along the street, full of joy. In front of me walked an old man, carrying two full buckets with difficulty. A voice inside me said: "Take one of the buckets from that old man." I did so. The bucket was very heavy. My joy grew less. Then the voice said: "Take the other bucket, too." I took it. I was now perspiring under my burden. My spiritual exaltation was at an end, whereas the old man was now overjoyed.

page 169 CHRIST ON THE JEWISH ROAD

In Bucharest there lived an Indian hypnotist, who was married to a half-Jewish lady. He had adopted a Jewish girl, his wife's daughter by her first marriage.

The girl had not been baptized. When the Fascist regime came to power, he asked us to baptize her, as he imagined this to be a mere formality. When he realized that we insisted on conversion before baptism, he gave up the idea. He no longer came to visit us, nor did the girl, although she felt attracted to Christ.

She went to see a Greek Orthodox priest, and asked him: "What shall I do to be saved?" (This was in the time of the Nazis, when the baptism of Jews was forbidden.) The priest answered: "As you are a Jewess, it is difficult. But send an application to the Patriarchy. It is possible that they will authorize it." The girl did not send in her application, but she poured water over her own head, saying: "In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, I baptize myself." With that she was easy in her mind.

The years went by. One Sunday morning, before going to church, I knelt down to ask God's blessing on the sermon I had prepared. As I did so, I heard a voice saying clearly: "The sermon you have prepared is not suitable for today. You must preach about Christianity and hypnosis." I argued with the voice, insisting that I was not prepared to talk on such an exacting subject. There was only a quarter of an hour to go before the service was due to start. And when all was said and done, to whom would I talk about this subject? I could think of no one in our church who was interested in it. But I obeyed the voice. On my way to church I hastily gathered together a few ideas.

After the service, a young lady approached me, whom I failed to recognize. It was the daughter of the hypnotist, now grown up. She asked me: "How did you know that I was going to come here today, and what made you prepare a sermon with a subject especially designed for me, who grew up in the aura of hypnosis?" The girl had been ill for a week, and had promised God that if she recovered she would come to our church. I baptized her. She took her mother with her to our services and she, too, was converted and became a celebrated Christian poetess, publishing two collections of poems in honour of Jesus.

She became a valiant worker in God's vineyard. Unexpectedly one day she was given permission to preach the gospel in the women's prison in Bucharest. She also provided material assistance to the prisoners, who suffered terribly from lack of nourishment. She frequently visited the prison.

In the prison, which I often visited in her company, I had an interesting encounter.

Some years previously, walking through the streets one day with a Jewish brother, I had seen the sign of a fortune-teller, who boasted that she could tell anything about a person's past, present and future. Judging by her name, she might have been a Jewess.

Both of us went into her office. She asked us what we wanted. I told her that I, too, was a fortune-teller, and that I had come to see her, not as a client, but as a colleague. She was delighted, and told her maid to fetch us coffee. She used cards for telling fortunes. I told her that I used a book, the Bible. I read her a passage from DEU 18:10: "There shall not be found among you any one ... that useth divination, or an observer of times, or an enchanter, or a witch." I interpreted the passage to her, and concluded: "Unless you are converted, you will perish. Now I have told your fortune, and it is a prophecy promised by God."

Two days later I read in the paper that the fortune-teller and her sister had been murdered by the maid, for her money. Years later, I met the maid again, in prison. She was converted, and became our sister.

Now let me recount some more examples of unusual spiritual phenomena.

A Mosaic Jewess, who was blind, married a Rumanian who was likewise blind. They had married without ever setting eyes on one another. But another woman came between them. The blind man left his wife, and set up house with her rival. The blind woman, poor and desperate, decided to take her own life. She gradually built up a small stock of sleeping tablets. One afternoon she dissolved them in a glass of water, but – as she later told us – just as she was about to drain the glass she clearly saw Jesus in the room. He said: "What you are doing is evil. I will show you a much better way." "Which way?" she asked. "Life has passed me by. I no longer have anything to hope for." Jesus answered: "Do as I say and you will be happy. Go to the other woman and tell her to come and stay with your husband in your house, and be her serving- maid. Serve them with all your love, without a spark of jealousy, and I shall make you happy!"

She followed this advice, and the other two moved in. She tended and cared for them in every possible way.

After her vision, she became interested in Jesus. She was converted, and I baptized her. (It is interesting to note that I baptized Jews, a thing that was forbidden by law at that time, in the house of a converted anti- Semite.) She obtained a Bible in braille, and found consolation in the Saviour, so that all grief vanished from her soul. Later, her husband quarrelled with the other woman, and life returned to normal.

All went well until a doctor, who was a member of our congregation, started treating her, in an attempt to restore her sight. As soon as she could see a little, she was attracted by the things of this world. She forgot her vision and the redemption she had enjoyed.

A man who had held a high position under the Communist regime in Rumania, lost it when he was falsely informed against.

In despair, he plunged a knife into his stomach, and collapsed in a pool of blood. One of our brethren, who lived opposite, was just sitting down to his dinner when an inexplicable impulse compelled him to leave the table and hurry to the man's flat. In a flash he saw what had happened, and called out: "Do you wish to fall into the hands of Satan?" As he helped the man, he told him of the Saviour. His life was saved. But who had told the brother to walk into the flat? This question, and the warning he had been given about Satan, started him thinking. Today he is our brother in the faith, and is witnessing for Jesus in Israel.

For us, such experiences as these were accepted as a part of normal life for a Christian. Both my wife and my son have seen Jesus in our house. My son saw Him when he was about five or six years old. He chanced to tell us about it a long time afterwards. He was not amazed at seeing Jesus, and did not consider it necessary to mention it to anyone. Just as a visitor from a distant place brings a gift to the one he loves, so I have tried to give my readers a faint impression of our encounters with the Invisible World, without necessarily placing these experiences on a high plane. God works in man in various ways and without his knowledge. He has spread His love over all creatures and all events, even the most ordinary, and in this way He can be seen in every lowly beggar and in every beautiful flower. We see God aright when we see Him everywhere. But I would certainly not claim that experience of these unusual phenomena is a necessity for the Christian life.

6 CONVERSATIONS WITH ZIONISTS AND OTHER JEWS

The sins of the Jews

During the war, the International Red Cross had organized the immigration of Jews into Palestine. When the question arose of sending a group of Christian Jews, a Zionist leader vigorously opposed this move: "We do not want renegades. We shall throw them into the sea."

We encountered this kind of hostility in conversations with leading Zionists. We could understand their point of view, but we, too, had our national feelings.

In the Gospels Galilee is called Jesus's fatherland and Nazareth His town. Jesus did not consider Himself to be a citizen of the world, as did the Stoics, but a Jew, and He loved His people. There is a sort of nationalism which is an integral part of Christianity: the desire to work together for the greatest spiritual, economic, political and cultural benefit of one's own people. If you do not love your own people, how can you love foreigners?

The Christian Jews, each in his profession, have fulfilled their obligations to their people, and they do so in Israel too, playing their full part in developing and defending the country.

Christian Jews have served their people in a very special manner by opposing anti-Semitism, in a way of which other Jews were incapable.

During the Fascist regime, I was travelling by train from Galatz. The only other occupants of my compartment were Jewish businessmen. I talked to them about Jesus, but they were quite indifferent. At Ploesti, a burly Fascist entered the compartment. He seemed almost to smell that we were Jews. No sooner had he taken his seat than he began to be offensive, addressing us as "circumcised," "sidelocks," and by other similar names.

The others endured it in silence. I gave him time to calm down, and then I opened my Bible and showed him a number of passages which proved that Jesus was a Jew. I told him that the gospel mentions Jesus's circumcision. Christians believe that the Song of Solomon is a prophetic book about Jesus. In this book it is written: "My head is filled with dew, and my locks with the drops of the night" (SOS 5:2). So Jesus, too, must have had sidelocks. "If you make fun of Jews," I told him, "you are making fun of Jesus, too."

I went on: "I suppose that, like every Christian, you expect the return of Christ. The first time He came, He came as a Jew with sidelocks in Palestine. If He should choose to come a second time as a Jew with sidelocks to Rumania, you would mock Him and beat Him. What sort of a Christian are you?" He apologised, and admitted that up till then no one had ever spoken to him about these things.

In ways like these we also serve our people.

But we realized that we had another duty: it is not enough merely to show the anti-Semites their sins. The Jews, too, have their national failings, which must be made clear to them.

We could not agree with Dubnow or Gr„tz in their view of the history of the Jews. According to these writers, in all their conflicts with other nations, and at all times in history, the Jews have been in the right. We have always been innocent victims, and other people hate us without reason.

Historians often tend to write in precisely the same manner about other nations, and this is not right. I have no time for those who assert that the negroes, the whites, the Americans or the Russians are always right. Every social group has its sins. We Jews, too, have our sins, and Jewish sin has many aspects.

Economically, we exploit the countries in which we live, by appropriating a larger proportion of a country's wealth than is due to us in relation to our numbers. This is a general characteristic which does not mean that all Jews are exploiters. Many of them are terribly poor, some even live in slums. Most Jews lead an honest, productive life.

There is an explanation for our share in the national income. Jews live mainly in towns, and for this reason they enjoy the high standard of living that exists there. In the second place, they were excluded from the guilds of craftsmen in the Middle Ages, and as a result a great many Jews devoted themselves to business and banking. To this day they play an important role in the commercial and financial life of many countries, and often amass great wealth.

A Gentile exploiter, be he Rumanian, German or French, proceeds in exactly the same way as a Jew. "Anti-Semitism is the Socialism of the foolish," Engels once said, because it attacks only Jewish exploiters, and leaves the others alone. This is true, but there are a great many fools. When the exploiter belongs to a different race, the social problem becomes a national one.

Not all Jews are blameless for being hated. There is something else which arouses the animosity of other people. Compared with other races, Jews enjoy great intellectual superiority. As I have already mentioned, over sixty per cent of the Nobel prize winners have been Jews, and nuclear science, the great scientific achievement of the twentieth century, is to a very great extent in Jewish hands. A Jew, Sternfeld, was the chairman of the Committee for Russian Astronautical Coordination. Jews hold key positions in political, economic and cultural life.

If all these were used for the purpose of establishing the Kingdom of God, a kingdom of justice, peace and joy on earth - which is the special task of the Jewish people - then the nightmare in which mankind lives today would come to an end. As the Apostle Paul said, if the world is reconciled to God by the rejection of the Jews, what will their acceptance be but life from the dead? (ROM 11:15).

The other nations feel that there is a great deal the Jews could do for them, which they are not doing. A member of an anti-Semitic organization was sentenced to twenty years' imprisonment. We met in a prison cell. He was in despair. He clasped my hand, and said: "Do something for the world, you Jews! Only you can do it."

What is the use of a knife that will not cut, a pen that will not write, a watch that will not show the time? What is the use of a Jewish race which does not conscientiously, systematically and thoroughly fulfill its role as the people chosen to bring light to nations and to turn their steps towards God?

Jesus said to the Jews: "Ye are the salt of the earth; but if the salt has lost its savour, wherewith shall it be salted? It is thenceforth good for nothing, but to be cast out, and to be trodden under foot of men" (MTT 5:13).

Anti-Semitism has given us more than enough of this tragic fate. Crimes have been committed against us which cannot be defended. But are we all entirely innocent? I would not assert it about myself.

~Discussion in a prison cell~

When, in solitary confinement, I heard from a new prisoner, by means of our system of tapping in code on the walls, about the creation of the new state of Israel, I was overjoyed. Afterwards, in a common cell, I spoke to an extreme right-winger of the Zionist movement. He had avoided me for a long time because, as he put it, we were both hard nuts, and he could see no point in our meeting. But an explanation was necessary, so God arranged for us to meet in a prison cell. He was a strong personality who made a great impression on his fellow men. Torture, and the deprivation of all creature comforts in his old age, never made him feel sorry for himself, but proved an opportunity for him to summon his strength and energy to continue the fight.

I had preached in the cell about the crucifixion of Jesus, and this was followed by a discussion, in which he openly expressed hls opinion.

"Your continual dwelling on the sufferings of Jesus is a sign of masochism, and your constant glorification of the virgin birth merely stimulates the libido. A normal person doesn't continually think about a girl's virginity. It shows how your subconscious must be working. Christianity is a religion of neurotics. It can still satisfy the religious needs of some of its converts. But Judaism is the religion of life, normal life in all its fulness; it has nothing to do with a crucified Saviour. Our sins were expiated by the sacrifice of Isaac, which Abraham intended to make, but which was not carried out."

I asked him: "If Christianity is a false religion, and the Jewish people, as God's chosen people, are in the right, how can you explain the deep cleft between God and the Jewish people? Why are we punished by God and scattered among the nations?"

He replied: "We are not punished by God. The dispersion is our mission. The ghetto prepares us for the fulfillment of our ancient belief that the day will come when Israel will spread among all lands. In order that this ideal shall be fulfilled, we are scattered over the world; but we are not under any curse."

I pointed out that this is a contradiction of the Jewish prayer book, which repeatedly maintains: "For our sins' sake we are driven from our land." It also contradicts what is written in the Old Testament: "If thou wilt not hearken unto the voice of the Lord thy God ... ye shall be plucked from off the land whither thou goest to possess it. And the Lord shall scatter thee among all peoples, from the one end of the earth even unto the other" (DEU 28:15,63, 64).

He stuck to his point of view: "In the dispersion God is just as close to us as He was at the foot of Mount Sinai. The rabbis who wrote the prayer book admit their guilt because they are humble. And the curses that Moses pronounced are a blot on an otherwise great character."

"Did Moses pronounce these curses?" I asked. "He maintained that it was God."

He answered categorically: "They were only the words of Moses, and we are not guilty. We are Jehovah's favourite children, and we are fulfilling the mission He gave us. You have joined the ranks of the anti-Semites." I thought it best to ignore this jibe, and went on: "Apparently what you are trying to say is that it is the mission of Israel to spread the Law of Moses, with which you yourself are only partly in agreement, and belief in the God of Israel. Quite certainly this mission still exists. But you must be half blind if you fail to see that it is only realized through Jesus. Wherever in the world a Gentile prays to the God of Israel, and recognizes the divine authority of the Jewish Bible, and the Jewish prophets as authorities, this is due to the Church that was founded by Jesus, and in no way to the merit of a Mosaic Jew. If the Mosaic Jews had committed no other sin - and in that case they would have surpassed the angels in heaven - they have at least committed the sin of not fulfilling their mission, but only talking about it and leaving it to others, thus increasing their guilt."

My opponent suddenly abandoned the theme of divine mission and contradicted what he had already said by declaring mockingly: "You will not be able to complain much longer about us. Our aim as Zionists is to go back to the land that was ours, a great deal of which is still wrongfully occupied by the Arabs. Then we shall leave you all in peace. Christian Jews will have to choose between being Jews and being Christians. If they choose the former, they must join us; if the latter, they must stay with their co-religionists."

"We want to come with you," I assured him, "though I admit that this will create difficulties, as we wish to come and yet to retain our Christian convictions."

"We do not want to interfere in your private affairs," he declared. "After all, you may believe, or not believe, whichever you wish."

"That is precisely where difficulties will arise," I said. "Our Christian faith will not remain bottled up inside us, nor will it be satisfied with the assurance of our own eternal salvation. It manifests its nature in true thinking, and in an impartiality which is certain to make things difficult for you. Take the Arab problem, which you mentioned. The Arabs have been in Palestine for centuries; it would be wrong to say that they have seized the country unlawfully. You might as well insist that the Americans should be driven out of the United States, so that the country could be returned to the Red Indians. If we went to Palestine, we should feel differently from some of you. The Arabs would be our brothers. We are opposed to chauvinism. The whole of Jerusalem and Israel belong rightfully to the Jews, but the utmost must be done that the Arabs should feel at home with us."

He shouted: "If you do that, you will be severely dealt with. The Christian countries have not behaved in a Christian way towards us, and we shall not allow anyone to start experimenting with Christian love towards our enemies in Palestine, of all places, where our national interests are at stake."

I could not allow him to condemn the whole of Christianity. "Many Christians have behaved in a Christian way towards the Jews. All the pietiests have done so, and the Scandinavian Lutherans and a great many Catholics, both laymen and clergy. So have some members of the Greek Orthodox Church. You are quick to notice the bad characteristics of Christians, but you close your eyes to the good ones. Where the spirit of their faith is missing, where their Christianity is a mere formality, it might go hand in hand with anti-Semitism. But beyond doubt there have been innumerable believing Christians who have loved you. In any case, your chauvinism is not at all representative of Jewish feelings. Most of our people would agree rather with a policy of love and understanding. Real Zionism is ethically Christian because, while fighting for the Jewish cause, it has feelings of friendship toward Arabs."

A well-known anti-Semite, who up till now had listened in silence, interrupted us: "Mr. Wurmbrand, you as both a Jew and a Christian would best be able to explain something to us Rumanians: is there or is there not a Jewish plot against the Gentiles, led by a clandestine Jewish government called Kahal?"

I replied, "There is no plot engineered by the Jews. Non-Jewish people, if they follow their true instincts, do both good and evil, without entering into any prior agreement. The Jews behave in the same way, without the existence of a Kahal. There are enormous differences among the Jews, between parties and denominations. Communist Jews imprison Zionist Jews, as you have an excellent opportunity of seeing. Nevertheless the Jews are united, not by a Kahal, but by their national characteristics, and this is true also of other nations. The special Jewish characteristics sometimes produce positive results of enormous value, sometimes negative results, like their attitude to Christ. This attitude we consider to be a real curse to the nations of the world, who are aware of it without understanding it, because it postpones the only possible solution of the world crisis, which is the establishment of the Kingdom of God, based on justice and happiness, of which only Christ can be the head. This curse must be changed into a blessing, by converting the Jews to a belief in Jesus, because they are called to be God's main tool in establishing His kingdom. Anti-Semitism, too, is a curse, because it prevents the conversion of the Jews."

The anti-Semite answered: "You will never wipe out hostility towards the Jews. They are incapable of being assimilated; they remain an alien element in every country. Every organism has a natural tendency to eliminate foreign bodies."

I admitted: "The Jews are quite different from other people. Their unique history proves this. They cannot be assimilated. But in His parable of the Good Samaritan, Jesus taught us, not that we should absorb people from other nations, but that we should behave justly and kindly to them, whoever they are. There is no justification for anti-Semitism."

The anti-Semite, who refused to let me resume my conversation with the Zionist, maintained his conviction: "A nation must defend itself: Not only are the Jews incapable of being assimilated, but they would like to assimilate us to their own mentality. They undermine our national institutions."

I replied: "So far as that is concerned, you have already been defeated: you are all living in a state of perfect Judaism. If you want to get rid of Judaic influence, you must renounce Christianity, capitalism and Communism; you must give up Singer sewing machines, Waxmann's streptomycin, much of the realm of microphysics, Einstein's theory of the universe, everything that sets is seal on twentieth-century man, and return to the primitive state of a pastoral tribe. After all, it is a fact that man rules nature, and that the white races are at present the most advanced. It is also a fact that, for better or worse, the Jewish mentality is the dominant one. The Jews have an unsurpassed knack of imposing their ideas on others, and in this respect they are invincible, though this is not necessarily always to their credit. But neither is it always to their discredit. People like you are trying to get rid of the Jews while at the same time you worship Jesus, who was Himself born a member of our race."

I turned to the Zionist and added: "We Christian Jews, too, have this quality of invincibility. What is more, we are the most perfect incarnation of the belief in humanitarianism which contains the core of Judaism. We are the true bearers of Judaic values."

He answered: "You are heretics of the Jewish faith. As a Protestant, you are also a heretic of the Christian faith. Double heretic! We may be friends, but it is impossible to reconcile our principles. Your words really conceal a seething hatred of everything that is dear to us, just as the Red Flag is a cover for hatred. Marx wrote an anti-Semitic book, ~The Jewish Question~. The Communist International, too, has published its thesis on the Jewish problem in a book by Heller called ~The End of Judaism~. We are hated everywhere, utterly hated."

Mere words are powerless to help people who have suffered greatly, and have reached the stage when they see enmity in people who are not their enemies.

For this reason I decided to change the subject, so I said: "In a book which you published in 1934, you wrote that Jewish immigration to the part of Palestine which was placed at your disposal would reach a critical point when Palestine cannot absorb any more Jews. An overwhelming majority of Jews will have to remain scattered among the other nations, and you must stop imagining that you are surrounded only by enemies. A new adjustment will be necessary, but your anti-Christian attitude would make this adjustment difficult.

page 182 CHRIST ON THE JEWISH ROAD

Besides, the falling away from the Mosaic religion goes on more rapidly in Palestine than in the dispersion. Only a small percentage of Jews in Palestine go to the synagogues or keep the Jewish traditions. What do you say to this?"

He answered: "We are back in our own land. At last we shall be able to strip off the expensive and deadly garments of the Chosen Race. We shall be just like any other nation."

"You are contradicting yourself," I reminded him. "A few minutes ago you were talking about the holy mission of Israel, Jehovah's favourite child."

He laughed. "Now we are in Palestine we shall complete our mission, by sending apostles to foreign nations. But on a material plane we shall live like them. We shall have our own army, and it will give us victory. We shall have tractors, and they will be our Messiah."

I pointed out: "And one day we shall die, leaving behind us our torturers and our victims, because in the countries where we have lived we have not only been killed, but we have also killed. Consider the millions who were killed by Trotsky, Bela Kun, Tibor Szamuely, Rakosi, Ana Pauker, Jews who were rulers in Communist countries. We shall also leave behind our tractors, and we shall stand before the judgement of God. We shall have to answer for all we have done, and even more for what we have left undone, because we have not been obedient bearers of light. Judaism has shone like a beacon. Salvation has come, and still comes, from the Jews, as Jesus said. But it comes only from the Judaism that was incarnate in Jesus. The spirit that unites all nations does not come from the Jews, who refused to allow other nations to enter the temple, but from Jesus. The sense of supreme justice does not come from the Jews, whose ultimate revelation is the Old Testament (a very valuable book, but one which contains commands to utterly destroy innocent people). It comes from Jesus. Jesus was the first to preach a just and impartial God, who reveals Himself through love to every nation that seeks Him."

The Zionist was content to answer: "We are prepared to make a gift of Christianity to the nations, and we shall see how they make it come true. Let them endure being struck on the face, and let them turn the other cheek! We have put up with blows all too long. We no longer want the religion of meekness."

In prison, serious discussions cannot last long. The anti-Semite seized this moment to make a joke: "We shall receive Christianity as a present from you, minus the commandment about committing adultery. Jewesses are very beautiful. We are against the Jews, but not against Jewesses!"

In the unclean atmosphere produced by a joke of this kind the Spirit no longer vibrates. I held my peace. What our feeble words are incapable of doing, God can do. He will fulfill his plans of peace, even that of peace between Jews and Arabs. He has made the miracle of giving the Jews the victory in the Six-Day War. We hope for an even bigger miracle, lasting peace between Israel and Arabs, with a Jewish Jerusalem serving as lighthouse for the Moslem world. Jews and Arabs can become friends at the foot of the cross of Jesus.

~"I shall stick to our old religion"~

I spoke to another Zionist leader, and asked him: "I realize that you are compelled to attack us. But why do you do it in such a vulgar manner?"

He answered: "We choose our method according to public taste. An academic style would not be very convincing."

"Let us forget it," I replied. "In Paul's Epistle to the Romans, the Christian Church is compared to a branch grafted on to the olive tree of Jewry. Do you realize what this means? An organization embracing more than a thousand million people, and which plays an enormous role in history, is described in the sacred book of this religion as the lawful property of the Jews. Surely we are not so strong, wealthy and self-confident that we can forego a position of this kind? In the sacred book of a thousand million people Jesus is referred to as the Glory of Israel (LUK 2:32). Can we who are so despised afford to renounce this glory?"

He retorted: "We decline it; we refuse to have anything to do with Jesus and Christianity."

I asked him: "In whose name do you decline? Whom do you represent? Does the intellectual elite speak on behalf of the nation? Because almost without exception the intellectual elite of the Jewish people in the twentieth century have supported Jesus."

I quoted from ~As I See the World~ by Albert Einstein, where he said that if we cleanse the Judaism of the prophets, and Christianity, as Jesus preached it, from all its later additions, especially from priestcraft, we shall have a doctrine which will be able to heal mankind of all its social ills. It is the duty of all good people, he said, to strive earnestly to introduce into their milieu this really humane teaching, as far as lies in their power.

I continued: "The synagogue refused to bury Henry Bergson, because he had openly avowed that he was a disciple of Jesus. Franz Werfel, the great Jewish poet, wrote in praise of St. Bernadette. Scholem Asch, the great Jewish novelist, was a Christian. Nils Bohr and Piccard are Christian Jews, and there are many like them. Emil Ludwig wrote ~The Son of Man~, a book full of admiration for his subject. This is also true of Max Brod. Not to mention Martin Buber, who called Jesus his elder brother.

"These, after all, are representative leaders of the Jewish race. 'This is the first time in history that the intellectual leaders of Judaism have rallied to Jesus. In this way, a biblical prophecy is being fulfilled, just as the return of the Jews to Palestine, and the fact that Jews fill leading positions in so many countries, fulfill other biblical prophecies."

The Zionist leader laughed: "All the people you mention were converted to Christianity in their old age, when people tend to suffer from a hardening of the arteries. I don't bother my head with religion, but if we must have one, I shall stick to our old religion."

It was impossible to get him to see reason. He did not know that the old religion familiar to Abraham was salvation by faith, which the Christians preach; and that the new religion is really the Mosaic religion, where salvation is the fruit of obedience to commandments that were not written down until four hundred years after the death of Abraham.

Another factor that distinguished us from the Zionists was that for them the national question was of supreme importance. We were certainly not blind to it, but for us it was of minor significance.

We are at one with the Zionists in one thing. We are in favour of Israel. The rights of the Jews to Palestine are unchallengeable. God, the creator of the universe, gave them this country.

As for the Arabs, it is simply nonsense for them to be afraid of the Jews. What can three million Jews do to three hundred million Arabs? The Arabs should rather profit and learn from the intellectual and financial superiority of their new neighbours. I should also expect the Vatican and the World Council of Churches to take a clear stand on the side of Israel.

We made our position clear.

The Jews enjoy intellectual and material advantages which the Arabs do not possess. The Jews must show understanding, kindness, indulgence, and a willingness to help the Arab world. Difficulties can be overcome by showing them love.

How effective it would be to bombard the impoverished Egyptians with bread, medicine and words of peace! Christian nations could proceed in the same manner. Attacked, the Jewish people must defend themselves with military weapons. But the basic attitude of the heart must be love. The Arabs are loved by every true Jew. They deserve love as much as every other human being.

~All things to all men~

The doctrine which the Zionists found it particularly hard to swallow was the commandment that men should love their enemies.

Would any Zionist have done what we did? After Rumania had severed its alliance with Nazi Germany, it was decreed that any person concealing members of the German army would be liable to the death penalty, as all Germans were to be handed over as prisoners of war. A number of girls serving in the German army, the so-called ~Blitzm„dchen~, appealed to us to shelter them, to save them from being deported to Russia. Naturally, we did so.

page 186 CHRIST ON THE JEWISH ROAD

Some person or other informed on us, and the police surrounded the house. A police commissar entered, and asked me: "Are you sheltering German girls?" I answered: "Do you know what my nationality is?" He said: "Richard Wurmbrand? You're German, of course." I showed him my identity card, issued during the Fascist regime, which stated that I was of Jewish race. "I am a Jew," I declared. "Half of my family have been murdered by the Nazis. Do you really imagine that I would shelter German girls?"

The officer apologised: "The whole thing is obviously a mistake," he admitted, and withdrew. The girls were in an adjoining room. We made no distinction, as God makes no distinction either, allowing the sun to shine and the rain to fall on good and evil alike.

On other occasions we intervened successfully on behalf of Germans who were threatened with deportation only because they were Germans. It was a crime similar to persecuting men only because they were Jews.

In time, this activity became widely known. The Zionists could not forgive us for it, any more than they had forgiven Jesus for giving His love to Romans and Samaritans alike, even to publicans, who were traitors to their country. It was even insinuated that He was on their side, because people failed to realize that the love which He bestowed on sinners did not mean that He condoned their transgressions, but that this would heal their minds. Neither did we condone Nazism, but we healed some of the Nazis by deeds of love.

Our position as Christian Jews is always between the devil and the deep blue sea; as we tried to win everyone to the faith, to be all things to all men, we were almost like actors striving in different plays to interpret completely different characters.

By way of putting me to shame, someone once described me as a great actor. I took this as a compliment. I cannot see how it is possible to be a good missionary unless one has a certain artistic flair, and a knack of playing different roles.

One day I left my house to carry out my duty as a fisher of men. The first person I talked to was a noted anti-Semite.

page 187 CHRIST ON THE JEWISH ROAD

"I don't want to hear about Jesus, because he was a dirty Jew," he rebuffed me. I replied: "How do you know Jesus was a dirty Jew? He is the Son of God, and belongs to no one nation. In driving the merchants from the temple He showed his repugnance for a quality which you condemn in Jews, the pursuit of money. The harshest words of condemnation ever written about Jews are to be found in the New Testament. Your place is at the side of Jesus, not with those who condemned Him to death."

I parted from him, and met a Jew, who told me that he did not believe in Jesus, because He was the Saviour only of the Gentiles. I asked him: "Where did you get that from? Jesus was a Jew. The New Testament opens with the words: 'Jesus Christ, the son of David, the son of Abraham,' giving His entire genealogy and proving that He is of Jewish descent. In the Scriptures Jesus is called 'the Glory of His people Israel.' He loved His people passionately, and told a Samaritan woman: 'Salvation comes from the Jews' (JHN 4:22). Christianity is essentially a vast undertaking to Judaise the world, because it has been ordained that people of all races shall become 'Jews in their hearts.' Even after Jesus had been crucified, the apostles continued to call Jerusalem the Holy City, and the apostle Paul writes that the Jews are still loved by God for the sake of their forefathers, and that they will play a great role in the future. The chosen ones of heaven will consist of 144,000 people from the twelve tribes of Israel alone."

Shortly afterwards, I ran into a brother who was full of confidence in his own faith, but not conspicuous for his good deeds. As I was familiar with his way of life, I said to him: "Faith without good deeds is dead" (JMS 2:17), because men will be judged by what they do.

I then visited a believer who was on the brink of despair because of a sin he had committed. He could never forgive himself, and he doubted whether he was saved. I explained that man is regarded as true to his faith, even without good deeds, because God looks on the heart, and not on our actions; the opposite, in fact, of what I had just said to the last man I had met.

After these four conversations I sat down on a park bench.

page 188 CHRIST ON THE JEWISH ROAD

My head was spinning. I asked myself which of the four things I had said I believed myself. The answer I came to was that the different ways in which one speaks to people are nothing but bait with which to lure them to Him who is far above and beyond our prejudices and ideas. But going from one category of human being to another involves the use of different arguments and different medicines for the soul. The anti-Semite and the Jew brought to conversion will meet in the same Christian love, but work of this kind is very exhausting.

~Anti-Klausner~

A professor at the university in Jerusalem, Josef Klausner, wrote a book called ~Jesus of Nazareth~, which has been translated into all the main world languages.

Every time I talked to a Jew about the Saviour, he would conclude his argument with: "The problem of Jesus has been explained by Klausner." Generally the learned Jew concerned had not taken the trouble to read Klausner, but he had the book unopened on his bookshelves, and this was enough. He did not need to bother his head any more with Jesus.

For this reason I considered it necessary to publish an answer to Klausner's book, which I called ~The Jews and Jesus of Nazareth~. ~Anti-Klausner~.

Klausner took an unfair advantage of his great name, which made him confident that his assertions would be accepted by the rank and file of Jews, and enabled him to make statements which were completely untrue but which would never be subject to any check.

He writes, for example, that in Paul we find no authentic historical proof of Jesus's life and work.

Any student familiar with the Scriptures could have corrected the professor on this point.

In Paul we find a great many details about the life of Jesus. He says, for example, that Jesus was betrayed, that He was killed by the Jews, and that the place of His crucifixion was just outside Jerusalem. Paul also tells us something about the mind of Jesus. He says that Christ "loved the church and gave himself for it" (EPH 5:25). He describes Jesus's humility, His mildness and His power. Above all, he constantly reminds us of a "biographical detail" that Klausner has omitted, namely that Jesus rose from the dead.

Without any historical basis in fact, Klausner proceeds to make any statement that suits him. He says that Jesus was born in Nazareth. Where did he get this? Any mention of Bethlehem, which the Gospels describe as Jesus's birthplace, would be rather awkward, because it is David's town, and it was here that the prophets foretold that the Messiah would be born.

He claims the story of Salome is a legend. Professor Klausner merely decides that this is so and argument is superfluous.

"John the Baptist considered himself to be Elias." The Gospels state that when John was asked: "Are you Elias?," he answered: "I am not." (JHN 1:21). Professor Klausner possesses a source of information which is not available to other people.

He goes on to say that it is obvious that John the Baptist knew nothing of Jesus, and did not accept Him as the Messiah. The only historical sources, the Gospels, state that Jesus and John were related, and that the latter proclaimed Jesus as the Messiah. No one knows where Klausner obtained his information.

The only argument Klausner uses every time he submits a statement for which there is no proof is: "It is obvious that this is so."

He excuses Judas Iscariot, proclaiming him to be a learned Jew with a clear understanding. The account of Jesus being betrayed by a trick is only a legend.

Just as all the unsavoury details about Judas are dismissed, so all the lovable features attributed to Jesus are also put down as legend. Klausner refuses to believe that Jesus on the Cross would have said of His executioners: "Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do" (LUK 23:34). His argument is simply that Jesus could not have pronounced these words in such terrible circumstances. I have personally known men and women, disciples of Jesus, who have spoken the same words under cruel torture, and what is more, who took the first opportunity of doing good to those who had tortured them. But Professor Klausner has simply made up his mind that love of this kind is non-existent.

He swiftly dismisses the gospel story of the resurrection of Jesus by declaring that it is obvious (a wonderful expression which relieves the author of the need to adduce any proof) that Joseph of Arimathea removed the body from the tomb.

He believes "a resurrection is incomprehensible." There are a great many things that are incomprehensible. Incomprehensible though it may appear, there actually exists a learned professor who, instead of starting off by analysing facts and documents, proceeds on the basis of certain prejudices as to what God can or cannot do.

After writing hundreds of pages without making any contribution to the problem of the life of Jesus, Klausner discusses the differences between Judaism and the teaching of Jesus. In this connection he states that a nation cannot survive by means of an abstract faith and by a universal human ethic. It needs a practical form of religion, involving forms capable of expressing religious ideas, and capable of penetrating everyday life with the sanctity of religion. "Jesus has not shown us new ways for our national life." By accepting the teaching of Jesus, "national life and the national state would entirely disappear." "His doctrine contains no elements which can maintain the state and regulate the community." "Jesus came to abolish culture."

What answer is one to give to this two thousand years after the coming of Jesus? Professor Klausner has obviously never heard of Christian culture, he knows nothing of the national states which still exist, which were established and maintained thanks to Christianity. How can he explain the fact that all the nations of Europe and America, as well as a great many African nations, have independent national states, despite the fact that they have accepted Christianity, which, according to Klausner, destroys state, nation and culture?

I might go on to ask: "What did the enemies of Jesus, Caiaphas, Annas and the others, do to the Jewish state?" They succeeded in removing the great danger that Jesus represented, on the pretext that this was necessary if the Jewish national state was to be maintained. These were the very men who led the Jewish state to disaster. History has proved that Christianity establishes and maintains a state, while Pharisaism destroys it. How can one possibly ignore these obvious historical proofs?

Klausner says that Judaism cannot accept the term "The Son of God," or only "God," for the Messiah, even though the idea in itself is Jewish. But if the idea of the Son of God is Jewish, then it is obvious that only those who have renounced the inheritance of their people can refuse to accept it. According to Klausner, who defies any form of logic, it is the renegades who have accepted the Jewish idea.

Klausner dislikes Jesus's teaching that we should love those who wrong us. Human society, he says, would not survive if every injury remained unpunished. But why did the Jewish national state disappear two thousand years ago? The Jews rose in revolt against the injustice of the Roman Empire. The result was that the Jewish state vanished from off the face of the earth. One might have expected the professor to conclude from this event, and thousands like it, that human society cannot survive if we repay evil with evil, if we rise against injustice. For thousands of years states have vanished, bloodthirsty wars have been fought, and thousands of millions of people have been killed because one side has refused to tolerate the injustices of the other, and has failed to requite evil with love. This is a historical fact. There are grave issues when violence is justified, but the fundamental attitude should be love.

When Jesus teaches love toward enemies, he does not mean literal practice of non-violence whatever happens around us. He Himself used violence of language and also the whip. The world is not yet conveniently arranged for non-violence. Sadly, you have sometimes to exterminate enemies of your nation. But nothing compels me to hate them. God does not look at our deeds dictated by circumstances. Here the desire to kill must be removed. Here only love must reign. In the end it will triumph also over external circumstances.

It is not wrong for a nation to practise love toward those who wrong it. Professor Klausner's reproach against Jesus is unjust. Nations do not as a rule vanish from off the face of the earth because they have practised love.

Klausner sums up his attitude neatly when he declares that Judaism is in its entirety of this world. It was for this reason that the Jews rejected Him whose kingdom is not of this world, but belongs to the sphere of purest truth. "He cannot be the Messiah of the Jewish people."

Now, if you want to decide whether a person is the Messiah or not, it would be scientifically correct if you first clearly defined what this term means, what methods exist for recognising the true Messiah, and, finally, investigate whether that person fulfils these conditions. Klausner did not carry out any studies of this nature. In my book I did it for him, pointing out that all the prophecies about the Messiah who expiates the sins of mankind by His suffering, and other biblical prophecies, were fulfilled by Jesus.

There are a great many of these prophecies, and a large body of literature exists about them. Without going into these in detail, it might be worth mentioning one, which is incapable of more than one interpretation, since it is based on mathematics.

The prophet Daniel, who lived about six hundred years B.C., foretold with astonishing accuracy the year in which the Messiah would be killed. This was the year when Jesus was crucified.

Anyone studying this prophecy with an open mind will realize that waiting for any other saviour is fruitless. The Talmud declares: "The time determined for the coming of the Messiah has passed, but the Messiah has not come." The Talmud, refusing Jesus as the Messiah had no other solution than to declare God to be a liar, because He did not keep His promise, and allowed the time foretold for the coming of the Messiah to go by without keeping His word.

Let us consider the biblical text: "Seventy weeks [of years] are determined upon thy people," the Archangel Gabriel declared to Daniel in about 600 B.C., "and upon thy holy city to finish the transgression, and to make an end of sins, and to make reconciliation for iniquity, and to bring in everlasting righteousness, and to seal up the vision and prophecy, and to anoint the most Holy. Know therefore and understand, that from the going forth of the commandment to restore and to build Jerusalem unto the Messiah the Prince, shall be seven weeks [of years], and threescore and two weeks [of years]; the street shall be built again, and the wall, even in troublous times. And after threescore and two weeks shall the Messiah be cut off, but not for himself..." (DAN 9:24-26).

This would give us a total of sixty-nine weeks of years, in other words sixty-nine multiplied by seven, which is four hundred and eighty-three years, from the time when the order was given to rebuild Jerusalem to the death of the Messiah.

Let us check the events that actually occurred:

King Xerxes of Persia commenced his reign in the year 465 B.C. In the book of Nehemiah, Chapter 2, we read that in the twentieth year of his reign he permitted the rebuilding of Jerusalem. In other words, nineteen years had elapsed, which we must subtract. Consequently the order to rebuild Jerusalem was issued in the year 446 B.C.

Four hundred and eighty-three years after this event, the Messiah, according to the prophecy, would be killed. For the sake of accuracy, we should remember that Daniel calculated the year according to the old Jewish calendar, which consisted of three hundred and sixty days, unlike our calendar year which has three hundred and sixty-five and a quarter days.

This means that we must convert the Jewish calendar year to years based on our present reckoning:

483 years x 360 days (based on the Hebrew calendar)
= 173,880 days.

173,880 days:365¬ (the length of our present calendar year)
= 476 years.

This means that four hundred and seventy-six years would elapse from the year 446 B.C. to the death of the Messiah. In other words, this event would occur in the year A.D. 30 calculated according to our calendar.

And it was precisely in this year that Jesus was crucified. It is a well-established fact that in the sixth century A.D., when the pre-Christian and post-Christian eras were divided, there was a mathematical mistake in the calculation. The birth of Christ was assigned to a date four years later than it actually occurred. The year A.D. 30, by our modern calculations, is in fact the thirty-fourth year of Jesus's life. And in the thirty-fourth year of His life, in the year 30 of the Christian era, Jesus was crucified, precisely as prophesied by Daniel.

God's vengeance was not slow to strike. Daniel had foretold that after this unparalleled misdeed, "for the overspreading of abominations he shall make it desolate, even until the consummation, and that determined shall be poured upon the desolate." (DAN 9:27) We know that, shortly afterwards, Palestine was ravaged by the army of Titus, that the land was utterly laid waste, the temple was burned, and sacrificed were no longer made.

Rashi, one of the leading biblical commentators, recognizes that Titus fulfilled these very prophecies. But in this case the Messiah must be a man who was killed before Titus enjoyed his great triumph. This man is Jesus; it cannot be anyone else.

Professor Klausner was one of the many intellectual leaders of the Jews who was misled. It is astonishing that a race which is so intelligent and so civilized can accept a book which sets such low standards. In the last chapter of his book, Klausner plumbs the depths of the ridiculous with the remark that "Jesus became a Christian." This is written by a university professor. He might as well have said that Mohammed became a Mohammedan.

Is Jesus God?

There are a great many Jews who are prepared to accept the Christian moral code, but refuse to accept the Christian teaching about the divinity of Jesus.

I was one day in the office of an intellectual who was in this position. I asked him: "Are you really able to make the Christian moral code a reality in your life? You say you accept this code, and in fact you have called it 'glorious.'"

He began to laugh. It is depressing how seldom one manages to start a really serious discussion with anyone. He said: "Yes, but one cannot demand that it should be put into practice."

I answered: "In my opinion it is just as ridiculous to give mankind a moral code incapable of being carried out as it would be for a shoe manufacturer to make beautiful shoes that cannot be worn. The Christian moral code may appear incapable of being put into practice, but it is not so for everyone. The conditions necessary for keeping it must be fulfilled. Every businessman knows that income must cover expenditure. Christian morals involve certain expenses - loving, serving, helping. But where do you get the strength for this? From your faith, a treasure-house full of truths revealed by God."

"No, no," was his answer. "The Christian dogmas are absurd. How could I believe that a Jewish carpenter, who bought wood, boiled glue, sold his products and went about the everyday business of an ordinary man, could be God? The only form of Christianity the Jews could ever hope to approach would be Unitarianism. Jesus may be a great teacher, a great prophet, but never God."

I explained: "That possibility does not exist. Jesus assumed divine rights, and accepted worship that belongs only to God. If He is not God, He cannot have been a great teacher, but He must have been merely a fraud or a crazy fanatic. You would not dare to regard Him as such. The only alternative left, then, is to accept Him as God."

"We are in the sphere of words," he interrupted. "In ancient times a great many people were regarded as gods, and so were celestial bodies. Hercules, Romulus, and the emperors Julius and Augustus were regarded as gods. Even the mad Caligula was raised to the status of a divinity. The philosopher Epicurus was considered to be a god. Even among the early Christian fathers there were some who insisted that Christians become gods. In human speech, the word god is not a name reserved only for the Creator. In this sense we might perhaps call Jesus divine, just as we could call Plato divine, or talk about Beethoven's divine music. But no more!"

The position of a Protestant, when he is debating with a Jew, is much easier than that of a Greek Orthodox or a Roman Catholic. Protestants delight in their freedom of thought, and need never be afraid of making a statement in an incautious moment which Catholics would consider heretical.

page 196 CHRIST ON THE JEWISH ROAD

My reply was: "As soon as we describe something or someone as divine, we are moving in a sphere where words have lost their power. In what way is Jesus divine? And in what way is the Heavenly Father divine? The French are right when they say: 'Un Dieu defini est un Dieu fini' (A God defined is a God who is finished). Lao-Tse said: 'Any Dao [god] who is named is not the true Dao.' In calling Jesus God, I mean that He cannot be compared with other human beings. His character is a miracle: He cannot be explained in terms of genetic laws, laws of environment and so on. In Him we have a fortunate combination of all the four human types: sanguine, choleric, phlegmatic and melancholic. The life of Jesus can only be explained by assuming that He comes from a higher sphere than the human.

"Brought up in a carpenter's workshop, without access to the wisdom of other nations and races, He gave the world, at the age of thirty, an unparalleled moral code. His death, side by side with two criminals, was followed by a miraculous spread of His religion. The best explanation of these facts is that Jesus is divine.

"We cannot judge on the basis of sympathy or antipathy, but only on the basis of proof. Let your understanding act like an impartial tribunal, which pronounces its verdict on the basis of proofs which are submitted to it. There are five highly convincing arguments in favour of the divine nature of Jesus.

"First, He overcame death, which no other human being has done.

"Second, He overcame physical laws which man cannot overcome (raising the dead, healing lepers, multiplying loaves and fishes, and so on).

"Third, He overcame Judaism, which wanted Him to remain unknown. False Messiahs, who were accepted by the Jews such as Bar-Kochba and Sabetai Zvi, are unknown to the rest of the world, whereas Jesus, who was rejected by us, is worshipped by hundreds of millions of people.

"Fourth, He conquered the Roman Empire. The great persecutor of Christianity, Julian the Apostate, died with these words on his lips: 'Thou has conquered, O Galilean.' It is the strongest who conquers: If Jesus has conquered kings, He is King of Kings.

"Fifth, by the madness of the Cross, He has overcome human wisdom. One after another, philosophical systems are destroyed. Who even remembers the anti-Christian philosopher Celsus, or of the Cult of Reason introduced by the French Revolution? Who still leads his life according to the Talmud? But the words of the carpenter, who is both man and God - 'Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away' (MTT 24:35) - are still valid. From the purely human point of view there was no chance whatever that Jesus's words would be fulfilled, nor was there any chance that His prophecy that His gospel would be spread to the ends of the earth would ever come true.

"In no possible way could Jesus be merely a human being and for that reason we accept that He is God in human guise.

"It is important to know this. The medical advice given by a doctor's assistant carries very little real weight, and is not decisive. But the advice given by a well-known doctor comes into an entirely different category. You can lead a Christian life when you know that these laws come not from another person, who is fallible like yourself, but from God. It is this that makes it possible for people to keep God's commandments."

The intellectual Jew had no answer to make. He grew thoughtful. I was tired of having the last word, it is wiser to leave it to your opponent. It ls difficult to win over to belief someone you have beaten in a debate, because in so doing you will have wounded his pride. In this case, I had the last word and I did not win him.

7 OUR ATTITUDE TO COMMUNISM

~Communism as part of God's plan~

The change in the political regime in Rumania presented new problems for us.

Marxism had been practically unknown among us. Now, all young people were being educated in its spirit, and a great many Marxist and atheist books were being published.

The Jews played an important role in spreading the Communist ideology in our country. We ran up against it at every step, and were forced to adopt a new approach.

We published a series of pamphlets dealing with the problems of the relationship between Protestant Christianity and Marxism: ~Conversation between a young Socialist and a Believer~, ~Jesus and Socialism~ (an answer to the book by the Socialist theorist Karl Kautsky, ~The Origins of Christianity~), ~Dialectic Materialism and Biblical Faith~ (an answer to Engels' book Anti-Dhring~) and ~Karl Marx and Belief~. We tried to make these booklets attractive to Communist readers. On the first page of ~Karl Marx and Belief~ there was a picture of Marx, and on the next page a picture of "Jesus the Working Proletarian," followed by other pictures, such as "Jesus driving the Capitalists out of the Temple." There followed an account of Jesus's sacrifice.

We were in no way frightened by the atheist offensive, which persuaded a number of other people that Christianity was finished in our country. Christianity has many times in the past been declared dead. In ~The History of the Popes~, Ranke describes the spread of heresy in Italy during the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries; at that time, too, it was believed that Christianity was at the end of its tether.

Nor were we terrified at the thought that a small group of real Christians were so feeble compared to the giant Goliath of atheism.

For myself, I clung to the biblical idea that the power of God is fulfilled only in weakness. The ~Tao-Te-King~, the sacred book of Taoism, rightly declares: "All creatures and plants are delicate and weak when they are born, but when they perish, they are strong and powerful. What is strong and powerful is destroyed, and what is weak and delicate begins to live. For this reason a strong army does not conquer, but is destroyed like a strong tree. That which is strong and powerful does not have the same advantage as that which is weak and delicate."

It was precisely our weakness which gave us immense strength in our struggle with the all-powerful Marxism, which many Jews also championed.

If Communism exists in God's world, it must surely be to fill a vacuum in God's economy. Capitalism makes a man an individualist. Emphasis on personal salvation and personal sanctification reflects man's conscience in the social conditions created by capitalism. The very instigation of the Socialist set-up made a profound difference to the thinking of a great many Christians. They were able to stand face to face with Communists simply by showing that everything that is beautiful and attractive in Communism has been derived from Christianity.

Today the churches are divided. The Church of the early Christian Jews in Jerusalem, organized according to the instructions of Jesus himself to His apostles, was a Church in which all shared their possessions. In the Acts of the Apostles we read of the first Christians: "And the multitude of them that believed were of one heart and of one soul: neither said any of them that ought of the things which he possessed was his own; but they had all things common ... Neither was there any among them that lacked: for as many as were possessors of lands or houses sold them, and brought the prices of the things that were sold, and laid them down at the apostles' feet: and distribution was made unto every man according as he had need" (ACT 4:32-35).

This was another kind of Communism, one based on love! It would be better not to use the same name for it, so different is it from what we experience under Communism today.

We could come to an understanding with many Communists, we could accept some of them as brothers, because not only did we preach the individual salvation of the soul through the blood of Jesus - which remained our main task - but we were also interested in social problems.

We believe that it is the duty of Christians to strive to ensure that men and women need not depart from the Christian standard; they should not be compelled to crawl, flatter, steal, kill in wars, or exploit other people, in order to enjoy material sufficiency.

We do not consider that sanctification is merely a personal matter; it is also a social vocation. Not only must I be glorified, but the social body must be glorified, by creating the kingdom of God on earth; in other words, a kingdom where justice, peace and joy reign. We must fight for just laws and institutions, as the first Christians created an ideal social institution, the Church, which has this characteristic too. We long for a social justice which springs from love, and is inspired by the wish to imitate God, who makes the sun to shine and the rain to fall on all alike.

We do not believe in all the saints canonized by the Orthodox and Roman Catholic Churches. Their legendary and unique deeds are enough to make us, ordinary people, despair. When Peter tried to walk on the water by himself, he sank. We want to walk in common with others along the road that leads to Jesus.

Jesus reproached whole towns for not being converted (MTT 11:21-23); in other words, He expects conversion to be a social phenomenon, embracing large numbers of people.

In the parable of the Prodigal Son, the father is made to say: "Let us eat and be merry." There are no pleasures without food. We must make sure that everybody has food.

We must strive to convert not only a prostitute or a drunkard, but prostitution, alcoholism, the prisons, man's exploitation of other people, war - all these things must be abolished, and this can only be done if the Christian fights his battles in the social as well as the personal sphere. Evil has made great strides; there is a long line stretching from Cain, who killed a man with a staff, to the gas chambers of Auschwitz and the Communist extermination camps. The satanic powers have transferred their attack from the individual to an offensive on a large social front. The powers of good must do the same.

In the old days Paul could preach from the same pulpit as his enemies. We have a pulpit today, but our enemies have the schools, the press, large publishing concerns, the cinema, the radio, television. We, too, have a right to all these things, and if we are to achieve them, then we must strive to realize Daniel's prophecy that "the kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the most High" (DAN 7:27).

The apostle Jude writes of the common salvation; and something like this does exist, not only personal salvation. Jacob prophesied of Jesus that "nations will gather around Him" (GEN 49:10, according to the Hebrew). The nations, not an occasional individual here and there.

The conditions necessary for the establishment of God's kingdom on earth are now present; this was not possible when material conditions were so wretched. The advances of modern technology have made it possible for all people to have food and clothing. Modern medicine, freed from the shackles which still hamper it, could give us physically healthy men and women. Proper education and psychology could help us to give us people who are mentally healthy. Modern means of communication could ensure that a handful of people, filled with the spirit of God, could exercise a decisive influence for the benefit of all mankind. Modern scientific ways of thinking could eliminate all ancient superstitions, which have been unjustly attributed to religion, and religion could then shine forth in all its purity and glory. With mutual understanding between nations, humanity could receive vigorous international and interdenominational impulses. Soon there will be only two religions - the religion of love and the religion of ceremonial formalism.

The coming into power of Communism has meant prison, torture and death for thousands of Christians, but it has helped our thinking enormously: Communists think on a global plane, and in terms of future generations. The children of God, quite wrongly, have a reduced horizon: often their thinking is narrow, and they look only one step ahead. Was it for nothing that the leaders of the Church in the New Testament were called "presbyters," that is to say, people who see far ahead?

The Christian Jews, too, have learned to think on the universal plane, and to strive to achieve a distant goal. The Roman Empire threw Christians to the wild beasts, but it also taught them to think on an imperial scale. Christianity became the religion of the empire, instead of that of isolated individuals. Communism has played the same role for us.

The earth has plants which are used to heal individuals. The Bible tells us that Heavenly Jerusalem has leaves which serve to heal whole nations (REV 22:2). Christian Jews know the secret of finding their pharmaceutical remedies here.

Yet the evangelization of the individual still remains the priority. Only saints can sanctify society. A social gospel preached to unregenerate men is a fake. But men who have been born again must bring their new life into society.

~Christian revolutionism~

We Christians were not frightened by Communist revolutionism. After all, we ourselves are the descendants of revolutionary movement. Four hundred years ago, Calvin, in his commentary on the Book of Daniel, wrote: "The princes of this world set aside all their power when they rise against God, and are not worthy to be reckoned among mankind. We should rather spit in their faces than obey them when they are so bold as to try to deprive God of His rights ... If they rise against God, they must be humbled and regarded as valueless

page 203 CHRIST ON THE JEWISH ROAD

as a pair of worn shoes." Before him, St. John Chrysostom and St.

Ambrose had valiantly opposed emperors.

We do not reproach the Communists for their revolutionism, but for the fact that it has not gone far enough.

The Bible is much more revolutionary than the writings of Karl Marx and Lenin. On the very first page of the Bible we read that God says to the human beings He has just created: "Have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the earth" (GEN 1:28). Only notice this! Man is to have dominion over all nature, but not over another human being.

The Bible also tells us that God created only one couple: the English rebels at the time of the Peasants' Revolt understood this excellently when in one of their revolutionary songs they asked: "When Adam delved and Eve span, who was then the gentleman?"

God has made "all nations of one blood," the Bible declares (ACT 17:26), thus putting under a question mark the value of all titles of nobility and rank - including those in Socialist countries, such as Party membership or working-class origins - and all racialist theories.

The first nationalisation of landed property which aimed at preventing the exploitation of the peasants by the rich landowners in times of famine was put into practice by Joseph, when he was prime minister of Egypt.

In the preamble to the Ten Commandments, God boasts not of creating Heaven and Earth, but of something quite different: "I am the Lord thy God, which have brought thee out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage." (EXO 20.2) We are permitted no other gods apart from the God who makes it His task to liberate mankind from every sort of serfdom.

What a revolution the world underwent when the Sabbath was introduced as an institution! In pagan countries slaves were part of the machinery of production; the Bible introduced the principle that a man should rest, and that his servant should be given an opportunity to do likewise. In the Socialist countries, where the fulfillment of the various state plans is more important than Sunday rest, the fourth commandment, to keep the Sabbath, is a revolutionary imperative.

"Thou shalt neither vex a stranger, nor oppress him" (EXO 22:21) is what the Bible teaches men in an age when being black in America and white in Africa and a Jew in Europe involves discrimination.

God commanded Moses not to treat the poor unjustly (LEV 19:15). If the capitalist countries would respect this principle everywhere, they would have no need to fear the Communist threat.

We must remember that the sacred book of the apostles and the first Christians was the Old Testament, and not the New Testament, which was not written until several decades later. If Jesus had not intended to give His disciples a revolutionary training, what point was there in letting them read a book which was mainly an epic of revolutionary struggle?

The Lord raised up a deliverer for the children of Israel, the Benjamite Ehud, the man who killed the tyrant Eglon (Judges 3). Jael was called "blessed above women" for slaying the oppressor Sisera by driving a tent peg through his temple (JDG 5:24); these were the very words that were later on used about the mother of our Lord. Jael was what today would be called a brave female partisan in the army of liberation in an oppressed country. Other biblical characters, such as Gideon and Jephthah, were also revolutionary champions.

The Bible ridicules absolute monarchy in Jotham's parable which compares tyrants with thorn bushes while the useful trees, such as the olive, the fig and the vine, refused to play this odious role. In his speech when the Jews wished to elect a king, the prophet Samuel also inveighed against absolute monarchy. In the second book of Kings we read of the bloody revolution raised by Jehu against the tyranny of the Ahab dynasty. The Bible tells us that this revolution was carried out on the express orders of God. Jehu slew the two unlawful kings, and Queen Jezebel was thrown out of the window. He destroyed those who supported the tyranny and the sons of tyrants, and slew without mercy all priests who had made power an excuse for plunder. Not one was allowed to escape. After all this, the Lord said to Jehu: "Thou hast done well in executing that which is right in mine eyes, and hast done unto the house of Ahab according to all that was in mine heart" (2 Kings 10.30).

Later on, Jesus was to say: "Not everyone that saith unto me, 'Lord, Lord,' shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven" (MTT 7:21). And the will of God, according to the book of Kings, in the story of the revolutionary Jehu, is the complete destruction of tyranny.

What revolutionary songs there are in the Bible! What is the ~International~ compared to Psalm 109, which is directed against the man who "persecuted the poor and needy man, that he might even slay the broken in heart"?

The cry for social justice echoed by the prophets of Israel is well known; in the New Testament, too, there are numerous revolutionary passages. The mother of our Lord establishes a social programme for her Son, whom she had conceived by the Holy Ghost, with the words: "He hath put down the mighty from their seats, and exalted them of low degree. He hath filled the hungry with good things; the rich he hath sent empty away" (LUK 1:52-53).

"Woe unto you that are rich!" said Jesus, "for ye have received your consolation! Woe unto you that are full! for ye shall hunger" (LUK 6:24-25). "It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God" (MTT 19:24).

"If a man does not work, he shall not eat," the fundamental principle in the legislation of Socialist states, is copied, almost word for word, from the Apostle Paul (2TH 3:10)

Christians know that God has a chosen people, the Jews, and a chosen group, the Church, but how many know that He has a chosen social class? The apostle James wrote about something that was very familiar to his readers at that time: "Hath not God chosen the poor of this world?" (JMS 2:5), and scourges the rich unmercifully.

"Christianity was formed as a religion for the poor, for those who were xsploited and oppressed, for the slaves and freed bondmen," writes Amusin, the Soviet historian, in his book on the Dead Sea Scrolls.

Within the Christian community there have always been those who have striven to return to the original teaching; but most have become hypnotised by details, controversies about baptism, speaking in tongues, and keeping the Sabbath, which might have been practised by the early Church but are not the essentials. But why should we not return to the revolutionism of the first Church, and the struggle to live according to the principles of social justice? When God chose a language in which to express His revelations in the Bible, He chose the Hebrew language, possibly the only language in which the verb "to have" does not exist. In this way He wished to show that the idea of property, of owning anything, is and must be completely alien to the people of God. It will always be true, as Jesus said, that the believer who wishes to attain perfection must "sell everything he has," and "leave all he has," and "leave home and family."

Proudhon's saying that "Property is theft" is one to which every believing Christian can subscribe; because as God has arranged things we are not meant to have property. All good things must be enjoyed in fellowship; individual ownership is an abomination. Only individual stewardship is admissible. Though private property is economically the best method of increasing riches, these should then be spent not for a selfish end, but for the glory of God and the good of one's fellow-men.

The Catholic Church, which faithfully recommends this teaching of Jesus, adopts the selfsame ideology today, even though it does not practise it. It declares that the man who wishes to be perfect must renounce private ownership, and only possess things in common, for example within the framework of a monastic order.

Today, at the threshold of a new historical era, Jews who believe in Jesus and faithfully follow His teaching are wholeheartedly on the side of the exploited and the oppressed. But we know of nobody more oppressed and more exploited than the citizens of the Socialist states, which speak in the name of the poor.

We utterly oppose Communist dictatorship and terror. We abhor Communist atheism. But, as a Christian must be "a Jew to the Jews and a Greek to the Greeks," so, in dealing with Communists, in the same sense we must be Communists, if we wish to win them for Christ. It is just as impossible to win them if we adopt an anti-Communist approach as it would be impossible to win Jews by adopting anti-Semitism. Though we are opposed to Communism, we must show sympathy for the individual Communist, just as St. Paul, who detested Greek idolatry, would use words of praise for the Greeks in order to convert them.

The writings of Socialism always offered us a great many Christian arguments. Whenever I meet a Communist who makes fun of the Bible as a reactionary book, I counter him with a quotation from Marx: "When Luther translated the Bible, he placed in the people's hands a powerful weapon against princes, nobility and clergy."

Whenever a Communist calls the Bible absurd, I quote from Engels' work ~Bruno Bauer and Primitive Christianity~: "A religion which conquered the Roman world empire, and which has reigned for eighteen hundred years over the majority of civilized mankind, cannot be rejected merely by declaring that it consists of a series of absurdities, created by deceivers." In ~The Revelation~ he praises primitive Christianity as "a great revolutionary movement." It was, incidentally, Engels who wrote: "We live in God. One can understand that better when one travels on the sea."

Even the apostles took it for granted that the multitude would have to go away from Jesus to look for food; but Jesus showed that they could have food in plenty if they remained with Him.

No one need abandon Jesus in order to be a revolutionary. He can be a much better revolutionary by remaining with Him. Without Jesus, revolutions are destructive, and costly in blood. A revolution with Jesus is constructive, changing social conditions peacefully, after sanctifying hearts.

page 208 CHRIST ON THE JEWISH ROAD

We were always present at the great Communist rallies, where we handed out our tracts. These started with the subjects I have just outlined, and thanks to them we made contact with the Communist soul, and preached the crucified Christ.

~Conflict with Communism~

Yet we had no illusions; we knew that our differences with the Communists were fundamental.

They are totalitarians; they do not permit the slightest deviation from the line pursued by the Party. Why should they allow us, who are just as totalitarian, and want all people to belong completely to God, to go free?

By practising the methods used by Jesus and His apostles we were able to win some Communists for Christ, but this resulted in increased opposition towards us by the Party. They did not want understanding, loyalty and love, they merely wanted us to identify ourselves with their plans, and to be transformed into willing tools. But our love for them would not allow us to be opportunists, to flatter them, or to be their willing slaves. Out of love towards them, we had to show them their crimes. They avoided us because we posed the problem of sin, and the madness of the Cross as the only way to solve this problem.

There are sins which are caused by social conditions, and which can be removed on the social plane, as were the sins of slavery and polygamy. But there is a limit to this. Lenin writes: "We can abolish the law that allows the capitalist to exploit the worker and the landowner to exploit the peasant, but no one in the world can prevent the cunning man exploiting the simple person, or the weak being exploited by the strong."

Communists, in the first case, would attain the limit of what is humanly possible by changing social conditions, but they cannot change human hearts. This only Jesus can do. He can give us new birth. Without using coercion, he turned cunning men like Matthew and Zacchaeus, and a terrorist like Saul of Tarsus, into good, just people. It is only the Cross of Jesus that can perform this miracle.

page 209 CHRIST ON THE JEWISH ROAD

With Communists, as with all other people, the attempt to lead a moral life and to allow the mind to soar upwards is frustrated by sin which weighs down the soul with its enormous burden. They have committed injustices, they have made men weep, they have shed blood, they have been inconsistent and unfaithful to their own ideals, they have violated their own moral standards. This gives them a feeling of guilt, and of the need to be saved, but the more these are suppressed, the more they upset their mental state, resulting in all kinds of morbid and evil complexes.

And Communists do just what all other people do: they try to transfer their guilt to others, they look for a scapegoat. Adam blamed Eve, and Eve blamed the serpent. The Communists find their scapegoat in the bourgeoisie, the landowners, the Social Democrats, the Trotskyites, the clergy, the sectarians and their own Party members. They fight against everyone and everything.

No one can live in a constant mental attitude of "I am not worthy." Besides, the feeling of guilt is deaf to all argument. It is no good blaming our sins on bad heredity, or physical weakness; nor can we blame a bad social environment. Nor is it possible to blame Satan for our sin, as that would be admitting that we had listened to him. No madness can be healed by argument, certainly not the madness induced by guilt. There are mad people who believe that they have a watch ticking in their head. It is impossible to convince them that it is not so. In cases of this kind doctors anaesthetise the patient, make a small incision in his cranium, bandage him and, when he wakes up, show him parts of a watch stained with blood which, they tell him, have been extracted from his head. This is precisely the case with the madness of an evil conscience. The innermost heart cannot be persuaded that a sin is the result of atavistic or social causes. We feel responsible for our own evil doings. For this there is only one remedy, which is another form of madness - the madness of the Cross. "Yes, you are guilty, you are full of guilt, you are the only guilty person," the great healer Jesus tells us. "You need a scapegoat. You must transfer your sin to another. Do not attempt to transfer it to an equal, because your equal will throw it back to you, heavier than it ever was. Transfer it to me! I represent the Creator. Like Him, I bear responsibility for the whole of Creation and everything that is done in it. It is right that I should take your sin upon myself. I have expiated your sin on the Cross." The liberating effect of this sacrificial atonement of Jesus on the soul which trusts in Him is tremendous.

But there are sick people whose sickness has become the very substance of their lives. The blind who live by begging are horrified at the thought of being healed, as this will compel them to work. Jesus's healing Cross causes the same sort of panic. The Communists are in this plight; for them sin, especially hatred, has become the core and substance of life. What would they do without it? We preached a crucified Lord, and we knew that we would be hated.

Communists are atheists; we were committed to God. The conflict was unavoidable. We knew that many thousands of Christians had suffered in the Soviet Union. We prepared ourselves for the same fate.

There was another point of conflict. After the war, the great question was as to which city was to become the capital of the United World of the future - Moscow or Washington? The world divided into two camps, the revolutionary and the anti-revolutionary, and two blocs were formed. We openly declared our conviction that the efforts of Moscow and Washington would be equally in vain as the capital of the future united world, under the aegis of Jesus, would be Jerusalem, which He called the city of the great king. "Out of Zion shall go forth the law, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem," says the prophet Isaiah (ISA 2:3).

Some believe that salvation will come from Communism; others believe it will come from American democracy. We believe what Jesus says: "Salvation is of the Jews" (JHN 4:22), and the Jews will fulfill their role of salvation when they turn again to Jesus.

Noah prophesied that Japheth (from whom the Indo-European race is descended) "shall dwell in the tents of Shem" (from whom the Jews are descended). In other words, the Indo-European race will live in the temporary social systems created by the Jews according to the words uttered by the prophet thousands of years ago (GEN 9:27). And Moses told Israel at a later date: "Thou shalt build a house, and thou shalt not live therein ... Thou shalt plant vineyards ... but shalt neither drink of the wine, nor gather the grapes" (DEU 28:30,39).

Let us see how these remarkable prophecies have been fulfilled!

The House of Christianity was built by Shem, by the Jews. In primitive Christianity, everything was derived from the Jews. It was from the Jews that "Christ came as concerning the flesh, who is over all God, blessed for ever," wrote the apostle Paul (ROM 9:5). The Bible is Jewish. Luther denied the validity of the ecumenical councils, using as his argument the fact that they were not constituted by Jews. "God's word was entrusted only to them," he said. The apostles were Jews. The psalms which are sung in the churches were written by David. For many centuries the whole of Europe has lived in the tent of Shem. The dominant influence exercised by the Christian civilization embraces the entire world in its sphere. Only the Jews remain outside the dwelling which they themselves erected. All races have rejoiced at the good grapes which the vine of Jesus has borne; the Jews alone have not tasted them.

The Renaissance, the flow of gold from the New World, and conflict within the Church shook the House of Christianity in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. It was then that Israel, in great haste, constructed a new house, the house of capitalism. In his book ~Jewry and Capitalism~, Werner Sombart described the decisive role the Jews have played and still play in the creation of capitalism. Japheth's descendants, the Indo-Europeans, have all entered into this new "tent of Shem" in the sphere of influence of capitalism.

When capitalism had triumphantly established itself, a Jew, Karl Marx, declared war on it. The Jews have benefited from capitalism, but Judaism finds no peace in it. Countless young Jews have started on a crusade to create a new system, Communism. The role played by Jews in building this new house, in which Japheth was to live, is well known. Lenin's mother was a Jewess named Braun. This is recorded by Trotsky, who adds that Stalin forbade all mention of her origins, in order not to hurt the anti-Semitic feelings of the Russians. A great number of the leaders of the Russian Revolution were Jews - Trotsky, Zinoviev, Kamenev and others. In Hungary, Communism was led by Bela Kun and Tibor Szamuely, and later by Rakosi and Gero. In Rumania, too, the Jews played an important role when Communism was introduced. A number of people from all races dwell in this new Socialist system, in the building of which Jews have played such an important role, though not an exclusive one. Many of the officers of the Communist Secret Police were Jews, but not as many as the anti-Semites like to assert. There were plenty of full-blood Rumanians who tortured their co-nationals. But the Jews are also the most active against the Soviet government. They have again built a house in which they cannot live. Russia's anti-Communist freedom-fighters Daniel, Litvinov, the priests Eshliman and Jakunin, Knasnov-Levitin are Jews. Having contributed in such large measure to the erection of the Communist regime in Rumania, a great number of the Jews then left the country to settle in Israel.

The Jews have always been God's chosen People, entrusted with the task of carrying out His plans in history, in creating social regimes which, step by step, would prepare the material, cultural and intellectual conditions for God's kingdom on earth.

Now they have been entrusted with a new role. Once they have returned, as a nation, to Jesus, their king, they will have a decisive role in building a fourth house, the Kingdom of God, where the Wandering Jew will at last find rest. This kingdom, with its center in Jerusalem, will constitute a rejection of capitalism as well as of Communism, or it might even embody the useful features of all past social systems.

The anti-Semites pay the Jews a great compliment when they insist that this nation, numerically so insignificant, exercises so much influence all over the world, and is the root of all evil.

At one time the Niagara Falls were a nuisance to the United States and Canada, because they laid waste thousands of acres of fruitful soil. Wise men, however, realized that if Niagara was capable of wreaking such great destruction, then it should be capable of doing a great deal of good, once it was harnessed and made to drive turbines and similar devices. Today, these great falls are an important source of electric power to both countries. The Jews do a great deal of evil, contend the anti-Semites. This means that they are a source of energy, and that they are also capable of doing a great deal of good. But if they are to do this, they must be united with the source of all good, Christ. Hence the tremendous importance of the Christian Mission to the Jews. Up till now, a mission of this kind has seemed utopian; but we have now reached a new phase in history, when the Jews are coming into their own.

Our working methods brought us into conflict with the Communist authorities. In 1948, they put me in prison.

EPILOGUE

When I was released from prison, my enemies in the Church, those who had collaborated with the Communists, declared that I was a heretic. This aroused people's curiosity, and a great many people were anxious to hear me preach and to read my books. The doors of the old Lutheran churches were opened to me, and I preached from a pulpit where no Jew had ever stood. Nor had a Jew at any time preached in the Greek Orthodox cathedrals and other places to which I was now invited. The vast majority of those who came to hear me were non-Jews. But for anyone who has dedicated himself to preaching the gospel to the Jews, it is most important to win non-Jews for Christ, since every person, no matter what his race, who has been converted to Jesus by a Jew, becomes himself a missionary to the Jews. This indirect approach is every bit as important as the direct approach.

As their latest attack had proved fruitless, my enemies now adopted different tactics, spreading the rumour that I was mad. But they spoke of my madness without any signs of sympathy, thus rendering their motives suspect from the very start. I had long been used to hearing all sorts of things said about me.

I had been called a genius, an idiot; "Jesus Christ," "the Devil"; a highly cultured person, an ignoramus; a saint, a repulsive character; a man of exemplary honesty, a thief; a Nazi, a Communist, an anarchist, a Jesuit; the most lovable and the most despicable accusation was that they now said I was mad. In believing that they were undermining the value of my message by calling me insane, my enemies revealed their own ignorance.

In the first place, there is a certain affinity between insanity and genius. Seneca wrote: "There is no great intellect that does not possess a touch of madness."

The Christian Jews had set themselves the task of building a road to Judaism and mankind. How could they carry out this task without a touch of madness? Some people reproached me for my madness but I asked, in the words of Nietzsche: "Where is the madness that you should be inoculated with?"

Christian Jews have a great vocation: they are expected to be grand, to attain to the stature of Christ, to do greater things than He did (JHN 14:12), to conquer the fortress of Israel, which He failed to conquer. If they attain to this greatness, they will also share the fate of all great men, one of whose characteristics is madness. In the prophetic Psalm 69 we hear of the madness of the Messiah. Paul confessed himself to be a fool. Without a touch of madness he would not have been a great apostle. Nervous disorders are commoner among people with a special vocation than among ordinary people. We were not in the least surprised when a young engineer, one of the most brilliant of our brethren, suddenly had a serious nervous breakdown, and had to go to hospital. This in no way lessened the value of his convictions.

The prejudice is widely held that a sound mind is valuable not only biologically but also socially. But history has not been moulded by normal people. Could Calvin and Luther have introduced the Reformation if they had been normal? Our object is to bring about a revolution within Christianity, within Judaism and in the world. Woe to the man with a vocation of this kind who is afraid of madness!

One of my enemies once said to me: "In Christianity everything must start from the beginning." When I answered: "Let us begin," he withdrew in fear, and to my great delight called me mad. When madness has reached a particular stage, it makes the intellect more sensitive, sharpening it and making it more perceptive to contrasts. This makes the mind more complicated, richer, more conscious of itself. Not for nothing did Erasmus of Rotterdam write his book ~In Praise of Foolishness~. I thanked God that I had spent many years in prison in conditions which might well induce madness. My intellect had in many ways acquired new qualities, which I now used in serving Christ.

Besides, madness is close to love. Normal people bicker with their husbands or wives, and in some way or another have to put up with them. Romeo and Juliet were a bit mad, and so were the mystics. I like to call things by their right names. It is no secret to those who have read the lives of the great mystics that the mystic life is to a large extent nourished by unsatisfied sexual desires. Blessed is the man who can sublimate this desire to the spiritual world! In this respect, too, the years I spent in prison were of great help to me.

I had a mystical experience which ordinary people, living a normal sexual life and an abnormal family life of conflict and family quarrels, could never have had, and could never have understood. They would merely have dismissed it as madness or a farce. But my experiences were of great value because a Christian-Jewish pastor, if he were to fulfill our tremendous task, had to have - like the living creatures of the Revelation - four heads: the head of a mystic, the head of a man capable of scientific thought, the head of a strategist capable of organizing, and the head of a revolutionary.

How can a normal, modern clergyman, whose chief source of reading seems to be Dale Carnegie's ~How to Win Friends and Influence People~ rather than the evangelists' ~The Art of Discovering a Meaning in Allowing Oneself to be Crucified~, sublimate the tragedy of life, be filled with pathos, and weave his way through the infinite realms of metaphysics?

I accepted the label "mad." Has not God made foolish the wisdom of the world? For Christ's sake I want to be a fool, and not a peaceful, vulgar, banal, run-of-the-mill member of society.

I can look back on twenty-five years of strife. I have received many blows, but I have also delivered my share. Christians must be the salt of the earth, and also the mustard. They must sting. The enemy must know that he is facing a soldier of Jesus who is well armed.

I have known unspeakable joy and deep sorrow. The one thing I have never done is to be bored. Along the path that Jesus has prepared for us there is life in abundance.

Thanks to the grace of God I have met brethren of many nations who have given themselves entirely to the God of Israel. I have read that God has equipped them in this way in order to make the Jews envious. I envied them, and tried to be, like them, a faithful champion of the cause of Jehovah and of His chosen Son, Jesus. In my former days I had been an eager servant of Satan; now I wished to serve God in the same way.

I did this in an age of great spiritual indifference. Men eat, drink, marry and build houses without knowing the prophecies and without realizing what is happening in Israel and in the world - that mankind is approaching the end of time, and the clock now shows five minutes to twelve. Mankind must either be converted, or be destroyed in a nuclear catastrophe. We are striving to convert the world. We wish to bring the Jewish people to Christ, because not till then will there be new life in the Church, and not till then will the Christians be as they were described at the beginning of the second century by the Athenian orator Aristides:

"The Christians know God and trust in Him. They forgive those who oppress them, and make them their friends. They are good to their enemies. Their wives keep marriage pure; their daughters are chaste. They love one another. They do not refuse to help widows. When they see a stranger, they receive him in their house, and rejoice at him as at a brother. If any among them is poor or in need, they fast for two or three days in order to satisfy his needs. They obey conscientiously the commandments their Messiah has given them. Every morning and every hour they praise God and thank Him for His goodness. They are the source of all that is beautiful in the world. They do not speak publicly of their good deeds, but take good care not to be observed by any man. They are in truth a new people, and there is something divine in them."

The negative characteristics of the Christian Jews of today do not discourage us. These are not the result either of their

page 218 CHRIST ON THE JEWISH ROAD

Judaism or of their Christianity, but of the strong pressure which the world exerts on them. Circumstances will change when the whole of Israel is saved. But even today the Christian Jew, who in truth is a Jew and in truth a Christian, who does not claim to be a Rumanian or a German, a Lutheran or a Catholic,- is a source of great blessing to the nation. Many Christians, ecclesiastical as well as lay, have adopted an entirely new attitude to Christianity, and it was the Christian Jews who gave them the first impulse in this direction.

As yet, however, we have only taken the first steps. Those who wish to follow us will have to work in an entirely different way. We have only been able to work by winning a soul here and a soul there. We shall have to think strategically, and work on a national front, in fact we shall have to think in terms of universal perspectives, since new factors have arisen.

Every day, the Devil takes tens of thousands of people with him to hell. We do not bruise the serpent's head, but only tickle its stomach a little, if we are content merely to save one out of all these tens of thousands.

We must change the religious attitude of our people, and of the whole world. This is undoubtedly a difficult task, but everything is possible with God and with those who believe.

Jesus is not the Saviour whom the Jews seek. He wishes to save us from sin. We would like to keep sin, because it provides us with pleasures, and we only wish to be saved from the catastrophic consequence of sin. We want Him to speak to us about our economic and political problems, and to save Israel from oppression by other people, and enable her to triumph over them. But He speaks to us of lilies, of birds, and of an eternal kingdom of justice and light for all people.

But neither God nor the universe is as we would like it to be. It is not reality that must change into what we want, but we who must adapt ourselves to reality. The true prayer is "Thy will be done," and not "Lord, let my will be done."

By accepting Christ as He is, and showing Him our confidence, even when we do not understand Him, Israel will fulfill its sacred vocation, for which it has been chosen. We must receive Christ; and together with Him we shall in love embrace all His disciples, from all nations, with all their faults and shortcomings. Even a flawed diamond is, after all, more valuable than a perfect grain of sand.

Our Gentile brethren surrounded us at all times with their love, and without their help our missionary work among the Jews would not have been possible.

When the Jews hunger after God, they will no longer take offence at the fact that the Christians possess in an earthen vessel the spiritual treasure they have received from Israel, that they have sins. The Talmud declares: "The man who blows on a glass of beer to remove the froth is not thirsty. And if anyone asks: 'What shall I eat with my bread?' thou shalt take the bread from him, because he is not hungry." We too received spiritual sustenance from the testimony of the weakest Christian.

What shall we do to conquer Israel?

In the first place we must not be dismayed at the magnitude of our task. Jesus said: "Fear not, little flock; for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom" (LUK 12:32).

We shall not achieve our goal by analyzing the enthusiasm of our convictions, but by knowing Him in whom we believe, and whom we preach: God.

To what does Israel owe its miraculous history? Could it be to efficient propaganda? No, but to the fact that without anyone else knowing about it, one of our forefathers overcame an angel as he wrestled with him, and wrung from him an eternal blessing.

Step by step the discovery by one man of a new source of energy - steam, electricity, the atom - has changed the face of the world. An unknown source of power still exists: the power which we inherit from the good angels, and from the prophets and the saints, who have departed this life without having their longing fulfilled or witnessing what we are witnessing today - the time when Jesus will come again. This power is still latent today, and it can become effective. In one night an angel slew 180,000 Assyrians. Having an angel on your side is more valuable than having the support of crowds of big and important people.

In order to unite Christian Jews with angels I spent years in prison, isolated from the brethren. This road is full of secrets, but it is the road along which we must walk. When the time comes we shall be clad in surpassing majesty, and Israel will belong to Christ.

When will this happen? It depends on how quickly each one of us starts out on this road.

What is demanded is that each of us should dedicate our life to the truth that is in Christ, and then the miracle will take place.

But here are two practical pieces of advice: first, concentrate your missionary efforts on the key personalities among the Jewish people; second, include in the missionary programme of your church the one third of Jewry which lives in the Communist world and which is subjected to heavy persecution.

What would you think of somebody who pays a pastoral visit to a family where one member is deadly sick and converses with the healthy ones without even inquiring about the one who is in bed? Two thirds of the Jews live in the free world or in their own country where, though facing troubles, they enjoy independence. How can a mission to the Jews not give priority to the problem of the Jews in the Soviet Union who are terrorized, kept apart for mockery and blows, but not allowed to cultivate their specific Jewish values, language, art and religion?

How will it end? There is not much chance that they will be allowed to go to Israel. Even if allowed, how could Israel take in a short time over three million new inhabitants? And how will they rejudaize three million men and women who certainly hate Communism, but have been indoctrinated only with Marxism? They know no other teaching than that of fierce atheism, wherewith they have been brainwashed. For the time being in any case, these Jews are in the USSR and they are there to stay.

Any sensible man will tell you that there is not the slightest possibility of convincing them to become Orthodox Jews. Who will spread this religion to them? There exists no Orthodox mission even to the Jews in the free world. For a missionary work in conditions of illegality Orthodox Judaism is completely unprepared. Neither would such a mission have the slightest probability of succeeding. Should liberal Judaism try the adventure? What will it propagate? The doubts of modernism? The criticism of the Bible? The religious problem will come to the forefront again, and in the spirit I already see Jewish synagogues, schools, newspapers and publishing houses, Jews in all the key positions in political, economic, cultural, scientific and artistic life, in every country in the world, rallying to the service of Christ. I see people of all colours and races turning to the Jews, so that these can show them the way to the Saviour (ZEC 8:23). I see Jerusalem as the capital of the Christian world. I see peace, love, justice and understanding triumphing. I see the lion lie down with the lamb. I see a kingdom to which Jesus has returned to rule. I see an earthly life which is consciously used as a preparatory stage for eternal life. I see Jews in Christian pulpits, showing the peoples of the world the perfect way to salvation. Faith sees all these things, and this is how it will be. For I do not believe the reality before my eyes, but the promises of God.

The dawn is appearing; soon it will be day; soon the sun will shine on Israel.

This was the hope that inspired Nollensen, the Batakians' apostle from Sumatra, and with his own eyes he saw the fulfillment of his dream. It was the hope of Skrefsrud for the Santalis, of Paton for the New Hebrides, and many others.

The Jews live on an entirely different level, and it is much more difficult to convert them. They are a race which has a great many outstanding personalities. But where God is there to help us, there is no difference between what is difficult and what is easy.

Up to the present the majority of the Jews have not believed in Jesus, not because they wanted it so, but because God has concealed the truth from them (MTT 11:25). And God has remained hidden from them, because He wished to retain them as His strategic reserve. They are the future hope of the Church. God has spared them from fifteen centuries of error and decline in the Church, because this would enable Him to use the Jews, who were not tainted with these sins, to re-establish the Church at the decisive moment. That moment has come; and now Christ will be King of the Jews.

INTRODUCTION

A brother who had been terribly tortured by the Communist police shared the same prison cell with me and told the following incident:

> I once saw an impressive scene in a circus. A sharpshooter set out to demonstrate his skill. In the arena was his wife, with a burning candle on her head. From a distance he shot the candle so that it fell, leaving his wife unharmed.
>
> Later I asked her, "Were you afraid?" She replied, "Why should I be? He aimed at the candle not at me."
>
> I thought about this when I was under torture. Why should I be afraid of the torturers? They don't beat me. They beat my body. My "me," my real being, is Christ. I was seated with Him in the heavenly places. This - my real person - could not be touched by them.

I have lived through the years of enforced exile with the image of such heroes of faith in my heart. Now, on my return to my homeland, I again found this same spirit among the Christians I met.

My purpose in writing this book is to help you ascend to such heights.

A PROPHET IN DISGUISE

After eight years in Romanian Communist jails, I was released, but only for a short period. I had failed to pass the test. The Communists considered my sermons after liberation as bad as those before my arrest. The brainwashing to which I had been subjected in prison had not been effective. My mind still harbored the same "wrong" religious ideas. There was only one solution: send me back to jail - this time for twenty-five years, though I eventually served only six. My total prison experience was fourteen years.

Captain Stanciu of the ~Securitate~ (Romanian Secret Police), who had to interrogate me when I was arrested for the second time, was an apostate Christian who had been brought up in the home of devout believers. Now he jailed God's children to convince them that they were wrong. For some unknown reason, he was nice to me. At the risk of losing his own liberty if overheard, he whispered to me on the first day, "My superiors have committed a terrible mistake in ordering your arrest. At first you were an unknown pastor in a small church. Then we imprisoned you for eight years and turned you into a national figure. Now all Romanian Christians know you, and you have become a hero in their eyes.

"Your rearrest will make you an international figure. That was the wrong thing to do."

p008 From Suffering To Triumph

Though an enemy of the gospel, he uttered a prophecy, just like Caiaphas the high priest who sentenced Jesus to death (JHN 11:50).

When I was freed in 1964 after my stint of fourteen years in Communist dungeons, I was not allowed even to attend churches. Pastors of congregations where I tried to worship were threatened by the Communists: "Don't allow Wurmbrand to enter your building - or else!" I had no other choice but to leave the country, which I did with my wife Sabina and my son Mihai in December 1965.

For twenty-five years we have been forced exiles during which time the Romanian Communists have not ceased to denounce me in their press as their archenemy, principally because of my books exposing their activities and my involvement in the ~Christian Mission to the Communist World~. God used me to start this mission devoted to spreading the gospel in countries under atheist dictatorships and to helping the persecuted. I was able to write books that have been translated into over sixty languages. For more than two decades I have traveled and preached the world over in the service of this mission, which has expanded to all continents. I have indeed become internationally known. Captain Stanciu's prophecy has been fulfilled.

RETURN TO ROMANIA

I value the fellowship of brothers and sisters of all nations and confessions, but my heart has never ceased to yearn for my Romanian fatherland, the country in which I had been born twice.

Patriotism is not very fashionable today. But since Jesus taught us to love even our enemies, how can we do so if we don't love our own country first? And so wherever I traveled, the heart that beat in my breast was the bleeding heart of my country and the oppressed Romanian church. There seemed to be no hope of my ever seeing it again, except in heaven where the great reunion will take place. Although we felt no hope for this earth, my wife and I practiced hope against hope and saw it fulfilled. In a matter of a few days God overthrew Ceaushescu's bloody dictatorship. He and his wife were killed. I could finally return to my beloved country.

My lovely wife Sabina and I boarded the plane in Zurich. We were not sure if we would be allowed to enter the country. A few days before our departure, the Romanian King Michael I and Queen Anna had tried to return. Though much loved by the people, who of course were not consulted, they had been denied entry by the Communists. They had been stopped at Zurich airport. The new Romanian government, presumed to be democratic, forbade the King and Queen, pride of the Romanian nation, to visit their own land in which the Communists were intruders as puppets of the Soviet Union. (In January 1991, the Romanian government finally restored their citizenship.) The new government, with Iliescu as President, still consists almost entirely of Communists - "reformed" Communists to be sure, but still Communists. A tamed wolf is still a wolf.

A stewardess interrupted our reveries: "Will passenger Richard Wurmbrand please identify himself?" My heart sank. We thought we were sure to be asked to leave the plane.

To our great surprise and relief, unknown friends who had heard that we would be on this jet had sent us a box of chocolates and a beautiful message of encouragement.

Some two hours later we heard the almost unbelievable words: "Please fasten your seatbelts and prepare to land in Bucharest."

My granddaughter Amely once gave this explanation of the city's name: "Romania is a Communist country. If they catch you there with a Christian BOOK, ARREST follows."

This explanation was no longer valid when we arrived in Romania, exactly a quarter of a century after we had left. The mission to which I belong, and many others, now cross the border with truckloads of Christian literature. Our organization has even created a large printing press in Bucharest itself where we hope very soon to produce Bibles and other books. The printing presses themselves would have cost us a fortune which we did not have. But the printing press of Germany's ruling Communist Party went broke, and their machines were sold at auction. We obtained first-class machinery for half the price. Moreover, Romanian Bibles will be printed on machines that had printed atheist literature!

We are also setting up the first Christian bookshop and video store.

SEEING ANGELS AND JESUS

At long last we were in Romania! Overcome by emotion, I kissed the soil.

Later, when I returned to western Europe and America, many people asked me about the situation in Romania. I cannot really comment on the situation in its totality. I can say only what I saw. The observer is part of the reality observed. Beauty is in the eye of the beholder. If one has a good eye (MTT 6:22), a dove's eye (SOS 1:15), he will see things differently from the one who looks with other eyes.

When Peter and John heard a rumor that Jesus had risen, they immediately ran to the tomb, entered, and saw linen and a handkerchief, nothing else. Then they left (JHN 20:7). Moments later, Mary Magdalene looked into the same tomb and saw two angels. How come the disciples didn't see them? But Mary Magdalene was not satisfied with seeing angels. She thought to herself "Where there are angels, there must be something even better." She did no more than turn her head, but she saw the risen One.

I went to Romania to see angels and Jesus. They are my first love. Why should I spend time with lesser beings? I saw angelic beings and Jesus dwelling in the lives of His saints.

ONLY ONE SADNESS - NOT TO BE A SAINT

Twenty-five years had passed since we left Romania. A voice whispered in our ears, "Why not give up hope? Perhaps no one will remember you."

We could hardly have anticipated the crowds that gathered from many cities far and near to welcome us. Our joy and astonishment knew no bounds. The first person I saw was my former cell-mate Nicolaie Moldovanu from the ~Army of the Lord~, a Romanian version of the Salvation Army, but without uniforms and bands. We had been in the same cell in the ancient prison in Gherla. The regime had been very harsh. From time to time, wardens would shout, "Everyone on the ground!" It was winter. We had no sweaters, let alone overcoats. The floor was cold concrete with not even a bit of straw for warmth.

Prisoners cursed the brutality of the wardens. Not so Moldovanu. He believed that praising God was better than cursing Communists. With a beautiful smile on his lips, he would say, "Let's forget our surroundings. I'll sing you the song I just composed while lying on my stomach." It was a hymn full of joy, hope and praise, sung now in many countries.

I remember the Orthodox priest Ghiush with whom I had been in the Jilava jail near Bucharest. The whole prison is underground. Cows graze over the subterranean cells.

I was then in the eighth year of my sentence, I had grown used to everything. But one day a whole group of newcomers, all Orthodox priests. were brought in. From time to time, the wardens would shout, "All priests out in the corridor!" and would beat them.

I sat down near the priest Ghiush, whom I had known when we were both still free. My intention was to comfort him. "Are you sad?" I asked. He lifted beautiful eyes to me and replied, "I know only one sadness: not to be a saint."

Moldovanu was the same type of man. What an honor it was for me to receive his brotherly kiss! I did not feel worthy to untie his shoelaces.

HOLY KISSES

Many were the kisses I received at the airport. I believe that kisses should have a much greater place in Christ's church. Paul wrote: "Greet one another with a holy kiss" (ROM 16:16), not with a cold handshake. Jesus Himself longs for our kisses.

p013 From Suffering To Triumph

"Kiss the Son" wrote the psalmist (PSA 2:12). He is not satisfied with anything less.

One evening Jesus was at the house of a Pharisee named Simon who had invited Him to dinner. Doubtless, on the table were beautiful flowers, choice foods, and wine. Jesus looked at them and said with sadness, "I have come into your house, and you did not give me a kiss." This was what He really desired.

In the New Testament, the word for worship in the original Greek is ~proskuneo~, which means a reverential kiss. When Jesus was on earth, it was easy to kiss Him. His mother Mary must have kissed Him countless times. But how can we kiss Him now? My wife had more kisses from me when I was in jail than she has now. So often when I want to kiss her now, the phone rings or I have to hurry to a meeting. But kissing is not so much a touch between two pairs of lips as a coming together of two loving hearts.

UNSINGED BY FIRE

And so I was kissed by Constantin Caraman who had been one of the main contacts of our mission with the underground churches. It was through him that we had channeled much relief to the families of those who were being persecuted.

He, too, had been in prison three times. He had worked as a slave laborer, just like my wife, building a canal uniting the Danube with the Black Sea. What a place of cruelty that had been! A prisoner was caught stealing twenty onions which he intended to share with others to enable them to swallow the tasteless food: oats cooked in water, without salt, without fat. The guard gave the prisoner a choice: twenty-five lashes on the soles of his feet or eating the onions without salt or bread. He chose the latter. Tears streamed from his eyes which swelled and made him look like a frog. In the end, he fell into convulsions.

Another time, a convoy of women prisoners were being driven from their barracks to their place of work. On the way, they saw a dog's corpse. One woman smashed its head with a stone, then others jumped on it to eat its brain, so great was the hunger for protein.

In the USSR horses were used to carry wagon loads of stone. Prisoners picked worms from their excrement and washed them. Again, valuable protein.

I looked at the shining face of Caraman, former slave laborer. He had a triumphant, loving smile on his lips. Observing him, one would never guess what he had passed through.

In ancient Babylon, three Jewish youths who had been thrown into a fiery furnace because they refused to bow down to an idol emerged without even the smell of fire on them. So it was with Caraman and a host of other former prisoners I met.

A CONVICTED PICKPOCKET

There was Brother X. I would not have recognized him after twenty-five years, but he reminded me who he was: a former pickpocket with whom I had been in jail. He had been won for Christ when I preached in a cell full of common prisoners about Jesus' love for thieves.

Far from loathing them, Jesus went so far as to compare Himself with a thief who comes at night when the residents of the house would not expect him. Even more, He uses thieves as models for honest men. He praised thieves in His Sermon on the Mount for being good to each other.

Now we laughed as we remembered the time I fell asleep in my cell with my shoes on, only to awaken as he tried to take them off! At the time, I was moved by his kindness, thinking his desire was to enable me to sleep better. On the contrary! He had played dice, and my shoes were the stake. After winning, he expressed surprise that I failed to recognize him as their legitimate owner.

There was Vasile Rascol whom I had known from childhood. He, too, had been in jail for the crime of distributing smuggled Bibles. Now he is working with us in establishing a press where Bibles and other books can be freely printed.

MY CHILDREN IN ROMANIA

l could not begin to describe everyone I knew in the crowd, but I must say at least a few words about my children.

All my friends in the West know that I have one son, Mihai. He was the only one about whom I spoke and wrote because he had emigrated with us. But he is not my only son. In the airport, Sandu was waiting. Since he had remained in Romania, I could never mention him as I didn't want to endanger him.

Many years ago I buried a Christian who had two small children. Since his widow was very poor, I took one child into my home, and he never left. He became Mihai's brother. Because he was adopted, the Communists would not allow him to leave with us. Today he is married, and I was able to meet him, his wife Sylvia, and their children.

p016 From Suffering To Triumph

I could embrace my granddaughter Doina whom I had never seen. She is married and has given me my first great-grandchild. I also embraced my grandson Richard, named after me. Richard had been arrested in the final days of the Ceaushescu regime and expected to be shot. In his cell he thought, "Well, I belong to the Wurmbrand family. Prison and persecution are its fate." When he was taken out of his cell for what he thought would be execution, he received an incredible surprise.

"Ceaushescu has been shot," he was told. "You can go home."

There was also Lenutza. Once, as I sat in my office, a girl of thirteen entered. She was shy, poorly dressed, and very thin and pale.

"Are you Pastor Wurmbrand?" she asked.

"Yes."

"Then you are my father from now on. My own father is an alcoholic and has forsaken us. My mother is always bringing home some other man who beats and chases me. I heard that you are a good man, so I will be your daughter."

I called my wife from the kitchen

"Congratulations! You have given birth to a child without any birth pangs. Here she is."

She, too. remained in our home. Just after I was kidnapped by the Communists in 1948, my wife, instead of brooding about her misfortune, prepared a beautiful wedding for Lenutza.

She, too, was at the airport, with her husband Gheorghe and their daughter Comelia.

We had six other children, all war orphans whom we had taken for our own, though under Communism it was not possible to adopt them

legally. There was plenty of joy and noise in our two-bedroom apartment. We never had to go to the circus or cinema for amusement. We had plenty at home.

All six of these children were killed on one day. To reveal the circumstances would mean accusing some whom I would not like to mention. Great sorrow has been my companion from childhood. God has taught me to rejoice in tribulation. He is with me in the free world too. My wife and I suffer here more than we ever suffered under the Nazis and Communists.

THE POLITICS OF KINDLY SMILES

At the airport we all joined in singing, accompanied by Moldovanu on the harmonica. I'm sure the angels participated in this joyous reunion. Police officers from the ~Securitate~ (the dreaded Communist organ of repression) stood by. They are still in power and wear the same uniforms, but they have been paralyzed by the uprising of December 1989 which overthrew their boss Ceaushescu.

After the singing, there were speeches. A video-tape was made by brothers Neureder and Wieser of our German mission, great friends of Romania who had come especially for this occasion. A number of individuals from the crowd went with us for an intimate meeting in a house on University Square. From the window we could see the many thousands who demonstrated against the government day and night.

The University Square had been declared a non-Communist zone that refused to acknowledge the authorities. There were tents for some twenty hunger-strikers (one in the 36th day) who were calling for the demise of the government. Some of the demonstrators, almost all young, sang a hymn, "Better to be a rascal and a scoundrel than a Communist." This hymn was in response to the prime minister who had characterized them in such terms. From a balcony, leaders of the opposition harangued the Communists.

The aversion to Communism was understandable, but it was not wise to turn it into a political platform. The Communist Party had four million members. Together with the membership of the Communist youth and their nearest relatives, they numbered ten million, the great majority of the voters in a country of only twenty million. Instead of trying to win the rank-and-file Communists to their side, the leaders of the opposition frightened them. The Communists thought, "We will all have to suffer if the opposition comes to power." Unwise anti-Communism assured the success of the Communists in the elections.

Jesus knows best what is right in the political sphere. Words of love for the enemy serve the cause better than expressions of hate. It would have been easy to win the hearts of Communists. They were shattered by the bankruptcy of their ideology in the Eastern European nations. They were depressed as well as disappointed. With a few good words, President Sadat of Egypt obtained great concessions from Israel, after five bitter wars had led to terrible loss of lives and territories for the Arabs.

I am for the politics of kind words and friendly smiles in all human relations.

The Hebrew word for "to tell" is ~lesaper~, which comes from ~saper~, meaning sapphire. "To tell" in Hebrew means "to give a jewel."

p019 From Suffering To Triumph

We should only speak if we have a jewel to give. If you can enrich another, if you have a jewel to give, talk. If not, it is better to keep your mouth shut. If this simple Hebrew rule were respected, there would be no family strife, no divorce, no political splits, no feuds in churches or between individuals.

SUBVERTING COMMUNISM WITH THE GOSPEL

The Communists have done great evil in Romania, but most of them were unaware of it. They did not know about the satanic roots of Communism, which I have revealed in my book ~Marx - Prophet of Darkness~ (Marshall Pickering). Many only joined the Party for a better job or higher education. They should have found compassion, but instead they were hardened by evil attitudes.

Finally, the Communist President Iliescu had had enough of the demonstrators in University Square. One day he shot and wounded many of them. Over a thousand were arrested on one day.

How is it that Communism has crumbled, that, while it is far from losing the war (China, Cuba, North Korea, Vietnam - about one-fifth of mankind - are still under Communist one-party rule), it has lost some decisive battles?

For years politicians believed that Communism could only be defeated through nuclear deterrents. They spent billions and billions of dollars producing them and now have to spend billions more in dismantling them as useless. Others believed we should accept Communism as an unchangeable reality and come to terms with it. Their slogan was ~d,tente~.

The Romanian dictator Ceaushescu was a maverick. Like Tito, he had played the game of being a

p020 From Suffering To Triumph

Communist apart, at odds with Moscow, but friendly with the West. He was even granted a title at the British court. But he was a Communist just like the other dictators, only of a different stripe. There are several species of tyrants just as there are several species of wolves, but they all have the same primary characteristics.

Neither anti-Communist armaments nor courting the Communists helped.

In all my writings and speeches I advocated something else: "Communism infiltrates and subverts the free world. Let us subvert the Communist world with the gospel. Let us win them with love. Christ taught us to hate sin but love the sinner. Let us introduce, by secret means if necessary, the word of God. Let us raise an army of prayer warriors."

ALLIANCE WITH ANGELS

Furthermore, I said, we should ponder the secret of the Jewish people. Though small in number, they have had to fight powerful foes in order to exist. In the end, they have conquered all their enemies. Today Israel faces the enmity of hundreds of millions of Arabs who will succeed no more than the powerful Romans, the Inquisition, or the Nazis.

The Jews are 3% of the population of the United States. They are 25% of its millionaires, but also of its revolutionaries. They play an enormous role in science and the arts. A large percentage of Nobel prize-winners are Jewish. The nation of Israel, although among the smallest, is in the headlines every day. A third of the world now awakens from the nightmare in which a Jew - Marx - played the principal role. The only one who can save it from this nightmare is another Jew - Jesus.

What is the secret of the uniqueness of the Jewish nation? One can say God willed it, and that is true. But there was one event in Jewish history through which this will was manifested.

Jacob, ancestor of my people (I am Jewish), fought with an angel and prevailed (GEN 32:28).

With one man on its side, a colony of ants is invincible in its fight against other ants. With a few steps the man can destroy the enemy. Likewise one man, one nation, one church with an angel on its side will prove in the end invincible.

Each of us has a guardian angel. How can two walk together if they do not agree (AMO 3:3)? It was one of the greatest events of my life to know my guardian angel. Many Christians worked together with their angels for the defeat of Communism. Learn from them and do the same! In some places angels are described as having wings. They are necessary for communication between men and a distant God. But if God is nearer, wings are not needed. In Jacob's vision, it was enough that angels had a ladder (GEN 28:12). For some, even a ladder is not needed. The angel of the Lord surrounds them (PSA 34:7). He is at their disposal.

Christian Mission to the Communist World and other similar organizations that followed its example have worked hard in the spiritual as well as practical realms. Angels were by our side. Our prayers were added to the prayers and sacrifices of numberless martyrs. And so it happened that Communist walls have come tumbling down.

p022 From Suffering To Triumph

HOW THE REVOLUTION BEGAN

A Romanian bishop, one of the many who became stooges of the Communists, fired the Reformed Pastor Tokes of Timisoara for preaching faithfully. When he was to be evicted from his home and church, a crowd of Christians of all denominations and several nationalities surrounded his house and obstructed the police. The number of demonstrators grew. When they proceeded to march toward the center of town, the army was called out to stop them. The soldiers began shooting, and many were killed or wounded. Little children gathered on the steps of the cathedral and sang religious hymns. Again the troops fired, and some children died. The rest sought shelter in the cathedral, but heartless priests had locked the sanctuary.

Then an amazing thing happened. The entire crowd, instead of fighting the army, knelt and prayed. This was too much for the soldiers. They refused to shoot any more. Meanwhile, the whole town had gathered. Pastor Dugulescu seized the opportunity to address everyone from the balcony of the Opera House. A poem by Constantin Ioanid, "God Exists," was recited. The crowd shouted, "God exists!" Leaflets with the text had been distributed. Some who knew the music began to sing the song that had been composed for the words. Soon thousands joined in singing it again and again. It became the song of the revolution.

One day when my son Mihai, at about age five, was walking with us through the park, he stopped in front of a man sitting on a bench reading.

p023 From Suffering To Triumph

"What are you reading?" he asked with childish simplicity.

"A novel."

"Better read the Bible," said Mihai, "because if you don't follow it, you will go to hell."

"What kind of words are those?" asked the stranger.

"Do you see the tall man with a little lady there behind me? They are my parents. Ask them and they will tell you everything. It's a very serious matter."

Curious by now, the man did ask. It turned out he had been a member of a virulent anti-Jewish organization. Through the witness of a little Jewish boy named Mihai, he was converted and became one of the best Christian poets of Romania. It was his song that became the hymn of the revolution.

When it became known elsewhere that innocent people had been killed in Timisoara (it was rumored they numbered thousands), other demonstration broke out spontaneously in different location Thirteen children, the oldest fourteen, made a barrier with their bodies against the troops of the Secret Police who could advance only by murdering them. The children knelt and shouted, "Please don't kill us!" The police paid no attention. When the first fell. the others did not run away but remained kneeling with arms outstretched in love and childish confidence toward the murderers as they continued to beg, "Please don't kill us!"

A cross now stands where the children died.

A legend arose in Romania. It said that angels began the revolution. Coming down from heaven, they entered the children, giving them holy courage like that of the good angels who had defeated the hosts of Satan in heaven. The martyrdom of these children gave victory to the unarmed against an army. Tanks and troops were called out against the populace, but in vain. The soldiers were as fed up with the dictator as the people. In Sibiu, two Orthodox priests who were lifted onto tanks asked everyone to kneel for prayer. The demonstrators, numbering thousands, as well as soldiers and officers, did so. An "Our Father" was said together by those who still remembered prayers. Soldiers and citizens embraced. It was no longer possible to repress the uprising.

COMMUNISTS HATE EACH OTHER

At the same time, another scenario was taking place in the capital.

Communists have a religion of hate. They hate not only capitalists, Christians, and Jews, but also each other. Almost all members of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of the USSR had been killed by their comrade Stalin. In China, the president of the Communist republic, Liu-Shao-Chi, died under torture ordered by his comrade Mao-Tse-Tung. In Romania, Lucretiu Patrashcanu, the Communist who brought his party to power, was killed by his own secret police.

So it happened that Ceaushescu's comrades in evil deeds, Iliescu, Roman, and others, plotted to overthrow him. For them the uprising in provincial towns was the spark they needed. They prepared to arrest Ceaushescu who had just returned from Iran and was scheduled to deliver a speech from a balcony in the center of Bucharest.

When he spoke, instead of receiving the usual cheers (which were compulsory), lliescu's men in the secret police began to boo. No one else would have dared. But this signal was enough to stir up the crowd. They had long desired to boo. Nothing could stop them now. The shouts against Ceaushescu became louder and louder. Sensing the danger, he fled, but something was wrong with his car. He flagged down another. The security officer who was with him and his wife drew out a revolver and instructed the driver - who happened to be a Christian - where to go.

Pretending that the battery was low, he stopped right where men were ready to apprehend their leader. After being paraded on television, Ceaushescu and his wife Elena were killed. Several of his adherents were jailed. Romania now has a new government, but one which consists (at the time of writing) almost exclusively of former Communist leaders, schooled in Marxism from youth. They claim to have renounced Communism, but Communism does not abandon a Communist.

The Bible tells the story of the exodus of the Jews from slavery. They followed Moses for a while, but at the first opportunity they made a golden calf to bow down and worship, just as they had seen the Egyptians do. They had gone out of Egypt, but Egypt had not gone out of them. The idolatrous practices learned while they were slaves in a heathen country remained in the Jewish mind for centuries.

The new government of Romania, like the old, has also shot and jailed innocents. Ceaushescu can be happy about his successor.

A CHURCH I FOUNDED

On Sunday, I had my first service in the Baptist church of Valaori Street in Bucharest.

p026 From Suffering To Triumph

In a sense, I was its founder. The Communists were not the first to persecute evangelicals in Romania. By 1940, the right-wing Iron Guard, who were fanatically Orthodox, had come to power. The first thing they did was to forbid Baptist, Adventist, Pentecostal, and Brethren Churches to worship. Consequently, all their buildings were closed. Then Marshal Antonescu dispensed with the Iron Guard and established his own dictatorship, again banning religious freedom. Not one Romanian-language evangelical church remained open. Hundreds of evangelical Christians were sentenced for up to twenty years. The Orthodox Church stood solidly behind this persecution. There has been no Reformation in Romania. The Orthodox Church is still as authoritarian as the Catholic Church was before Vatican 2.

All Lutheran churches were free except mine because I was Jewish and so were the majority of my congregation (the government was fiercely anti-Jewish). The Lutheran bishop Stadel was not inclined to defend us. He gained renown through his sermon that proclaimed, "Mankind has had three geniuses: Christ, Beethoven and Hitler. I dare to assert that Christ is even greater than Hitler."

And so, like the Baptists and other evangelicals, we, too, gathered in the underground.

Toward the end of the war, a friend of ours, the Swedish ambassador van Reuterswarde, succeeded in obtaining the authorization for us to worship. In one day, we removed all the furniture from our apartment and turned it into a church. As soon as this was known, hundreds of brethren from all the forbidden denominations came to our services which we had to conduct five times a day. Thus we were the only Romanian-speaking evangelical church.

When the Nazis lost the war, my former church again enjoyed religious freedom and was given back its old building. Those who had gathered in our apartment formed a Baptist congregation. This has become the Valaori church. Thus, in a sense, its Baptist pastor Talosh is my successor.

Many who now gathered to hear me had known me personally before. The others knew about me, my books, and my life story. For them I was not a mere human but the incarnation of a legend that had grown more and more beautiful over the years, to the point of losing touch with reality. I had the problem of convincing them that I was not the legendary hero they imagined, but an ordinary man.

THE WURMBRAND LAND

A joke is told in Romania: the dictator Ceaushescu's car was forced to stop on a country road for a small repair. Nearby he saw an old peasant woman painfully shoveling dirt and asked about her life. She told him how hard it was and then asked, "Who are you?"

Amazed at not being recognized, he replied, "Read the newspaper. Watch TV. They tell who I am. I am 'the genial leader,' 'the lay god,' 'the genius of the Carpathians.' I am the one who brings truth, light and love to this country."

The woman, full of joy, shouted to her husband who was working at a distance, "Come quickly, John! Brother Wurmbrand has arrived!"

An American Christian has written a book about

Romania which he calls ~The Wurmbrand Land~. Dispelling the legend, and speaking as a simple man, I preached in church after church, my heart overflowing with love and joy.

HOW MUCH AM I?

One evening I was in the Popa-Rusu church, where I had been secretly ordained as deacon during Nazi times, when it was inconceivable that a Jew should be given office in a church. But this was a German-speaking church, and the Romanian Fascists did not dare to close it.

The ordination took place in the greatest secrecy. Only the two who laid hands on me and two witnesses were present. The door was locked. The German brethren Fleischer and Strobel were not concerned about the anti-Jewish tempest raging outside.

It was in this same church that I later performed my first baptism - of a Jew who did not know one word of Romanian. During the services he would read his Russian New Testament and just let me talk. Before baptizing him I said, "I cannot just perform this ceremony. I bear a responsibility. I must find out what you have learned from Scripture. Read any verse you like and explain it to me."

He opened his Bible at 2 Corinthians [2CO 12:1] where Paul writes, "I am nothing," closed the book. and asked, "If Paul was nothing, how much are you?"

I thanked him. He knew Scripture better than I.

A HEROINE OF THE FAITH

After Bucharest, I traveled from town to town. We saw the miracles of socialism everywhere.

p029 From Suffering To Triumph

Where there had once been cars and trucks, men now rode behind horses. The shop windows were empty. People stood in line for hours for tomatoes, cabbage, milk. There were ration cards for many articles. An individual was allotted one kilogram of meat every two months. The streets and houses were poorly lighted.

In every town I met the great and little heroes of faith, as well as cowards and outright traitors. One heroine who traveled with us to some places was Dr. Margareta Pescaru.

In 1950, I was close to death in the prison hospital of Tirgul-Ocna. The Communists had inherited from the capitalists they despised the notion that every jail should have an infirmary and a physician. However, physicians were told, "You must practice veterinary medicine on these prisoners. Give them the sort of medicine and care you would give to oxen and horses in order that they might be able to work as slaves. If they can no longer recuperate, let them die."

In such prisons we knew two kinds of physicians. Some of them, among whom were young female doctors, would be present at the torture sessions and would joke with the savages. From time to time that doctor would take one's pulse and say, "Now let him rest for a while." During this time, he - or more likely she - would amuse herself with the police officer then say, "Now you can start again, but be careful not to beat him in the region of the heart. He might die too soon, and you won't get any more information out of him."

But there were others who took seriously their primary duty to save life. Preeminent among them was Margareta Pescaru. A Christian, she smuggled medicine into the jail. Physicians, just like others, were frisked when they entered, but she succeeded time and time again. Many lives, including mine, were saved in this manner.

If a doctor was caught smuggling, he or she would be badly beaten, then imprisoned for many years. The risk was considerable.

Dr. Pescaru made contact with my family and friends. She also provided me, and others through me, with streptomycin, the miracle medicine for tuberculosis which was widespread in prison.

PREVENTING AN ORGY OF CRUELTY

But she did even more than that. In the prisons of Piteshti, Suceava, and the Canal, the Communists had begun the so-called "re-education" of prisoners. Some had been corrupted through promises of freedom if they would beat and torture their fellow inmates to get them to reveal deeds against the state they had not divulged during the investigation. The prisoners also had to abjure all their convictions, political or religious, for which they had been sentenced. They had to promise full allegiance to Communism.

Any method that would produce results was permitted: severe beating on the soles of the feet and on the genitals; breaking teeth with gravel; forcing prisoners to ingest feces and urine; sleep deprivation; forbidding them to go to the toilet; and any other degrading measures.

Men had to be reduced to heaps of fear, nothing else. The Communists succeeded with most of them. When prisoners were forced to run up and down the stairs pursued by whips and sticks, everyone ran for his life, which. though wretched, was at that time all that mattered to him. Some did not yield, but they were few. Some died under torture. The henchmen, not satisfied with mere killing, would urinate over the corpses.

Each prisoner was allowed to take one cup of water from the tap each day, but he first had to present it to the re-educator, who would spit in it. Then the prisoner could drink. Jesus used spittle for healing. I know one prisoner who at that time asked himself, "If Jesus' spittle could heal a blind man, can the spittle of such wicked men also heal if we accept it with quiet resignation and love for the evildoer?"

The authorities brought some of these re-educators to my prison hospital, designated for tuberculosis patients, to start their work of destruction. Re-education had been hell for the sane; what havoc would it wreak among the sick, many of them near to death? In a whisper, we communicated the danger to Dr. Margareta Pescaru. She did the unthinkable. She decided to go to the worst of beasts to plead the cause of lambs.

After traveling a whole night to the capital, she went to the top officials who had oversight of the prisons - in simpler terms, to the chief butchers. God gave her grace in their eyes, as He did to Esther in the eyes of Ahasuerus. We have no idea what convinced them. Was it her physical beauty, or rather rays of God's power shining through her? But she pleaded with success. She appealed to pride. Tirgul-Ocna was the only large prison hospital; the prestige of the country was at stake, and so on. The fact is that, for the first time in the history of Romanian Communism, the torturing of innocents was stopped.

p032 From Suffering To Triumph

CHRISTIAN BECOMES COMMUNIST POLICE OFFICER

Another hero was X. (It is not safe to reveal his name even now, since the ~Securitate~, the Communist Secret Police, is still in power.) During those dark years, some wore the prisoner's garb for Christ. But X brought a greater sacrifice. To destroy the church from the inside, the Communists infiltrated their numbers, placing men who had become priests and pastors for this purpose in positions of trust. Brother X thought, "Why not reverse the process?" David said, "There is none like the sword of Goliath" (1SM 21:9). Translators often believe they are wiser than the original authors and should correct them. This is true of Bible translators as well. In the original Greek in MTT 10:1, it is written that Jesus gave his twelve disciples the power of unclean spirits. The English says "over," which is something entirely different.

In time of war, the enemy's spying cannot be counteracted only by preaching the gospel. There must also be counterespionage. So young Brother X became an officer of the Secret Police to serve the underground church, and especially me. Brothers and sisters who had become prisoners wore a uniform that was highly honored by believers. X was loathed as a traitor who had passed to the ranks of the enemy. Believers might well have thought, "Who knows what he really does? Perhaps he has even become a torturer."

He bore the shame and did his job well. He was not the only one. Through men such as him we came to know beforehand about threats of arrest. I was informed even after I had been exiled to the West about threats to my life.

I met this hero of the faith, Brother X. Romanian believers still don't know his story. What a privilege it was to embrace him!

Some brethren, instructed by their faithful pastors, accepted the role of becoming informers of the Secret Police when it was proposed to them (and it was proposed to almost all Christians). Police officers would meet with these "informers" in conspiratorial apartments, and we were thus able to learn the addresses. Then members of the underground church could spy on these apartments belonging to the police and learn the identity of the real traitors. These sham informers were very careful to tell the police only things that would lead them astray. It is wise to say little more, even today.

COLLABORATORS OF THE COMMUNISTS

I met with top leaders of different denominations. Some of them had been collaborators with the Communists. Feeling terribly guilty, they did not dare to lift up their eyes. They trembled for fear that the archives of the Secret Police and the Ministry of Cults would be opened, and the public would know all the details of what they had done. Some of them were elder]y men. Considering the fact that Communism had reigned in Romania for forty-five years, they probably asked themselves what they would do at such an age, deprived of their positions and probably of their pensions as well. I tried to ease their conscience by telling them, first of all, that a measure of collaboration had been legitimate.

I was not saying that it would be right to submit to dictators, for Paul said in ROM 13:1: "Let every soul be subject to the governing authorities, for there is no authority except from God." A God-hating government is not from God. If it were, God would be like the Jewish king Saul, who asked an enemy, an Amalekite, to kill him (2SM 1:9). God would be advocating a kind of suicide.

I believe, with Saint Augustine, that "without justice, states are nothing more than robber-gangs." Our duty is to uproot them as gangs and try to save the souls of individuals in the gang.
Why, then, did Paul not write like Augustine?

I believe it is wise to say a few pleasant words to tyrants under whom you are obliged to live, as long as you cannot overthrow them. Daniel the prophet said some very pleasant things to King Nebuchadnezzar who was the Hitler of his day. Diplomatic talk belongs in the arsenal of Christians.

Commenting on the king's dream that foretold terrible sufferings for him, Daniel said to Nebuchadnezzar, who not long before had thrown Daniel's three friends into the fire. "My lord, may the dream concern those who hate you, and its interpretation concern your enemies1" (DAN 4:19). In his heart. Daniel might have thought, "All the punishments from God, O king, are only just, and I hope God will not change his mind."

WHAT SHOULD WE RENDER TO CAESAR?

Jesus said, "Render to Caesar what is Caesar's," a very c]ear teaching. The Jews were to render to the Roman emperor what was his. Now, what was legitimately his in Palestine? Simply - nothing. The Roman army had invaded Palestine by force and ruled in a tyrannical way. The historian Flavius Josephus wrote that, when the Jews rose up claiming minimal human rights, the Romans crucified so many of them "that there remained no wood for more crosses and no place to put them." The Caesars had planted not one tree and built not one house in Palestine. "Give to Caesar what is Caesar's" means give him nothing, except a boot in the back.

Who are the governing authorities everywhere? They are the successful rebels of yesterday or their successors. Cromwell and others fought against tyrants in Britain; therefore the democratic regime was God-willed. One royal house has been overthrown through violence by another; therefore the actual queen of Britain is a God-willed authority.

Americans broke an oath of allegiance to the king of England and made a successful revolution. The American authorities of today are therefore of God.

The conclusion? Overthrow Communist and other dictators. If you do not succeed, you are a rebel. If you are victorious, you will be a ruler appointed by God Who gave you victory.

Under Hitler, Mussolini, Stalin, Ceaushescu, as with many despots of old, Christians have been misled, by a false interpretation of this one verse from Romans 13, to become collaborators in evil deeds. They have failed to observe that these polite words, "Let every soul be subject to governing authorities," appear only towards the end of a book that teaches on all preceding pages that one should withstand and tear down injustice and tyranny. This is what Moses, Gideon, Barak, Samson, David and others did, all of whom are honored as heroes in the Holy Book.

p036 From Suffering To Triumph

I did not consider the collaborators with the Communists personally guilty. One born in a heathen or animist environment naturally becomes heathen. He cannot be blamed. Likewise one brought up in a church in which everyone submits to rogues, considers the practice normal.

One of the top leaders of the official Soviet Baptist Church, now deceased, said, "We have to be submissive to the authorities, which does not mean only to the government, but also to the KGB (the murderous Soviet Secret Police), because it is also an authority and as such is willed by God." This means that if they asked me to spy on my brethren in the faith. to report on and denounce them, knowing murderous arrests will follow, I must do so. How can one ask Christians educated in such a faith to act otherwise? It is like wondering why a child educated in English does not converse in Arabic.

I managed to have fellowship with the former collaborators who had caused much harm to individuals and churches. They had considered it right to inform the authorities about everything that happened in the church - every word spoken, every decision taken. As for the consequences of what they did? They thought, "Let the chips fall where they may."

I tried to show them understanding. I told them that for the Jews the Talmudic teaching is: when a persecutor of religion arises, the rabbis have to divide into two parties. One must stick to the inherited faith and not change even the Jewish manner of tying .shoelaces. The other, on the contrary, must be friendly to the oppressor, wine and dine with him, in order to obtain at least some alleviation of suffering. The merit before God of the suffering first group is not greater than that of the second group who feast with the tyrant, provided they are prompted by good intentions. These words helped some to understand themselves better.

Some collaborated very wisely. By giving only a little verbal allegiance to Ceaushescu, they were able to receive many concessions. They would abstain totally from the deification of Ceaushescu who was called "the lay god," "the genius of the Carpathians," "the greatest thinker ever," and so forth. The Lutheran bishop Muller consented to be a member of the Communist parliament, though he never voted. But the little compromise of being there without ever flattering the Communist rulers had the result that the Lutheran church was among those that suffered the least.

THE TRAITORS

The church in Romania had others besides collaborators in its ranks. Some were outright traitors who sold the lives of innocents for money, though they never got more than a pittance, like Judas with his thirty pieces of silver. Even then, I am reminded that Jesus sat at the table with Judas even after he had betrayed Him. All the many words of love spoken by Jesus to the disciples at the last meal included him, too.

Jesus said, "Let not your hearts be troubled. You believe in God, believe also in me." This was meant for Judas, who was assured that in the Father's house there are many mansions, even one for a disciple who already had the price of betrayal in his pocket, if only he would repent. Jesus was saying, "There is still time to return" as He continued,

p038 From Suffering To Triumph

"I will receive you to myself" (JHN 14:1-3). When Judas led the soldiers to arrest Jesus and gave Him a treacherous kiss, Jesus even then called him "friend," for His friendship is everlasting.

In the original, JHN 5:2 reads: "By the sheep there was a pool" (the word "gate" here is an interpolation of the translators). Near every sheep of Christ there is an opportunity to be washed from every sin. The great tragedy is that some of the traitors were recruited not only from among the worst Christians but sometimes from the best, even from those who had been heroes of faith, who had suffered torture and imprisonment for many years. There is a Latin saying: ~De hic historia silet~ - "about these history is silent." Not everything should be told. Some things are too sad.

PREACHING TO UNSEEN AUDIENCES

What were the highlights of our trip to Romania? Sabina and I stood before the gorgeous palace of Ceaushescu which dwarfs Buckingham Palace. It is said that even the taps in the bathroom are gold, but "the lay god" never once had the pleasure of using them. The palace is built over the spot on which the Uranus prison of the Securitate had stood. This prison was torn down to make way for the dictator's residence. I sat in that underground fortress. I even dare to assert that I ruled from my cell, though this may sound like boasting. Let me explain.

I was kept alone in a cell from which I never saw sun, moon, stars, birds, flowers, trees, or butterflies.

In time I forgot that nature exists, even that colors exist. In my dull gray world of dingy cement walls, tattered clothing, and ashen skin, I forgot what blue, green, and violet look like. There was never a book nor a scrap of paper. In that deep subterranean prison, silence reigned. I heard never a word nor a whisper. This was sensory deprivation at its cruelest.

Every night in my dark cell I preached to an unseen audience. I was accustomed to this audience, even when I was free. In 1PE 1:12, it says that angels desire to look into the preaching of the gospel. Whenever I preached in churches, I was aware that angels were also present, not only men. (Where else would our guardian angels be when we are in church?) I always endeavored to say a kind word for them, too. But I made the mistake of thinking that only angels could be my unseen audience. It was not so.

After I came to the West, I published three books of sermons I had delivered in my solitary cell: Sermons in Solitary Confinement, If Prison Walls Could Speak, and Alone with God.
And then something very strange took place.

I received a letter from a man in Canada who wrote that he was from a good Christian family but had gone astray as a young man and wound up in jail. There he misbehaved and was put in a solitary punishment cell. In despair, he thought how sad his godly parents must be. He would have liked to return to God but did not know how. He prayed, "God, if there is somewhere in this world another lonely prisoner who knows You, bring me his thoughts." Then he heard an inner voice telling him, "God seeks you more assiduously than you seek Him. The desire of a cow to be sucked is greater than that of a calf to suck. He seeks you and He knows how to find what He seeks. Sit quietly and confidently. He will reach you."

And then, evening after evening, he heard a kind of sermon from far away.

He repented. Mercifully, his prison term was short, and he was released. Years passed during which he married, had a family, and became a deacon in a church.

One day he entered a Christian bookshop and saw a strange title on a book cover: Sermons in Solitary Confinement. Having been in solitary confinement himself he wondered, "To whom does someone in solitary confinement preach?" He read the book and later wrote to me: "Mr. Wurmbrand, you did not preach to nobody. I was in solitary at the same time as you. I recognized the sermons. It was yours that I heard and that brought me back to Christ. Thank you for having delivered them."

I might not have paid too much attention to this letter if I had not received another from a lady in England who described the same sort of effect.

Then I met a French pastor. He told me he had been an unbeliever when he saw a vision of a pastor with a clerical collar who told him about Christ. He was converted and in time became a clergyman who won many souls to his Master. One day he too saw the same book, Sermons in Solitary Confinement. On the cover of the French edition is a picture of me wearing a clerical collar. He recognized me immediately as the man he had seen in his vision.

PREACHING BEYOND SPACE AND TIME

The Hebrews have three words for soul: ~nephesh~, ~ruach~ and ~neshamah~. ~Neshamah~ is its highest stage. ~The Kabbalah~, principal book of Jewish mysticism, calls it "the supersoul."

At its highest level, the soul is beyond space and time. A man enclosed behind four walls can reach men thousands of miles away. When I received these letters, they shed new light on some strange assertions of St. Paul: "The word of the truth of the gospel, which has come to you, as it has also in all the world" (COL 1:5-6, my italics); "Your faith is spoken of throughout the whole world" (ROM 1:8, my italics), and so on. These words seem such gross exaggerations that they could almost be called outright lies. Paul had no knowledge of Japan or America. The gospel was far from having reached even the known world. But the hidden man of the heart, the inner man, the neshamah, communicates beyond all boundaries. Things happen to the inner man of which the outward man, the conscious, knows nothing.

It is written that all the Jews who passed through the Red Sea at their exodus from Egypt "were baptized" (1CO 10:2). They numbered perhaps two or three million. Not one knew that this was happening to them. "All those who were baptized into Christ Jesus were baptized into his death" (ROM 6:3). Ninety percent of those baptized, even at maturity, did not know this. My wife and I learned this only years later and wondered about it. Who of us knew that we were "buried with him" (ROM 6:4), or that our old man had been "crucified with him" (ROM 6:6). A man would remember if he had been crucified. None of us does. Things happen with our neshamah, things which the conscious, that very little part of our mind, does not experience.

Personally, I never had the experience of accepting Christ as a novelty. When, at the age of twenty-seven, I heard the gospel from a village carpenter, I had rather the impression of recognizing something I had always desired, for which I had been searching. Plato wrote, "To know is to recognize."

A real sermon that flows from the inner castle of the heart, a sermon to which the preacher also listens in wonder, never having thought that he knew such things, is an existential event remembered by listeners even after decades. It reaches to the ends of the earth and produces an impalpable effect. In his book, The Peace Child, Richardson tells about many missionaries who have found tribes with a knowledge of tenets of the Christian faith that they had no way of learning from other Christians. Sermons from far away have reached them.

As my wife and I stood before Ceaushescu's enormous palace, I remembered these things and meditated on them. In my subterranean cell I had more joy than he could ever have dreamed of, even when he was at the peak of his power. His work was in vain. In this palace, as in all others, one day there will not remain one stone on another. But souls won for Christ will remain for ever and ever and will ascend without end from glory to glory.

Sabina and I embraced each other and said a prayer of thanksgiving.

WINNING SOULS IN JAIL

From there we went to the former building of the Central Committee of the Communist Party. From its balcony, Ceaushescu had started to deliver his last speech when he was rudely interrupted with shouts of "Murderer! Criminal! Down with Communism!" He fled in a helicopter that was on the roof and went to his death. This building is the former headquarters of the Secret Police and hosted another underground prison. There, too, I spent two years in solitude. Deep underground I had preached the gospel by tapping on the wall to prisoners in cells on either side. The inmates changed frequently.

The Norwegian pastor Fjeldstad, a missionary in Israel, told me he had met there a Jew who, when he started to tell him the gospel, replied with a smile, "You come too late. I heard the gospel years ago from a fellow inmate who tapped in Morse code when I was in a solitary cell in Romania. I believed it then and I still believe it."

I rejoiced every step I took in Romania. Each place brought back beautiful memories.

We stood before the actual police headquarters where my wife and I had often been detained in Fascist and Communist times. In Bucharest, I saw again a sister who, with her father, a Baptist preacher, had been imprisoned by the Fascists in these police headquarters, along with me and several others. We had been denounced for organizing underground services in homes. We remembered how happily we had sung there.

Then there was the Malmezon prison in Bucharest. where r had been in both Fascist and Communist times (it was much worse under the latter), During the war, six brothers and sisters were there. It was a loose arrangement, with male and female prisoners together during the day. On one occasion the commander, a colonel, entered the room and shouted, "I heard that you sing your

hymns here, which is forbidden. What kind of hymns are these? Let me hear one."

We sang "O sacred head, now wounded, with grief and shame bowed down." He turned around d left without saying a word. Many years later I heard from Filip Shmuilovici, an outstanding Hebrew Christian who had been my fellow prisoner on this occasion and now lives in Israel, that the colonel had become a brother in Christ. Our singing might have helped others to salvation as well.

THE CENTRAL PLACE OF MY LIFE

I found myself again on Olteni Street, where my church had been. On the same street there had also been an Orthodox church and a synagogue. Ceaushescu had no need of such buildings so they were all torn down. Olteni! What memories I had of this place. It was here, through many tears, that I had said my first public prayer of repentance. The service had been conducted by Pastor Adeney of the Anglican Church's Mission to the Jews. He had dedicated his life to the Jews and had preached some forty years with little visible fruit. But he did not abandon his mission. It became evident later that had not worked in vain. He had brought to Christ Isac Feinstein, who became a well-known Hebrew Christian preacher and died a martyr's death. Another was Asher Pitaru, who was with me later in Communist jail. Prisoners and Communist wardens alike called him "Mr. 1 Corinthians 13," [1CO 13] because this was his main subject when speaking to anyone, even to the guards, who treated him respectfully. When Pitaru was before court, an intimate Christian friend of his was the main prosecution witness against him. He never spoke about this man with anything but love: he never mentioned his sin. These and many others were the fruit of Adeney's service.

The main preacher was Pastor Ellison, himself also of Jewish descent. Olteni was the place of my conversion and later my pastorate. Everyone called the church "the church of love" because, though nominally Lutheran, it was really the only interdenominational place in Romania. Worshipers of all kinds - Orthodox, Baptists, Pentecostals, Nazarenes, Adventists - felt at home in this nest. When someone who believed in christening brought his child, we all rejoiced with him. When another asked for baptism at maturity, those who baptized children were present to celebrate. My colleague, Pastor Solheim, preached his belief that at Holy Communion we receive with bread and wine the real body and blood of Christ. I said that I believe in a symbolic presence. No one quarreled about it. Jesus had said, "Take, eat, drink." He had not said, "Squabble about which interpretation is correct." Communion is what it is, not what we think about it.

We took good care of the poor in this church and helped many other churches as well. It was here that we started the first secret mission to the Soviet and that had invaded our country. New Testaments an Gospels were printed for them.

The Olteni church is dear to my heart for another reason: it was here that we met secretly in the attic, which was my "parsonage," the Rev. Stuart Harris, now Chairman of the International Christian Mission to the Communist World, and his friend the Rev. Moseley from the USA. They were the firs foreign visitors who did not allow themselves to be fooled by official church leaders. We met at night, and I told them the whole story of our suffering.

This meeting was really the foundation stone of our Mission to the Communist World, which has expanded to over forty countries, has introduced millions of Bibles, New Testaments, Gospels and other pieces of literature into Communist lands, and has mobilized hundreds of thousands in prayer for the persecuted. We also helped with radio broadcasts and financial support for families of prisoners.

ARE YOU READY TO ENTER A CHARIOT OF FIRE?

I delivered many sermons in Romania which I cannot reproduce here. But I would like to share a few of my main thoughts connected with the special situation in that country.

I spoke about the ease with which one can be raptured to heaven. Anyone can be raptured today if he is willing to travel as Elijah did. This is how: "A chariot of fire appeared with horses of fire . . . and Elijah went up by a whirlwind into heaven" (2KI 2:11).

"Is anyone here ready to enter such an uncomfortable chariot?" I asked. "Then he can be captured at once.

"Where would you like to be taken? Jesus has given us a great promise: 'To take him who overcomes I will grant to sit with me on my throne, as I also overcame and sat down with my Father on his throne' (REV 3:21).

"Anyone can come to sit on this throne. Daniel gives us a description: 'His throne was a fiery flame, its wheels a burning fire. A fiery stream issues from it' (DAN 7:9). Are you ready to sit on such a throne? Then you can have a place of honor on it.

"I come from the West where some preach easy salvation. Just believe, that is all. If you believe, you will not only have heaven in eternity but also health and prosperity here.

"You might escape totally from Communist persecution, but this false western teaching is around the corner to destroy your spiritual life much more than Communism could have done.

"To be a Christian means to believe in Him, which is to believe in His sacrifice on Golgotha and His teaching that we too must deny ourselves and follow Him. We are meant to be crucified and buried together with Him, not in a physical sense (though in southern Sudan Christians have been crucified even in 1990) but in fighting to the uttermost against sin, the world and the devil, and never giving up even if you lose many battles. About Britain, it is said that in war it loses all the battles but has the final victory. So must we too.

"Christian faith can bring healing. My wife, my son, and I have been healed repeatedly by faith. But it is also true that many fall sick because of their faith. Perfectly sane men became Christians. For this they were jailed, beaten, tortured; they lost their health because of Christ. He has made many prosper in business, but many with a good living lost everything. Their houses and property were confiscated, or they had to pay heavy fines again and again because they became Christians.

"Don't serve Christ for what you can get from Him. John and Mary Magdalene and others loved'

Christ when He could do nothing for them. He hung in pain and thirst on a rude cross and even shouted words that seemed to indicate despair.

"Mary Magdalene loved Jesus, period. Even if He could give nothing. She loved Him even when He was a corpse in a tomb, and she spent money on spices to embalm Him.

"Where, then, is Christian joy? Paul says, 'I now rejoice in my sufferings for you.' A Christian weeps with all those who weep - not only for those who weep for a little while, but also for those who weep and gnash their teeth in hopeless pain in eternity. Not only Jesus, but also all His disciples share in everyone's pain.

"They fill up in their flesh what is lacking in the afflictions of Christ. He was not satisfied with just being crucified for mankind. He descended into hell. Even if no one did Him any harm there, just being in such a place of horror, hearing the shrieks and the howling, sensing the fire and brimstone, must have been terrible. No sensitive man can read Dante's description of hell without shuddering.

UNION WITH GOD

"But this was not enough for Jesus. By His choice He i.s crucified again as often as spiritual Christians fall away in sin (HEB 6:6).

"This, too, is not enough for Him to reveal the abundance of His love toward us. He inhabits believers. He lives our life with us. He does it patiently, but He still sometimes asks, 'How long will I bear with you?' (MTT 17:17). Every fall, every sin. every weakness and doubt of ours tortures Him, because He has become one with us. In us, He is not a separate 'I.' A symbiosis has taken place.

"In Hebrew, ISA 48:12 sounds like this: ~Ani-Hu-Ani rishon, af ani acharon~. Translated literally: "A me who is a me - he is the first; one who is only me is the last.' God and I have united in one person. There is no grief of mine He does not share, no doubt, no rebellion, no mistake. It is also His. Out of love, He takes it upon Himself.

"And we find our joy in the supreme priestly service of bringing ourselves as sacrifices. We suffer for everyone, for Christ the sufferer lives in us. Christ is not only in glory now, but has also remained the Man of Sorrows acquainted with grief."

I gave an extreme example of this taken from life.

"BAPTIZE ME OR I'LL SHOOT YOU!"

Annmarie had been arrested for her underground work in the church. As is usually the case, she was beaten and tortured to make her betray the names of other brethren and sisters implicated in her work. The temptation to yield did not even occur to her. She was so preoccupied, I would say possessed, by one thought: how to bring salvation to the torturer. For her the question was not how to escape further pain, how to forego being sentenced to long years of prison, but how to make her torturer escape sin and hell.

She said to him, "You beat me in vain. You will never beat out of me my love. not only for God, but also for you."

The torturer laughed heartily. "What a foolish girl you are! I beat you, and you declare your love for me."

There were times when one could have lengthy talks with the torturers. Occasionally, they got tired of beating.

One of them said to me, "You prisoners shout when you are beaten. Why? You feel pain, but what is your suffering compared with mine? You get beaten at most for half an hour. We have to beat so many. There is not time for more than that. Then you rest in your cell. But I have to beat eight hours a day. I have done this six days a week, twelve months a year, for ten years. The only music I hear is the noise of the whip and the cries of the tortured. It is maddening.

"In the evening I get drunk and then go home, where I beat my wife, too. This is my life. I am a greater sufferer than you."

Torturers took coffee breaks. They would also smoke cigarettes. If the prisoner smoked, they would offer him a cigarette as well. For a quarter of an hour, the torturer would be a jolly fellow, ready to converse and even joke with his victim.

And so this one torturer took the girl's declaration of love as a joke.

She continued: "I will now tell you words that under normal circumstances you would never hear from a girl. While you beat me, I looked at your hands. How beautiful they are! I imagine how your wife enjoys it when you caress her. I put to you a simple question: is caressing not better than beating? When you caress your wife, you and she have pleasure. You surely cannot enjoy torturing more than caressing.

"You have very attractive lips. How your wife must have rejoiced when you first kissed her. Is kissing not better than swearing at people and cursing with foul words?"

p051 From Suffering To Triumph

He gave her a slap. "Stop this stupid talk! I am not interested in your idiotic lies. You'd better tell us with whom you worked in your underground activity. We are not in the business of love here, but in discovering counter-revolutionist activities."

She responded, "I have a boyfriend who not only loves me. He simply is love itself. From Him I have learned to love everyone heartily. I love those who do me good. I love those who hurt me."

He gave her a blow, and she fell to the concrete floor of the cell, hitting her temple, and fainted.

When she awoke, she saw the torturer sitting, deep in meditation. He asked her, "Who is this strange boyfriend of yours who taught you to love both the good and the bad without distinction?"

She told him, "It is Jesus," and spoke to the torturer about him.
"How can I become His friend too?" he asked.

"You must repent of your sins, put your faith in His dying for you on the cross, and be baptized."
"Then baptize me," he demanded.

She replied, "I cannot baptize you," which was not true. Anyone can baptize in such exceptional circumstances. But she did not know this.

He took out his revolver, pointed it at her, and said, "Baptize me or I'll shoot you!'

If this seems strange, it shouldn't. He fulfilled the words of Jesus, who said, "Some take the kingdom of God by violence" (MTT 11:12). "By violence" can mean threatening with a revolver.

He dragged her to a pool, threw her into the water, and she baptized him. It was a sincere conversion. The proof was that, at great risk to himself, he succeeded in freeing her.

p052 From Suffering To Triumph

This Annmarie is an Ani-Hu-Ani, a symbiosis between Him and herself. Even under the worst of tortures, she had one thought: the salvation of the worst of men. She accepted an especially severe beating because of her missionary endeavor, but she also triumphed.

FORGIVING A TORTURER

Continuing my sermon, I insisted: "You have all suffered much at the hands of the Communists, in one way or another, physically or psychologically or socially.

"There is something lacking in the cross of Christ. All He did for mankind till now is not enough. You belong to His body, you are a new embodiment of His. Wherever you are, Christ is, as it was when the Virgin Mary was pregnant. If she went from the kitchen to the dining room, He was with her. He and His mother were one. You are part of His body, just as He was part of Mary's body.

"Take all tribulations upon yourself with resignation and joy. They are Jesus' tribulations first. Thus you will fill up what is lacking in the cross of Christ. Apply this to all the hurts you receive in the family, in your job, in society.

"The Uniate priest Demeter had been a prison colleague of mine. When he was in jail, a warden amused himself by beating him again and again with a hammer on the backbone. As a result. Demeter was paralyzed and has lain unable to move for twenty years.

"Now there has been a revolution, and Ceaushescu has been overthrown. The Securitate officer who had destroyed his life came to Demeter's door and said, 'I know I cannot be forgiven. What I did was too heinous. But only listen to my words of apology and I will go.'

"The priest replied, 'For twenty years I have prayed for you daily. I waited for you. You are forgiven.'

"This is the essence of Christianity. Any other attitude is not.

"When Jesus taught us the 'Our Father,' to make sure we understood the most important part of it He added immediately, "If you forgive men their trespasses. your heavenly Father will also forgive you. But if you do not forgive men their trespasses, neither will your Father forgive your trespasses' (MTT 6.14-15)."

COMMUNISTS BROADCAST MY SERMONS ON TELEVISION

Something very strange happened after I had delivered a few sermons in which I stressed our duty to love our enemies, including the Communists. My sermons were broadcast at state expense on TV.

For years the Communists had kept me in solitary confinement so that I could not tell my thoughts, considered poisonous, to even one fellow-prisoner. Now the Romanian government. still Communist, took special care to ensure that the whole populace heard what I had to say.

Why?

The government well knows that the people hate its activities. The dictator Iliescu, wiser than his predecessor Ceaushescu, understands this. He considered it profitable for the oppressed to be taught to love their oppressors. The paradox was that my enemies and Christ's were eager for people to listen to me. In fact, today Communist leaders actually beg Romanian pastors, "Please preach all you want, even in public squares, but stress love for one's enemies. Otherwise the people will tear us to pieces."

Did Jesus foresee that His teaching of love to the uttermost would be welcomed by His enemies when they were in danger and would help the spread of the gospel because it offered them protection?

We dare to walk our dangerous way, in which we seem to be fellow-travelers with the worst of men and to strengthen their hands (this is the case with almost all who do good to those who do evil), because we believe that the Word is God and in the end this Word will change the hearts even of God-haters.

Two thousand years ago, the Jews hated their Roman oppressors. Was it because Jesus taught love for one's enemies that Pontius Pilate, Roman governor of Israel, desired to free Him?

Love, just because it is love, exposes itself to all risks - even the risk of being misused by the wicked - in order to win all. We will not give up teaching love for one's enemies, even though for a time God-haters profit at our expense.

NOT INTERESTED IN MY SERMONS

We met Angela Cazacu.

She had been our coworker during the War, busy stealing Jewish children from the ghettoes and thus saving lives, smuggling food and clothing to scores of female Christian prisoners in the Mislea jail, and so on. Then the Soviet army invaded our country. She gave out Russian Gospels and New Testaments in railway stations to trains full of

p055 From Suffering To Triumph

Soviet soldiers. Some sisters were arrested for this, but started again as soon as they were released.

When I was in the Tirgul-Ocna jail in 1951, Romania had its heaviest snowfall ever, in some places five feet high. At the time I was seriously ill with pulmonary and spinal tuberculosis, as well as a couple of other illnesses. When the cold was most bitter, the prison commander gave the order that no prisoner was allowed to have more than one blanket. We shuddered endlessly with the cold. TœRnsport was at a standstill. The administration had no food to give us. No family members or friends could come to the jail with a parcel because of the snow. Only one prisoner of the hundreds who were in this jail received a parcel at that time. Angela, whose name in Romanian means "female angel," made her way to the jail through the mountains of snow and left a package for me. At that time I looked like a skeleton. I accepted the gifts that she had struggled to bring us, and we shared them, comforted that we were not alone.

Now she attended a service at which I preached. I asked her what she thought about the sermon. Her reply was not very complimentary: "I did not listen to it much. I was not very much interested in what you said. For me it is enough to see that, after all you have endured, you are well enough to preach. I see your radiant face. I feel the love that emanates from you both. If you had given only the blessing at the end of the service after someone else had preached, it would have been enough for me."

DO TODAY WHAT YOU NEGLECTED BEFORE

Many leaders from the World Council of Churches, Lutherans, Baptists, Reformed,

p056 From Suffering To Triumph

Pentecostals, Adventists, World Federations, and world-renowned evangelists now flock to Romania and the other freed Communist countries. None of them has apologized for having praised non-existent religious liberty in Romania under Communist rule. None has apologized that during the forty-five years of terror not one of these great bodies or any national denomination had done anything to give practical help to the families of Christian martyrs. Though my name was known abroad, my children never received one cent, one parcel, or one letter expressing concern during all my years of imprisonment. I could vouch for the fact that not one of the families of Christian prisoners of that time received anything until our Christian Mission to the Communist World was formed.

That is all in the past now, and I would not mention it if this hard-hearted attitude was not still present. I challenge anyone to ask the leaders of these denominations if they have in their budget at least œ50 ($100) a year for families of Christians jailed in Muslim countries. There are prisoners of faith in Egypt, Malaysia, and Iran. Christians are heavily persecuted in Muslim Turkey. Perhaps the universal church could make up now for what it neglected then. There are missions that now work effectively in this regard in Communist countries. Let the denominations do the same in Muslim countries.

THE LANGUAGE OF PASSION

When I started to tell in the West the story of persecution in the East, I was accused at the very least of gross exaggeration. Bishops and leading evangelists who had been to Russia, Romania, and Hungary were quick to give the Communist rulers certificates of good behavior. I myself heard one of the most renowned evangelists in the USA say upon his return from Russia, 'There is more religious freedom there than in Britain." Such kind words were also spoken about my homeland.

Did I exaggerate?

First of all, what's wrong with exaggeration?

Why should anyone object to it, since it is the normal response of individuals speaking about a subject that they feel passionately about?

We read in MRK 1:4, "All the land of Judea and those from Jerusalem went out to John the Baptist and ~were all baptized~ by him." Is this an exaggeration or not? Those who place high hopes in the victory of the kingdom see in small beginnings the mighty events that will follow, just like a father with his son.

Have the descendants of Abraham become as numerous as the stars of heaven or the sand of the sea? These are beyond calculation. Yet the promise was such. Was God exaggerating?

Is the bride of Solomon's Song really the only beauty, beside whom other girls are ugly? If not, why does the bridegroom say, "As a lily among thorns, so is my love among the daughters"?

I don't mind being accused of exaggeration when speaking passionately about the sufferings of the persecuted. When one tortured man cries, I hear more than one voice crying. All true believers suffer with the one who suffers. Jesus Himself suffers in them. Why do you hear only the cry of one insignificant man and not the cry of Jesus Who dwells within him?

p058 From Suffering To Triumph

How many suffer? How great is the suffering? Do you have good ears? When Abel was killed by his brother, his cry was so loud it reached from the ground to highest heaven (GEN 4:10). Why then do you hold it against me that I hear one voice as the voice of a multitude?

I never exaggerate willingly, but neither am I a stickler for exact figures. Eichmann, the war criminal judged in Jerusalem for his participation in the Holocaust, gave as his defense: "Not six million but only one million Jews were killed by the Nazis." For me and my wife, who had family among the victims, the one million would never be only one million.

When all is said and done, anyone who now reads even Communist publications from the former USSR, Romania, and other Communist countries realizes that not only I, but also Solzhenitsyn, Bourdeaux and others are guilty of understatement.

Even now I have not told the whole story. Patrashcanu, the one who brought Communism to power in Romania, was later tortured by his own comrades in such a manner that I could never tell anyone! including my wife. No publisher would print such violent obscenities. It is strange that we can stand to see pictures of Jesus crucified, but we cannot stand to see the suffering of His saints.

Meanwhile, several newspapers and magazines in Europe have asked the World Council of Churches and the Lutheran World Federation to apologize to me. I absolve them of this obligation. But I would.be gratified if they would take a stand against the atrocities committed today where Communists are still in power and would expel from their leadership those who have led people astray about non-existent religious liberty under the Reds unless they repent.

A BLEAK SITUATION

After speaking in many services, I was invited to meals in the homes of believers.

In one very poor house my wife and I were served chicken, but from the expression on the faces of the children I realized they had never had such a thing. In Romania there is a proverb: "If a poor family eats chicken, either the chicken or the family is sick." We said we were not hungry and each took only a wing.

In other homes we were given good food, but we soon realized that it had been purchased on the black market for exorbitant prices and that the families would eat minimally after our departure. My own children, knowing for a long time that we would be in Romania, had hoarded food by standing in line for hours day after day, for weeks.

The Talmud says, "Every meal where the conversation is about something other than the word of God is idolatrous." I try to abide by this. Families have so little time to converse that mealtime should be used for spiritual as well as physical nourishment. But there were also jokes. A former member of the Communist Party said, "In times past, you had to he recommended by two members of the Party to be accepted. Now. only a certificate from a psychiatric asylum that you are mad is sufficient.''

There was joy and happiness at meals in spite of the great poverty. But the situation was bleak, without any hope of improvement in the foreseeable future. I know the figures: in the first quarter of 1990, the productivity of workers and the gross national product had decreased by 42% compared to the year before. International trade had virtually come to a standstill. There was no new capital infusion into the economy. All socialist economic planning went out the window. With no raw material, many factories stand idle. Private enterprise is now permitted, but where does one begin when there is no capital? There are no goods for even the smallest venture.

The transition from capitalism to socialism is easy. You simply destroy what your predecessors nave accomplished. But the transition from Communism to capitalism and the free market system has never yet taken place. Will it succeed? To create or recreate a free market, capital is needed. Historically, capitalism began in Europe because of the huge amounts of gold discovered in America.

Where is Romania to obtain capital? The western capitalists have no confidence in the new government because it represents no real change. The leaders still feel free to slaughter innocents at whim, just as their predecessors did. Between the 13th and 15th of June, 1990, a multitude of corpses (no one knows how many) and countless wounded, many mutilated for life, lay on the streets of Bucharest. The killers were allegedly miners, as reported in the western press, though the people know they were men of the old ~Securitate~ who wore miners' helmets as a disguise. These miners had been called by President Iliescu and were congratulated when they finished their bloody work, because they had shown "proletarian solidarity." Those were apocalyptic days. Hoards of Communist police armed with iron sticks and axes roamed the streets killing people in the name of a government that called itself democratic. ~Demon~ocratic would be more accurate. The image of such scenes persists long after the streets are cleared. People still hear the wild howling of the killers and the moaning of the wounded.

A sane economy, a free market system, cannot be built on such a foundation. Romania receives no substantial help from the West, unlike all the other Eastern European countries, which were also Communist. This was decided at a conference of twenty-four industrial nations in Brussels.

CAPITALISM AND COMMUNISM

There were spiritual discussions at meals, along with songs and jokes, but no palpable hope for the immediate future of the country as far as living conditions are concerned. In view of all their bitter experiences with socialist economies, it is proper that Christians consider what their attitude should be in the conflict between capitalism and Communism. Wicked men cannot construct good social systems. Slavery. feudalism, capitalism, Communism - all are tainted with sin. However, the wise distinguish not only between good and bad, but also between good and better or between bad and worse.

Of all the social systems devised by men until now. Communism is surely the worst. One hundred and fifty years ago, Marx believed that capitalism would soon perish. Seventy years ago, Lenin believed in the near victory of the Communist revolution. In the United States, the great depression of the thirties was considered a sign that capitalism was on its deathbed. It was not. Capitalism has great vitality. Communism is sick.

Capitalism has proved to be the only system of production that by its very nature assures the development of new techniques that in turn raise the standard of living of the multitudes. Under capitalism, periods of crisis are followed by periods of recovery. Technical developments assure this. New discoveries result in new branches in the economy. Competition assures that products will become cheaper with time. The number of consumers grows. New enterprises are created and with them more jobs. The great number of unemployed in capitalist countries is due to the fact that job-seekers have not qualified themselves. For those who do and who are willing to work, joblessness is not generally a long-term problem under capitalism. In other words, there is no permanent crisis under capitalism.

Under socialism, by way of contrast, there can be no long periods of progress. No one is interested in investing capital because all the profit goes to the state. A political organism, the state, decides what factories should be built and how the goods should be distributed. It takes no advanced degree to observe that as a result the shops are almost always empty. Politicians decide on salaries. Romania provides a bitter example. During the election campaign in June 1990, the government announced a salary increase of 50% in many industries. Since all enterprises belong to the state, this was simple. After the elections, the same government that had used this ruse to win declared that no one in industry would have a fixed salary but rather it would be determined by productivity. However, since there is neither capital for productivity nor goods for even the most urgent repairs of machinery, industry is hobbled and workers are stymied.

Warning signals about the shape of the economy do not worry the planning commissions, who are the real bosses, because their members have no profit motive for what they do. They receive a modest salary whether or not the plan is fulfilled. Capitalists, on the other hand, react quickly to economic indicators because their capital is at stake. They can become millionaires or go broke. The profit incentive tends to prevent economic catastrophes. Under Communism, antiquated enterprises continue to function even though they bring no profit. The breakdown of Communism came in many countries without revolution. Romania was the exception. In Hungary, Czechoslovakia, Poland, East Germany, and Russia, Communism died a natural death because it simply doesn't work.

Capitalism has grave weaknesses, but it is the best system mankind has produced. Of necessity, Christians must prefer it to something far worse - Marxist economics. Nations that have tasted Communism now show their aversion to the system. In Romania, as in neighboring Eastern European countries. people have torn down the statues of Marx. Stalin. and Lenin with strong ropes and multiple manpower. so strong is their revulsion to the "gods" that have been imposed on them. Some are offered for good money to western collectors.

"Lord, when you awake, you will despise their image' (PSA 73:20). Previously, pictures of Ceaushescu were seen everywhere. Now there is not one.

p064 From Suffering To Triumph

THE SPECTER OF FAMINE

Christians in Romania, like the rest of its inhabitants, have little time nowadays to think about heavy social or spiritual problems. The mere earning of daily bread consumes more than a normal man's power. And there is even worse danger for all former European Communist countries, and especially for Romania, which is excluded from aid from the USA and the European Community. Romania is also shunned by those who could invest capital because of the brutality and instability of its government, consisting almost exclusively of Communists who so far give few signs of having changed.

There is rampant inflation. The price of necessary goods has increased. Income is lower. Widespread unemployment is inevitable, since unproductive, inefficient factories kept alive by unreasonable state planners will have to be shut down. There is no legislation providing for the unemployed. All Christian charitable institutions have long since been abolished.

Meanwhile, the specter of famine towers over Romania. In winter there is not enough heat in the houses. Babies nurtured in a warm womb are born into cold hospital rooms and fall sick. In neighboring Hungary, also formerly Communist, Mother Theresa of Calcutta was allowed to open soup kitchens - but not in Romania. Leading specialists in economics, finance and industry have been dismissed because the public simply abhors Communists. Furthermore, other Communists in government sacrificed their comrades to the fury of the mob. with the result that the economy is ruled by ignoramuses.

The agricultural collectives are no longer productive. While no one really cares to work for them, who has the capital and machinery for individual farming'? Former peasants would refuse land even if it were given back to them because they do not trust the Communists. Romanian peasants once owned land, and it was stolen from them by the Communists. So agriculture was destroyed. What warrant do they have that the Communists in power now, after allowing them to become productive again, would not take everything away from them a second time?

Whoever can manage to do so flees from Romania, not only German, Hungarian, and Jewish minorities, but also ethnic Romanians. But what country is ready to accept the millions hoping to emerge from the former Eastern bloc? Except for Christians. no one really knows in Romania (or Hungary, or Bulgaria, or Poland, or Russia) what to do. The believers know exactly what to do even under the worst circumstances: when one does not know what to do, it is imperative to do nothing, but with patience and trust to let God take over. He has known worse situations than these.

NOT EVERYTHING WAS TAKEN AWAY

When the Communists seized power, most of Romania was composed of small peasant holdings. The land was collectivized by the Communists who were inspired by Lenin's teaching: "We will introduce collectivization, not fearing coercion. Revolutions were never accomplished without coercion.

The proletariat also has the right to use it to obtain its purpose in order to assure that its will is fulfilled.'

Trotsky said, "Our peasantry is an ally of American millionaires. We cannot reach America, but we can suppress these with our cavalry, tanks and swords."

Bukharin. another leading Russian Communist theoretician, wrote, "Our party is the most militarily shaped organization."

In Romania, the Communists did indeed act militarily in taking away from the peasantry everything they owned: fields, sheep, cattle, implements, houses, furniture. Every small farmer became a slave of the state, working for a pittance on a field no longer his. Ceaushescu was one of the principal organizers of this collectivization. In Dobrogea province, he did it with the utmost simplicity. All the villagers were gathered together in a square and were asked to renounce their possessions of their own free will. "Who is for this?" No one raised his hand. So Ceaushescu personally shot ten people. Then the vote was taken a second time. All voted to renounce their possessions "voluntarily." There was military music. They were forced to dance. To add insult to injury, a film was made about their enthusiastic adherence to socialism.

With this, the agricultural sector of Romania was destroyed. In a country that formerly could feed all of western Europe, farmers were forced to stand in line for bread and were unable to obtain it. Now I met once more a farmer who had come to see me immediately after collectivization. He reported at that time, "They thought they took everything. But I told my family, 'They left something very important - our hymnals.' We sat down and sang praises to the Lord."

I was reminded of those who "accepted joyfully the plundering of their goods, knowing that they have a better and enduring possession for themselves in heaven" (HEB 10:34).

We embraced again. I, too, had known this joy several times in my life.

HEARING MY SERMONS AGAIN

One of the most striking aspects of this visit to Romania was the encounters with brethren who said they had heard me preach thirty, forty, even fifty years before.

When someone tells me he heard a sermon of mine years ago, I always ask, "What did I say?" I believe that listening to a sermon should be an existential event, something that changes life for better or worse. In a sermon the preacher should not only speak ~about~ Christ but should ~impersonate~ Him. An actor does not speak ~about~ Hamlet or Romeo; he ~is~ the person while on stage. During those several hours in the theater his personal life is put aside completely. He speaks exactly as Romeo would speak if he encountered Juliet. Just so the minister. Not only by his words, but also by his gestures, by the expression on his face, by his appearance, his tone of voice, by the light of the Spirit shining through him, he must convey the impression, "I had an encounter with Jesus today. He speaks through me." Fifty years ago I heard just such an existential sermon, and today I could reproduce even the gestures of the bishop who delivered it.

p068 From Suffering To Triumph

When I became a preacher, I took seriously the words that we should "run so as to receive the prize" (1CO 9:24). This is possible only by outrunning all the others. So I read sermons by great preachers, listened to the best preachers of all denominations in Romania, and nurtured a desire to attain to their level and if possible surpass it.

I have not yet become the great preacher I intended to be (I still have hope - I am only eighty-two). but wanted to find out how much I had achieved. Therefore I asked those who said they had heard me half a century ago my usual question: "What did I say?" Some told me.

TELLING A LEGEND

One sermon had begun with the legend of Gorun, a very beloved disciple of the Master. "There is good stuff in you," Jesus said to him. "I want you to pitch a tent for yourself on Mount Carmel and stay there for a time in meditation and prayer." And so he did.

Soon the rumor spread to all the villages round about that a young saint had made his habitation in the region.

One day Gorun went to the nearest village and begged, "Please give me a blanket. Rats have gnawed on my old one and they leave a bad smell. [I know this from my prison life.] Because of this I am unable to sleep."

The villagers gladly gave him what he asked. After a few days, he asked for another blanket because rats had gnawed on the second blanket, too. Soon he was back again with the same request, then again. Finally, someone said, "We'd better give you a cat. That will solve the problem for good."

Gorun returned happily to his abode. The rats were no longer in control. But after two days he was back. "Could you please give me some milk for the cat?" The villagers were happy to comply. But the need persisted. So they decided to give him a cow.

Again he came back. "I need something to feed the cow." They decided to give him pasture land in anticipation of future needs. Soon he came back. He was not used to taking care of both land and animals, so they gave him two workers to help him. Then he needed bricks and materials to build houses for the workers. Then the cow calved, and so on and on.

Years passed, and Jesus went to see his beloved disciple. A fat man greeted him and asked, "What business brings you to this place? What would you like to buy?" The now well-to-do merchant no longer recognized his Master.

Beginning with this legend, I had taught that we should not put distance between us and Jesus, not even so much as a stone's throw. Even at such a small distance, disciples slept while Jesus agonized in Gethsemane. Do business only if the Lord works beside you with accompanying signs (MRK 16:20), as He does in your Christian endeavors. If not, abandon the business.

Don't leave Jesus even for holy meditation or great missionary deeds. To lie quietly on His breast like the apostle John is preferable to the greatest enterprises in His service. Whoever has once leaned on this breast can no longer find full joy anywhere else.

Jesus said, "The first of all the commandments is: 'Hear, O Israel' (MRK 12:29). Hear the beating of my loving heart. Everything else follows from this."

Nothing should be preferred to loving gestures for the One Who leads us to eternal life. There is a depth in renunciation of everything else. The devil can tear one away from the life of a hermit on Carmel but not from the very breast of Christ. Blessed is the man who can do both his secular work and visible work for the church while lying spiritually on His breast. If he cannot do both, he should forego the work rather than the quiet adoration.

A brother of almost eighty repeated this sermon to me, heard fifty years before. He served me well. Curiously, I have no recollection of ever having read or heard the legend of Gorun. Yet I am told it was part of a sermon of mine. Perhaps I composed it myself. Legends are often good clothing for truth.

COUNT YOUR SECONDS

Another person reminded me of a sermon thirty years old about PSA 90:12. Again, I had started with a story (sermons without illustrations are not remembered).

A man was obliged to walk late at night to a village far away. The journey was monotonous, especially since it was dark and he could scarcely see the road. At a certain moment he stumbled on something in his path. Reaching down, he picked up a small bag full of pebbles. To distract himself from time to time he threw one in the river bordering the road on which he traveled. Plitch ... plitch.... The sound of the splash was harmless amusement. When he reached his destination, only two pebbles remained. In the lighted house he glanced down and saw that they were diamonds. He had squandered a fortune.

Our days are made up of seconds. There are 32 million seconds in a year. A person who has lived thirty years is responsible for one billion. Every second comes to us from God as a gift to use in His service. If we do not, the second returns to God in sadness and reports that we have neglected His precious gift.

Then I told about a general in the former Royal Army with whom I had been in jail. He was very ill. When I spoke to him about God, he showed no interest. But then his last hour came, and he asked for a priest. There were plenty of priests in that jail, but it took time to bring one from another cell. When he came, the general was no longer able to speak and make confession. The priest gave him Communion, but he could not swallow the wafer. He died without confession and Communion. He valued the treasure only when the last diamonds remained in the bag.

I spoke about how well Jesus used his seconds, even when crucified: pardon for his crucifiers, . salvation to a robber, good words to his holy mother and to a beloved disciple, the assurance that all things needed for our salvation were fulfilled, a trusting prayer to God. Even in those dire circumstances, moments were not lost.

"Use your time well. Time is the most precious commodity. You can regain money lost but not time lost. Use your time in the Lord's service."

PHYSICAL ACTS COMMUNICATE THE SPIRIT

I visited Oradea, the city with the largest evangelical churches in Romania: a Baptist church led by Dr. Gheorghitza and Pastor Negrutz, with 2,500 members attending, and a Pentecostal church with some 2,000. Space forbids my recounting all the things I preached in these churches, but I will mention one pronouncement that stunned the audience.

Ceaushescu is hated by the whole populace. I never heard one good word spoken about him. All speak evil of him, except Christians who have learned from the Arch-angel Michael not to dare to bring against even the devil a railing accusation (JUD 9). We often bring such accusations against men, even dead men. I was once warned in the night by a voice which said, "Don't speak evil against any dead persons. They hear us. If they are lost, they have pain enough. Don't add to it."

Now the congregation was anxious to hear my message. All eyes were fixed on me.

I spoke from JHN 20:22-23 - "Jesus breathed on them, and said to them, 'Receive the Holy Spirit. If you forgive the sins of men, they are forgiven them."

"A physical act, a special manner of breathing," I continued, "can impart the Holy Spirit. At ordination, another physical act, the laying-on of hands, imparts the gifts of the Spirit. Bodies can be the tool of the Spirit, which can be communicated not only through words, but also through a really warm handshake, a loving look, a face expressing goodness and understanding, a brotherly kiss. A spiritual man should be such not only in words but in all his gestures."

I DEFEND CEAUSHESCU

Then I made my second point, to the stupefaction of my listeners: "Why did Jesus impart the Spirit to the apostles? He answers the question: that they may be able to forgive or retain sins.

"I regret not having been in Romania when Ceaushescu was judged. I would have volunteered to defend him."

It was obvious the audience could not believe their ears. I was reputed to be a fierce anti-Communist. having opposed Communism when even some of the best pastors had compromised their beliefs. Defend Ceaushescu? Out of the question! Not only had he and his wife been killed, to everyone's satisfaction, but all his children, brothers, and in-laws were in jail. To bear the name Ceaushescu was crime enough.

I went on to explain: "I was in jail with a former major in the police during Fascist times. His sentence was twenty years. He claimed to be a Christian, blessed himself the whole time with the sign of the cross, and prayed to God, the Virgin, and a number of other saints.

"This man was sentenced for having arrested during the war (in the early forties Romania was at war with the Soviet Union) a lad of fourteen who had distributed Communist leaflets, then strictly forbidden. This lad was a member of an atheist organization, the Communist Youth.

"What an occasion this was for a Christian! The major should have seated the young lad and taken the opportunity to show him lovingly how wrong he was. He should have pointed him to a better way, the way of Christ.

"Instead, he beat the boy savagely. With every lash he inflicted, he strengthened in him his atheist convictions and confirmed his hatred for God.

p074 From Suffering To Triumph

"The name of that young boy was Nicolae Ceaushescu. Some of the foremost criminals of history - Hitler, Stalin, Lenin, Marx - also had early encounters with Christians who had not used the occasion well.

"At a certain moment, the guards threw into my cell a Catholic priest who had been beaten badly and was bleeding. We washed him as best we could and gave him water to drink.

"When he came to himself I asked him, 'Can you pray, like Jesus. "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do"?'

"He replied, 'Jesus could, I cannot. My prayer would rather be, "Father, forgive me and them, because if I had been a better priest, they might not have become torturers.'"

"'I would have told the court which judged the Ceaushescu all this,' I went on, 'and would have concluded: "Judge for yourselves if you have no part in their crimes.'" Then I challenged the audience: "You judge yourselves and ask if you have done your utmost to share with the Communists the teaching of Jesus and to turn them from their wicked ways.'

"In 1918, the Russian Communists killed Czar Nicholas II, his wife, his four daughters, the twelve-year-old crown prince, and their servants. After the murder they found in the house a handwritten poem from the pen of Princess Olga, aged fifteen:

On the threshold of the grave,

Put on the lips of Your servants

Superhuman power to pray humbly

For our enemies.

p075 From Suffering To Triumph

"This too I would have quoted to the judges. May we all learn the beautiful art of forgiveness."

There were tears in the eyes of many in the congregation.

"GORBACHEV, REMEMBER CEAUSHESCU'S LOT!"

Obviously I was not able to appear in court to defend Ceaushescu. He and his wife Elena had both been sentenced to death. She was executed. He was badly tortured to get him to reveal where he had deposited - abroad - the millions he had allegedly stolen from the country. He is said to have died of a heart attack during the torture. His corpse was shot and displayed on public TV.

Ceaushescu's death frightened other Communist dictators and their stooges. The president of the court that had sentenced him committed suicide one week later. In East Germany, seven generals of the ~Stasi~, their Secret Police, also committed suicide. These are known. No one knows how many of their subalterns did the same thing. There were many suicides among the officers of the Soviet KGB as well.

On the 15th of July, the Russian magazine ~Gudok~ reported on a demonstration in Moscow with an estimated attendance of 400,000.

There were posters with messages that were unthinkable a year ago: "Down with the Communist Party!" "Down with the KGB!" "Communism is the scourge of the twentieth century." "The Communist Party consists of henchmen and deceivers." And so on.

But the most striking slogan was: "Gorbachev, remember Ceaushescu's lot!" There was another

p076 From Suffering To Triumph

praising Fanny Kaplan, a girl who in 1921 had wounded Lenin in an attempt on his life.

A member of the Supreme Soviet Murashov, delivered a speech in which he said: "We don't want a restructuring (perestroika) of Communism. No reforms, no changes. Communism should perish. The Romanians did well with Ceaushescu."

A general of the KGB, Oleg Kalughin, joined the ranks of the opponents of Gorbachev. He declares he ha.s become a democrat, but the opponents don't believe him. They ask him to enumerate the crimes committed in his career that allowed him to rise to the rank of general. In the debates in the press about him, it is suggested that he and others have changed sides only because of the fate of Ceaushescu. What happened to him also frightened the Communist dictators of Albania, Mongolia, Korea, and Ethiopia, who began to take steps to come to terms with their own people. Romanian blood shed for the cause of liberty by martyrs of the revolution has had wide-ranging effects.

DO WE NEED TWO RELIGIONS?

In Oradea, I had one of my most memorable encounters. I met my former fellow-inmates Pastor Visky, Pastor Sz”ke, and others from the so-called Bethanists, a revival movement within the Hungarian-speaking Reformed Church. Several members of this group, theological students as well as pastors, along with pastors of the Hungarian Unitarian Church, were in one huge cell together with Catholic and Orthodox priests, some sixty or seventy in all. Each confession gathered separately, with no common fellowship in Christ. Instead,

p077 From Suffering To Triumph

there were heated debates, not so much about which religion was right but about what was wrong with another's religion.

The story is told of a lone survivor of a shipwreck who made it to a desert island where he lived like Robinson Crusoe. Two years later, when he was discovered, his rescuers were surprised to find that he had built two prayer houses. "Why would you, alone on an island, build even one prayer house, let alone two?" they asked.

"Every man needs two religions," he explained. "One that he is for and one that he is against."

What was the essential question we debated in our overcrowded cell?

The essence of religion cannot be the subject of debate. If it is, the debaters reveal their ignorance. Religion is life, adoration, silence. Though words may indeed be spoken, it is not in the English sense of the expression "word."

The Hebrew word for "word," ~davar~, also means "the real thing." In Hebrew, John's Gospel reads: "In the beginning was Davar, 'the real thing,' and 'the real thing' was with God, and 'the real thing' was God." The verb "to speak" in Hebrew is ~ledaber~, from the root davar in its sense of giving a real thing. Even in Greek the word logos has both meanings.

Unhappily, at that time I too got caught up in the debates, but I remember telling the following Jewish joke. A young couple went to a rabbi to obtain a divorce. Among Christians, people go to the pastor or priest only for weddings, but in Judaism a rabbi is needed for divorces as well. The astonished rabbi responded, "I married you only a year ago, and you seemed so much in love with each other. Why do you want a divorce now?"

The woman replied, "Let's not waste any time. Reconciliation is useless. Just go through the formality. That's all we want. At this point talk is superfluous."

The rabbi insisted: "At least satisfy my curiosity. What happened? What is the reason for divorce?"

The man said, "We had a child, a boy."
"That's no reason for divorce."

"Yes it is, because we cannot agree on a name for him."

"What name did you choose?"
"I chose 'Nahum,'" he replied.

' Very good - the name of a prophet. But why did you choose this name?"

"Because it was the name of my father."
"Even better. You wish to honor your parent."

The rabbi then turned to the woman. "What name do you wish to give your son?"
She replied, "Nahum."

Surprised, the rabbi asked, "Why did you choose this name?"
"My father's name was also Nahum."

The rabbi couldn't help asking, with wonder, "If you both want the same name for the same reason, why do you quarrel?"

The man replied, "My wife is shrewd. I wish to call him Nahum for my father and she for hers. But her father was a horse thief and mine was a sage."

This is the impression I get of religious squabbles among Christians. All Christians want to glorify God's name, work for the coming of His kingdom, spread the gospel and the message of His love, and more. Then let us love one another!

The rabbi counseled the couple, "Call him Nahum after the prophet. Then live together happily for some twenty years. By that time, if your son becomes either a rabbi or a thief, you will know which parent's name he bears. Why start the quarrel now?"

In the divided cell, it took a long time for us to persuade even the priests of the two Catholic Churches, Roman and Byzantine Rite, to say an "Our Father" together.

A CHRISTLIKE PASTOR

During all this mental, physical and spiritual anguish, Pastor Visky was a unique example to us. Many considered him the most Christlike among us. During the time when we had one small slice of bread a day with some soup of potato peels or rotten carrots, he would give half of his bread to a sick, weak or older prisoner. Once I remember he shared a sweater with a fellow prisoner. His words were always pleasant, and a smile did not disappear from his lips.

As for the rest of us, we were happy if we chanced to observe in him some little sign of irritation or a harsh word, because we knew then that we still had a chance with God. We reasoned that if a Christian had to be as advanced in holiness as Pastor Visky to be acceptable to God, our chances were nil. He retained this composure though he suffered more than us. Somehow he had received news that his wife and seven small children had been deported to a barren part of the country where not only food but also water were lacking.

In Gethsemane, where Peter was ready to defend Jesus with a sword, he said to the disciples, "Permit even this." The worst must be accepted with composure and even with joy. Now I had the joy of meeting Visky and his family. Our mission had supported such families through secret channels in Romania and several other Communist countries. He expressed deep gratitude to all donors who helped him survive.

WHICH IS THE TRUE BIOGRAPHY?

First there was just small talk, but then he gave me the outline of a book on his prison experiences that he was writing. I could not believe my ears. All the beautiful attitudes and laudatory deeds I had said about him as illustrations in my sermons, he attributed to me. Bemused, I asked him, "Was it you or I? Which of us is telling the truth?" Then I knew the answer. It was simply what minds with great love, true attachment, and holy fantasy see in their beloved.

Never believe biographies. If they are written by adversaries, they tell not what the man truly was but what enmity, rancor, or jealousy saw in him. If they are written by admirers, they will reveal the noble heart of the biographer, who ornaments the subject of his book with his own virtues. As for "objective" biographies that tell the story with pedantic exactitude and thrifty dosages of praise or criticism, don't waste your time reading them. They are boring. worth nothing.

Truth is truth only when told by the passionate. The original of the New Testament had no punctuation marks. It is up to us to decide how to punctuate

p081 From Suffering To Triumph

JHN 14:6, where Jesus says, "I am the way the truth and the life." I would suggest the following: "I am the way: the truth and the life." Those who think like Him never offer prosaic truth by itself, but animate it with the beautiful passions of lives worth living.

Visky's children, who grew up in utter misery, are all believers now, some engineers, some pastors, every one in some useful work for the kingdom. Men like Visky brought love, peace and light to shepherds at loggerheads with one another, even in a prison cell where all suffered for the same Savior. But this common suffering was worthwhile. Christians learned in time to understand and admire each other.

Now in 1990, Romanian Christians have formed for the first time in history an evangelical alliance, which includes Baptists, Lutherans, Pentecostals, Brethren, and the Army of the Lord. The latter, with an estimated membership of 800,000, is the cream of the Orthodox Church.

The Roman Catholic Church is not in the alliance, but relations with it are correct and friendly. The enmity of past times no longer exists. One side does not call the other "idolaters" and the other does not respond with "heretics." The Catholic archbishop Robu is the only head of a denomination who, in his sermons, took a public stand against the murder of innocents instigated by the new president Iliescu.

THE MOST PERSECUTED

As for the Byzantine Rite Catholic Church (1.5 million members), also known as Uniates7 we all admire the heroism in faith of their members. Almost all its bishops and many priests died in jail after .severe torture. Their jail sentences totaled 600 years. All their church buildings, schools, and charitable institutions were stolen from them by the Communists and given to the Orthodox Church, whose hierarchy was foremost in collaborating with the Reds.

The crime against the Uniate Church has not been repaired even now. The government has assured them that in principle they are completely free. But how can 1.5 million people enjoy religious freedom when deprived of all their buildings? Stolen property has not yet been returned.

The Uniate church has a history of two hundred years of great suffering. The church began in the eighteenth century in the Romanian province of Transylvania, at that time under the domination of the Austro-Hungarian monarchy of the Hapsburgs. It was a split from the Orthodox church, to which most Romanians belong. The Uniates retained all the Orthodox rituals but accepted all the dogmas of the Catholic church. Composed only of Romanians, it suffered in Transylvania all the vexations to which the nation was subjected under the years of Hungarian rule. The church enjoyed freedom for only thirty years, from 1918 when Transylvania united with Romania until 1956 when the Communists abolished it.

The second most persecuted group is the Army of the Lord whose very existence had not been recognized, either by the state or by the Orthodox church subservient to the state until late in 1990.

MY FIRST ENCOUNTER WITH JESUS

How can I tell all that I experienced in Romania?

One day as a boy, with deep emotion I entered an Orthodox church in Bucharest. It was the first Christian church I had ever seen on the outside. Brought up by non-practicing Jewish parents, I never heard in my childhood either a bad or a good word about Jesus. He was simply unknown to me.

One day as I returned home from school with another boy, he stopped in front of this church and said, "Wait for me a minute. My father asked me to tell the priest something." I said, "No, I'll go in with you." This is how I crossed the threshold of a church for the first time.

I was deeply impressed. Now, re-entering the same church after some seventy years, I relived vividly my initial experience.

As a child I saw a picture of a man crucified. I had no idea who this man was, but thought he must have been very bad or this would not have been done to him. As a child I was much spanked and probably deserved it. But this man, bleeding all over, attached with nails to a cross - why?

I also saw at that time a picture of a beautiful young lady, who looked at me with great love. I was not accustomed to such an expression. I was despised for being a Jewish boy, and was also very poorly dressed, thin, frail, small. This lady loved me. I loved her, too, from that moment.

I wonder why some Christians never think of Mary with love. The Bible says "all generations will call her blessed." Why don't we?

Reason tells me that I did not actually see the Crucified One or that lady, but only a representation. At that time I had the impression that I was seeing real persons. It was one of the several existential events in my life.

p084 From Suffering To Triumph

The other boy spoke with the priest, who then came to me and caressed me on the head. It meant much to me, since my parents were not demonstrative. He had a fine touch, the kind I felt at my ordination. Bishop Argay really loved me. Only ordinations performed by those with divine love impart gifts of the Holy Spirit.

As the priest caressed me, he asked, "Little fellow. what can I do for you?"

I was embarrassed, thinking perhaps I was not permitted to be in that strange place. I replied, "Nothing."

He said, "That can't be. I belong to Jesus, who taught us not to allow anyone to pass near us without doing him some good. It is summertime and it is hot outside. I will bring you a cup of cold water."

Jesus - what a strange being! To that point no one I had met knew anything of His teachings. I was given no toys, no chocolate. (When other children ate chocolate, I licked the paper in which it was wrapped.) Jesus changed the water I received into wine. I was stunned.

Being young, I soon forgot this incident. But when I became a Christian, it came back to my memory. The name of that priest was Cavane.

Many years later when I was an evangelical pastor. the Fascists came to power. A new priest in that church, Chiricuta, was the only Orthodox priest who allowed me, a Protestant and, even worse, a Jew, to preach regularly at evensong in his church. He was unconcerned that other priests bullied him for this. I became a contributor to his Orthodox magazine.

During the war, when my wife and I and several

other Hebrew Christians were court-marshaled, he dared to offer himself as a defense witness. He defended a Jew when Hitler ruled Europe! His defense and that of a German Baptist pastor resulted in ours being the only case in which Jews were acquitted under Hitler. Normally, we would have been condemned, whether guilty or not guilty.

Now, back in Romania after an absence of twenty-five years, I was able to pray in that same church, remembering how much good God had done to me there. God surely has a reward for the one who offered a cup of cold water and unconditional love in His name.

ANTI-SEMITISM

Only some 15,000 Jews have remained in Romania, which at one time had a Jewish population of 600,000. Many of those - among them my wife Sabina's family - perished in the Holocaust. Quite a few have emigrated to Israel and other countries. But even this small remnant wants to leave the country now. The stirrings of anti-Semitism, which were stifled under Ceaushescu, are evident again.

Why didn't this dictator persecute the Jews? Because no one persecutes a cow that gives him milk. The Jews were a great source of income for the government. They were sold to the state of Israel, sometimes at very high prices, depending on their qualifications. The sale of Jews to Israel and ethnic Germans to West Germany enriched the treasury and - it is said Ceaushescu personally. Anti-Semitic publications were forbidden.

Now the situation has changed in Eastern Europe. There is ~glasnost~ and relative freedom of speech. So

anti-Semites are free to reveal the hatred they have in their hearts for Jews.

The Romanian president Iliescu is a former school colleague and personal friend of Gorbachev, who has shown how he feels about Jews by naming to his presidential council Valentin Rasputin (the name means "profligate" in Russian and gained notoriety in the person of an immoral monk who was an intimate adviser to the Russian imperial family). In an interview given to the ~New York Times~ Magazine, Rasputin said, "Our Jews must feel responsibility for the sins of the revolution and for its consequences . . . responsibility for the terror that existed during the revolution and especially after it. ... Their guilt is great, for they killed God and also Russians."

It is moving to read how painful it is for this high-ranking leader of a God-hating regime to think of God being killed when He came to earth. Certain Jews of old did play a role in the death of Jesus. It was because He Himself was a Jew and lived in Israel. Curiously, I never heard accusations against the (Greek people for having killed Socrates or the Italian nation for having persecuted Galileo.

The interview with Rasputin was published in January 1990. In March he was named to Gorbachev's presidential council. This was his reward. Some knew what conclusion to draw from this interview. In the Moscow magazine ~Nedelia~ (16/1990), one person proposed a simple solution to the Jewish problem. If everyone who understands the Jewish danger would free the country of one single Jew, tomorrow there would be no more Jews. Certainly a program to which Ayatollah Khomeini and the leaders of the Lebanese terrorist organization Hezbollah would subscribe.

"Nothing distorts human nature so much as maniacal ideas. If a man is possessed by the idea that all evil in the world comes from the Jews, Masons, Bolsheviks, heretics, capitalists, etc., even the best man becomes a wild beast." So wrote Berdiaev.

One can choose among many accusations against the Jews: "Christianity is a Jewish ideology into which nations have been tricked to create a Judeo-Christian civilization, so that in the end the whole world will become an enlarged Israel."

"Communists were right in fighting capitalism, but they did not say who is guilty of it: the Jews."

"Columbus was a Jew who discovered America with the purpose of making it a center of Zionism from which the Jews would dominate the world through the dollar."

"International Communism was also created by the Jew Marx for the purpose of destroying love for one's nation and fatherland." And so on.

This anti-Jewish propaganda could not be spread in the USSR without the connivance of Gorbachev's government.

From the Soviet Union, anti-Semitism spread.s to other countries just freed from the shackles of Communism. All are passing through a grave economic crisis. In Romania, the new government has declared it will no longer subsidize the prices of bread, milk, meat, etc., which means prices may soon rise by 50%. In times of crisis people need to blame someone, and the Jews provide a convenient scapegoat. For two thousand years of history this has been the case.

p088 From Suffering To Triumph

Some of the Romanian Communist leaders were Jewish: Ana Pauker, Kishinevski, Rautu, along with some of the leaders of the Secret Police. That the majority were Romanians or Hungarians doesn't matter; the Jews are guilty.

While it is true that Roman, the first prime minister after the revolution, was a Jew, it must be remembered that Marx himself was also a Jew and a Jew-hater.

Romanian anti-Semites who are also anti-Hungarians are grouped under the name ~Vatra Romaneasca~ - "The Romanian Home."

Romanian Jews, as well as those in other Eastern European countries, are concerned. But where should they go? The USA does not receive them. In Israel, Arabs kill Jews and there is always imminent danger of war. In Romania there are Jewish Christian efforts to acquaint Jews with their King, Jesus. Many are from the province of Bessarabia, theater of the Second World War. They remember that when the Nazi army entered, posters were seen everywhere: "Calamities come from the dirty Jews"; "Jews have provoked this war': "Jews are behind Communism"; "Death to the Jews." And the Jew-haters did not only threaten. Rare are the Jewish families from that province who had no relatives executed by firing squads or deported to concentration camps. Almost the whole of my wife's family (both parents, three sisters, and a brother aged six) perished in such a camp. Since the situation in Romania cannot be assessed apart from the rest of Eastern Europe and especially the Soviet Union, a few words are in order about the latter.

p089 From Suffering To Triumph

Gorbachev a Blessing

Gorbachev has been a blessing for the western world. Just imagine the Gulf crisis with the USSR and the West opposed to each other, as in the cold war!

When, during the thirties, Stalin killed all the high command of his own army, suspecting them of intrigue against him, Italy's Fascist dictator Mussolini wrote, "Stalin is a disguised Fascist." Gorbachev was hardly an agent of the American CIA, but he has done its work well. He undermined the power of the Soviet Union and with it the power of Communism in the whole of Eastern Europe. The western Communist Parties have also been shattered.

I remember how, when I arrived in the USA, the general secretary of the World Council of Churches begged me not to publish the atrocities of Communism. But Gorbachev caused them to be publicized. Today you can read in the Soviet newspapers about the millions of innocents killed and about the whole populace being robbed, exploited, and oppressed by the Communists.

But while he himself exposes the cataclysm Communism brought to Russia, Communist Leaders, nicknamed the nomenklatura, still cling to power. They acknowledge they have nothing to give to the people, yet they continue to wield power and, begging money from the capitalists, they lead Russia to tragedy, a bloodbath that might surpass everything history has known till now.

Perhaps they are guided by the instinct of self-preservation. Or perhaps they have simply abandoned planning and thinking about a more distant future.

p090 From Suffering To Triumph

Though Gorbachev played a leading role in the preparation of the drama, he himself would be better suited to play the actor in a farce. He presided over the dismantling of his Party and of the Soviet Union itself, yet ended the congresses by singing the "Internationale," the venerable hymn of Communism. He and his cohorts chant about fighting to the end the deadly battle that will give the whole world the "ideal" society that is now in its death throes in its homeland, Russia. Their slogan is still "Proletarians of the world, unite!" Then they decide at their congresses that the Ukrainian, Russian, Byelorussian, Baltic, and Uzbek Communists should go their separate ways. These decisions only help to enhance extreme nationalism. The result will be a new brand of Fascism, or, more likely, several brands of Fascism, because each of the Soviet republics will have its own to foster against others. Gorbachev and his ilk have played a major role in emasculating Soviet and Eastern European Communism. Without intending to do so, they have rendered the free world a great service, putting off for a time the threat of war between East and West.

Yeltsin, also a former Communist leader, though in personal conflict with Gorbachev, walks the same way.

Should Christians Be in Politics?

Before going further, I feel I must reply to a frequently heard and pertinent question. Should a Christian, and especially a pastor, depart from the Bible and speak out on political matters? This question is very acute for Romanian Christians as well. Some claim we should speak out on political issues, while others say we shouldn't. Somehow they don't realize that by speaking out fervently about not making politics. They are playing the political game. Why don't they use their energy to explain the atonement of Christ or the doctrine of the Trinity?

The word "politics" comes from the Greek ~polis~, meaning city. "Alms" is doing good to a few men, "philanthropy" is doing good to many, and "politics" is the art of doing good to a nation and even beyond.

Some 70% of the Bible is concerned with politics: the constitution of a nation, its liberation from slavery, the multitude of its wars against other nations, laws regarding social relations, agriculture, hygiene, matrimony, inheritance, the establishment of monarchies and the rivalries among them, along with the misdeeds of rulers, much as the media would expose them today.

"Give to Caesar what is Caesar's" is political advice, as is incitement to rebellion. "Be submissive to authorities" is also political advice, along with descriptions by Daniel and the Revelation of world rulers as ferocious beasts.

We have to evaluate political events to find our way through them. Many discussions among Romanian Christians were not only about the ascent of the soul from the earthly to the angelic, which is holiness, but also about political events in the country and under Communism in particular.

PREACHING UNDER ESCORT

Another place with powerful memories for me is the Baptist church in Giuleshti, a suburb of Bucharest. I had been invited to preach there the first

p092 From Suffering To Triumph

Sunday after Romania entered the Second World War, in 1941. At that time the Nazis dominated our country, and when their army attacked Russia, it was in alliance with our troops. The slogan was, "Destroy Communism created by the dirty Jews. Beat the Jews!"

I went to church with a group of other Hebrew Christians. The brethren had invited many unbelievers, telling them who would be the preacher. The Baptists were already hated by the Orthodox. Now something even worse was about to take place: a Jew would preach in the pulpit of the despised Baptist sect. Anti-Semites could not stomach the situation. They denounced this intolerable crime to the police, and we six Hebrew Christians were arrested. A Romanian Christian lady, Sister Mindrutz, knocked at the gate of the prison where my wife and I and the four other Jews were detained and said, "My brethren from the chosen people suffer here for Christ. I wish to suffer with them." Her demand was graciously accepted. She was put in the same cell with us. Now we were seven: three Jews, three Jewesses, and the Romanian.

The cell was small, with only one single bed. The police officer said, "You priest (meaning me), will sleep in the bed and all the others on the floor."

Meanwhile, the Orthodox priest of Giuleshti went to the police to make sure that we would not be freed. He also spoke with me to convince me that there was no place for Jews in Christianity. At that time, the patriarchy had forbidden the baptism of Jews.

Following the Giuleshti arrest we were taken to the prison of the Military Tribunal for interrogation.

p093 From Suffering To Triumph

While we were being questioned, the air raid alarm sounded. Bucharest was being attacked by Soviet planes. Soldiers with bayonets on their rifles escorted us to the basement, along with our investigators, the staff of the Tribunal, our prosecutors and future judges. We prisoners were kept in a corner under strict surveillance. The conversation of the others was about trifles. One young lady complained about a new garment she had not yet worn - and now the bombing!

Then the first bombs were heard falling. The explosions shook the earth. Weeping and panic broke out. Seizing the opportunity, I said with authority. "You have a pastor among you. I will give you a word of comfort from Scripture, and then we will pray. Please kneel."

Everyone knelt, including guards, prosecutors, and judges. I was then able to speak to them from the word of God.

When the bombing was over, we were taken back to our cells, escorted again by soldiers with bayonets they would not hesitate to use if we attempted escape. Those who had knelt at my command h an hour before were again my prosecutors judges.

I relived all these events on seeing the Malmezon prison. What I have just recounted took place Fascist times. Later, under the Communists, I again a guest in this same prison.

A SPIRITUAL EXPERIENCE

In one of its solitary cells, I had had a spiritual. experience to which I alluded in several sermons delivered in Romania upon my recent return. I say "alluded" because a deep spiritual experience cannot be adequately expressed in any language. One enters into contact with a reality that is neither namable nor explainable. Therefore, the Bible is God's revelation in both senses of the word: it reveals something so that we may perceive it, but it also re-veils It.

Explaining what you experience often does little good. Beethoven had experiences and put them in music. A sculptor in Buenos Aires carved for a cemetery nine statues symbolizing the nine symphonies. After I had visited the site, someone asked me to explain what the statues were. Sentiments had become music, which then became sculpture, which needed words for interpretation How much of a relationship would these words have had with Beethoven's experiences?

The Bible says, "Taste and see that the Lord i good" (PSA 34:8). No speech, no music, could explain to you the difference between the taste of watermelon and a peach. Only tasting works.

We can hint at spiritual experiences but only with the aim of encouraging others to have their own. Put through the filter of words, such experiences are diminished in value. Everyone has to make an individual effort to obtain the capacity to see reality beyond appearance.

A Zen master was asked by a disciple, "What is Buddha?" He replied, "This flax weighs three pounds" - another way of saying, "What Buddha is cannot be expressed in words. Let us spend our time better by talking about practical things."

If Buddha cannot be expressed in words, even less can Jesus.

p095 From Suffering To Triumph

TIMELESSNESS

I have spent years in solitary conf1nement in three different prisons. While there, I lost track of time. Our solitary cells had only a window facing the corridor, none on the outside. We never knew if it was bitter winter or beautiful spring. We could not tell night from day. The same electric bulb burned constantly. Probably for the purpose of confusing us, the prisons had no fixed program of hours when they would awaken prisoners, give them food, or allow them to go to the toilet. We were time-disoriented.

We lived in timelessness as astronauts live in weightlessness. If prolonged for years, timelessness produces a state of mind apart, not comprehensible intellectually. Our senses had nothing to sense. Perfect silence reigned. We almost never heard a voice or a whisper, and the guards wore felt-soled shoes. There was nothing to see. We were surrounded by the same gray walls. We forgot that colors exist. The stench was overpowering and unrelenting, to the point of paralyzing the olfactory nerve. To this day I cannot smell the perfume of flowers. As for taste, the food was always bland and bad and always the same.

Our minds were not oriented to the senses or regulated by logic.

As I tried to relive those days on my return to Romania as a free man, it was difficult to interpret those experiences for contemporary ears as I spoke in churches. However, being Jewish helps when it comes to timelessness.

Biblical Hebrew does not have our tenses: I eat, I ate, I have eaten, I had eaten, I will eat, I will have eaten, and so on. God's people are not intended to cut time in pieces: past, present and future. This dividing of time is not natural. The past is not only past; it lives very much in the present, often carrying with it joy or sadness. It will also live in the future. The basis of today and tomorrow is what has been accumulated in the past. Some of the past was also determined by the previous perspective of the future. We are part of one undivided ocean in which waves flow back and forth but remain part of the same ocean. And so as I gazed at the prison walls that had contained me and thought of what went on below, I tried to relive old experiences.

CRUCIFIED FOR YOU TODAY

How easy it is for one who can divide time to accept salvation. I can be forgiven of all my sins and obtain heaven by believing that Jesus died for me long time ago. He chose to suffer for me without asking me. He suffered on the cross for a few hours and then died. On the third day He was resurrected, then returned to heaven, where He has lived now for two thousand years. It would give Him great joy if I was converted. Then why shouldn't I become a Christian? It would give us mutual joy. Many people come forward during evangelistic appeals with a smile on their face. In great crusades, few tears are shed.

With us, dwelling in timelessness, it was otherwise. Everything was experienced only in the present. Golgotha did not belong to the past but was a present event. It was as if Jesus was standing before me, saying, "You have sinned. For you I will be whipped and crucified. Before your very eyes you will see and hear nails being driven into my flesh. You will see my holy mother weeping at the foot of the cross. Do you accept this my actual sacrifice for you, or do you prefer to bear the punishment of your sins yourself?"

The crucifixion was no longer an old story read in a book. I had to decide then and there who should die: Barabbas or Jesus. Peter, John, and Mary Magdalene did not have to accept a past sacrifice of Christ, but one in the present or near future. No guilty person with a sense of decency would allow himself to be the eyewitness of the actual cruel death of someone else for what he had done. Neither could we in solitary confinement.

Now I relived what I understood then. It was never intended that salvation should be the result of His dying for me, period. There is no period after His death. not even a comma. We are meant to be "crucified and buried together with him" (ROM 6:6), which is something entirely different.

Luther called the book of James "an epistle of straw" because it teaches that faith alone without deeds is not sufficient. He was wrong. "We are saved by faith" - no period after this assertion. We have to add many sacrifices to this faith (2PE 1:5-8). It is a sacrifice to remain always pure, loving, forgiving, active in God's service. We have to fill up what is lacking in the cross of Christ.

The priest Cheruvian did so. Forced after unspeakable torture to give a Satanist Communion, pronouncing the holy words "This is My body" and "This is My blood" over human excrement and urine, he later told me, "I have suffered more than Christ." As far as physical torture was concerned, perhaps this is true.

p098 From Suffering To Triumph

In timelessness, we lived simultaneously the passion of Christ, His resurrection, His ascension, and His final triumph.

In that solitary cell, we were also concerned not only with the earthly life of men but with their eternal life as well. Death is not an end. In timelessness, we also experienced the afterlife.

WHERE IS CEAUSHESCU TODAY?

With these thoughts in mind, I preached again in Romanian churches. I asked my listeners, "Where are the Ceaushescus today? He was not able to finish his last speech. The audience booed him and he fled. But now he speaks again. Don't you hear him?

"In Jesus' parable, the rich man in hell begged Abraham to send someone to his brothers to tell them not to lead lives that would bring them to the same place of torment. He was refused; he had asked the wrong man. Abraharn had been very harsh with Hagar, mother of his own child. He expelled her from his house with only a loaf of bread and a skin full of water. Why should he show pity to those in hell?

"But perhaps Ceaushescu petitions Jesus, with whom he has a better chance. The rich man was not totally wicked. At least he had love for his lost brothers. Perhaps Ceaushescu too loves some of his old Communist comrades. Perhaps he asks each of us now, 'Go to other Communists and tell them that I suffer the fire and brimstone of condemnation. Warn them to seek another Way.'

"Whoever has experienced timelessness or, in better words, reality beyond the temporal, hears not only the songs of cherubim and seraphim calling him, but also the howling of those in despair in hell. And there is something even more unbearable to listen to: the deep silence of those kept in darkness (1SM 2:9).

"The silence of some pleads from hell, 'Tell the good news to the worst of men. Think about their terrible destiny. Jesus is interested in them. He proved it by descending into hell.'"

There were unusual strains in my Romanian sermons. I thank God they were well received. For these moments of triumph in my homeland, I had passed through much suffering and sickness and perils of all kinds. It was all by God's grace.

A SIGN FROM GOD

In the case of Chinese wornen over seventy, mortality diminishes by 35% before the harvest feast. In the week following, it returns to normal. This has been established in the studies of the death dates of Chinese-Americans in California The expectation of a feast, the sentiment of duty to help prepare for it, can influence mortality. With Orthodox Jews, mortality diminishes before the Passover feast and returns to normal during the week following.

Epidemiological Research reports only on physical, chemical, and psychological factors that influence mortality. Religion has its influence too. My wife and I believed that God would prove that we were justified in our fight, in which we had encountered much opposition and contrddiction. He would give us a sure sign. We willed not to die before revisiting the old places, bearing triumphantly the banner of Christ. More were on our side than the enemy's. I revisited Romania and its churches at the age of eighty-two. I will not disclose my wife's age, but she too knew the triumph when well advanced in years.

ROMANIA NOT YET WHOLE

What one sees on the map is not the whole of Romania. The vicissitudes of history have caused much of the nation to live outside its boundaries.

In 1939, when Hitler and Stalin divided up Eastern Europe, Russia obtained the Romanian provinces of Bessarabia and Bucovina. The Red Army occupied them at the end of the Second World War. The Soviets renamed Bessarabia"Moldavia" and invented a language that the Bessarabian Romanians were obliged to use. To do so, they mixed Romanian with a number of Russian words and then required that the result be written in the Cyrillic alphabet of Russian instead of the Latin alphabet used in the West. Romanians are the only Latins of Eastern Europe, but they were forbidden to use their own alphabet.

Bulgaria also stole from Romania - the province of Cadrilater. To the east of Bessarabia is Transnistria, another territory thickly populated by Romanians. The province of Banat, in Yugoslavia, is ethnically Romanian, as is the language spoken there. We hope this whole territory will be reunited with the motherland once and for all under our beloved King Michael I. It should certainly be the concern of the Romanian churches.

It is a special sorrow to me that the Bible, even the New Testament, has not yet been translated into the Macedo-Romanian language spoken by a compact Romanian minority in Greece, Bulgaria, Yugoslavia, and Albania. Lydia, the first Christian in Europe, was a Macedonian (ACT 16:12-14). Her language must have been Macedo-Romanian. which is nothing but a dialect of Romanian, but the difference is still so great that an uncultured Macedo-Romanian would not understand a plain Romanian Bible. It would be like Languedocian and French, Frizian and Dutch, Swiss-German and German, though the Swiss-German, being cultured. would know classical German. European Christians owe it to the memory of Lydia, the first European Christian, to care about the translation of the Bible into Macedo-Romanian.

ROMANIAN MARTYRS

Romanian Christians also miss much through the lack of communication with Bessarabia. This eastern province, stolen by the USSR, is known for its many wonderful Christians.

The renowned martyr, Vania Moiseev, was from that area. In spite of his Russian name, he was Romanian and did not even know the Russian language. The Soviets have Russified Romanian names. Moisiu was renamed Moiseev. He had been a soldier in the Red Army. He had the same faith that we have, with one difference: his faith was contagious. True faith is like the flu. If you have the flu, it is catching. So is faith. In his regiment, soldiers and officers were converted.

His superiors ordered him to keep silent, to avoid speaking about his beliefs, to stop singing. He replied, "What would a nightingale do if ordered to stop singing? It cannot stop, and neither can I."

So they tortured him and in the end drowned him after stabbing him repeatedly in the heart.

p102 From Suffering To Triumph

While under persecution, he sent word to his mother: "They give me much pain. I might die at their hands. But don't weep, mother. [He was twenty-one. At that age it is still possible to believe you can stop a mother from weeping.] An angel showed me heavenly Jerusalem, and it is beautiful. Do your best, mother, to meet me there."

Did this Vania really see an angel? People can have foolish hallucinations. But we have proof he did, because, as an uncultured peasant boy, he described this angel as no professor of theology would.

He went on to say, "Angels are transparent. When you have one in front of you and a man stands behind him. the presence of the angel does not keep you from seeing the man. On the contrary, you see him better. Seen through an angel, all men look more lovely. You can understand and appreciate even a torturer."

Many regret they have never looked upon an angel. They are wrong. You see an angel as often as you accept an unlovely person, as often as you love the one who hurts you.

Vania Moiseev is the pride of our Romanian nation.

Another is the young girl Sophia Chiriac. From the age of eighteen she worked in the underground print shop of the unregistered Soviet Baptists. Confined in a small cellar full of machines, paper, ink, and stocks of books, she had little room to move, stagnant air to breathe, and never any sun-sunshine. She became sick but could not go to a physician. The rule of conspiracy is that once on the staff of such a secret enterprise you never leave it till near death. When she was finally taken to a hospital, it was too late. Sophia was a Romanian girl who had sacrificed her life to give light to the Russian nation that had subjugated her own.

And then there is another Bessarabian, the well-known confessor Nikolai Horev, who was repeatedly in Soviet jails and came out each time strengthened in faith, a shining example to others. From all he said and wrote, I value most a prayer of his: "Lord, you are my shepherd forever, and I am your sheep forever. May your rod always be in your hand so that when I am in danger, you will protect me from my enemies, or when I stray from your way into wrong paths, either through temptation or through the fear of difficulties, you will use your rod to bring me back to the right way. And should I ever ask you, O Lord, for anything different from what I am asking you now, please ignore it."

Have you ever asked God to ignore your prayers if they should keep you, or others through you, from becoming a saint?

We hope Bessarabia, as well as all the other territories formerly belonging to Romania, will soon unite with the motherland. At this moment, the fact that we have a Communist government bodes ill for the fulfillment of our national ideal: the union of all Romanians.

CONFESSIONS

Much of my time in Romania was taken up with hearing confessions.

I was terribly tired after having preached twice or thrice a day, but was not allowed to go to bed. Some with burdened hearts asked me to listen to them.

p104 From Suffering To Triumph

Perhaps it is good for confessors to be tired, because then they speak less and don't interrupt, letting the words and tears of the penitents just flow.

Not one of the main collaborators with the Communists and none of the outright traitors confessed this particular sin. I met with men who had denounced their brethren in faith to the authorities, knowing how much they would have to suffer as a result. When I was arrested, the police officer who interrogated me let slip the name of one who had denounced me. In another case, I was given the actual denunciation to read. Those guilty of such extremes of apostasy never confessed the worst they had done. They told of sins that were minimal, but their disproportionate regret showed that they carried a much heavier, though unacknowledged, burden.

I understood. Cain, after killing his brother, said to God, "~Gadol avoni linso~ - My sin is greater than one can bear" (GEN 4:13).

When conscience reproaches a person for an extreme sin, memory tells him, "You never did it." And memory usually succeeds in convincing conscience. This happened in Germany. It was too difficult to acknowledge that millions of Jews had been killed, so conscience was silenced. Memory won: "It did not happen."

I know how difficult it is for me to admit the worst sins I have committed and my reluctance to confess them to anyone, even to God. On the other hand, reason tells me - very often rightly - that it is far from wise for a person with standing in the church to tell his sins to any man. An American evangelist produced havoc for the babes in Christ by confessing on TV, before an audience of millions, a sin that only two or three persons knew about.

In Romania we had an Orthodox monk, Arsene Boca, who would tell the penitent, "I know it is too difficult for you to relate certain things you did. Therefore I will tell them to you." He was a man with clairvoyance. But a confessor doesn't need this quality. It can drive one mad to know all the sins of his interlocutors. Be modest. Be happy about the little you are told. God is a modest God. David and Manasseh did not spell out all the gruesome details of their sins. David simply said to Nathan, "I have sinned against the Lord" (2SM 12:13). No more was required.

However, the brethren who have sinned most profoundly under Communism did not confess, though some of them might have made decisions in their heart to change. You may wonder who confessed with tears: it was the best, the most heroic. They felt guilty, some for having survived. If they had been heroic the whole time - and no one could have been - if they had stepped forward and protested each time another was beaten, they would have died of the many beatings they would have received.

Others felt guilty that, because of their involvement in the underground church, the family had broken up. Their children had not approved of the fact that father or mother went to jail for their beliefs and left them to eat from the garbage, suffer poor health, and forego proper schooling. Their reproach was always the same: "If father had kept quiet like so many other believers, we would not have been deprived of a normal childhood." And so the parent returned from jail and found hostile children and sometimes a bitter spouse, too. They felt it was all their fault.

It is difficult to win in this life. Other children were rebellious against parents who had played a treacherous role. These children could not bear the thought of being children of a Judas. Many felt guilty for having lied to the police during investigation, to protect themselves or to keep others from being arrested. They had been taught strict honesty. been wise never to engage in secret work. Such work is impossible for someone who considers it a sacred principle always to tell the full truth. A Bible smuggler from the West to Eastern Europe told me, "I never said a lie." I asked him, "When applying for a Russian or Romanian visa, what did you declare as the purpose of your visit?" He replied, "Tourism." This was a lie.

"Lies" in self-defense, in defense of innocents or the church, are not really lies. When in danger of death, Paul defended himself before the priestly council with these words: "I am a Pharisee, the son of a Pharisee; concerning the hope and resurrection of the dead I am being judged" (ACT 23:6), which was certainly not the issue. But those who felt the guilt of having lied were indifferent to any ethical niceties. They said, "If these Communist police were to find out that I lied to them in matters about which I was questioned, how would they believe what I told them about salvation?"

Others had something else on their heart. They had not seen a female for years, even decades. Once free, they found every girl an irresistible temptation. (This was less true of Catholic priests, who had been brought up with the discipline of celibacy, than of evangelicals.) I told everyone about the blood of Christ that cleanses every sin, and souls found rest. Such conversations in intimacy were as important as speeches delivered to audiences of thousands.

I had the advantage of having known great confessors personally. One was an English missionary to the Romanian Jews, David Adeney. When a person confessed a major sin to him, Adeney would weep. His tears spoke. He added to them not a word. I had also known the Lutheran bishop, Frederic Muller. No matter what sin of mine I told him, he would always reply, "This I have, too. It belongs to all men, just as forgiveness belongs to God."

I had known the Orthodox priest Suroianu who, when I told him many sins of mine, said, "Well, you have plenty of sins, and grievous ones. But beware of one sin, that of despair. Never believe that your sins can be more or greater than God's grace. You can never out-sin God. He forgives for Christ's sake. Go in peace."

THE BROTHER WHO DIED FOR ME

To each person who came to me, sometimes four or five in an evening, I told a story that I had told to robbers and murderers in jail. I felt it was appropriate for saints carrying remorse, and I offer it to the reader for comfort, regardless of the monstrous sins he may have committed.

In the olden days there were two brothers, the elder good and devout, the younger a libertine who reveled with unsavory companions. The elder brother prayed for the younger and often begged him to change his life, but all seemed in vain.

One night as the elder brother sat in his study reading, the younger brother rushed into his room, begging, "Save me! The police are after me! I have killed a man." There were bloodstains on his clothes.

The older brother grasped the situation immediately and said, "I will save you. Let us change clothes." He took the bloodstained suit of the criminal and gave him his white robe.

The two had barely dressed when the police arrived. They had pursued the criminal from the place where the deed had been committed and seized the brother in the bloodstained garment.

Brought before the judge, he pleaded guilty, saying, "I bear the whole responsibility for the crime."

Faced with the evidence before him – the pursuit, the blood, the confession – the judge had no doubt. He sentenced the man to death, then asked him his final wish.

"Only one," said the supposed criminal. "I want my brother to receive this letter, which I have prepared for him, at the very moment I am hanged."

The wish was granted.

The next day, his brother received the letter. Opening it, he read: "My beloved, at this very moment, I die in your place, in your bloodstained clothes, for your crime – and I am happy to offer this sacrifice on your behalf.

"But I would like you, in the white clothes I gave you, to lead a life of righteousness and purity. I have no other desire!"

The younger brother, on reading these words, was taken by remorse. He ran to stop the execution – but it was too late. Then he ran to the judge to confess

p109 From Suffering To Triumph

his crime, but the judge would not listen to him. "A murder was committed; it has been expiated. What was between you two brothers is of no interest to us."

After that, as often as his former comrades in revelry called the young lad to drinking parties and loose living, he would say. "In the white clothes left to me by the brother who gave his life for me, I can no longer do the evil deeds I did before."

YOU RECEIVED AN ANGEL

I was in the Christian home of a couple I had married some forty years before. They reminded me of what I had preached at their wedding.

I had told them that on the preceding evening, unable to sleep, I was wondering what to say to them at the ceremony. My wife was already asleep. I was having considerable difficulty finding a suitable text for the occasion. Only one verse of the Bible kept coming to my mind: "Do not forget to entertain strangers, for by so doing some have unwittingly entertained angels" (HEB 13:2). I dismissed it. How can one make a wedding sermon out of that?

But since it was on my mind, I tried to figure out who of the many who had stayed in our home was an angel. Some later proved to be devils, some were nice people, but angels? None fell into this category. While speculating like this, I chanced to look at my sleeping wife, and said to myself, "This is the angel entertained by me unwittingly." That became the text of my wedding sermon. "You, the bridegroom, are now receiving an angel. Angels were badly treated in Sodom. Others are not taken into consideration. You give to your bride the honor due to an angel."

Forty years have passed. He still calls her not by her name, but "angel."

In the USA, 50% of marriages end in divorce, and probably a good percentage of the other half are torn by quarrels. Even a great number of pastors divorce. I rejoice that it is not so in my homeland. Divorce among evangelicals is a rare event.

It would be easy to say that this situation is due to the greater spirituality among believers, but there is a more down-to-earth explanation: the hardship of life. When husband and wife, after a day of hard labor, have to stand in line many hours for the bare necessities of life, there is less time to quarrel. One man told me, "Our apartment is not heated in winter. The electricity bill is high. We cannot afford to have many bulbs burning. The cozy atmosphere needed for a good quarrel is missing, so we forego it."

In contrast to this, the opulence in the West favors divorce. I have known couples who divorced because of quarrels about how to squander their surplus on futilities. If western Christians gave more of their surplus to good causes, the number of divorces would drastically decrease.

CHRISTIANITY AND COMMUNISM

This leads me to express a few thoughts about the relationship between Christianity and Communism.

I have long been aware that, on a practical level, sinful mankind does not know a better economic system than capitalism. This system conflicts with Communism; between Christianity and Communism there is not a total contradiction. How is it that the name "Communism" is so much akin to notions dear to Christians, such as "the communion of saints," "holy communion," etc.? Whenever I met with a convinced revolutionary, I felt guilty. I would say to myself, "He is the wrong kind of Communist, because I am not the right kind."

Nowadays we discuss how one becomes a Christian: is it through infant or believer's baptism, sprinkling or immersion? Does one receive the Holy Spirit at the same time, or is this a second experience? Which denomination should one join, if any? It was not so in the beginning. In the early years of the Christian church, all believers "had all things in common, and sold their possessions and goods and divided them among all, as anyone had need" (ACT 2:44-45). Today it is difficult to guess which confession is the church that Christ willed. Is it the Catholic, Orthodox, Lutheran, Baptist, Pentecostal, Adventist? However, we can be sure that one church was organized as Jesus willed it. After the resurrection, he spent forty days with his disciples and surely must have told them what to do. He taught that the multitude of those who believe should be of one heart and one soul; that no one should say that anything he possessed was his own; that they should have all things in common (ACT 4:32). Measured by this standard, all today's Christian denominations are heresies.

It is obvious that contemporary Christianity, which numbers hundreds of millions on all continents, must have other life structures than those Christianity had when it numbered only a few thousand in Jerusalem, but the principle should remain the same. We should all be able to say,

p112 From Suffering To Triumph

"None of us lives to himself, and no one dies to himself" (ROM 14:7).

A theoretician of the New Age movement read my book ~Tortured for Christ~, in which I describe the heroic virtues of Christians in the underground church under Communism. Then he wrote, "If today's Christians in the West were like this, the New Age movement would not have arisen." I paraphrase him: "If we had been the right kind of Communists, we would not have the wrong kind of Communists opposing us."

Meanwhile, we should not deceive ourselves. The Communist ideal has lost some very important battles, but it is far from being defeated or extinguished. A fourth of mankind is still under Communist rule: China with 1.1 billion people and Russia with 280 million which still has a one-party Communist system at the moment I write these lines. There is Communism in Vietnam, Ethiopia, Zimbabwe, Angola, and Cuba. In Nicaragua, the army, police, and trade unions are still under Communist control, while the government belongs to a divided opposition.

And there are still thousands in Romania and other eastern countries, where a major change has taken place, who still want Communism - some to regain the privileges they lost, some because they retain their Communist ideology. Many of the political concepts they believed in, many axioms they took for granted, crumbled with the Berlin Wall, but they are still sure that a society in which people have all things in common and share according to need, a society without millionaires on one side and homeless on the other, is to be preferred to

the capitalist society in which profit is the mainspring for action.

Is there any Christian who loves Jesus' teachings who does not see that they have a point? It might not be practical, but many impractical things have spiritual value. We should all feel some uneasiness in our conscience when we read the Master's words: "Sell all you have and give to the poor, if you wish to be perfect." Is there anyone among us who does not have a longing for perfection?

Our God is modest and looks at our modest, sincere desires as if they were accomplished facts. It is not easy to go back two thousand years and fulfill all commands literally just as they were given. But I feel a bond uniting me with every sincere Communist and can extend to him wholehearted love. The fact that I suffered under Communism is not sufficient motive to reject it totally.

Communists no longer kill wholesale in Russia or Romania, but they continue to kill retail wherever they have guerrillas, as in India, the Philippines, and Latin America. Though they are killers, they are also ready to die for their beliefs. Therefore, they should not be simply discarded as worthless junk. Communism is the old dream of mankind for a kingdom of justice and happiness. Whence did this idea arise if not from a reminiscence of paradise? Many anthropologists maintain that Communism is the first primitive social order. Communism as practiced by Marxism has been and still is horrible. Today even the Communist press in Russia admits this.

DISTINGUISH IDEALS FROM THEIR SUPPORTERS

Some will be shocked that I, a man who has suffered

p114 From Suffering To Triumph

so much, can still say a good word about Communism as a principle. Intellectual and spiritual progress is impossible if we do not make a clear-cut distinction between an ideal that can be sublime and the gruesome deeds of those who proclaim themselves its adherents.

If we were to take into account the very base deeds committed at a certain stage of their lives by David, Solomon, and Paul, we would have to discard their writings as unacceptable.

Great crimes have been committed over the centuries against Jews and fellow Christians of other persuasions as well. Because of this, should we forego Christian teaching altogether? Christians love their enemies - all their enemies. They have a loving understanding for what makes a man an enemy. Communists, on the other hand, are passionate in evil. They have learned Communism from Marx, who had connections with Satanism, as I proved in my book ~Marx - Prophet of Darkness~.

Christians can teach what the first Christians learned directly from Jesus: to have all things in common; not to claim anything for oneself; to share with the brethren. After two thousand years, living as we do under entirely different circumstances, we may not be able to follow this command explicitly. But the great principle remains: Christians have to deny themselves, deny their ego, their selfishness. Not one of us lives or dies to himself. Let us show that the spirit of primitive Christianity has not been extinguished.

I believe there is no greater and more effective Communism ever propagated in the world than the loving, giving Communism practiced by the first Christians and continued by many groups since. It is the only solution for the economic and social ills of the world. Mankind will have to ascend a steep road toward this ideal. For the time being, however, capitalism is surely better than Communism as we have seen it.

DANCING IN PRISON

Once when I was especially hungry in the Jilava jail, Lieutenant Franco from the ~Securitate~ came to investigate me. Angry about such an untimely visit, I decided I would investigate him. I asked him about his soul, with the result that he was converted and gave me the lunch he had brought for himself: sandwiches with fine, white bread and the most expensive sausage. I even had dessert - luscious chocolate candies. He now lives in Israel.

Another time, in the solitary cell under what later became the headquarters of the Central Committee of the Communist Party, I remembered Jesus' words: "When men hate you and revile you, rejoice and leap for joy" (LUK 6:23). It occurred to me that I had neglected a duty. I had rejoiced but not leaped for joy, as Jesus had taught us to do. So I began to dance around the cell. The warden, who kept an eye on me through the peephole in the door, was sure I had gone mad. Guards had orders to behave well towards madmen so they would not disturb the silence of the prison. To quieten me down, he brought a large loaf of bread, cheese, and two pieces of sugar.

Romania should do what all believers are intended to do when in distress. Do nothing practical to remedy a situation that is irremediable. Just praise the Lord, sing and dance in His honor. Angels can take care of the rest, not only for individuals but also for whole nations. Isaiah recommended just "quietness and confidence" (ISA 30:15). Some will discard such advice as foolishness. But surely it is more practical to be a fool in Christ than to be a "wise" man foolishly angry about what he cannot change.

WHY NO APOLOGY?

In spontaneous actions, western evangelical and Catholic groups have done much to help the Romanian people in need since the revolution. Great quantities of Bibles and good Christian books have also been sent in.

But this is not enough to establish right relations between East and West.

After the War, the churches of Germany, acknowledging that Nazism killed millions of Jews, made public statements of apology for having supported the Nazis or at least for allowing mass slaughter to take place without protesting and helping the persecuted to escape. The German democratic government itself recognized their national guilt and gave great sums of money in restitution to the surviving victims.

Romania and other Eastern European states were given into the hands of Communist butchers - already known as such - by Britain and the USA at Yalta. In his memoirs, Churchill says that he passed a slip of paper to Stalin, whom he had characterized previously as a bloody criminal, with the following proposal: "You give me Greece and Romania will be yours." He disposed of Romania as if it were his private possession. Roosevelt went along with him as they committed their nations to handing over whole countries to God-hating rulers. Hundreds of thousands of innocents died as a result. My country has been ruined.

Until Vatican 2, the papacy was the only large religious body that took an anti-Communist stance and defended the persecuted. After Vatican 2, they gave up their crusade. Meanwhile, the World Council of Churches for thirty years has harshly criticized the western world while covering up the atrocities taking place in the East. It has vigorously supported liberation theology, which means liberation from capitalism but never from the injustices of Communism. The great Protestant bodies, such as Lutheran and Reformed World Federation, followed suit. During the worst years of terror, Romania was visited by bishops, pastors and renowned evangelists. Not one said a word in defense of the sufferers.

I was reminded of the fact that in 1935, when Hitler ruled Germany, the Baptist World Alliance chose Berlin as the location for its world congress. Hitler's program to exterminate the Jews was known. While the delegates quoted Bible verses written by Jews about the Jew Jesus and spoke about His sufferings, not one word of compassion or solidarity was spoken on behalf of the German Jews threatened with mass murder. There was only one American Jewish Christian among the delegates, a Mr. Gartenhaus, but he was not allowed to speak from the rostrum.

On one occasion, I read the report of an Anglican bishop in his diocesan bulletin about his visit to Romania. He wrote glowingly about the many lavish breakfasts (wrongly so-called, because they broke no fasts), luncheons, and dinners, but said nothing about the Christians starving in jail.

Today foreign church leaders are certainly welcome in Romania, but it would be appropriate for them to express some word of repentance. They might also publicly acknowledge that during the years of terror not one denomination had budgeted so much as one pound for the families of Christian martyrs, who never received one parcel of food from abroad. On the other hand, through the World Council of Churches, many denominations have given money to Communist guerrillas in Africa who, when they came to power, imprisoned and killed Christians. Mozambique and Angola are prime examples. Again, no money ever went to families of prisoners.

TEACH, BUT ALSO LEARN

Something else needs to be said about the relationship of the West with Romanian churches (and also for other countries of the former eastern bloc).

Western Christians can afford the luxury of expensive journeys to teach others. Why then don't they invite Romanian or Russian Christians to evangelize in the West? Why, at large evangelistic congresses, are only well-fed, affluent western evangelists the key speakers? It was not so in the early church. There, men like Paul shared the mysteries of Christ learned while in chains.

Hands that have worn chains can give blessings and should be awarded this privilege. In the first centuries, the church in Rome was heeded by others because it had given the most martyrs.

One more detail: in Romanian evangelical

p119 From Suffering To Triumph

churches women use no makeup and wear no jewelry. Believers who do so are not accepted as church members. Smoking and drinking are strictly forbidden. American evangelists who wear rings and whose wives use lipstick are not acceptable. It is helpful to know this.

THE DUTY TO HOWL

Many western preachers have had the advantage of a theological education, which can be very profitable. Many of the Romanian preachers, as well as Russian, Bulgarian, etc., have not been in seminaries but in dark cells, hungry, beaten, and suffering with the cold.

I cannot explain why, but in certain cells in utter cold and darkness, prisoners could not refrain from howling. God says, "I will howl for Moab" (JER 48:31). Before being in such a cell, I had never imagined how terrible is God's pain for sinners. It makes Him howl. I now knew another aspect of God: a God who howls. This is also a revelation about Him.

It can be learned best from those who have been through this school. They have fulfilled an amazing commandment from God: "Howl for Babylon." Howl for the worst enemy of your people. We howled in these cells for our Communist torturers, knowing that if we did so, "they may be healed" (JER 51:8). We consider it important that a minister should be trained in homiletics, dogmatics, Greek, Hebrew, and church history. The West can give us teachers for these. But ministers must also be prepared for howling, for being men who feel they will die if souls are not saved.

p120 From Suffering To Triumph

The prophet Joel says, "Howl, all you who minister before the altar" (JOE 1:13). Preachers should imitate Micah, who at a given moment made the decision, "I will wail and howl" (MIC 1:8), not, "I will preach according to the rules of rhetoric."

Perhaps eastern preachers can teach the West how to weep when you have been stabbed with the knife of treason, how to bear the burden of suffering for the honor and good of the holy church. They will add that the great suffering is not produced by lost battles (no warrior can win them all) or by physical wounds, but by brothers and sisters who do not take up a cross and fight the good fight, who renounce the holy dream. They will teach us to smile not only when comforted by friends, with lilies strewn in their path, but also when surrounded by enemies, with nails driven into their bodies.

A HEAVENLY SMILE

Speaking of smiles, let me write about one fellow-prisoner whom I did not meet again on Romanian soil because he is now in a better land.

We usually imagine the saints as being in a heaven far away. The Bible tells us in HEB 12:1 that they surround us. They continue to be interested in all they left behind and participate in the fight. They inspire us in the very strict sense of the word.

It is said about a disciple of John Chrysostom, the greatest preacher Christianity has ever had, that he peered into the room where his master was preparing a sermon and saw two unknown beings whispering something in his ears. Curious, he asked about them and received this reply: "It was wrong of you to peek, but since you did. I will tell you. These were the apostles Paul and John, who sometimes suggest what I should preach about."

This story might be legend, but the fact remains that we are in the communion of the saints of all times. It is good for those who visit Romania not only to look around to see living saints, but also to look up and through the spirit get a glimpse of those in glory who surround them.

I remembered Milan Haimovici, a Hebrew Christian pastor who spent seven years in jail. Even enemies of both Jews and the gospel admired his courage. He would protest against any injustice on the part of the wardens though he knew that for this he would be savagely beaten.

Once I was in a large cell holding perhaps a hundred prisoners. We were crammed together in utter misery with no room to walk even a few steps. We were overcome with the dirt and the stench. At night it was impossible to sleep because there were always three or four who snored, each on a different melody. When they stopped, others started. Some coughed, some sneezed, some quarreled.

In these close quarters were Christians of many denominations, Jews, atheists, men of all political parties and social categories. Among them was Milan, who witnessed for Jesus. He had no Bible and had seen no book for many years. He could advance no intellectual arguments. He could only say repeatedly, "I know Jesus. Walk and talk with Him."

A professor, member of the Royal Academy of Sciences, scoffed: "Jesus has been dead for two thousand years. How can you talk with Him? Even admitting that He was resurrected, as you Christians believe, and went to heaven, this heaven is millions of miles away. Don't tell us any more lies. No one can walk and talk with Him."

Milan simply repeated, "I wonder myself how it can happen and have no real explanation, but it is a fact. He walks and talks with me." A great circle of prisoners listened to the discussion. Continuing, Milan asserted, "I even see Him sometimes."

This was too much for a man of science. "What you say is the greatest lie I have heard in all my life.

Since you claim you see Him, can you please tell us how He looks at you: angry, wrathful, bored, indifferent, polite, interested, loving? Does He perhaps also smile at you?"

Milan replied, "How did you guess that? Really, He sometimes smiles at me."

"Well, well," said the professor. "You are lucky I am not a psychiatrist, or I would diagnose you as having religious mania. Perhaps you can show us how Jesus smiles."

"I will gladly try," said Milan.

The scene that followed was the most beautiful in the eighty-one years of my life. Like all the rest of us, Milan resembled a scarecrow. Shorn, dirty, with dark circles around his eyes; only skin and bones, with teeth missing, and in a zebra uniform, he was anything but attractive. But when he received this challenge, his face began to shine – the glory of God can shine through a thick crust of dirt – and a beautiful smile appeared on his lips. Romeo must have looked like this when he smiled at Juliet.

There was a touch of sadness in the smile because of the lost condition of his questioner's soul. But one could read on his lips a passionate love, an unquenchable longing, a sure hope and an ardent desire of a lover to receive the kiss of the beloved. All the splendor of heaven was in this magnificent smile. (An ugly thought passed through my mind on seeing this smile: the definition of the word "kiss" in a Russian dictionary – "the mutual touch of two pairs of lips with reciprocal transmission of microbes and carbon dioxide." Who can avoid such wrong thoughts at a sublime moment?) The atheist professor bowed his head and said, "Sir, you have seen Jesus."

When I became a Christian, I was advised to read every day a page from the Bible and the life of a saint, a martyr, or a renowned missionary, which I do. But before I was in jail, I read the lives of saints with skepticism. The writers always seemed to exaggerate. I knew the story of the charming and convincing smile of Bernadette de Soubiroux of Lourdes. I had known several Christians on earth who had heavenly smiles (one of whom is my wife Sabina). But now I saw such smiles in conditions of utter suffering.

I have seen them many times, in many jails. Sometimes I have difficulty remembering the circumstances. All the great smilers became one for me, fusing into the smile of Jesus. Saints bring the smile of heaven into the deepest valleys of the shadow of death. Men with such a smile do not die. They surround us after death as well, encouraging and helping us. Romania has just such a cloud of witnesses above it. This too is a Romanian reality. A Christian who goes to such a place must look for it.

A renowned church leader told me that he had visited Lenin's tomb in Moscow and had seen his mummy. I asked him if he had perceived the presence of some other dead person in Russia. He had not. But Paul says in HEB 13:1 that he had seen cloud of God's witnesses from thousands of years before.

KILLED FOR DISTRIBUTING BIBLES

Milan Haimovici is one of many martyrs who beautify the sky over Romania. I am very much attached to some of them because in a certain sense I played a role in their dying under tragic circumstances.

We know the names of four Romanian Christians who had to die for the crime of distributing Bibles they had received from us through underground channels. Clipa was caught and badly tortured to reveal how he obtained and distributed the Bibles. Then he was found hanged. No one really knows how he died. Did the Communists hang him? Did he commit suicide, like many others in Communist China, fearing he might weaken and betray when subjected to further torture? Another Bible distributor, Bogdam, was also found hanged. Tudose was found electrocuted. Pastor Radu Cruceru died of a staged automobile accident, a method of killing much practiced by the Communists.

If we and others from abroad had not smuggled in Bibles, these persons would have lived. We bear a responsibility that their wives are widows and their children orphans. Every Christian who contributes to such a work should know that someone at the receiving end might give blood in the cause for which we in the free world give money.

Some do this underground work in Communist and Muslim countries without pangs of conscience. But I know directors, personnel, and supporters of our mission who are very conscious of the risks and suffer because of it. They feel it is not enough to give money and send Bibles; we must share with those in Communist countries the pain, the tears, and the sorrows of the distributors and their families. Some dear saints in the West have broken down mentally under this burden. It gives me many sleepless nights. Couriers of our mission have been killed in China, too. And some were imprisoned for many years under the appalling conditions of Communist jails, among them the translator of my book ~Tortured for Christ~ into the Amharic language of Ethiopia.

DON'T GIVE MONEY EASILY

I was scheduled to preach at a large meeting in Norway that was called for the special purpose of gathering money for Ukrainian Bibles. The mission counted on my presence to be an encouragement to others to give more.

I told the crowd the story of Nikolai Hmara, a Soviet Christian who had died for Christ after having his tongue cut off and his eyes gouged out, and I ended by saying, "Don't be quick to give. You might be punished by God for having given money to print Ukrainian Bibles. Some will believe so devoutly that the Bible you donate is the word of God that they will be ready to endure prison, torture and death for sharing it. Your Bibles will be read in the Soviet Ukraine, where those who read the word will follow its command and renounce everything for the sake of the kingdom. Some will prefer

p126 From Suffering To Triumph

Jesus to wife, mother, and children, and will fulfill dangerous tasks in the underground church, such as working in secret print shops or running forbidden Sunday schools. If they are caught, their wives might remain widows and their children orphans, who may later accuse their father of putting religion above duty to provide daily bread for the family.

"The Bible you donate might inspire someone else to become a Nikolai Hmara. You will answer to God for having given this money if your life does not show that you yourself obey the Bible as the word of God, if you do not lead a life of intimacy with Jesus, following Him on the way of the cross, of prayer and praise and self-sacrifice.

"lf you do not intend to commit yourselves wholeheartedly to Jesus, it is best for you not to give. Please forego giving."

It remains for the reader of these lines to guess whether the offering on that evening was large or small.

I constantly hear the cries of those suffering in Communist countries because they desire the spreading of the gospel and relief for their abandoned families. This spurs me on when I feel my age and feel tempted to give up. But Bishop Meshkala died in Albania at the age of eighty-four after forty-three years in jail! He was not too old to suffer for Christ and never gave up. Should I give up my fight under entirely different circumstances?

Some, after reading this book, might feel like giving money for the cause of Christians in Communist countries or in those only recently liberated. Giving will oblige you to have fellowship with them in their

p127 From Suffering To Triumph

heavy tribulations. Think carefully about what you intend to do.

LOVING THE ENEMY

Every place I visited in Romania brought back other memories to my mind.

In Bucharest, I preached in the Dragosh Voda Brethren church. This building had been used before by my church in its peregrinations from one place to another under different dictatorships.

It was immediately after the invasion of Romania by Soviet troops toward the end of the Second World War. Whole units of the German army that had occupied our country were taken captive. They had no illusions. Slavery in Siberia would be their lot. For many it would mean death. While a large group of German prisoners of war were being led to their barracks. two officers succeeded in escaping from the surveillance of the escort. Still wearing their Nazi uniforms, they wandered trembling through the streets of Bucharest. The one thing that shielded them was the night. We were still at war, and the streets were only very dimly lit.

All at once they spotted a ray of hope: a sign saying "Lutheran Chapel." They knew the Lutherans of Romania to be of German extraction. Here someone would help them. What a disappointment awaited them when they heard that we were Jewish! Jews had more reason to hate the German soldiers than even the Soviets did.

I quieted their fears. "We are Jews, but also Christians and give no one into the hands of their enemies. There is a story about a lamb led to slaughter that fled and ran to Moses, asking him to protect it. He replied, "I cannot do so. God has ordained that your meat should serve as food for men," and he handed the lamb to the butcher. A Jewish writing says that God hid His face for shame at what a man who bore His name could do.

"We have suffered under the German occupation. But you personally may not be guilty. In any case, we are not your judges. You are welcome in our home. We will also give you civilian clothes so that you can try to make your way to Germany."

We were then under a decree forbidding anyone to hide a German soldier under pain of death. In time this developed into a systematic work of helping persecuted Germans just as, during the war, we had used our influence in Christian circles to help persecuted Jews.

The believers in the Brethren church where I was now asked to preach knew all this. They knew that I meant it when I spoke about forgiving those who have abused you, even the God-hating Communists.

So I traveled from one place to another in Bucharest and then to different cities and towns, reliving events of the past.

REVISITING PLACES WHERE I SINNED

I not only saw places that held pleasant or sacred memories, but also places where I had gravely sinned.

I saw once again the homes in which my family had lived when I was young. I had been very evil towards a mother who had sacrificed herself for her orphaned children.

Here was the quarter called - I don't know why - "The Stone Cross." It was a place of prostitution. "Friends" led me here when I was twelve. No Christian stood before the ill-famed house warning youngsters not to enter. The first time I saw the half-naked women, I fled. Not so the second time. I saw again the places where I had taken advantage of other women. I saw gambling houses that I had frequented, places where I had met with other blasphemers and mocked God, places where I had failed and sinned even as a Christian and then a pastor.

I had confessed this whole life of sin and believed that Christ had forgiven everything. Paul wrote that he pressed forward, forgetting those things that were behind him. But he, too, could not forget his whole past. He tells us about it. Neither could I forget it all.

In Romania I thought, too, of all the shortcomings and grave sins committed during the quarter of a century lived abroad.

How happy I was that "there is a fountain filled with blood drawn from Emmanuel's veins" and that if one plunged into this fountain, a great miracle takes place. Not only are sins (even crimes) forgiven, but also they become white as snow. They become visible tokens of actual purity. What happens to them is beyond description. Jesus was made sin. One of the purposes was to show what beauties can be made of sins through repentance, as a potter can make a luxurious vase out of what had been mud.

However, like the pieces of pottery or like metal that has to be refined, we must pass through the fires of affliction. This cleansing process lasts until all impurity has disappeared, which in our case means until all complaining, all rebellion, all pestering God with the question "Why?," all selfishness, pride, and an unreadiness to forgive have disappeared.

A little girl watched a goldsmith hold the costly metal in a jar for purifying. Repeatedly he took out the slack and the metal shone more and more beautifully. The girl asked, "How long does this go on?" He said, "Have patience." The goldsmith had to repeat the words often as he waited for the moment called "the silver look," when he saw his image in the metal.

This is how the heavenly Goldsmith works. A sinner who has passed through His purification has a beauty he never had before, the beauty of Christ Himself.

ENCOUNTER WITH A TOP SOVIET OFFICIAL

For twenty-five years I have played in the world the role of Tychicus (EPH 6:21), who during Paul's day made known to the brethren how the persecuted were doing. While in Romania, I had the opposite role: to tell how the church in the free world is faring, as well as how we worked for the persecuted while they were under the yoke of Communism.

Romanian Christians were aware of the fact that Bibles and other books entered their country, along with financial aid and radio broadcasts, but they did not know about the vast organizations that were behind all this and about the thousands upon thousands of fellow believers who gave sacrificially and prayed for them. They were most interested in our Christian Mission to the Communist World and its work in over forty countries. I told them not only about the relief work for the persecuted but also about our missionary endeavors among their persecutors.

p131 From Suffering To Triumph

I will mention here just one of my most interesting experiences in this area.

In Switzerland, another brother and I visited a world industrial exhibition. The most beautiful section was the Soviet department, the only one to add a fashion show, which attracted thousands, and a religious exhibit which was very well put together.

At the entrance was a huge picture of Billy Graham preaching in Moscow, of the Patriarchy, and of the one single synagogue in Moscow (a city with 200,000 Jews), of a mosque, and so on. The obvious aim was to reveal the perfect religious freedom that exists under Communism.

An album was prepared for each visitor to register his impressions.

I wrote the following: "I congratulate you for this unique idea to ornament an industrial exposition with words and pictures about religion. If there were no God, there would be no human mind and no industry. Everything you show is well arranged, but as a friend of the USSR, I would suggest that you enrich this exposition with other valorous pictures: that of Nikolai Hmara, a Baptist who, because of his faith, had his tongue cut off and his eyes gouged out. I can provide you with the picture of his corpse. The picture of Nikolai Hrapov would fit well, too. He spent thirty-four years in jail for his faith. Also that of Vania Moiseev, stabbed seven times in the region of his heart and then drowned," and so on and on.

A gentleman I believed to be from the Soviet staff read what I wrote and said, "There is a wicked man by the name of Wurmbrand who spreads such slander sbout us." After I told him I was that very same Wurmbrand, we spoke with each other for four hours. He was the head of the Foreign Department of their Ministry of Cults, a top man of the Soviet government on religious matters. He spoke fluent English and German. He had read all my books as well as other publications of our mission.

He started in a bellicose manner by saying there is no persecution. I answered, "It would be useless to contradict you, because you are obliged to speak thus. Let us rather pass to something much more important.

"A day will come when you will no longer be a man in high position in the Communist Party and government, and I will no longer be a pastor. We will both die. For a short time someone who loves us will weep at our grave. Then those who knew us will die too, and we will lie in a forgotten grave.

"What happens after that? If at this point everything is ended, then it is stupid to be a Christian pastor and just as stupid to be an atheist opponent of religion. The best course is to eat. drink, and have some amusement; nothing more. In my homeland of Romania, there was a custom in the olden days to give a person sentenced to death a good meal with all his favorite dishes before his execution. The accused ate and drank well, and then he was shot. If everything ends with death, the most beautiful life that Communism or capitalism can provide is no more than a henchman's meal. It would not be worth while to fight for any cause."

He listened without interrupting.

I told him that in my youth I was meditative and inclined to melancholy. I had had a bitter childhood, without any such childish pleasures as toys or chocolate. When other children in school ate chocolate,

I would lick the wrapping paper because it smelled good.

"I was sure that a God could not exist. If he did, he would have given me a nicer childhood. But for some reason I liked to take lonely walks through cemeteries and read the inscriptions on gravestones. I do so even now. It makes for highly interesting reading. This person had been a general, and he died. Another was a renowned poet. and he died. Another was a banker, another a beggar. But the end of life was death.

"On every gravestone there were two figures, the year of birth and the year of death, with a stroke in between. This is the sign that nature draws over every life: a stroke. Thus life is annulled. Without knowing a thing about any religion, I said to myself at that time, 'I wish to find Someone who can give youth without old age and life without death.' It took me a long time, but I finally found this Someone."

He continued to absorb my words without interruption. He had a soul hungry for God. I told him how I had prayed the prayer of an atheist: "God, I know for sure you don't exist. But if you exist - and this I contest - it is not my duty to believe in you. It is your duty to reveal yourself to me. I regret that you do not exist. I could have wished that somewhere in this universe there should beat a heart of love. I speak as a madman to the nonexistent. Well, that is all."

I went on: "This prayer was accepted. God sent a carpenter my way, who told my wife and me the story of the Carpenter of Nazareth who lived and died for us and was resurrected."

p134 From Suffering To Triumph

He asked question after question. At the end of four hours, he said, "I must admit there are two problems to which we Marxists have no answers. First, how is it that something exists? We explain everything by evolution, but how come evolution exists and that the first living cell existed from which all animals, the monkey, and man came into being? Secondly, what happens to man after death? We have no answers; you have. Therefore you are strong and we are weak."

Later he played a role in liberalizing the Soviet policy towards religion, which in turn had an effect on Romania and the other Eastern European countries.

Our mission sees to it that specific Christian literature for Communists, such as my books ~Answer to Moscow's Bible~ and ~Marx - Prophet of Darkness~, gets into their hands and those of their leaders, with amazing results. These books have been translated into many languages and distributed in Romania, Russia, China, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Ethiopia, Mozambique, and Angola, among others. The professor of atheism at the highest school of the Romanian Communist Party was converted through their ministry, along with many others in a number of Communist countries.

A COUNTRY REDUCED TO POVERTY

Back in Bucharest I was driven around and I also walked the streets, but it was no more the same city. In times past it had been called "the Paris of the East" because of its beauty, but it had long since foregone its proud boast. The impression was one of hopelessness.

p135 From Suffering To Triumph

Grand avenues such as grace the largest western cities lie unfinished; they end in nothing. Ceaushescu had the sickness of gigantomania. All his enterprises were to be unsurpassed in greatness, but he could never finish what he began. Most houses are decayed. They were in ruins before the windows were put in. You can see the results of the ravaging earthquakes of the recent past, but also of the bloody unrest. Facades are blackened by fire, and in the walls are bullet holes.

The shops are empty. Long lines of people wait for hours in the hope, often vain, that there will be something to buy. The queues for bread begin at four in the morning. By seven there is no more bread. The black market flourishes. There you can buy strawberries, furs and shirts, or suspect alcoholic beverages made with chemicals that have killed many people.

Small children beg. Crime is rampant. Tourists are advised not to walk at night carrying money. The economy is in a coma and the populace lacks even basic necessities. Skyrocketing unemployment seems unavoidable. The USA and the European community have stopped giving aid because Communists are still in power. The present regime is unhappy, but the rulers continue to live well. In fact, Ceaushescu would be pleased with his successor, who has also killed innocents, just like his predecessor.

Although Communists are still in power in Romania, they are politically bankrupt, reduced to the level of a theatrical prop, just as in Russia.

THE DANGER OF COMMENTARIES

God declared "I am what I am, not what men believe me to be." He is the entirely Other. We cannot fathom His ways.

Innumerable books have been written explaining how biblical prophecies correspond to current events. Many books were full of predictions about how the Communist colossus in the north, Russia, would attack Israel. Then the much-dreaded Battle of Armageddon would ensue, along with the reign of the Antichrist.

Some said that Kissinger was the Antichrist. Before these, others had offered biblical proof that Stalin, Hitler, and Mussolini were the Antichrist. Now a book denounces Gorbachev as this enigmatic person, especially since he is marked with an indisputable sign: a red spot on his forehead.

To one such writer I said, "Every book on prophecy written till now has proved to be false after twenty years." He did not mind.

When my twelve-year-old grandson Alex was with me at a Christian booksellers' convention recently, he saw a great deal of advertising for Bible commentaries. "What's a commentary?" he asked. I responded that there are many things in the Bible that are difficult to understand, for example, predictions of doom and great suffering that will arise in the latter days. These are explained in the commentaries.

His reply was, "Such predictions should not be explained but contradicted. Abraham did not write a commentary on God's prediction that Sodom would be destroyed, nor did Moses on the prediction that God would destroy the Jewish people. Instead, they pleaded with God that it should not take place, and they changed His mind. Why shouldn't we do the same instead of writing commentaries?"

THE POWER TO OVERTURN COMMUNISM

God is not bound by what men - who are not commissioned to write or speak in His name - say. He has destroyed a great deal of the power of Communism and will destroy the rest, not through political events, but through the prayers of the saints and the power of the Word distributed under duress.

He altered the mind of Gorbachev and many of his comrades. They in turn destroyed the power of Communism as no bombs or political action could have done. No plagues from above were needed. Men can forestall tribulations even if predicted in the Bible. God foretold Nineveh's destruction but then relented from this decision. His love is more reliable than any word spoken or written in His name.

When God has shed His love in our hearts, we have enormous power. We can affect God. ZEP 3:17 says that we can make God rejoice with singing. Our burning love can change men, too. They can be consciously won by it. Others will be confused by the rays of our spirit and will lose the capacity to oppose us. The sun shines on some and gives them life; it burns others. So love is always effective regardless of whom it touches. Humans do not realize what enormous power they possess. It extends not only to the whole earth but also to the cosmos.

Daniel 8 [DAN 8] tells about a king who cast down some of the host of heaven, exalted himself as high as the Prince of hosts, and cast truth down to the earth. A very great power of evil can exist in a man. But at least this much power exists in good and saintly men and women.

The church of Christ can finish with Communism, with fanatical Islam, with the darkness of heathenism, with a Judaism without the King of the Jews.

I have many more things to say about my visits to Romania after twenty-five years of enforced exile. But I will permit myself to imitate Paul when he said, "Time would fail me to tell of Gideon and Barak and Samson and Jephthah, also of David and Samuel and the prophets" (HEB 11:32).

STRANGE COMMUNION SERVICES

Pastor Vasile Vadan's church in Bistritza was destroyed with bulldozers. Treacherous official Baptist leaders connived in this act. In a heavy frost, he gave Communion to his flock on the ruins. The surface of the wine was frozen. After preaching in the open, he fell gravely ill of pneumonia, but that did not prevent the Communists from putting him in jail.

Many Communion services in Romania have been strange. In home churches there would be bread and wine on the table, but also a pot of tea and biscuits in reserve. When a guest (a person known as a Christian but suspected as an informer) appeared unexpectedly, the wine would disappear from the table in a second. The pot of tea and biscuits gave the impression that the meeting was just a social gathering.

In jail there were times when we had no bread and certainly no wine. We took Communion with nothing, remembering how precious a thing "nothing" was. The world was created out of nothing. The earth is suspended on nothing. Paul wrote that he was nothing. We learned to appreciate the value of nothing.

p139 From Suffering To Triumph

To write about all the beautiful things that can be said about Romania today and its church would fill a large volume. But I would like to say a few words about what our Christian Mission to the Communist World is doing in other parts of the world.

A GREAT COMMUNIST STRATEGEM

When I left Romania, I thought that I would work only for my own country, but then the Rev. Stuart Harris, director of the European Mission, offered me a larger sphere: the whole of Europe. However, Communism stretches to all continents. And so we enlarged our vision to include the whole Communist world, though I never forgot Romania. [When I say "we," I mean all the co-founders of our international mission: the Rev. Stuart Harris (UK); Myrus Knutson and Casus Styrdy (USA); J. Maris (Holland); Hans Braun (Germany); H. Zrcher and Hedi Fluri (Switzerland); Pat Henegan (S. Africa); Laiso (Italy); Colette Grarsu (France); Reg Werry

(Australia); and many, many others.]

We confront Communism as a whole, of which Romania is only a small part. The whole is affected by any one of the parts. What is happening in Communism today? We have seen great changes. Are they for real?

The changes in the USSR and Eastem Europe are real enough and concern politics, economics, even religion; all institutions that can be controlled. But there is no change in the attitude towards God or in the basic outlook on life. In his speech on the Seventieth Anniversary of the Bolshevik revolution, Gorbachev said, "We are moving towards a new world. the world of Communism. We shall never turn off that road." He repeated, with the same vigor, that he remains an atheist. If there is one thing we can learn from the Communists, it is consistency. They abide by their teachings.

At the end of the Second World War, the Communists were granted dominion over all of Eastern Europe, without firing a shot. Roosevelt and Churchill ceded them this hegemony at the Yalta conference because they promised free elections, which of course never occurred. They had won through deceit.

The bloody dictator Stalin, whom the Soviet press now accuses of having killed fifty million innocents, had made a tremendous impression on western rulers. After meeting him, an American diplomat commented, "His brown eyes are exceedingly wise and gentle. A child would like to sit on his lap and a dog would sidle up to him." Nothing has changed. After meeting Gorbachev, even a world-renowned evangelist praised his charm and his "warm eyes." But Gromyko, former president of the USSR, had recommended Gorbachev as successor with the words, "He can smile beautifully, but he also has steel teeth tor biting."

Marx said, "Religion is the opiate of the people," which means it must be countered as resolutely as drugs. Lenin wrote, "Thousands of epidemics and natural catastrophes are to be preferred to the slightest notion of a god." Marx wrote in his poem

p141 From Suffering To Triumph

"The Player" that "hellish vapors" filled his brain and that he "bought a sword from the Prince of Darkness." (Elements of satanic rituals.) Communism continues to brandish this sword against religion.

God-haters are also haters of mankind. In a letter to Engels on the 18th of June, 1882, Marx called mankind "a bunch of rascals" who can "kiss my [obscenity]." But miracle of miracles, the party he created, which never renounced its militant atheism, has now reopened hundreds of churches and closes its eyes to intense religious activity. Today there is mass evangelism, Sunday school for children, and charitable work - all totally proscribed a short time ago. There are even processions on the street in which these words are sung: "For the Czar [title of Russian emperors], for our country and faith." Bibles and other Christian literature continue to enter freely. We have 100,000 letters from the USSR alone, thanking us for the literature individually received.

Communism is far from being defeated, but it has received mortal wounds. The Berlin Wall and the Iron Curtain crumble!

Communists have killed millions of believers, and they were sure religion was dying. Now the church triumphs. It is Communism that struggles for survival in Eastern Europe. There is no human explanation for these events. Thanks be to God for working this miracle!

When we began our mission twenty-four years ago, anti-Communists thought that Communism could be defeated only through war. They said, "Only a dead Communist is a good Communist."

p142 From Suffering To Triumph

We came with a new message: just as Communists subvert the free world with their poisonous doctrine, let us subvert them with the Gospel. Let us work secretly to make Christ known. Let us help the underground churches. Though the Communists hate us, let us win them with love. Let us pray for them and bring them to Christ.

I ended my book ~Answer to Moscow's Bible~ by calling upon the Reds to repent and confess their crimes openly. The Soviet press now acknowledges that their Party has killed tens of millions of innocents, and Gorbachev has apologized to the Patriarch. Articles by atheist lecturers and officers of their Secret Police appear, acknowledging that they have lied to the people and shed innocent blood. Yet many Communists still stick to their ideology, modified by what they call "glasnost" and "perestroika."

GLASNOST AND PERESTROIKA

What is the secret behind these words? We fear it is another example of Communist deceit, a maneuver intended to lull the West to sleep. Terror could not uproot religion - the blood of the martyrs has always been the seed of the church - so the Communists are trying another approach.

In an article in ~Kommunist~, Lunacharsky, author of ~Socialism and Religion~, is quoted as predicting that persecution of religion would be counter-productive. (After seventy years of terror, 70% of adults are still believers.) He advocated that Communists create a "religion without God," a "religious atheism."

"Let the Christians believe," the argument runs.

p143 From Suffering To Triumph

"Communists will infiltrate Christian ranks, will befriend them, disguising themselves as having similar ideals on many points. They will attract Christians to common social actions and will influence them to keep only an external form of religion, while becoming basically as godless as ourselves."

The same situation took place in the Roman Empire during the fourth century, under Constantine the Great. Ten emperors had slaughtered Christians. Constantine did an about-face, gave them full liberty, and made Christianity a state religion. Under him every baby was baptized and declared a Christian. Thus Christianity seemed to triumph - but it ceased to be truly Christian. The church leadership increasingly became a tool of the emperors.

In the USSR, the Orthodox patriarch Pimen cabled to Gorbachev, "We express deep thankfulness for your attention to the needs of believers and for all you do to reestablish the Leninist norms." (Lenin's norms included the killing of millions of Christians and the destruction of churches.) Kharchev, then head of the Religious Council of the Soviet government, declared, "Religion is penetrating socialism, not on foot but on wheels. And since power belongs to the Party, it is up to us to steer those wheels in one direction or another, according to our interests."

Few Soviet Christians are aware that Gorbachev and his kin follow the same Constantinian road. He wants to give liberty to the church, but to a church that will not be really Christian. It will be an outreach of Communism just as it had been of the Czar. Yeltsin asserts he is converted, but in his government he has hard core Communists.

p144 From Suffering To Triumph

The media have created the impression that Communism has been overthrown and a Communist world no longer exists. If this is true, there is no need for our mission. On the contrary, Communism has full power over a third of mankind, including China (1.1 billion), the USSR (280 million), Vietnam, Laos. Cuba, Ethiopia, Angola, and Zimbabwe. In Eastern Europe, Communist governments have been overthrown, but not Communist domination over the minds of men. Marxism has filled the whole populace with fear. People feared to say what they thought, whether by phone, in the marketplace, or even in the privacy of their own homes. Everyone was forced to inform on everyone else, even on members of their own family. Priests had to report privileged confessions to the police. Letters were censored. It was dangerous to meet a foreigner. Spies of the Secret Police were everywhere.

Publicly, everyone was on the side of the Communists, who always got 99% of the vote because no one dared to vote on his convictions. But in reality everyone hated the government. Millions have passed through jail. Many died before gaining freedom. Their relatives well knew what took place in prison. Torture has been used throughout the whole history of mankind. It would seem that all methods of torture were already known.

But Communists are innovators. Knowing that few men volunteer to do the work of torturing and those they victimize are many, thus allowing much respite between torture sessions, they forced others into torturing. Not satisfied with squeezing out of the victims a denial of their convictions and a betrayal of the secrets of their organization, the Communists tortured them to the extreme until they consented to become torturers of their brethren in faith. The result was that a new prisoner, thinking he was in a cell with fellow-believers, was subjected to the worst ignominies, not by officers of the Secret Police, but by those he had trusted and worshiped with. He was together with them day and night, tortured without pause, until he too consented to become a torturer. Some became sadists for life, others went mad.

All nations under Communism have been traumatized: not only those of Eastern Europe, but also Mozambique, Laos, Mongolia, etc. It will take decades for them to recover. The best medicine is the Gospel. The work of our mission in providing these people with the word of God is needed now more than ever before. Neglect of our duty angers God. Fulfilling it will make Him rejoice with singing. Jesus said, "Take heed that no one deceives you" (MTT 24:4).

The warning is pertinent because Christians in the free world are in danger of being deceived by changes in the USSR. Apologists are saying, "Gorbachev is democratizing the country and extending liberty, so missions to the Communist world are no longer necessary." Lenin, founder of Communism and Gorbachev's avowed mentor. wrote: "Hundreds of epidemics and natural catastrophes are to be preferred to the slightest notion of God. Even flirting with a god is an unspeakable abomination." He also wrote: "The more representatives of the reactionary clergy are killed, the better." In their ~Communist Manifesto~, Marx and Engels wrote that the aim of Communism is "the abolition of all religion and all morals." Gorbachev calls himself a Communist and remains such even if, like Yeltsin, he ceases to be a member of the Party.

Let us not forget that Communists seized power in Russia under the name "Social Democrat Party Bolshevik)" and in Romania under the name "National Democratic Front." A change of name is not a change of heart. Stressing the point that Gorbachev is still a Communist and thus a God-hater, let us remember, too, that Castro, general secretary of the World Council of Churches, wrote in a letter to Gorbachev, "Christianity and Communism pursue the same aims."

WHY SO MUCH SUFFERING?

The one pain above all others endured by Romanians and inhabitants of other Communist countries is not knowing ~why~ they suffer such pain. The thought paralyzes the mind.

In the USSR, an estimated fifty million innocents were killed, another fifty million in China. No one knows how many were killed in Romania and other lands. One person was in prison for being a Jew, another for being an anti-Semite. Pastors were imprisoned for spreading religious propaganda, atheist lecturers for not having been effective in their anti-religious propaganda. Anti-Communists suffered next to convinced Communists who had fallen foul of their party about the interpretation of some tenet of Marxist teaching.

Communists used to condemn whole families if one member had done something amiss. I remember being imprisoned with a father and his four sons. His wife and daughters were in other cells.

p147 From Suffering To Triumph

Hungry and beaten prisoners renounced some of the few hours of sleep allotted them to discuss without end such questions as "Why did all this come upon us and upon the world?" "Is there a God?" "Where is God in all this? He is supposed to be all-powerful and loving. He could have kept these things from happening or could at least end them now. Why doesn't He?"

A Jewish prisoner went out of his mind. He constantly repeated one Hebrew word: ~Maduah~ - "why?" He said, "I could fill volumes with ~mah~ - (what) is happening, but no one can reply to the question ~moduah."

I never met even one sufferer who was satisfied with the explanation that all evil - Auschwitz, the Gulag, Piteshti, and so on - is due in the last resort to the fact that Adam and Eve ate the forbidden fruit. Their sin was inherited by their descendants down all generations. It even passed into nature. Lambs are eaten by wolves, little fish by bigger fish, and children are beaten to the blood by Communist torturers in the presence of their parents to make them confess - all because many thousands of years ago a couple ate some fruit. The original sin is to blame.

It might be because of the sinful nature inherited from Adam that his descendants in our generation cannot comprehend this explanation. Other explanations I heard in these marathon discussions over the years were: "There is no God and therefore no sense." "It is punishment for our own personal sins." "Suffering is not real, it is ~maya~. It belongs to a world of delusion." None satisfied.

One prisoner who had escaped from Nazi camps, in which he had lost almost his whole family, and

p148 From Suffering To Triumph

now suffered under Communism, shouted in despair at a certain moment, "Haven't I endured enough from the Nazis and the Reds? Why must I bear the torment of listening to your senseless explanations? Suffering is bad enough. Don't make it worse with explanations." Believers who know God personally should trust him without asking questions. Our minds cannot comprehend the ultimate answers.

The Jewish people, generally considered to be very intelligent, had Jesus in the flesh in their midst. He spoke to them in plain language, but they did not understand Him even when He spoke in very simple parables. The disciples themselves understood Him only in part, but they believed in the unintelligible Jesus. This is faith. It supplements reason, which can know only an infinitely small range of things in this huge universe. We still don't know what an atom is. The image of an atom provided by science changes every couple of years. How then can we understand God?

I learned something in this regard from my grandson Alex when he was eight. We had guests in our home who discussed higher mathematics in his presence. I did not know how to hint to them in a polite manner that they should change the subject because it was boring for a child. So I asked him, "Alex, do you understand what we're talking about? Do you know what logarithms are?"

He replied, "Yes, I do."

Amazed, I asked, "What are they?"

"Logarithms are things I will learn about when I'm in high school."

Like children in school, Jesus' disciples advance from the merely human to the divine. They are learners. One cannot learn in elementary school what is taught in universities. One day "I shall know even as also I am known" (1CO 13:12).

Of all the explanations in answer to the question, "Why so much suffering?" the most compelling is simply, "We don't know." One day God will be all in all, which means that He will be all in Richard Wurmbrand. There will be no questioner, no questioned, and no question. We will be one spirit. It will be a mini-incarnation.

Jesus said. "To him who overcomes I will grant to sit with me on my throne, even as I also overcame and sat down with my Father on his throne" (REV 3:21). Somewhere there is a throne from which universes are created and ruled. This will be my throne too. Today I have to learn patiently all I will need at the moment of enthronement. The knowledge of suffering is part of the curriculum. Jesus himself was made perfect through suffering.

Some theologians adopt a softer tone than the Bible, claiming that God only permits evil. But according to Isaiah, God said, "I make the good and create the evil" (ISA 45:7, as in the original).

A racehorse trainer not only constructs a course but also obstacles which the horse must overcome. This comparison may seem inadequate to us because we have to overcome terrible physical and psychological torture. When we meet Jesus at last, we will see that our sufferings were insignificant in comparison with what we have attained. Scars will be ornaments. The wounded will be enriched by what they lost. Those who were killed will have exuberant life.

p150 From Suffering To Triumph

Christians face not the ~problem~ of evil, but its ~challenge~. Problems depress, challenges spur us to activity. Christians in Romania see no possibility of solving problems, but they have learned to transcend them, to view them from heavenly places. For us, it was enough that the Communists tortured us. We decided not to add self-inflicted torments, such as philosophizing about the unknowable. Every torment was only a challenge to surmount the biggest obstacle: to win the tormentor through love.

David was our example. He wrote Psalm 9 [PSA 9] on the tragic death of one of his sons, as is indicated in the title. But he does not complain about God and his own fate. He says what he would have said at the birth of a son: "I will praise you, O Lord, with my whole heart."

The Bible tells us that in the beginning was ~Tohuwabohn~ - dark, formless chaos. God, the Spirit of love, worked on this, encountering resistance to create a kingdom of unspeakable beauty and truth. I adore the audacity of this enterprise, His persistence in the face of failure, and His readiness to sacrifice His dearest for the salvation of the children of chaos. Psalm 121 [PSA 121] tells us that from Him comes your help, not your sorrow.

THE LEGEND OF KISHAGOTAMI

In my visit to Romania, whenever I was confronted with questions about suffering, which were very often overwhelming, I told the old legend of Kishagotami, a young woman whose only baby had died and who could not bear to bury him. She went from one person to another asking how she could have him back alive.

p151 From Suffering To Triumph

One man told her, "Your only hope is the Savior. He has miraculous power like none other."

She brought her baby's body, knelt before the Lord, and begged. "Please resuscitate my child."

He replied, "Gladly, if only you will bring a little bit of salt to me."

Now, salt could easily be obtained, so she started to run. But he shouted after her. "The salt must be from a house in which no one has died."

"All right, all right!" she shouted back.

At every gate at which she knocked, she was gladly given salt. But when she asked if there had been a death in the family, she was always told, "I'm sorry, yes. My Father ... or my spouse ... or my child died."

She wept with everyone who gave such a reply, because now she knew what the sorrow of bereavement was. She comforted them and received comfort from the consolation she gave to others.

In the end she came to the Savior again and said, "Thank you for what you taught me. I will give back the body of my baby to the earth. Praise to you who give to my child and to all of us eternal life."

I have seen many a sad face illuminated when they heard Jesus' teaching.

"Why suffering?" is a wrong question. No right answer exists for wrong questions. Who can tell the melody of a peach? The question is wrong. Ask instead, "What good can I do with my sorrow? How can I use it to become more loving and more understanding towards others?" Sympathy will surely do them more good than theological explanations.

As for the rest, accept what Jesus said to Peter:

p152 From Suffering To Triumph

"What I am doing you do not understand now, but you will know after this."

WHY IS THERE CRUELTY IN THE BIBLE?

One more very troublesome question I often met in Romania was, "Why does God order so many horrors? He commanded Moses, Joshua, and others to exterminate whole populations, specifying each time that children and infants should be slaughtered, animals hamstrung, and trees felled. Such destruction surpasses even what Stalin and Ceaushescu have done."

I had heard these questions in the West, too, but rarely and not with such insistence as in my homeland. The many mass murders to which my nation was subjected made hearts more sensitive to such passages of Scripture. I am therefore against what is much practiced in the East nowadays: the indiscriminate distribution of Bibles to everyone we can reach. This was not originally God's intention. He gave to mankind a Bible and a church with wise teachers to explain it. Where there are no such teachers, it is preferable to give at first books explaining the main biblical messages.

But as I had to answer this difficult question, I preferred to give the simplest answer possible. In a sense, criminals decide what weapons the forces of law and order should use against them. Police don't use guns against pickpockets, because pick-pockets have no guns. But they do use guns against armed robbers. Some methods used in a just war might be considered inhumane if the same results could have been obtained otherwise. Against Nazi and Japanese aggressors who had tanks and bombers, tanks and bombers had to be used; otherwise evil would have been victorious.

God can evaluate evil in certain nations and social structures as we cannot. If wide-spread anti-American feelings in the West had not impeded the victory of the U.S. in Vietnam, Cambodia would not have become Communistic and its leader Pol Pot would not have killed two million innocents. God alone knows the whole of a person, including the genes that will determine a baby's character. Jesus says about some, "It would have been better if they had not been born." He calls others devils and has a right to treat them as devils deserve to be treated. His decisions and actions are not subject to our judgment. We have to submit to His.

Lenin, founder of Russian Communism, said, "If Kerensky (prime minister of Russia before the Communist takeover) had arrested in time two dozen leaders of our party, we would never have come to power." And millions of innocents would not have been killed and mankind would have been spared a seventy-year bloodbath. No doubt some crusader for human rights would then have criticized Kerensky for depriving Communists of their "right" to prepare evil.

Don't philosophize about the Bible, but enter into the holy nation of God's children. Flee from those who deserve God's wrath. But do be attentive. In the original text of the Bible, there are no punctuation marks. There is not one single full-stop or comma. Only in translations is there a full-stop after expressions such as "They killed" or "God killed." In Hebrew, it is "The Lord kills and makes alive" (1SM 2:6).

p154 From Suffering To Triumph

In heaven, we will meet many of those we thought were slaughtered. Alive and happy, they are thankful to God for elevating them from the level of pagan notions to that of children of God.

It is also good to know what the words "God said" mean in the Bible.

No one has seen the heavenly Father (except Moses, in one instance). When biblical authors (like today's believers) say, "God spoke to me," they mean an inner voice. We are composed of many parts. We have the conscious, the unconscious, different inclinations and impulses, even contradictory ones. All these can take, in our mind, the shape of voices that counsel and prompt us to action. Religious people call the voice that calls them to what they consider the noblest action the "voice of God." Sometimes they are right. But they can also be terribly mistaken. Ayatollah Khomeini, the Rev. Moon, Joseph Smith, founder of Mormonism - each was sure that what he said was "God's word."

Jesus is skeptical about some events in the Old Testament. The prophet Elijah caused fire to fall on the troop of a wicked king. Elijah was sure that his action fulfilled God's will. But when Jesus' disciples wanted to proceed in such a manner against those who opposed Him, confident that what Elijah had done was inspired by God, He chided them: "You don't know what manner of spirit you are of." The Old Testament prophets did not always act from the inspiration of God's spirit, though they believed they were.

Let us cherish Jesus' revelation: God is love.

THE TASK OF HEALING NATIONS

Communism is finished as a political institution

p155 From Suffering To Triumph

in almost all of the former satellite states of the USSR. But in Romania and Bulgaria, Communism still struggles to retain political power. Although it still does much harm, we can be sure that it is a rearguard fight; it is the despairing fight of a defeated enemy, the last writhing of a serpent before it dies. It will not survive in the Soviet Union either, except that Communism is more than a political institution. A Filipino who heard me speak twenty years ago in the Military Academy of Manila and who took part in armed fighting against Marxist guerrillas, reminded me that I said then something that made a lasting, because unexpected, impression on him: "There is a Communist rebel in each of us."

Marxist hatred of God is the most powerful expression of the human heart alienated from the Creator. It has always existed in fallen mankind in a latent form, but all societies tried to repress it. Communism lifted the lid. Marx wrote, "It is the evil side that makes history." I heard a Communist torturer say, "I thank God, in whose existence I don't believe, for making me live just at such a time when I can do all the evil I want without fear of punishment - yes, even with the assurance I'll be rewarded for it." This evil spirit has come out of the box under Communism, and the church will have to fight for many decades against Communism's poison in human hearts: hatred, envy, betrayal, lawlessness. (The Hebrew word ~Belial~ means etymologically "without yoke.")

In Romania, as in Bulgaria and Mongolia, the 1990 elections were free. After forty-five years of fierce terror, the Communists won great victories.

p156 From Suffering To Triumph

There were several serious reasons for this, which I have already mentioned. The opposition parties pleaded for friendship with the West. Romanians had been taught for decades that western governments were oppressors and exploiters and that their people went hungry. But the principal reason for the success of Communism lay elsewhere: who dared vote against the Party?

If Communism had fallen from power and the volumes of the Secret Police were opened, whole families would have been split apart because wives had denounced husbands; brides, bridegrooms; children, their parents; pastors and priests, members of their churches and vice versa. Even where the transition from Communism to a free society has been greatest, as in East Germany and Czechoslovakia, the archives of the Secret Police were not made public. If they were opened up to public scrutiny in Russia or Romania, these would cease to exist as nations. People would not be able to look into each other's eyes.

The pastor of a small Romanian Baptist church of only forty members confessed to me that he had been an informer of the Secret Police and that he knew five members who informed against him. I was in jail with an atheist who had had a quarrel with his bride. She told the police that he had expressed anti-Communist sentiments to her, and he received twenty years in prison.

Romania feels guilty. (In Nazi-occupied countries, there were also a significant number of collaborators, but the numbers were not so high as in Communist countries as the time-span was shorter.) Romania fears disclosure. Thousands voted for the

Communists they hated because they had been their accomplices. It is estimated that every tenth adult was an informer for at least a time. Our Orthodox synod called back Patriarch Theoctist, a bootlicker of Ceaushescu, when he retired after Ceaushescu's fall. The guilt had been collective, involving the priesthood as a whole.

When the final judgment is near, Satan will be released from his prison of a thousand years. Only he, restored to power, could cover up - men will hope - all the satanic deeds they themselves have done (REV 20:7).

All Romanian writers, almost without exception, had flattered Ceaushescu's pride, calling him "the greatest genius ever" and other such stupidities. Not one has admitted guilt. They all keep silent. The Romanian churches have an enormous task: to heal the nation.

GOD'S REMNANT

God has a remnant in Romania as He has in other Eastern European countries. Very many Christians died in the revolution of December 1989. Thanks to them. Ceaushescu has been overthrown. It was on Christmas Eve - a sign from God. The celebration of Christmas had been forbidden. But thousands of others are alive, and they have an amazing Christian spirit.

On the 13th of July, 1990, just a few days after so-called miners (in fact men of the former Communist Secret Police) had killed five, wounded hundreds, and arrested over one thousand peaceful demonstrators in Bucharest, there was another demonstration. Thousands marched with flowers in their hands, chanting a slogan that rhymes in Romanian: "You came to us with clubs and axes, but we come to you with flowers." The army sent out to quell the demonstrators was showered with flowers. The soldiers were overwhelmed. This time there were no bloody incidents. This was the first demonstration in which flowers were used against an oppressor, epitomizing Jesus' teaching: "Respond to evil with good."

Our mission had taught Romanians this for over twenty years through the written word and by radio. It was my message from the first day of my pastorate, at liberty and in jail, and it was what I preached in Romania on my return. It was Christ's triumph, but also the greatest personal satisfaction of my life.

And it has not remained the only one. The river Prut separates Romania as it is today from its province of Bessarabia, stolen by the Soviets and renamed the Moldavian Republic. On the fortieth anniversary of this tragic event, Romanians from both sides of the river turned it into a flowery carpet in a huge demonstration as people threw blossoms into the water. A people that has such a remnant will not perish. God will turn its mourning into feasting. Marx and Lenin, the deceivers, will be defeated by Jesus, the Truth.

But the true Romanian church, like that of other former Communist countries, needs your help. Give them Bibles and Christian literature. Give them Christian teaching by radio. Help the impoverished churches rebuild their prayer houses. Help former prisoners remake their lives. And help us bring Communists to Christ. If conquerors are not capable of converting the conquered, the conquests are not complete. The Allies conquered Germany in the First World War but did not convert the Germans to their ways of thinking. And so the stage was set for the Second World War.

Communists have lost decisive battles in Eastern Europe. If they are not won for Christ or at least for decent human behavior, the devil will be loose again in a very few years. We have to be on the alert. I certainly am. Many aged people live only on rehashing the past, which is nonproductive. I am only eighty-two. I still have a present as Christ's soldier and a great future in prospect. Come, fight with me.

Acknowledgments

Almost all the sayings of children recorded in this book have been gathered by myself at the very source - 'from the lips of children.' However, I acknowledge gratefully other sources, including Alfonse de Liguori's ~Life of Martyrs~ (for stories of children who died for Christ); the secretly printed magazines of the Soviet underground churches (for stories of prisoners' children); various Christian publications including ~Daily Bread~ and ~Portals of Prayer~, and a few foreign publications.

Some of these stories have appeared in several versions in various places. It has sometimes been impossible to find the original source.

Where I quote from children's own remarks, I have used only their words. I hope they will not insist on their copyright! Almost all the commentaries are my own.

A ship's captain took his six-year-old daughter with him on an ocean journey. A terrible storm arose, and the order was given for everybody to enter the lifeboats.

A maid came into the captain's cabin, where his little girl was sleeping, and woke her. 'Quick! Come with me! The ship is sinking.'

The girl asked, 'Where is my father?'

'The captain is at the helm.'

'Then,' said the girl calmly, 'I can go back to sleep. He will not let the ship sink when his child is on board.'

* * *

A child, standing on the ocean shore, waved to an ocean liner passing by, hailing the captain to take him on board. An adult watching him in amusement finally spoke. 'Don't be silly! You can hitchhike by car, but not by oceanliner!'

Undaunted, the boy continued to signal. Suddenly boat was lowered from the ship. Sailors came to the shore to pick the boy up. As they left he shouted back to the astonished observer, 'You see - I wasn't silly. I knew what I was doing. The captain of the ship is my father!'

May we have such childlike trust in our Captain!

Prologue

[illustration appears at this point in the book]

"Jesus is going to come back with his arms full of toys."

Today new theologies are sweeping, like weather fronts, across the globe: black theology, God-is-dead theology, feminist theology, liberation theology, and many more.

So why should we introduce yet another - 'children's theology'?

Jesus would surely have preferred it to some other human fabrications. In fact He endorsed it: 'I tell you the truth, unless you change and become like little children, you will never enter the kingdom of heaven' (MTT 18:3).

p012 ..... From the Lips of Children

To become like little children means to think as they do, and that is as true in theological matters as in any other. My grandson Alex (who at six years old was quite well read in the Scriptures) once said to me, 'The Bible is meant for children. Only the Children of Israel came out of slavery in Egypt; the grown-ups stayed behind. Only the Children of God enter heaven. It will be a country without any grown-ups!'

Little did he know how close he was to the truth!

Jesus' teaching that we must become like little children has been the subject of much thought and discussion both by theologians and by philosophers. What exactly does Jesus mean? Does He mean that we have to become less complicated, more humble, more open, more trusting? Perhaps He means we must be prepared to play? What precisely are the characteristics of children which we are to imitate?

The German philosopher, Karl Jaspers, commented: 'It is part of the very essence of man that he is a philosopher, and there is a wonderful confirmation of that in the questions that children ask. It is not unusual to hear, from their lips, profoundly philosophical statements.'

The psychologist Carl Jung went even further. He suggested that adults whose minds were troubled should play with toys, like children. He himself, he said, had found it to be a helpful spiritual exercise.

A little Turkish girl of four years old, called Ariel, told me, 'Jesus is going to come back with his arms full of toys. He will even bring a piano for me!'

If we have not 'become like little children,' to whom will Jesus give his playthings?

In the Bible it is written that 'a little child shall lead them (ISA 11:6). A child whose parents were divorced came across that verse and demanded, 'Then why don't they let us lead?

We would never have invented pubs, casinos or nuclear war. If we were the leaders, there would no spankings and no divorce.'

p013 ..... Prologue

Jesus tells us that we must be born again, and that suggests that we must return to the innocence and trustfulness of childhood. But it must be a genuine return. We must not be people who put on childlikeness to order, but people who are childlike by nature, having a spontaneous sense of dependency and an awareness that we need to be guided.

Children have a great advantage; their minds are not compartmentalized. They do not make a distinction between the concrete and the abstract. They have no need to pretend.

So their thoughts on theological matters are of special interest to us.

I have often been taken aback by the remarkable insights of the children I have known. For many years now I have been recording their questions and comments, observations and insights. Many are from my own family, from my son Mihai and my grandchildren Amelie and Alex.

My hope is that the incidents which are recounted in this book will help you to listen the more perceptively to the children in your own life, and enable you to recapture some of the unsophisticated candour and openness that belong uniquely to childhood.

It is said that the child is father to the man. Similarly, a child's intuitions about God may well help adults embrace true theology.

p015 ..... Beliefs

[illustration appears at this point in the book]

"It is cold outside. How are you?"

When he was five years old my son Mihai became dangerously ill. His life was threatened; he needed an emergency operation, a trepanning of the skull. This is a major operation, in which a piece of bone is removed to relieve pressure on the brain.

The night before the operation we called a number of fellow-believers to gather round his bed to pray for a successful outcome.

As I sat beside him I touched his body. It was burning with fever. I said to him, 'Tomorrow you are to have an operation, a dangerous one. It's possible that you will die.'

Mihai replied joyfully. 'Then I'll go to heaven! Angels must have splendid toys. An angel might teach me how to play the harp!'

p016 ..... From the Lips of Children

'Well, it's not that simple; you are a sinner.'

'But Father, didn't you tell me that Jesus' blood cleanses us from sin? I'm not worried - I will be in heaven.'

'Well, Mihai, these brothers and sisters have come to pray for your welfare. The Bible says that when someone is sick, the elders of the Church should be called and they should pray over him. Then he will recover. Do you believe that?'

'I believe everything the Bible says,' he answered simply.

One brother after another prayed. Then Mihai himself prayed: 'I thank you, God, that you are making me healthy now, and that I will soon be able to go with my father to the toy shop to buy a new toy.'

My hand still lay on his chest. As he prayed I felt the fever diminish markedly. When he had finished his brief prayer, I said to my wife 'Take his temperature. God's miracles are measured with the thermometer!'

Sure enough, Mihai's temperature had dropped. There was no need of any operation the next day. Instead, he played in the garden.

Several days later, I was able to take him to the toy shop. At that time, the Soviet army had just invaded Rumania, our homeland, and had shown a marked liking for alcohol. A great deal of drunkenness was in evidence.

When we entered the department store, a Soviet captain was there with a woman sergeant. They were attempting to make some purchases, but were handicapped by not knowing our language. On the other hand, the salesman could not speak Russian. I offered to translate for them.

Mihai repeatedly urged me to tell them about Christ. I too was waiting for the right moment.

After I had helped them in their spending spree sergeant said to me, 'You have been so kind to us.

p017 ..... Beliefs

Perhaps you could do me one more favour. I need some dresses. Where can I find them?' Now I knew she was at my mercy!

'I haven't the slightest idea about such matters - but may I invite the captain and you to come to our home for lunch? Afterwards, my wife will take you shopping.'

Mihai was delighted that we would have them in our home, where they could learn about the faith.' Buy them a bottle of wine,' he urged. 'Then they'll listen better. You know that all their soldiers are drunkards!'

Probably he had heard me quote Paul's words: 'To the Jews I became like a Jew, to win the Jews.... To the weak I became weak, to win the weak' (1CO 9:20,22). I smiled at his ingenuous suggestion; but I was indeed able to share with my guests the fruit of the True Vine, which gives life eternal.

Both officers were converted.

* * *

In the Soviet Union, Piotr, whose father was in prison for his faith, was interrogated at school by a police officer who had a hidden motive for his questions. Smiling and apparently sympathetic, the officer said, 'I really like your father, and I want him released. But I need more information about him. Tell me about your father.'

'Oh!' replied Piotr. 'He tells beautiful children's stories. When he speaks it's as if Jesus were present in the room. Only last Christmas he told us how Jesus was born in a manger, and how wise men came to worship Him. We should worship Him, too.'

The officer ignored this. 'Where was this gathering? Who was present? Who else spoke?'

The child sensed the danger. 'I can tell you the whole story just as my father told it. Beyond that I have nothing to say to you. You are not one of our people. I don't trust you.'

Many disasters have been caused in the Church by unveiling its mysteries to the profane, and by casting the pearls of the Kingdom before swine. It is important to cultivate a discerning spirit, such as Piotr had.

* * *

When young Alex arrived home from holiday with his parents, he went round the house kissing the front door, his pillow, and many other things, repeating 'This is my home.'

We should have that same spirit as we approach the heavenly Jerusalem, which is our everlasting home. Even though we may live very comfortably here, we are still pilgrims and strangers in this world.

A missionary came back to the United States after forty years of service in Africa, where he had endured many hardships. Sailing on the same ship was President Theodore Roosevelt, returning from an elephant-hunting safari.

A large crowd turned out to greet the president, but no one came to meet the missionary. He was feeling very sorry for himself. Then he was comforted by an inner voice that reminded him: 'The president has come home; you are not home yet.'

When we reach the heavenly Jerusalem, we too will impulsively kiss the door and threshold of our real home.

Here are some letters written to Basil Rishuk, imprisoned in the USSR for his Christian faith, by his children Andrew (ten years old), Gena (twelve), and Tanya (fourteen).

> I kiss you, dear Daddy, in the love of Christ. As I it is cold and unpleasant outside. How are you? How is your health? May the Lord shed in our hearts the peace and joy that Jesus gives, in spite of all the tempests. We will always trust only in Him. We believe that He will give us power for the fight, that He will help us to withstand the tempest.

> At home, everything is going well. We live in the hope of seeing you, but also of seeing the Lord, so that we may enter into eternal life, where no one will separate us.
> A hearty kiss.

Dear Daddy, I greet you in the love of our Lord Jesus Christ. Papa, we never forget you. We pray constantly to God for you. We pray for your health. We pray also for all prisoners, and trust that God will keep them.

Daddy, ask the prison commander to allow a personal visit, for it is a long time until the New Year and we all want to come to you. We have such a yearning for you!

Your loving son, Gena.

Dear Daddy, Christ has risen!

How are you? May the resurrected Lord illumine your camp, so that you may be joyous even in sorrow. When I hear hymns sung my heart shrinks and tears run, though I screw my eyes up as tight as I can. May we see each other soon. You are alone, and we are all together. But soon all will pass, and then you will be with

Be strong.

Your daughter, Tanya.

May we learn from such children to have a burning love for our imprisoned brothers and sisters in Christ.

A Methodist missionary in Africa told of a child who went to Sunday School and there heard the story of Abel sacrificing a lamb to God.

p020 ..... From the Lips of Children

The next day the child made an altar from a few stones out on the fields. On it, he placed a mutton chop. Then he prayed.

'O God, my Father, I have made You a sacrifice. I have only two pence, so I can't buy a lamb. If I owned any lambs I would give You one; but I only have this meat. Please, my Father, send fire down from heaven to consume it.'

God did touch the meat, though not with fire. Ants consumed it. Ants belong to God just as much as a flame of fire does.

May we have a child's readiness to follow the example of the saints of old, and bring sacrifices to God.

* * *

It might seem that the ultimate anguish is to lose a child through death.

It is not so. There is worse suffering.

In the village of Dubrovo in the Soviet Union, a family named Sloboda (the name means 'liberty' in Russian) had committed the crime of being Christians.

For that crime Mrs. Sloboda was jailed for four years. Her five children - Galia, Shura, Kolia, Liusa, Pavlik (the youngest five years old) - were taken away and placed in an atheistic children's camp.

This type of separation is more difficult to bear than that of death. Mrs. Sloboda never saw her children again. At the age of forty-nine she died in prison, as a result of torture. The children were only allowed to attend her burial. At her grave, they recited this prayer: 'Lord, our mother has died. Help us to be as righteous as she has been. Help us to give a witness such as she has given. Amen.'

And that was all. Unafraid of pain, they had decided to walk the way of martyrdom. Detention in the Communist camp had neither frightened nor 're-educated' them.

Accepting suffering for Christ's sake will be an essential part of children's theology, if they are provided with true Christian models.

In Communist Rumania, a Christian girl named Viorica was beaten harshly in school because she had invited her schoolmates to church. She fainted during the beating, and an ambulance had to take her to hospital.

Two days passed before she regained consciousness. When she did, the doctor at her bedside said, 'You poor girl, at last you have opened your eyes. All this time I have been thinking of the cruelty of the Director who beat you like this. My heart has been bitter with hatred. I wish

I could take revenge on him.'

Viorica smiled. 'There is no need to hate him. Jesus taught us to love everyone. Just before I opened my eyes, I saw Him and talked to Him. He asked me whether it still hurt. And He told me that in heaven I will receive a very beautiful crown, which is reserved only for those who have suffered for Him. He told me to pray for those who mistreated me, and to love them, because our influence will help them to give their lives to God and so become His children.'

According to children's theology, this is how a Christian should react to being flogged. Like their Saviour, they know how to love when abused, and how to forgive when persecuted.

* * *

Charles Spurgeon once said, 'A child of five, if properly instructed, can as truly believe and be regenerated as an adult.' This suggests that a child so instructed can have very valuable theological insights.

When he was a child Spurgeon's mother told him, 'Charles, your father and I have trained you in righteousness. We have taught you the Word of God. We have lived a godly life before you. If you do not live a godly life, we will stand before God in the day of judgement and bear witness against you.'

A friend once argued with the adult Spurgeon that children cannot really understand the gospel. Spurgeon took him to his Sunday School, where the gentleman asked one of the boys, 'What kind of a heart do you have?'

'A very good one, sir,' was the reply.

The man turned to Spurgeon. 'You see? He does not understand the ABC of the gospel. He does not realize that he is a sinner.'

Spurgeon asked the child, 'How do you know your heart is good?'

'Well,' he answered, 'I had an old heart, inherited from my ancestors who were sinners. But Jesus gave me a new heart. Jesus has no bad hearts to give! If He gave me a heart I am sure it is an excellent one.'

Heinrich Heine, the German Jewish-Christian poet who lived in the first part of the nineteenth century, wrote of his early yearnings for God:

As a little child I was already asking questions such as, Who is God? and, What does He look like? I could spend whole days looking up towards heaven and would be very sad in the evening because I had not seen the most holy face of God, but only grey, silly caricatures formed of clouds. I was totally confused by astronomical events, which were not concealed even from little children, and constantly marvelled that these thousand million stars were big,beautiful earth-balls like ours and that one single God ruled over each shining world.

I remember that once, in a dream, I saw God very high up and far away. He looked happily through a little window in heaven, with the face of a pious old man with a small Jewish beard, and scattered downward a multitude of seeds that blossomed as they fell from heaven, grew in the infinity of space, and enlarged until they became glittering, populated worlds, each as big as our earth.

I could never forget this vision. Several times I saw the happy old man, sowing the seeds of worlds from His small window in heaven. Once I heard Him click His tongue as our maid did when she threw barley to the chickens. 1

As an adult Heine mocked religion and the churches. He became the great friend of Karl Marx, the God-hater, and forgot this vision, which became a reality to him again only a short time before his death.

Those who are privileged to know God when they are children should strive to retain their tender images of Him, and not surrender them to pseudo-intellectualism. 'Remember your first love,' says Jesus. (If we fail to do so, the images of those early days may come back to haunt us at death.)

When she was four years old, Amelie was alone with my wife and me in the chapel of Campus Crusade in San Bernardino, California.

Suddenly, without any prompting, she stepped forward and said: 'Jesus, I am Yours.'

Since that time she has steadfastly resisted any calling to commit herself to Christ. 'I did so once,' she says. 'I am a child of God. I'm sure of it.'

If a child can be so sure that Christ has received her into His loving care, why should we ever doubt that He has accepted us, as our Saviour?

p024 ..... From the Lips of Children

Julieta was an aristocratic lady who lived during the reign of the fourth-century Roman emperor, the cruel Diocletian.

She was asked to bring a sacrifice to a heathen altar, but answered, 'I am a Christian. I am prepared to lose not only my property but even my life, rather than deny my God.'

Alexander, proconsul of Cilicia, ordered that Julieta's three-year-old child Quiricus be torn from her embrace and be flogged to a pulp.

The child saw his mother's agony and struggled to return to her. But he was held back by Alexander, who sat him on his knees and tried to kiss him. Punching and kicking, Quiricus freed himself from the tyrant and cried out, 'I too am a Christian!'

In a rage Alexander grabbed him and beat him to death. The ground was spattered with the boy's blood and brains. Julieta, who was herself being flogged, cried 'I give You thanks, O my God, because You have called my boy to Yourself before me.'

Would we have the courage to say, 'I too am a Christian,' if it meant 'I too am prepared to die under torture for Christ'?

A child did so.

* * *

St. Cyril, who was born at Caesarea, became a Christian while he was a child. In consequence he was ill-treated, and finally turned out of his home, by his idolatrous father.

Word of this reached the judge, who summoned Cyril to appear before him. He had been told that the child frequently called upon the name of Jesus. So he promised Cyril that he would work out a reconciliation between him and his father - on condition that he promised never to utter that name again.

The child answered: 'I am content to be turned out of my father's house, because I shall receive a more spacious mansion in heaven. Neither do I fear death; by dying, I shall obtain a better life.'

In order to frighten him the judge ordered him to be bound and had him led away, apparently to execution. But he secretly gave orders that the boy should not be harmed. The executioner brought Cyril to a blazing fire and threatened to throw him in. But Cyril was quite prepared to lose his life.

The executioner then brought him back to the judge, who said to him, 'My child, you saw the fire. Cease to be a Christian, so that you can go back to your father's house and inherit your estates.'

Cyril replied: 'I fear neither fire nor sword. But I long to have a dwelling more magnificent, and riches that will last longer, than my father's. God will accept me. So hasten to put me to death, so that I can quickly go to enjoy Him.'

Those standing by wept, to hear the child speak in this way.

'You must not weep,' said Cyril, 'but rather rejoice and encourage me in my suffering, so that I may come to have that house which I desire so passionately.'

He did not flinch from his position, and when death came he suffered it with joy.

* * *

In the sixteenth century there was a great persecution of Christians in Japan, under the Emperor Taicosoma.

At first, the officers whose responsibility it was to make up the list of Christians to be executed refused to include the name of little Louis. But the boy, who had been baptized only a few days earlier, cried and begged to have his name on the list. Eventually he was successful.

As he was led to his death, which was to be by crucifixion, his face radiated joyful confidence; and those who were watching were deeply moved.

The under-governor of Nagasaki presided over the execution. He was willing to release Louis, provided that he was prepared to renounce the Christian religion. But the child declared, 'On such a condition I do not want to live. If I die, I shall be losing this short and miserable life and gaining a happy and eternal one.'

When he saw the cross, upon which he was to be nailed, he ran to embrace it. The cross had always been an object very dear to him.

* * *

In another Japanese province, there was a further persecution of Christians a century later under King Canzugedono. Another little Louis was condemned to die, and his mother with him. His last words to her were 'My dear mother, I will not forget to call upon the name of Jesus as long as I am alive.'

They bound him to a small cross, opposite his mother and he continually repeated the sacred name. His executioner, in a fury, killed him with his lance.

Let us learn from such children to find, in the very name of Jesus, comfort in all suffering.

* * *

On that occasion, two more children were sentenced to death: Thomas, who was twelve years old, and Peter who was only six.

Their fathers were sentenced first. When Thomas heard that his father was to be a martyr, he longed so passionately for such a death for himself that when his own turn came he hastened to join him. Embracing his father, he said, 'I am going to die with you for the faith. We will go to heaven together.'

The executioner wanted to spare Thomas the horror of seeing his father being tortured, but the child cried out, 'I want to die with him!' They brought him near to where the bleeding body lay. There, his face radiant, he offered his his head to the executioner.

Little Peter also said, of his father, 'They will make me die with him because I am a Christian. And I am so glad!'

p027 ..... Beliefs

Arriving at the place of execution, he knelt readily. Seeing the executioner with his sword, he extended his neck, all the time clasping his hands in prayer.

The executioner was deeply moved, and he replaced his sword in its scabbard. 'I have no heart to kill this innocent lamb,' he protested. A second executioner did likewise, and so did a third. The child knelt patiently until a fourth executioner carried out the sentence.

* * *

Those who are now past childhood, but have learned to become like children, think as these young martyrs thought.

Madame Guyon was a seventeenth-century contemplative who was imprisoned for several years because of her beliefs. 'I claim for my dowry,' she wrote, 'only crosses, scourges, persecutions, ignominies, lowliness, and nothingness of self; which God, in His goodness and wise purposes, grants unto me.'

p028 ..... From the Lips of Children

[illustration appears at this point in the book]

"How can God think about me when He is busy with all the things He has to do in the world?"

Sometimes the thoughts of children explore unknown worlds.

'Do boys have boy angels, and girls have girl angels?' asked my granddaughter Amelie.

It was not a ridiculous question. Spiritual beings are not sexless. The 'great and wondrous sign' that John saw in his vision was no asexual being, but a woman (REV 12:1). Zechariah in his vision also saw women, some of them demonic (ZEC 5:7-9). The 'night creature' mentioned in ISA 34:14 (called, in Hebrew, ~Lilith~) is believed

p029 ..... Questions

in Jewish demonology to be the chief female wicked spirit.

* * *

Amelie asked her father, 'Why is it that your wishes are always the ones that have to be obeyed? The Constitution says that we have equal rights.'

It is a fair question. There is an answer to it. The Bible teaches great respect for one's parents. The only one of the Ten Commandments that promises a blessing is the fifth: 'Honour your father and your mother.' It is in the interest of children to be obedient: they get blessed.

Christian parents owe it to their children to give them this explanation. In fact, they should be ready to reply to any questions that their children ask, however uncomfortable.

For example, Amelie once asked, 'How was God the Father born? How did the whole thing begin? How did He come to be in heaven?'

The best answer is simply this: 'Whatever age we live to, we can only ever know a little. We must learn to accept that limitation, however old or young we may be.'

Moses warned, 'The secret things belong to the Lord our God: but the things revealed belong to us and to our children for ever' (DEU 29:29). And on the last evening, before His crucifixion, Jesus said to His disciples, 'I have much more to say to you, more than you can now bear' (JHN 16:12).

* * *

A question children often ask is, 'What does God look like?'

I have a simple answer: 'What does the image in a kaleidoscope look like?'

The image changes all the time.

p030 ..... From the Lips of Children

In the Bible, God is likened to many things: love, a consuming fire, a lion, a stone, a man of war, the Ancient of Days, and many more. Everything can be in His image, because He encompasses everything. He is all in all.

If a child responds to this by saying, 'I can't understand,' then you must reply 'Neither can I'! God is not to be understood but to be ardently loved. He is beyond anything that man can imagine. He is what He is, not what we fancy Him to be.

'How can God think about me,' asked a child, 'when He is busy with all the things that He has to do in the world?'

Yet even man, with all his cares and activity, still has time to think about sub-microscopic atoms, even tinier electrons, and beyond them, the most minuscule elementary subparticles. He makes hypotheses about particles which he can only visualize mathematically, and builds vast nuclear chambers to isolate them, to prove their existence, because they constitute the very life of mankind and the essence of his environment.

We may be just as minuscule in the scheme of things, but we are very important to God; we are part of His inner life. 'In Him we live and move and have our being' (ACT 17:28).

God is as interested in us as we are interested in every facet of our bodies. Our minds are a part of His consciousness. God also cares about the most minute details of His creatures' lives.

A small boy asked his mother, 'Did God remember that you liked curly hair when He planned me?'

The answer is, 'Yes, He did.'

Another child wanted to know, 'Why did God make people, when He had the stars and the flowers?'

The answer is that it was for the same reason that we appreciate having brains as well as kidneys, lungs and toes - for the same reason that a man is not satisfied with a 'Mona Lisa' or a 'Venus de Milo,' but prefers a woman who is alive, even though she may not possess an ideal beauty.

* * *

When I am out driving with my son and grandchildren, I often hear the familiar request, 'Grandpa, tell me a story.' And Amelie fastens the seat-belt, settles herself comfortably, and looks up at me expectantly.

On one occasion I decided to tell her about Noah's ark. But I had not been telling the story long when she interrupted.

'Why didn't the wolf eat the sheep in the ark?'

My son exchanged glances with me in the rear-view mirror. We took deep breaths and in turn tried to provide an answer. But Amelie was not satisfied. Then she brightened, and came up with an answer unassailable in its logic.

'I know! When each animal entered the ark, Noah fastened its seat-belt! He separated the wolf and the sheep, so the wolf could only snap and not bite.'

Perhaps Amelie was wiser than she knew. We would be well advised to widely separate individuals whose temperaments clash, and who generate quarrels and dissension when they are near to each other.

* * *

A child listened to a learned sermon that attempted to explain away the plain meaning of Scripture. Eventually she interrupted, exclaiming, 'If God did not mean what He said, why didn't he say what He did mean?'

Out of the mouth of babes!

When he was quite a small boy, Mihai asked, 'Why didn't God simply kill the devil, and put an end to all the trouble?' (When he was grown up, his own daughter Amelie asked exactly the same question.)

I replied, 'The devil was not always the devil. Once he was a good angel, until the day came when he chose to become evil. If he had been killed, another good angel might have made the same choice. So killing the devil would have achieved nothing. Jesus did not say to the devil, "Perish!" He said, "Get behind me!" He puts demons to flight; He does not destroy them. We must develop that inner resistance. We must learn to do as Jesus did, and say to the devil, "No, I'm not going to listen to what you are suggesting."'

In his childish way, Mihai understood the point, and so in her turn did eight-year-old Amelie.

* * *

The famous American evangelist Billy Sunday told the story of a twelve-year-old boy who went to a preacher and begged him, 'Please go to the jail and speak to my Daddy. He murdered my Mummy. We loved him so much, he was always kind to us; but then he began to drink. It was whisky that made him do it. Now I have to look after my three small sisters. Please pray with him. He's going to be hanged tomorrow.'

He added, 'They told us we would be given his body. What am I going to do with it? Why don't they deliver it to the owner of the saloon that sold my father the whisky? Why don't they hang him? He murdered my father's soul before my father strangled my mother.'

Who is going to answer the questions children ask? Why is it that the people who receive the harsh punishments are those who commit the crimes, and not the brewers and publicans, the authors and publishers of obscene literature, and the producers of television shows that glorify violence - all of whom must share responsibility for incitement to crime? Why not indict those legislators and judges who let the poisoning of souls and minds go unpunished?

I can name very precisely those people who destroyed my soul with the poisonous ideas that they purveyed,

p033 ..... Questions

when I was very young and lacked discernment. I also remember with shame that I too led others astray.

* * *

A child wanted to know, 'Will God do anything I ask Him to do? That is what He promised - can I rely on it? Can I really ask Him for anything at all?'

Yes, it is an all-embracing promise. 'Ask whatever you wish, and it will be given you,' says Jesus (JHN 15:7). But there is an 'if' preceding the promise: 'If you abide in me, and my words abide in you.'

Be a living part of the mystical body of Christ; let His words be your guide; and then you can ask anything, and you will have it.

Those who fulfill the condition will never ask for anything wrong.

Many children are still very young when it occurs to them to ask why there is so much evil in the world. But if they retain the mind of a child as they grow older, one can teach them to see good in everything, and potential good in everyone.

If a child asks, 'Why should there be evil?' then the answer must be, 'How can what we regard as evil be used for good?'

The crucifixion of Jesus was a terrible evil. But it served the greatest good that this world has ever known; the salvation of mankind.

The evangelist, Cerullo, asked a boy in Haiti: 'Do you know Jesus?'

'Is that a new American drink?' he replied. 'I only know Coke.'

The promoters of Coca-Cola have been more successful than the promoters of Jesus. Many children do not even know His name.

p034 ..... From the Lips of Children

The Church could learn something from the merchants of this world, although it has an advantage that they do not have. It has not a product to sell, but a person to introduce; a person who has living water to give, so that one need never thirst again.

* * *

A boy of four had to play Joseph, and a girl of the same age Mary, in a Christmas play. The two children began to quarrel while they were on the stage.

The boy's father chided him. 'You forget what role you're playing! Joseph never quarrelled with Mary.'

The boy answered, 'How do you know?'

The father was dumbfounded. How did he know?

And in truth, he did not know.

However, we know from the Bible that the disciples quarrelled between themselves. Statues and pictures that show the saints always smiling are the inventions of grown-ups. Children know that saints on earth can be weak and earthly - especially if they live with parents who are Christians!

But if somebody happens to quarrel or commit some other sin, it does not mean that he ceases to be a saint. Christianity is not just a treasure and not just an earthen vessel. It is a treasure in an earthen vessel. Deny that the vessel exists, and you deny that the Christian exists.

* * *

When Mihai was five, he heard that the saints would one day walk with Jesus dressed in white garments. 'Does He have robes in children's sizes?' he enquired.

I assured him that they come in all sizes. St. Pancras and St. Tarcisius were devoured by wild beasts; they died as martyrs when they were only nine years old.

There are garments not only for those who are small and large in body, but also for those small and large in faith.

p035 ..... Questions

A bulldog, on seeing a pocket-sized poodle, demanded, 'Do you dare to call yourself a dog?'

The poodle replied, 'I admit that I am not as big as you are, but you certainly can't call me a cat. A small dog is still a dog!'

A feeble, fearful, backslidden Christian is still a Christian, and still has a white robe waiting for him.

* * *

A class of children was shown a painting of the Nativity and told that the holy family was very poor.

'Then where,' queried a child, 'did they get the money to pay the photographer?'

The child's question could well prompt the reflection that it is good to share not only bread with the poor, but also the means of pleasure - such as provision for a family portrait!

* * *

A mother assured her child, who had confessed a sin, that 'the blood of Jesus has cleansed you from it.' The child thought for a moment, and then remarked, 'You said the same thing another time that I sinned. But where is Jesus' blood when we don't sin? What does it do then?'

In the words of a hymn:

> E'er since, by faith, I saw the stream
> Thy flowing wounds supply,

Redeeming love has been my theme,
And shall be till I die.

(~William Cowper, 'There is a fountain filled with blood'~)

There is an unbroken stream of blood flowing from the wounds of Christ.

Blood flows constantly in our bodies, never pausing, never resting. It serves a hundred trillion cells, providing them with oxygen, amino acids, nitrogen and many other necessities. It carries away waste products and fights invaders. In the meantime, we go about our work without any awareness of what is happening inside us. Yet if the blood ceased to flow for a few brief moments; we would be dead. In just the same way, the blood of the Saviour flows throughout His Church, nourishing it with heavenly manna, and bearing away sins.

Let His blood be an object of our devotion. We need it, even when we do not sin.

* * *

A child once asked her mother, 'If I had not been your little girl - what would I have been?' She could not imagine that she might not have existed at all. 'Non-existence,' 'nirvana' - these are concepts that only adults wrestle with.

For years I was in solitary confinement, without books, without paper or pen, without ever hearing a voice or a whisper.

To occupy my time, I sometimes spent hours imagining what I would do in various situations. What would I do if I were pope - prime minister - a celebrated writer - pastor of a church - a millionaire - a beggar?

Once I tried to imagine that I was dead. I imagined myself in a coffin. Loved ones stood around weeping. A pastor said a prayer. Then I laughed heartily. 'If I can see myself in a coffin,' I thought, 'then I can't be dead!'

Many things are possible in life, and it is possible imagine oneself in all sorts of situations. A soldier can dream of becoming emperor. It's possible- it happened to Napoleon. A beggar can become a millionaire. It's possible - I have known men who did. The reverse is also possible.

Because all these reversals of fate ~are~ possible, we can imagine them happening. But what is unimaginable is that we might cease to exist. Life is a gift of God, and it only finds fulfillment in eternal happiness.

p037 ..... Questions

The little girl found it impossible even to imagine never having existed.

Alex's curiosity is boundless. When he was five, he began to be suspicious about the origins of meat. 'Where do we get meat from?' 'From the supermarket.' 'But where does the supermarket get the meat from?' 'From cows.'

Alex's suspicions were confirmed. He became very grave. 'Do you mean that we kill cows so that we can eat their meat?'

'Yes.'

'Why?'

'Because we need nourishment.'

'But,' asked Alex, 'do we at least explain to the cows that that is why we kill them, and do we apologize to them for doing it?'

Very orthodox Jews do. I have seen their special 'slaughterers,' whose religious function is to sing hymns while slaughtering animals. The kabbalistic purpose of doing so is to communicate somehow to unreasoning animals that they will be incorporated into the bodies of the chosen people, and will thereby become part of the temples of God, which is what our bodies are.

We ought to eat our meals with great devotion, remembering how many of God's creatures have been sacrificed so that we may live.

When Alex was six, and had heard the story of Cain and Abel for the umpteenth time, he said: 'In the beginning it was Cain who was good and Abel evil, because Abel killed a lamb, which is wrong, whereas Cain did not. Lambs are nice, living beings. Why did God order people to kill them for sacrifices?'

To kill a lamb wantonly - or, worse, to have somebody else kill one because I like eating lamb chops - is wrong. The Bible teaches that whatever we do we should do to the glory of God. Are we quite sure that He is glorified when we kill lambs?

Millions of animals are sacrificed each year just so that we can enjoy a good meal. But it is only justifiable to eat animals when it is done in the sole desire that our strengthened bodies may serve God better.

This is why the Talmud says, 'Every meal at which the subject of conversation is something other than the Word of God, is an idolatrous meal.'

(On the other hand, vegetarianism does not necessarily make men better. Cain did not kill a lamb, but he slew his brother; and Hitler was a strict vegetarian.)

* * *

A child was urged to eat carrots and peas because they contained vitamins, only to retort, 'Why didn't God put the vitamins in the sweets and ice-cream?'

My answer would have been, 'Because it's important for children not only to have vitamins, but also to learn to swallow what may be unpleasant to the taste.'

We all need to learn from the good and the unpleasant. A Christian must welcome unpleasant things sometimes, because they are part of the 'all things' that God is working together for our good.

* * *

Amelie at six listened to a sermon on Jesus' words, 'Let the little children come to me, and do not hinder them, for the kingdom of heaven belongs to such as these (MTT 19:14).

Turning to me she commented, 'But all men were or little children, and so they must have had the kingdom of heaven. How did they lose it?'

I remember my childhood sins very vividly. It does not require very much effort for most of us to remember how we lost our childhood innocence: lying, stealing, perhaps sliding downhill into a particular bad habit.

We had the kingdom, and we lost it. The Bible urges us to return; we don't have to come to something entirely new, but simply to return to what was once ours, to the treasure that we lost.

A boy born in the satellite age was told by his father, 'We have just placed another star in the sky. We have launched a manned satellite.' He asked, 'Who placed all the other stars in the sky?' To this his father, who was not a believer, had no reply.

If it took so much genius and skill and intellectual brilliance to place into earth's orbit a satellite, manned by only a few people, a far greater intelligence must have been required to create the starry heavens.

The existence of man-made satellites is one more proof of the existence of God.

* * *

A child heard his father say 'Faith moves mountains,' and asked him, 'Father, you believe in Christ. When did you last move a mountain?' The father was embarrassed!

Jesus surely did not intend that we should move real mountains. One can imagine what chaos would be caused, were men to decide to move the Himalayas, the Rocky Mountains, the Carpathians or Alps according to whim!

But there are mountains of difficulty, of all kinds, that faith can move. Every believer should pay heed to this blessing of God. Then he will be able to say when he last moved a mountain!

When Amelie was eight, she asked me, 'You were on a Communist jail. How did you come to the free world?'

I explained to her that Christian organizations had a ransom of œ5,000 for my release.

'But,' she mused, 'you were in jail for fourteen years –

p040 ..... From the Lips of Children

why did it take Western Christians so long to collect 10,000 dollars?'

I had no answer.

Others, who still suffer in Communist prisons, could have been helped long ago if it were not for our apathy. How much do we contribute towards easing their lot?

But the question goes even deeper.

When Hudson Taylor went as the first missionary to inland China, one of his first converts asked him, 'How long have you Englishmen known the gospel?'

'For 1,600 years,' he replied.

'Then why did you leave it so late to tell us about it? My parents and my ancestors died in sin, and went into the outer darkness.'

Why is it, that the good things in life seem to take so long to come to fruition?

I once discussed these matters with a child who, because he was a child, was not afraid to go even further in his thinking. 'God is like us,' he observed. 'He has promised that His kingdom would return. Jesus said, "Behold, I come quickly."

But He tarries.'

Let us continue to pray, 'Thy kingdom come,' and all we can to hasten His coming. And let us 'never tire doing what is right' (2TH 3:13).

In Canada some children were asked to write down what they would ask the Pope if they were able to speak to him during his visit to their country.

They wrote down such questions as: 'What can I do to make God happier?,' 'What can I do to help poor people?,' 'How do you feel when you have to make decisions that will upset people?,' and 'How do you feel about not being able to marry?'

Children ask direct questions; they are much less inclined to be devious than their elders. And they expect straight answers!

p041 ..... Questions

In front of Holman Hunt's well-known painting, 'Christ knocking at the door,' a large group of visitors stood in admiration. One praised the colours; another noted the expression on Jesus' face; another called attention to the fact that the door had no outside knob, explaining that the heart can only be opened from the inside. Still another pointed out that the feet of Jesus were painted as turned away from the door; long accustomed to being rejected, He was prepared to depart.

Only one, a child, asked the question that really mattered: 'Father, did they let him in?'

It was a very small question. But it is the principal theme of the painting. All other aspects fade into insignificance.

* * *

A scientist was speaking to a group of children about Einstein's Theory of Relativity. A child raised the question: 'And what if Einstein was wrong?'

Only God can be totally trusted. All human assertions must be treated with a healthy scepticism.

A cardinal was once asked, 'What if scientists agree unanimously that the statements of the Bible are untrue?

The cardinal replied, 'I would wait a while! Scientists do not hold on to their certainties for very long.'

Once - I suppose it was from weariness - I protested to Amelie, then aged seven, 'You can't ask questions about everything!'

'Why not?'

'Because some things just happen. For example, Jesus said, "You hated Me without a cause."'

But still she persisted. 'Why isn't there a "Why" for everything?'

Even Einstein could not accept the theory of Heisenberg, the great German microphysicist, concerning the indeterminism of elementary particles. Heisenberg had shown that the law of causality, which was considered universal, has its limits; and therefore certain events have no 'why.'

Adults as well as children have to learn to simply accept certain facts that seem to do very well without our analysis and our categorizations as to cause and effect. It demands humility of mind. 'So much I know, and further, at this stage, I cannot go.'

The Hebrew Bible begins with the letter 'B' (~beth~), written [Hebrew character] - rather like a box with three walls. Hebrew text is read from right to left, so the opening in the 'box' faces forward. The rabbis explain that Scripture begins with this letter because it teaches that you will never know what is above, behind and below. And so we are to look forward, in the only direction in which God wishes to reveal Himself to us.

Amelie again: 'God must have known that Adam and Eve would sin. Why did He allow it?'

Again this 'Why' - the great 'Why.'

The response is simple. Sin is here, and we must fight it unceasingly. To waste time on fruitless 'Whys' is simply to sin all over again.

A person who has just been bitten by a rattlesnake will be foolish to waste time speculating about why he was attacked. Time is of the essence! The venom must be extracted - or he will die.

There are times when 'What' and 'How' are much more important than 'Why.'

Why so many questions, in a book about theology - even children's theology? Isn't theology a set of dogmatic statements?

No, it is not.

In the four Gospels, Jesus asks no less than 287 questions. His statements and assertions are far fewer in number.

His first recorded statement is a question: 'Why were

p043 ..... Questions

you searching for me?' (LUK 2:49). As a child in the temple, He, like children everywhere, spent His time simply listening and asking questions (cf. LUK 2:46).

As an adult He retained this childlike characteristic. Even on the cross, He asked a question: 'My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?' (MRK 15:34).

Later, confronting an enemy of His Church, He asked him a question: 'Saul, Saul, why do you persecute me?' (ACT 9:4).

When I first became a Christian and asked myself two vital questions, the only answers that I could find in the Bible were two further questions.

Firstly, I needed to know, which was the true Church? The Bible answered, 'Who is this that appears like the dawn, fair as the moon, bright as the sun, majestic as the stars in procession?' (SOS 6:10).

Secondly, I needed to know who was a reliable pastor to follow. Again the Bible replied with a question: 'Who then is the faithful and wise manager, whom the master puts in charge of his servants to give them their food allowance at the proper time?' (LUK 12:42).

The question is 'Who?': the reply is also, 'Who?'

Questions are an essential part of true theology. As Heidegger remarked, 'Questioning is the piety of thought.'

'For we know in part' (1CO 13:9).

"I would like my father to walk out of the frame and be with us again."

When Mihai was five, I came home one day and learned from my wife that he had committed some wrongdoing for which he needed to be punished. This time I decided to try a different approach. I left him alone.

The next morning, I told him the story of how Peter denied his Lord, and how, later, Jesus asked him three times: 'Do you love Me?' When I had told him the story, I asked Mihai, 'Do you love Jesus?'

'Yes,' said Mihai.

I asked him again, 'Do you love Jesus?' And again he answered, 'Yes.'

The third time I asked the question, he understood that I was chiding him for his sin of the day before. Tears came to his eyes as he said for the third time, 'Yes, I love Jesus.'

p045 ..... Answers

I thought that he might simply be repeating the words of Peter without really meaning them. So I asked him 'How do you know that you really love Him?'

His thoughtful rejoinder was: 'Jesus did not ask Peter that. He was satisfied with the words, "I love you."'

Love really needs no explanation.

The comments of pre-school children indicate how much of positive value they can be taught, even at an early age.

Little Alex brightened our lives many times with his little pearls of wisdom.

'I like everybody in the whole world,' he said once, 'because I belong to God. All except the devil - because he put Jesus on the cross.'

Once, watching ~Romeo and Juliet~ on television, I tried to explain the plot to him. Later I asked him: 'Did you understand what was going on?'

His reply meant more than he knew. 'Yes - Grandma is Jesus' Juliet.'

He had understood, without theological ramifications that Jesus' love for His own is like that of a bridegroom for his bride.

A child sat in his grandfather's arms as both of them looked in a mirror. 'Did God make us both?' he asked. 'Yes, of course.'

'Well, He does a much better job nowadays. He's had lots of practice! Now He doesn't put wrinkles on faces.'

God-improving?

Well, strange as it may seem to us, He says so about Himself: 'I will . . . do better unto you than at your beginnings' (EZE 36:11 AV).

The fact is, that God has given this generation more knowledge about health and much greater possibilities of learning than previous generations - at least, in the Western world. May our young people respond by being more faithful to Him!

Linna was six years old. She asked a newly-married man, 'Do you love your bride?' 'Yes, of course,' was the quick rejoinder.

'That's good, because I imagine it must be awful to be married to a woman you don't love.'

The only basis for marriage is love between two people. Divorce is often the result when two people pledged to love and care for each other, break their vows and abandon their commitments - unlike God, who keeps covenant with His bride, the Church, and is grieved when she is unfaithful (MTT 23:37-38).

'Tell me something about Jesus, in whom you say you believe,' a man enquired of a young child.

The boy answered simply. 'I'm too small to say something great about Him.'

He did not know that he had repeated, almost verbatim, what Justin Martyr had said when asked to explain the mysteries of Christ. Justin was beheaded in the year AD 155.

'God is gigantic,' Alex pronounced, with childish finality.

I thought of John Mazzuconi, the Italian missionary who died a martyr's death in New Guinea at the beginning of the nineteenth century. Mazzuconi wrote, 'It is wrong to call the ocean immense. I traversed it in three months in a small ship. If one owned this whole world, he would own something smaller than a grain of sand. I wonder why so many fight to have it? Only One is truly immense, and He is eternal.'

Eusebius and John Chrysostom were both among those who praised the very young Christian child Barulas, who was brought before the heathen governor Asclepiades and asked: 'Which is better: to adore the one God who made heaven and earth, or a multitude of gods?'

The child replied, 'God is an almighty being. If there were many gods, they would become powerless, because the might of one would cancel out the might of another. God can be only one. Your gods are frauds.'

The tyrant demanded, 'Who has taught you these things?'

He replied, 'My mother, who was herself taught by God.'

The child was flogged and beheaded.

His mother herself carried him to the place of execution, and without shedding a tear, kissed him; and, telling him to remember her in heaven, gave him to the executioner.

We should not forget that it is to a child that we owe the writing of the most celebrated book about the holy Trinity.

Augustine was walking on the seashore meditating on this great mystery, about which he intended to write a book; but he could not develop his thoughts clearly. He was so frustrated that he was almost inclined to abandon the project.

Suddenly, he heard weeping. Running towards the sound, he found a child in tears. He asked what was the matter.

'Look what a big hole I have dug in the sand,' the child sobbed, 'but I cannot put the whole ocean in it. Can you?'

Augustine interpreted the question as a message sent to him by God Himself. Challenged by it, he wrote the book, but he wrote it with great modesty, realizing that God is limitless and we are very small. Like the child on the seashore, we can know only a very little about what - and Who - lies beyond.

During a science lesson in school a pupil asked, 'Why did God make the earth?'

Before the teacher had a chance to reply, a seven-year-old boy gave the answer: 'So that people would have something to stand on.'

He spoke a profound truth. This is why God gave mankind the Law, the prophets, the Bible - even His own Son.

A Pentecostal preacher patiently explained to Alex, who was then five, the doctrines of his Church. He did so with fervour, repeating again and again that this was the only correct doctrine and that all others were heresy.

I wanted to spare this preacher, by giving him the impression that he was wasting his efforts on a child who could not understand. So I asked Alex, 'Do you know what the word "heresy" means?'

He replied straightforwardly. 'Sure I know! When you have the right faith, you are happy. When heresy arrives, your head begins to ache.'

The way of salvation is simple: 'Whoever believes and is baptized will be saved.' Beware of things that cause headaches!

Listening carefully to a narrative of the events led up to the crucifixion, Amelie at six concluded: The disciples in Gethsemane were right when they decided to flee. Peter was admonished for trying to help. So why should the others have stayed? If they were in the wrong, why did Jesus choose them in the first place?'

p049 ..... Answers

Many a preacher has decried the weakness of the disciples in deserting Jesus on that dark night in Gethsemane. Curiously, the Gospels contain not one word of criticism or rebuke.

The distinguished psychologist Viktor Frankl was asked by his six-year-old daughter, 'Why do we speak of the "good" Lord?'

'Some weeks ago,' he reminded her, 'you had measles. The good Lord made you completely better.'

His daughter frowned. It was the wrong answer. 'But don't forget, Daddy, it was Him that sent me the measles in the first place!'

Children are not easily taken in by religious cant and cheap propaganda for God. They take His words seriously - 'Come now, let us reason together' (ISA 1:18), which means that both sides have a say.

When children ask us why innocent people suffer, we have to confess to them that we simply do not have an explanation for this mystery. They do not respond to theological speculation about the whys and wherefores of pain.

Can a guinea pig in a laboratory understand its many sufferings? Is it aware that it serves the good of higher beings? Our sufferings may be of great value for the instruction of angels.

Let us not be afraid to admit how limited our human knowledge is. Children's questions lead to a theology that compels us to face up to our ignorance of many aspects of reality.

God is omniscient. We are not.

Six-year-old Alex had been throwing sand at other children, and as punishment had to report every day to the school principal. He asked his mother to write a letter of apology on his behalf, promising that it would never happen again. With this, the matter was settled. His father attempted to impress upon him the lesson to be learned from the episode. 'If you sin, you are hooked.' To which the reply came, 'But with promises, you can get off the hook!'

The prodigal son of Jesus' parable got away with even less. He promised nothing, but just uttered a few words that showed his repentance. It was enough. He had a loving father.

Somebody asked a child what one must do before receiving forgiveness of sin. The candid reply was, 'Sin!' There could not have been a better answer.

That is why the Catholic Church sings '~O felix culpa~' - 'O blessed sin, which gave us such a Saviour.'

E. Stanley Jones, the renowned missionary to India, told a story about a child whose teacher asked him, 'What would you like for Christmas?'

Looking up at a picture of his father, who was dead, the child said wistfully, 'I would like my father to walk out of the frame and be with us again.'

Children love their parents by instinct. When you stop loving your parents, you have stopped being what Jesus wants you to be - childlike.

A teacher once asked her class, 'What does the Bible contain?'

p051 ..... Answers

A girl replied: 'In our Bible there are a lot of dates, marriages, deaths, newspaper clippings, a birthday card, a Christmas card, and that's about all.'

Children who are brought up in homes where that is all they can find in the Bible are in great spiritual danger.

What is in your Bible?

A five-year-old boy had recited his usual bedtime prayer: 'Now I lay me down to sleep, I pray the Lord my soul to keep; If I should die-' Here he stopped, and asked, 'Daddy, what's dying like?'

'It's dark,' replied the father, for that was all he knew. The little questioner remained awake in the dark, sobbing uncontrollably.

Another child had a father who sent him to Sunday school. He knew that his mother had a terrible fear of dying. One Sunday he came home from church in great excitement.

'Mother! You don't have to be afraid of dying any more, because Jesus went through the tomb and left a light behind Him!'

Jesus submitted to the power of death, and was entombed. But He had the power of resurrection, and He promises us this same experience if we commit our lives to Him.

'Death' is the name given to a deep sleep, by those who do not know about resurrection. But Jesus has the keys to the grave. He knows how to give life to those who die. The proof lies in His empty tomb.

A child who had just said his morning prayers was asked by his mother, 'What did you pray about?'

'I told Him to rest,' he said. 'I told Him to sleep in peace, because I'm awake now.'

Love calls for reciprocity. Jesus says, 'Come unto Me, and I will give you rest.' May we not say the same thing to Him, with all our hearts?

A Christian girl was once asked by a friend, 'How do you begin to love Jesus? I don't love Him - I can't see any reason why I should. I can't make myself love Him.'

The girl replied, 'Don't try! Just repeat to yourself "Jesus loves me," over and over again. It was through Him that the flowers, the birds, and everything beautiful were created; He went through a lifetime of suffering and died on the cross in great sorrow, for me, He has prepared for me a heaven of exquisite beauty; He offers me forgiveness for all my sins and a life full of joy. He loves me, for sure! Never try to love Him. Just say again and again, "He loves me."'

Later the other girl confided, 'I love Him.'

What a model of Christian witness! And what a sermon in miniature!

'Two people kissing,' he answered.

'How would you paint death?'

'I'd paint a man and the sun.'

below were drawn by a four-year-old girl whose father was convicted of raping her repeatedly.

[illustration appears at this point in the book]

In her drawings the middle part of both bodies is omitted. It was abhorrent to her to think about that part of the body. The father has no legs; they are replaced by phallic symbols. She has scrawled over his face, reflecting the anger she feels towards him.

If a child knew me as I really am, how would he or she draw me?

J. Allen Blair told of a proud Sunday school teacher, who was attempting to explain to children how they should practise the virtue of obedience.

As he strode up and down the platform, everything about his outward appearance betrayed his self-esteem - his head was held high, his chest was thrust out, his gestures were commanding.

'Now, children,' he boomed, pausing to fix them with a stare, 'why do people call me a Christian?' He was

p054 ..... From the Lips of Children clearly expecting somebody to respond with 'Because you are obedient to Christ.'

But a boy raised his hand and ventured, 'People call you a Christian because they don't know you well enough.'

Little children find it hard to disguise their true feelings, especially when they are talking about other people. Telling falsehoods is something that they learn later, often out of fear of punishment (though sometimes what is thought to be lying is in fact the child's imagination).

Adults tend to be much less candid in what they say to each other's face. Instead they learn the virtue of 'tact,' which is shown up as hypocrisy when they gossip about an individual behind his or her back.

It is sometimes necessary to meet evil head-on, with a child's directness. John the apostle, who wrote so extensively and so beautifully about love, nevertheless had this to say about Diotrephes ('who loves to be first'): 'I will call attention to what he is doing, gossiping maliciously about us' (3 John 10).

In the words of a wise man, '[There is] a time to be silent and a time to speak' (ECC 3:7). Children's theology 'tells it like it is'!

Children know how to apply what they have learned, but sometimes they do it in unexpected ways.

A boy complained to his mother that his stomach ached, and she said, 'It's probably because your stomach is empty. I'll make you a snack.'

Not long afterwards, a pastor visited the house. He mentioned that he had a headache, upon which the child observed: 'Probably, Pastor, it's because your head is empty. You should feed it with something.'

When pupils in a school in England were asked to name the person with whom they would most like to be stuck in a lift, a girl answered, 'A lift specialist!'

In a very real sense, we are all 'stuck' - not in a lift, but on a planet bent on self-destruction. We go through life like a train that roars through the darkness towards an unknown destination. The problems of our own lives are already too complicated for us, but when they are multiplied by the threats of nuclear war, the population explosion, pollution, increasing immorality, crime and violence, they are too much to bear. Perplexed and afraid, we can see no way out.

Jesus is a specialist in human tragedy. His was the most tragic of all human lives. Poor, oppressed, rejected, scorned, spat upon, whipped, crucified, buried - He offered the only solution to the world's problems: the power of His resurrection.

Let us prefer the Specialist to anybody else!

An atheist once said, in reply to a child who had claimed to be a Christian, 'I will give you a pound if you can show me where your God is!'

Addressing a group of schoolboys, a bishop gave the following example of 'moral courage': 'A boy in a dormitory, who, in front of everybody, kneels and says his prayers before hopping into bed.'

He asked the boys if they could think of another example.

'Sir,' a voice piped up, 'a bishop in a dormitory full of bishops, who hops into bed ~without~ saying his prayers.'

Bishops and prelates rarely have that courage! But biblical authors like David, Job and Jeremiah had the courage to complain to God, using words that to us might seem blasphemous. We ourselves would probably have suppressed such thoughts, and the result would have been that they would have become submerged and unresolved within us.

Children teach us to have the courage not only to tell God that we love Him, but also to argue with Him. In the words of a hymn, He has 'the answer to all our questionings.' By the same token, He will surely accept us when the questions are hard ones.

Nadia reached up and handed him the flowers.

I was once a guest in a Christian home. I was rather depressed, brooding about all the things that I do not possess.

The children's bedtime arrived. A boy who was not four years old prayed. 'I thank You, God, for my hair, my face, my eyebrows, my eyelids, both my eyes, my cheeks, my nose, my lips, my teeth, my tongue ...' On and on he continued, until he had itemized everything down to the soles of his feet. He finished his prayer with the request 'Make my Daddy and our guest happy.'

His prayer was answered, as I realized that I possessed all the same things that the child did - and mine came in a bigger size! I was also aware of other aspects of my being, about which he had not yet learned. But I had never recited them all in a prayer of thankfulness. 'A little child shall lead them' - even in prayer.

In Sunday school a pastor showed the children a telephone. He explained, 'You speak on the telephone to people whom you cannot see. It's the same with prayer. You call God, and He listens. Don't be distressed that you can't see Him. We speak to people we cannot see, every day.'

A boy asked, 'Pastor, what is God's telephone number?'

The pastor could have replied something like this: 'It is a five-figure number: repentance, faith in Jesus' sacrifice, love, truth and righteousness.'

During a prayer meeting a restless child continued to misbehave after several warnings. Finally his exasperated mother said to him, 'Come outside with me. You're going to get a spanking!'

As he left the boy called out to the group, 'Pray for me! Mother hits hard!'

Impressed by his plea, his mother decided not to spank him. When they came back, he greeted the believers with: 'You see? Prayer works!'

A girl who had been naughty was sent to bed and advised to pray to God that He would take away her bad temper.

I overheard a girl praying 'Dear God, be nice and obey your mother.' I remembered that there was a time when God was on earth in the person of Jesus Christ.

It cannot have been easy either for the virgin Mary or for Joseph to have such a child. I wonder, did His uniqueness ever seem to them to be merely self-will? The fact that there was some distance between the child and His parents can be inferred from His words to His mother when He was twelve years old, and she had sought Him for three days: 'Why were you searching for Me?' (LUK 2:49).

He was obedient, in His own way. But when His mother asked a special favour from Him at the wedding in Cana, He answered, 'Dear woman, why do you involve Me?' Perhaps when He was small, Joseph might occasionally have said to Him, 'Please obey your mother.'

In a morning prayer, little Dorothy said, 'Thank God, for this beautiful morning. My dog will enjoy it.'

She had a breadth of vision. The Bible's vision is even broader. God feeds the birds of the air and the beasts of the field, so satisfying their needs. He also makes the sun shine and the rain fall on the evil as well as the good.

Let us, like this little child, appreciate the joys given to others, whether or not we share in them.

I once stayed in the home of a farmer, whose three-year-old Carlitos always prayed for 'Daddy, Mommy, Grandma, the sheep, the goats, the guinea-hen, the dogs, and the cat.'

Do we pray like that, in detail - or in mere generalities, like 'God bless the missionaries'?

Jesus prayed for Peter by name.

When he was only five, Alex prayed, 'Dear God, take good care of Father, Mother - and also of Yourself. If anything happens to You, we'll all be in trouble.'

It was not a unique prayer. Peter the disciple prayed that Jesus would not go to His death. He was afraid that their entire group would be in trouble without Him.

We can all pray not only ~to~ God, but also ~for~ God - that His name might be hallowed, His kingdom come, and His will be done.

A father and his little son sat down at the counter of a small cafeteria for a bite to eat. 'We'll have a silent prayer,' said the adult, and bowed his head.

Minutes passed. The boy's eyes remained closed. When he finally looked up, his father asked him, 'What were you praying about for so long?'

'How could I know how long my prayer was?' asked the son. 'You told me it was to be a silent prayer!'

He may well have known more about silent prayer than his father did. A silent prayer is one in which not only the lips, but also the mind keeps silent. In mental prayer one should close the mind's door and let no distracting thoughts enter- not even the thought of time passing.

The first disciples met behind locked doors out fear of the Jews, who could only destroy their bodies. So how much more carefully should we lock the door when we pray silently, so that no thievish idea may enter which might destroy the soul. The Lord can enter through locked doors; and we desire no other guest.

Mental prayer means a time that is spent in the embrace of Jesus, our heavenly Bridegroom. And what bride, in such an ecstasy, could tell you how long it has lasted?

During the night a loud knocking sounded at the door of the Danielsky family in Russia.

'Open up! It's the police!'

The mother whispered quickly, 'What should I do with the Bible? They'll take it away.'

'Open the door quickly- or we'll break it down!'

Piotr, the little boy, had a sudden idea. He took the Bible and placed it under the blanket on his sister's doll's bed. To Nadia, who was even smaller than he was, he whispered, 'Don't pay any attention to the people who are coming in. Just carry on playing with the doll, in her bed.' Quietly, he prayed, 'Lord, please keep the Bible safe for us.'

It was many hours later that the police left, taking with them their plunder of hymnals and other books. When they had gone, Nadia retrieved the Bible from the doll's bed. 'The credit belongs to Piotr,' she said.

Piotr replied, 'Let us thank God. I prayed that they would not find the Bible, and He heard my prayer.'

May we all cherish the Bible as tenderly as Piotr did!

Because of his faith in Christ, Nadia's father was in a Soviet jail. She was walking one day with her grieving mother through a meadow.

Turning to her, Nadia said thoughtfully, 'Be at peace, Mummy. God, who takes care of these flowers, will also care for Daddy.' She picked a few flowers and prayed: 'Dear God, please make it possible for Daddy to have these flowers.'

p062 ..... From the Lips of Children

The next day she accompanied her mother to the police station to leave a parcel of food for the prisoner. Nadia smiled at the officer on duty. 'Do you have any children?' she asked.

He looked down at her. She was very like the young daughter he had recently buried.

Nadia reached up and handed him the flowers that she had picked, saying, 'Uncle, please give these to my Daddy. You will, surely, won't you?'

The torturer was no match for the little girl. The prisoner received the flowers.

God does indeed answer prayer.

It was Nadia's birthday. 'Lord Jesus,' she prayed, 'last year on this day my father brought me a bar of chocolate' - chocolate is a luxury in Russia - 'but now, he is in jail. You are my only hope. Please bring me some chocolate.'

Larissa, her older sister, rebuked her. 'We are only allowed to pray for absolute necessities, not for dainties.'

Her mother agreed. 'We can only ask for food when we are hungry, or for clothes when our old ones are worn out. We can also pray for health if we are ill. But I don't think that chocolate is a necessity of life.'

There was a knock at the door. It was their pastor. He had known nothing of the birthday, but something had made him buy chocolate for the children.

It was a lesson for Nadia's family, and for the rest of us. Our God is a bountiful God! Sometimes He takes delight in answering prayers for things which are not absolute necessities.

When he was a boy, Robert Louis Stevenson remarked to his mother, 'Mama, one cannot be good without praying.' 'How do you know, Robert?' 'Because,' he said with an air of great finality, 'I've tried.'

It might be valuable, I suggest, to try a childish experiment. Decide to spend one whole day without prayer. Then, in the evening, examine yourself and see whether you have succeeded in being good without it (Be honest!).

A little fellow was sent to bed early because he had been naughty. Soon he reappeared. 'I've been thinking about what I did,' he told his mother. 'And I said a prayer.'

'That's fine - if you asked your heavenly Father to make you good.'

'Oh no, I said something else; I asked Him to make my mother put up with me as I am.'

In the Greek New Testament, ~aphiemi~ means 'to forgive' and 'to leave.' In the Lord's prayer, the text can be read either as 'Forgive us our trespasses,' or 'Leave us our trespasses.'

Each of us is a cluster of selves. One part of me wants to be forgiven, while another part is very much attached to a given sin and wants to be allowed to keep it.

One voice in us asks the Father to make us into saints; another says, 'Put up with me, just as I am.'

As adults, we repress this second voice. A child, lacking our inhibitions, openly expresses this other side of his being. It is better to expose and then expunge our self-centred attitudes than to repress them and deny that they exist.

The Psalmist said, 'I ... did not cover up my iniquity ... and you forgave the guilt of my sin' (PSA 32:5).

* * *

When she was asked whether she prayed every day, a little girl replied, 'Not quite every day- some days, I don't need anything.'

She was right not to make prayer just a routine. But if we have nothing to ask God for, then let us thank Him for that! And let us praise Him continually.

At a family gathering, little Alex prayed aloud as we knelt together. 'God is great; God is good; and I thank Him for the food.'

My wife gently chided him. 'Why did you pray like that? It's not time for a meal.'

'That's not my fault,' Alex responded stoutly. 'I've said grace, now it's up to you to give me something to eat!'

He had touched on a profound truth. It is written in Scripture, 'Faith is being sure of what we hope for and certain of what we do not see' (HEB 11:1). Let us thank God for His blessings whether or not we have yet received them. Then it is His responsibility to ensure that we receive them - and He will not fail.

Jesus said, 'Have faith in God ... If anyone ... does not doubt in his heart but believes that what he says will happen, it will be done for him' (MRK 11:22-23).

The well-known Christian psychiatrist, Paul Tournier, tells how as a small boy he used to dream of doing some great deed.

With a toy construction set, he began to build a strange machine, bristling with springs and gears. One day, he confided his ambition to his young sister. The machine was to be capable of creating life.

She asked him to explain how it would work, but Paul was vague about that. He admitted that he would have to rely on prayer. He would pray hard, and God would work through the machine.

'If that is so,' exclaimed his sister, 'what are all the gears for?'

What are our many gears for?

Once we have prayed, we must be patient. Even if it seems impossible, we must quietly put up with our impatience and allow God to work. He hears us, and he answers us.

Billy Graham has five children. One day at family prayers he was jolted by his son Franklin, who interrupted his father's exposition of Scripture with the words, 'Daddy, let's not talk so much – let's pray more.'

Even a child understood that talking to God is more valuable than mere human talk.

But how we love our own talk!

A friend of ours died in circumstances that caused his family to doubt his salvation.

Amelie, who was then seven, comforted them with these words: 'I'm positive that he is in heaven. He was very nice to me. I prayed for him. I said to Jesus, "God promised Rahab, who did a favour for some Jews who were in trouble, that she and all her house would be saved [cf. Josh. 2]. This man belongs to my household. He is in my heart." There is no doubt that he is saved!'

When Jesus saw the faith of the men who brought the paralytic to Him (not the faith of the paralytic himself) then, we are told, He honoured them with a miracle of healing on their friends' behalf.

Allenby was the British general who freed Jerusalem from Turkish rule during World War I, without firing a single shot.

When he was a boy he used to repeat his evening prayers after his mother. They always ended with these words: 'Dear Lord, we would not forget Thine ancient people Israel. Hasten the day when Israel will again be Thy people and will be restored to Thy favour and their land.'

What joy it must have given the God of Israel, to hear an English boy pray such a prayer! In His good providence, God allowed Allenby to become the man to fulfill his childhood prayers.

Dwight L. Moody, the noted evangelist, used to go into saloons with a little boy named Tommy, who really knew how to pray. If Moody's exhortations met with a cool reception, Tommy would perch on a barrel of wine and begin praying aloud. He then kept on praying until he had 'prayed out' all the drunkards. Many were converted through his simple, yet effective, ministry.

A little girl prayed, 'Dear Lord, please make all the bad people good and all the good people nice.'

When a Rumanian child heard, for the first time, that a book exists in which are contained the names of all who will enter Paradise, he knelt and prayed: 'God, please write me down. My name is Rada Ionescu. I'd better spell it for you, so that there will be no mistake.' And he carefully pronounced each letter.

Then he added, 'Other people may have the same name as me. So, please note my name and address, and my date of birth, to avoid any confusion.'

Are we as precise and careful in our own relationships with God?

p067 ..... Prayers

An eight-year-old boy in America prayed, 'Father, my Daddy sometimes lets me sit on his lap and steer the car - but he puts both hands over mine. Please, put Your hands over those of the President as he rules our country to keep it safe.'

The prayers of young children are often full of insight.

* * *

A child knew he had done something very wrong. He had told his mother a lie. So he prayed, 'O God, make it not to have happened.'

This is not such an unreasonable prayer as it might seem. God can undo events for us. We regret having committed a sinful deed. We know it was as red as scarlet. Remorse cannot undo something done. Repentance obtains forgiveness, but how can the lie, murder, adultery, blasphemy or whatever it might be, be erased from history?

God can do even this. He makes sins that are scarlet as white as snow (ISA 1:18).

When Jesus changed water into wine at Cana, it was into the best wine, which is old wine. The liquid He gave to the wedding guests was not something which had formerly been water and had suddenly become wine. His miracle was profounder than that. In place of the water was something that had always been wine.

For King Hezekiah, God caused the sundial to go back ten degrees (ISA 38:8). Suppose this happened at 6 p.m. Miraculously, it was again 8 a.m. on the same day. He had said rash words to his wife, he might have been harsh with a servant, he might have issued a bad decree - but it was as if things had never happened.

God gave back to Hezekiah the day that had passed. In the spiritual realm this is possible. The same can be true of us in our daily lives. The child was right in praying 'God, make my lie not to have happened.'

"Look, your heads are bent! You must straighten up too."

A Christian child, aged ten, had been brought up on the Bible and its teachings about love. But there was a great deal of quarrelling in his family.

One day, following a harsh exchange of words between his parents, he approached his father. 'Daddy,' he said, 'please take me to an oculist, and to an ear specialist.'

'Why, son?' 'Well, there must be something wrong with me. I can't p069 ..... Interpretations

see the things I hear in the Bible, and I can't hear the things I see.'

Many of us would have to say the same. Jesus is the Word who became flesh. Our faith must be seen also in the flesh.

'Alex, get in the car,' urged his mother. 'I'm taking you to the doctor.'

'Why?' asked the five-year-old.

'Because of the cough.'

They came from the doctor's surgery to my house. Alex was happy and carefree. 'The doctor hasn't got a cough,' he told me. 'We went to see him, and he's OK!'

Hearing him say this, I told him once again the story of my conversion. Somebody who loved my soul brought me to Jesus, though I felt no need of Him. The friend told me that I must come to Him because of my sin. But I emerged happy from that first meeting with Jesus. I had discovered that He has no sin. He is clean and pure. This gave me a joy that has lasted for half a century.

If Jesus had committed a single sin, He could never have helped a single sinner. But because He was without any sin, the sinner can have confidence that all his transgressions are forgiven.

The last word is with Alex: 'So it's the same with Jesus as with my doctor! If you are taken to him with a cough, you are glad that he hasn't got a cough himself.'

* * *

When he was six, Alex sat looking at a picture of Golgotha. 'They killed the one who was good, and they killed those who were bad. But this is wrong. They ought not to have killed the robbers like that. Jesus? Yes. They were right to crucify Him, because His death opened up the gates of heaven for us. But robbers should only be locked up.'

A little French girl named Bernadette told her priest and her whole village that the virgin Mary had repeatedly appeared to her. This happened in Lourdes, and since then the village has become a world-famous place of pilgrimage.

Catholics believe in the objective reality of Bernadette's vision; Protestants would prefer to say that she had a subjective experience, because she was used to venerating Mary. These differing opinions, however, do not alter the value of the following episode.

An unbeliever asked Bernadette, 'What kind of expression did the Virgin have? Was she frowning? Was she sad? Did she smile?'

Bernadette replied, 'She was smiling.'

'Then show me how she smiled.'

Bernadette, so the story goes, smiled with an inimitable expression of mingled compassion, tolerance, grief for sin, painful surprise, and hopeful expectation.

The unbeliever fell to his knees. 'Now I believe!'

I have myself witnessed a similar incident in jail.

Have you ever looked attentively at the smile of a child who has a personal relationship with the Saviour? In that smile, all heaven is mirrored.

A girl of ten learned that the gospel must be preached to every creature, and she came to the conclusion that this must also apply to stalks of wheat. Were they not created by God?

But what should she preach to them?

She went into the field, and shouted, 'The Bible commands us to make His paths straight. Look, your heads are bent! You must straighten up, too!'

We should call upon everyone to 'straighten up.' And the stalks of wheat? They bow as a mark of gratitude to the earth, for nurturing them with water and minerals.

My wife and I are Jewish Christians. When Mihai was five, we took him to the synagogue on ~Simhat Tora~ (literally, 'the rejoicing in the Law'), which is the festival commemorating the giving of the Law on Sinai. The scroll of the Law is taken around the synagogue, and the people, especially the children, press forward to kiss it.

When the procession came near us, Mihai asked me 'Should I kiss the scroll?'

'It's up to you,' I said. I had previously explained to him the significance of the day and the ceremony.

The rabbi approached, and lowered the scroll so that Mihai could kiss it.

'Thank you,' said the child, 'but I will not kiss it.'

The procession came to a halt, and hundreds of pairs of eyes focused on him in consternation. Mihai, by now extremely tense, repeated his words: 'I will not kiss it.'

When the service was over, the president of the synagogue, who was a friend of mine, asked Mihai, 'Why did you do that?'

'Sir,' he said, 'God has given us mothers for kissing. The Law of God was given to be read and obeyed, not to be kissed.'

In Orthodox Churches also, the Gospel, luxuriously bound, is paraded so that all the communicants can kiss it. Few ever read it, and fewer attempt to obey it.

There is a Jewish legend that Terah, Abraham's father, was a manufacturer of idols. He made small wooden figures of the gods and sent his son to the market place to sell them.

But as soon as the boy Abraham found a buyer, he would say to him, 'I can see that you are an elderly person. Perhaps you are sixty or seventy years old.

So how can this god which my father made yesterday possibly help you?'

So he returned home at the end of the day with his merchandise unsold, and his father would beat him.

One day, he decided to test the reality of these gods for himself. In Terah's home was a chapel containing a series of wooden gods, with the figure of the chief god in the centre.

Little Abraham asked his mother to prepare a fine stew, which he planned to offer as a sacrifice to these so-called 'heavenly powers.'

He presented the food to the chief god, and knelt before it to see what would happen. The hours went by and still the god made no move. Finally Abraham took an axe and smashed all the gods except the chief one, into whose arms he placed the axe.

His father returned and found the idols hacked to pieces. He asked what had happened, and the boy replied, 'I presented some food to them. They quarrelled over who should have it, and the big fellow killed the smaller ones.'

'Don't be stupid,' said his father. 'They can't see, or speak, or move.'

'Then they are no gods,' replied Abraham, and with a rapid movement he destroyed the last idol.

Then he wandered far from his father's house, wondering all the time who had made the world.

He saw the moon rising, and said to himself, 'This must be he!'; and he adored it. But after a few hours, the moon set and the sun rose. 'Aha, this must be he!' he cried, and so he adored the sun.

But the sun also set. Then he thought, 'There must be someone who alternates the sun and the moon.'

He passed by a house and noticed a number of white linen cloths in the garden. Later, returning by the same road, he saw that the cloths were no longer white but many-coloured. There was no one to be seen but he deduced: 'There must be a man in the house. He is probably a dyer, and he has coloured the cloths. Likewise, in the heavens I can see no one, but I can see the colour of the sky change every day. There must be an invisible Master!'

And Abraham became a worshipper of the invisible God.

When Amelie was nine, she came to me one day with a serious question: 'Grandpa, are we allowed to say something when we know that God is wrong, or do we have to swallow our questions and keep quiet?'

I replied, 'Great men of God, like David and Job, spoke frankly with God when they sometimes had the impression that He was in the wrong. You can do that too. But what is it that has made you dissatisfied?'

'Two things. Firstly, He ought not to have given commandments. Daddy gives commandments as well. One should only give advice. Secondly, surely God was wrong when He said "Love your neighbour as yourself." We don't love ourselves very well. We torment ourselves and make our lives unhappy. If we were to love our neighbours like that, it would be awful for them! We have to love them ~better~.'

As regards Amelie's first criticism of God, she is correct; but the fault lies not with Him but with the translators of the Bible. What we call 'Commandments' are not commandments at all, but expressions of desires and enablings. The Hebrew language does not use the imperative, but the so-called 'jussive' tense. The prohibitions do not begin with the imperative (which in the Hebrew is ~lo~), but with ~al~, which conveys a desire.

A correct translation would be, 'Please do not kill,' 'Please do not steal,' and so on. Or, more to the point, 'If you love Me, you will not kill,' and so on.

As regards Amelie's second criticism, she is right again. To love your neighbour only as well as you love yourself would be inadequate. Jesus taught a better way:

p074 ..... From the Lips of Children

'As I have loved you, so you must love one another' (JHN 13:34). There is no greater love than to give your life for another.

After a sermon on obedience, a mother sought to reinforce the message for her child: 'You heard what the pastor said - you must

The child replied, 'You seem to have missed the other part of the sermon. Are you obedient to father?'

We all have filters; we often hear in sermons only what suits our interests and inclinations.

A little boy in New York wrote the following letter to God.

> Dear God, if You do all these things, You are pretty busy. Now, here is my question: What is the best time for me to talk to You? I know You are always listening - but when do You listen to New York?

Perhaps it had occurred to the child that God does not listen to every place at every time. For certain places, it can be too late for God to listen. It is now too late for Sodom and Gomorrah, for Capernaum and Bethsaida, just as there was a 'too late' for Esau after he had lost the blessing.

It is better to make arrangements ahead of time. God longs for human beings to communicate with Him. He is so anxious for us to do so that He says, 'Before they call, I will answer' (ISA 65:24).

A group of children were watching the space shuttle ~Discovery~ taking off like a ball of fire.

A little boy shouted, 'God is putting a new star in the sky!'

p075 ..... Interpretations

You can smile and say, 'This is a star that will last only a few days.' But all stars have only a finite existence. They appear, grow and die, like everything else in our knowable universe.

But there is a God who has put them into the sky. He also sends aloft the ~Discovery~, according to laws that He has ordained, and through the medium of human hands and minds which are also His creation.

Children grasp this and go straight to the First Cause, just as the Bible does:

'In the beginning, God' (GEN 1:1).

Amelie was asked a riddle. A man on a river bank has a wolf, a lamb, and a cabbage. He wants to get them safely on to the other bank, and the condition is that he can take only one at a time in his boat. How is he to do it? If he takes the wolf first, the sheep will eat the cabbage. If he takes the cabbage first, the wolf will eat the sheep. He can take the sheep first, but on the next crossing he will have to take either the cabbage or the wolf; in both cases, one of the objects will be eaten on the opposite shore.

Some of the adults who were present hazarded a few guesses. Finally Amelie said, 'We should hasten the Lord's return through prayer and preaching, for when that happens the lion and the sheep will be friends. The cabbage will be safe, too, because the kingdom of God is not a matter of food and drink' (cf. ROM 14:17).

For her, the Lord's return was a certainty, upon which she counted to solve the problems of life. Sadly, it rarely enters into the calculations of adults. That is why He will return for the children of God; for children He counts, He is important. 1

A four-year-old toddler had his own version of the pledge to the American flag:

One morning, a boy said to his father, 'I dreamed about God last night.' 'What was He doing in your dream?'

'He was locked in a cupboard. He was begging me to let Him out. What does it mean, Daddy?'

The father could have answered that when we shut Jesus out of our lives, it is as if we were locking Him in a cupboard, and all His powers of love and goodness with Him. Let us unlock the door, and let Him enter our lives.

The Bible uses a slightly different image: Jesus says, in effect, 'Behold, I stand at the door of your heart and knock. If you let Me in [He never enters uninvited], I will come in and eat with you, and share My bounties with you' (cf. REV 3:20).

In Russia some children were taken from parents who had taught them about God. In the atheistic boarding school to which they were sent, they were given a doll.

When they thought they were unobserved, the children decided to play at 'prayer meetings.' But they found that the doll's knees did not bend and so it could not kneel.

One of the children went to the teacher. 'Please can I have another doll? This one is plain stupid.'

'Why do you say that?'

'Well, everyone who does not kneel before God must be stupid.'

It was a witness to the Communist teacher.

A sixteen-year-old Arab father took his baby girl to an Arab orphanage in Israel. Her fourteen-year-old mother had died in childbirth. If the child had been a boy, the father's family would have looked after it, but they had no use for a girl.

The young father visited the child, Muna, regularly. As she grew older she looked forward joyfully to his visits, and would wait for him to arrive, crying 'Baba [Daddy] comes!'

Every time he came she clung to him, begging him not to leave, or at least to take her with him.

Eventually he remarried and decided not to visit any more. His new wife did not want the child, and he could not bear his daughter's weeping.

Muna was devastated. She refused to eat or drink, and sat at the door, repeating over and over again, 'Baba comes.' No one could make her give up her self-imposed fast. Finally she had to be force-fed.

Still she continued to insist, 'Baba comes!' A missionary tried to tell her about a heavenly father, but she would not listen. One Baba had abandoned her. Why have another, who would probably be no better?

Fortunately the missionary was able to convince her that the heavenly Father is an entirely different kind of Baba, a Baba whose love never fails. Muna became once more a happy child.

Too many of us accept the notion of a heavenly Father who might forsake us or let us down. Who needs a Father like that? Have we not been forsaken by enough humans? Why open ourselves up to another bitter experience?

But this picture of the heavenly Father is a false one. He loves to the uttermost. He runs to meet the returning prodigal. He gives him the finest robe. He kills the fatted calf in his honour. Then He says, 'What more can I do, to prove I love you?' (cf. ISA 5:1-4).

When Mihai was four or five, he asked me, 'How was Jesus born?'

He had heard the story many times, but I told him again how Jesus was born in a stable, how the shepherds and magi visited Him, and so on.

'I know all that,' he said. 'But I'm curious about something else. I've often heard you quote the proverb, "Whatever is born of a cat, eats mice." But if Jesus had been born like us, He would have been bad like us. So He must have been born entirely different.'

Intuition like that has enabled Christians through the centuries to believe in the revelation of the virgin birth of Jesus.

The 'Christian Mission to the Communist World,' having received news of a Lithuanian Christian who had been imprisoned for his faith, sent a parcel to his mother.

To their great surprise, they received a letter of thanks from the prisoner himself; because of a serious injury, he had been released before completing his sentence.

He wrote:

> Working as a slave-labourer in a uranium mine, I was hit by a large chunk of rock. As a result I have become a hunchback for life.
>
> Naturally, I was deeply depressed. I was in love with a girl. Would she accept me, with such a deformity? Who would want to marry a hunchback? I felt like an outcast. Little children mocked me, crying behind my back, 'Hunchback! Hunchback!'
>
> One day a little boy stopped me on the street and asked me, 'Uncle, what is it that you are carry your back?' I thought, ~Now I will be mocked again.~ But nevertheless I replied, 'A hump.'
> He looked at me with love. 'Uncle, I don't believe that. God is love, He does not give people deformities.

> What you have on your back is a box containing angel wings. If you carry it with humility and love to the end of your life, the box will then open; the wings will unfold; and with those wings you will fly to a beautiful heaven.' I wept when I heard those words. Even now I weep again, as I write these lines.

This Soviet child had within him the Holy Spirit, who in Scripture is called the Comforter, and knew how to offer a word of cheer to one in need.

We too have the promise of the same Spirit, and under His blessed influence, our words can provide comfort and encouragement.

A sick child was asked how he was feeling. He replied, 'I suffer, but I suffer little, because Jesus said, "Suffer little, children, to come unto Me." Only those who think of their sufferings as little are called.'

To this child a comma made all the difference. The earliest Greek manuscripts have no trace of punctuation. Jesus ~could~ have pronounced the sentence like that!

The parents of President Ronald Reagan did not practise much religion, but his grandfather did. When the family were preparing to dine with him, little Ronald's parents warned him, 'Grandfather always asks every child to recite a Bible verse at meal time. You must have one memorized.'

But the future president was only four, so his mother found him an easy verse to remember: 'Jesus wept' (JHN 11:35). Ronald was now sure of himself.

At dinner, with ten children sitting at the table, grandfather asked the first for a verse. 'Jesus wept,' he replied promptly.

Ronald was in despair. What was he to do now? To make matters worse, his mother had not been the only one to find a simple solution to the problem. Two other children produced the same verse, and grandfather eyed them with displeasure. Ronald shrank in his chair.

When his turn came, however, he had a sudden inspiration. 'Jesus weeps,' he volunteered.

The other children laughed. Grandfather rebuked him: 'That is not written in the Bible!'

Ronald defended himself. 'It may not be written, but it is true.'

Grandfather was unrelenting: 'Jesus wept then because He was at the tomb of a friend. Why would He weep now?'

'He weeps now,' said Ronald, 'because we children only know that He wept a long time ago.'

That was a remarkable insight for a child. The Bible teaches that we are involved with a God who is ~crushed~ because of our adulterous hearts (EZE 6:9, NKJV). Our Lord is also wearied (MAL 2:17). When on earth, He was a man of sorrows acquainted with grief. As such, He represented the heart of God (cf. JHN 14:9).

At the age of thirty He was told that He looked around fifty (JHN 8:57). So much sorrow was visible on His face that some believed He was suicidal, and asked 'Will He kill Himself?' (JHN 8:22). That is not a question that is asked of somebody who looks cheerful and happy.

It is part of children's theology to seek God's sadness, and to want to make Him rejoice with singing' (ZEP 3:17).

A four-year-old in an American department store was given several biscuits, among them one shaped like the United States. His mother asked, 'What does this remind you of?'

As a pastor in Rumania during the war, I had only one suit, which eventually became worn and frayed. I had to get a new one.

One morning in our family devotions, we read these words: 'The man with two tunics should share with him who has none' (LUK 3:11).

Mihai, who was then four, interrupted. 'You've got two suits now. You should give one to Brother X, who is in rags.'

'Which one should I give him?' I asked.

'The new one, of course. God always gives the best.'

It was a difficult decision, but I took his words as a mandate, and the God who gives generously somehow kept me clothed.

On her first visit to a church with stained glass windows, a little girl asked her mother who the persons were through whom the sun shone. 'They are saints,' her mother replied.

She thought about this for a while, then said: 'Now I understand what being a saint means. It means, to be a girl through whom Jesus's beauty shines, even if I'm not beautiful myself.'

When one reads the sad biographies and dark episodes in the lives of some saints, this childish definition becomes astonishingly perceptive and true.

A father wishing to put his son to the test gave him a pound coin and a ten-pence piece for the Sunday school collection. 'Put whichever of the two you want to in the offering,' he said. 'It's your choice.'

When the boy returned he said to his father, 'I listened to the pastor's advice - and I gave the ten-pence piece.'

'Is that what the pastor really said?'

'He certainly did! He said we should give cheerfully, and it was a lot easier to be cheerful giving the ten-pence piece!'

We should all give as much as we can cheerfully, but we have to learn how to give both cheerfully and with generosity.

In our family, before going to church on Sunday each grandchild receives from his daddy some money to put in the offering.

Five-year-old Alex once queried this. 'Why should I give money to God? Does He want to become a millionaire? Let's send Him a Bible. You told me that there's a verse in it that says, "The love of money is the root of all evil."'

God not only knows but inspired the Bible, and we need not remind Him of those words. But some pastors would do well to ponder St. Paul's comment.

I know one clergyman whose small granddaughter asked him, 'What does the word "allergy" mean?' He explained it as an aversion to certain foods or medicines. The child replied, 'I understand, Grandpa. You are allergic to money.'

If only that were true of all ministers! Too many nowadays are preoccupied with their benefits and investment and properties. Even the clergyman who told this story said that he felt that this most beautiful compliment was not entirely true of himself, though he wished it were.

Like many children, Amelie sometimes has a finicky appetite.

Once I said to her, 'It's not good for you to only eat dessert. You must first eat your soup and salad, and the other good things that Grandma prepares.'

She replied, 'I eat as Scripture tells me to.'

'What do you mean by that?' I inquired in surprise.

p085 ..... Misinterpretations

'The Bible says that God prefers the dessert! Look, here it is, read it.'

The verse she actually showed me said that God led His people forty years 'through the desert' - she had misread it as 'dessert.'

I smiled, but I could not help wondering whether perhaps we adults are not sometimes just as guilty of reading into the Bible what we hope to find there.

The English language, with its many 'homonyms' - words that sound the same but have very different meanings - can be very confusing to a young child. A five-year-old observed, 'It must be very wrong to fly in a plane. Jesus said, "Lo, I am with you always."' Of course, he had thought it said 'low.'

We smile. But in truth, Jesus is with us only if we seek the low places. The Bible says that 'in lowliness of mind' we should value others better than ourselves (cf. PHP 2:3).

* * *

On the other hand, Amelie once remarked that Jesus must have enjoyed flying in aeroplanes. Puzzled, I told her that He never flew. But she insisted that He did, and pointed to a heading in her Bible: Jesus' flight to Egypt' and to LUK 6:17 where it is said that Jesus 'stood in the plain.' As his disciples and a large multitude were with Him, she added, it must have been a large plane!

The subtleties of English spelling had not yet become apparent to her.

I was reminded of a Russian Baptist who, unlike other Baptists, insisted on making the sign of the cross. He justified himself by asserting, 'It is written in the Bible that we must do so.'

In Russian, the word ~krestitsia~ has two meanings: to be baptized, and to cross oneself. He had adopted both meanings of the word.

Schoolchildren were asked to draw the holy family. One child drew them in an aeroplane. Four heads were looking through the windows.

Curious, the teacher asked, 'You have Jesus, Mary and

'That's Pontius, the pilot!'

From the mouths of babes have come many versions of the Lord's prayer. One prayed, 'Our Father, Harold be Thy name,' and 'Give us this day our jelly bread.'

But are grown-ups any better than children?

When Jesus cried from the cross, 'Eli, Eli,' His hearers thought He was calling Elijah. How do we listen to the words of the Bible?

Jesus once asked, 'How do you read it?' (LUK 10:26).

A child who heard that God Himself wrote the Ten Commandments on tablets of stone observed, 'God must write with His left hand.'

'Why do you say that?'

'Well, you read to me yesterday from the Bible, that Jesus sits on God's right hand - so He can't move it.'

To an adult this is an entertaining deduction, but it is also a correct guess. The Law comes from the side of harshness, called in the Bible the left side; whereas grace flows from the right side (cf. MTT 25:33). The saved are on His right.

Some children might have theological intuitions, but since they are human and influenced by the good and evil to which they are exposed, it is our responsibility to be careful what we say in their presence.

A teacher asked in class, 'Is the world round?'

p087 ..... Misinterpretations

Isaac replied, 'No, Ma'am.'

'Is it flat, then?'

'No, Ma'am.'

'Well,' demanded the teacher, 'if it is neither round nor flat, what is it?'

Isaac was equal to the challenge: 'My Papa says it's crooked.'

* * *

Another child was asked, 'Where do you live?'

'In hell,' was the startling reply.

Next he was asked, 'Who is your father?'

'The devil.'

The teacher was shocked. 'How can you say such things?'

'It's what my mother says, all the time.'

Children can receive negative images from us – of the world, mankind, the Church, clergy, rulers, our nation.

If they do, we will be held responsible for their negative or false theology.

It is wrong to criticize churches, clergy or grown-ups in the presence of children.

* * *

During World War II, a child in an American home heard only the worst about Germans from the tender age of two. Since there was no television, the child could not possibly understand what a 'German' actually was.

But once her mother warned her, 'Be careful; there are germs on the plate.' Now she knew. When her father came into the room, she announced, 'I've got Germans on my plate!'

Be careful of what you tell children. If you stir up disgust in them for a certain category of men, they may unintentionally project it on to others who are related to them perhaps only by a syllable.

p088 ..... From the Lips of Children

At the age of six, Amelie was more charitable towards sinners than were most of her elders. 'I don't believe there is a hell,' she said. 'Bad men enter Paradise as well - but with a sad heart.'

Concerning the existence of hell, there has been much debate. Is it a place, or simply a horrible state of mind experienced by those eaten with remorse, with no hope of reparation or restoration?

When St. John Chrysostom was asked which of the two he thought was true, he answered, 'I don't speculate about hell. I shun it!'

* * *

At seven, Amelie approached me one day and asked me to baptize her dog. 'Honey, only humans are baptized, not dogs.'

'Why?'

'Because dogs can't tell the difference between good and evil. They are not responsible.'

She was thrilled. 'If my dog has no sin, then it will surely be with me in the resurrection!'

Does not Isaiah 11 describe the messianic kingdom as belonging also to sheep and tame wolves, which will be led by a little child?

* * *

Children's questions are sometimes perceptive, and sometimes foolish and perplexing. Amelie once stumped me with: 'Grandpa, why don't you bow to windows?'

'Wherever does the Bible say such a foolish thing?'

She promptly showed me: 'Honour widows.' With her limited vocabulary and experience - she knew nothing about widows - she had given the printer the benefit of the doubt and supplied the 'missing' letter. She wanted to fulfill a commandment which she thought she had found in the Bible, even though it made absolutely no sense.

p089 ..... Misinterpretations

When it comes to fulfilling God's commands - do we lean on our own understanding?

Jewish theology distinguishes between ~mitzvah~, a commandment that is intelligible, and ~chok~, a commandment for which we can see no reason but which must be fulfilled because God says so.

* * *

Members of a family were discussing the Christmas story. The mother asked the others why they thought Jesus was born in a stable.

Seven-year-old John answered, 'Because there weren't any doctors at that time.'

'But,' countered his mother, 'God could have provided a nice place for Him to be born in if He had wanted to.'

'Well,' reasoned John, 'God was in Mary's tummy, and He couldn't work out anything from there.'

We know of no high thoughts or great deeds on Jesus' part while He was in Mary's womb. Some keep Him locked up in a closet, and then wonder why he does not perform miracles.

* * *

Eight-year-old Amelie confided one day, 'I love a boy who is in my class, and I told him so.'

'What did he say?'

'He said he couldn't stand me, and he hit me on the head as well.'

'Well then, you had a chance to obey Jesus' advice to respond with love!'

'But Jesus told us to turn the other cheek when somebody hits you on the cheek. He didn't say what to do when somebody hits you on the head. So I did the same thing to him, and now he won't forget me.'

Children, like us, have a tendency to pharisaism. They also have their own excuses for evading the universal duty of love, which applies in all circumstances when there is no specific commandment covering an unexpected situation.

* * *

A boy of six saw a skeleton for the first time and wanted to know what it was.

'Those are the bones of a man who has died,' he was told.

'Oh,' he commented, with childish logic, 'so it's just the fat that goes to heaven!'

In this case the child was wrong in his theology. Fat can be an impediment to entering heaven: 'Small is the gate and narrow the road that leads to life' (MTT 7:14). Delicacies and luxuries must be left to others if we are to advance along that narrow way.

* * *

A Baptist child in America was baptized at the early age of six, on a particularly cold day. Next day he sang with his family the hymn 'Holy, holy, holy,' which ends with the words, 'God in three persons.' The child sang, 'God in four persons.'

When he was chided for this, he said, 'But I was baptized in the names of four persons. When the pastor immersed me, he said "In the name of the Father- Brr! - the Son- Brrr! - and the Holy Spirit- Brrr!"'

The pastor had shivered aloud, and the child, too overwhelmed by emotion to register the chill of the water, had assumed that 'Brrr' was the name of a fourth member of the Trinity.

In Communist countries, where the underground Church has no baptistries, believers in winter make holes in the ice through which to baptize.

In Western countries, we should not only count our blessings, but also ignore our inconveniences.

* * *

p091 ..... Misinterpretations

During family devotions a child heard that we are made of dust and, when we die, return to dust. A little later he commented, 'There's a man under my bed who's either being born or dying.'

'What do you mean?' queried his startled mother.

'There's a lot of dust under my bed!'

* * *

Another child was taught that Adam became a living soul when God breathed His spirit into him. He sighed: 'So God is dead.'

The child could not be convinced otherwise: 'Anyone who gives up his spirit is dead,' he explained.

* * *

At five, Mihai asked me where apricot trees come from. I told him, 'You have to dig a hole in the ground, put an apricot stone in it, cover it and then water it. In due course a tree will grow.'

Excitedly he summoned his brother and together they followed my instructions. After watering their buried treasure, they dug it up again immediately to see whether a tree had begun to grow. Naturally, they were greatly disappointed.

Children in this respect make the same mistakes as adults. We all rush to see results. God made the world in six days, not one.

* * *

When I read to Mihai from the book of Joshua, about how God ordered wars, his comment was, 'This must have been before God repented and became a Christian.'

Christians should take care not to read the writings of the Old Testament undiscerningly.

* * *

Children, it seems, sometimes know only too well how to be deceitful.

p092 ..... From the Lips of Children

A Slovak nun, a primary school teacher, tells of an amusing incident. She was distributing sweets to the children on St. Nicholas' day. One child, Stanko, was ill, so she gave a slipper full of sweets to another boy, John, to take to him.

When Stanko was better, she asked him if he had enjoyed the present. He claimed that he had never received it. So she decided to confront the two boys.

'I gave them to you,' said John, pointing to himself.

'I didn't get anything,' protested Stanko.

But John, pointing to himself again, repeated, 'I gave them to you. Don't you call me "you," when you speak to me? Well then, I gave them to "you." I carried out my assignment.'

Once I had to speak to an American pastor about his financial dealings, which were not above board. He said, 'You don't understand the Bible at all. All money belongs to God. I am God's child. What's wrong with depositing God's money in the bank account of one of His beloved children? We Christians all belong to one body. It only seems that I have dishonestly taken for myself something that belongs to another. We are one; the money belonged to a member of the body; and after I have taken it, continues to be the property of the same body- though of another member.'

Such deceptions are amusing in children, but in adults they are criminal.

As we seek to become like little children in matters of faith, let us at the same time remember that all of us, children as well as adults, have sinned. We do well to shun childish foibles, while emulating childlike faith.

* * *

The greatest danger in children's theology lies in the fact that they are prone to gullibility. Because of their trusting nature, they are easily led astray. The suggestibility of all human beings is limitless, but it is greatest in children.

Two small boys were discussing the myth of Icarus.

p093 ..... Misinterpretations

'There was once a prisoner who wanted to escape. He stuck some feathers on himself with wax and flew. But he went so near the sun that the wax melted, the feathers fell off and he fell into the sea!'

'Is that a true story?'

'Of course it's true! It's in my history book.'

Another boy was a member of the Orthodox Church; he was sure that St. George really did kill a dragon, because he had seen ikons portraying the victory.

We can learn a great deal from children, but let us grow in understanding and not be taken in by every wind of doctrine, nor be led astray from the truth and go after fables (cf. 1 Tim. 4). Furthermore, let us not demand of our pastors that they 'tell us pleasant things' (ISA 30:10).

* * *

A child asked his father, 'Why are all the pastors in America either white or black? Why aren't there any green pastors?'

'Where did you find such a silly idea?' laughed his father.

'Daddy, you read yesterday from Psalm 23 that He leads us to green pastors.'

This urban child did not know what a pasture was, and could not relate to it.

Pastors must be very careful to communicate effectively. Even adults can misunderstand what they are told, thinking only in terms of their own theological vocabulary- obviously more limited than that of the pastor. They relate what he says to what they know.

I was born a Jew. The Christian language was completely foreign to me. When at the age of twenty-seven I entered a Christian church for the first time and heard the congregation singing of 'the lamb of God,' I whispered to my wife, 'These are the idolators of old who worship animals!'

Children's misapprehensions should serve as a reminder to theologians and preachers, to speak the truth

p094 ..... From the Lips of Children

plainly. They are handling matters of eternal significance.

* * *

'God must have an awfully big stomach,' said a little boy returning from church.

'Why?' asked his mother.

'Because the Bible says, "In Him we live and move and have our being."' (ACT 17:28).

Another boy aged four observed that God must have many ears, because He has so many prayers to listen to at once.

The Hindus paint Krishna with many arms, because God has to help many people simultaneously.

Children, and primitive religions, have sensed a truth: heavenly beings have many more organs for perceiving reality than we do.

It is written of the cherubim that 'their entire bodies, including their backs, their hands and their wings, were completely full of eyes' (EZE 10:12). They also have four faces, with ears, noses and mouths on each.

If this is true of His heavenly creatures, one can be sure that God is even better equipped for hearing, seeing and handling everything. Children can be reassured about God's capacity to take care of them. There is no need to worry that a prayer will go by unheard.

p095 ..... Versions

[illustration appears at this point in the book]

Back to playing with toys.

I taught little Alex the verse, 'He shall pray unto God, and He will be favourable unto him' (JOB 33:26, AV). But the word 'favourable' did not exist in his six-year-old vocabulary. When he came to recite the verse, he said, 'He shall pray unto God, and God will pray unto him.'

He could not understand why his 'version' was wrong; it tallied with his experience. 'I pray to God and tell Him what I desire. Then He prays to me and tells me what He desires. I tell Him I love Him; He tells me the same thing. He prays even better than I do!'

We have a problem; we need a sense of purpose in life, something to live for. Jesus has a problem; He needs workers in His kingdom.

p096 ..... From the Lips of Children

We pray to Him about our problems. He also speaks to us through the Bible, the Church, His special servants, an inner voice, the events of life; sometimes even visions and dreams.

Ultimately the child was right. We pray to Him, and He to us.

* * *

Sometimes children have unusual insights. An eight-year-old girl said, 'I wonder why all these people are talking about their experiences with Jesus? I never had an "experience." He told me to come; and I came. He said, "I will give you rest," and He gave it to me. I wonder also why they bother Jesus so much. He gave them rest; they should give Him rest, too.'

* * *

There are often guests in my home. The conversation ranges over many subjects. Once I and a fellow-Christian were discussing some philosophical problems. Ten- year-old Amelie was quietly playing with her toys in the sam room.

I remarked, 'Every point of view is actually a "point of blindness," for it blinds you to every other point of view. If you look at the ceiling of a room, you cannot see the floor, and vice versa. If you look at the right side of the room you cannot see the left. Each point of view of a party, religion or social class diminishes your ability to see with equal clarity a different point of view. Only an overall intuition can get at the truth.'

To our surprise, Amelie interrupted. 'Only to see the whole is still blindness. It keeps you from recognising that there is not just the whole but also the parts, which are different from each other. The "whole" is an abstraction, which means it is only part of reality. The truth comprehends all the parts and their sum, in a totality.'

Now I cannot vouch for the fact that these were her exact words, as I had no tape recorder running. But the thought here expressed was very definitely hers.

Everyone in the room was stunned for a moment. Amelie went back to playing with her dolls.

A multitude of Christians are now so enamoured of ecumenism that they can see only the whole as the representation of true Christianity. But individual denominations are as legitimate a part of the truth as is the sum total of which they are part - and even that statement assumes that an organic whole is a possibility and that it would be recognized as such.

Let us pursue Jesus' desire that all Christians should be one. Let us also value the certain truth that we have in our own denominations. Christianity would not have denominations were it not for the good of those who love God, though we do not yet understand the mystery that lies behind it.

But a child understood.

* * *

A six-year-old girl had heard the story of the annunciation of Mary, and asked her father, 'What is a virgin?'

He replied, 'It's a kind of forest. Look at these pictures of virgin forests in the Amazon. They are forests never penetrated by man.'

'Oh!' exclaimed the girl. 'Then the angel saw her as a virgin, alone in such a forest with no man ever to hug her. So he came to spend an hour with her and tell her beautiful things. Angels are ~neat~!'

* * *

Five-year-old Alex thoughtfully remarked, 'God will have to be patient with me when I become an angel. I won't be able to fly very well. I expect it is like skating - you fall over a lot before you get good at it.'

Later he wondered, 'Aren't fallen angels merely angels who are just starting out?'

The point about fallen angels is of course far-fetched.

p098 ..... From the Lips of Children

But Christians begin angel-like lives here on earth. Like children, they should not be discouraged if they do not become instant flying experts! It takes a great deal of practice to develop spiritual as well as physical skills.

* * *

When Mihai was six, I attempted to impress upon his young mind the truth of JHN 3:16, that God gave His only Son to die for us.

'Isn't it wonderful?' I asked, and was taken aback when he calmly replied, 'Not at all.'

I was surprised, and insisted that he explain what he meant, and he readily did so. 'It is wonderful when a poor man gives a large gift to the Church. But large gifts are normal for a rich man. For God, it must be the normal thing to give the best.'

Since we belong to God's family, it should be normal for us to give of our best too.

* * *

A child of five, on hearing the Christmas story, commented, 'See what the angel wants you to understand. The news of Jesus' birth was a great joy only to people. For the angels, it was great sadness. They were going to be without Him for a long time.'

May we too always be aware of how angels feel about what happens to us! Sin gives us pleasure; if it did not, we would never sin. But it grieves the angels.

* * *

An eleven-year-old boy once acted the role of Joseph, Jesus's adoptive father, in a Sunday school Christmas production. When he discussed with his parents what sort of shoes he should wear, they suggested sandals. He wanted cowboy boots. When his father explained that it was unlikely that Joseph would have worn cowboy boots, the boy replied, 'Yes, but he didn't have braces on his teeth, either!'

p099 ..... Versions

He had understood that biblical personalities can be represented in a contemporary way.

Some believers do not accept this. A lady once said to me, 'My daughter claims to be a believer, but she is not born again. Look how short her dress is - and how bare her arms!'

I pointed to the picture of her mother that hung on the wall. It was taken in the last century. The lady wore a dress as long as a nun's habit.

'What you yourself are wearing,' I pointed out, 'would have seemed like a mini-skirt to your mother. You have to accept the fact that your children may hold to the same faith as you do, but in forms other than those to which you are accustomed.'

* * *

The twelve-year-old son of a doctor learned in Sunday school that Jesus was delivered up to death out of envy (cf. MTT 27:18). When he was asked why Jesus was crucified, he replied, 'Well, in the Bible it says it was because of envy. Doctors were mad at Him because He healed people for nothing. If there were many like Him, my father would be broke.'

A pastor's son contributed, 'He also deprived priests of their income by forgiving the sins of men who had not brought a sacrifice. Was Jesus right to take away the jobs of men like that?'

Albert Schweitzer, like many hundreds of self-sacrificing physicians, did not use his medical knowledge as a means of making money. On the contrary, he served the poor while remaining in poverty himself. Likewise many pastors have been more concerned preaching the gospel and ministering to others, than about looking for high salaries and personal well-being.

* * *

Somebody asked a child what it is like when you die. 'When you die,' he replied, 'God takes care of you, just like your mother did when you were alive - except God doesn't yell at you all the time.'

Ought we not to make sure that children do not see such a contrast between God and ourselves?

God is perfect. Since we are Christians, children cannot see why we are not perfect too. Jesus said, 'Be ye perfect, even as your Father in heaven is perfect' - perfect in this respect at least, that we do not yell at our children.

* * *

During the Nazi era, a great many members of my family were killed for the crime of being Jewish. When the slaughter began, Mihai was only two. He grew up in our home, constantly hearing conversation about killing. It seemed that whoever entered our home spoke only about relatives and acquaintances who had been murdered. The concept of actual killing was as familiar to Mihai as toy soldiers and toy wars were to other children.

One evening, after we had prayed together before bedtime, he asked me, 'Will we be killed too?'

He was only four.

I replied, 'Possibly.'

'How will it happen?'

'The police will come and take us away in a car,' I explained.

Mihai had never been in a car. In Eastern Europe pastors had no money for bus fares, let alone for cars. He rejoiced. 'And will they drive us around much?'

'Quite a lot; to the edge of town.'

'And then what?'

'And then they will shoot us all with a machine gun.'

He was silent for a few moments. Then he said earnestly, 'They will kill us a ~little~, and then we will be resurrected much - and we will go to heaven. The police cannot follow us there because they don't know about the ladder that reaches up to the sky.'

p101 ..... Versions

The Soviet Baptist Peters was killed while transporting Bibles which had been printed in secret. As his wife wept, their four-year-old child asked, 'Mother, is heaven a very bad, ugly place?'

'What makes you ask such a foolish question?'

'I can't understand why you're crying, now that Daddy has gone to a place like Paradise, which you both always told me was lovely.'

Compare what these children say with the words of a pastor I read about. He was asked at a party, 'Can one be ~sure~? Where do you go, Pastor, when you die?'

'To heaven, of course,' replied the pastor. 'But why should we talk about such a sad subject as death?'

For a Christian, 'death' is quite the wrong word. It means passing to a much better life. 'He is not the God of the dead, but of the living' (MTT 22:32).

Often children do not 'put the lid on' the dead, but speak of them as if they were still living.

Alex once prayed at the meal table, 'God, thank you for the food. Please feed those in heaven also, especially General Eisenhower and George Washington.'

At the age of eight Amelie prayed for a multitude of friends - and also for the well-being of St. Paul. I asked her why. She answered, 'Paul finishes an epistle by saying "Pray for us," and that includes the other apostles. Mustn't we obey everything in the Bible? It doesn't say anywhere that we must stop praying for them when they die.'

* * *

A family had moved into a new house which was far more luxurious than the one they had lived in previously. The child wandered round admiring all the new and different things, and finally exclaimed, "What beautiful things we have now!' He would never have thought to say to his father, 'These beautiful things belong to you.'

p102 ..... From the Lips of Children

The child understood what the Bible says: 'All things are yours ... and you are of Christ' (1CO 3:21,23).

In Russia, schoolchildren are taught that man has descended from apes.

A child stood up and said, 'Thank you, teacher, for giving us this explanation. I always wondered how Communists could be so wicked. I never knew but now you have made it clear. You are wicked because you come from gorillas.'

Another child in Russia reacted differently when told of his alleged descent: 'That can't be true. I've seen apes in the zoo and they're delightful creatures. It is a pleasure to see them jumping around, they grin at children, they are grateful if you give them a nut. I can't believe that wicked Communists could have descended from such happy creatures as apes.'

* * *

Rumania is an Orthodox country. In such countries it is the custom for the priest to go from house to house with a cross in his hand, blessing the family, on the first day of every month.

Little four-year-old Gaby was stopped by a priest in the street. He held out the cross towards her so that she could kiss it.

Looking up at him gravely, she asked, 'Why should I kiss it? The cross doesn't need my love. ~You~ do.' Whereupon she reached up, grabbed hold of the priest's beard, pulled his face down to hers, and kissed him right on the mouth.

The words might have seemed impolite, the gesture forward. But oh! If we could lavish on our fellow human beings the love we show for mere things, how much brighter this world would be! I know many Christians who are attentive to the words of Scripture, but deaf to the heart-cries of those around them.

p103 ..... Versions

It is not the cross, but the Man of the cross who needs our love. And Jesus said in effect, 'Inasmuch as you have shown love to your fellow man, you have shown it to Me.'

The child was right.

* * *

When he was five, Mihai said to me, 'Father, I was smarter than you! When you were young you sinned and then later you repented. I was born a Christian from the very beginning.'

A professor of religion once asked his class, 'How many of you were born Christians?' Several hands went up. He smiled tolerantly, then commented, 'No, you weren't. You were born miserable sinners like all the rest of us.'

We are not born sinning, but we are born sinners; we need the grace of God to enable us to become Christians. Through dedicated Christian parents, this grace can be mediated to children at a tender age.

In this regard, Mihai had not been smarter than me!

* * *

Amelie wanted to know how Jonah managed to get out of the fish.

Alex, with the confidence of a six-year-old, had an explanation: 'Jonah was a prophet - that means he was smart. When he boarded the ship he knew that ships sometimes sink and that he might then be swallowed by a fish. So to be on the safe side he put some red pepper in his pocket. He put the pepper in the fish's nose and that made it sneeze. Then he could slip out.'

We smile leniently at the naivete of a child, but how prepared are we for emergencies? More to the point - do we arm ourselves daily for the battle with evil? The Bible describes in precise detail the armour that will help the Christian to cope (cf. EPH 6:13-17).

* * *

p104 ..... From the Lips of Children

At seven Alex loved football, and tried to explain it to his Grandpa - who was not really interested: 'During the game it sometimes seems that your team is losing, but in the final minutes the game can turn and you can finish up as the winner.

It's the same in the game between God and the devil. On Good Friday it seemed that God had lost. Jesus had died on the cross. But then God turned things round, and on Easter Sunday He put the ball in the devil's goal! God came out the winner.'

Let us never say 'We have lost' or 'We are lost.' The Referee has not yet blown the final whistle.

* * *

Six-year-old Alex was much impressed by a film about chivalry.

'When I'm big I'll be a knight,' he decided. 'Then I'll have to fall in love with a lady. But Grandpa, don't be frightened. When you fall in love, you don't fall down and break your bones. You fall up!'

* * *

A small boy once said something to another which he had probably heard from his parents: 'Your God is evil' Such words never come from the heart of a child.

The young Christian replied, 'Really? Then let's work together to make Him good.'

'That's stupid. We can't decide how God should be.'

The Christian child (who was perhaps eight years old) said, 'Sure we can. God was once a boy like you and me, in the house of Joseph and Mary. They taught Him every day by word and example to be loving, good, honest and hard-working. If Jesus had been born in some other home, wicked parents might have taught Him swearing, lying, stealing and drinking. We can teach God.'

This was a child's way of expressing thoughts which are too profound for words.

The Bible says that we can 'magnify' God - which means, to make Him bigger. Bigger in what? We can make Him rejoice with singing (ZEP 3:17). We can make Him very sad. We can provoke Him to wrath. We ~can~ decide how God should be. God is love - but so much depends on our response.

p105 ..... Versions

p106 ..... Reactions

[illustration appears at this point in the book]

Little Alex injured himself climbing a fence.

A child, who was expelled from Sunday school for being naughty, cried, 'I want my money back!'

I once did the same. I was at a Sunday morning service in a church in Boston, Massachusetts. The customary offering was taken, and I put some money on the plate. Then the pastor preached a sermon against Richard Nixon.

Though I had not voted for Nixon, I was not at all disposed to sit through a sermon against him in the morning worship hour. I bore with the minister for some ten minutes, then stood up and interrupted him: 'Please start speaking about God' (he had mentioned neither God nor Christ).

The pastor was unnerved, and shouted back, 'I have the right to say what I like.'

I replied, 'Not so, sir! When I ask for cheese at a grocer's, I get cheese; if I ask for tomatoes I get tomatoes. The store belongs to somebody else but because I am

p107 ..... Reactions

paying, I am considered the boss. I've paid here, too. I put money in the offering plate on the assumption that I would get my money's worth of knowledge about God. If you want to talk about Richard Nixon that's all right by me, but then please give me my money back.'

I had applied the principle of children's theology. If there were more children in the churches, pastors would have to give proper value, or go broke!

* * *

We were walking in a park with Mihai, who was probably four years old at the time. At one point he had to be taken to a public lavatory. As he left he said, 'The lady in charge is a very good Christian. She allows people to make her home smelly. She couldn't be nicer.'

What a beautiful image of a Christian, who is friendly and hospitable even to those he finds repulsive! He remembers that Jesus showed compassion for the poor, the unlovely, the weak; and that He invites to His banquet those from the byways as well as the highways.

* * *

When Mihai was small I once spanked him for some minor transgression. 'If you beat me again,' he told me, I might die. How sad you will be then!' He was genuinely not thinking about his own discomfort, but about my sadness.

I was deeply moved.

When I myself was later passing through great suffering, I surprised myself by saying the same words to God, (echoing those of Job: 'You will search for me, but I will be no more' (JOB 7:21).

When somebody wrongs us, we would do well to disregard our own afflictions and think rather of the harm our adversary does to himself, and of his future regrets.

* * *

p108 ..... From the Lips of Children

At the end of World War II, posters were displayed in all the trams and buses, portraying hanged men. It was effective propaganda for capital punishment of war criminals.

One day, travelling in a tram with Mihai, I noticed that he kept his eyes covered with his hand the whole time. When I asked him why he did so, he replied, 'I don't want to look at evil.'

It is recorded that Jesus knew no evil. It is far better to have no knowledge of evil, than to know it and reject it.

* * *

When Mihai was five, I rebuked him for a sin. 'God has a book, and in that book there is a page with your name on it. There He writes down all your sins. There was one the day before yesterday, another yesterday, and now you have sinned again.'

He replied, 'Do you believe that God only writes down the bad things I do? Doesn't He write down the good things as well?'

He was right. The image of God as a policeman who books one only for law-breaking is wrong - and harmful.

A child was given two coins, one for himself, the other for the offering in Sunday school. Clutching them in his hand, he trudged off to church. On the way he fell over, dropped the coins, and could only find one of them again.

'I'm sorry, God,' he said,
'but your coin is missing.'

Children can sometimes be selfish - just like their parents!

When Mihai was small he could not be dissuaded from coming with us to all-night vigils, though he sometime fell asleep half-way through them.

He would complain that the services were too short.

He often said, 'Being in church is being with God, so why not spend all our lives there? The church should be our playground.'

He certainly acted as if it were, and could not understand why everyone was so serious in church.

One Sunday morning he disrupted the whole service with his noisy playing. By the time we got home I had decided to punish him.

'Do you think it is nice that only the pastor's son misbehaves in church?' I demanded.

He replied, 'You think I wasn't listening to the sermon. But I know every word of it.'

'Very well; what was it about?'

'You spoke enthusiastically about forgiving somebody who has sinned,' he replied. 'So you ought to do that now.'

There could be no arguing with such words!

Almost since the day she was born, Amelie has heard stories about Jesus. I have sometimes wondered what the name could mean to a very small child, to whom so much remains yet to be told.

When she was two, I showed her a picture of Jesus for the first time, and pronounced His name, pointing to His bleeding heart. She became very serious, and spontaneously kissed the picture twice, though she had never seen anyone do such a thing.

Even at that early age, she knew that Jesus was a person to be cherished.

Speak to babies about Jesus. Speak in their presence about His glory! One cannot tell how early their understanding begins.

* * *

When Amelie was three my wife gave her a sweet. The child took another piece from the box and gave it to me.

p110 ..... From the Lips of Children

Gently refusing it, I explained, 'Today is Friday. This is a day on which we do not eat.'

Of course, she asked why. I told her what fasting is and explained that it is an old Christian custom not to eat on Friday, the day on which Jesus was crucified. (This fast is particularly observed by the persecuted Church.)

Amelie gave both sweets back to her grandmother saying, 'I will fast too.'

A boy wrote God a note: 'Dear God, church is all right, only the services are very boring. Can you write some new songs? Your friend, Barry.'

True religion is never boring, because its focus is on a lovely person. The psalmist wrote, 'Sing to the Lord a new song' (PSA 149:1).

Dorothy, a girl of six, protested when her mother insisted on treating her doll Elizabeth just as a doll.

'She's not a doll; she's a ~girl~. I can tell. If she were a doll I would not put her nappy on, so you see – she's not a doll.'

The way I treat a person affects how I think about him. If I treat him badly I will begin to think of him as an enemy.

If we get into the habit of following a false god, we begin to think of it as real because we worship it. That is how false religions begin. That is how the nightmare of Jonestown started.

We should become like little children in matters of faith and trust, but not in everything. Our powers of reason and discernment must mature.

Somebody asked a minister's nine-year-old son, 'Have you decided what to be when you are grown-up? Will you be a pastor like your father?'

He answered, 'I don't think so. Ministers work too much and don't get paid much. My father could have made more money as a plumber.'

Another boy of six was invited to dinner along with his parents. During the meal, he announced loudly to the hostess: 'You sure don't know how to cook!'

Jesus tells us to become like little children, honest and forthright - but not naughty and mean-spirited. The truth should always be seasoned with politeness and kindness.

One of my nieces had several guests at a time when her husband was abroad. Being short of accommodation, she explained to Alex, then five years old, 'You'll have to sleep with me in my bed.'

'I can't do that,' protested Alex. 'We're not married!'

Would that those who are much older had such strong principles!

Valladares, the Christian poet, spent twenty-two years in Cuban jails. In prison, he was married. On his release friends prepared a bedroom for the couple, who had not yet enjoyed the privileges of their relationship.

'I cannot sleep with her yet,' he said gently. We only had a civil marriage. I will wait for the religious ceremony.'

He and Alex shared the same theology.

My son and daughter-in-law once took the children to a restaurant that was not very impressive from the outside. Alex asked his father, 'Why are you taking us to such a shabby place?'

But once inside, they saw that everything was clean and pleasant.

Alex asked to be allowed to say grace. 'I thank You,

God,' he said with childish candour, 'for the lesson You taught me today, that I should not call somebody or something ugly because of its outward looks. Help me always to see the inside.'

Man sees not as God sees, for God looks at the heart. Let us not be hasty in our judgements.

Victor, a Jewish child of five, was being driven past a church. 'Father, let's stop here a while and see how God is today.'

Do we go to church with such a purpose?

Victor also took part in a Christian prayer meeting, in which every prayer began with 'Lord Jesus ...' Puzzled, he asked, 'Where is God in your prayers?' It was a valid question; Jesus taught us to pray 'Our Father,' and to approach the Father 'in My name.' He never taught us to pray to Himself.

A twelve-year-old Jewish child was told the story of Jesus and was warned, 'Know that if all those things are true, and you don't believe them, you will perish.' He replied to the teacher, 'Know by the same token, sir; you will perish if those things are untrue and you have believed them.'

We all need to ask the age-old question, 'What is truth?' However, unlike Pilate, we should follow it through and not rest until we have found out the answer.

But the primary question should be, '~Who~ is truth?' Jesus said simply, 'I am the truth' (cf. JHN 14:6). Having settled that, we next learn 'Your word is truth' (JHN 17:17). The Jewish boy had no need to remain in doubt.

We must take care as to what we believe or disbelieve. We walk a narrow pathway to heaven.

A husband and wife quarrelled constantly, and finally decided to get a divorce. On hearing this, their six-year-old child - who had been a constant witness of their disputes - said, 'I can't tear myself in two to please you.'

Next morning he told his parents, 'My shoulders and arms are aching. During the night I felt like Daddy was pulling me by one arm and Mummy by the other. I feel as if I've been torn in pieces and I don't know how to put them back together again.'

God Himself has put into children's hearts the intuition that 'What God has joined together, men should not separate.'

In Russia, secondary school pupils are taken to the Museum of Atheism in Moscow.

A guide showed one school group all the exhibits designed to prove the evils of religion. They were shown pictures illustrating man's evolution from animals, the horrors of the Inquisition, and so on.

Then the guide showed them an ancient crucifix. 'You see, children, in olden times people were backward. They believed that there was a man called Jesus who was God's son. It was supposed that He came from heaven to earth, to save men from their sins. In their stupidity, they believed that He took everybody's sins upon Himself and that, animated by love, He was crucified for our misdeeds. Our forefathers had no sense! Their religion said that if anybody believed in Jesus he would be forgiven for sins, and would eventually be resurrected from the dead, just as Jesus Himself was resurrected, and would enjoy a beautiful life for all eternity!'

A girl of twelve began to weep.

'Comrade teacher,' she said, 'Thank you for telling us these interesting things. My wrongdoings have been greatly distressing me. I made my mother cry; I lied to my father; I cheated at school. I have been wondering how I can get rid of my sins. And I am terrified of dying. Every time I see a funeral, I think, "Some day I will be lying in a coffin, and everything will be over." But I want to live!'

She continued, 'If no modern intelligent person can believe what you have told us, then I will return to the foolish ways of our forefathers. It is better to be foolishly forgiven, and be resurrected, than to be burdened with them intelligently and miss heaven. I will always be grateful to you for what you have shown me.'

The Russian Christian, Gennhadi Malachov, had completed his prison sentence, and his family had arrived at the jail to take him home.

At the prison gate, his daughter asked, 'Father, where are you going?'

'I am coming home with you, my child.'

'No,' the girl said unexpectedly, 'you must stay here.'

'Why? Aren't you happy that we will be together again?'

'No,' replied his daughter, who had been born after his imprisonment and had never known him at home. 'I have always been taught that my Daddy's place is in jail, to suffer for Christ.'

p115 ..... Reactions

A Christian child should know that his father is a cross-bearer, and should be surprised to see him without a cross. Jesus said, 'Take up your cross, and follow Me.' That is the role of the Christian, the 'Christ-follower.'

The child of Michel Sakharov went with his mother to visit his father in jail, where he had been imprisoned for his faith.

The prisoner stretched out his arms to the child and said, 'Come to me, darling.'

The child clung to his mother, and said, 'I don't want to go to him. My father is handsome, I've seen his pictures; this skinny wrinkled man is not my father.'

Children of Christians tortured and imprisoned by Communists are not the only ones who fail to recognize their loved ones. The Jews loved God in glory, but when the Son of God appeared first as a baby in a manger, and later as a marred and crucified Saviour, they failed to recognize Him.

Malachov's child had sharper spiritual perception than Sakharov's.

During the Christmas season a Sunday school teacher told her class about Jesus' birth in a stable. The following week one pupil asked, 'Do those poor people have a house yet?'

That is a good reaction to the Christmas story; the Holy Family should have a home. My own home should certainly be made available. Better still - my heart.

After visiting Israel for a few days at the age of eight, Amelie observed, 'This is a land where cats don't scratch, dogs don't bite, and all men are good.' After a brief and unpleasant encounter with a cat, she changed her mind.

p116 ..... From the Lips of Children

'Some cats scratch - but they must have come from somewhere else.'

It is said that beauty is in the eye of the beholder.

Jesus taught us to look at the lilies as they grow, not after they are picked; at birds as they are fed by God, not after they are killed by predators. We are told to worship God 'in the beauty of holiness,' and to think about 'whatsoever things are lovely.'

We ask God to turn away His eyes from our sins. Let us also learn to turn our eyes away from what is ugly. Let us open our eyes to the beauties of the holy land, the holy Church, the holy nation, the holy Bible.

Little Alex injured himself while climbing a fence. Examining his wounds, which were bleeding, he said, 'Now I know what a crucifixion is like.'

May we also bear every wound as a reminder of Jesus' sufferings on Golgotha.

Before our trip to Israel, I promised Amelie that I would take her to all the places that were significant in the life of Jesus: Bethlehem where He was born, Nazareth where He grew up, places in Galilee and Judea where He preached, and then the places where He was judged, whipped, crucified and entombed; finally, the place of His ascension.

She thought for a while, and then said, 'Let's do it the other way round. Show me first the place where, glorified, He ascended to heaven. Then I will not be so sad when I see the places where He suffered.'

I was reminded of meeting a Russian lieutenant during World War II. He knew absolutely nothing about Christ.

I told him the story of Jesus' birth, childhood and baptism, and then described the Sermon on the Mount, the parables and the miracles. He, who had never heard anything like it, was jubilant. Dancing round the room,

p117 ..... Reactions

he exclaimed, 'What fairy-like beauty! How could I have lived, without knowing these things?'

Then I told him how Jesus was betrayed, arrested, bound, sentenced, flogged and crucified. He could not hold back his tears. When he heard that Jesus' enemies had asked Him to show them He was the Son of God, by descending from the cross, he considered that it was a reasonable demand. He was sure I was going to say that Jesus agreed to it.

When He heard that in fact, Jesus actually died on the cross, he collapsed into an armchair and wept bitterly. He had found a Saviour - but to no avail. Jesus had died.

Only when I was able to tell him the story of the resurrection did he once again rejoice. I could have spared him the tears and anguish, if I had told him at the beginning that the story of Jesus has a happy ending.

Four-year-old Terry listened to a religious broadcast and heard the preacher say, 'Jesus is mine.'

'That's wrong!' he exclaimed. 'He forgot about me. Jesus is ours, not only his.'

Take all you can from Jesus and his Church, but remember that nobody has a monopoly. Jesus taught us to pray '~Our~ Father,' not '~My~ Father.'

A boy who had heard me speak of 'narcissism' asked many questions about it.

Narcissism means self-admiration. Narcissus, a legendary person who spent all his time gazing at his own reflection, which was to him of surpassing interest.

The boy remarked, 'Then our Sunday school teacher is a narcissist. He boasts that man is the crown of creation. But when I went to Marineland I saw whales and dolphins doing amazing things. Can men do forty-ton backflips? Why does the Bible call Jesus a lion and a lamb?

p118 ..... From the Lips of Children

Because the lion is more powerful and the lamb more gentle than men.'

Little children are free of adult sophistication, and they don't look down on the animal kingdom. It's true that God made only man in His image. He gave him a mind that thinks, feels and reasons. But unlike Narcissus, man is to reflect God, not himself.

Michel Horev, a Russian Baptist, wrote from jail the story of his conversion. His father Mihai had died a martyr's death, leaving his mother very poor and with four small children.

Once she was peeling potatoes - their only food - and asked Michel as a favour to read the Scriptures to her as she did so.

Michel balked at that. He found the Bible boring. 'You read, and I'll peel the potatoes.'

'That's not such a good idea; I'll have to find my glasses first, which might take a while. Please be kind and read to me.'

'What part do you want to hear?' he said reluctantly.

'The Sermon on the Mount.'

~Such a long passage~, thought Michel. ~Three long chapters.~ He was a very poor reader, and his eyes were weak. He got the Bible.

'Blessed are the poor in spirit,' he began, struggling over the words. 'Blessed are those who mourn.' But suddenly his eyes were opened to words which were not on the page. ~Blessed are my parents. My father suffers in chains. My mother is sad. Her life is bitter, too.~

'Blessed are the meek,' he continued. ~Jesus must have meant my parents. They've always been so meek.~ 'Blessed are the merciful ...' ~Mother would share her last piece of bread with anyone who was hungry or poor.~ 'Blessed are the pure in heart . . .' ~They've never had a spot on their hearts.~ 'Blessed are the peacemakers ...' ~They don t know what hate is. If it

p119 ..... Reactions

were left to them, they would even be at peace with the Communists.~

'Blessed are those who are persecuted for righteousness' sake ...' ~For this blessing I am without a father.~

His mind flashed back to earlier days. What a strange man his father had been - as strange as this book!

His mother had told him that when he had been born, the doctor had said to Michel's parents, 'The boy's eyes seem weak. He may never see very well. You will have to accept the fact that he may soon be totally blind.'

On hearing the doctor's sombre prognosis, his father lifted the infant Michel towards heaven and said, 'Thank you, God, for giving me a son after four girls, and thank you that he has poor sight, perhaps no sight at all ...'

His mother interrupted - 'Stop this senseless prayer!' Tears coursed down her cheeks. 'You don't give thanks for a child's blindness.'

'Do you believe, then,' replied her husband, 'that God makes mistakes? If he is blind he will be useless for factory work or for any profession. Therefore he will be dedicated to the Lord's work. The Bible can be read in Braille.'

Remembering this, Michel thought to himself, ~That must be how Mary thanked God for giving her a Son whom the prophets described as a 'man of sorrows,' destined to die on a cross.~

'Rejoice, and be exceeding glad ...' He read on and on, through page after page of the Sermon on the Mount. By the time he had finished, he had settled in his heart that he belonged to Jesus.

His father's predictions came true. He really did become a pastor, and as a result he too has been in prison for many years. He is in prison as I write, and he is almost blind.

In Aurora, Colorado, USA, an eight-year-old boy named Charlie hanged himself.

He had sometimes been mischievous. Once he deliberately ruined school equipment belonging to other pupils. As a punishment his mother told him she would withhold his pocket money to pay for the damaged articles.

He became resentful. 'When I'm naughty I have to lose my pocket money, but when my parents have a big quarrel and they are naughty God does not keep back their pocket money.' His final argument was suicide at the age of eight.

Charlie's brother told his grandmother, 'Charlie went to heaven to visit God, but he'll be back in a couple of weeks.'

No doubt, when Jesus returns, Charlie will be back, together with all who have suffered innocently. Will we be able to look into their reproachful eyes? 1

Parents, teachers and judges often have to punish wrongdoing, and in this they are the representatives of God, who hates sin. Everyone who punishes must take good care to be very God-like, lest those who are punished be driven to despair. Unjust punishment inflicted by unrighteous men can produce indelible trauma, neurosis or psychosis.

Biographers tell us that one beating received by the young Lenin caused him to tear the cross from his neck and become a God-hater for life. His father had asked a priest what he should do with his son, who had failed to attend church. The priest replied, 'Beat him and beat him.' The boy overheard.

One slap received by Tito when he was an altar-boy made him a revolutionist and a mass-murderer. Having been slack in his duties of serving the priest, he was punished with a slap he never forgot.

Many people are like Charlie. They say, 'I get punished for my mistake, while God is good to those who beat me - though their sins are greater than mine.'

Children's theology demands that adults behave as they expect others - especially children - to behave. They all too easily perceive the fallacy of 'Do as I say, not as I do.

Jesus said, 'If you love Me, keep My commandments' - but He kept them too.

Some boys were misbehaving. Their Sunday School teacher wished to impress on them the fact that God would judge them. So he lectured them at length, repeating over and over again, 'Where is God? I say, where is God?'

One boy whispered uneasily to another, 'Let's get out of here - we're getting blamed for so many things, next he's going to say it's our fault that God's disappeared.'

Of course children should be taught to be aware of their sinfulness - but there is a need for proportion in all things! We must not make them feel responsible for all the tragedies of their homes and the world at large.

They have been born into a world that is full of sins they did not commit. The entire weight of sin has been carried by Jesus. It should not burden a child's heart.

In Sunday School the pastor was describing the crucifixion and death of Jesus. A child said afterwards, 'That story can't be true!'

Such incidents taught me how to preach.

"Oh, but others see my kite! It gives them joy."

When Mihai was only five, I came home one evening to find him very distressed. He had been playing with an electric wire and had received a shock. To teach him a lesson the baby-sitter had told him, 'Now you will die.' Mihai believed her, and told me the sad story. Trying to reassure him, I said, 'Don't worry - if you die, you will go to heaven.' 'Yes,' he said, 'but I want to stay here, to do more good deeds,'

p124 ..... From the Lips of Children

St. Paul once wrote that he wanted to depart and be with Christ 'which is better by far; but it is more necessary for you that I remain in the body' (PHP 1:23-24).

Was Mihai speaking out of altruistic motives like Paul, or did he simply want to get out of an embarrassing situation? I can't tell.

I was similarly unsure of eleven-year-old Amelie's motives when she badly wanted to have a horse. I told her, 'That could cost a fortune! You could do a good deed by giving up what you want, and giving the money to the poor.'

'But that's what I want it for!' she explained. 'So many people beat horses. This horse might even be bought by a circus, where it would suffer terribly learning the tricks it would have to perform. If I had it to look after, the horse would have a very good life.'

Do we make our decisions out of pure motives? Are the good intentions we claim genuine?

There is more than a touch of irony in the story of the atheist's child who said to his parents, 'It's safer not to tell God that we don't believe in Him. Then He might take us to heaven anyway.'

When Amelie was tiny, someone told her the story of Lourdes. To my surprise, she insisted that I take her there. 'Why?' I asked. 'You aren't ill.' 'But I want to pray at Lourdes, that I won't become ill.'

Must we wait for trouble before appealing to God to free us from it? Must we for ever fall asleep only to awaken time and time again in revivals and crusades? Or would it be wiser to pray, 'Lead us not into temptation'?

The chief concern of pastors for their flock should not be the recovery of sinners, but teaching their congregations how to vanquish sin when it first intrudes, and how not to entertain lustful or impure thoughts.

My wife and I once stayed with an Indian family whose five-year-old boy had just been given, for the first time in his life, a really beautiful pair of shoes. I was barefoot, because my legs were hurting.

During the meal he must have overheard the words of John the Baptist: 'He who has two tunics, let him give to him who has none.' He took off one shoe and handed it to me.

When, not realizing what was happening, I made no effort to take it, he asked whether he had done something wrong; perhaps I was not a believer?

He certainly proved that he was a believer.

When he was nearly four, Alex heard his sister say, 'I'm going to be a doctor when I grow up.'

Feeling that he needed to say something about his own plans, he chimed in, 'When I'm big, I want to be a man who will make his mother happy.'

What a beautiful ambition! We would do well to copy it. We can make our heavenly Father rejoice over us with singing (ZEP 3:17). We can make heavenly Jerusalem - which is our mother - rejoice. Even a prodigal son can make his father happy by returning home.

A Scottish pastor was given notice of dismissal. During his years of service, it seemed that nobody had been converted.

Moreover, he had allowed a foolish thing to happen that had scandalized the congregation. When the offering plate had been passed around, a nine-year-old boy had asked the sidesman to put the plate on the floor. Wondering what would happen, the sidesman had done so. The boy had stood on the plate. The congregation had not understood that he had given himself as an offering.

That boy was Robert Moffat, who later became a well-known missionary in Africa. His son-in-law was David Livingstone.

We can learn from this child the best kind of giving.

* * *

A missionary in Uganda in the nineteenth century told this story.

His church had a gift day, but instead of sending their gifts ahead of time for decorating the church, they brought them with them on Sunday morning. When the service was over and the missionary stood looking at the pile of gifts, he thought he heard something. Raising his head, he saw a little African girl in the aisle.

'Do you want to speak to me?' he asked.

Very timidly the girl came to the front of the church, and said, 'Please sir, I want to give something.' Putting her hand into her scanty garment she pulled out a bag. Opening it, she brought out handful after handful of silver and gold until there was a pile on the table worth more than all the other gifts put together.

The missionary said, 'You ought not to have done this. Tell me where you took the money from, and we will put it back.'

The child burst into tears. 'It's all mine!'

'It can't be!' exclaimed the missionary. 'You are much too poor.'

Then the story came out. The child had sold herself as a slave in order to be able to give money to the church.

To become self-sacrificing like God is an excellent way to find Him.

The Christian Mission to the Communist World received a similar letter from a boy of nine:

> I hope you are grand enough to accept criticism without getting offended. My Mom told me this is a sign of grandeur in a man.

It must be nice to be at the same time a general and a director and also to serve the Church. Do your generals wear uniforms like those of The Salvation Army? Please reply. Don't despise the little ones. Our angels daily see the face of God.

I replied with a four-page letter telling him what his duties as general director would be.

As a result, not he but his mother became our general director, and the nine-year-old 'missionary' became her assistant.

Amelie remained in the house as we accompanied departing guests to the car. Within minutes she joined us, saying, 'I was afraid that if I remained alone I might do something stupid.'

People are especially prone to doing stupid things when they are on their own and unobserved. But why should they be alone? There are no loners in God's service. Christians should remain in constant fellowship with their brethren.

Amelie's comment reminded me of a quiet madman who was a member of my congregation in Bucharest, Rumania, years ago. Once, when we invited him to lunch, my wife set before him the usual knife, fork and spoon.

He said, 'Please, take the knife away. I know I am mad, so I have said to God, "Since I'm foolish I don't know what I might do if I had access to a knife." So I promised I would never hold one in my hand.'

If only all adults and mentally healthy people had such wisdom!

Many devices for rescuing individuals from alcoholism or other bad habits are often unsuccessful. I read of one method that was very successful.

A five-year-old boy said, 'Mummy, do you know what I want for Christmas more than anything else?'

~Little con-man!~ thought his mother. ~I wonder what he's after?~

The answer bowled her over. He said, 'All I want is a Mummy who doesn't smoke any more. I love you very much, and want you to live for a long time.' Then he put his chubby arms around her neck and kissed her.

She had to brush away a tear. She never smoked again.

Children can be disarmingly honest when their motives are not entirely pure.

A grammar class was asked to write a sentence containing an object. One child wrote, 'Dear lady, you are really very beautiful.'

'Thank you very much,' responded the teacher, 'but what is the object in this sentence?'

'To get a good mark,' the pupil replied candidly.

When my grandson Alex was four, I asked him for a kiss. He said, 'I can't give it yet.' After an hour, he came to me and announced: 'Now you can have the kiss.'

I asked, 'But why not earlier?'

Are our kisses always stuffed with enough love? There is nothing more saddening than a loveless kiss.

When Luke, who was nine, heard people cursing the gypsies for stealing and fortune-telling, he wanted to be taken to them so that he could share his sweets with them. He told his mother of his intention: 'When I grow up, I am going to wash the feet of gypsies, just as Jesus did. Isn't that better than complaining that people have dirty feet? Will you let me do it?'

That child died young, having lost his sight. On his deathbed, he said: 'I would like to take all the gypsies with me to heaven.'

* * *

'If someone wanted to kill me,' observed Amelie, 'I would say to him, "First let me tell you the story of Jesus." If he killed me afterwards, at least I'd go to heaven.'

Her thinking was wiser than her years. Christians in Communist or Islamic countries who are brought before torturers or executioners make it their first priority to tell them about salvation through Christ. Before answering any questions from their interrogators about the underground Church, they share their faith. Then what comes, may come.

Isaac Feinstein was a Hebrew-Christian missionary in Rumania who was killed in the Holocaust. He left six children behind him, one of whom died at the age of nine. On her deathbed she comforted her mother: 'You have five other children. Papa is in the next world, without any of his children. It's only right that I should go to him.'

That is how easily a child who believes is able to face death.

The answer is yes, it is possible. Balaam, a false prophet, was granted the fulfillment of a bad desire, but this resulted in his own destruction.

A girl named Catherine read the whole Bible, Old and New Testaments, eight times before she reached the age of twelve. Are you wondering what became of a girl like that?

She became the wife of William Booth and the co-founder of The Salvation Army.

Such a little child can lead us, by her example, into the Word, so that we too may maximize our usefulness in the kingdom of God.

Count Zinzendorf, at the age of four, was taken to an art gallery in Dusseldorf, Germany. He stood before a picture of the crucified Christ. It bore the inscription, 'This I have done for you; what are you doing for Me?'

Then and there, the little boy decided to dedicate his life to the Saviour.

He could never forget that question. While still a child he told himself, ~A faith that does nothing is just babbling.~

When he was grown up, he formed the community of the Moravians, which has as its motto, 'The Saviour deserves everything.' Missionaries from the community went to Greenland, to India, to Africa.

Acknowledging the decisive influence of a picture on the life of this Christian, can we discredit the use of holy representations in worship? We use pictorial Bibles and Bible story books for the instruction of children. Perhaps art might serve to arouse the child in every adult.

Children's theology does not object to religious art.

A partially paralyzed girl, who was distressing to look at, was avoided by adults and children alike. No one wanted to be subjected to her endless complaints.

Finally she realized what the problem was. She decided not to complain any more. She would tell jokes - jokes even about her own disabilities - and she would amuse and cheer up those who were in her company.

Soon people were delighted to be in her presence. Eventually she became a professional comedienne.

In November 1984, Galina Viltchinskaia was freed after five years in jail, which had been interrupted only by three months of freedom. From jail she went directly to a service of the underground Church in Habarovsk. It was the normal thing for her to do; after all, she had been imprisoned for her faith.

When she was released she was twenty-seven years old. The church in Russia which told her story to the outside world said that she was extremely thin, and had shrunk so that she looked like a child of eleven. Her face was yellow; she had little hair left. It was an effort to try to smile.

Because of continuous starvation in prison, her body was unable to manufacture fat. It was reported that it might be months before she could eat normally - assuming that she remained free, which was considered very unlikely.

When a friend met her who had known her in the old days, she exclaimed, 'What have they done to you? You look like a child!'

Galina replied meekly, 'I should have made myself look like a child of God, but I suppose I did not, so they did it their own way.'

p133 ..... Motives

During the siege of Leningrad in 1941, he was living with his mother and three other small children (his father had died in jail for his faith in Jesus). The family was doomed to starvation.

His mother used to pray, 'Thank you, God, that you love us so much.' Little Mihail always wondered about that. ~If God loves us so much, why can't we have a piece of bread?~

One day she brought home a piece of cheese, divided it into four, and left the room. Mihail wondered why there were not five pieces. Unsure what to do, he held his piece in his hand.

After a few minutes, his mother came back into the room and asked, 'Does anybody have a piece of cheese left?' Mihail nodded. His mother continued, 'Old Kolia our neighbour, is dying of hunger. I asked him what was his last wish, and he said, "Something to eat." The last wish of a dying person ought to be granted. Would you give up your piece of cheese?'

Mihail went with his mother to see how Kolia would eat the cheese. When his mother placed it in the dying man's mouth, he smiled and breathed his last. He had not been able even to swallow the morsel.

Mihail was tempted to remove the cheese from the dead man's mouth and eat it himself. When would he ever see cheese again? His mother saw what was going on in his mind.

At last he said, 'I gave the cheese not to Kolia, but to God. I won't take back a sacrifice given to Him.'

His mother was happy. Later Khorev wrote, from the same jail in which his father had died, 'I can testify that the greatest happiness for a man is to be to consecrated to God.'

Have we made vows to God which we have later regretted? Then let us remember the saints and martyrs - not only those of old, but also those of today.

A poorly-clothed barefoot Egyptian child who was about ten years old pointed to the Nile. He told me, 'As a baby, Moses floated on that river in a basket. Princess Hatsheput saved the little boy, who then went on to save his people and to save mankind from much ignorance. I have nothing either - but nobody has saved me.'

Incredible things can result from the saving of a single child.

I told this story to an adult afterwards, who retorted, 'Nonsense! How do you know that the child you save won't turn out to be another Hitler?'

How cynical we become as we grow up! Children are much less inclined to indulge in such negative speculations.

A Moslem boy of thirteen heard a Christian extolling the sublime teaching of Jesus, that we must love our enemies and turn the other cheek when we are beaten.

He said to himself, I'll test this teaching. He slapped the Christian.

True to his convictions, the Christian wept silently, saying, 'I am weeping for you.'

Surprised, the Moslem boy asked to be shown what part of Scripture contained this strange command. He was shown the text in Matthew chapter 5, and after reading the chapter through he decided to live according to its precepts. But he could not break the habit of swearing, nor could he see any 'blessedness' in mourning and in being poor.

He consulted a wise Christian, who explained, 'The teachings of the Sermon on the Mount are not commandments given to men; no man could fulfill them. There has only ever been one life motivated by such love, and that was the life of Jesus Himself. Ask Him to come into your heart, and He will change you.'

The boy did so, and became a new person.

Mihai was eight years old when he came home from his Catholic school and announced that he was not going to pray any more.

I said, 'All right, you have the freedom to decide what you want to do. But can I ask you how you came to make such a decision?'

He complained that he had had two discouraging religious experiences that day.

In class, he had discovered that he had forgotten the exercise book that contained his homework. So he had prayed to God, who can do anything, to make the exercise book fly the short distance from home to school. Had I not told him that God took a whole man, Ezekiel, and transported him from Babylon to Tel-Aviv? So it would be no problem for God to fetch his exercise book.

The prayer had been in vain. The book did not arrive, and his teacher had scolded him.

Later, in the religious knowledge class, his teacher - a monk - told the pupils about a mason who swore at the virgin Mary while working on a high scaffold. As punishment, the blessed virgin allowed him to fall from the scaffold that very day and break his legs.

Unable to bear this, Mihai had stood up and said, 'Teacher, that can't be right. If someone wrongs my father, he forgives him. Surely the virgin Mary is even better than my father? If somebody speaks badly of her, surely she forgives. The man must have fallen because he was careless.'

In answer to this argument the teacher had given Mihai a slap.

We decided that the best course was to leave Mihai alone. We did not force him to pray.

At the same time I told his story to a lady who knew the Catholic archbishop, who made the monk apologize to Mihai. After that they became friends, and once more Mihai joined with us in prayer.

Later still, I shared a cell with that same monk in prison.

Political circumstances forced the father of Laura del Carmen Vicuna to flee from Santiago, the capital of Chile. She was still a baby when he fled. Soon afterwards he died, leaving the poor mother to work as a seamstress to support her two little children.

The mother, who was very beautiful, soon became the prey of a rich but brutal landlord, Manuel Mora. He grew tired of the woman he had lived with for a while, branded her like an animal with a red-hot iron, and chased her away.

The knowledge that her mother was living in sin with Mora caused the young Laura much suffering.

At the age of ten she took her first communion. On that day, in 1901, she wrote down the following resolutions:

1. My God, I wish to love and serve You all my life long. Therefore I give You my soul, my heart, myself.

2. I would rather die than insult You by sinning Therefore I wish to shun everything that could separate me from You.

3. I take it as my aim to do everything I can to ensure that You may be known and loved, and to repair the insults that You receive daily from men, especially from my relatives.

p137 ..... Motives

When she was twelve, Laura unwittingly aroused the lust of the same Mora and had to flee. To avenge this insult, Mora bound her mother to a pole and flogged her almost to a pulp. Laura, inspired by Jesus' words about the good shepherd who gives his life for his sheep decided to offer her life to God on behalf of her poor mother.

Soon she fell fatally ill. But despite her sickness, Mora attempted to seduce her. Only the intervention of neighbours saved her.

Towards the end of her short life, she said to her mother, 'I am dying. I have asked Jesus for this. For two years I have offered my life to Him so that He might give you the grace of repentance. Mother, before I die, will I have the joy of knowing that you will return to God?'

Her mother promised, and Laura died breathing the words 'Thank you, Jesus. I die satisfied.'

She was thirteen.

Her mother kept her promise and became a believer. She refused Mora's demands, even when he threatened her with a revolver.

Jesus wants more children like this, to offer their lives for the salvation of sinners.

A child was anxious to wear spectacles, because he thought they would give him the same prestige as his father, who was a bespectacled executive.

He was taken to an optician, who showed him a chart and asked what letters he could distinguish.

'I can see the first letters very well- H, I, C. But I can't see the next ones - S, A, B - at all.'

Our amusement at this story belies our own inclinations! When we read the Bible, we readily accept what fits in with our own ambitions and preconceptions. But we fail to see what does not agree with our own theories or pet sins, because we want to see the world through spectacles of our own choosing.

I have shouted many Hallelujahs in my time - but I never thought to hurl them at the enemy's head!

My grandson at the age of five was determined to become a soldier, though he was not sure whether in the American, Israeli, or Salvation army. He looked forward to the time when he would be able to shoot, but thoughtfully anticipated my reaction. 'Don't worry, Grandpa. I won't shoot with bullets - but with Hallelujahs.'

This struck me as being thoroughly biblical. Are praises to the Lord ('Hallelujahs') really as ineffective as we might imagine? In Joshua's time, when it was time for the Jews to capture Jericho, they were commanded not to shoot but to blow their trumpets and shout. A great victory was gained.

Consider too the great victory of Jehosophat over the Ammonites and Moabites - sworn enemies of the Lord - when he sent an army of singers against them, praising the Lord. 'You will not need to fight this battle,' the Lord promised, and the enemy was utterly destroyed and left much booty. We would do well to shoot with Hallelujahs!

I have always enjoyed telling Bible stories to my grandchildren. I remember telling Alex how Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon had set before his citizens the alternative of bowing before a statue portraying him as a god, or being thrown into a burning fiery furnace.

I asked Alex what he would have done. 'Would you have bowed to another god than our heavenly Father?'

'No way!'

'So you would have let yourself be thrown alive into the fire?'

'No way!'

'What other choice would you have had?'

'I would have thrown Nebuchadnezzar into the fire!'

* * *

Five-year-old Alex listened carefully to Jesus' story of the man who owned a hundred sheep, lost one, and searched until he found it. Joyful at reclaiming his loss, he gathered his friends for a feast. The conclusion of the story is that in heaven 'there will be more joy over one repenting sinner than over ninety-nine people who need no repentance.'

'What did you learn from the story?' Alex's father asked him.

'The man should have watched over his sheep more carefully; then he would not have lost one.'

Clergy expend a great deal of energy on revivals and on seeking to rehabilitate Christians who have gone astray. Would it not be better to warn Christians about the pitfalls and bypaths that might lead them astray in the first place?

When he was four Mihai said to me, 'Father, what can I do? I'm bored.' I suggested that he should think about God.

'What can I think about Him with my little mind? He can think about me with His big mind.'

Instead of theological speculations, which are often fruitless because of the limitations of our minds, we would do better to assure ourselves, through Christ, of God's friendship. Then He will be free to take care of us without hindrance.

Whenever I came home after work, Mihai would ask, 'Father, did you bring me anything? Good evening.'

One morning I read to him the story of how Jesus chased the merchants from the temple, and I took the opportunity to draw a lesson from what we had read.

'You are a temple - but you also have merchants that must be chased out.'

'What merchants?' he asked.

'One merchant is in the habit of asking first what gift I have brought, and then offering me a greeting.' He acknowledged that this was true.

'You have a second merchant,' I added. 'You love Jesus because He promises you Paradise. Would you love Him if He had no Paradise to give? To love Him just for what you can get out of Him is mercenary.'

Mihai replied, 'You have to pretend that you don't know He can give you Paradise, and say to Him simply, "I love you." But deep down, we know what He can give.'

A father agreed to be a one-man audience for a drawing-room Nativity play produced by his four children.

One played Mary, another Joseph, and the third an angel bringing the good tidings. The fourth child presented herself: 'I am the three Magi who have come from the East.'

When it was pointed out that she could not possibly be three wise men, she replied, 'Why not?'

And why not, indeed? Nobody is a single self, but rather a cluster of selves. We have the outward man, the inner man, the hidden man of the heart, the Id, the Ego, the Super-Ego. Often we 'talk to ourselves,' or conduct mental arguments with ourselves.

It was the best in Peter that acknowledged Christ as 'the Christ, the Son of the living God.' It was the worst in him that denied his Master, saying, 'I do not know the man.'

To a greater or lesser degree, we are all 'split personalities.' Very young children are probably the most integrated among us.

One child can play all three Magi. Were an adult to attempt the role, the three would probably quarrel within him.

Andrew Carnegie, who was known as the King of Steel, became rich as the owner of the greatest steel mills in the world.

When he was a ten-year-old boy in Scotland, he had a rabbit-hutch but no food for his little animal friends. So he told the neighbourhood boys that if they would gather clover and dandelions for the rabbits, he would name the animals after them. The deal was accepted.

Carnegie learned early in life how fond men are of their own names, and he applied that knowledge throughout his life.

Years later he named his steel mill in Pittsburgh after Edgar Thomson, director of the Italian railway company to which he wanted to sell steel rails. He had learned his lesson well!

Perhaps he had been inspired by reading what the Bible says in this regard. God promised Abraham, 'I will make your name great' (GEN 12:2). Jesus promised the overcomer, 'I ... will acknowledge his name before my Father and his angels' (REV 3:5).

Don Pedro, king of Brazil, intended to build the first hospital in his country, but had no money. So he issued a decree promising to everyone who gave the sum of $10,000 the title of Baron; to those who gave $20,000 the title of Viscount; and to those who gave the sum of $40,000, the title of Duke.

Money began to pour in, and the hospital was built. When inauguration day came, the veil covering the plaque was drawn aside to reveal this inscription: 'This hospital has been donated by human pride to human misery.'

At some time or other, everyone suffers from frustration or a lack of self-confidence. Consequently most people - including ourselves - are not as we would like them to be, and so we must meet them on their own ground as we attempt to win them for the kingdom.

Little Andrew Carnegie made use of a form of recognition-award to accomplish what he wanted. Let us apply his tactics, by making sure that in our churches every individual counts and is highly regarded.

~Nauka i Religia~, the chief atheist magazine of the USSR, tells of the life of some Christian families who fled to the tundra (treeless arctic plains) and the taiga (swampy forests) of Siberia, in order not to associate with the God-hating Communists. They were discovered by anthropologists, after living a solitary life for forty years.

The scientists recorded the following story about two children in the community.

When a dog died, one child said, 'Let's bury it and put a cross on its grave.'

The atheist Einstein was brought to believe in God by a very small child; none other than Yehudi Menuhin, who astounded the world at the age of six with his violin-playing.

Einstein was visiting Menuhin's father, a practising Jew. They discussed ideas about God, and Einstein explained why he did not believe in the existence of God.

Yehudi, the wonder child, overheard the discussion while playing with his toys, and interrupted. 'Mr. Professor, I will prove to you that God exists.'

Amused, Einstein asked, 'What is your proof?'

A little girl was talking to her mother, who was busy in the kitchen. She was telling her the events of the day. When she had finished, her mother said, 'Now go and polish Daddy's shoes.'

The girl did not enjoy the task, but she obeyed. Soon her father came in, but before he had a chance to thank her, she asked, 'Who polishes God's shoes?'

Her father was no theologian. Even if he had been, would his theological qualifications have been any help?

Somewhat embarrassed, he said, 'I suppose some good angel considers it an honour to do so.'

She was not satisfied. 'I was wrong - God doesn't wear shoes. He told Moses, "Take your shoes off, because you are on holy ground." God is always on holy ground in heaven. So He can't wear shoes, and there's no need to worry about it.'

At family prayers that evening, her father read how Jesus washed His disciples' feet.

She remarked, Jesus too had walked barefoot, or with just sandals, on the dusty roads of Palestine. It would have been nice if one of the disciples, after having his feet washed by Jesus, had offered to wash His feet. How come it didn't occur to any of them?'

Again, the father had no answer. He had never realized that we must not only accept Jesus' services, but also ask ourselves what little things we can do to help Him.

His daughter was wise beyond her years. It is important for us to consider the theology of children.

Today's headlines contain many unnerving and tragic events, among them the abduction, kidnapping, rape and murder of little children. Like many concerned parents, my son instructed both his children never to get into a stranger's car and to refuse any toys, sweets or money from strangers, however pleasant they may seem.

Once he decided to test Amelie. 'Would you go into someone's car if he offered you 500 dollars?'

'No way!'

'What if he offered you 5,000 dollars?'

'No way!'

'But what if he offered 50,000?'

'Well ... 50,000 dollars is a lot of money. I'd tell him "Give me the money and I'll ask my Daddy what I should do."

A little girl in a wretched attic, whose sick mother had nothing to eat, knelt down by her bedside and said slowly, 'Give us this day our daily bread.' Then she went into the street, wondering where God kept His bread. Turning a corner, she spotted a large, prosperous bakery and thought, 'This must be the place!' So she went in confidently and said to the baker, 'I've come for it.'

'Come for what?'

'My daily bread,' she said, pointing to the tempting loaves. 'I'll take two, if you please - one for my mother and one for me.'

The baker wrapped them and gave them to his little customer, who started at once for the door.

'Stop, you little rascal!' said the baker roughly. 'Where's your money?'

'I haven't got any,' she replied simply.

'Haven't any? You little thief! What brought you here, then?'

The harsh words frightened the little girl and she burst into tears. 'Mother is sick, and I'm so hungry. In my prayers I said, "Give us this day our daily bread," and then I thought God meant me to fetch it, so I came.'

The rough but kindly baker was softened by the child's simple story, and instead of punishing her he said, 'You poor girl! Here, take this to your mother.' And he filled a large basket with bread and gave it to her.

A boy of twelve threw a stone that accidentally hit one of the family geese on the head, killing it. Scared of the consequences of his carelessness, he buried the dead fowl, thinking that his mother would not miss it since they had a number of geese.

That evening his sister blackmailed him. 'Tonight you can wash the dishes. Otherwise I'll tell Mother what you did.'

So he washed the dishes. But when she tried to blackmail him again the next day, he replied 'No, today you wash the dishes. I told Mum all about it - and she forgave me.'

If you have committed a sin, however large, will you allow men and devils to inveigle you into more and more sins to cover up for the first? Better be quick to confess your sin to God. You will not surprise Him, for you are certainly not the first sinner. In fact, He would be surprised if you did not sin.

Know also, He forgives gladly. Where appropriate, confess your sin to the one you have wronged. And be aware how important it is that you do not let anyone force you into a wrong direction for ever, simply because you have taken a single step in that direction.

Origen, one of the most celebrated teachers of the ancient Church, passed through the gamut of suffering, though he did not attain to the privilege of dying a martyr's death.

He was only a child when his father Leonid (who later died for his faith) was arrested. When he heard that his father had been imprisoned, he did all he could to get himself jailed. His mother tried in vain to dissuade him. Finally she hid his clothes in desperation, and so forced him to stay at home.

Unable to do anything else, he wrote to his father: 'Beware of altering for our sake your decision, that you will suffer for Christ.'

Some Christians, thinking of the suffering that their loyalty to Christ brings their families, crack under pressures and persecution. Some are concerned lest their dangerous stand for Christ might make members of their family forsake the faith, because of the heavy burden that their father's sacrifice imposes on them.

I have heard many martyrs' children exclaim, 'If only my father had kept silent, my childhood would not have been so bitter.'

It is a great encouragement to have children like Origen. When I was in jail, my son who was then very young sent me letters in the same spirit in which Origen wrote. His first words to me, when he was allowed to see me after four years of detention, were: 'I have a rich Father who is taking care of me. You need not worry.'

The guards who were listening knew that he was my son. They wondered who this rich father might be.

May we encourage all who walk the way of the cross, assuring them that we do not resent the suffering that we may endure on their account. They should know that we are proud of them.

Strolling through a park with six-year-old Mihai and his friend, I sometimes found myself left behind as the boys skipped ahead. All of a sudden Mihai spotted a man reading a book. He went up to him and said, 'You'd be better reading the Bible!'

'It tells you how to go to heaven. If you don't, you will burn in hell. See that tall man over there? He's my father. He'll explain things better.' The child (who was eight) replied, 'A pebble is a big thing. If it gets into the shell of an oyster, it becomes a pearl! It's wrong to despise oneself.'

When my granddaughter was seven, she watched me drawing men's faces. My drawing is worse than poor. She said earnestly, 'Grandpa, you are sinning. God made men to be beautiful. In your

I would have liked Picasso to have heard those words. He painted men ugly. But then I realized how often I have labelled people bad whom God loves and who are appreciated in His sight. A pebble can become precious, and a sinner can be of great value.

'Grandpa, whereabouts is the word "problem" found in the Bible?'

'Nowhere that I know of.'

'But you all believe in the Bible - why are you so worried about something that's so unimportant, it isn't even mentioned in the Bible?'

I learned from this childish comment that looking for solutions to problems can be a useless exercise. It is simpler to reject problems, as things that do not belong to our lives.

In a life which has seen a great deal of suffering, I have learned that it is a sin to be plagued with headaches!

In the Bible, Jesus is called the head of the Church, and the believers are the body. Now, neither the foot nor the elbow can have headaches - only the head. So a believer with a headache has usurped the role of Jesus! It is as if he said, 'Come down from the throne! I am the head now. To prove it, I have headaches.'

In what sense do we have headaches like this?

At night Luther used to pray, 'God, is it my world - or Your world? Is it my Church - or Your Church? If it is Your Church and Your world, please take care of them. I am tired, I have to go to bed. Goodnight, my God. We will see each other in the morning.'

Let us leave everything in God's hands.

A boy of six overheard his older sister exclaim several times, 'Oh God!' Finally he said to her, 'You're doing wrong. Don't bother God.'

There is an old teaching in the Bible that is almost completely neglected. Jairus was rebuked: 'Why bother the teacher?' (MRK 5:35). The Psalmist says, 'My soul waiteth upon God' (PSA 62:1, AV).

It is said that Teresa of Lisieux once chided a nun for constantly complaining about her troubles. 'Don't bother your sisters. They each have their own burdens.'

The nun accepted the rebuke in a good spirit. 'You are

p152 ..... From the Lips of Children right. From now on, I will only tell my troubles to Jesus.'

'Oh, no,' Teresa said, 'to Him least of all! Has He not suffered enough? Let Him have peace.'

A couple had always put their toddler in the church crŠche, which is often very noisy. The day came when they decided to take him into the adult service for the first time. Before they did so, they told him, 'No talking in church.'

Everything went well while the choir was singing. But when the pastor began to preach, the boy shouted, 'No talking in church!'

Most older children would probably agree that there is too much talking in church! If the words they heard there were warm with love and truth - the 'real thing' (which is the meaning of the Hebrew word for 'word') - children would not mind long services. In the underground Church and in India, I have seen children quiet and interested in services lasting two to three hours.

When the Union forces finally gained victory in America's tragic Civil War, a jubilant crowd cheered Abraham Lincoln. He asked the people what should be done with the leaders of the rebellious South. They roared, 'Hang them!'

Lincoln's son, Tad, said, 'Father, don't hang them, but hang on to them.'

'You are right,' said his father, and acted accordingly; and so, in the opinion of some, made his assassination inevitable.

Whether the child reflected the man or the man the child, the Union was saved, and today America is one nation under God.

p153 ..... Admonitions

An American pastor was once asked to preach in Japan. When he came home, his young son asked him, 'How could people understand you? You don't speak Japanese.'

His father explained. 'I spoke a couple of sentences in English, then someone translated my words into Japanese.'

The child considered the explanation, and then said brightly, 'Father, why don't you stop in your sermons occasionally, and have somebody explain what they mean?'

* * *

In Aria, which is 50 kilometers west of Addis Ababa in Ethiopia, the first German missionaries bred cattle. They had a twelve-year-old boy looking after their herd.

One evening they observed him reading to his friends from the New Testament which they had translated. With great difficulty he stumbled through the words, trying to make some sense out of them. Finally, he closed the book and prayed: 'God in heaven, these white men have come to speak to us about Jesus, but they have heads like wood. They speak our language poorly and we can't understand them. Break open their heads, and put the words of our language into their brains, so that we can learn.'

Many good Christians who try to heed Jesus' advice to become as little children have difficulty in understanding some of the sermons for grown-ups. Preachers who can speak 'theologese' or 'philosophese' ought to learn to speak 'childese.' They would do well to remind themselves that their learned discourses are out of the reach of some listeners; or that their sermons are neither practical nor down-to-earth.

Jesus told us to feed His sheep - not His giraffes!

p154 ..... From the Lips of Children

Once Amelie told a playmate, 'Tell your father not to ask my Grandpa to play chess. Grandpa hates to beat anyone even at chess, and he hates taking other people's pawns. I can see how he always loses at chess.'

I wish I were as altruistic as my grandchild perceives me to be!

* * *

Once we arrived at a hotel in San Francisco, and the manager informed us that we had no reservation and there were no rooms available. We argued with him, but it was no use. Finally Amelie spoke up. 'You're supposed to be saints. Why are you arguing? You should be praying.' Abashed, I bowed my head.

I had scarcely finished when the manager called me over, and said, 'You're in luck! I've found you a room.'

Amelie simply said, 'I hope you learned your lesson.'

I had. But would I remember it? Would she?

* * *

Sometimes when my son Mihai felt tired and prayed too briefly with his children, Amelie would pluck his sleeve and say, 'Daddy, we haven't prayed enough.'

Do we pray enough, by children's standards? We pray to the heavenly Father through Jesus. Does the holy Child think that we have prayed enough?

* * *

A group of thirteen-year-olds were asked to illustrate one of the Ten Commandments by drawing a picture. Several chose the seventh: 'You shall not commit adultery.'

One boy's effort showed a stick-man taking a stick-woman by the arm. Above his head was a wordless heart-shaped thought-balloon; above hers was a thought-balloon containing the question, 'What about my husband?'

When temptation blurs spiritual vision, it is helpful to focus attention on the possible effects of such a wrong

p155 ..... Admonitions

course and to consider the likelihood of people getting hurt.

When the first atomic bomb was dropped on Hiroshima, the American pilot on his return was surrounded by reporters who asked, 'What do you think about this action?'

He replied, 'Why don't you ask the victims?'

The child in his rudimentary picture teaches us to put ourselves into the situation of the wronged party before we decide on a course of action that will cause that wrong.

* * *

Mihai was perhaps five years old when he sat on my lap and commented, 'You seem sad today. Why?' I said, 'Because I realize

I am a great sinner.'

He answered, 'You know what the proverb says: God takes away His gifts from those who are dissatisfied. Be thankful for what small goodness you have.'

At the same age, Amelie counselled me, 'Never complain about the state of your heart. You can be sure you will go to heaven, believe me.'

Cornelia, an eight-year-old, once interrupted one of my sermons. 'Don't tell lies when you preach! Don't say you are bad! Aren't you washed by the blood of Jesus? You are a saint!'

I was judging myself according to the deeds I had committed; these children believed my sermons asserting that those who trust in Jesus are made whiter than snow.

Why should Christians not be able to say, with David's simplicity, 'I am holy' (PSA 86:2)? Indeed, we are called to be saints (1CO 1:2).

* * *

A father told his child, with a wealth of detail, the parable of the lost sheep. To dramatize the story, he told how it had crawled through a hole in the fence at night and then

p156 ..... From the Lips of Children wandered away. But fortunately the Good Shepherd was able to find it.

When his father finished, the child commented, 'I suppose Jesus made sure He mended that hole in the fence.'

Pastors too should concern themselves not only with regaining the backslidden, but with seeing to it that their parishioners do not backslide in the first place.

* * *

The late Archbishop Fulton Sheen once told about how he lost his way when trying to find Philadelphia Town Hall. He asked directions from a group of local boys. They told him the way and asked him why he wanted to go there.

'I have to give a lecture, on "The Way to Heaven,"' he replied. 'Would you like to come with me?'

One boy laughed. 'How would you know the way to heaven, when you don't even know the way to the Town Hall?'

Children, like parents, are inclined to reject advice on how to get to heaven when their informant does not know how to behave decently upon earth.

The fact is that understanding and behaviour are not always cultivated to the same degree in a human being. David, and many other biblical and modern saints, could give very reliable information about the way to Paradise, while wandering far off from the paths of righteousness themselves.

Let us be sure that we discriminate between the man and his message. And for the clearest directions about the way to heaven, let us choose the Word of God.

* * *

A group of ten or so Christians of different persuasions were gathered in my home. We were having a heated debate about biblical problems.

The holy rule had been forgotten: that when discussion waxes hot, it should be abandoned. People shouted at each other in anger.

Mihai, who was about four years old at the time, was present. When the argument reached a peak, he said four Greek words quietly: '~Kardia kai psyche mia.~'

The others, assuming he was speaking in tongues, asked me what they meant. I translated: 'One heart and one soul.' They were stunned into silence. The discussion ceased.

The only explanation I can offer is that Mihai must have heard me when I read the New Testament aloud in the original. The words occur in ACT 4:32: 'Now the multitudes of those who believed were of one heart and one soul.' I would have drawn my wife's attention to the beauty of the words, and the fact that they rhyme - kard~ia~ ... ~mia~; and I would have explained to her what they meant.

Mihai had apparently remembered all this, and used the words at the right time.

p158 ..... Explanations

[illustration appears at this point in the book]

"I'm playing ball with God."

When Amelie was eight, she asked me to tell her yet again the story of how Jesus washed His disciples' feet. When I came to the words spoken to Peter – 'Unless I wash your feet, you have no part with Me' – she was very sad.

Jesus didn't wash my feet; so I have no part with Him either,' she mourned.

p159 ..... Explanations

I tried to explain. 'You were baptized. You have seen others being baptized.'

'But that's no help,' she countered. 'Jesus said that He must wash our feet. Anything else will not do.'

A chill travelled down my spine. I quoted many Bible verses before I found one that satisfied her completely: 'The blood of Christ cleanses us from all sins' – those of the head, the hands, the feet, 'just everything,' I explained.

'Well then,' she asked, 'if you are washed by Jesus, you are absolutely sure of entering heaven?'

'Absolutely sure.'

'Are you positive?'

'Yes, of course.'

'Then give me the names of the disciples whose feet He washed.'

I started to give her a few names. She broke in: 'Didn't He wash Judas' feet as well?'

'Yes, He did.'

'Then it is absolutely certain that Judas Iscariot is in Paradise.'

'I'm afraid not.'

'Why not?'

'Because he betrayed his Lord by selling Him for thirty pieces of silver.'

Amelie brought the discussion to an end by observing, with great candour and perception, 'Grandpa, it's not enough to be washed by Jesus; you have to behave afterwards.'

In that one sentence, she had summed up the entire epistle of James.

* * *

A Catholic child of eight gave a good explanation of 'holiness': 'Every person has a circle round his head, just as we see in the holy images. Some walk carefully so as to be right under the circle. Then it lights up. They are the saints. As for the rest of us, the circle remains invisible.'

No saint could have explained it better.

* * *

Nina and her small brother were fascinated by the siren of a passing ambulance.

Attempting to educate the wide-eyed toddler, Nina explained, 'They have the siren so that cars will stop and let them go past.'

Her brother disagreed. 'I don't think so. They make a big noise so that everybody will know "Here is somebody you should pray for because he's in great need."'

Who was right? I suspect both were!

* * *

I once read to Mihai from 1CO 11:28 - 'Let a man examine himself.'

Puzzled, he asked, 'How?'

I said, 'We must knock on our chests and ask, "Heart, do you love? Heart, do you love?"' To illustrate, I smote myself hard on the chest.

Mihai objected. 'In the railway station, I saw a man going from one train wheel to another, striking them with a hammer. I asked him to let me do it. When he handed me the hammer, I was surprised to see how light it was. He explained that if the wheels were struck with a heavy hammer at every station, they would eventually break.' (What Mihai had seen, of course, was the process of testing wheels for damage by listening to the vibrations of the metal when struck.)

'So,' continued Mihai, 'I believe we ought not to beat too hard on our chests, but only very lightly. Otherwise we might break our hearts! We should ask the heart very gently, "Do you love?" and if the heart whispers "Yes," we ought to be content.'

I learned something valuable that day. Self-examination, yes; but not self-torture.

p161 ..... Explanations

Kindergarten children often surprise us with their unexpected juxtapositions of ideas. Looking at a picturebook about Africa, a five-year-old concluded, 'There must have been a lot of ice in the Sahara, and a lot of people must have slipped and fallen over - or God wouldn't have put so much sand on it!'

Can we fault this child, for trying to make sense out of a world for which the Father cares so deeply?

* * *

A rabbi walking down the street saw a little child playing with a ball. He fell into conversation with him.

'What are you doing?'

The boy replied, 'I'm playing ball with God.'

The rabbi laughed. 'How do you do that?'

The little one replied, 'I throw the ball up to Him, and He throws it back down to me.'

We should strive, like little children, to interpret events like these with such simplicity. Things do not fall because of the Law of Gravity, but because God allows them to fall for our good. He may use the Law of Gravity, which He ordained, to accomplish His ends; but we should see His hand in all that happens to us.

We interact with a living God, our loving Father; not with blind laws that impinge upon our material, psychological or spiritual world.

* * *

A father gave pocket-money to each of his children, and asked how much of it they were going to give to Jesus. The youngest replied, 'Nothing.'

Surprised, the father queried, 'Don't you want to show Jesus how much you love Him?'

'I don't have to show Him a thing,' the toddler said earnestly. 'He knows exactly how much I love Him, even if I don't put a penny in the basket.'

The child was quite right. We must learn not to use religious jargon when we speak to children. To show

Jesus we love Him, we give ourselves. Then because we have given ourselves, we delight in giving things. God doesn't need our money - the cattle on a thousand hills are His - but He allows us the pleasure and privilege of filling human need by sharing with others.

* * *

Sometimes children display a refreshing honesty.

When Mrs. Booth of The Salvation Army preached on one occasion, she noticed a child in the front row crying. She paused to comment, 'I am moved to see a child weeping at the sufferings of Jesus.'

An adult might have been happy to accept the compliment. But the child stood up and admitted, 'No, lady; an insect got into my eye.'

Let us not pretend to have more spirituality than we actually possess!

* * *

Bramwell Booth was the General of The Salvation Army. His young children prayed, 'Dear Lord, send the Army a lot of money to make Papa happy.'

Alex says of his father, 'He wants to be a millionaire so he can give all the money to the Church.'

It is not money, but the love of money that is the root of all evil.

* * *

Children make theological mistakes just as adults do. A pastor once delivered a rousing sermon about sin and hell.

'One thing is certain,' he thundered. 'Every man, woman and child in this parish will die one day. There is no escape!'

A boy in the front row began to giggle.

'Every person in this parish,' reiterated the pastor, 'will die.'

The boy continued to laugh.

p163 ..... Explanations

Affronted, the pastor challenged him. 'Why are you laughing?'

'I'm not from this parish,' he replied.

* * *

Amelie at the age of five volunteered her own explanation as to why the capital of Rumania is called Bucharest.

'It's because the country is Communist, and if you're caught with a religious ~book, arrest~ will follow.'

* * *

In a small provincial town in Rumania I went to the Presbyterian church and asked for the pastor. Some children were playing in the churchyard and one of them, who was about twelve years old, offered to take me to the manse.

As we walked, I asked him about himself and learned that he was to be confirmed the next week. I asked him 'Do you believe in Christ?'

He replied determinedly, 'Oh, no. I'm only getting confirmed because my mother really insists.'

'Why do you feel like that?'

His answer was remarkable. 'I believe that if it were true that God created, 2,000 years ago, the marvellous Christ I'm taught about, He would also have made some little Christ in every generation, in every town, to show us that such a character is possible. But - I've never met a Christ. My father is dead, my mother is poor and has lots of children. Nobody has ever given me a sweet or shown me any kindness. There never was a Christ.'

I asked another question: 'Isn't your pastor a little Christ?'

'No,' he said.

We had arrived at the pastor's house. The boy left. I took the opportunity of relating to the pastor what the child had said, emphasizing his desire to meet a little Christ.

p164 ..... From the Lips of Children

'What an idiot!' said the pastor. He was right. But who was the idiot?

* * *

Little children love stories. When Amelie was five she begged, 'Grandpa, please tell me about Jesus, but every little bit, from when He was born to the very end.' Then she added, 'I know you can't do that. Nobody can tell the whole story of Jesus because it isn't finished yet.'

And so it is written in MRK 1:1 that the evangelist records only 'the beginning of the gospel about Jesus Christ.'

Let us also acknowledge that we know very, very little; but the little we do know is so beautiful that it is well worth repeating and well worth investigating further.

* * *

I remember having to tell Mihai off for some wrongdoing when he was small. Convicted, he stood before me with bowed head. I asked him, 'Why don't you look me in the face?'

'I don't want to look at your mouth when it says harsh words,' he said simply. 'I want to look at the loving heart from which they come.'

* * *

A child was taken to the opera for the first time. He saw ~The Masked Ball~ and was very impressed.

At home, he said to his father, 'I didn't understand what was happening on stage. What is the opera about?'

His father replied, 'It is all sung in Italian, and I don't understand Italian. But the orchestra conductor's son is in your class at school. When you are at his house, why not ask his father? I'm sure he'll be glad to explain.'

The boy did so, but the conductor could not help. 'I have to spend my time seeing to it that every instrument and singer comes in at the right time. I've never actually watched what happens on stage, so I can't tell you. But

p165 ..... Explanations wait a minute: the tenor who sings the leading role will be here for tea soon. He'll explain everything.'

So the boy asked the tenor, but he replied, 'I'm not on stage all the time, and I've had to memorize so many roles.... I really don't care about what the others are singing while I get a bit of rest in my dressing room. But look, here is the stage manager. He'll tell you.'

The stage manager had little more to offer. 'I only have a very general idea. My concern is the scenery, not the plot.'

So the boy went to the author of the libretto, who replied, 'I only wrote the words. I've wondered myself sometimes, about the weird music that draws attention away from the words.'

He went to the composer, but he only said, '~The Masked Ball~? Who knows? As far as I'm concerned, the author could have made the Governor of Boston a Spanish cavalier. For me, the text was just an excuse for my own musical fantasies.'

The child went back to his father, much enlightened. 'Nobody knows a thing. We're all playing some little part in a drama we don't understand.'

So it is written in Scripture: 'The man who thinks he knows something does not yet know as he ought to know' (1CO 8:2). Love is the key to knowledge and to meaning.

* * *

When she was eleven, Amelie had to write an essay in school on the subject of capital punishment. In her efforts to gather all the arguments for and against she consulted many people, including me. Six-year-old Alex listened for a while, then gave his unsolicited opinion: 'I am for capital punishment - but with love.' St. John of the Cross wrote, 'On the last day we will all be judged by love.' Sometimes life obliges us to use harsh

p166 ..... From the Lips of Children

methods and take up unpopular attitudes; but even these should be motivated by love.

* * *

The late Orthodox priest Sheludkov of Russia, a man much persecuted, tells in his book about a twelve-year-old boy in Moscow.

A terrible thing had happened; young Misha was a believer, and the Communist teachers had found out. A conclave of teachers gathered to persuade Misha to abandon his faith. They asked him, 'How can you believe in God? Have you ever seen Him?'

He answered, 'If I were to see Him, I would not believe in Him. The real God is invisible. Gagarin the first cosmonaut mocked Him saying, "I looked around in space and could see no God." Was he so ignorant? Didn't he know that God is invisible?'

We all wish sometimes that we could see God visible in our lives, giving direct answers to our questions or providing us with the things we most desire. But if He were thus visible, He would not be God. In our sinful state, we cannot look on Him and live. That is why God is the Invisible in the events of our lives, the mysterious, the awe-inspiring in our experiences.

We are pilgrims, bound for another world. What our senses can perceive in this world will never satisfy the human soul. We are looking for a better city, 'whose builder and maker is God.'

Then we shall see our Redeemer face to face, and know who He is.

* * *

The writer Elie Wiesel was once an inmate of a Nazi concentration camp. He tells of a starving Jewish child who was hanged for stealing a piece of bread.

The child asked for no explanation. He did not cry, nor even protest. Life had been given him without explanation,

p167 ..... Explanations and in a cruel way, life was taken from him without explanation.

Where was God?

God was right there, on the gallows with the child, silent and hurting. What is there to say, in the solemnity of such an hour?

Christ too was 'led like a lamb to the slaughter ... He did not open His mouth' (ISA 53:7).

* * *

I explained to a child of nine that hatred is an evil.

She said, 'Then hate is sin, and so is love.'

'Where did you get the idea that love is sinful?'

'Well,' she said, 'Jesus said we should love each other as He loves us. Everything less is sin. I don't love anybody as Jesus does. I would not die on a cross for anybody.'

From this discussion I held on to the concept that to love less than Jesus does is sin.

On the altar of sacrifice in the temple of Jerusalem, the blood of animals was to be found, that cleansed worshippers from their trespasses. But once a year, the altar itself had to be cleaned.

Before God, even our good deeds are like filthy rags. Only Jesus' righteousness satisfies. Only His love is worthy of this name.

* * *

One evening the son of a celebrated evangelist threw a tantrum. When his mother went to sort him out, she asked him why he had behaved so badly.

'I didn't do it,' he said. 'The devil did it.'

Oh, that we would have the wisdom not to attribute to ourselves actions that we deplore, and not to despair when we fall into sin! The devil really does seek constantly to ensnare us in attitudes and actions that are alien to our nature.

Let us place the blame where it belongs, and quietly

p168 ..... From the Lips of Children acknowledge the mis-steps in our lives, and firmly denounce the devil's doings in our lives.

And then let us pray: 'Our Father .... lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil.'

* * *

A boy was making a brave attempt to draw a dog in pen and ink. The result was pleasing, except that the dog had no tail.

Naturally, an adult who saw the picture asked 'Where's his tail?'

He answered disingenuously, 'It's still in the ink-bottle.'

Sometimes we are criticized for not being polished saints. A few years ago, there was a saying that was popular: 'Be patient with me - God isn't finished with me yet.'

Our virtues are still 'in the bottle,' along with His promises.

'He who began a good work in you will carry it on to completion until the day of Christ Jesus' (PHP 1:6).

* * *

A child asked his mother how he was born. She told him, 'God sent you into the world.'

'And how were ~you~ born?'

'I was sent by God too.'

'And Grandmother?'

'Yes, she was sent by God as well.'

'Mummy, why has there been no sex for such a long time in our family?'

In these days of television and ~Playboy~ Magazine, children are aware of sex from a fragile age. They won't stand for fables.

They should be told about sex, but told of it in its fullness - its beauty and its dangers. They should know that God has provided a framework for the precious gift of life to appear.

* * *

p169 ..... Explanations

A child came back from Sunday School very excited. 'We learned how Moses brought the Jewish people over the Red Sea!' he told his mother. 'He just waved his stick, and building materials fell from heaven! Then he waved it again, and everything stuck together and made a huge bridge! Then he waved his stick again - and there were horses and carts to carry the old people!'

His mother frowned. 'I'm sure he can't have said that.'

'Well,' replied the child, 'if I told what he ~really~ said - you wouldn't believe it!'

Nowadays children suck scepticism with their mother's milk. They don't take Bible stories on trust.

We must not only tell children the stories of God's miracles. We must also explain to them that an almighty God can do things we cannot; and we must explain to them why God worked miracles, and how trustworthy is His Word.

* * *

p170 ..... Epilogue

[illustration appears at this point in the book]

Love for God should always resemble that of a child

Not long ago, I had a dream that made a vivid impression upon me.

I was in a prison cell again. On my bed was a giant caterpillar. I wanted to get rid of it, but couldn't because the door was locked. I had no alternative but to kill it, and I succeeded in doing so only after great efforts. Exhausted from my exertions, I suddenly realized that what I had killed was the child in me - that capacity to believe wholeheartedly, love unstintingly, trust implicitly. I had killed the best in me.

p171 ..... Epilogue

I awoke with a feeling of great sorrow. Is it possible to kill the child within the man?

Today, abortion is a controversial issue. Some fifteen millions of the unborn have been killed in the United States alone during the last decade. In Red China, new-born girls are slaughtered by the thousand, because women are not allowed to have more than one child and they would rather have a boy.

We also kill spiritually. We murder the child within the child who, as Nietzsche wrote, 'wishes to play.' Even Marx, that implacable foe of religion, was driven to admit: 'I have to concede to Christianity one great merit. It has taught men to love children.' It has done more than that. It has taught men to love the child in themselves.

In this area, children's theology is unique.

After Christ had ascended to heaven, His followers referred to Him as 'the holy child, Jesus' (ACT 4:27, AV). Why?

A Cambodian girl, Arn Chorn, who grew up in the middle of the holocaust that annihilated at least two million of her countrymen - including her family - gives an interesting answer.

> Children are less angry than adults and forget insults more quickly. Maybe children know more about their imperfections, and when we do, we have a chance to laugh at ourselves more easily and not take ourselves so seriously. Maybe as children, we can feel a brotherhood of imperfection. Children are less sure that they are absolutely right. Adults, who are sure that they are absolutely right make war- even religious war- over their absolute rightness.

Jesus chides us with the observation, 'You have forsaken your first love' (REV 2:4) - a child's love. Love for God should always resemble that of a child.

Many believe that the innocence of children is a myth created by adults. Freud went so far as to call children 'polymorph perverse.'

I do not wonder. He was repeating what David said long ago: 'Even from birth the wicked go astray; from the womb they are wayward and speak lies. Their venom is like the venom of a snake' (PSA 58:3-4).

This is the bitter complaint of a father who had several wicked children. Perhaps Freud experienced similar frustration.

As for Jesus, He admired in little children their unqualified love, trust and openness. When the religious leaders and theologians of the day shut Him out, the little ones, with their children's theology, accepted Him, climbing all over Him, and, I think, hugging and kissing Him with unabashed warmth and ardour. Without knowing theology, they embraced the God about whom theologians argue.

The heart of the gospel - the Good News to which all Scripture testifies - is that God loves, forgives and accepts His creatures; and Jesus came as Man to demonstrate this true character of Deity (cf. JHN 3:16).

May God grant us the grace to grasp this, with the simple faith of a child!

THROW A CHRISTIAN INTO THE RIVER, AND HE WILL COME UP with a fish in his mouth. I have not known a Christian, who remained faithful through adversities and inner struggles, who did not come out of them enriched.

When I was released from prison, I brought with me a treasure which God had given me there: three hundred and fifty-six poems, which were in fact condensations of sermons, preached while I was alone in a cell.

I published some of them in my book ~Sermons in Solitary Confinement.~ They were well received, and many people have written to tell me that they have been helped by reading them. This encouraged me to publish another volume of these sermons composed when I had no pen or paper, and delivered to an in invisible audience. I was imprisoned underground. I saw nobody except the guards and the examining officers. I entrusted my sermons to the angels. They have wings. They could take my words to my brothers and sisters in the faith.

The angels have done more than I asked of them. They always do. They released me from prison, brought me to the free world and gave me opportunities to publish in many languages my experiences in prison. Let me be more precise. I do not publish the experiences, but the words in which these experiences are expressed.

There is a big difference.

When Patton tried to translate the New Testament for the people of New Hebrides, he found that they had no word for "faith" in their language. Instead, he used a word which means literally "to repose quietly, without worrying, on the grass." So those who read JHN 3:16 in the New Hebrides understand that a man who rests serenely, without fretting, on the fact that God gave his Son for him, will have eternal life. In Central Africa, other translators have used a word meaning "to hear and to do," which is the exact opposite. The Hebrew word for faith, ~emunah~, or the Haussa, ~amince~, both mean "to say amen."

When I read the word for "holy" in Hebrew, ~kadosh~, I know it to come from the same stem as the word for "prostitute," which helps me to understand that a saint is a man who offers himself spiritually to everybody and embraces everybody in love, without distinction of age, physical or moral qualities, race or creed. When I read the Greek word, ~aghios~, which means literally "not of the earth (ghea)," I understand that a saint is a man detached from earthly things. In different languages words convey different sentiments.

On the one hand there is your experience, and on the other hand a very poor attempt to put it into words developed by men whose experiences have been totally unlike yours.

In order to give a true account of my own particular experiences, as a man tortured, mocked and drugged in a solitary cell, I would have to invent words of my own; but then I could not communicate.

We did not live in the sphere of words there. St. John says that on Patmos he saw. We can put into words what we saw only in the measure in which we could describe to a blind man Michelangelo's Pieta, or Leonardo's Mona Lisa.

Moody said that the Christian on his knees sees more than a philosopher standing on tiptoe. If you want to know what hundreds of thousands of Christians have experienced, and are still experiencing, in Communist dungeons, don't stop at reading these sermons, but get down on your knees and ask God for the privilege of sharing the cross of the sufferers, of remembering them as though you were bound in chains with them.

But don't share only the outward physical suffering, the hunger, the tortures. Share what is far worse, the inner tempest, the doubts, the moments of despair.

These sermons are not what we usually understand by a sermon - the proclamation of God's truth - but an attempt to make others feel the storms of doubt, and sometimes even of rebellion against God, which assail a prisoner under such conditions. They assailed St. John the Baptist when he knew that Jesus was living not far from his prison yet never came to visit him. They forced Christ himself to ask God why he had forsaken him. Under normal circumstances, it would be blasphemy to suggest that the Heavenly Father could give up a righteous man. But Jesus was not preaching on the cross as priests do from their pulpits. He was experiencing suffering - the greatest mystery in the good and almighty God's creation - and was expressing what he felt at that moment when he cried, "My God, My God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?"

There are not enough shovels on earth to bury the truth. And there are no pains enough to prevent truth and faith and love from triumphing at last, even when you pass through the worst temptations. I have doubted, I have had moments of despair, but these were all overcome. The sermons finish on a note of victory. I left prison still a Christian.

I was set free. Others have remained in captivity. Watchman Nee and Wang-Min-Dao have been in prison in China for nineteen years, Hrapov in Russia for thirty years. Many have gone into prison since I left it. When you read these sermons, you are reading what is going on in their hearts today. You will thus be able to weep, but also to rejoice with them, and to arrive at some sort of understanding of the life of those who suffer.

I publish these sermons not in order that people should learn Christianity from them. For this they have their pastors. My purpose is to show what Communist imprisonment and torture can do to a Christian's mind and faith.

The evangelists found it necessary to publish the doubts which assailed John the Baptist when he was in prison and the distress of Jesus's mind in Gethsemane and on the cross. The purpose of the evangelists was not to teach you to question the messiahship of Jesus, or to consider yourself forsaken by God when you suffer innocently. But it is important for a disciple to know that such doubts come. It helps him not to be afraid of them when they come.

I am very well aware that some of the ideas expressed in this book will run counter to the understanding of Scripture which many Christians have. But my life at the time when these sermons were composed also ran counter to the style of life of Christians of the free world. I had no Bible, no books of theology, no Christian fellowship to check whether my thoughts were right. Don't compare my thoughts in a solitary cell with your thoughts when you sit comfortably in a study or in a sitting-room. Try rather to understand what the millions of Christians in Communist prisons have thought and think when beaten by terrible tempests.

I composed these sermons on the verge of insanity. In the Soviet Union Christians are put in asylums. After a time some of them really go mad. Are their ideas on the last days before they go mad not also a treasure of the church, a treasure which must be kept with respect as a holy thing, though they contradict what those think who never were put in strait-jackets and gagged?

Even theologically sophisticated readers, if they will weep with those who weep, instead of judging them as sobbing in an unorthodox manner, should listen to the voice which brings the cries of sufferers. The good Samaritan did not question the orthodoxy of the man who had been beaten by robbers. He helped. It is an essential part and test of orthodox Christian belief to be silent and to help when men in terrible pain say wrong things.

I will not take the place of your pastor who will be responsible before God for his flock. It is for him to teach you the fundamentals of faith. I wish only to remind you of your brothers and sisters under extreme pressure in Communist jails. Not only their bodies are wounded. Their minds also suffer deformations.

Now when I write down these sermons, kept in my memory during the years, I realize that sometimes they contradict each other. I leave them as they were composed. What man does not have inner contradictions? And if we have them, why pretend to be consistent? It is we who make the Bible consistent. Its authors were too big to waste time on this. They loved

God with all their heart, with its good and with its evil side and allowed both to speak to the glory of God. God accepted it and has caused the bloody psalms of vengeance in the Old Testament and clamour for retaliation in the Book of Revelation to be included in the same book with the poem on love in 1 Corinthians 13 [1CO 13].

In these sermons thoughts are expressed which would not occur to a Christian of the free world. But would his thoughts not change if his country fell under a dictatorial rule? Bonhoeffer was an Evangelical pastor. When his country was under the boot of Hitler he became an agent of the "Abwehr," the Nazi intelligence service. He got orders from this organization to spy on the ecumenical movement. For this purpose he was allowed to contact church leaders of countries which fought against Germany. Using these contacts he served Christ, telling the foreign church leaders of the atrocities of Nazism and what might be done to overthrow it. Then he came back and reported something other than what he had spoken. His only aim in this double play was to help the cause of God and of freedom. In the end he went to prison for his faith and died a martyr's death. Anyone who has not worked in an underground church has to accept that things like this happen and is not to judge. When his own church is underground, he will have to do the same.

The thoughts contained in these sermons do not occur to a Christian in the free world, because he has never been alone for years in a Communist jail. Solitary confinement under the Reds, accompanied by torture, doping with narcotics and brain-washing, gives you unique experiences.

We read in 1SM 1:1 that the prophet was from the tribe Ephraim. Then he had a rare experience. God spoke to him when he was only a boy. God who is sovereign raised him to a priestly office, normally reserved for the tribe of Levi. This changed not only his status. In 1CH 6:36-7 the same five ancestors of Samuel are named, but no more as Ephraimites. When Samuel was changed to the tribe of Levi by a direct call from God, the tribe of his ancestors until the fifth generation has changed too. Now they are numbered among the Levites, just like their descendant.

page 12 IF PRISON WALLS COULD SPEAK

An exceptional happening, a boy's talk with God produced great changes not only for him, but also for those related to him. I'm far from being a Samuel. But I also had a tremendous experience with God in unusual circumstances. It has changed my manner of thinking, my feelings, my relationship with other men. My experience has perhaps also changed the status of some related to me. It has certainly brought with it fierce attacks of the devil, fierce attempts on his part to suggest wrong thoughts disguised as revelations from God. I have now put on paper everything: what came from God, from the devil and from me, so that you might understand the terrible fight going on in the minds of those who suffer for Christ today. For many of them the worst pain is not the physical torture, but the intellectual conflict. Dostoievsky, who had also been in prison, wrote, "It is not as a child that I believe and confess Jesus Christ. My 'hosanna' is born of a furnace of doubt."

For Samuel the change was a permanent one. He remained a Levite to the end of his life.

I have come back to normal conditions of life and to normal thoughts. Today I have the same quiet creed which all Evangelical Christians have. Looking back to the thoughts which passed through my mind in solitary confinement, I wonder myself about many of the ideas which I nurtured there. I am on the safe side now. But the communion of saints is possible only if we bear with our imprisoned brethren their tempests of doubt and the assaults of the devil. In ~Tortured for Christ~, ~The Soviet Saints~, ~If that were Christ would you give him your blanket?~ and other publications, I gave a description of the physical sufferings of the bride of Christ in Communist countries. The other side also had to be told - the story of the mental stress. You need to know the state of their minds when their reason rocks under the pressure of Communist imprisonment, Read this book with charity towards those who suffer more than words can describe, instead of comparing every assertion with Bible verses. We had no Bibles and had forgotten theology.

page 13 Chapter 1: The Making of a Messenger

DEAR BROTHERS AND SISTERS

TO WHAT SHALL I COMPARE MY SOLITARY CELL?

It is like a wood full of the fragrance of flowers. No tree in the forest gives off a sweeter perfume than the one out of which crosses are made.

To what else shall I compare my cell?

It is like a rich storehouse. The same Greek word translated "closet" in MTT 6:6 is translated "storehouse" in LUK 12:24. God, the angels, the devils, the saints, my forefathers, my friends and my enemies, all future generations, the whole universe and its Creator are here. There is no joy which I cannot experience by the simple method of rejoicing with those who rejoice. In the spirit, I can accompany others on wonderful journeys, I can share their emotions as they worship in church or enjoy a good meal. I can rejoice with mothers bending over the cots of their babes. I can play merrily with young children. I can weep with those who weep. Here in my cell I have theology, philosophy, politics, light-hearted jokes and serious projects, virtues and vices.

I could liken my cell to a cinema. "~Vechol haam roim et hakolot~ - and all the people saw the voices." (EXO 20:18 in the original). In exceptional circumstances, like the terrifying moment when God appeared on Mount Sinai, it is possible to see voices. I used to wonder about that verse when I was free. It was usual for the Jews to listen. Unhappily, it has remained the usual thing for most Christians also. But it ought not to be so. Christians are meant to be men and women who "behold," if only as in a mirror. They are meant to see the glory of the Lord. (2CO 3:18). Here in my cell I see phantasmagoric moving pictures. Some depict scenes of horror but some are of indescribable beauty, such as I have never known before. And it is not only pictures I can see. What normally would be voices, expressing clear propositions of philosophical, theological or social content, become images. How much there is to be seen in a solitary cell! It really is true that you are never less alone than when you are alone.

But I would also liken my cell to the studio of a sculptor. Michelangelo looked at a block of marble, and saw an angel. All he had to do was to hew away the superfluous stone. I believe that these cells are places in which the great Sculptor shapes his future messengers.

Supposing that he makes a messenger out of me, what shall I look like? The thought becomes an image. I see myself as I shall be then.

Now I see the person described in Kipling's poem, "the Prophet of Utterly Absurd,"

> Who, when the thing that couldn't be occurred
> Just takes time to change a leg and goes again.

You don't think during tortures. But now, when I think back on them, I find in them a symbolism.

They fix a rope around your manacles. Then you are lifted up in the air so that you cannot reach the ground except on tiptoes. The steel of the manacles cuts into your wrists. You have cramps in your feet for a long time afterwards, but you have stretched higher than anybody else. An utterly absurd position, like the prophet's calling.

Supposing God, that I do become a messenger, will it be a source of joy or pain for me? I will have to receive messages from you. Daniel trembled when he received a revelation from the mysterious being Gabriel, who is simultaneously man (DAN 9:21) and angel (LUK 1:11). The beloved disciple John fainted when he saw the Lord. (REV 1:17) I am driven nearly insane at the mere thought of receiving messages for the people directly from you.

Usually, preachers get their messages from books they read, which copied the thoughts of other writers, inspired in their turn by an earlier sermon of Spurgeon, who took his inspiration avowedly from Calvin, who was greatly inspired by St.John Chrysostom, who learned from men of a former generation how to interpret a message which an apostle received from God. This is a golden chain of tradition through which the truth has been conveyed to us. The church possesses a treasury accumulated over centuries, from which preachers do well to draw. But a messenger from God is a rare phenomenon.

You cannot call St. Athanasius other than utterly absurd. Arius's teaching is so clear, so easily acceptable to the human mind. But the Athanasian creed makes human reason shudder: "Whosoever will be saved, before all things it is necessary that he hold the Catholic Faith; which Faith except every one do keep whole and undefiled, without doubt he shall perish everlastingly ..."

What will the absurdity of my message be? When I see myself as God's messenger, I see two possible Wurmbrands. One plays a role similar to Jeremiah and Gedaliah, (2KI 25:22) telling Christians what they will never accept, unless perhaps outwardly, that they must submit to the Communist oppressors, as the Jews had to submit to Babylon, and seek the peace of those who subdued them by violence (JER 29:7). On the practical level the Jews had no other choice. If they had resisted, Babylon would have utterly destroyed them as a nation. So, the Communists have the prospect of remaining in power for generations. Should not Christians submit and accept the terrible fact? Much suffering could be avoided if they did. The Communists have proposed that I should play a role similar to that of Jeremiah. The Babylonians would protect me. How ashamed Jeremiah must have been to receive their favour. My brethren would call me a traitor. Yet, notwithstanding, I would be sure that I was a messenger of God. Jeremiah did not doubt his calling, though it was nothing less than what any martial court would condemn as high treason, propaganda made in time of war to submit to the enemy.

Then I see another Wurmbrand, who is organizing a Christian fight against Communism, in Rumania itself or perhaps abroad - this also could be, because to a messenger the utterly absurd can happen.

These two types are contradictory. I see two Wurmbrands before me. I see them delivering contradictory messages. If each were embodied in different persons, they would have to quarrel publicly. Neither could fulfill his task without the other denouncing him as an evildoer. But there is a high spiritual level on which the two are one.

According to the Talmud an animal is unclean for food if it has some stones in the kidneys. "How big must the stone be to make the animal unclean?" asked a rabbi. To which another replied, "The stones must be the size of an olive kernel in one kidney, and another olive kernel in the other." The first rabbi guessed, "You are hiding something from me. It is not about stones in the kidneys that you wish to speak, but about some deep mystery." "You have conjectured rightly," the other answered. "I meant that if there comes a persecution against religion. the rabbis must divide into two camps. Some must accept death and not change even the manner in which we Jews tie our shoe-latchets. The other group must make friends with the tyrant, compromise with him, in order to win at least some concessions. And the martyrdom of those who pretend to be on good terms with the murderers of Jews is not less than the martyrdom of those who sacrifice themselves on matters of principle. This is the meaning of the size of the stones in an animal's kidneys."

God looks only on the heart. And both Wurmbrands may be right. To say that there is only one truth is like denying the existence of both positive and negative electricity. It shows a lack of understanding of the notion "one," which can only be defined as a synthesis of contradictory forces. That is what ~one~ atom, or ~one~ man, is. That is the sense of the word "one" even when applied to God. A Son who prays with bitter tears that he might be spared the cup of suffering. and a Father who says No to his agonizing Son, are one God. That is why the Bible calls God by the Hebrew word ~ehad~, which means compound oneness, and never by the word ~iahid~, which is absolute oneness, uniqueness. Absolute one does not exist.

The Sculptor knows what he will hew from the block of stone which he keeps in this cell. I can see the manifest beauty of the one masterpiece and the veiled beauty of the other. The latter resembles a piece of surrealist art - only the initiated can understand it.

But a third image emerges, one which I like more than any other. This is the image of a Wurmbrand who practises no wise policy, who is no warrior - but one who smiles. For centuries Leonardo da Vinci's Mona Lisa has done nothing else but smile and make the onlookers just a little bit happier. Isac Feinstein, the man who played a big role in my conversion and who was later killed in a pogrom, had received this message from God. Years after his death, a man to whom I spoke about him said, "Nobody could ever forget his smile." Did he smile like that to the last? The greatest preacher of our country was Brother Paulini, president of the Seventh Day Adventist convention. His message was a smile on a shining face. Such messengers fulfill the words of St. John of the Cross: where there is no love, put love, and love will grow.

It may be that God, like every great sculptor, has several projects, and that the images which I see are only provisional drafts of his possible intentions. Or perhaps I shall die in prison, and go to God as a messenger of mankind, to tell him that it is much too unhappy to be judged guilty.

We used to read to our little son Mihai every day a passage of Scripture and a page from the ~Lives of the Saints~. I remember the Christians who were brought before the Roman proconsul Saturninus. St. Speratus told him, "I do not acknowledge the rulers of this age, but rather I serve the God who has never been seen by men and who cannot be looked on with mortal eyes." St. Vestia said simply, "I am a Christian." The proconsul wanted to give them time to rethink their attitude. St. Speratus said, "In a cause so righteous there is no need to rethink." Both were beheaded. Now they serve God day and night in his temple (REV 7:15). In what does this service consist, if not in telling God how invincible was the ignorance of their persecutor and how great is the misery of humanity? They do not have to tell God much about God. He knows this better himself. I would like to be a messenger of mankind to

God, as much as to be a messenger of God to mankind. I will allow God to choose which it is to be.

My brothers and sisters, you also must believe that your lives are clay in the hands of a wonderful sculptor. He never makes mistakes. If he is sometimes hard on you, it is because he sometimes has what we could call negative successes. He loses a pawn in order to win the chess game. He loses a battle in order to win a war. He causes his Son to endure suffering in order to save a world. Just trust. Don't live on another's messages, but discover the message for which he is moulding you. Amen.

page 19 Chapter 2: A Joyful Noise Unto The Lord

MYSTERIOUS RULER

TODAY IT SEEMS QUITE POINTLESS FOR ME TO SPEAK TO YOU.

Humiliation destroys a soul far more easily than torture. This morning the examining officer asked me to open my mouth. Well, they often do this, to check that you don't have any poison hidden in it. But when I opened my mouth this time, he spat in it. I swallowed the phlegm.

Then he ordered me to kneel. His warm urine ran down my face. How stupid one can be. The verse which came into my mind at that moment was the one about "the precious ointment upon the head, that runs down upon Aaron's beard" (PSA 133:2)

And now I am back in my cell. Ought I to pray? "Is any among you afflicted? Let him pray" (JMS 5:13). But how can I pray to one who has foreordained all things, who has all power in heaven and in earth, and in whose world somebody urinates on my head?

I wonder why I swallowed the phlegm instead of spitting out. I certainly was not thinking what I was doing. But we are surrounded by the saints, with whom we are in communion (HEB 12:2). They are not in some far-off heaven. St. Catherine was with me when the officer spat in my mouth. She was a princess who cared for the sick. One of them was full of lice, and she was so overcome by disgust that she almost left him uncared for. So she swallowed a louse taken from his body. This helped. I have always admired her for this. Now perhaps she has taught me to do, just for a moment, something similar.

page 20 IF PRISON WALLS COULD SPEAK

But his urine on my head was too much. God, I have simply nothing to tell you about it, neither as a reproach, nor by way of thanks. Nor do I wish to embarrass you by asking you the indiscreet question "Why?" You would perhaps not know the answer.

So I circle round my cell, making a noise which I call joyful. Tra-la-la-la-tum-tum-te-tum-tra-la. Or am I in fact weeping? The Hebrew word ~nud~ means both "to bemoan" and "to skip for joy." You have asked us to "make a joyful noise unto the Lord" (PSA 98:4). Well, here you have it, "Pom-pom-tara-pom-tara." When I am beyond understanding anything, I can enjoy the miracle of hearing my own voice.

I stop making a noise, in order to think. Why do you need joyful noises? I prefer the quiet. Perhaps you are stricken by some deep sorrow which we have to cure, as David of old had to cheer Saul's melancholy by playing on the harp.

Perhaps you are like the ancient Persian kings, whose palaces no mourner was allowed to approach. A king needs quiet, and a cool mind, in order to rule a country.

Nobody is allowed to disturb a surgeon with bad news from his family while he is performing an operation. Even more, God must not be worried with transitory human sorrows, so that he is free to concentrate on eradicating evil from his kingdom.

But men are constantly crying out to you in their need. The joyful noises of believers must drown these cries, in order to create in the Godhead the right mood for its own work. It is probably for this reason that the angels sing unceasingly the same monotonous "Holy, holy, holy, is the Lord of Hosts" (ISA 6:3). The Church repeats over and over again the meaningless words "Glory be to the Father and to the Son and to the Holy Ghost; as it was in the beginning, is now and ever shall be." Nobody really wants the glory of God to be through all eternity what it is now. It would be a poor thing. But because these songs are being repeated uninterruptedly, you cease to pay attention to them. They become just a joyful noise, a background against which you can continue to think your own thoughts

Our job is to create a barrier of noise around you, so that man's cries of despair may not distract you from your work which alone can destroy the root of all despair.

You must be deeply sad, because you find yourself in one of four situations:

(1) either, as Origen taught, you are working with uncreated matter, existing since eternity, in which there is intrinsic evil which you have to overcome;
(2) or you have yourself foreordained all the sufferings of the world, including this urine on my head, for an ultimate good purpose. This is a Protestant concept. But I don't know if you agree with the Protestant creed. When the Augsburg and Westminster confessions were drafted, you were not consulted. But anyhow it must be terrible for you to look at sufferings which you, who are fundamentally good, have foreordained;
(3) or man has free will, and his sufferings are the result of his rebellion against you. Then your sorrow must be that of a father whose own children are his enemies;
(4) or Zoroaster was right, and you have a great adversary who cannot yet be subdued.

You choose. Don't ask me to solve theological problems with this head of mine which they have abused. I will just make a joyful noise. Tum-tum-te-tum. No words, no tune, no rhythm. Don't even try to find some sense in it. You just mind your business, which is to create a new kingdom.

The places where I have felt the deepest quiet have been in the Jewish Chassidic synagogues, or Christian Pentecostal meetings, where everyone is shouting at once, in a mixture of voices at different pitches, all saying something different. The unintelligible noise gave me a feeling of inner serenity.

Jesus, on the cross, after having uttered the seven words, did the most beautiful thing of all: "He cried with a loud voice" (MTT 27:50). What did he cry? It was not a what. It was just a joyful noise. "Tra-la la-la. Tra-la - You, Father, just quietly get on with your own business. I have done my work. I have endured all the mockeries and the pain. I have just one thing more to do: to make a joyful noise. So I will cry out aloud." It is only now that I understand this verse. That cry is worth more than all the theories of Origen, Luther, Spurgeon or anybody else.

If I had to die today, I would like my last breath to be not a prayer or a hymn, but just a joyful noise.

The tra-la-la can be joyful because I may meet in heaven the man who humiliated me. He has as many chances of salvation as I have.

I always marvelled at the ritual of the Day of Atonement as described in Leviticus 16. The high priest had to cast lots upon two goats: one lot for the Lord and one for the scapegoat. The scapegoat was destined for the evil spirit, Azazel. If the law had stipulated one hundred lots for the Lord and one for the demon, nobody could have objected. But God is all for fair play. Only one lot for him, the same as for the scapegoat, not a whit more. His Son was born in a stable, like many poor children. His Son feasted at the banquets of rich publicans, as many other men did. His Son died on a cross; so did the robbers. His Son rose from the dead, as millions will also rise. He will keep no privilege for himself. He is in glory, and "when he shall appear, we shall be like him" (1JN 3:2); we, his former enemies. We shall sit with him on his throne - we, former murderers, liars, adulterers, slanderers, unbelievers. One lot for God, one lot for the scapegoat. There is equality of chances with the Lord.

So this officer's chances of going to heaven are equal with mine. I cannot imagine how any conversation between us will be possible there. It will be too difficult for him to apologize, he will not be able to explain or justify his action. I shall not be able to speak any kind words. We shall simply take each other's hands and cry out ecstatically some loud, senseless noise.

Tra-la-te-tum. How wonderful to circle around my cell and make a joyful noise! A pity it cannot be too loud now. The guards would object. Perhaps you will take this noise as a prayer.

Protestants reproach Catholics for praying before statues of the saints. But for me, even such a prayer is more acceptable than one in which a man keeps before his eyes only his own self with its remorse, its troubles, its desires, its ambitions, its needs and its stupid memories about somebody having reviled him. Is it not much better just to make a joyful noise?

What this officer did to me was base. But God chooses the base things (1CO 1:28). I will think of him as my future companion in the heavenly choir which will make a joyful noise unto the Lord. Tra-la la-la. I am calmer now. This also has passed.

I started my first sermon as a young pastor with a story; King David once summoned a jeweller and gave him the order: "Make me a ring which will transform my mood from sorrow to joy or from joy to sorrow whenever I look on it. If you make it within a week, you will be royally rewarded. If not, you will be beheaded." The jeweller left the palace a broken man. He knew that his life was lost. But in the palace courtyard little Solomon was playing. He noticed the sorrow on the man's face and asked him the reason. When the jeweller told him of the king's command, Solomon laughed and said, "You must make a plain ring of tin, and engraved on it the words ~Gam ze iavo~ - this also will pass. That is all. If he looks at it when he is merry, my father will at once become serious, and when he is worried, a look at the ring will wipe the frown from his face."

~Gam ze iavo~. So many terrible events have passed in my life. Now this has passed, too. With Jesus the incarnation passed, the crucifixion passed. Everything passes. It is as though nothing has happened to me today. My beloved God, let us walk again in companionship with one another. Amen.

DEAR BROTHERS AND SISTERS

THE EXAMINING OFFICER WAS IN A GOOD MOOD TODAY. YOU could sense it from the very beginning. There would be no beating. He just wanted to amuse himself with some pleasant conversation.

He asked me, "Do you believe that God created man in his own image?" I answered, "I certainly do." "Do you believe that you are in the image of God?" "Of course."

Then he took a mirror out of his pocket and handed it to me. "Look into the glass. See how ugly you are. You have dark circles under your eyes. You are all skin and bones. Your whole appearance is haggard, like a madman. If you are in the image of God, God must be as ugly as you are. Why should you worship him?"

I had already seen myself in a mirror once since I had been in jail, and I knew that I was terribly ugly, I who had been considered a handsome man. I had been horrified to see myself in such shape. Now, my ugliness was being made into a theological problem.

Happily, Christians do not have to think beforehand what to answer. The words are given to them.

I said, "Yes, my God has an ugly face like me. In Hebrew there is no such word as 'face.' You can only say 'faces'- ~panim~. The word has no singular. There is a deep meaning in this, because no man has only one face. He shows one countenance when he speaks to a superior, another when he bullies an inferior, one when he is grieved, another when he hears good news. Our God also has many faces. One is a face of complete serenity, the serenity of a Being who has foreordained everything and can see from the beginning the happy end of the tortuous road. He has a face radiant with joy, sharing the pleasure of all who rejoice, even that of a little girl who has been given a new doll. But he has also another image, one of even worse suffering and ugliness than mine. We saw this face on Golgotha. His hair was disordered, his brow was disfigured by wounds. Spittle and blood mingled on his face. He had dark circles under his eyes. He had no form nor comeliness" (ISA 53:2). This, too, is one of the faces of the Godhead. Christ is not ashamed to call me his brother."

I hope the Communist officer may have understood at least something of what I told him.

Now, back in my cell, my thoughts, which are not diverted as they would be if I were free, by new events, continue to dwell on the question put to me. Everyone who suffers bears the image of the God who became "a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief" (ISA 53:3). But what about my soul? God, too, has a soul (ISA 42:1; ZEC 11:8). Is his soul also like mine, a bird which continually flies from place to place, from ugly thoughts to the most lofty and back, tossed to and fro by passions, a mixture of holiness and worldliness? Does my soul, polluted by sin, bear the image of his, as my face, vilified by sufferings, is surely an image of the Godhead; yes, of the Godhead in its highest form - the self-sacrificing Godhead?

Does God also have an ugly soul, like mine?

But how do I know that my soul is ugly? By self-analysis. "Examine yourselves," say the scriptures (2CO 13:5). "Know yourself" was the teaching of Socrates. But can we do this? When I think about myself, as about everything else, I do so in words. The Rumanian language has possibly 200,000 words. So we could not even give a name to all the 30 billions of stars which exist in our galaxy alone, nor to the octillions of atoms which constitute my body. With what poor instrument I think about myself!

How much of my soul is really me, and how much is a legacy from my ancestors, or telepathic influences which reach me from the prayers or curses of others?

page 26 IF PRISON WALLS COULD SPEAK

If Judas Iscariot had examined himself with absolute sincerity, he would have discovered that he was a genuine disciple of Jesus, who had sold everything in order to join the group of apostles, that under his preaching men were converted, that, like the other apostles, he had developed a beneficent activity, healing sick people, driving out demons. He had just one besetting sin remaining. But so had his colleagues: a quarrelsome spirit, or pride, or cowardice. Judas's besetting sin was dishonesty in petty things. But there is no man who has not some sin, and with Jesus there is forgiveness. How could Judas have known that the devil had put it into his heart to betray Jesus? What do I know about the imponderable influences of angels and devils in my heart? Their influences have a long incubation period, as with some diseases, and you discover them only years later when they appear in some unexpected outward act.

All psychoanalysts would agree that there is no possibility of a thorough and valid self-examination. The examiner is I. The examined is I. The subjects on which I shall be examined are decided by the teacher, I, with the knowledge of the pupil, I. The examiner is biased. The apparatus with which I examine the I is I. There is not the slightest possibility of achieving an objective result.

A Pharisee examined himself and found that he was a good man. He was mistaken. Close by him, a publican examined himself and discovered that he was lost. He, too, was mistaken. He was unable to discover the reality, that he was justified. Wisely, Jesus's parable does not tell us that he ceased to be a publican after having beaten his breast about his sin. Neither have I reason to believe that Zacchaeus fulfilled his promise to restore everything he had stolen. Self-examination can bring a man to beautiful decisions, not to their fulfillment. The Bible does not tell us that he really gave back the money. We always examine only the superficial strata of our ego. We don't penetrate to its ultimate depths.

The law of Moses was given, not that we should fulfill it, but to make us discover our incapacity to do so. And the Bible says "Examine yourselves" to make us aware that self-examination is impossible.

page 27 Chapter 3: My Image

The thinker, the subject of his thought and the act of thinking are one, as God is one.

Why do I believe God to be one, and not two as in Zoroastrianism, or many as in Hinduism? The number one has certain peculiarities. It is the only number which remains the same when you multiply it by itself. God can multiply himself; he can beget a Son; the Holy Spirit may proceed from him; then many children can be born from him and added to the mystical body of Christ. They become partakers of the divine nature. But the One remains one.

One is the only number the root of which is itself. Extract the root of the Godhead, and a carpenter will tell you, "He that has seen me has seen the Father" (JHN 14:9). It makes no difference whether we look at the Creator of the galaxies and of all mankind, or at a carpenter confined to one room, who is soon to be crucified. The root is equal to the whole number. I may be the millionth root of the One. I am still One, not a particle less.

The definition of the word "number" is a quantity related to one. The number one is the foundation of everything. Therefore God is one, Christ is one. I am this one. Luther says, "The Christian is Christ." The faith is one. There is nobody to analyze himself. There is no analyzer and no analyzed. There is only the One God in whom we all live, move and have our being. We belong to an inner world, of the one Soul, full of beauty. What appears in the distorting mirror of my mind as ugliness is the splendour of his all-understanding and all-pardoning love. My cursed mind considers me ugly. In his eyes, the eyes of the only One who judges rightly, I am comely.

A great miracle occurs. The highest possible beauty, the Godhead, is beautified even more when mirrored in the soul of a bride of Christ, who like Mary of Bethany sits quietly at the feet of Jesus, instead of torturing herself with self-examination, which can result only in pride or despair.

We have to look not at ourselves, but at the brazen serpent. It is this faith which heals (NUM 21:9). There is no healing in evaluating the number and gravity of the wounds inflicted by the snakes. Look away from the pus and blood, and concentrate upon the

page 28 IF PRISON WALLS COULD SPEAK

One Saviour who has taken up residence in you to make you one. One with him and one with yourself. There is no greater beauty than that of oneness. I have this beauty. Yes, my soul bears his image.

"All things work together for good" (ROM 8:28). St. Augustine adds "even my sins." Mary Magdalene's former sins were the raw material out of which her future faithfulness was produced. The former crimes of Saul of Tarsus were the ingredients for making the most zealous apostle. Some men have to choose their way. Abraham was privileged. About him it is written that God was with him "in all that he did" (GEN 21:22).

Be happy, my soul. You bear the beautiful image of God, as God bore your ugly countenance during his passion. Or rather, just because of this.

Don't examine yourselves, my brothers, by criteria chosen by yourself, by a book declared by yourself to be holy (your fellow-men do the same thing with the Talmud, the Koran or the Vedas), according to an interpretation of it chosen by yourself, according to a standard of morality which changes when you cross a frontier, or when the century changes. Believe that God blesses you in what you do. The Church needed the intransigence of St. Paul, the courage of the first martyrs, the compromise with the State made in the time of Constantine, the quarrelsome spirit of Luther, the calm of Melanchthon, the neutrality of Erasmus, the costly love of the arts of the Popes, without whose selling of indulgences we would not have had the works of Michelangelo, Raphael and Leonardo da Vinci. The Church needs men who choose the way of martyrdom under Communism, and also the official church leaders who in good faith serve the same Lord, accepting the limitations imposed by tyrants.

Be happy that God has chosen you to bear his image in your soul. It is a free gift. Be thankful for it. And cease to judge yourselves and others.

The Sasover rabbi once gave his last coin to a man of evil reputation. His disciples asked him why he did so. He replied, "Should I be more particular in my choice than God, who gave the coin to me?" God has chosen you to be moulded in his likeness without any merit of yours. Now you also must

love other men independently of their moral and spiritual status.

Yes, lieutenant, we, the ugly, haggard prisoners, bear his image. Amen.

page 30 IF PRISON WALLS COULD SPEAK

DEAR BROTHERS AND SISTERS

THE CENTRAL MESSAGE OF THE MOSAIC RELIGION BEGINS WITH the word "Hear" - "Hear, O Israel: the Lord our God is one Lord" (DEU 6:4) There were exceptional personalities in the Jewish religion who saw - men such as Moses and Isaiah. But the people had to hear, and to obey what they heard.

Christ said to his first disciples, "Come and ~see~ (JHN 1:39). We have passed from hearing to seeing. To Martha, the Lord said, "Said I not unto thee, that if thou wouldest believe, thou shouldest ~see~ the glory of God?" (JHN 11:40) The Book of Revelation, too, is a book about things which St. John actually ~saw~.

The highest Jewish spiritual exercise is meditation on the Word. The Christians know a higher stage: contemplation. They can visualize.

In conditions of solitary confinement, which are similar to those of a hermit in the desert deprived of material things, the seeing becomes so real, that you have difficulty in convincing yourself that what you see is an event in the spirit and not in the material world.

This reminds me of two old Chinese legends. How true legends can be. It is said that a great painter once painted on a wall a beautiful landscape with a cave. When he had finished, he walked into the cave and disappeared, and was never heard of again. Another legend tells of an artist who painted a lake with reeds. Among the reeds he placed a fish. The painted fish swam in the lake, alive and happy like all fishes.

page 31 Chapter 4: Hearing and Seeing

Whatever you create or evoke in the spirit can become a reality, into which you can enter, and live, and disappear

All I have in my cell is a bed with a straw mattress and a blanket. In the corner there is a bucket. My only other possession is a tin mug. With no earthly possessions to live on, I live in the world of the promises of God. Faith sees them as already fulfilled.

"To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the tree of life, which is in the midst of the paradise of God" (REV 2:7). Under the Nazis, I once had a narrow escape from death. Still under emotional stress, I told the story to a wise old pastor. When I had finished, he said, "If you have gone through all that, you had better eat." And he asked his wife to bring me some fish. So Jesus, when we meet him and tell him all the tribulations through which we have passed, will say, "Then let us first eat." I see him leading me to the tree of life, which is simply life itself. A blind man whom he healed saw men who looked like trees. That is what we are really like. Our lives are "the tree yielding fruit after his kind, whose seed is in itself" (GEN 1:11). Now I lie down in the shadow of the tree of life. He plucks the fruit of everything good which I have done. I see him bending over me and giving me to eat. It is written, not that we shall eat, but that we shall be given to eat. I am a beloved bride, and the Bridegroom cherishes me. He plucks the fruit for me, and puts it in my mouth.

What a man sows, that he will reap. He enjoys now, for eternity, the fruits of his life of faith.

"To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the hidden manna" (REV 2:17). ~Manna~ means "what is this?," the words which the Jews said not only in the wilderness, but also what they saw the Lord driving out an unclean spirit in the synagogue at Capernaum. It is an expression of amazement. I see so many amazing things in heaven. God has surprises for his children. There are many more joys here than I expected, and a greater capacity for enjoying many pleasures at the same time. In Indian art, Krishna is depicted with many arms. This is a basic archetype of the human soul. You need many arms in a world where you have to receive so much. Most of the beings around me are like this. So I feel the greater pity for a few others whom I see around me in heaven. They have their share of joy. But I find it tragic that they should be in heaven with one single arm. They have obeyed Jesus and cut off the hand which offended them. It would have been simpler to readjust their whole life so as to prevent their hand from offending.

I would not dare to say whom I have seen in paradise. Nobody would believe me. This much I can say, that it contains more people than the average Christian would permit to enter.

I see something like an Orthodox church - that is the nearest comparison l can make, but it is something completely other. In it I see among the worshippers an exclusive brother, who would never have entered an Orthodox church during his earthly life. I ask him, "How do you come to be here?" He answers, "In heaven, there are many mansions. We, the exclusive brethren, have our own quite separate dwelling. But we enjoy visiting each other."

"And I will give him," says the Lord, "a white stone" (REV 2:17). I have actually received it. "And in the stone a new name."

The Communists have put me in jail under the false name of Vasile Georgescu. I have been forbidden to reveal to anyone my true identity. They are afraid that a warden may commit an indiscretion. But it is not only they who give new names. God also gives new names. God was not satisfied with the name of Abram. He wished that its pronunciation should last longer; so he added a syllable to it. We would never have thought that God would appear to a man just to give him a nicer, more meaningful name. But, not satisfied with this, God changed Sarai's name, too. He called her Sarah, because that is the Hebrew name for "princess." She was a princess in his sight. Jesus changed Simon's name to Cephas (JHN 1:42), a simplified form of Caiaphas (the name of the high priest of that time), to show him that he, the ignorant fisherman, was the real high priest in the Lord's sight, and not the man who dressed in gorgeous robes.

I also received from Christ a new name. After something like a year, it was changed. It was not only that I heard it, I saw his face, the movements of his lips when he pronounced it. And the name lost its importance for me. Before he pronounced it there had been his desire to give it to me. The name was new only as applied to me. It was a Biblical name. There was in his mind a comparison between me and the persons who have borne it before. There was the ineffable source out of which his thoughts have their provenance. I had touched the depths. The new name was only a hint inviting me to these depths.

When he breathed upon the apostles and said, "Receive ye the Holy Ghost"(JHN 20:22), they surely caught his quiet breathing rather than the words he said while expelling the air. It is in catching this quiet breathing that you receive the Holy Spirit.

"And he that overcometh, and keepeth my works unto the end, to him will I give power over the nations" (REV 2:26). I see myself on a throne. Why should a throne be made of gold and velvet? Can it not as well be the few planks of a prisoner's bed? Men have given a certain kind of chair the name of throne. I can give this name to any other object I please. From this my throne I decide about nations.

Not only the Christians will be saved. If they have the monopoly of salvation, over whom will they rule? And how will this promise be fulfilled, that to faithful servants is given the government over five or ten cities (LUK 19:17-19)? It is no fun to be king over empty towns. So they will be populated by those who have not been faithful servants. We Christians will be in the heavenly Jerusalem, but there will also be nations walking in its light (REV 21:24). The leaves of the tree of life will serve for the healing of the nations (REV 22:2), which means that there will be in the life beyond people who need a cure for their souls.

And I am seated on a throne, and have the power to do good to multitudes of people. I can send messengers to give light and health. I get reports about the progress of difficult cases. They have to be thought about. There is no rest in heaven. It is the busiest place I know.

I see myself clothed in white raiment. I read this promise to Mihai when he was small. He was worried, "But what if the Lord does not have clothes small enough for children like me?" I had to assure him that Jesus has white garments of every size, for giants and dwarfs and babies. He also has white garments for those who are small in faith as well as in body. St. Peter, the apostle, writes to very simple Christians, "You that have obtained a like precious faith with us" (2PE 1:1). A little dog may be despised by a big Dobermann, but the Dobermann has to recognize that the little dog is also a dog, and not a cat.

I am dressed in white, in fullness of light, and so are all those around me. We walk with Jesus. What a privilege it was to walk with him through the earthly meadows! Birds sang more melodiously than ever. Lilies bloomed with a scent never smelled before. But we walk with him in the golden streets of the heavenly city.

An old Jewish book, ~Sefer Ierahmeel~, says that in the life to come the day is divided into four watches. In the first watch, we shall be like children, and shall know all the joys of childhood. In the second watch we shall be young, and know all the joys of youth. In the third watch we shall know all the joys of maturity, and in the fourth watch those of the wisdom of old age. Next day, the cycle of joys begins again. It really is so. I pass from joy to joy.

Like the Chinese painter, I enter this cave, painted once by St. John the Divine and now once more by me. Like the painted fish I swim in the water. No man can become a future citizen of heaven without passing hours in heaven now. Therefore we have been given the power to ascend in the spirit. Poverty, sickness, inner and outer tragedies, prisons, chains, cannot hinder this ascent. On the contrary, they assist it.

O my brothers and sisters, why remain in the ugly places? Evoke heaven and enter for ever into what you have evoked.

What will death matter then?

The ~Zohar~, the ancient book of Jewish mysticism, says, "When such a soul departs from this world, pure, bright, unblemished, the Holy One, blessed be he, daily causes her to shine with a host of radiances, and proclaims concerning her, 'Here is the soul of my son such a one. Let her be preserved for the body from which she has departed."

"Jacob kissed Rachel" (GEN 29:11), which is to say, the Lord discerns each holy soul and, taking each in turn to himself, embraces and caresses her. To die is to pass into his embrace. Amen.

page 35 Chapter 5: The Pain of Erotic Imagination

DEAR BROTHERS AND SISTERS

I DON'T KNOW WHAT IS HAPPENING TO ME NOW.

The tuberculosis microbe has invaded my whole body. I spit blood. On the spots where I was most severely beaten, bone tuberculosis has fixed itself. I have read somewhere that the secretion of the tuberculosis microbe greatly excites the sexual glands, giving rise to a rich erotic imagery.

It may be that they put aphrodisiacs in our food. A pastor in a cell nearby was put to sleep in the same bed as a girl prisoner, only to torment them both.

The fact is, I cannot defend myself against erotic fantasy. You young people, when you have it, can escape by reading a book, listening to music, or taking a walk. I lie on my bed and imagine, for hours at a time, all kinds of wild sexual scenes in which I myself am taking part.

I cannot escape from this torture into any other activity. And I feel a deep disgust with myself after making love for hours in my imagination to girls and women who were my former parishioners. Some of them won for Christ by me.

But we have to bear such crosses, too. There is an objective law of the soul, just as in the material world. Given a man of a certain type, under such circumstances, such thoughts are the unavoidable result. I will not consider it a matter for guilt. We can try to do our best, even when we are haunted by obscene imagination.

Here you are, Helen, offering yourself to me.

Your name reminds me of many things. One beautiful

page 36 IF PRISON WALLS COULD SPEAK

Helen was the cause of the Trojan war in which so many heroes died. There must be a value in a beautiful Helen. Welcome!

At the beginning of the fourth century, Christians were thrown to the wild beasts under the Emperor Diocletian. A Christian servant at the court of Queen Helen brought her to salvation. The Queen persuade her son, Constantine the Great, to give freedom to the Christians. That was the beginning of our Christian civilization. So much can a Helen achieve! Before her marriage her future husband, Constantius, may have had day-dreams about her. She may have appeared to him in these dreams naked and offering herself. But this can be brushed aside. Welcome, Helen. It was because of his wife Helen that the name of Constantius and their more famous son, Constantine, entered history.

And what if, perhaps under the influence of drugs, or simply because of long sexual abstinence, I see you in provocative poses now my dear Helen? Does it diminish anything of your value?

What a fight I had to win you for Christ! You belonged to a family with Communist affiliations, and refused to come to church. You said once, "If Pastor Wurmbrand wishes me to become a Christian, he will have to come every Sunday evening and repeat the whole sermon just for me." So I did. Sunday after Sunday. I came even when I was very tired. I came on cold winter evenings. I came once even when I had a fever.

Usually, priests and pastors do not have to fight for souls. A Catholic man and a Catholic woman have a child who is born predestined to be the Catholic priest's parishioner. The child is brought to baptism. The priest has one more member in his church without any battle. The same kind of thing happens in the major Protestant denominations. When you don't have to fight for souls, you don't value them so much. You don't love them so much. Not every priest weeps when he loses them, seeks them when they go astray. I wonder if they are even the objects of his erotic fancies.

I have fought for you, Helens and Marias and Floricas. You were my every day's work and my every night's prayer.

Why should I wonder that you are now the objects of my obsessions?

I must learn to accept even these erotic imageries. Now, when my mind and memory are deteriorating more and more under the influence of drugs and hunger, they may be the manner in which God is reminding me of you, and of every one of those souls who, left without their pastor, have a heavy battle to fight. Who knows all the laws of the spirit? Perhaps what appears to my conscience as a disgusting sexual obscenity is a distorted image of the uniting of our souls in the battle against the forces of evil.

You, Maria, had an only daughter sick with a heart disease. The girl begged not to have an operation, but you decided otherwise, and she submitted. She died under the anaesthetic. After that you were heartbroken. My visits were a comfort to you. Every time, you asked me, "What is my daughter doing now in Paradise?" and you felt relieved when I answered, "She is still asleep, and the angels are working on her soul to prepare her for the shock of opening her eyes in a new, unknown world. In the meantime, she dreams."

It was an erotic fantasy which reminded me of you. We don't see things as they are. So, perhaps, I don't see what is really happening now between us two. What may seem to me to be an obscenity may be a false image, under the terrifying prison experience, of a beautiful reality, a holy union of our souls. It may be that it is a distorted image of our bending together over the soul of your daughter, Yvonne. Her sleep of initiation may be approaching the end. She may soon be awake, and enjoy the beauties of heaven. Jesus may be approaching to tell her, "Talitha, kumi" (MRK 5:41).

"All things work together for good to them that love God," says the Scripture (ROM 8:28). St. Augustine adds, "even my sins." Perhaps these fantasies too.

And then, have we not to share the sufferings of the Man of Sorrows? Were not the sorrows of all who are in pain his also? What about the pain of sexual desire which cannot find fulfillment? It is one of the greatest sufferings of mankind. So many beautiful souls cannot find a suitable partner; others are sick. With others, utter poverty or a wrong education are a hindrance. Many are unhappy because they have not been able to marry, or because they have married the wrong person. Sexual obsession is one of the great tragedies of mankind. Jesus, who became sin for us, shared this tragedy, too. His heart is open to this suffering also.

If he is in me, the suffering of the world is a burden which I have to bear, too. God being in me, all his responsibilities become mine. The disciples of Jesus have power to remit sins and to retain them. They can tie and they can loose (JHN 20:23). But in order to use this power well, they have also to be tempted in all things. There is an educational value in such things happening to me. God shapes his ministers.

There is a value in all the sexual sufferings through which you pass, my brothers and sisters. They teach you to understand people, to love them as they are, to do your best to see that there should be more sexual justice, in the same way as a Christian has to work to bring about political and economic justice.

Jesus said that there will be a world in which people will not marry, nor be given in marriage (MTT 22:30). If you pick flowers and put them in a vase, they become your property. You can uproot a plant and put it in a pot. It will be yours. But why not leave all the flowers to grow in the garden, so that all can enjoy together, without claim of property, their beauty and their perfume?

God will be all in all. Unfettered, we shall all meet in him. There will be nobody who is not united to everybody else, and everybody will be like Christ, splendid, radiant, full of virtue and perfection. Therefore we shall neither marry nor be given in marriage.

Why should we look only at the ugly side of erotic images? Perhaps they are a dim presentiment of the state predicted by Jesus, when Richards and Georges and Stephens and Helens and Marias and Floricas, in glorified bodies, will live lives which will be a continual embracing of each other and being all embraced by God, a life of increasing voluptuousness in the spirit and in glorified bodies.

So let us remain serene, even through those tormenting imaginings from which, in a different measure, many of you

page 39 Chapter 5: The Pain of Erotic Imagination

also suffer. Christ is with us in these things, too.

The Communists have lost the battle of doping us with aphrodisiacs.

Rejoice, my young brothers and sisters. Christ conquers this temptation. ~Amen.~

page 40 IF PRISON WALLS COULD SPEAK

DEAR BROTHERS AND SISTERS

I HAVE NO BOOKS. I NEVER SPEAK TO ANYONE. IT IS QUITE A long time since I was last called to an interrogation. I live intellectually on the thoughts which flash through my mind. Sometimes I hear my thoughts.

A few days ago - it was on Good Friday - suddenly a voice said distinctly, "Mary sees everything." This was contrary to all I had previously thought about the mother of the Lord. Since I had become a Christian, I had always held her in high respect. A woman does not become a Jewess by giving birth to a Jew. She gives birth to a Jew because she is a Jewess. And Mary did not become the mother of the Lord by giving birth to the Lord. She gave birth to him because she was essentially a God-bearer. This potential existed in her before her meeting with the Archangel Gabriel. She said, "All generations shall call me blessed" (LUK 1:48). And I have always called her the blessed virgin, though this is very unusual for a Protestant.

But I could not admit the practice of addressing prayers to her. In order to hear them, she would have to possess the divine attribute of omnipresence. She is not everywhere. She is a human being. She is a saint in glory, but even these have their limitations. They are creatures, not the Creator.

I have often argued along these lines with my Orthodox and Catholic friends. They seem to forget sometimes how unspeakably small the Virgin Mary felt herself to be, and how unworthy, when she held the infant Jesus in her arms. They could do well to bear in mind what their own hymns say.

There is a beautiful hymn sung in the Orthodox churches every Good Friday, in which the Virgin is made to express the awe which her Son inspired in her: "O Son, my Son, how shall I wrap thee in swaddling clothes? How shall I give thee milk, who givest food to all creation? How shall I hold thee in my arms, who holdest all things? How shall I look upon thee without fear, on whom the many-eyed cherubim dare not lift their gaze?"

And now. out of the unknown, comes this voice saying, "Mary sees everything." Strangely, far from being scandalized, I feel so well, knowing that it is so. For days, I have kept repeating to myself "Mary sees everything." I feel so happy about it. It gives me comfort. I have not the slightest desire to pass on to any other thought. I am reminded of the story of a Jewish rabbi who was observed reading a page of the Bible. Hours later, he was seen still pondering over the same page. More hours passed. Still he had not turned the page. He was asked, "Why don't you read further?" and he answered: "This page is so beautiful. Why should I go on to the next?"

Mary sees everything. St. Francis's prayer was "Dio mio e toto mio - my God and my all." God was his all. To blessed Mary, her Holy Son was everything. I cannot say that he is everything for me. I love many other things besides him. To her, he was and is everything. She sees only him, she sees others only in him, through him, as if through his eyes. Mary has a unique vision.

One evening Joseph was cold towards her. She could guess that he wished to leave her because she was pregnant. But she saw no sin in his suspicion; she did not tell him what had happened. She did not defend herself. She looked towards her. Everything and could be quiet. What did it matter if Joseph thought her impure?

Centuries later, the Lord said to St. Brigit, "The name of humility is Mary." Humility cannot be insulted. The friends of Jesus said "He is beside himself" (MRK 3:21). Blessed Mary looked to the Everything and did not quarrel with those who insulted him, knowing that he is above any insult. She never saw anybody other than him. She looked on those who mocked him as he saw them, with a love which covers sin. The brothers of Jesus did not believe in him (JHN 7:5). She did not tell them to believe. She trusted that they would. She did not even notice their disbelief. It was only transitory. Later, one of these brothers was to become an apostle and die a martyr's death .

She did not complain at the foot of the cross that the disciples had forsaken him. After the resurrection, he did not show himself to her. It was not necessary. She saw him, the Everything, even when he was not before her eyes. Afterwards she sat quietly in the midst of the church at Jerusalem, attending services conducted by an apostle who had fled in the dark, or by Peter who had denied his Master. She saw no sin in them.

She was essentially the Mother of the Lord, and in this respect she was a partaker of the divine nature. She had the nature of One who does not behold iniquity in Jacob, neither perverseness in Israel (NUM 23:21).

"God saw everything that he had made, and, behold, it was very good" (GEN 1:31). Everything is very good. Only if you look at things in isolation do they appear sometimes good and sometimes bad. "Toto mio." For the holy Virgin, Jesus was the everything. Through him, everything she sees is good. And Mary sees everything.

O. give me dove's eyes, as Mary has.

In Acts 22, we are told that, while St. Paul was in a trance in the temple, the Lord appeared to him with the practical purpose of telling him where to go next. But Paul, instead of talking business with Christ, reminded him "I imprisoned and beat in every synagogue them that believed on thee: and when the blood of thy martyr Stephen was shed, I also was standing by, and consenting unto his death" (ACT 22:19-20).

The Lord wished to speak with Paul about a beautiful future of service and self-sacrifice, crowned with martyrdom at the end. He answered by remembering the past.

Paul knew that sin brings a curse, and so it is. Except that words used by God do not have the same meaning as when they are applied to men. When we curse a man, we hate him and wish him evil. With God, the opposite happens. He cursed the serpent, and it finds its food everywhere. He cursed the woman. and all men love her. He cursed the earth, and it brings forth tulips and wheat. He cursed Ham, and the Hamites have created powerful civilizations, and have also played an important role in building up America.

The Lord refused even to talk to Paul on the subject, completely uninteresting for him, of Paul's former misdeeds. When you speak in his presence about your past sins, he does not even understand your language. Only the present and the future have any interest for him.

I have wasted so much time in my solitary cell remembering my past. I was a very bad child. At the age of six I threw a knife at my mother, showing criminal tendencies. By the time I was fifteen, I was already something worse than my present jailors. They at least have some kind of discipline. I was on a lower level than they. I was, and remained until my conversion, an anarchic element, capable of any misdeed, for or against the revolutionist cause. I hated God, mocked him publicly and tried to persuade everybody else to hate him. If I loved Marx and Bakunin and Kropotkin, it was not for their political or economic doctrines, but chiefly for their antitheism. I have committed crimes. I have blood on my conscience. I told Jesus about it again and again. And there was no possibility of communication between us. Because he had long ago washed all this away. He did not understand what I was talking about.

God had separated Paul from his mother's womb. He chose me, too, before the foundation of the world. It would have been a curious kind of election if he had not foreordained all my steps. My sins belonged to his mysterious plans. God tried to make something whiter than snow. The only raw material out of which he can achieve such whiteness is grave sin of which a man repents. There is a deep significance in falling into sin. The Book of Daniel says, "Some of them of understanding shall fall, to try them, and to purge, and to make them white" (DAN 11:35).

Past sins, if you repent of them, whiten you. They made a great psalmist out of David, a faithful disciple out of the courtesan Magdalene, a zealous apostle out of the persecutor Saul. I have been a loved preacher and writer with a particular vocation. My sermons and books would not have had the same quality without my past of anarchy, vice and violent atheism.

But I feel so peaceful now. Mary, the lovely one, sees everything. She sees simultaneously the ugly past, the present state of grace and the future of possible glorification. She sees the whole picture, and it is that of an ascension. This is how the Lord sees it too.

When St. Paul touched on the problem of his past sins the Lord did not react at all. He continued to give directions of the future. It was for him as if Paul had said nothing. And you really are speaking about nothing, when you speak about your past offences. Where are they? They have as much reality as the snow of ten years ago. The statutes and judgments of God are given in order that men shall live by them, and not that they may torture themselves slowly to death with continual remorse.

Jesus does not see any sin in me. Everything is washed away. He is God. But there is also a human being, Mary, so pure that she, seeing the everything, the whole picture, never rebukes, but only understands, only loves, only helps.

I promise you – and O, Lord, help me to keep the promise when provoked to do otherwise – never to mention my past sins, neither before you, nor before men. In the frame of the everything they were preparatory steps toward holiness. For saints, past sins have formed the roots of future beautiful flowers. I will live only the present and the future, learning from Mary not to see meaningless isolated fragments, but the great, beautiful everything.

Hail, Mary, full of grace. Hail, Mary, who sees everything. Amen.

page 45 Chapter 7: The Remnant of My Faith

DEAR BROTHERS AND SISTERS

A FAITH WHICH CAN BE DESTROYED BY SUFFERING IS NOT FAITH.

I have read many stories of men who experienced great sorrows, but who believed to the end; stories of martyrs, and of missionary heroes. Bishop Hannington of Uganda must have preached to the cannibals about a faith which endures through every suffering. Then they took him away to be eaten. On the way to the place where they cut his body into pieces, he repeated to himself all the time, "Love your enemies; pray for them which despitefully use you" (MTT 5:44). When his sons took his place as missionaries and converted the bishop's murderers, they were told the story. So he must have kept his faith unaltered to the end. A man will continue to hold his true creed even in the face of death. You give up only what you imagined you believed.

Today I have had a time of quiet to think about what I have really retained of the creed I used to hold.

The relationship between the body and the soul is a curious one. The soul is not always tied to the body. When I was arrested, for weeks it was as if my soul had remained at home. This lasted for quite a time, until my soul accepted the new situation, joined my body and began to function normally as the soul of a prisoner. The Orthodox say that for forty days after death, the soul of the dead man remains near his old home with those he has loved. Only after this – a period equal to that for which Jesus remained on earth after his resurrection – does the soul go to its destination.

page 46 IF PRISON WALLS COULD SPEAK

Is there something in this? The soul does not automatically follow the body. After a session of heavy torture, my soul is not in my cell, but remains, obsessed by what it has endured, in the place of torture. The torturers are no longer there. They are no longer concerned with me. But I live over and over again the past tortures, until they become infinitely multiplied.

Now my soul has come back to me; I have scarcely any more pain. I can think quietly about my faith.

Certainly I believe that God is the maker of heaven and earth. I could not explain the existence of the universe otherwise. This is called theism. But really it is unimportant to me how this universe came to be. God made it. Fine. Reason is satisfied with this. But what about the rest?

My reason categorically refuses to believe that God is love. Your interrogators tie you to a chair. Your head has been shaved, and at intervals of one minute, tup-tup-tup, a drop of water falls on you, always in the same spot. And this happens in a world ruled by the God of love! Luther called reason a beast because it gave him arguments against the faith. But I treat it as a beast when it puts forward arguments to convince me that belief is the right thing. Reason tells me fairy tales: that I have free will and that I, and others, have chosen to sin. Hence all sorrows! Suffering is the unavoidable outcome of sin. (Something unavoidable in the universe of an almighty God! It makes me laugh!) But why then do babies suffer? What have they done to deserve it?

Men are torn to pieces by wild animals; poisoned by reptiles; killed by microbes and viruses. Do they deserve it? How is it that the God of love had prepared the viruses long ages beforehand, against the eventuality that man would sin? And again I ask. why do babies die? Because of the sin of Adam and Eve? But death must have existed in nature before the Fall. God said to Adam, "Of the fruit of the tree which is in the midst of the garden, ye shall not eat of it ... lest ye die" (GEN 3:3). If Adam had not known the phenomenon of death, these words would have been completely unintelligible to him. He knew what "death" meant. Eve, too, understood it, when the serpent assured her that she would not die. She must have seen animals dying, at least. Maybe death is the wages of sin for men, but why did animals die even in paradise? Why do fishes and crabs suffer in the depths of the sea? They have never even seen a man. It is madness to believe that fishes eat one another because a man has sinned.

I shudder every time I say the word "madness." I see that it is the unavoidable outcome for me. (Again something unavoidable in an almighty God's universe.) I fight against madness, and cling desperately to reason. Why did Luther not cling to reason? Why did he call it a beast? He too knew maddening suffering. Sometimes he actually raged like a madman.

He, seeing himself driven towards madness, simply threw himself trustingly into its arms.

The whole story of a God of love is madness. It is madness that God should love, not only the good people, but also those who use the Chinese drip torture and make jokes while you suffer. And how can he love the dictator who sits quietly in his office and never touches anybody himself, but orders these things to happen? Equally mad is the story of redemption by the blood of Christ. My reason rejects it. And if I don't keep my reason, the purpose of the Communists will have been attained. I shall begin to yell, and to bang on door. I shall be put in a strait jacket. I shall end up in an asylum.

But could I not be mad in a reasonable way - reasonably mad? In the conflict between Galileo and his inquisitors, reason was on the side of the inquisitors. It was obvious, a simple fact proved by the senses since humanity existed, that the sun moves round the earth. Galileo's assertion was mad. But observations, experiments, calculations were made, and what was madness became reasonable. Galileo was reasonably mad. It is reasonably mad to believe that I am surrounded not by strong walls, but only by whirlwinds of electrons, with huge spaces between them.

And if the earth is in fact circling madly without any reason for doing so, and all this time has been mocking our senses, if elementary particles are dancing around as unpredictably as madmen, then the ultimate truth in religion is obtained in a very strange biblical expression. While all other religious writings flatter God and speak of him in the most reverent language, the Bible speaks of "the foolishness of God" (1CO 1:25). Maybe he does love, but not as a reasonable being would. He loves to the point of folly, in the truest sense of that word. The Chinese drip cannot come from the love of a reasonable God. But it might have a place in the plan of a God's foolishness, or it might be an expression of the weakness of a deeply loving God. St. Paul speaks in the same verse about both the foolishness and the weakness of God. If God is almighty, he must also have a capacity for weakness and madness. Nothing is impossible for him, not even this.

We think of Job and David as holy men, but they both said the most blasphemous things about God. Even Jesus, on the cross, accused a God whom he had proclaimed as love of forsaking in his sufferings his only-begotten son. Whatever the motive, this is surely not a very laudable attitude for a God. At one time I used to prostrate myself before God. But to reproach God with a lack of love, or at least a lack of normal love, is also a part of religion.

Othello loved. and killed because he loved. Was this not love? Desdemona accepted it as such and, in her turn, loved to the end the one who strangled her. That madman had the right wife. Job displayed the same spirit when he said: "Though He slay me, yet will I trust in Him" (JOB 13:15).

There is a foolishness in God, and a corresponding foolishness in the saints. My reason stops short at theism. But Einstein demanded that we relinquish convictions which we have held for so long that they have become synonymous with common sense. I will give up common sense in religion, too. If Einstein consigned to the flames the classic laws of physics, we must do the same with the classic notion of love. God loves in a sense of this word which is different from our use it. And, as for me, my foolish love will not stop where my reason stops. God loved us without any deserving on our part. I will love him, and believe in him and in his plan of redemption, without any reasonable cause, simply because it pleases him.

And having once given up reason, I will go all the way with madness. I will love my torturers, too, though to do so is sheer folly. And when you, Jesus, come to take us to yourself.

page 49 Chapter 7: The Remnant of My Faith

I will make it difficult for you. I will refuse to go with you. I will keep my arms firmly around the worst of hangmen, and I will say to you, "I go to heaven only if he comes too." You will have to yield.

As for you, Devil, I recognize you now. It was you who made me doubt.

In the early days of my Christian faith, I was very much assaulted by a certain temptation. I asked an Armenian-Catholic priest, a very wise man, what I should do about it. He answered, "Despise the devil." Thomas More said, "The devil is a proud spirit. He cannot endure to be mocked."

Later, I found the same thought in Luther: the best way to drive out the devil, if he will not yield to texts of scripture, is to jeer and flout him, because he cannot bear scorn.

Stupid devil, he hopes to wipe out my faith with the arguments of reason. But arguments are not so painful as beatings and the Chinese drip. If these have not destroyed my faith, should I abandon it because the battered reason of my little mind finds fault with it? I renounce you, reason, and the devil who inspires you, and I will remain madly attached to the foolishness of God which is wiser than men, and to his weakness which is stronger than men. Amen.

page 50 IF PRISON WALLS COULD SPEAK

JESUS HAS LED ME AT LAST TO STILL WATERS.

The period of instruction of my case is finished. Soon I shall appear before the court. I did not defend myself before the examining officers. I shall not defend myself before the judges. Lao-Tse rightly said, "Those who justify themselves do not convince." I signed everything they asked me to sign against myself. I refused only to accuse others.

Why should I justify myself before the Communists? I am sure I am right in my attitude towards them. But you cannot be right without being wrong at the same time. "Fair is foul, and foul is fair," say the witches in Macbeth. To believe that you can be entirely right without also being wrong is like believing you have a front without a back. I hate Communism, so the Communists must defend themselves against me, as I defend the cause of the Church against them.

The chapter of instruction, with its torture, is finished.
