The waters have become still in my relationship with God also. Things have taken on a crystalline clarity. A God from whom I can depart, who would let me go, who would not keep me to the end, never was a God. I can rest completely tranquil. The real God will uphold me.

I have passed through the period of remorse for past sins, and the period of moral perplexities over lying or not lying at interrogations. I know the evil in me, I know the good. I can use both. The Lord has said, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart" (DEU 6:5). How can a man love God with all his heart if in the heart there are so many wicked passions? The Kabbala's answer is, "Love God with your evil side also."

page 51 Chapter 8: Mother

When we were children, we used to play on the sea-shore throwing a ball from one to the other. The ball floated both on the crests and in the troughs of the waves. So does the faithful soul, until it ceases to judge itself. There are no such things as good flowers and bad flowers. There are simply flowers. One is a tulip, another a rose, another a violet. Some have a fragrance, some do not. Some are gorgeously coloured. Others are modest. So our souls are as God has created them. Some mountains are high, but you do not have to be an Everest to be called a mountain; neither do you have to be an ascetic or a hero of faith in order to be a Christian.

I do not agree with canonizing certain men as saints. Always to have before your eyes exceptional characters like St. Francis of Assisi or St. Theresa of Lisieux is enough to drive you to despair. It makes it difficult to believe that an ordinary human being, with a good appetite, normal sexual instincts and a sense of fun, can be a real saint, having been washed in the same blood of Jesus Christ to which even the virgin Mary owes her sanctity.

My whole inner conflict has passed. I no longer try to compare myself with anybody. I am what ~I~ am, and in this knowledge I lie down in green pastures. I no longer live between two states of existence, my past liberty and a future reunion with those I love. I am able to realize the Kingdom of God present within me at this moment.

I knew very little of Father. He died when I was nine. He was a very taciturn man. I don't remember ever having heard him speak. He only gave you a deep look. I went to see him in hospital the morning he died. Even then he told me nothing. He had been in touch with the Gospel. Probably he could not communicate in words what he knew. He was silent. (The New Testament never mentions a word ever spoken by Joseph.) That very afternoon, I went to meet you when you returned from the hospital. You were in tears and said, "From now on you will be orphans." I remember weeping. Then followed the burial, a simple ceremony for a poor man. The coffin was made of a few planks, not even painted black.

page 52 IF PRISON WALLS COULD SPEAK

An old Jew with a beard and side-curls said the prayer, "~El mole rahamim~ - God full of mercy." None of us understood then what he was singing. We came home. You fainted. Father came into my mind no more, until now.

Thirty years have passed. During the night, I feel his presence in my cell. I have his image before my eyes. He is silent, as he always was. Only his eyes speak. And his eyes make me understand why the Lord said to Peter after [he] had sinned, "Simon, son of Jonas, do you love me?"(JHN 21:15). Why did he remind him just at that moment, and only at that moment, about his father? Because on the other side our parents participate in our lives. We grieve them terribly when we sin. We are useful to them when we walk in the ways of righteousness. I could see no approval on my father's face, nor rebuke. He was waiting to see the outcome of the struggle. His place in eternity will also be influenced by my victory or defeat.

I did not know my father, but you, Mother, I knew. How I regret that I was a bad son.

When I was small, I would turn the handle of the sewing-machine for you as you sewed. You would sing to me. Always the same two songs. One was about a monk who, being asked what had driven him to the monastic life, answered, "Two blue eyes." When I saw those two blue eyes which look into the ultimate depths of the soul, and became a Christian, you did not understand it. I read to you one evening the story of the Passion. You wept over it. You never spoke about it afterwards. I remember your second song was "Silent Night." Where did you, a Jewess, pick it up? And why were you always singing it?

It was a deadly blow for you when I experienced my silent night, and Jesus was born in my heart.

Where are you, Mother, now? Are you weeping?

In a cell near me there seems to be an elderly woman. Her daughter must also be a prisoner. When she is led past a certain cell, the mother begins to cry, "Ioana, Ioana," and begs the guards to allow her to see her child. She says, "I will kiss your hands with which you have beaten my daughter, if only I can see her." The guards laugh, "We would rather have her kisses than yours," and they pass by.

And then the mother yells, and bangs with her fists on the door. Afterwards she becomes silent. Perhaps they have gagged her. Perhaps they have given her an injection.

How was it with the virgin Mary when her Son was led away to his death? "Rachel weeping for her children, and would not be comforted" (MTT 2:18). Can anyone comfort you, mother of the Lord, for so much suffering of your Son's disciples? Do you always weep?

Most of your statues in churches do not correspond to the picture I have of you. In the statues you are shown very much like a nun, with a rosary in your hand. You are smiling serenely. But nuns have no children. You have. Your true likeness has yet to be depicted.

It is said that the artist who first made a statue of the Buddha disappeared. He had himself become the Buddha's statue and, even so, an unfinished one. Michelangelo and Raphael remained very much alive after they had produced their great works of art. You, Mother of the Lord, are different from anything they have painted or carved. You are still waiting for a sculptor to make a transparent statue of you, which would draw the eye not to your outward appearance, but deeper, to seek your indescribable purity and sorrow. You must be like the mother imprisoned near me, devastated by suffering. Would you kiss a Communist's hand to be able to help me?

Foolish, foolish thoughts - it is a long time since I had a normal one. St. John says he saw you clothed with the sun and with the moon under your feet, and upon your head a crown of twelve stars (REV 12:1). You are beyond bowing to a Communist.

But how about you, Mama? Will you be able to come to see your Richard, your youngest son, again?

I remember your heroism and self-sacrifice. Left a widow with four small children, you brought us up to adulthood. I remember you in all your beauty. You were in your seventies when they arrested me. But you still had a brilliant and youthful appearance, with hardly any wrinkles.

Will age have made your beauty decay? Will you die, and have passed away for ever, and will we never meet again? You are not a Christian. St. Thomas Aquinas said that one of the joys of heaven will be to see the endless tortures of the damned in hell. A cannibal could not have said it better. I don't believe it. When I first went into a church, it seemed to me to have wings. Would the Church's wings not be strong enough to carry you, too, to heaven? The Communists mock the mother near me. Jesus cannot mock my feelings, my love towards you. I and my house shall be saved. Mother, you belong to my house.

You will be saved, Mama. You will have your silent night in heaven. You will look into those two blue eyes and you also will leave everything for them, as the monk did about whom you sang.

Forgive me, Mother. I will sanctify myself for you. When Jesus tells me, "Well done," he will call me "Richard, son of Henric and Amalia," as he said "Simon, son of Jonas," when Peter sinned. And if Richard, son of Henric and Amalia, is to inherit the Kingdom, his parents cannot remain outside it.

A parable tells of a young man who loved a girl to folly. One evening he could stand it no more. He knocked at her door and begged "Let me in. I must be with you." She asked, "But who is it?" He answered, "It is I, your beloved," to which she replied, "My room is narrow and my bed is straight. There is no place for you." He left and waited for years through the world, not understanding her refusal. He had assumed that she loved him, too. But the moment of enlightenment came. He knocked at her door again. She asked, "Who is it?" He answered, "It is you." The door opened for him. He was received with embraces. She said, "For years I have waited for this moment."

Heaven, Mama, is a narrow place. There is room in it only for one. The soul who wishes to enter must be able to say at the gate, "It is you, Christ."

This will be difficult for you, Mama. You have not known him. But say, "It is Richard's mother," and you will be received with love. David asked, "Is there yet any that is left of the house of Saul, that I may show him kindness for Jonathan's sake?" (2SM 9:1). and he was good to a worthless man, Mephibosheth, for his friend's sake. Jesus calls me his friend. He is more generous than David. Not only I, but all my house will be saved, and you belong to it. So does Father. So does my little sister Mary, for whom I long so much. I have never seen her. She died before I was born. But in this cell I have a burning desire to be with her. We shall all be together. And it will no longer be the Richard who often made you weep. Everything will be new.

page 55 Chapter 8: Mother

Don't cry, Mama. Good night. Until we see each other again.

Angels, you, too, will have to bow before the "It is written." The Scriptures say that, "when He shall appear, we shall be like Him" (1JN 3:2). He is with his mother. I wish to be like him in this respect also. See to it, angels. Amen.

page 56 IF PRISON WALLS COULD SPEAK

BELOVED CONGREGATION

EVERY DAY I TELL MYSELF AT LEAST ONE NEW JOKE. THE ONE for today was this: a man was complaining to his friend about doctors. "They write so illegibly. Don't you think there should be a law obliging them to write so that everybody can read it?" - "No," answered his friend. "God forbid. I have a completely illegible prescription from a doctor. With it I have passed through several customs offices without any trouble. I have travelled free on trains and I have even been exempted from taxes."

I laughed dutifully. Then I thought: so many people, complain that the Bible is full of contradictions and of mysterious and incomprehensible passages. Is there not a good purpose in this? Is it not just for this reason that for so many centuries men of all kinds of religious beliefs, of different intellectual calibre, slave owners and slaves, feudal lords and revolutionaries, socialists and capitalists, schoolchildren and eminent scientists, have all passed unhindered through the customs offices of life with the Bible as their guide? The fact is that Hebrew and Greek are full of double meanings, and capable of many different legitimate translations. Is there any value in imprecision, in vagueness?

My first impulse would be to deny it.

There is only one thing which I hate more than Communism, and that is lack of precision in thinking.

Every false, every imprecise thought makes the very operation of thinking appear unreliable. And as a result men are driven to irrational actions, which have not been properly thought out. Imprecise thought drives them to drugs, alcohol and other excesses, all means of evading reason, which apparently gives false results.

As a matter of fact, even the reason why I hate Communism is not so much because of its brutality as because of its imprecise thinking. A good musician feels something like a physical pain when the orchestra plays a false chord. In the same way it makes my heart ache when I hear thoughts expressed which are not mathematically precise.

It is said that once a radical agitator rode his bicycle to Hyde Park in London, where he left the machine against a fence and addressed the crowd, "Property is theft. We are all descended from Adam and Eve, or from a pair of monkeys. At the beginning there were no rich and poor. How is it that some are rich now? They have stolen from their neighbors. By taking from rich men you are taking from expropriators. To take back what has been stolen from you is not theft. So if you need anything, you are entitled simply to take it. No policeman in the world has the authority to stop you. Everything belongs to everyone." The crowd applauded him. But when he wanted to go home, his bicycle was missing. He at once began to shout, "Police! Police! My bicycle has been stolen!"

Communists think wrongly, which is a greater crime than brutality. It is a sin against reason.

But there are certain ambiguous and mysterious matter about which our thinking becomes more precise as it becomes more imprecise. In such matters the object of thought has no precision in itself. A system is projected into it, from my mind, and this falsifies reality. Every definition of the Godhead, of the Kingdom, of eternal life, must be false. We have to do here with mysteries. The God of love and the God of revenge, both the same God, is an ambiguous God. Only ambiguous thinking can reflect his reality. He is a mystery, and we think rightly about him rather in the mystery and confusion of the subconscious than in the clear-cut definitions of the scholars.

Let us not allow ourselves to be led astray by the plainness of biblical statements like "God is love" (1JN 4:8). When David Livingstone first went to the backward tribes of Central Africa, he could not preach to them about this verse, because their language did not have the word "love." So he asked them, "What is the thing you like best?" They answered, "~Unboi~. It is the name we give to meat from the arm of a man after it has been smoked. There is nothing better in the world than ~unboi~." Then Livingstone delivered his famous sermon on the theme that "God is the best ~unboi~," and with this he reached the hearts of the primitive people. You may think it blasphemy to compare God with pastrami from the arm of a man. But did not St. John do something similar when he said that "God is love"? Love is a human affection towards a person we strongly like. The higher animals also know this affection. Does anybody believe that God is an affection shared by men and animals? But love was the highest thing known to the Jewish and Greek contemporaries of the apostle, just as ~unboi~ was the highest thing known to the African cannibal. So John said that God is love. As for God, he is what he is, neither pastrami, nor an emotion. He is a mystery which cannot be put into words. A person who thinks about him in precise terms is imprecise in his thinking. Only vagueness is precise in this sphere. My Christianity is undogmatic. Dogmas are much too clear-cut.

When my son Mihai was small, his favourite books in the Bible were Nehemiah (which he pronounced "Nehembiah") and the Book of Revelation; the first because Nehemiah not only smote some whom he disliked, but also plucked off their hair (NEH 13:25). (I had to explain to him in detail how this happened, whether he plucked out the hairs one by one or in handfuls.) The second he liked because of the multitude of beasts, dragons and four-headed creatures.

His preferences compelled me to read Nehemiah over and over again. I remember it quite well. Nehemiah calls the Creator "the great, the mighty and the terrible God" (NEH 9:32).

In the Babylonian Talmud, Rabbi Mathana says of this verse that he learned from Rabbi Jehoshua ben Levi that the scribes of the time of the second temple were called "men of the great synod" because they restored sovereignty to its rightful owner. Moses had said "the great, mighty and terrible God" (DEU 10:17). Then came Jeremiah, who said: "The Gentiles are pillaging the temple. What has become of God's terrible character?" So, in his prayer (JER 32:18), he leaves out the words "the terrible." Later, Daniel said, "The Gentiles oppress his children. Where is his might?" Therefore, in his prayer (DAN 9:4), he leaves out "the mighty." Then came the men of the great synod, who said, "On the contrary, this is his might, that he has power over his indignation and is longsuffering towards offenders. By this he shows that he is terrible, because if the Holy One, blessed be his name, were not so, how could our nation exist among the peoples of the world?"

God is mighty and terrible in his own way. Words applied to him have not the same meaning as when they are applied to us. He has the might to forget about himself and to give his only begotten Son to help some infinitesimal beings who are in deadly danger. What man would use his might to help an ant to get out of trouble? God is mighty in an absolutely unique sense of this word.

We continue to sin even after we have become children of God. We sin before his very eyes. And he looks away from our offences, keeping always the sweet remembrance of the moment of our conversion. Call this attribute of God his terribleness if you like. But it is a terribleness apart, without comparison.

How terrible is a God who strips himself naked, because Roman soldiers armed with whips order him to do so! He stripped himself not only of his clothes, but also of his ability to perform miracles, he stripped his immaculate human nature of its immortality. This God cannot be put into words. We can only be changed into his likeness. Then people, looking at us, will believe in this strange God.

During an interrogation, a Christian was asked by a Communist officer. "Where is your God? Why doesn't he perform a miracle?" Our brother answered, "You have a great miracle before your eyes, but you are blind. You mock me and beat me. I look at you with love. That is the miracle."

We have to speak like this to the Communists. It may even convert them. We ourselves are not satisfied. We would like to see quite another miracle: that there should be no more beatings, no more suffering. But God is what he is, not what we want him to be. This is why we call the Beloved terrible.

I have said that my Christianity is undogmatic. Again I use a human word, and it may mislead. Christianity can no more do without dogmas than natural sciences can do without laws.

But in many sciences the notion of the "natural law" has changed. Science has ceased to be consequent. The atom is considered, according to the needs of a given experiment, as a particle or as a wave. Nobody has seen it, and it cannot be located. So it makes no difference. Or try to imagine what geometry calls a point - an entity without dimension. It is impossible. Or, take Max Planck. He says that matter ~per se~ does not exist. Matter appears and remains only thanks to an energy which brings particles of the atom into orbit. This energy is the ultimate basis of matter.

This means that the scientist must live in different spheres. He has an object in his house which he can handle and sit on, and which he calls a chair. When he begins to think about it in his laboratory, he knows it to be a whirlwind of elementary particles. When he draws philosophical conclusions from his science, the chair becomes an unreal object. Planck says that it is not the seen, transitory matter which is the real, the true, the existent, but the unseen, the immortal spirit, without which matter would not even exist. And having said this, he sits down on a chair with full confidence. On a practical level, he knows it to be matter.

So we have to live our life with God on different levels. There is practical religion, in which God is very like a man. He has eyes with which he looks on us. He can stretch out his arm to help us. He speaks to us in our language. He enjoys our songs and prayers.

When we meditate about him, all these things disappear. No human words exist to explain him. The French say, "~Un dieu defini est un dieu fini~ - a god who is defined is a god who is finished." You cannot define his image.

Yes, we have a dogmatic Christianity, but its dogmas are inconsequent, vague, contradictory. God is light. Physicists will tell you that light behaves in an inconsequent, contradictory manner.

Imprecision is the only precise manner of thinking about God and about his rules. The leap of faith is a leap into the vague, the indefinite, the equivocal, the uncertain, the undetermined.

"He hangeth the earth upon nothing" (JOB 26:7). Hang your faith upon nothing. Jesus "offered up prayers and supplications with strong cryings and tears unto him that was able to save him from death" (HEB 5:7). But he was not saved. He had to endure death. And on the cross he asked in vain, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" (MTT 27:46). There came no answer and no help, but only a new mockery. To this mysterious, terrible God he said, "Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit" (LUK 23:46).

My last sermon before my arrest was on the terribleness of God. My congregation did not understand much of it. Neither did I, and I wondered about what I said. Now I begin to understand. Because I understand less and less about what God is doing with me.

How beautiful is the bride of Christ when she does not try to understand the Unintelligible, but follows him blindly, and embraces him in love. Amen.

page 62 IF PRISON WALLS COULD SPEAK

DEAR BROTHERS AND SISTERS

AND THE FIRST BEAST WAS LIKE A LION, AND THE SECOND BEAST like a calf, and the third beast had a face as a man, and the fourth beast was like a flying eagle" (REV 4:7).

The Christian pastor today needs many qualities. He must be a mystic of high degree; he must be a clever strategist with the skill to win battles; he must possess a practical organizing capacity; he must be a revolutionary, preparing the way for the twenty-first century to be an age of Christ's dominion.

There are two sides to religion. There is ezoteric religion, a name which comes from the Greek word ~ezos~, inner. In this religion you are taught the deep mysteries of God which are reserved for the few.

Then there is the exoteric side, from the Greek ~exos~, outer, which is the practical day-to-day religion of the great majority of men.

The Book of Esther in the Bible is the prototype of exoteric religion, a religion which stops at the outward man, and is concerned with national destinies. That is why this book never mentions the name of God. But a book of sheer politics forms part of the Holy Scripture, and has its honoured place there, on an equal footing with the Song of Songs, a book of pure mysticism.

Exoteric and ezoteric religion must go to together.

We recently learned, from a new prisoner tapping on the wall in morse code, that Tibet has been invaded by the Chinese Communists. The Tibetans had a purely mystical religion, which did not equip them for diplomacy and political fighting. Now politics will entirely wipe out the mysticism. That is the fate of mysticism, if it is not allied with right political thought.

page 63 Chapter 10: Exoteric Religion

Those who are prepared to understand the mysteries of the Kingdom of God are few. Let the other Christians be drawn into political activity which will serve to the glory of the same Kingdom. Then the mystics, like the apostles of old, will be able to withdraw from serving at tables and ascend to the spiritual world. They will live only in the realm of truth, undistracted by material problems, an involvement which can bring harm both to them and to the material world.

The fall of Adam was a premature initiation into mysteries. The deep designs of God cannot be plucked from a tree. A man must first learn over a long period to put aside selfish interests, and the interests of his social group, vainglory, passion and the judgment of other people's passions, prejudices, his sin and his righteousness. Only a holy man can know the whole truth accessible to mankind.

A man is prepared for the highest initiation, only if he can die on a cross with the words "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do."

All others have to remain in the lower spheres, in the realm of the exoteric. But how unspeakably useful they can be there! If there had been no Esther, the Jewish nation would have disappeared, there would have been no Jesus and no Christian civilization, and the gates of Heaven would have been closed for many.

The Esthers, those who do not have the word God much on their lips, but who fight to keep the world free for the Gospel, to liberate it from the dominion of Communism and from heathen terror, are especially important today.

A group of people were once amusing themselves by considering which book they would choose to have with them on a desert island. A clergyman chose the Bible. Another man decided on the plays of Shakespeare. Another settled for a book of jokes to keep him amused. Then a wise man spoke, "I would choose a book which would teach me how to build a boat in which I could escape to the mainland. Once there,

I would be able to decide what to read, whether it is the Bible, fine literature or pornography. But first of all I must be free."

Men must be free. Jesus teaches that only the truth can set us free. The converse is also true. Only freedom gives us truth. Under a dictatorship, truth is inaccessible. Fighters for freedom are fighters for truth, and therefore for God. The warriors of Cyrus, who were not worshippers of Yahweh, are called a holy army, because they freed from Babylonian captivity the Jews who were the depositories of the truth.

In LUK 6:1 there is a strange Greek word, what is called a ~hapax~, a word which occurs only once in the Bible. In most translations it is rendered as "the second Sabbath after the first," which makes no sense. The word is ~deuteroprotos~, literally translated "the second first." The translators did not know what to do with this word. Even St. Jerome considered it disrespectfully to be sheer nonsense. But it has a deep meaning.

A man must first seek the kingdom of heaven and its righteousness, and then care for his belly. But there are moments when the second things come first, moments of ~deuteroprotos~. If on a Sabbath day you are so hungry that you have to pluck ears of corn, and eat them after having rubbed them in your hands - or if you have a hungry family to care for - second things come first. You must be concerned first for food and then for the sanctification of the Sabbath.

That is what the gospel teaches in Luke chapter 6. There are many things in life which are decidedly of secondary importance, but which can put you at a given moment under such high pressure that you have to treat them as priorities.

That is how it is with liberty.

Forget about mysticism, for which most of you are not intended (those who are made for it will ignore my appeal to forget it) and become political fighters against the Communist oppression. It was something like this that Joan of Arc did, and she came to be recognized as a saint.

Is there any hope that your fight will succeed? Reason tells you no. Bolshevism has reigned for decades undisturbed in Russia. Now it has conquered half of Europe and infiltrated the other half.

Reason tells you that yours is a vain fight, just as reason told David that he could not overcome Goliath. It is a characteristic of the Christian that he accepts things which seem absurd to reason. Reason, by believing that the earth revolves round the sun, believes what is absurd to the senses. Why should we not treat reason as it treats the senses? Why should we not transcend reason?

The human mind has gone mad, and you attain reality only when you pass beyond reason.

"In such an hour as ye think not the Son of man cometh" (MTT 24:44). When any thought of victory is abandoned, he will come and make you triumph. Don't be concerned about your chances of immediate success, but continue to fight for freedom.

There is another kind of knowledge than that given by reason. Love has a greater knowledge than logic. The Hebrew word ~iada~, to know, and the Greek word ~gnosis~, knowledge, are both related to sexual union, "And Adam knew (~iada~) Eve" (GEN 4:1). The man who unites himself in burning love with the world which suffers under slavery knows more than the strategists and the politicians. He knows the God who did not allow the Jews to be slaves of the Egyptians has remained the same God who hates the slavery imposed today by the Communists upon hundreds of millions of Russians, Rumanians, Poles and others. He hates any slavery and social injustice.

In the preamble to the Ten Commandments, God does not say, "I am God, your Lord, who created heaven and earth," but, "I am the Lord, thy God, which have have brought thee out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage" (EXO 20:2). To free slaves is a bigger honour for him than to be the creator of the universe.

Rely on him, and fight. Fight on the level of earthly needs. "I have told you earthly things," says Jesus (JHN 3:12). I, too, have told you earthly things today. Fight to overthrow Communism. If you are hearing me from even more distant places, fight to overthrow heathen terror, fight to overthrow racial hatred, all the godless rulers. Daniel writes of four kings, and with no fear of lese-majesty, calls all the kings whom he has seen beasts. Let us not fear to think like this about all dictators and to treat them as beasts must be treated. Amen.

page 67 Chapter 11: Problems Of An Underground Church

DEAR BROTHERS AND SISTERS

SOME OF YOU HAVE MET THE FIGHTERS OF THE UNDERGROUND Church of the Soviet Union. You met them when the Red Army invaded our country. What beautiful characters they were, but what intriguing and gruesome stories they told us about their lives.

Now the best of you who are outside prison have no alternative: you will have to organize an underground work. The official churches will either be closed, or will accept Communist limitations on how much of the Gospel can be proclaimed. The small legal opportunities which they will leave must be used to the maximum. But we will accept their fragments of freedom on the point of a spear. We will fight to be able to proclaim the whole, which will be possible only in a church like that which existed in the catacombs of Rome. Except that the conditions of modern life, the perfection of police methods and equipment, will make the task much harder.

It makes sense to attempt only what you are able to perform. The Christians of the Soviet Union could organize an underground church. So we shall succeed, too. But I do not approve of everything our Russian brethren told us. Their stories of the heroism of the martyrs thrilled and inspired us. But the best underground church is surely that which has the least number of martyrs, just as the best spy ring is one which remains for ever undiscovered. It is not martyrs we want, but victories.

Be careful about accepting new members into the underground church. To be a member of an ordinary church, you have to fulfill two obligations: to believe and to be baptized. The biggest denominations consider you a member even if you don't believe, once you have been baptized. The Salvation Army has renounced baptism. But acceptance into the underground church lets a man into secrets. He will know hidden meeting places, pastors who are wanted by the police. If he cracks under torture, he may destroy a whole organization. To be baptized and to believe is not enough. St. Paul was a convert for only three days, and had not yet received the sacrament, but he had to be told about one further condition: "how great things he must suffer for my name's sake" (ACT 9:16).

The capacity to suffer is an absolutely necessary condition for being a member of the underground church. You must teach converts from the very beginning to be like Mary, the holy mother of the Lord, who gave her own heart to be pierced by a sword and her Son to be crucified for the salvation of the world. They will have to bear such pain with patience, with joy and with thankfulness.

But it is not only torture for which they must be prepared. Beatings and a certain amount of torture can be borne by every well-prepared Christian who has the baptism of the Holy Spirit. But just as the atomic weapon is absolute and irresistible, so there is an absolute torture which no man, whoever he may be, can stand. Under this torture, Savonarola recanted, Cranmer's courage deserted him and he repudiated his own writings. Under such torture Thomas Munzer recanted, too, and so did many Catholic heroes tortured by the Protestants. Here in prison, sometimes the most refined cruelties are committed. In the limited sphere in which our morse-code system operates, I know only one or two who did not confess when submitted to such pressure. Neither do I know what would have happened if it had been continued with me. But happily, these heavy tortures are very rare, because the torturers themselves cannot bear them. Man is not made to inflict agony upon his fellow men. Even torturers have religious mothers, wives, or children, who chide them for what they do. There is no perfect criminal, nor is there a perfect torturer. He tires of his job.

page 69 Chapter 11: Problems Of An Underground Church

The Russian Christians told us that in the Soviet Union the Communists have succeeded after thirty years in creating a new type of being, the "anti-man," a man who can over years inflict extreme torture and not flinch. The Nazis also created such a species. In Rumania we have not yet gone so far.

But still, you must be prepared for the worst. The newest convert must be told that not only may he have to pass through terrible physical pain, but he may also become a traitor, after having suffered much for Christ. We have not to frighten him unduly, but neither can we deceive him. He must know all the risks in which he will be involved.

The convert will have to give up all romantic expectations. He must know that a foolhardy enterprise, a superhuman task, awaits him.

It is related that Hudson Taylor, the founder of the China Inland Mission, when told to form a committee, because otherwise he would not have the necessities of life in a country so far away, replied, "I have no difficulty in remembering that my children need breakfast and dinner. Is it possible to imagine that our heavenly Father is less tender and mindful of His children than I?" A beautiful sentiment, but romantic. I have had no breakfast for two years. Dinners I have had. I wonder if Hudson Taylor would have called them dinners.

The convert must know that he has no guarantee from God that he will have breakfasts or lunches. He must know that he may starve to death in prison, without any hand stretching out from heaven to feed him. God must simply be served. If or what he will give you in return for this is incalculable.

You will also have to entirely revise you thoughts about suicide. The question is not whether it is moral to commit it under certain circumstances. You have simply not to care about morals and do it, if by doing so you can avoid betraying others. Once you begin to argue within yourself whether it is permissible or not, you will have betrayed before you have made a decision, so many are the arguments for and against. If there is any guilt in suicide during close interrogation, it is not yours, but the fault of the one who drove you to it.

To protect the church from the Secret Police, you will have to infiltrate the latter. This you can only do by deceiving, dissimulating, accepting the necessity for lying. This ought not to be a moral problem. Christians who are undercover agents in democratic countries do the same when they infiltrate criminal circles and spy rings in order to serve their country and the cause of order. Why should it not be done for the good of the underground church?

page 70 IF PRISON WALLS COULD SPEAK

There is a legend that when Herod had given the order to kill the children in Bethlehem, Mary and Joseph tried to escape with the Child. But the sentries at the gate stopped them. They asked Mary, "What are you carrying in your arms?" She answered, "A bunch of lilies." "Unwrap your bundle and show us." She unwrapped it with confidence. They saw on]y lilies, and allowed her to pass. Was Mary lying? Did God strengthen a lie with a miracle? Or did God change the Child at that moment into a bunch of lilies, as Catholics believe that bread and wine are changed into his body and blood during the Communion service? Did Mary hope that God would make the soldiers have an optical illusion? Some may wonder that I ask serious questions in connection with a legend. But you know me. You know that for me the world of legend and myth is reality. I

The Creator shows us the whole creation otherwise than as it is. It took men thousands of years to discover that the earth revolves round the sun, and that our whole material world is a whirlwind of elementary particles. God does not seem keen to tell us the whole truth. Why should I tell it to a Communist officer? We have to discover God's realities; let the Communist work to try to discover our organization. It is not my business to tell him the facts about it.

The Russian underground church, as it was described to us by its members and leaders, is not sufficiently sophisticated. They have not thought out these questions. That is why they have lost so many victims. A "sincere" underground pastor is no more possible than dry water or wooden iron.

They did not use codes in their exchange of letters. Some did, but the codes were primitive, ridiculously easy to decode.

Many other problems arise. We have either to renounce the idea of a well-organized underground church, in which case we will only furnish more and more victims to the Secret Police; or we must agree to use nicknames and false documents, to hide and distort facts. But this is exhausting for a man who is of the truth and yearns for it. Communists have worked secretly very successfully, but with them the lie is their very element. Christians will easily get tired and, once they have compromised in what they have been taught about the duty of always telling the truth, the door will be open for another compromise: why not come to an arrangement with the Secret Police and play a double role? We need men of steel. But the amount of spiritual energy which a man possesses at a certain moment being limited, we have to put a total ban on energy-robbing ideological controversies in order to concentrate the energy for the moments of great temptations and great trials.

We must learn to discover the Communist spies within our ranks. Sometimes it will be quite easy. Just tell a suspected informer about an important meeting with top leaders at a certain address. This meeting must not on any account take place. But the address must be chosen so that you can observe the house secretly and see if there is police surveillance. You can apologize afterwards to the informer for having given him wrong directions. If you have discovered an informer, keep him in the church. A known informer is good capital. By following him, you can discover the officers of the Secret Police with whom he is in touch and through these afterwards other informers. Don't give him his punishment too early.

A well-organized underground church needs money. It must have secret printing presses, secret broadcasting stations, the latter frequently changing their location, because they can be traced; there will be bribes to ensure warning of impending arrests, and other expenses. The Communists, when they were a secret organization, used to rob to help the party. Stalin went to prison for committing such a robbery. They forged money. Will our brethren from abroad give us material help? I hope so. They do not help the Russian underground church.

There was a Lazarite Catholic nun who tended a sick, lonely old man. His house was full of gold and silver objects which were of no practical use. She took first one thing then another, sold them and gave the money to the poor, keeping a strict account of what she did with it. When she was arrested, a French jury acquitted her. Ought our conscience to acquit us for similar actions? Napoleon said that to win a war you need money, money and again money. I believe that this also holds true for the war of the underground church, though money alone will not achieve it.

There will be many problems. As in the church in general, women will play an increasingly large role in the underground church. Some of the leaders will have to meet Christian women. They will often have to be alone together, probably late at night, without any witnesses. This will not happen only once or twice. It will be a general practice. Temptations will arise, which will be the more intense because the underground workers will inevitably be under constant emotional and nervous strain, which tends to bring about an increase in sexuality. We learned about this from our Russian brethren. St. Paul wrote to an underground church, in Corinth, "It is reported commonly that there is fornication among you." (1CO 5:1) Though this sin is common, he proposes expelling from the church only one, who had committed incest. Paul knew the special difficulties of leading a pure sexual life in underground conditions.

Wives whose husbands have been in prison for years will have to meet with new underground pastors. There are certain dangers which have to be faced and accepted.

As underground workers have to move about from place to place, meeting privately with girls, unavoidable jealousies will arise. Jealousy may lead to denunciations. Great caution is needed. St. James, writing to underground churches, calls their members several times "my brethren" and then suddenly "ye adulterers and adulteresses" (JMS 4:4).

Every member must obey his conscience and his pastor, more than the state authorities. The pastor will have to be obeyed as strictly as in the army. There is no time, no place, for argument.

I am far from you, alone in a cell. May God give you wisdom to organize a powerful, well-trained underground church. Amen.

page 73 Chapter 12: You'll Be On The Right Side

DEARLY BELOVED BROTHERS AND SISTERS

TODAY SOMETHING SEEMINGLY IMPOSSIBLE HAPPENED. THE officer on duty came into my cell. In his hand he had a pot of honey. "This is from your brother Herescu; he brought it," he said. "A daring guy." Then he went out, locking the door again behind him.

I have no bread, nor spoon. I shall manage somehow. But Herescu has risked his liberty by bringing me a gift, and the officer has risked even more.

They will be on the right hand side of Jesus on the day of judgment. I was in prison, and they visited me. Also on his right hand side there will be the guard who sometimes passes a word from me to my family and back. So will be my wife, with two others sisters.

Before I was put in this underground cell, I had a cell with an outlook towards the front entrance of the prison. One day, in a fit of depression, I asked God, "Where are you? Have you forsaken me?" At that very moment, I saw coming into the yard my wife, and Bianca, and Alice, who had come to inquire about me. Since then, whenever I say "Lord," I see these three. When I think about these three, I see the Lord. I identify Christ with his believers.

All these will be at Christ's right side.

But what about the others who did not dare, those who did not even wish to move a finger in our defence, the millions of Christians who care nothing for the sufferings of their fellow-believers? What will be their fate?

page 74 IF PRISON WALLS COULD SPEAK

We pass about two-thirds of our life awake and another third in sleep, dreaming. What makes us believe that God will judge men only according to what they do while they are awake? If the whole life is examined, should not the dreams count also?

When I fall asleep, I see myself surrounded by so much love. People whom I knew to be most selfish or apathetic, sometimes even my torturers, are bending over me tenderly, giving me food and drink, offering me flowers. All these people have visited me in prison, though they did it in my dreams. Does this count for nothing? If what happens in a dream is nothing, why is there a dream recorded on the very first page of the New Testament?

And surely it is not in my dreams only that they are good. Bad men are often very good in their own dream life. For many years l have paid close attention to what I see in my sleep, because I believe the Talmud is right when it says that a dream which is not understood is like a letter which has not been opened. I cannot agree with Freud that only our base and ugly impulses are expressed in dreams. If this were true, we should have to throw away the Bible, because it teaches just the opposite.

I have known Orthodox Jews who hated the very name of Jesus, which reminded them of anti-semitic Christians, but who had dreamed of him and were happy about it. Joseph, in the Old Testament, saw himself in his dreams as a ruler. But this did not express ambition. What happened later showed that what he meant by a ruler was a benefactor. In his dream he had great benevolent plans which embraced his whole family and whole countries, things which were not in his mind when he was awake.

The benzene ring was discovered in a dream. So the scientist who discovered it was wiser in his sleep than during the day, when he had sought in vain for the chemical formula.

Now, if a bad man dreams that he visits prisoners, feeds, washes and comforts them, should this have no validity before God? Which is which? A Chinese poet says, "I dreamed last night that I was a butterfly, and I do not know now whether I am a man who dreamed he was a butterfly, or a butterfly

page 75 Chapter 12: You'll Be On The Right Side

who dreams that he is a man." Why should we call someone a bad man rather than a likeable dreamer? Many great artists have led morally wretched lives. What of Oscar Wilde, Guy de Maupassant, Richard Wagner? We judge them according to their books and their music, which were so remote from their manner of life. Does God judge men according to their beautiful dreams rather than by their neglect of us when they are awake?

In the primitive conditions in which I live, my mind may simply have returned to primitive ideas. Some backward African tribes assume that, if a man dreams of having sexual intercourse with another man's wife, he will be fined the usual adultery fee, for his soul and hers have had intercourse. But who bears more clearly the image and likeness of God, the sophisticated European intellectual or the childlike primitive?

Good actions performed in dreams are simply good actions.

The Bible tells us that the angel of the Lord appeared to Mary's bridegroom in a dream (MTT 1:20). It does not say in whose dream. It must certainly have been in Joseph's dream, because he acted on it. But did the angel perhaps appear also in a dream of his own? Do angels sleep? Is there a telepathic communication between sleeping beings? (You will forgive me. I am not entirely normal. Don't expect me to give normal sermons.)

Do angels sleep? And how about the believers who have passed into the life beyond? Are they awake in paradise, or is their whole eternal life a continuous beautiful dream? Jesus said of Lazarus, "He is asleep" (JHN 11:11). Every other Jew would have said: "He is walking and worshipping now in God's paradise." Again, Jesus said that Jairus's daughter was sleeping.

I know myself, that in this cell my heaven is to fall asleep. At once the grey walls and the brutality disappear. At times everything becomes beautiful, and even the wardens appear angelic.

At his judgment, God will keep in view the good which we do in dreams. "Christ died for us, that whether we wake or sleep, we should live together with him" (1TH 5:10). I thank you all who visit us in our prison cells while you sleep. You also will hear the words, "Come ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world" (MTT 25:34).

page 76 IF PRISON WALLS COULD SPEAK

Jesus himself, who preferred the fantasy world of sleep to the harsh though exciting realities of the storm, must surely love those who have beautiful dreams.

The Coptic church honours Pontius Pilate as a saint, which seems very curious to us, who do not allow God to forget his crime, reminding him of it as often as we recite the creed. (I wonder why this man alone has been singled out for condemnation.) There must have been something holy in Pilate. He did very wrong things. He gave Jesus to be scourged and crucified. But he also said some very good things: "I find no fault in this man" (LUK 23:4). I understand criminals, because I myself have a criminal element in my nature, and have committed the gravest offences. Criminals often dream of themselves doing the most wonderful things. Pilate's remorse may have made him dream that he was caressing Jesus. The Coptic church may have judged him according to this.

Jerusalem was called "the holy city" after it had crucified the Lord (MTT 27:53). The criminals who had demanded his blood became, what they will be for millenia, Ahasuerus, the wandering Jew, unable to die, torn between his hatred of Jesus and his attraction to the One who so loved his murderers that his last words were a prayer for their forgiveness. When a Jew or a heathen says "No" to Jesus, do not look only at his conscious attitude. If God is the maker of all things - "visible and invisible," is He not the maker of the unconscious, too? Out of my unconscious there emerged one day the image of Jesus, and I loved it. But it had been there for a long time. St. Paul killed Christians. That is what men knew. But there was another side to him, of which he himself was unconscious, that he had been "separated from his mother's womb" to serve Christ (GAL 1:15). Deep in his unconscious, there was the call. And one day the unconscious became conscious. It pleased God to reveal his Son in him. The wicked Saul or the saint Paul - it depends how we look at him, whether we judge by superficial impressions or employ depth psychology.

What a crazy sermon! I would never have delivered it from a pulpit. But just take it as a dream of mine, that even torturers can have something good in them, at least when they are asleep, and will be with us in heaven; that a man may be washed by the blood of Christ without being conscious that it has happened. Dreams are madness, and that is why I am preaching today as I do. I should like to see our executioners saved.

And remember that the Old Testament praises Joseph, not as a man who lived intensely in his real life, but as a dreamer of dreams.

To look on a woman to lust after her pollutes me even if I have not touched her. Then what if I look on a woman with the thought of doing her good, even if I do nothing afterwards? Righteousness demands that this also should be enough. Where is the miserable man who has never had any good in his intentions, in his looks, in his dreams?

Leave me with my foolish thoughts. I will still hope for you, who have abandoned us, who have not visited us in prison in your waking hours. You too will be on the right side. Amen.

page 78 IF PRISON WALLS COULD SPEAK

DEAR BROTHERS AND SISTERS

I CAN ADMIT OF NO FREE LANCES IN CHRISTIANITY - CHRISTIANS are soldiers who belong to an army. They have commanders, and must obey them. Christ himself "gave some apostles ... some pastors and teachers" (EPH 4:11). Nobody can be a Christian and declare Jesus as his only pastor, just as nobody can obey a general while refusing obedience to the captain or even the sergeant, though these are much less competent than the commander-in-chief.

We used to live under a free enterprise system, and we have applied to our churches principles and ideas taken from this system. But Christianity is not of this world. There is no such thing as free enterprise in Christianity. There is organization, hierarchy and, I repeat, obedience. Obedience not only towards God, but towards your fellow-Christians "who have the rule over you" (HEB 13:7). Protestant Christians do not have a man to rule them in matters of faith. They have rejected the Pope, because everyone considers himself a pope. Such an attitude is not biblical. It is not Christian.

But once the question is put like this, you have the right to ask, "Well, then, who is the pastor in whom I should have confidence?" It is his task to bring me to perfection as a saint, but there are so many fakes. Some men, who are called pastors, don't even have the intention of making men into saints. Those who believe they have this calling say so many contradictory things, and give so many contradictory examples of living, that I am confused. Who is the true pastor?

page 79 Chapter 13: The True Christian Teacher

This is a problem which is not yours alone. Christ has it, too. He, too, asks, "Who then is a faithful and wise servant, whom his lord hath made ruler over his household, to give them meat in due season?"(MTT 24:45) and he finishes the sentence with a question mark. So much he knew. So much he said. He could give you no clear indication of where to find the right pastor. He could not tell you to rely on the Bible alone. The Bible teaches you about faithful servants who will give you the Word of God. To give men the Bible alone as a sufficient rule is like giving the pupils in a school all the books, without guiding their reading. They need more than books. They need a teacher.

But what has Christ revealed on the subject of who is the right teacher? His revelation was a question mark - one of many in the Bible. Who is the true bride of Christ? Would you like to know? Look it up in the Scriptures, and you will find God's answer in the Song of Solomon 3.6 [SOS 3:6]. There is posed the same question that you are asking, "Who is she," (so says the original) "that comes out of the wilderness like pillars of smoke, perfumed with myrrh and frankincense, with all powders of the merchant?" Look carefully at the answer which follows. It is a question mark. Just that. Question marks are God's only revelations concerning some of the biggest problems of the Christian life, such as how to find the right pastor, and how to be sure which is Christ's true bride. In the original, even the question mark is missing. There is just a blank space, a stimulus to thought.

God wants us to find the answers for ourselves. We are in the paradoxical position that we have to be taught matters of faith by God-approved teachers, but we must know these matters beforehand so well that we are able ourselves to choose the right teacher from among hundreds who offer themselves as guides. It is a paradox, like all the paradoxes of life. In order to extract iron, you need iron tools. In order to have iron tools, you must extract iron from the mines, which you cannot do without having the tools first. Theoretically, the extraction of iron is an impossibility. But life has shown itself stronger than theory.

You have the same thing here. You begin with very primitive tools, in this case with very simple criteria. With these you can make the first steps towards discovering the right teacher. Having found him, you will progress further, together with him, since he also is only a man, but guided by him.

One very primitive criterion for discovering the right teacher is to ask, "How long has he kept silent?"

The soul does not leave a place at the same speed as the body. A messenger from God cannot deliver his message at once. His spirit continues for a long time to dwell in the heavenly places where he received the message.

When I was arrested, it was a long time before my spirit came to stay with me in prison. To begin with, it remained at home. It took the Holy Spirit thirty years to reach Jesus. Empowered by the descending of the Spirit, he could then deliver his message. St. John the Baptist also had to wait thirty years.

St. Paul, after having seen and heard Jesus, and after having received instruction in the proper manner, from a pastor, Ananias, went to Arabia to meditate in loneliness. He was not good yet as a messenger. His soul was still tossed to and fro by tempests, and continued to dwell for a long time in the old Pharisaic framework. Only after many years did his soul realize what his ears and eyes had perceived. After this he became fit to be an apostle.

Slowness to speak is generally a characteristic of a Christian (JMS 1:19). - even more so of the righteous teacher. A man who has not passed years in silent meditation may be able to give you a useful interpretation of messages delivered by others in times gone by, but he is not a reliable teacher. Why should you receive messages at second hand and not directly from the source?

How long has the would-be teacher been silent? Put this question to him. Ask him, "How long have you been non-existent, of no standing at all in the spiritual life?" This is the only guarantee against pride. The man who does not stand on a height can never fall.

A second characteristic of the true teacher is that he will use language of a different quality. The officers who went to arrest Jesus returned saying, "Never man spake like this man" (JHN 7:46).

page 81 Chapter 13: The True Christian Teacher

Unquestionably, many of the teachings of Jesus existed also in the Old Testament, in the Jewish tradition, in the Vedas, in Meng-Tse and Lao-Tse. They were similar to the teachings of Rabbi Hillel. Jesus used words common to religion and mysticism in all times. Otherwise nobody would have understood him. But, along with all this, there was a uniqueness in the language he spoke which startled men as they had been startled - to a lesser degree - whenever they had met a prophet before. What the true teacher of God has to say, cannot be described in terms of common concepts, because God's thoughts are not like our thoughts. Our languages and concepts have been formed since prehistoric times to make possible communication between men in hunting, fishing, and the production of food, and in personal relationships. From where could we have found the words to convey a divine message?

The true messenger from God cannot find adequate words in any human language. Neither can he fit his message into the much too simple patterns of logic. So many words are homonyms, and when I use a word in one sense, a secondary meaning passes simultaneously through my mind, creating thought associations which have nothing to with logic. Words alone, and their logical connections, are quite unfit to express a divine message. Logically well-constructed, systematic theologies, and highly logical sermons, come rather from the devil.

Goethe knew the devil, and in ~Faust~ he puts into the mouth of Mephistopheles these words to a young student:

Waste not your time, so fast it flies.
Method will teach you time to win.
Hence, my young friend, I would advise,
With college logic to begin.
Then will your mind be so well braced,
In Spanish boots so tightly laced,
That on 't will circumspectly creep,
Thoughts beaten track securely keep.
Nor will it, ~ignis-fatuus~ like,
Into the path of error strike.

Then many a day they'll teach you how
The mind's spontaneous acts, till now
As eating and as drinking free,
Require a process - one, two, three.
In truth the subtle web of thought
Is like the weaver's fabric wrought.
One treadle moves a thousand lines,
Swift dart the shuttles to and fro,
Unseen the threads unnumber'd flow,
A thousand knots one stroke combines.
Then forward steps your sage to show,
And prove to you it must be so.
The first being so and so the second,
The third and fourth deduc'd we see.
And if there were no first and second,
Nor third nor fourth would ever be.
This, scholars of all countries prize,
Yet 'mong themselves no weavers rise.
Who would describe and study aught alive,
Seeks first the living spirit thence to drive.

Then are the lifeless fragments in his hand,
There only fails, alas - the spirit-band.

Logic is a subtle web of thoughts, but they are only thoughts, and so they remain. Pastors have to be, according to EPH 4:11-12, makers of saints and not of logically well-connected systems.

Ordinary language is not enough for the true messenger of God. That is why David and Deborah used song, accompanying the words with music. That is why the first Christians used to dance, according to gnostic sources. That is why the Church has always expressed its message in sculpture and painting and ceremonial.

And even these are not enough. Consider how much Jesus spoke without words. The gospels continually remark that "He lifted his eyes," "He lifted his hand," "He touched." He spoke not with words only, but with gestures, with the expression of his face. Look at Rubens' picture of the driving out of the merchants, and you will have some idea of how much the face of Jesus must have spoken.

In a true message from God, the significant silences play also an exceptional role.

Many assert their belief in the Bible as the Word of God. But if you examine them more closely, you will find out that they do not really believe it. The Bible consists of white sheets of paper (in the early days, of parchment), with black letters inscribed on them. Nearly all Christians believe the black letters to be God's word. But the white pages do not have a place in their creed. Yet these are of enormous importance.

St. Luke says that at the age of twelve, Jesus was in the temple and all the doctors were astonished at his answers (LUK 2:46-47). You will seek for these answers in vain in the black letters of the Bible. They are on the white pages.

Mary chose "the good part." She sat at the feet of Jesus and heard his words (LUK 10:37-42). This may be interesting, but I would rather like to know what was the word to which she listened. This is reported in the Bible, but not in the black letters. You must learn to read the white pages. There also you will find the solution to the mystery of what Jesus did between the ages of twelve and thirty.

The Bible is a message from God, and speaks through its silences, not only through its words. Music is beautiful not only in its notes, but also in its pauses.

Try to understand the silences of God's messengers. The truer the messenger, the more mysterious his silences. He often speaks a great many words to cover the silence about the deepest things. You have to go beyond his words to find the truth which he means to convey.

Discover the mystery beyond the words of the messenger, and you will know the message from God.

But what if you cannot find a teacher with the characteristics I have described? Then you yourself may be a righteous teacher in the process of formation. You can put these things to your pastor, and in this way you can be very helpful to him. The relationship between the pastor and his parishioner is a paradox. The parishioner learns from the pastor. But it is also true that he has to form him.

page 84 IF PRISON WALLS COULD SPEAK

In everything you do, begin by accepting these criteria.

I am sorry that I was never a good Christian teacher. I had not yet had my time in Arabia. Now I live in complete silence. absolutely alone. The guards have felt-soled shoes. I don't hear their approach. They give me my food without saying a word. Inner voices have also ceased. For long periods not even God speaks to me. My conscience keeps quiet, too.

Perhaps God is reforming me to be a good teacher in future. Pray for this. Amen.

page 85 Chapter 14: Salt Is Good

DEAR BROTHERS AND SISTERS

THE JEWS, WHEN THEY GET UP IN THE MORNING, FIRST WASH themselves, and then immediately start their prayers, which last for at least an hour. Christians, on the other hand, first read the Bible, and only afterwards begin to pray.
Why?

The Rabbi David Talner, contrary to the normal custom of the Jews, used to start the day by reading his mail, and only prayed afterwards. When asked why, he answered, "The more renowned a man is, the more difficult is his struggle against besetting evil thoughts in prayer. So I always read my letters first. Usually, they begin by addressing me as a righteous rabbi, a teacher, a leader, a holy man or by some other complimentary phrase. Then I begin my prayer saying, 'Lord, you know that I do not deserve these titles of honour. But since so many men believe me to be so in all sincerity, do not put their faith to shame. Make me become what they believe I am.'"

This is the reason why we read the Bible before praying. Through the Bible, not men, but God himself speaks to us the most beautiful and undeserved words, "Ye are the salt of the earth (MTT 5:13). Ye are the light of the world (MTT 5:14). Ye are children of God (GAL 3:26); partakers of the divine nature (2PE 1:4), heirs of God (ROM 8:17). I love you with an everlasting love" (JER 31:3). This incites us to prayer that we may become what we are called by God. I did believe he was indeed the duke," so it is easy for us to take as realities compliments which spring from love and are a call to goodness. We can easily believe a lie, we can believe that we are indeed what we are deemed to be, without any striving to attain the qualities of these titles.

But as in Shakespeare's ~The Tempest~, Antonio, a usurper, "made such a sinner of his memory to credit his own lie - he

We are the salt of the earth. Jesus says, "Salt is good." I wonder what made him say those simple words. Did he ever eat unsalted food? At one time, our guards poured spoonfuls of salt down our throats, and then left us without water. Now, on the contrary, we have for months been given completely unsalted food. For us, these oats boiled in water, without any salt, are absolutely unbearable. We sometimes prefer to go hungry, and do not eat them. Primitive peoples, once they have known salt brought by traders, long for it. Travellers in some parts of Africa are surrounded by men begging for a little salt. We, who are deprived of it, know that "salt is good." The idea that Jesus spent part of his youth in countries far from Palestine, perhaps in countries where salt was not known, might not be entirely invention.

Now, "ye are the salt of the earth." "Salt is good." Are we good? Are we seasoning the meals of other men? Are we giving taste and sense to other men's lives? Or do we leave them without salt, as we prisoners are left? The simple fact that the Bible calls us salt is not enough. A friend of mine, a teacher, had a pupil who had great possibilities, but was lazy. Once he handed in a bad thesis. The teacher reproached him for this, but gave him the highest mark, telling him, "Now you have got this mark, try to deserve it in the future."

But how do we become good? The conditions do not seem to be very favourable. At first, I did not exist. Then I was made, from the very same elements from which the dust of the earth is formed. Soon, I shall be dust again. My soul has inherited a sinful character. There is no possibility of my becoming good by any act of my will. Neither can my will keep me good. We have to rely utterly on the grace of God.

You have become good when you have made the great discovery that you are not good, and cannot be so. Then you ask God to make you so. The result is that you die, and you be- come another person, you become He. All his righteousness

page 87 Chapter 14: Salt Is Good

becomes yours, not a particle less than it was his. You are as much entitled to proclaim yourself the owner of his righteousness and goodness, as you are to proclaim yourself the owner of any estate which has been given you legally as a gift, or which you have inherited. Either all the Christian mystics have been fools, or a Christian can say to Jesus, like St. Gertrude, "You are I!"; or like Luther in his commentary on the Epistle to the Galatians, "A Christian is Christ."

By putting on Christ's personality, by being clothed in him, by being able to say "not I, but Christ liveth in me" (GAL 2:20), you are the salt of the earth, you are good and will remain so for ever. The question as to how the salt will be seasoned again if it has lost its saltness becomes purely theoretical, because for you it can never happen that the salt should lose its saltness; you can as little lose your divine nature as Christ can cease to be Christ.

Now, how should I proceed practically to be not me, but him? The Bible speaks of the foolishness of the cross (1CO 1:18); even about the foolishness of God (1CO 1:25). So, let us learn from the madmen.

There are madmen who believe that they are Napoleon. Others reckon themselves to be St. Francis of Assisi, or Winston Churchill. Each behaves according to what he reckons himself to be. The man who thinks he is Napoleon will put on a tricorne hat, keep his right hand in the breast of his jacket, discuss military strategy and boast about Austerlitz or curse the English for having defeated him at Waterloo. Those who think they are St. Francis will wear the habit and girdle of a monk, will fast and pray a great deal and speak holy phrases, even if they do not make sense. The man who reckons himself to be Churchill will always go about with a thick cigar in his mouth and talk about politics. What you reckon yourself to be, determines your behaviour.

Begin with this madness. Consider yourself what St. Gertrude and so many other saints have considered themselves to be: you are He. This mad presupposition will have the same result as with other madmen. More and more, you will come to behave like him.

There is a difference, though, between the two kinds of madness. If you consider yourself to be Churchill, you behave like Churchill, but you are not Churchill. But if I believe myself to be He, an essential part of his mystical body (just as my heart is me, and my brain is me, and my glands and my soul and my spirit and my eyes; so every member of his body is He) and if this produces in me step by step the corresponding changes, then I am really He. The words of the Bible, "As He is, so are we in this world" (1JN 4:17) have found their fulfillment.

page 88 IF PRISON WALLS COULD SPEAK

It needs faith to believe yourself to be He, when you are a sinner. But what do we really know about the lives of the prophets, from Isaiah to Malachi? We know their prophecies, not their virtues and failures. You become a child of God by faith, not by virtues and good deeds.

Have this faith, and you will be essentially good, with a goodness which cannot fade away. The salt can never more lose its saltness. This or that bit of salt can lose it. Salt – the chemical formula, salt; the notion, salt in its essence, can never cease to be salt. You will become the unalterable formula of "goodness."

Cease your own life completely. Deny the self. Cease to practise its virtues as much as its lusts. You have been crucified with Christ, and have suffered the fate of every crucified man. You have died. But you exist. Since you exist after having died, you must have been born again, this time not from an earthly union; you have not being conceived in sin, but are begotten from God. You are once again a child, an angel. (According to the Talmud, the etymology of "cherub" is ~kerabja~, like a child – this because in Babylon a child was called ~rabja~.) You have been born with a new, angelic, divine character. Believe it.

Don't be disturbed if you continue to see evil in yourself. Children see many fancies. Their world is populated with many products of their imagination. Rather believe the word of God, "In those days and in that time, saith the Lord, the iniquity of Israel shall be sought for, and there shall be none; and the sins of Judah, and they shall not be found" (JER 50:20). This refers to the time of the return of the Jews from Babylonian captivity. Looked at from the human level, they had plenty of sins. Nehemiah punished some of them for this. From the godly level, which is now yours, they had none. Self-diagnosis is no good. Do not judge yourself. Only believe steadfastly that it is not you who live, but He. Continue to believe it, just as the madman believes himself to be Napoleon although everybody contradicts him, and you will succeed. You will achieve the goodness which does not fade. Amen.

page 90 IF PRISON WALLS COULD SPEAK

DEAR BROTHERS AND SISTERS

HOW, IN PRACTICE, DOES GOD COMMAND A CHILD OF HIS WHAT to speak? It happens in different ways. He can do it through a dream. I once dreamed an article for a magazine, from the beginning to the end. I was so shaken by the dream, that I awoke and wrote it down in the middle of the night. The article has been spoken of as one of my best. It was also an accurate prediction of my future spiritual journeys, although I did not understand this at the time, Another time I dreamed a whole sermon, beginning with "Beloved brethren" and finishing with "Amen." This too I wrote down during the night. (I never went to bed without having paper and pen near me. "I sleep, but my heart is awake," says the bride in the Song of Songs (SOS 5:2). She is continually waiting for some communication from the bridegroom.) This sermon seemed to me so fantastic that I never delivered it. Only after I had gone to prison did I realize that, if I had preached it, it would have warned my church of much suffering and could have halted some who were already sliding down the path of betrayal.

God does not speak only in dreams. Once at midday in the busiest part of Bucharest, I felt a compulsion to take out paper and pencil, and write down what would be given to me. I rested my paper against a shop window, and in half an hour the outline of a whole booklet was dictated to me. You know it as ~The Mirror of the Human Soul~, and you considered it the best thing I have written. I don't shrink from page 91 Chapter 15: Believe In What Flows From Your Heart

repeating this tribute, because I had no part in writing the book.

I imagine that many children of God have experienced similar inspiration, either when awake or asleep.

At other times, God speaks through a verse of scripture, a sermon, a book, or a conversation. But the most usual way in which he speaks to one of his children is, probably, by insinuating himself into our own thought process. He commands me through my own character. I believe that my thoughts are his, even if these thoughts seem very odd to me. Many of the thoughts expressed in the psalms of David, or in the prophecies of Jeremiah or Ezekiel, and attributed to God, must have seemed very peculiar to the prophets. Peter and Paul may perhaps have wondered why, though they were convinced that they were inspired by the Holy Spirit, they called some Christians "dogs" or "sows" (2PE 2:22), and put so many under curse.

Be yourself, speak what you think, and - if you are a child of God by faith - you can be sure that you have spoken what God has commanded you to speak. If not he, who else? He could change Baalam's curses into blessings, against the false prophet's will (Num. 23,24). So he can change my words before I have uttered them. Since he does not do so, he must wish me to say the very words which I speak. Have your words sometimes been enticing words? Don't be afraid that because of this they were not words from God. The Lord sends enticing spirits (2CH 18:18-21). Perhaps he wants to destroy some Ahab who deserves it, and is using you as his instrument.

You would prefer to be used for other purposes? But society needs both perfumed ladies and evil-smelling tanners. Why should another man be the tanner, while you are the one who spreads intoxicating fragrances? Just put yourself at the disposal of God. Be his voice, as John the Baptist was, just a voice, allowing him to be the mind which decides what the voice will say. John, the voice, spoke of Jesus having a fan in his hand and burning up the chaff with unquenchable fire (MTT 3:12). The same divine mind later used the same voice to say that the one described so harshly was "the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world" (JHN 1:29). John the Baptist was not concerned with how far the two utterances agreed. He simply said what flowed out of his mind, which he had yielded to God. You must do the same.

St. Bonaventure says that the devil proceeds against us like a general who sets out to capture a city. He finds out which is its weakest point, and there he attacks. Our weakest point is not to believe that God wills, speaks and works through us.

In the second book of Chronicles it is written that "the king of Syria had commanded the captains of the chariots that were with him, saying 'Fight ye not with small or great, save only with the king of Israel'" (2CH 18:30). This is the devil's strategy. Our most truly royal characteristic, the full assurance that we are entitled to behave and speak as we do, this is the target for his attack.

So the doubt arises in our mind, and in that of our hearers, whether we might have presumed to speak a word in God's name, which God has not commanded us to speak. That is how the whole confusion arises.

Jesus knew himself to be the truth. He knew that in everything he spoke, he said exactly what God meant him to say, and in the way in which God intended. He had not the slightest doubt. How could anyone doubt, who asserts, "I am the truth" (JHN 14:6)?

Jesus said, "I am the truth." On the basis of this text, for nearly two thousand years the Church has continued to assert that he is the truth. But he never proclaimed that he, Jesus considered as a third person, is the truth. He said very clearly, "~I~ am the truth"; I am this only as long as I am an I, a first person. A Jesus who is a he, a man who lived two thousand years ago in Palestine, cannot be the truth. He never expressed his opinions about such modern questions as the theory of relativity, modern technical or political life, the problems of Nazism, Bolshevism and Imperialism, and so on. Only a Jesus who is an I, a living I, can answer each day's problem.

In the true prophet, and even in the most modest witness to the truth, he is an I. He lives through his witness with all the power of his truth, in the first person, giving to the disciple his own full confidence in everything he says and does. Some of the things the witness says may be erroneous from a human point of view. But God willed those words. A chess player may sacrifice a pawn in order to win a game. The pawn may blame himself for the fact that he is captured. He does not know what role this apparent loss may play in the strategic plan of the master.

God may have told Shimei to curse David (2SM 16:5). He certainly willed that Caiaphas and Pilate should behave towards Jesus exactly as they did behave. The apostles said it, "Against thy holy child Jesus, whom thou has anointed, both Herod and Pontius Pilate with the Gentiles, and the people of Israel, were gathered together, for to do whatsoever thy hand and thy counsel determined before to be done" (ACT 4:27-28). From a human point of view they committed a crime in killing Jesus. From the divine viewpoint, they would have committed a crime by not crucifying him, thus hindering the redemption of the world; this in the vain supposition that they had free will and could have done otherwise than they did.

I know that I am shocking you by talking like this. That is just what I want to do. Shocks can cure deafness. An enormous possibility is opened to you: to live free from doubts, free from the fear that you may do or say something contrary to the commandments of God; because Jesus, the Truth, has become "I" in you by faith.

Do you believe that you have become the temple of the Holy Ghost? Then, being sure that the Holy Spirit is God, be also assured that he will allow nothing evil to dwell in this fair house of his.

St. John writes in his first epistle to the believers, "Ye have an unction from the Holy One and ye know all things (1JN 2:20). Jeremiah tells us the terms of the new covenant, "They shall teach no more every man his neighbour and every man his brother, saying, Know the Lord. For they shall all know me, from the least of them unto the greatest of them, saith the Lord" (JER 31:34). A Christian knows that what he knows is right. He need take no thought about what to speak. What flows out spontaneously from his new heart is God-given (MTT 10:19).

But does he never make a mistake? Dr. Erlich made 665 unsuccessful experiments before he discovered the remedy against syphilis, a remedy therefore called 666. Were the first 665 unsuccessful experiments errors? You may call them that. You might just as well call them 665 steps upwards towards the truth. Only in this sense does a Christian err. Every error of his is a necessary. unavoidable step towards the ultimate truth which lies within him, waiting only for the Christian to dig deeply enough within himself to find it. For him, to be a false prophet is no longer possible.

I have been through a terrible period of doubt. For weeks, the devil has tormented me every night, telling me that I have been a false prophet, and am being punished for it. One night I made the decision to return to the Jewish faith. Another time I felt a strong compulsion towards the Church of Rome. But what if the Adventists were right? The Bible tells us hundreds of times to keep the Sabbath. To know that Jesus is the truth was of no help to me at that time. I recovered my serenity when I told the devil who tempted me, "I am the truth." I believe in what I think. Because I, the I sanctified by Jesus, so believe. That is the reality. Amen.

BELOVED BROTHERS AND SISTERS

THOSE PASSAGES IN THE BIBLE WHICH APPEAR TO US TO BE boring genealogies or lists of places on a journey, have in reality a deep significance.

Almost without exception, Hebrew names of towns and people have a specific meaning. It is therefore possible to read certain Bible verses in the original either as mere enumerations of names, or as sentences in which every word has a meaning. So, for example, the Babylonian Talmud, commenting on Numbers 21.18-20, "And from the wilderness, they went to Mattanah, and from Mattanah to Nahaliel and from Nahaliel to Bamoth and from Bamoth in the valley," says, "If you become like the sand of the wilderness on which everyone can tread, you go to ~matanah~ (in Hebrew, gift), that is you receive the gift of the Law. From there you go to ~Nahali-El~ (my inheritance is God). God becomes your inheritance. From here you got to ~Bamoth~ (this means to the heights). But if, once there, you become proud, you will descend again from the peaks into the valley." I remembered this part of the Talmud when they ordered me to lie down and then trod on me. That is the way to Mattanah.

Many Bible verses take on a new meaning when you know them in the original languages. At least pastors and priests should be required to know these. When people of different nationalities love each other, they usually learn one another's language. Why do children of God, especially those who are cultured, not learn the original language of the Bible? It made a great impression on me when I read once that, many years ago, a missionary visited the shop of a Chinese Christian, at a time when he had no customers. He found him at his counter studying the New Testament in Greek. Amazed, he asked him how he had come to learn Greek. The shopkeeper answered, "Out of respect for the Word of God."

In the Book of Nehemiah there is a verse which has a deeper significance than appears on the surface, "And Jeshua begat Joiakim, Joiakim also begat Eliashib and Eliashib begat Joiada" (NEH 12:10).

Jeshuah is the first link in this genealogy. Jeshuah is the name of the Saviour in Hebrew; it is the equivalent of Jesus, and means "salvation." We usually think of Jesus as saving us only from the punishment of our sins. We are rather like the Catholic girl who prayed before the statue of the Virgin Mary, "Help me to sin without giving birth as you gave birth without sinning." We would like sin without hell, which is its unavoidable result. But he is a Saviour not only from hell, but also from sin, and from much more besides. He is a Saviour from error. God made him to be for us not only ransom and redemption, but wisdom, too. He saves us from a life without meaning, without aim and without vision. He saves us from pettiness.

For Ibsen's Peer Gynt, his self was "the host of desires, passions and lust." It was the sum of caprice and all demands, in short "everything which belongs to me alone and is made to show my manner of being." He was sufficient to himself, forgetting that he came from someone else and depended on others for his life.

Jesus, Jeshua, saves us from this minuscule self. While Peer Gynt roamed for years about the world, as a drunkard, a magician, a false prophet, a merchant of slaves, his real self lived on in the faith, hope and love of Solveig, who waited for him faithfully.

Jesus gives us his self to be ours. What a delight it was, and is, for him to have suffered for us, to share all our shortcomings, our failures and our inability to rise above ourselves. He saves to the uttermost.

This Jeshua, salvation, begets in us Joiakim, which means

"God raises us." Now we are fit to be raised to great heights. We are no more burdened by sins, we have been saved from attachment to transitory things.

This in turn begets Eliashib, "God turns to us." Glory be to God on high! It is not right that God should always descend to the level of our human misery. His plan is to raise us to the place where his throne is, to show us the beauties of his kingdom. Christ has supped with us. Now we shall enter into fellowship with him, share in his divine thoughts, and help to fulfill his divine tasks.

Eliashib begets Joiada, which means "to know God." Before passing through all these stages, we may have known a good deal about God. Know we know him. The Greek word for "knowledge," as well as the Hebrew, also contains the meaning of sexual union. "Adam knew Eve his wife" GEN 4:1). Now the time has come for the mystic marriage, the marriage of the Lamb. The wise virgins have entered with him into the bridal chamber.

One state of heart begets another, one stage of spiritual growth begets another, just as a father begets a child. This is the deeper meaning of this verse, and of many other similar ones.

Rip off the mask and reveal the falsity which disguises itself as truth. Shun any religious guide who does not know this ancient way, trodden by the saints of old, and who does not walk in this path himself.

There are beauty shops for lies. You can dress them in priestly robes, surround them with the smoke of incense and with the impressive music of the organ, wrap them up in old or new theological assertions.

The truth is found somewhere else. It passes through the state of full salvation to that of being raised to high and heavenly places, where God turns to you in love and unites with you, embracing you with the holy kiss. This may happen in a splendid religious service, in a simple little chapel, at home or in prison. But this is the real aim of religion, to love God without restraint, and never to rest until you have been united with him for ever.

The greater the pain, the more slowly the time passes.

page 98 IF PRISON WALLS COULD SPEAK

This is why God is eternal while we are transitory. He feels a pain so difficult to bear that we cannot even understand it. It is pain which causes his time never to pass.

In the Talmud it is written, "The night is divided into three watches. In every watch, the Holy One, blessed be his name, sits and roars like a lion, saying, 'Woe that I have destroyed my house. I have burned my temple and have banished my children among the nations ... woe to the father who has expelled his children, and woe to the children who have been driven out from the table of their father.'"

The pain of God must be made to cease, and this can only be done by rooting out its cause: our separation from him We must travel from Jeshua, through the intermediate stages, until we arrive at Joiada, in a union with God as complete as that of a bride with her husband. Then, God being no longer in pain and having experienced perfect happiness, time will fly quickly for him, as it does for all those who know joy. It will pass so quickly that it will disappear completely. When this transition from salvation to union with God has happened for all creatures, God will be all in all. All creatures will be deified. We shall sit with him on his heavenly throne (REV 3:21). The word of Jesus, "Ye are gods" (JHN 10:34), will be fulfilled. God being all in all, he will no longer be anybody's God. We shall all have entered into the Godhead. The distance between adored and adorer will have ceased to exist. The aim of creation will have been fulfilled. The heirs of God will take over their inheritance. The old myth about Brahma's falling asleep will have found its fulfillment.

We suffer remorse about all kinds of little sins. At the moment of the decisive crisis in our life our greatest remorse will be not about our sins, but about our religiosity, and our faith which has fallen short of this ultimate aim: to pass through full salvation, ascension, and his turning to us, into indissoluble union with him. St. Bonaventure said that a servant of God should examine himself seven times a day. Do we do this? And do we do it concerning what principally matters in religion - the mystical marriage with the Godhead?

This is prefigured in the Holy Communion. In it we unite

page 99 Chapter 16: Dull Genealogies with the Godhead in the person of Christ. We become one.

He becomes flesh of our flesh and blood of our blood.

Before appearing before King Ahasuerus, the young maidens had to purify themselves for six months with oil and myrrh, and six months with sweet odours (EST 2:12). Even more so, ought to purify ourselves and anoint ourselves with all that is best before uniting with him in Holy Communion. Here again, Jeshua begets Eliashib, and Eliashib begets Joiada. You become a palace for God. You can then rightly apply to yourself the words of David, "The work is great, for the palace is not for man, but for the Lord God" (1CH 29:1).

David did not just begin building at random, but gathered a vast quantity of gold, silver and jewels. The building passed through many stages, until the glory of God came to dwell in it.

Your only true friend is the one who shows you this way, travels along it with you, and helps you as you go.

Which sense of ours shows us that a caterpillar is in the process of becoming a butterfly, or that an ugly egg is a future peacock? Our senses apprehend things statically, as they are at a given moment, not dynamically, as a process of evolution. So the sinners who confess to you are not only what your senses perceive.

A wicked man can be saved from his cruelty; a melancholic can be saved from his worries. Jesus can save everyone to the uttermost. Every soul can pass from Jeshua through Joiakim and Eliashib to Joiada, moving and living henceforth within the Godhead, indissolubly united with it.

When you see people in that way, it becomes progressively easier to overcome sensuality. Then the Spirit moves you, and you are able to overcome. Amen.

page 100 IF PRISON WALLS COULD SPEAK

MY DEAR CONGREGATION

I WONDER IF A RICH CHRISTIAN FARMER, IN THE WEST, WHERE farmers can still be rich, would be willing today to give for his religion the great quantity of bullocks, lambs, rams, flour, oil and wine, besides the obligatory tithes, which the Jews gave as offerings. The Israelites gave freely, and they gave out of poverty. Palestine may have been a blessed land, but the Jews of that time knew nothing of farming economy. They had nothing like the income of a modern Western farmer. But they gave so much, that there came a time when Moses had to restrain them from giving any more, telling them: "Enough."

Religion for the Israelites was what it ought to be for every Christian: their ruling passion. A man who has a real passion, whether it be for gambling, drunkenness, whoring, pride, or addiction to drugs, will give everything he has to satisfy it - his money. his honour, his health, his family. So it is with those who are passionately devoted to art, or science, or politics. Nansen, passionate to know the secrets of the North Pole, lived there for three years among the polar bears. Men will die on the gallows for their revolutionary or reactionary ideals.

For your passion, you sacrifice everything. And religion is a passion. It calls for the sublimation of all evil lusts, and spending your human energies and possessions on God instead of on worldly things.

When you are young and have the spring in your blood, you do not keep account of how much your passion costs. So the Jews did not keep an exact account of their tithes. Besides the prescribed offerings, which were many, there were free-will offerings, some offered in fulfillment of vows made in difficult circumstances, some simply out of overflowing love to God. Religion is the state of heart of those who, more than anything else in the world, love, prize and honour God.

A man cannot decide of his own free will whether or not to have a passion. No man is a drunkard or a chain-smoker because he decided to be one. He becomes one by a slow sliding into sin. You do not know at the beginning where it will lead you. The same thing happens with religion. It may begin by being just a legitimate curiosity, you experiment with it as others might experiment with narcotics. From being an occasional practice, it can become a habit, and from this it develops into an irresistible passion.

Those in whom religion is not a passion for God are nevertheless not excluded from religion. They can be servants of those who have the passion. There are many people who work in breweries and tobacco factories, in the cinema industry, in printing shops which produce pornographic literature, or as smugglers of drugs, who, without having the passion themselves, help others to see their desires fulfilled. If you don't love God passionately, you can passionately love the passion for God which you don't possess; you can be a servant of the bride of Christ. Jesus said, "Whosoever shall give to drink unto one of these little ones a cup of cold water only in the name of a disciple ... shall in no wise lose his reward" (MTT 10:42). Your reward will be that you will come to know the religious devotion for which you have longed. You will at last know the passion for the Lord.

But this passion is shallow, so long as it is a passion for somebody else. At the beginning of ~Romeo and Juliet~, Romeo is madly in love with Rosaline. It is enough for him to see another girl at a ball, to change his passion. Fortunately, both Romeo and Juliet die shortly afterwards. Otherwise he might have changed the object of his love again. It is in the very nature of passions to be able to change their object. All the time you can see men passing from one ideal to another.

page 102 IF PRISON WALLS COULD SPEAK

Jesus said that you can only really love your neighbour if you love yourself. The highest measure of love for another is that which you have for yourself. The more you are deified yourself, the more you will be able to love God. The more you are changed into Christ, the more Christ will become your passion, because he will be your real self.

Christians have almost forgotten the Orthodox teaching that they are being transformed into Christ even during this earthly life. St. Augustine recounts how he heard the voice of Christ saying, "I am the food of grown men; grow, and thou shalt feed upon Me; nor shalt thou convert Me, like the food of thy flesh, into thee, but thou shalt be converted into Me." St. Thomas Aquinas said that it is in the nature of the sacrament of Holy Communion to transform man into God, and to make man to be like him. Because if fire has the power to change all things into itself and, having first destroyed in them all that is contrary to its nature, to transmute them into its own form and perfection, how much more will the consuming fire of divinity (HEB 12:29) destroy every impurity which it finds in our souls and transform them into his likeness?

The God for whom the Christian entertains a fierce passion is not merely an external being far away. My passion for him is a passion for myself in my highest stage. "Ye are gods" says Jesus (JHN 10:34). So my passion for God is also a passion for what is divine in myself. This discovery of the divine jewel in yourself makes every day a Sunday for you. Most men are more generous on Sunday than on other days. This is the day on which they spend most on satisfying their own pleasure. Now you will spend your energy, your time, your liberty, your life, on God.

With this discovery, the old nature dies in you. It dies in poverty. It never did possess anything worth mentioning. The dead are free from debt. Your mind is no longer burdened by the remembrance of past sins. They do not belong to you, but to another being, who has passed away. You can speak of them as you would of a crime committed by some murderer three hundred years ago. It is not you. Your mind is free. Now you can judge before you act. And so you will see the salvation of the Lord.

page 103 Chapter 17: God Is My Passion

We have from the Greeks the legend of Prometheus who stole fire from the gods and made possible the progress of humanity by giving it to men. Prometheus means "the one who thinks beforehand." Such a person is very rare. Most people are "Epi-metheus." They act under impulse, prompted by psychological complexes, fears, anxieties and so on, which are all the result of past sin. Only afterwards along comes the mind, liked a wicked stepmother, to tell you how wrong you have been.

But the discovery that Christ, the divine jewel, the hope of glory within your own heart, is himself your real personality, sets you free from all this. For the first time you can begin to fulfill the commandment to serve God with all your mind. You are a true Prometheus. Your actions are well thought out beforehand. They are successful, as Godhead is always successful. It succeeds even when it seems to be defeated, as it appeared to be on the cross. Such a life is worth living. You will sacrifice for it gladly and liberally, where once you did so grudgingly.

It is not extraordinary deeds, like going off as missionaries to arduous places, which make us Christians. It is our daily burnt offering and the abundance of our freewill offerings. To devote as a matter of course your thought, your time, your energy, your substance to the cause of God - which is nothing else than your own cause because you are a partaker of the divine nature - this is true Christianity.

God united with a human body and made human life his own. So you now unite with the Godhead. Its life is your real life, your ordinary everyday life. It was not an exceptional deed for Jesus to be human. He was human day by day, as a helpless babe, as a diligent schoolboy, as an obedient son, as a conscientious carpenter, as a faithful preacher and healer, as a martyr, in his weakness and despair as one who went down into hell. He daily shared all aspects of human life, including its temptations. He spent all his Godhead on human life. In the same way the child of God shares the whole of divine life. He does not express this life only in moment of mystical elevation and rapture. He carries out the ordinary things of life in a divine manner. In his routine occupations, in the home, in the workshop, in the scientific laboratory, in unavoidable failures of the flesh he spends himself as a god would do, because God is a passion for which he gives up everything, because God has become his real being.

page 104 IF PRISON WALLS COULD SPEAK

Prisons are full of men who suffer for passions such as gambling, stealing or sexual vice. Why should we Christians not also suffer gladly for our passion? Amen.

page 105 Chapter 18: Prayer For The Dead

DEAR BROTHERS AND SISTERS

I HAVE NOT PREACHED TO YOU FOR A LONG TIME. WE HAVE HAD a very bad time lately. Our jailors have behaved worse than ever. They filled our bellies with water and jumped on us. They hung some of us up by our thumbs. They tied us with crossed arms between two pillars and whipped us until we fell over fainting. Why did they tie our arms like this? It was with his arms in the same posture that Jacob blessed his grandchildren.
God is becoming, just as he wishes to be, less and less intelligible, a God who "would dwell in the thick darkness" (1KI 8:12). Let him fulfill his desire. I leave him in peace. I don't disturb him with my demands.
I have something better to do, to prepare myself for meeting him. If things continue like this, I shall not last long. I shall die. They will bury my corpse.
The Trappist monks greet one another with the words "~Memento mori~ - remember you will die." As a spiritual exercise, I had formed the habit some time before my arrest of saying the burial service which we use in our church, imagining myself to be the one for whom it was spoken. At the end, I would sing Mozart's ~Dies Irae~, composed in macabre circumstances. Legend says that, when he was writing it, he was visited by a mysterious stranger with the appearance of a death's head and a skeleton. Catholics sing it at burials:

page 106 IF PRISON WALLS COULD SPEAK

Day of wrath, O, day of mourning!
See fulfilled the prophets' warning!
Heav'n and earth to ashes turning!

O what fear man's bosom rendeth
When from heaven the Judge descendeth,
On whose sentence all dependeth...

When the Judge his seat attaineth
And each hidden deed arraigneth,
Nothing unavenged remaineth.

What shall I, frail man, be pleading,
Who for me be interceding,
When the just are mercy needing?...

Low I kneel, with heart submission,
See like ashes my contrition.
Help me in my last condition.

I have continued with this practice in my solitary cell though my mind often gets confused and it is difficult to remember the exact words.

There is something unique about a burial service. It is possible to imagine myself to be a king (Napoleon started as a corporal and became an Emperor), a bishop (St. Ambrose was chosen to be a bishop before he was even baptized), a millionaire (many poor people have become rich), free. Such eventualities are all possible, and so we are able to imagine them. But to be dead is not possible for the human soul. Proof of this is the fact that we cannot imagine ourselves to be dead. I try to picture my death. I see myself lying still and cold in a coffin. But the fact that I see myself, and that I can even recite the burial service, shows that I am not very dead. A man should be serious during his spiritual exercises. Sometimes I roar with laughter. I am not dead, and never will be. "Whosoever liveth and believeth in me shall never die," said Jesus (JHN 11:26).

But I am no longer normal. I stop suddenly in the middle of my laughter and begin to cry, because the words of Jesus belong to some mysterious sphere of unintelligible truth. They don't correspond to reality. The fact is that Christians do die. Countless numbers of them have died under torture or otherwise over the centuries. And I may die very soon.

At this moment, people are praying for me. I am sure of this. Will they stop praying if, by chance, they hear that I have died? Will they stop praying for me just when I will need it the most?

In times past I have taken part in discussions on the subject of whether Christians should pray for the dead. People smiled as they debated. No one had in mind the moment of his own death. When death threatens you, you see things otherwise. Why should I be abandoned in prayers as soon as I die?

Because prayer for the dead is unscriptural? Many things which are unscriptural are still very good. You will not find family prayers mentioned in the Bible. Is this practice therefore wrong? The Bible only mentions churches in towns.

Village churches appear to be unscriptural. Are they wrong? Is it scriptural to be a Lutheran, or a Baptist, or Catholic, or Orthodox?

But is it even certain that prayer for the dead is unscriptural? I remember a prayer in Nehemiah, which I often used in my devotions: "Let not all the trouble seem little before thee, that hath come upon us, on our kings ... and on our fathers, and on all thy people, since the time of the kings of Assyria" (NEH 9:32). The Jews had no kings in the time of Nehemiah. He prays for kings and for Jewish ancestors long since dead.

In any case, I would think the same way even if there were verses which seemed to contradict this. The true interpretation of all Bible verses is love. God is not the God of the dead, but of the living. He is the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob (EXO 3:6).
In Hebrew, and even more clearly in Greek, it is said "I am the God Abraham, the God Isaac and the God Jacob." He has identified himself with these living dead. To abandon them means to abandon God himself.

I don't know about others, but I, when I die, will need your prayers. I am saved, but even the children of God come to judgment. They will have to answer not only for every wrong deed, but even for an idle word. We will not go to hell for these sins, but God has punishments for his children also.

St. Mary Magdalene was saved, but what a punishment it was for her to stand at the foot of the cross and to hear Jesus crying, "My God, my God, why has thou forsaken me?" (MTT 27:46) Jesus at that moment did not know the answer to the question. Magdalene knew. He was forsaken because she had sinned. And she could not help him. He had to pass through darkness and death because of her past lasciviousness.

St. Peter was forgiven for his denials, but he had to bear a heavy punishment. He was asked three times by the Lord, "Do you love me?" (JHN 21:17) He was not trusted after his first answer. Punishment enough for a lover.

I have sinned so much, even since I became a Christian and a pastor. I need your prayers. I need the prayers of the glorified saints. Would it not influence the judgment at all if I could appear before the Lord surrounded by the prayers of thousands of children of God who would declare their solidarity with me and implore pity for my failures?

Whatever you think about prayers for the dead, pray for me. Pray what Nehemiah prayed for the Jewish kings and his forefathers who had died long ago, "Let not all the trouble of Richard seem little before thee. It is true that Richard has sinned much. but he has also had a very troubled life. He has suffered much. O, that his grief were thoroughly weighed and his calamity laid in the balances together. It would be heavier than the sand of the sea (JOB 6:2-3). He has sinned, but he has received from thy hand double for all his sins (ISA 40:2). Let his sin be small before you, and his trouble great. For Jesus's sake, forgive him."

God is sovereign. It depends on him whether to see a thing as big or small. St. Paul decided to consider his terrible afflictions - the repeated jailings, beatings, stonings - as "light" (2CO 4:17). If we can consider our afflictions for God as light, could he not reciprocate by considering the sins of those who have suffered as light also? When I am overcome by worry, I begin to whistle quietly. Why should God ponder in detail about my sin? Simply by turning away his head he no longer sees it. So by a prayer of yours you could distract his attention from my sins, you might make him turn his head towards you. My sins would not be observed any more.

page 109 Chapter 18: Prayer For The Dead

Live just once in the spirit your own burial service, even if you cannot recite it under such menacing conditions as ours. Then you will no longer philosophize about the question of prayers for the dead. You will think, "Poor man, he has died. Even now he may be passing through judgment. Let me make a desperate attempt to help him. I may not succeed. But neither can I harm him by my prayer."

Brothers and sisters, death is ready to swallow me. Pray for me. The German Lutheran Pastor Blumhardt asserts that he saw the souls of the dead in church imploring the prayer and fellowship of the living. I may not be normal any more, but I have the same fancy. I see dead persons in my solitary cell, asking for my prayers. Luther objected only against public prayer for the dead, because of the abuses connected with it and the false hopes which it might give, but not against private prayer for them. Pray for me.

Remember the words of Boaz, "The name of the dead be not cut off from among his brethren" (RUT 4:10). Amen.

page 110 IF PRISON WALLS COULD SPEAK

BELOVED BROTHERS AND SISTERS

THE BIBLE SPEAKS OF "THE FOOLISHNESS OF GOD" (1CO 1:25). THE original Greek word has the meaning more of "stupidity"; our Rumanian translators have used the word "madness." This madness of God's attracts me much more than his wisdom. And I will ask a question which may seem most impious. Has God always been mad like this, or did he become so by suffering too much pain? Is his madness curable? But these are mad questions, you will say. I agree. I cannot deceive myself. I am slowly going mad. So I cannot ask any questions other than mad ones. Well then, if I know this, why don't I keep quiet instead of asking questions? But he, too, knows about his madness, yet he still puts questions to us, and gives us revelations.

I want to know all about his madness, because madness has become my lot.

A high percentage of mental patients are Jews. As pastor of a Hebrew Christian congregation, I had to deal with quite a number of cases. My wife nursed schizophrenics. I have read about this illness. I know what is happening to my mind.

Schizophrenics withdraw from reality. Their only pre-occupation is with inner fantasies. Well, all prisoners shut up in solitary cells develop these characteristics. We grow out of touch with the world. We live on our imagination, which is entirely different from that of men who lead a normal life. But what about God? He is ~aghios~. This Greek word, which we translate as "holy," means literally "not of the earth" (ghea). It is a way of saying that God is out of touch with the realities of this earth. And as to his thoughts, he says himself that they are not like ours (ISA 55:8). So, even by becoming mad, I become close to his image. How trustfully a Christian can watch himself losing his mind!

My responses have become dulled. The guards shout. I sometimes, rarely, hear the screaming of prisoners who are being beaten. I continue to pursue my own line of thought. Gone is the time when I reacted by banging on the door or even weeping. God sees from heaven the tortures of his children. He hears their cries. He does not react either. What inconsistent behaviour for a God as men imagine him to be if they don't believe his own revelation about his foolishness. My hands tremble all the time. I see no reason why they should. I suppose it is an image of God's hands, which tremble when he has to punish, because he loves the wicked man and cannot bear to see him destroyed.

Being constantly watched through the peep-hole, no wonder I have developed a persecution complex. I am afraid to touch the food. It might contain narcotics or poison. Jesus said unexpectedly to those "Jews who believed in Him" (JHN 8:31): "Ye seek to kill me" (JHN 8:40). That looks like persecution mania. The curious thing is that those Jews, who believed in him and whom he was apparently falsely accusing of harbouring murderous intentions, really did take up stones to cast at him. So in the same heart there can co-exist belief in Jesus and the desire to kill him. And the foolishness of God, which recognizes the latter desire in believers, may be wiser than the wisdom of men. Perhaps my own persecution mania is also well-founded, and I do well to beware of men.

Being much persecuted, and my sick imagination making me exaggerate the extent to which I am in danger, produces a reaction in me. Why should I be persecuted, imprisoned, tortured, if I am not somebody important? Now I observe the delusions of grandeur growing in me. I hear voices strengthening me in such delusions. How sure Jesus was that he was the Messiah, though he knew that many others in the past had believed the same thing of themselves, but wrongly. If he was not the Messiah, why should Herod have tried to kill him while he was still a babe in his mother's arms? Why all the anger against him when he spoke and even when he healed? I, too, firmly believe in my delusions of grandeur. St. Augustine said, "We are Christ." What higher thing than this could I be? It is condescension on my part if I sometimes have fantasies of being merely some little earthly ruler or pope.

No, I do not have delusions of grandeur. I am grand. I can die today in this prison cell, and suddenly have the wonders of God burst upon me. One of these wonders will be his kinship with me, even when I am mad.

The guards mock me. They call me "Hamlet in misery." Well, Hamlet was a prince, even though he was mad. Every day men share his tragedy and foolishness, and learn from it to be better. Who remembers the name of even one of Denmark's jailors of his time?

I don't mind going mad, and God does not mind having his foolishness proclaimed. No treatise of systematic theology mentions it among his attributes. It is contrary to reason to believe in a foolish God, but one plain text is worth a thousand reasons. And here is the text "the foolishness of God." In here I am going foolish, too.

A man must be mad to believe in a mad God. But here is the supreme test of faith.

A Canaanite woman appealed to Jesus to cure her sick daughter. He refused, saying that he was not sent but to the lost sheep of Israel. When she insisted, he called her a dog, saying, "It is not meet to take the children's bread and to cast it to dogs" (MTT 15:26). I was revolted when I first read this. A healer who practises racial discrimination towards the sick is not worthy of the name of healer. Not only is he not divine. He is not even human. It is shameful to call somebody a dog because he belongs to another nation than yours.

It took me years to understand that Jesus was not using the word dog as an insult. It only seems so to us. The people of the east did not have the same attitude to animals as we do. Among us, a man would mind very much if his father called him an ass. But Jacob praised his son Issachar by calling him "a strong ass" (GEN 49:14). Jesus was highly commending this woman. He saw with sorrow that the Israelites were lost sheep, whereas

page 113 Chapter 19: Going Mad

this woman was faithful, like a dog. He was ready to perform miracles for those who were lost. But a faithful dog, a soul as attached to him as this Canaanite woman was, a person who had crossed racial barriers and appealed to him, a Jew (even today Brahmins in India would prefer to see their son die than call in a doctor from among the pariahs), should not ask for wonders. She should bear quietly with the tragedies of life. Miracles are bread for children. It is not meet to take it from them in order to give it to those who are already faithful, and should believe without seeing wonders. The word "dog" in Jesus's mouth is a compliment. But she continued to demand healing for her daughter, and the Lord agreed that some crosses are too heavy even for the faithful. He cured the sick child.

To be like a dog - this is what being faithful means. A dog does not care about the character of its master. He may be a genius or an idiot, wise or foolish, a thief or a saint, he may treat the dog with affection or he may beat it - the dog will continue to watch the house, and fight with aggressors, and never cease to be a trustworthy companion.

Let the lost children of Israel find it objectionable to believe in a God who acknowledges his own foolishness. Dogs simply love God, whatever he is like, and whatever he does. This dog- like attitude is unreasonable in the eyes of men. They call Christians fools, and they are right. But we have become fools, and are going mad, in the knowledge that God has chosen the foolish things of the world (1CO 1:27). Though we are fools, progressing visibly towards madness, we do not despair. It is for us one more sure sign of our election.

God has suffered terribly because of the rebellion of his children. This drove him to the mad solution of sacrificing his beloved Son for unworthy sinners. He did it out of love for us, but it is love to the point of folly. His madness will be cured. It will be cured when the wall of partition erected by sin has disappeared, and he is all in all; when his creation has entered once more into rest, and his kingdom stretches from shore to shore.

Until then, I will quietly accept my growing madness. I may be a madman, but I am his. Amen.

page 114 IF PRISON WALLS COULD SPEAK

DEAR BROTHERS AND SISTERS

AND WHEN THE APOSTLES HAD LIFTED UP THEIR EYES, "THEY saw no man, save Jesus only" MTT 17:8).

You can look at things at many different levels. Suppose I look at myself in a good mirror. I see myself exactly as I am. But then I look in a magnifying mirror. Now I see my image distorted. I change the mirrors, using ones which magnify more and more, until I am looking through something which resembles huge lentils. I can no longer see my face, only the molecules of which it is composed. I am once again seeing myself without distortion, but at another level, the molecular one. I can continue with the operation until I see the molecules composed of atoms, and then the atoms composed of elementary particles. Or, conversely, I can look at a man standing in a crowd, while I am going up in an aeroplane. The crowd will become smaller and smaller, until in the end hundreds of men have converged into one point. They have become a single unity.

On the earthly level, there were six men on Mount Tabor - Jesus, Moses, Elias and the three disciples. You could see them as separate individuals. But if you are looking from above, from the level of spirituality, you see all individuals unified in Christ. So the apostles saw Jesus only - not the mighty prophets, not their companions, not themselves, but only him in whom we all live.

The ovule of the holy virgin out of which Jesus was born had at first been inorganic matter. Then it became synthesized into organic matter. Then, at her meeting with the archangel Gabriel, it became fertilized with the heavenly seed. The "holy thing" (LUK 1:35) came into existence. Jesus was once merely a thing. The embryo developed just like every other embryo, passing through the different phases of animal life, until it took human shape. But he was the embodiment of the pre-existent Son of God. So in him all things could be seen united - inorganic matter, organic form, the animal world, the human world and the Godhead.

page 115 Chapter 20: They Saw Jesus Only

He was both High priest and the sacrifice offered by the priest. He was the lamb of God and the lion of Judah. He was the Holy One and he was made sin. Angels ascended and descended upon him, but he was counted among the criminals. He was a carpenter and the King of Kings. He was a man, yet bore the feminine name of Jeshuah. He was a man of sorrows, yet joyfully took part in marriage feasts and banquets of a very worldly sort, given and attended by publicans and sinners. He was a Jew with an open heart for Gentiles, rating the good Samaritan higher than a neglectful priest of his own race.

Ibsen's Peer Gynt, when he awoke from a lifetime of failure, realized that he had never been himself, except in the heart and dreams of Solveig, the girl who had loved him and waited for him all the years. We live in the sphere of illusion if we live the life of our little self. How can you isolate the self? Parts of plants and animals, of other creatures than yourself, constitute and continually renew your body. You think in a language formed by others long before you were born, and according to laws of logic established by Aristotle. Your mind is full of what you have learned from others in school, from newspapers and films, from conversations or from books. How much of your thoughts are really yours? You may have been born as an original, but now you are a copy, a representative of a social type, you think what your nation, your social class, your race, your sex, your religious denomination thinks. What individual thoughts or desires remain in you? Perhaps 0.00005 per cent of what is you. You live the transitory life of a man of a certain social and psychological type in a certain age. Your true self waits for you in the thoughts and aspirations which your best friend Jesus experiences for you. He is the one in whom we also, torn apart by so many conflicting tendencies, become one.

A Christian sees only the One. In an apocryphal papyrus found at Oxyrrhinchus, Jesus is quoted as saying, "Cleave the stone and you will find me within it. Cut the wood, and lo, I am within it." Nature receives its beauty from him. He is mankind's ultimate aim. He is the King of the choirs of angels. He is the Beloved of the Father. In him, God and creature become one.

It is said that the Japanese wanted to find a good market for their steel, which was of an inferior quality to the Swedish product. They named the town in which the steel industry was situated, "Sweden," so that with a clear conscience they could then label all their products "Made in Sweden."

Our false self tends to do something similar. He will give himself a new name - he becomes a religious self, a spiritual self, a self faithful to Jesus, instead of denying himself totally and seeing "no man save Jesus only." Jesus in me, Jesus in my neighbour, Jesus in development in the torturer who beats me, Jesus in Moses and Elijah, Jesus in those yet to come, Jesus in nature, Jesus in all things.

During the war, my wife was away in another country on a very dangerous mission. There was no possibility of communication between us. All the time she was away, I could read nothing. On the pages of newspapers and books, I saw her image. I walked along the road and surprised myself by calling out her name. When the branch of a tree, shaken by the wind, knocked against my window during the night, I had the impression that she had returned and was knocking at the door. Her image persisted continually in the retina of my eye. This is what happens with Christians. They see in sinners and saints alike only what comes from Jesus. Like the Abbot Zosima in ~The Brothers Karamazov~, they would bow before the criminal. He is made Christlike by the sorrows and sufferings which he prepares for himself through his wickedness. There is no place on earth where sparks of Christ are not spread around.

Shakespeare's Prospero says to Miranda that, by withdrawing from the world, he awakened his brother's evil nature.

page 117 Chapter 20: They Saw Jesus Only

"My trust, like a good parent, did beget of him a falsehood in its contrary as great as my trust was." We criticize our bishops, priests and pastors, without asking ourselves whether our shyness and trust might have created their untrustworthiness.

I have said that there is a way of looking up in which, although six people are present, you see no man save Jesus only. Why have you allowed your priests and pastors to give you less than this? Why have you accepted as spiritual guide a man who does not see the One only, and is unable to direct your gaze in such a manner that you also see only One?

When you see in everybody only the One, the true Light which lightens every man that comes into the world (JHN 1:9), you will no longer despise any man.

The Jewish scribes of old despised the common people. It is recorded in the Talmud that Rabbi Eleazar said, "It is lawful to kill a common man even on the Day of Atonement which falls on a Sabbath." Rabbi Samuel ben Nahmani said, "It is lawful to tear a common man to pieces like a fish." Jesus has taken such common men, fishermen, harlots, publicans, and has made them into saints and heroes, by teaching them the great mystery of oneness. God is one. There is one Lord, one faith, one baptism. There is only one to be seen, to be looked upon. It was in looking not on the multitude of snakes crawling around them, but only on the one brazen serpent, that the Israelites were healed (NUM 21:9). As long as you see a multitude of men and things, you will always be afraid and troubled by their multitude; but Mary chose the good part, to sit at the feet of only One, the One in whom all the other twelve guests lived, the One who was the real Self of the twelve (LUK 10:42). She looked to him only, listened to him only. This part cannot be taken from you. In the multitude, every moment new things and new men are appearing and disappearing. But the One is eternal.

United with this One, you too are eternal. There will never be a time without this One. If he is your life, there will never be a time without you. We bear his name. So many people believe us to be Christians. Let us not put to shame those who have believed in us, but let us be what a Christian is meant to be, a Christ in miniature, a living part of the one great mystical body in which Jesus is the head and we are all members.

page 118 IF PRISON WALLS COULD SPEAK

So long as I was still out in the world, surrounded by crowds of people, I was too weak to attain this state. He has given me the privilege of being put in a solitary cell. At least through this I have been able to learn, what all Christians must learn even when they are surrounded by multitudes of people, to "see no man save Jesus only." Amen.

page 119 EPILOGUE

THE CATHOLICS HAVE A HYMN, "O, FELIX CULPA - O, BLESSED guilt, which has given us a Saviour." Some believe that I am anti-Communist in the vulgar political sense of the term. On the contrary, I am tempted to sing, "O, blessed Communists who have given us hours of voluptuous embraces with the heavenly bridegroom, an insight into heavenly things which we never had before, victories of faith, not only under difficult outward circumstances, but through inner storms."

Countless thousands of people are in prison for Christ's sake in Communist countries today. It is not only the physical fact of being in prison, it is the shame. Joseph in the Old Testament, just because he wished to keep his purity, had to bear the humiliation of sitting in prison under the trumped up charge of adultery. Christians in the Red camp are accused of theft, treason, espionage, currency offences and even of ritual murder. But, please, don't pity them. Don't pity the bride who has gone into the marriage feast leaning on the arm of her bridegroom. The bridegroom loved the cross. She shares the joy of the cross with him. Suffering is involved. But this is no reason to pity her.

When asked why I describe the atrocities of Communism, I searched myself to discover my real motive for doing so. It is most of all to stir up your compassion for the Communists, who are burdening their poor souls with crimes.

I wish to stir up prayer for them, to call the churches to the task of spreading the life-giving Gospel among the Communists.

page 120 IF PRISON WALLS COULD SPEAK

There is, of course, the other side. Christians must pray for and help the persecuted underground church. Well over 1,000,000 letters of enthusiastic support, and the creation of Missions to the Communist World in twenty-nine countries within four years, are proof that the rank-and-file Christians of all denominations are on our side.

We also have Christian leaders who support us, but these are fewer. Why the adverse attitude, or at least the apathy, of some?

It is, I think, first of all because they are theologians. Theology is a setting aside of ~Theos~, of God himself, who is not interested in doctrines but only wants our love, in order to dissect the ~logos~, some hundreds of millions of words which have been written about the one Word of the living God: "Unite with me in love, forget about words in the reality of my embrace." ~Theos~, God, makes you love. Theology has produced strife, hatred and even murder.

Secondly, it is because these people carry the responsibility for vast church organizations, which can subsist as such only by adjusting themselves to successive political regimes. There was a time when Hitler's photograph was on the altars of some German Evangelical churches, when certain Catholic and Protestant German pastors wore the uniform with the swastika, instead of going to prison or to death. In Communist countries, theologians have had to cheer Stalin and to praise the Soviet regime. There is a big difference between what an American Baptist pastor preaches in the South and what he says in the North, when he touches on racial issues. I have myself heard a renowned pastor saying two different things according to the attitude of his audience, which in one state was in favour of segregation and in the other against it. Without this adjustment, the big religious organizations could not exist. Of this fact we must have full understanding.

But why do big religious organizations have to exist at all? St. Athanasius had the truth about the Holy Trinity. An ecumenical council disowned him and he was expelled from church membership under no less a trumped-up charge than of murdering a bishop and raping a virgin. He was told, "The whole world is against you," to which he replied, "Then I am against the whole world." It is only men of this calibre who have been canonized; only they are considered heroes of Christianity.

Happily, the underground church has no big structure to keep in existence. Even less do you have to worry about buildings, finances and committees when you are alone in a solitary cell. There, only truth counts. You struggle to find it.

The story is told that a Mikado once announced his intention of going to see a renowned garden of orchids. On the appointed day, his host met him at the gate, and bowed respectfully. "Would His Imperial Majesty please to come into the garden first? Tea will be served afterwards." They went into the garden, but the earth had been levelled. There was not a flower to be seen. The Emperor did not say a word. Then he was invited into the house. On the tea table stood a vase containing one single orchid, of unsurpassable beauty. The host said, "I have kept the most beautiful flower for the grandest of Emperors. The other blooms did not deserve to live."

Only the ultimate, eternal truth survives in the underground church. All other considerations which engage the transitory interests of a church disappear.

By joining hands with the underground church, Christianity in the free world will gain an influx of truth, love and heroism. It is a question of life or death for Christians of countries which are not yet under the Red yoke.

The purpose of this book, as of all my books, has been to familiarize children of God in the free world with what may be their own lot very soon – if Communism continues to spread at the rate it does now – and to bring them into the holy atmosphere of those who continue to believe when their faith is gone, who hope when they are in despair, who love even when they rebel, and who proclaim that God is King where Satan reigns. Will you too leave reason behind, and follow us into the realm of the foolishness of God which is shared by his suffering children – a foolishness which is wiser than men?

I wonder if you disagree with many of the thoughts expressed in this book. I, for my part, disagree. I told you what I thought then, not what I think now. I did it, because my "then" is the "now" of millions of men and women imprisoned for their faith in Communist countries today. You can share their sufferings only through the knowing the torments of their minds.

I have done my part. I leave it to you. Choose to judge, to cavil or to help.

I am happy also to render a service to my adversaries and to the opponents of my missionary work.

One of the men whom I respect most is a Catholic bishop with whom I was in prison. He once told me, "I wish to give you as a gift a very strong argument which you can use against my church. Christ has taught that when someone has sinned, he should say, 'Forgive us our trespasses,' when according to our doctrine he should have said to the offender, 'Go and confess to a priest.'" The bishop told me this, just because he loved Protestants.

Jump at this book, all my enemies and all the opponents of our mission. I make you a rich present. I give you here plenty of material to prove that I am a heretic, mad and whatever else you like. Just profit by it. I love you. Why should you not have a little joy? You don't know the beauty of the embraces of the heavenly Bridegroom. Have at least the joy of attacking me.

But the children of God will understand. They will feel as if they themselves suffer today this terrible strain. The Bible teaches, "Remember them that are in bonds as bound with them" (Hebrews 13.3). Manacles hurt not only the wrists, but also the soul. If this book will have caused some to shed a tear, to say a prayer and to help practically the martyrs, my aim in publishing it will have been achieved.

The End of "If Prison Walls Could Speak" by Pastor Richard Wurmbrand

If That Were Christ, Would You Give Him Your Blanket?

Richard Wurmbrand
Copyright 1971

Two Chinese Christians shivered with cold in a cell. Each had a thin blanket. One of the Christians looked to the other and saw how he trembled. The thought came to him, "If that were Christ, would you give Him your blanket?" Of course he would. Immediately he spread the blanket over his brother.

First American Printing 1971

Copyright 1970 by Richard Wurmbrand. First printed 1970.
ISBN o 340 12534 9 All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced or transmitted in any form or by any means electronic or mechanical including photocopy recording or any information storage end retrieval system without permission in writing from the publisher.

CONTENTS

Chapter		Page
1	Episodes in the Life of the Underground Church	7
2	Does the Underground Church Exist?	25
3	Facts, Only Documented Facts	33
4	Russia's Golgotha	39
5	How Many Christians are Jailed in the Soviet Union?	47
6	The Prison Regime	52
7	Red China	55
8	The Christian Church at Midnight	61
9	Romania: a Liberal Communist Country	65
10	The Absolute Torture	69
11	Beauty Shines at Midnight	79
12	Persecutions of Christians in Africa	83
13	The Attitude of the Church of the Free World Towards Communism	87
14	What We Should Not Do	94
15	What Can Be Done?	98
16	The Need for Literature	103
17	Broadcasting the Gospel	106
18	Help to Underground Pastors and Families of Christian Martyrs	108
19	Answer to the Most Frequent Criticisms	112
20	My Last Word	122

"There is no better rest in this restless world than to face imminent peril of death solely for the love and service of God our Lord." St. Francis Xavier page 7 If That Were Christ, Would You Give Him Your Blanket?

CHAPTER 1

Episodes in the Life of the Underground Church

In North Korea few workers have a free day. They work from the 1st of January to the 31st of December. The revolutionary feasts are celebrated by increased production. You can stay at home only when you are sick.

In a big coal-compound with some 40,000 workers, it was observed that 1,200 always reported sick on Sundays. The authorities became suspicious, and they discovered that, in turns, these gathered in private homes or, during the good season, in the woods. Their pastor would announce a hymn, but nobody would sing. The danger of being heard was too great. They all would read silently at the same time the respective songs from hymnals written by hand. Then they would pray, also in perfect silence. The pastor would read a few Bible verses and give a very short exhortation, which was meditated upon in silence by the whole congregation, which would disband afterwards in small groups, looking around to be sure that nobody saw them.

Forty-five Christians considered to be leaders of this Christian group have been shot. We do not know the fate of others.

page 8 If That Were Christ, Would You Give Him Your Blanket?

What is this? A scene in the life of the Underground Church. This happened in 1969.

Rev. Fang-Cheng is in jail. He has been tortured, but has not betrayed the brethren.

One day he is brought again before the examining officer. He sees in a corner of the room a heap of rags, and hears a rattling of chains. The image becomes clearer. It is his mother. But she did not have white hairs before. Now she has. The colour of her face is like ashes. You can see that she, too, has passed through heavy ordeals.

The Communist asks Cheng, "I have heard that you Christians have ten commandments allegedly given by God, which you strive to fulfil. I would be interested tO know them. Would you be so kind as to recite the commandments?"

Cheng is in a terrible state of heart, but still such an opportunity to acquaint a disciple of Mao with God's law must not be neglected. He begins to enumerate the commandments until he arrives at "Honour father and mother." Here he is interrupted. The Communist tells him, "Cheng, I wish to give you the opportunity to honour your mother. Here she is in suffering, in chains. Tell us what you know about your brethren in faith and I promise that tonight you and your mother will be free. You will be able to give her care and honour. Let me see now whether you really believe in God and wish to fulfil his commandment."

It is not easy to take a decision.

Cheng turns to his mother – "Mummy, what shall I do?" The mother answers, "I have taught you from childhood to love Christ and his holy Church. Don't mind my suffering. Seek to remain faithful to the Saviour and his little brethren. If you betray, you are no more my son."

This was the last time that Fang-Cheng saw his mother. The probability is that she died under torture.

What is this? A scene from the life of the Underground Church.

An officer of the Secret Police sits in the study of a pastor. The Communist is very polite. He asks the pastor to become an informer for the Secret Police. In exchange, he can preach as much as he likes. "And then, you know. We have a say in the Church today. We can help to make you bishop."

The pastor refuses.

It is a Saturday afternoon. The Communist leaves. When he is already at the door, he says, "I will be back for a definite answer on Monday. You had better think it over. By the way, your congregation considers you a saint. But you remember your affair with Betty. It went far. We have a picture of her in your embrace. You have been very incautious. If your congregation knew the story, you would be finished. I wish your good. Better accept our proposal. In any case, goodbye, and have a very blessed Sunday."

On Sunday morning the pastor tells from the pulpit his love affair, omitting only the name of the girl. He says, "We all are sinners, pastors as much as laymen. I have failed. The Secret Police blackmails me by this sin to inform on you. I prefer my shame as a whoremonger to be considered by you. God forgives, and I will not become a Judas. The wrong which I have done is enough. For the rest, it is up to you to decide if I can stay on as your pastor or not."

When he descends from the pulpit, the parishioners throng around hi n. In tears they kiss him and say, page 10 If That Were Christ, Would You Give Him Your Blanket?

"Don't leave us. We are not better than you. Now you will be the best of pastors."

When the Communist comes back on Monday, the pastor says, "Just go ahead and publish what I have done." The publishing does not discredit him. Everyone answers, "We know the story. He has told us himself, and we forgave him."

Soon after this, the pastor is sent to prison, but it is like going to a feast.

What is this? A scene from the life of the Underground Church.

A Christian has been released from prison. He is a farmer. He goes into the fields and prays, "God make me perfect." An inner voice answers, "Would you be ready to return to prison in order to become perfect?" He shrinks back. He has suffered so much. He replies, "Anything else, God, only not this." The inner voice says, "Then do not ask to be perfect."

A long inner struggle follows. In the end the Christian yields. "Make me perfect at whatever cost," he prays. Soon he is re-arrested and put in solitary confinement. He passes a long term there. Beatings, hunger, lack of sun, no reading material. His only pastime is to communicate by Morse code through the wall with his fellow-prisoners. One day he has near him a new prisoner. He asks him his name. It is the same as his own. It is his son. Encouraged by the heroic example of the father, the son has also walked the way of the cross and has also arrived in jail. The father thanks God for the privilege given him to have a confessor of the faith as a son. A remarkable step on the way to perfection.

What is this? An occurrence from the life of the Underground Church, as reported in ~Vestnik Spasenia~

page 11 If That Were Christ, Would You Give Him Your Blanket?

(The Herald of Salvation), the secret magazine of the Russian Baptists.

~Sovietskaia Bielorussia~ of the 15th of August 1967 said, "Ignorant fanatics of the Utevsk Baptist Evangelical Christian Church have woven their nest in the area... They are determined to convert the population and to establish the rule of the evangelical ideology over the land, to introduce religious instruction of children and the abolishment of anti-religious propaganda. They urge each person to earn their salvation by active recruitment and winning others to Christ."

The Moscow publishing house ~Znanie~ published recently a book by a Communist A. Shamaro, called ~lrreconcilability~. It thunders against the Christians. But at the same time it describes them: "The preachers, the active bearers of religion in all its forms - in churches or sects - don't laugh and don't make jokes. They act. They work day and night. They preach everywhere, at bus-stations and in hospital wards. They seek new men for the parishes or sectarian congregations. They seek them everywhere. They would stop on the streets unknown men whom they saw to have a sad face... Day and night they seek the sheep that have gone astray. "Faith without works is dead," they say. And the first work pleasant to God and which honours him, ... they consider to be "the fishing of men," the attraction of new adherents in church parishes and sectarian groups... If the dirty religious preachers and recruiters endeavour not to miss any occasion to fish a soul among those with whom they work, with whom they live in the same town or village, with whom they meet on the street, they surely do everything to fill with religious faith the heads of their children, and of the children belonging to relatives and acquaintances"

Where are there such faithful pastors? Where are these zealous Christians? We do not meet them often ;n the free world. You have heard again about the Underground Church, as described by her worst enemies.

A letter arrives. The writer introduces himself as a florist. He is a specialist in breeding orchids. He has cultivated new variations of orchids which can grow even in Northern Siberia. As far as from there, but also from many other parts of the country, people come to copy his catalogue of twenty-seven new kinds of orchids. (By the way, what a coincidence! The New Testament is composed of twenty-seven books. Would it be so that he is the lucky possessor of a New Testament and people come to copy it by handwriting?) He says that the most appreciated are his Amosian orchids, types 8 and 11. I open the Bible at AMO 8:11 and read "Behold, the days come, says the Lord God, that I will send a famine in the land, not a famine of bread, nor a thirst for water, but of hearing the words of the Lord."

In this shrewd manner, this brother informs western Christians about their need for Bibles.

Others make it simpler. A Christian begins his letter with the words "Dear Censor, I know that every letter written abroad is censored. But you are also a man created by God, who will stand once before his judgement seat. Allow this letter to pass. It does not harm the state. I simply communicate with my brethren in faith in another country." The letter passed. Some Communist censors are also men with hearts.

A tourist returns from the Soviet Union. She received there various little gifts, among them a towel. The tourist is thoroughly searched when she leaves the U.S.S.R., but nobody pays attention to the towel.

When we get it, we dip it in a chemical solution. And we can read a communication from the Underground Church.

There exists a church which keeps relationship with other churches by methods like this.

Mrs. Ghinzburg is a Soviet writer and a Communist. Notwithstanding, she has been in Soviet prisons some seventeen years. She has been jailed by her own Party comrades. This is not an exceptional case. Communism is not only anti-Christian, or anti-Jewish, or anti-imperialist, it is simply anti-everybody. One Communist hates another Communist. The Communist Kosygin put manacles on the wrists of the Communist Dubcek. Mao hates Kosygin. Kosygin hates Tito. Khrushchev has kept his own wife in prison eight years. It is a religion of hatred. In Party purges, thousands of Communists have been jailed and killed. Mrs. Ghinzburg has been one of the victims.

Released from prison, she wrote a book called ~The Whirlwind~. She asserts that she still has Communist convictions. Nevertheless, she describes honestly the horrors of Communist prison-camps. Among other things, she says that in the north of Siberia, where the snow never melts, some Christian women prisoners refused to work on Easter Sunday, saying that they had to celebrate the Lord's resurrection. They were punished by being made to stand barefoot on the ice. And the Communist writer adds, "Not one of them fell sick."

It reminds us of what happened I,600 years ago.

Forty Christian officers serving in a Roman legion in Sebaste (Armenia), refused to bring sacrifice to the Roman Emperor as a god. They were stripped naked and made to stand on the ice of the river Kisil-Irmak. On the shore, a fire burned. A warm bath was prepared for those who would recant. Every hour they were asked if they were ready to renounce their faith, in which case their life would be spared. In the end, one denied the Saviour. At that moment, the Roman centurion who watched the execution, saw forty angels with forty crowns descending from heaven to crown the martyrs. But one of the angels found no head on which to put the crown. The would-be martyr had become a renegade. So, the centurion stripped himself of his clothes and crying, "Angel, I come" ran to the ice. He died, as did the others, for the glory of the Saviour.

Those have died. The sisters in Siberia did not die. But neither was there even one to recant.

This is the Underground Church as described by a Communist writer

The Christian Ketchik had been converted late in his life. He lived on a small pension. His wife did not share his Christian faith.

One day, Ketchik was found at a secret prayer-meeting and compelled to pay, as a fine, his income for two months. He came back from court happy, and told his wife, "Now you see that I was right telling you the great worth of prayer. You did not believe me. But look here - the sentence. The Communists know the value of prayer. Even ill their eyes a prayer has the value of two months" pension. If it is of such high price, from now on I will never miss a prayer-meeting." He was fined three times during one year. He lost his income for half a year. But he learned the truth of what St. Augustine said: "Prayer is the strength of Christians and the weakness of God."

This is another of the many happenings in the life of the Underground Church

page 15 If That Were Christ, Would You Give Him Your Blanket?

Monsignor Draganovic was head of the Yugoslavian section at the Vatican. He himself is a Croatian.

But then the Vatican decided to arrive at an understanding with Tito. He had not killed all the Catholics. You just pass over the corpses of the hundreds of thousands dead, forget to mention their innocent death any more, and you sign a concordat. So Monsignor Draganovic, opponent of Communism, had to leave the Vatican. But he continued to work from Germany on behalf of his persecuted brethren.

He foresaw the possibility that he might be kidnapped. Therefore he wrote and deposited in a safe place a statement that he had no intention of returning to Yugoslavia and that he considered invalid any declaration which he might give, if he is ever in Yugoslavia, this being possible only against his will. Monsignor Draganovic was lured to Trieste where allegedly one waited for him to give him more documents and pictures about Tito's crimes. From Trieste he disappeared.

The foreign correspondents in Belgrade were shown afterwards a declaration written by Draganovic in which he declared that he returned to his fatherland of his own choice. The reporters even got photocopies of the document. It was certainly his handwriting. But Monsignor Draganovic was a sophisticated writer. In this declaration the syntax was that of an illiterate. It had been dictated by a Communist officer of little education.

After a few weeks, Draganovic himself appeared before the foreign press and declared that he had decided to come back to Yugoslavia and to stand trial under the charge of having been a "war criminal," though he had never been in the army. Only God knows through what methods of torture and brainwashing he had passed before giving such a declaration.

page 16 If That Were Christ, Would You Give Him Your Blanket?

The American Government apologized before the North Korean Communists for having intruded into territorial waters, though it had not been true. This has happened even though the American president had not been beaten by the Communists. Why should we wonder about Draganovic?

This bishop did not resist. Nobody must judge him. Two hundred pounds of flesh under Communist torture are not a man. They have ceased to be a human body. As the root of the figure 4 is plus 2 or minus 2, these pounds of flesh under a Communist whip are a bunch of several possibilities: they can make a hero, a traitor, a weakling.

Christians meet in a wood. The police surround them. Several try to flee, but they are caught by dogs.

Many get short terms of prison, fifteen days, but they have to pay for their board in the hospitable institution which detained them! A heavy burden for a family of poor Soviet citizens.

A Christian lady fights with the policemen. She would not allow her hymnal to be taken away from her. She has had it for forty years and could not replace it She bleeds. The bone of her nose is broken. She also has injuries to her arms. Just visualize the scene. Physical violence endured for possessing a book containing praises to God, while we have hymnals and never sing except in church.

In the U.S.S.R., hundreds of families have their children taken away because they teach them the Christian faith Now, these families understand in a new manner the words of the Lord, "Except ye become as children, ye cannot enter the Kingdom of Heaven." According to them this means unless you accept to be come sufferers like these children, unless you accept to lose the one most beloved as they lose their mummies and daddies, there is no place for you in the Kingdom.

This is a new interpretation of the Bible, or rather a return to an old interpretation, and it happens in this world apart, the world of the Underground Church.

Children fight. The teacher says, "Cosmonauts have been in space and have not met God. " A pupil stands up. The child knows that by its Christian witness it may lose father and mother. But she says, "Comrade teacher, did the astronauts have a pure heart? Without it you will never see God on whatever star you arrive. If you have it, you can see God everywhere, even while sitting on a form in an atheistic school."

In another school, the children are taught that man comes from a monkey. The teacher, suspecting Eve to be a Christian girl, points at her and asks her what she thinks about it. She answers, "I am thankful, comrade teacher, for what you taught us today. I have always asked myself how it is that Communists are so wicked and torture so many innocent men. Now you have given me the explanation. You are from the monkeys."
The children Vania, Pavlik, Andrei, Vera and Sveta were given a rubber doll. When the children played "a prayer-meeting," they were embarrassed by the fact that the knees of the doll could not be bent. So they complained to the teacher that they have an unbelieving doll. "We have learned that every knee must bow before the Name of Jesus." What a lesson for an atheist!
Many children taught in the Underground Church say openly what they think about God, and also what they think about Communists.

Y. I. Kushev stands before a court in Moscow. He has been one of the organizers of a demonstration on a public square against the arrest of Soviet writers. He had shouted, "Release Dobrovolski. Down with dictatorship."

The prosecutor asks him, "Do you believe in God? - Yes."
Then Anatalovy Krasnov-Levitin takes the stand as witness for the defence. He had brought Kushev to Christ. Doing this he knows that he exposes himself to heavy sufferings. Krasnov-Levitin had already been for seven years in prison for his Orthodox faith. Now he sees his convert in the dock. It is not like bringing somebody to Christ and then rejoicing that he sings dressed in a choir-robe in the church.
Krasnov-Levitin says, "It is under my influence that Kushev asked to be baptized. I was on the square Someone said to me, "They've arrested Kushev." I ran after him, but it was too late. They pushed him into a car and drove off. And now I see him after eight months -here, pale and drawn after his long imprisonment ... he is a man of exceptional integrity ... What happened to him is the direct result of his generosity ... he is very unselfish, always thinking of others, never of himself. A gifted poet ... he has all the making of a brilliant writer."

The defence asks, "Were you pleased to have him baptized?" Levitin: "Of course I was pleased. What kind of a religious man or writer would I be if I wasn't happy when people come to believe in God? But I am most displeased to see him in court." The defence (which in the Soviet Union also acts as the prosecution): "You think you can baptize a nineteen year old boy without his parents" knowledge?"-"There is a canonical rule that the church is not entitled to refuse baptism to anyone and the Gospels call upon everyone without exception to be baptized."
The lawyer Alski "defending" Kushev: "Levitin asserted his right to be religious and to propagate religion; but no one has given him the right to subvert minors to religion or to use compulsion. In coming to your verdict, I ask you to keep in mind the need to protect such youngsters from Levitin."

Soon after the trial of Kushev, Levitin was also arrested. A Communist, general-major P. Grigorenko, protested against the injustices. He is an atheist, but Levitin called him "the good Samaritan" who helps, while priests pass by. Grigorenko has been interned in an asylum.

A new fashion appeared in the Russian town of Liubetz. Women wore ribbons with inscriptions like, "May God arise and His enemies be dismayed," "The Most High is alive to help," "May the devils perish before the face of the living God," and so on. These were worn publicly in open defiance of the Communists.
But how could they be produced? Every factory has a political commissar who surveys everything. Well, it so happened that the man of the Secret Police appointed for the textile factory of Liubetz was a secret Christian. He had infiltrated the police in order to help the cause of Christ. His name is Stasiuk. He has been discovered and is in prison now. But he did it.
This is how the Underground Church works.

Some of the Underground Churches, especially those from among the Orthodox, are also politically active. Christians would like not to be busy in politics. But when Communists are busy to meddle in church affairs, when Communist politics jail, and kill millions of Christians, believers have not much choice. They have to defend themselves. Did not the Scottish Covenanters fight with weapons against bloody King James II?

page 20 If That Were Christ, Would You Give Him Your Blanket?

In Leningrad a plot to overthrow the Communist regime, headed by brethren of the Orthodox Underground Church has been discovered. Involved in it were sixty intellectuals of high-rank position.

On this occasion we received the explanation how it was that the Soviet press itself contained much data about the persecution and growth of the Underground Church. We can tell the secret now because it has been discovered.

Some Christians made a much bigger sacrifice than that of their liberties and their lives, as martyrs do. They sacrificed for Christ their integrity. They became members of the Communist Party. They tried to arrive at top positions in order to help the Underground Church

Some of them became editors of anti-religious magazines and newspapers. Pretending to oppose the Bible, they published whole chapters of it, followed by a few words of criticism. In this way the Underground Church had pages of the Bible printed by the Communists. For the same reason, they published facts about the persecution.

Hmara was a Ukrainian. His father was a well-to-do farmer; for this "crime" he was deported with his whole family to Siberia, Hmara grew up there with bitterness in his heart and became an anti-social element, a robber. He was put in jail for criminal offences. In jail he met Christians, beings apart, who suffered with shining faces for a Lord about whom they and their lives spoke so beautifully. Overwhelmed by what he saw in them, Hmara told one of them how he had become a robber, and finished with the words, "I am a lost man." The Christian, smiling, asked him, "What is the worth of a ten rouble bill when it has been lost by its owner? Is it not still worth ten roubles? Does a diamond ring diminish its value if someone has lost it? So a lost man has the whole value of a man, of a splendid creature of God. God values men even if they are sinners. And he gave his Son for them." The old story about Jesus followed, told in simplicity with its old effect. Hmara was converted.

page 21 If That Were Christ, Would You Give Him Your Blanket?

In 1964 he finished his term, and was released. He was no longer the old drunkard who beat his wife and children. They saw in him a new man. They, his brothers, his neighbours, were converted. Hmara became a member of the Underground Church

In 1966, he was arrested. The Secret Police had no special motive in arresting him rather than anybody else. He was to be the subject of a new experiment.

The Communists had hands on a leading personality of the Underground Church, whom we will call Brother X. He had resisted all tortures and refused to betray. The Secret Police thought, "What about torturing one of his flock in his presence, telling him that this torture of somebody else, of a beloved brother, would stop only if he disclosed the secrets? Worth trying."

So Hmara was flogged, submitted to all kinds of tortures. He had the lower part of his belly split, his tongue was cut, in order to make a leading pastor become a traitor. This pastor did not betray. And what if Hmara should die? Should a pastor tremble because one of his flock will have his body killed and fall into the hand of the One who made the lilies. Hmara will have the same God on the other side of death.

Brother X told afterwards that, while Hmara was tortured, he did not think so much about Hmara. He knew that he was walking a thorny path towards heaven. But he was appalled by the sight of the sadistic joy on the faces of the torturers. He remembered that for these, too, Christ has died. And he prayed for them.

The experiment did not succeed. The corpse was returned to the family in order to scare others away from becoming Christians. But its sight produced such an indignation in the population, that the authorities could not prevent the burial from becoming a triumphal march of the Underground Church. Singing Christian songs, masses of Christians and non-Christians took the coffin to the cemetery.

As Communists usually do, they got rid of the hangmen. Those who had tortured, having been ordered to do so, were sentenced. The judge was a woman. She wept hearing of the ordeals; she embraced the children of Hmara. Then she was converted. I, who come from a Communist country, know that the sentenced hangmen were released soon, and sent to do the same things in another place.

Jesus has been given again to be crucified in the person of Hmara of Kulunda. Two brothers of Hmara are still in jail.

How do Underground Christians think? Aida Skripnikova, the heroine of the Christian youth in the Soviet Union, at the age of twenty-seven, and in prison for the fourth time (her father was shot by the Communists for his faith), writes, "I cannot divide my heart in two, for it all belongs to the Church." (A western Christian would have said, "It belongs to Christ." In the Soviet camp the Church is very much beloved. She has been seen in her splendour. There the words of old have remained true, "Whosoever has God as his father, has the Church as his mother." Western Christians speak about the Church rather as about a mother-in-law.) Skripnikova continues, "Religion is my very heart and to take away my religion would be to tear out my heart."

page 23 If That Were Christ, Would You Give Him Your Blanket?

I met an Underground Orthodox priest from Russia. I asked him by whom he had been ordained He answered, "We were ten young men decided on entering the ministry. No regular Orthodox bishop would have ordained us, because they can do this only with the approval of the Communist authorities, who put unacceptable conditions. So we went to the tomb of a martyred bishop, and formed a circle round it, holding each other's hand. Two of us held the hands on the tombstone. We gave an oath of faithfulness, which we had found in an ancient book of Church history; "I take on myself scourgings, imprisonment, tortures, reproaches, crosses, blows, tribulations and all temptations of the world, which our Lord and Intercessor and the Universal and Apostolic holy Church took upon themselves and lovingly accepted. So even do I, an unworthy servant of Jesus Christ, with great love and ready will take upon myself all these until the hour of my death." Then we prayed that Jesus might ordain us with His pierced hands. We believe He did."

In my eyes, this ordination was valid.

Two women kneel on the steps of a warehouse in Russia. When asked why, one of them answers, "It is a former church. It is still sacred ground. When I kneel on the steps, I can hear the priest singing the praise of God in a loud voice. You'll say that here textiles are sold and that there is no priest. I don't believe you. I believe what I hear. I smell the incense. I see the images. The worship continues. Therefore I come every night"

Typical Russian mysticism, you will say. But why do you feel compelled to say something? Is it not better to refrain from any comment? You are on sacred ground. Who can define what is possible and impossible on holy ground?

page 24 If That Were Christ, Would You Give Him Your Blanket?

I am Romanian, not Russian. My former Lutheran church in Bucharest is now a studio for making movie-pictures. When I walked into the building after its desecration, there could be no shadow of doubt. The angels had not left it.

When the Cathedral St. Sophia was invaded by the troops of Mohammed the Second, the priest interrupted the Liturgy and disappeared behind a door, which has remained closed since then. The Christians then believed that when Constantinople becomes Christian again, this same priest will reappear and continue the Liturgy from the very place where he interrupted it. In the 15th century, the Christians were such children. There are still children who believe that this building which has been changed first into a mosque and then into a museum, will be a church again and that the priest mentioned will serve in it. The childlike minds who believe legends have become few. My mind is among these few.

In Russia there are Christians who wear iron chains under their shirts, day and night, so as never to forget their brethren who are in bonds.

I have brought you on to most holy ground. You have now lived scenes of the Underground Church oppressed by the Communists.

Poor Communists. They do not know the words of Tertullian, "To kill us means to multiply us. The blood of martyrs is the seed for new Christians." (What about sowing this seed also in the West by sharing in the Spirit the sufferings of martyrs?) Neither do the Communists know the words of St. Hilarius, "The Church triumphs when it is oppressed and progresses when it is despised."

page 25 If That Were Christ, Would You Give Him Your Blanket?

CHAPTER 2

Does the Underground Church Exist?

When, by publishing ~Tortured for Christ~, ~The Soviet Saints~, ~In God's Underground~ and other books and articles, I made known this wonderful world of Christian martyrdom and heroism, when I told this Church's story which, though real, sounds more fictitious than any novel, the response was huge. I gave up counting the letters of enthusiastic support, after they passed the figure of 300,000.

Christians simply know that they have now been told a truth which had been hidden from them. The human heart knows many things for which it does not need any proof. They knew Communism to be atheistic. They knew it to be a dictatorship

And in the free world, as well, Christians have around them atheists, or men who are practically godless, though they might profess some form of religion. Christians know from their own experience how tyrannical a boss, a husband or a parent can be if he does not fear the Creator. They know the resistance to the terrible pressure of the world in their own hearts. When they read about the fighters of the Underground

page 26 If That Were Christ, Would You Give Him Your Blanket?

Church who chose to die rather than compromise with the Red Dragon, they saw in their beautiful examples only a magnification under exceptional circumstances of what was best in themselves.

I received letters from some who had passed through prisons or who had worked with me in the Underground Church. A former prisoner wrote: "What you say is as true as the fact that two and two are four." A Romanian Lutheran pastor wrote: "We are whole-heartedly behind you."

But I had interesting letters from people who had quite different backgrounds. One of these came from among the Sikkim, in India, and encouraged us: "Warmed through your most timely message, I cannot help shedding tears for all you, dears. I hope that the message of the Underground Church will prepare God's children of the free world also to face such hardships in the coming day."

I quote from a letter from Sweden, "I heard you in a church in Stockholm. For many days afterwards, I could think or speak of nothing else than the Underground Church."

A pastor from Bombay states - "My colleagues have already been excited by the publications of your missions and many are telling about them to their own congregations. The demon of acquiescence to the torture of the brethren has suffered a defeat."

An American writes, "Please continue. The common people hear you gladly. Even if you just stir up some of us common people to prayer, you will have a very faithful ministry. Please, give our love to our brothers and sisters in the Communist countries."

Another voice from Scandinavia: "Do not give up. It is true that most of us sleep, but there are also those who suffer because of this laziness. There are 10,000 people in our congregation. At the most twenty-five come to our large church building on Sunday ... Sometimes, a hymn is being played, without a single person opening his mouth to sing ... I received the message of the Underground Church. It gave me a period of searching of my heart, good for me. I will read again everything which I receive from your mission and lend it to others, as often as I can. The ignorance about the Church in the East seems to be great in our country."

Another letter from India: "The night after reading about the martyrs, I could not sleep. I pray that many people have such sleepless nights and be aroused to prayer." In the same spirit is a letter from France: "The example of the Underground fighters whips us in a welcome manner. In it there is grace for all."

And now a Britisher: "I was not a Christian. I have never been a member of any Church and I have never lived a Christian life. But I read now about today's martyrs and cannot stop weeping. Now I understand the verse,

> When I survey the wondrous cross,
> On which the Prince of Glory died,
> My richest gain I count but loss
> And pour contempt on all my pride."

Innumerable writers show their thankfulness at having been made able for the first time to fulfil the Biblical commandment, "Weep with those who weep." Christians have received one of the finest gifts of the Holy Spirit, that of shedding tears for their suffering brethren.

A New Zealander: "The things which you describe may well be repeated in our land. I have faced this possibility and decided that I am ready to suffer with Jesus, as these beloved ones have done."

The opinion of an Englishman is, "The type of Christianity practised in the Red Camp is much needed in our country."

An Indian writes: "The only conclusion I am able to draw from the message of the Underground Church is: I wish I had suffered more for Christ." A letter from Nigeria, "You asked me about the best way to combat the Communist threat in my country. You have supplied already the best weapon: the examples of the heroes of the martyr church."

One letter from Ulster: "My congregation is very earthly. My sister and I have always felt contempt towards its cold services and the stale sermons which are quite often preached. The singing in our church is so dead and heartless, that it must be an insult to our Lord. But having read about Christians going to prison for singing Christian songs and continuing to sing like nightingales would do, even when they are in dungeons, I am determined with Christ's strength and guidance to change this, so that the western Church may be as soul-winning as the Underground Church in countries behind the Iron Curtain."

A Californian boy of fifteen writes that he challenged the kids in the junior high school group to give up their candy bars and malts and send money to get Bibles into Russia.

Top leaders of the churches of the free world received our message with love and opened to us their cathedrals to bring there the cry of those tortured for Christ.

But we met also some sceptics. These sceptics had not read a letter which I received by hidden channels from an officer of the Russian Secret Police: "I read all your books and am happy that these things were told. I know that some doubt your assertions. I would recommend to these people to come and sit in a Soviet prison ten years under my command. Then they would know the truth. The only thing in your book wherewith I do not agree is that you are so mild. I, in your place, would have thundered."

I am in the office of an important personality of the World Council of Churches.

"Your books and lectures have produced a big sensation. I take it for granted that you sincerely believe what you say, but objectively your assertions are untrue. There is no Underground Church. I have visited innumerable times Russia, Romania, and other Communist countries. I never saw the slightest trace of an Underground Church."

I asked, "Have you been also in China and Korea?" "No. My travels did not take me so far. But let us stop at Russia and Romania."

I refused. "No, I will not stop here. Supposing that my assertions are wrong and there is no Underground Church in the Soviet Union and the European satellite countries, you have won no point. Every fourth man is a Chinese. In China, for sure, not one single church is open. One million catholics, it is reported, have been killed. Proportionally, the same number of Protestants. The jails are full. Christians there practise their religion only underground, under the danger of torture and the death penalty. The same holds good for North Korea, Mongolia. ~Nendor~, organ of the Albanian Communist Party, announced officially in November 1968 the closure of all churches. Here you have four countries about which nobody can argue. The Church there can only be underground. It suffers. Instead of debating about Russia, why not organize better help for the Chinese martyr Church?"

He was a ruddy-cheeked man, but his face now became red altogether. He said decidedly, "Let us remain at the European countries." I knew that I had to yield.

Otherwise the discussion would have ceased. He was a bishop and I was not. He had to remain in the right.

"Naive people are easily impressed. And you have a gift. But I am no fool. I looked around well when I was in Russia. There is no Underground Church." I replied, "I have been five years in the West and have also looked around attentively. I never saw a Soviet spy. Would you say that it would be right for me to assert that there exist no such spy-rings? People who do an underground work never introduce themselves as such."

Now he walked round the room agitated. His new shoes squeaked. I remembered how in prison I had shared one pair of shoes with a former general. Each of us went to the exercises in the yard every second day.

The bishop said "Comparison n'est pas raison." (Comparison is no argument.) Underground Church is an expression with a very precise meaning. We don't live in the times of the catacombs any more. An Underground Church would have to have secret seminaries, secret printing-presses, secret services, Sunday schools and so on. Such things don't go unnoticed."

I had come to him well prepared. I took out from my bag ~Nauka i Religia~ (Science and Religion), the ominous atheistic magazine of the Soviet Union, dated May 1966. In it an article called "Podpole" (Underground) describes how a Christian with the name of Elisha created a secret seminary for young believers. It is deep in the endless Siberian woods, many miles from any house, and at a distance from the last village to which you could pass only through mire and jungle. There was the seminary - two houses. One for men and one for women. The Christians called this seminary ~The Academy in the Forest~. The atheistic magazine mocks the secretary of the organization of Communist youth of that district who had not the slightest idea of the existence of the seminary. But even the Christians knew about it only if they had something directly to do with the school. The rules of conspiracy were kept perfectly.

"So we have the first sign of a regular Underground Church: secret seminaries."

I took out a book proving the existence of underground printing-presses written by the Soviet author P. Savkin and entitled ~A Meeting in Hiding-Places~. It finishes by describing the arrest of Christians who have organized such a press.

I then produced a Russian New Testament printed secretly within the Soviet Union. So it is much more than a secret printing-press. They have a secret Bible Society.

My brother, who was my opponent said, "What you say seems factual, but is not when you take a closer look. We know about a small Baptist splinter group which did such things. Now this group has reunited with the official Church. It was a small, transitory thing. You have greatly exaggerated its importance."

I replied, "I am sorry to contradict you. The documents show clearly that The Academy in the Forest is Orthodox. Those arrested because of the printing-press mentioned in Savkin's book, are the Orthodox priest Pletkov and several Orthodox ladies. ~Anglican Digest~, one of the organs of the Episcopalian Church of the U.S.A., says that the Orthodox Underground Church of the Soviet Union has - brace yourself - forty-five million members. The Episcopalian Church of America collaborates in the World Council with the official churches of Russia. It would have no interest in exaggerating the role of the Underground Church.

"~Headway~ of January 1968, a magazine not noted for special sympathy with sectarians, says that the number of underground Baptists is four millions. If you add the Catholics, the Pentecostals and other groups, it appears that every fourth citizen of the Soviet Union has some ties with Underground Churches. It is not the question of a small Baptist splinter group."

I took out of my bag a pile of articles from the Soviet press and wished to show reports about secret meetings, secret Sunday schools for children. But he did not seem likely to melt like an icicle in the sunshine before my proofs.

Lenin has said that if there were important interests involved in denying that two and two are four, people would deny it. I remembered the hundreds of thousands of letters of support. People write that after having listened to the cry of the martyred Church they wept, they had sleepless nights. Others wish to be comfortable. They wish to sleep.

The bishop shook my hand. He told me, "I sympathize with you. I understand you have suffered much. This makes you emotional. We are used to thinking factually. A man who has passed through pains like yours cannot be objective any more. Facts do not count with you. It is all sentiment."

The door had opened already. The secretary announced the next visitor. When I closed the door behind me, it creaked. My last thought as I left him was, "They should have an oil-can and drop a little oil into the hinges." What thoughts pass sometimes through a human mind?

page 33 If That Were Christ, Would You Give Him Your Blanket?

CHAPTER 3

Facts! Only Documented Facts

The episodes of the life of the Underground Church may be beautiful and impressive. But we have to distinguish between beautiful legends and an impressive reality. I leave all my emotions on one side for a time and will give only facts as proved from unchallengeable sources. I cannot be quiet about them, not because of the accidents of my own destiny, which brought me into conflict with Communism, but because I love Jesus. It is written in MTT 24:31 that his angels shall gather his elect from the four winds. If the gospel will not be published in the Communist world, angels will find elect ones only in three winds and the word of the Master will not be fulfilled.

The Church in the Red Camp is persecuted. She needs our help. Therefore the facts of her martyrdom must be known. Even in seminaries you are taught about all kinds of churches, but never about the Underground Church, a Church existing in one third of the world. This anomaly must cease. Its existence, its suffering, its victory must be proclaimed.

~Sovietskaia Moldavia~ of the 11th of June 1968, under

page 34 If That Were Christ, Would You Give Him Your Blanket?

the heading "There exists no more open and disgusting lie than the Christian religion," describes a secret meeting of Baptists in Chishinau. Children keep an eye on the street, so that no stranger may interfere. Many of those who attend the meeting are young teenagers. The guilty man is Horev, who has passed already several times through prisons. He organizes such meetings, the article says. He spreads secret religious literature. Also charged with having organized a secret prayer-meeting in the woods, is the Christian S. Apostu.

~Pravda~ of the 19th of August 1969 describes a Baptist Underground Church in the town of Mozdok. Believers meet in an apartment with two bedrooms which are full.

The newspaper says, "During the service, people weep." This is one of the distinguishing features of the Underground Church. I don't remember ever seeing a religious service there without tears being shed. They don't ~enjoy~ their sermons, they suffer them. They share the sufferings of Christ, the sufferings of all who suffer. They weep for those in the West who have lost the precious gift of having a tender heart and the ability to weep with those who are persecuted.

~Pravda~ (don't forget, please, that this word means in Russia "The Truth") describes the secret baptism of three believers. The Christians went to baptism through dark streets, avoiding men. Now, why would they be fools to be baptized secretly if the Soviet Union has religious liberty, as we are told again and again?

The same article in ~Pravda~ calls the fact that Christians teach love towards enemies "treason." The article concludes by reporting the arrest of several Christians, among them a certain Cherviakov charged with having arranged a sort of Bible Summer School for children. Twelve boys and girls have been taught there the word of God. For this crime, Cherviakov works now in bitter winters in northern Siberia's slave labour camps, knee-deep in snow.

In the French Christian magazine ~Tant qu'il Fait Jour~ of November 1969, a Danish Christian describes his participation at an Underground Church meeting somewhere in the Soviet Union. He had the address of one of its members. Having succeeded in escaping from his hotel one evening, without attracting attention, he met in the comparative obscurity of the outskirts of the town a young girl who asked him in bad German if she could help him. He said the convened password. She asked him to follow her, going before him at a distance of some ten yards and pretending not to know him. She took him to a house where there were boys and girls between the ages of eighteen and twenty-five. These did not need to take narcotics for kicks. To follow Jesus on the way of the cross, to worship Him under danger of arrest and death, was thrill enough. Not to attract attention, one single candle illuminated the room. At the beginning nobody spoke. After a long time of silent prayer there followed a whispered Biblical lecture. Then, one after the other, at irregular intervals, the Christians disappeared into the night. But the night was not dark for them. They were the light of dark Russia.

~Zaria Vostoka~, a Caucasian Communist newspaper of March 1969, reports the arrest of Peter Restshuk and others for having organized a secret printing-press in Suhum.

I can describe such a printing-press, which I have seen myself. Imagine a small state grocery. Trucks discharging goods or taking back those which had remained unsold. Nobody would notice if ballots with paper were discharged or printed material put in boxes were taken out. In the cellar of the house was a well. It was on the outskirts of a primitive town. You don't find running water everywhere in the Communist Camp. A man was let down into the deep well by a rope. From the side wall of the well, above the level of the water, a tunnel led to a small room in which was the printing-press. Those who worked there had little air. Again and again they had to leave to take a breath. Such printing-presses are discovered. Others take their place. But ~The Herald of Salvation~ has appeared regularly for many years. It is the underground magazine of the Soviet Baptists.

It is not only the Baptists. The Soviet Union is mainly an Orthodox country. ~Sovietskaia Kirghizia~ of the 15th of November 1969 tells of the Orthodox monk Zosima who had been in prison already once for his faith. After having been released, he organized a church in his parlour and held its liturgies there. The church is the house of the Christian. So it was in New Testament times. It would be much more effective in the West, too, rather than the huge buildings which exist and that are sometimes empty as regards men and often empty of Spirit.

The Communists report about this monk that Christians spoke about him in the following terms, "The glory shines upon him," "God has given him a gift of speech like that of the Apostles," "He leads a righteous and blameless life."

The article uses the very expression "Underground Church" and it is the most adequate. I looked up in ~Webster's Dictionary of the English language~ what the word "underground" means, and found it to be a synonym of "secret." The church of monk Zosima was surely secret. Whoever wished to visit it had to have the recommendation of a trusted person and give the promise of silence, just like in the Academy in the Forest. Then you could enter the church from one street, the exit being in another. (The existence of such a church with two exits has saved my life in Nazi times.) Monk Zosima told the Christians to be as clever as serpents and righteous as doves, and, if asked, not to tell where they had been, but to invent some story.

I myself believe that St. Dominic was not mistaken when he wrote about a saintly hypocrisy. This does not mean that the end justifies the means. Just the contrary, the end to keep personal integrity and purity of heart does in no case justify the ugly means used for this purpose, which are to leave the world terrorized by the Communists without the gospel, which cannot be brought to them without using conspiratorial techniques. Moralists would call this hypocrisy, forgetting that it is immoral to leave the victims of tyrannies without the knowledge of Christ.

Zosima had also an underground workshop for the producing of candles. ~Sovietskaia Kirghizia~ says that many bought his secretly produced candles, which shows that there are places where there are no other possibilities of getting candles, considered as necessary for the religious services by our Orthodox brethren. The newspaper does not say what happened further to monk Zosima. But hundreds of other articles from the Soviet press justify the supposition that he must be in prison again.

More than all this. In the huge Soviet Union there exists a whole district populated only by Christians, a district about which Westerners know nothing. The world first heard about it from the Communist source ~Nauka i Religia~, issue of September 1968. It tells us about large numbers of old-ritual Orthodox who took refuge in an inaccessible district in the far north of Siberia. These Christians deny the whole Soviet reality, as centuries ago Protestants denied the then oppressive

Catholic reality and fled to America. Nauka t Religia says: "They are a mysterious, unbelievable, newly invented world. The women and men do not recognize the anti-Christian power, but they wish a righteous death as a step towards eternal life."

The atheistic magazine also gives several pictures taken in Siberia. Among others, it shows a copy of their Holy Scriptures. It has a great hole in the middle which has been caused by rats. They had nothing wherewith to replace it.

I myself am not an idolatrous worshipper of facts. Every man sees what he calls "the facts" according to a pre-existent image which hovers in his mind. It is not possible to establish facts, apart from the variety of opinions which arise when they are viewed from different standpoints. But my opponents wished facts. Here they have them.

page 39 If That Were Christ, Would You Give Him Your Blanket?

CHAPTER 4

Russia's Golgotha

Figures show that more Christians have been suffering persecution during the Communist period than at any time in history. In the Red Camp, those who have the longest road of Calvary behind them are the children of God in the Soviet Union.

The test of the veracity of any report about the state of religion in that country is if the martyrs of today are mentioned.

When Eban, minister of external affairs of Israel, came to Western Germany, his first visit was to Dachau, the place where his co-nationals and co-religionists had been exterminated. Should Christians not learn from Jews how to behave?

I know not of one single case of a Christian church leader who, visiting Russia or any other Communist country, would have gone to place a wreath of flowers on the tomb of a martyr or who has even asked to visit the Christians in jail. Yet ~Bratskii Vestnik~, the organ of the official Baptist Union of U.S.S.R., publishes that a delegation of Swedish Baptist preachers visited the mausoleum of Lenin, the murderer of millions of

page 40 If That Were Christ, Would You Give Him Your Blanket?

Christians, instead of going to the grave of one of his victims. In Germany, Eban would not have gone to honour the tomb of some Nazi war-criminal. Is not the Christian religion meant to teach a higher level of solidarity with the innocent victims than the Mosaic religion?

As for us, our hearts go out to the martyrs. Not that we pity them. Their chains are of pure gold. Their cross is perfumed. All those whose spiritual senses are alive know it. To Christians, prison has always been a delectable orchard where the sweetest nectar flows. Neither do we give to the sufferings of the martyrs an honour due only to the cross of Christ. Only to this cross apply the words of St. John Chrysostom, "The cross is the will of the Father, the honour of the Son, the joy of the Spirit, the jewel of angels, the assurance of the faithful, the glory of Paul. By the cross we know the gravity of sin and the greatness of God's love towards men." But the true knowledge of the state of Russia's Christianity will enlarge our minds and hearts and will help us to follow in the footsteps of Christ.

Russia! Its writer Tiutchev said, "You cannot comprehend her with your mind, you cannot measure it with any rod. She is an entity apart. You can only believe in Russia." I, from my side, do. I believe that she will yet find peace at the feet of Christ.

We love Russia. Jesus descended into hell. So we descend into Russia's hell. When Brother Andrew, the author of ~God's Smuggler~, made, in Norway, an appeal for Christian workers on behalf of Russia, two hundred volunteered at one meeting. The same thing happens now all over in the free world. Young Christians expose themselves to prison sentences, but they protest against the persecutions in Moscow itself, in public squares and shopping centres. There are now innumerable Christians of the free world who can use of themselves the words of a Russian underground poet, whose verses circulate in handwriting:

I bend to the head of thy bed;
You, Russia, wash your tears and pus with my blood.

The Russian martyrs are no longer alone in their fight.

There are now millions in free countries who weep with those who weep in the Soviet Union because of the closing of their beloved houses of God.

~Pravda~ of the 18th of April 1968 says that in the district of Vologodsk there are now only seventeen churches, where there existed eight hundred before the Communist take-over. Is this because people have ceased to believe? The answer is given in the same article, "The leaders of sects could increase their influence. Religion is not harmless in our days. It does not breathe its last as some believe, but somehow it has the tendency to go on, to attack."

It is not her fault if she has to attack from the underground, into which she has been driven because of the closure of churches in a time when she is increasing her influence. On the 8th of April 1968 ~Pravda~ reports the closing of 210 churches in the Odessa region.

But how do the churches fare which have remained open? They seem to be all right in Moscow, Leningrad and a few other places visited by foreign tourists. But how about the smaller towns and villages?

A secret communication of the Underground Church tells us that on the 10th of April 1969, during a Baptist religious service in Kopeisk, a group of atheists, led by a policeman, disturbed it. They put bottles of alcoholic beverages on the Communion table and photographed the people with the bottles. These pictures will be used for atheistic propaganda.

The assertion of the Underground Church is corroborated by official communications. In ~Science and Religion~ of November 1967, the Communists tell what happened in the licensed Baptist Church of the village Batiatitsh. The atheist lecturer Bilchenko entered the church on Sunday, pushed aside the pastor and delivered her blasphemous doctrines. Those who had come to worship had to swallow the praise of godlessness.

Foreigners and church leaders from the West are never present at church services where this kind of thing happens.

The Psalmist loved the house of God. So does every Christian. Next Sunday when you sit comfortably in your pew, remember Russia's churches changed into warehouses, museums, factories and dancing clubs. Out of 50,000 Orthodox churches before the Revolution, only 7,000 remained. Remember the churches who have to bear the mockeries.

But the temple of the Holy Spirit is the Christian himself. Against him the great fight is fought.

A letter signed by 180 young Christians, addressed to the Soviet Government and other oflicials, has been smuggled out of the U.S.S.R. It is dated the 13th of May 1969, and protests against the arrest of a great number of brethren. The youngest among them, E. Radoslavov, is only 19 years of age. (The oldest Christian prisoner about whom we know is Peter Popov. He is eighty years of age, the age of St. Polycarp, when he was thrown before lions.)

When this group of Baptists were arrested, in the school No. 61, the director Malamud told the children that the Baptists were sentenced because they had sacrificed to God a girl, by crucifying her. Therefore children and parents have to beware of the Baptists.

This was not the fancy of just one man. The State Publishing House of Leningrad published a book called Children and Religion. In it the Communists reiterate the old lie also used in times ago about the Jews, that Christians teach and practise ritual murder. Allegedly, Christians, to atone for their sins, kill their own children. The Roman persecutors had invented the story centunes ago. Now it has been unburied by the Bolsheviks to frighten the children and hinder them from becoming Christians.

Many Christians are sentenced today in the Soviet Union under the accusation of ritual murder. Just one example: in 1969 the Military Publishing House of Moscow issued a book by F. Dolgich and A. Kurantov, called ~We must not forget~. In it, pastor M. Krivolapov of the village Neftogorsk, district of Karaganda, is said "to have sacrificed to God as a lamb without blemish" the three-year-old boy of the Christian Oslovetz. He allegedly killed the child in the presence of its mother and of all the worshippers. None of the faithful ever tried to hinder the horrible crime. They considered that all this happened by the will of the Holy Spirit. The child is said to have been buried during the night in a forest. The young mother died for grief Such "facts" from Soviet publications are all lies, needless to say. Have Krivolapov and others like him been executed already for an uncommitted murder or are they in a death-row awaiting execution?

Even to be an ~official~ Baptist leader, licensed by the murderous Communist Government, does not necessarily save a person from persecution and years in state prisons.

~Sovietskaia Moldavia~ of the 13th of November 1969,

page 44 If That Were Christ, Would You Give Him Your Blanket?

describes the trial of such a pastor, Slobodchikov, in Chishinau. He was known in town to have denounced the underground leader Rudenko, who received ten years in jail because of him. Rudenko died as a consequence of the tortures he endured.

So Slobodchikov knew himself to be in good standing with the Communists and imagined he was exempt from danger. He therefore dared to use a microphone at a Baptist wedding and so, as the article puts it, "he committed the darkest of possible crimes." A few words about Christ slipped out of his lips while speaking with the children. The newspaper says that he should have taught them rather about Paul Morozov, a Soviet hero, a child of twelve, whose statue is in one of the parks of Moscow. The heroism of Morozov had consisted in the fact that he had denounced his own father for having taken some weed from the field formerly owned by him, but now the property of the collective farm. The father was sentenced to prison. The boy had been lynched by the population.

Well, Slobodchikov had committed two crimes. He had used a microphone and, instead of eulogizing a lad who had put his father in jail, had said good words about Christ who had been obedient to His parents. So Slobodchikov got two years in prison. In jail he might remember his victim, Rudenko, and repent.

The world press has announced the arrests of the Orthodox Talantov and Krasnov-Levitin. The charge against them is that they had protested at the lack of religious liberty in Russia, the closure of churches and the stupid burning of ikons. You can surely burn an image. But the knowledgeable Orthodox believer has never bowed before it. For him the image is transparent. He looks through the image to the holiness of Jesus, to the purity of Mary, to the courage of the martyrs painted on them. Burning images, you burn together with them many superstitious conceptions connected with them. But fire cannot burn those whose pictures have been on the images. Neither can you stamp out the love towards them in the hearts of Christians. The Christian on earth is one with Christ and with the glorified saints in heaven.

page 45 If That Were Christ, Would You Give Him Your Blanket?

The closing of churches, the jailing of Christians, the taking away of children - all this seems insufficient to Communists. An underground document tells how aged Orthodox nuns Morozova, Gherasimchuk, and Korolenko, had been raped at the monastery of Pochaev.
Tomakova was raped and killed. The writer, Galanski, who published this news in his secret periodical ~Phoenix~ (a mythical bird which resurrects from his ashes, which was used as symbol of the Saviour in the catacombs), went to prison for this.
The Moscow Publishing House issued a book ~Psychosis and Religion~. They say that arguments have failed to convince religious people. Christians must be considered as mentally sick and put into asylums for the insane. We now have brethren and sisters of the faith in strait-jackets and gagged. We know the location in the town Kalinin where this institution is.
All denominations are persecuted. The Lutheran World Federation had forgotten to inform us. We had to read in the novel ~This Happens More Rarely~ by the Communist M. Glinka, that the largest Lutheran Church in Leningrad had been converted into a swimming pool.
~Unirea~ of January 1969 reports about the sentencing of the Catholic Priest Potochniak in Lviv to five years' hard labour. ~Vysti iz Rymu~ of June 1969 announces the death in prison of the Catholic bishop Welyezkowich.

page 46 If That Were Christ, Would You Give Him Your Blanket?

Other sources say that he is still alive in jail. But in any case, the Catholics, too, are persecuted.
If it would not be for God, the spring of vitality in the Church of the Soviet Union would be unaccountable. It blossoms under persecution. It is the fastest growing Church in Europe.

page 47 If That Were Christ, Would You Give Him Your Blanket?

CHAPTER 5

How Many Christians are jailed in the Soviet Union?

The only true answer is that nobody knows.
~Free Trade Union News~, the organ of the American trade unions, a sound proletarian source, says in its issue of April 1968, that fifty-six concentration camps have been identified in the Soviet Union. The total number of prisoners is estimated at 1,150,000.

How many of them suffer for their faith in God? Try to guess the right figure yourself on the basis of the following data:

On the 8th of May 1969, ~Pravda Vostoka~ reports from the town of Angren the sentencing of eight Christians - Friezen, Schmidt, Walla and others. They received between two and five years for having plotted wickedly to spread diseases in the population by three means: taking holy communion from the same cup, being baptized in the same baptistry, and greeting each other with a holy kiss. (The Russian Christians have the biblical habit of kissing each other as often as they meet, and greeting each other with the words, "The peace of God be with you," instead of the ugly and nonsensical "Hallo" or "Hi" used by the Christians in the West. These are Bible-believing Christians. Could someone tell me where they have found a "Hallo" or "Hi" in the Bible? Did St. Paul greet his brethren like this?)

Well, this is Soviet justice. To go together with others to a swimming pool does not spread diseases: to be baptized with others does. Unholy kisses are immune. Only holy kisses transmit microbes. If you kiss in a holy manner, you may suffer five years in prison.

Only a month later, on the 12th of June 1969, the same newspaper announces the arrest of another fifteen people for their religious belief. These have committed the crime of going from home to home to call people to salvation. Among these fifteen is a certain Rabinchuk together with all his five sons. Stop a little and try to understand the grief of Mrs. Rabinchuk's heart. She lost on one day all the joy of her house.

So twenty-three men sentenced for their faith in the town of Angren during a single month. Twenty-three about whom we happen to know. There may be many more. We have no reason to believe that the anti-Christian terror in Angren would be fiercer than anywhere else. The Soviet Union has 5,092 towns. If in one town twenty-three go to prison for their beliefs in one month, how many Christian prisoners are there? Who knows what happens in the villages about which we never hear anything?

It is naive to reduce the problem of Christian prisoners in Russia to a couple of hundred Baptists. The Baptist prisoners themselves number more than that.

The Baptist Underground Church is not centralised and has no possibility of knowing what happens in the vast Soviet Union. There exist several Baptist underground groups working independently of one another.

In December 1969, the European Baptist Union announced with great joy that "the Initsiativniki," that is the underground Baptists of the U.S.S.R., had united with the official Church. But in the same month, on the 4th, ~Red Star~, the organ of the Soviet Army, announced the sentencing of a group of Baptist soldiers. Nobody knows how many, to what terms of imprisonment, under what charges. The names are not given. So much is said about them that "the Baptists have a fierce religion and do not pity their children. They do not kill them only because the law of the state does not permit it." In January 1970, after the "reunion" staged especially for foreign delegates, the whole underground activity continued, as well as its denunciation by the Soviet press.

There must be thousands of Baptists in prison. ~Kristeligt Dagbladet~, Copenhagen, of the 4th of March 1970, evaluates them at 10,000.

In my book ~The Soviet Saints~ I have provided many instances of sentencing of Pentecostals. In my hearing before the U.S. Congress Committee, I gave names of persecuted Seventh Day Adventists. Forty Catholic priests from Lithuania signed a protest, dated August 1969, against the sentencing to forced labour of Rev. M. Gylys and Rev. J. Sdepskis. Miss Paskeviciute, a Roman Catholic who had prepared children for their first confession, was also deported to a forced labour camp, where she died of over-exhaustion. But the great bulk of Christian prisoners are the Orthodox, these constituting the majority of the Soviet population.

The official Orthodox Church has a membership of fifty millions, according to the claim made by its delegation at the session of the World Council of Churches in New Delhi. The Orthodox underground is considered to have another forty-five millions. Then there exists the so-called True Orthodox Church and Old Ritual Orthodox. All these give huge numbers of prisoners.

Sometimes we read about them in the Soviet press. Some other news we have from underground documents. But the names of most of the martyrs are known by God alone. Then there are sufferers from all kinds of Christian sects which exist only in the Soviet Union as the Molokans, the Duhobortsi, the Murashevtzi and others.

The Underground Church is the most powerful anti-Communist force in the Soviet Union. It is also the most organized. If the figure of 1,150,000 political prisoners is correct, a big percentage must be the religious opponents, considered by the Communists as political criminals. The Communists themselves say again and again that religion is their No. 1 foe.

How many Christians are in prison in the Soviet Union? Nobody knows. Remember this, however: in one town twenty-three were sentenced during one single month. There are 5,092 towns and there are twelve months in a year.

Perhaps after these grim things we should smile a little, even if it will be a bitter smile.

~Moscow News~, the newspaper in English which appears in the capital of the Soviet Union, says in its issue of the 25th of October 1969, "All religious associations in the country (Baptists, Mennonites, Methodists, Adventists, Molokans, Pentecostals and even Jehovists) have the right freely to observe their rites at specially allotted premises." The newspaper did not say that the premises were prison cells.

Michel Zhidkov, one of the top leaders of the official Baptist Union of U.S.S.R., declared at the European Baptist Congress in August 1969 in Vienna that nobody is persecuted for his faith in his country. Michel Zhidkov's own father spent many years in Siberia because he had dared to believe in Christ contrary to the orders of the Communist dictators. Not one delegate booed Michel Zhidkov.

The Belgian magazine ~Panorama~ of the 9th of May 1969, publishes that one of the former heads of the Gestapo, Henrik Mueller, sought as a war-criminal, is now leader of Moscow's Communist Secret Police.

He has tortured Christians and Jews in times past in Hitler's name. He does the same job now in the name of Karl Marx's ideals. The important thing for him is to be able to torture.

  Men like him, and his genuine Communist comrades, do not feel it wrong to commit cruelties, just as we do not feel it cruel to peel potatoes. For Marxists, man is only matter. They do not believe in the existence of soul or spirit. We cut wood, we tear down houses, we hammer nails into walls. It is matter. We have no remorse. So, Communists do not pity their victims. For them, they are matter.

page 52 If That Were Christ, Would You Give Him Your Blanket?

CHAPTER 6

The Prison Regime

We could describe the regime in Soviet prisons from communications smuggled out by the Underground Church. But these might be considered as biased. So I prefer to allow a Communist to tell the story.
  Under Dubcek, there was a short respite in Czechoslovakia. You could tell some of the truth. At that time a certain Loebl, an old-time Communist, high-ranking official of the Ministry of Foreign Trade told the story how he has been tortured by his own comrades under Novotny, in a time when the Czech Secret Police was led by Russian specialists. Loebl's story, corroborated by writings of other Communists who have passed through the same ordeal (see Arthur London's ~The Confession~ and the book of Mrs. Slanski about her husband being hanged by his own comrades), will give us a picture of what our brethren have to endure in Soviet prisons and will give us the chance of fulfilling the commandment, "Remember them that are in bonds, as bound with them" (HEB 13:3).
  I quote from the Czech Communist magazine ~Reporter~ of the 15th of May 1968. Loebl writes that

page 53 If That Were Christ, Would You Give Him Your Blanket?

during the interrogations, which lasted an average of sixteen hours a day, he was not allowed to sit. He had to stand or march sixteen hours a day, day after day. All the time he was hungry. After a fortnight, his feet were swollen, every inch of his body ached at the slightest touch. Sometimes he had to stand for a whole day with his face to the wall. Even the latrines were of the stand-up type.

Loebl was drugged. So was I. So are Christian prisoners in the Soviet Union. "All of a sudden I would feel as if someone were trying to push his hand into my head. It was a sensation similar to that which one has after laughing-gas has been administered as an anaesthetic ... I heard from other prisoners, who had to do the cleaning at the prison hospitals, that they had found empty bottles of narcotics, which were put into the soup served to prisoners.

"In addition to classical beatings, there were ice-cold showers, the crushing of genitals or the victim's head was wrapped in a wet cloth and when this cloth dried and shrank it caused unbearable pain ... I was no longer a person."

During this short respite in Czechoslovakia we heard what is happening continually in the Soviet camp but remains untold. The Czech Communist newspaper ~Kulturny Zhivot~ of the 31st of May 1968 reads: "The church as a whole has been in prison since 1950 ... In jails, guards fired from the observation towers into the cells. Dogs without muzzles were led into the prison hospital, the inmates were beaten on their heads with horse-whips and sprayed with water from hoses. The investigators yelled, "We do not recognize any humanitarianism." Many of the inmates suffered internal injuries. Some, for example Hermanovsky, a very young man, became insane from the torture. In one of the transports was also the seventy-five-year-old bishop Vojtassak. They stripped him naked and he had to stand for several hours on the stone floor. When he could not continue the squatting exercises, they yelled at him, "squat, until you spit blood, you ..."

At that time, the late professor of theology, Hromadka, Czech himself, was touring through all the continents for the World Council of Churches telling of religious liberty.

Don't read only the story of these tortures. But feel them as if you are being tortured, because in reality it is you. All Christians are one soul and one heart. They constitute the mystical body of Jesus Christ. When one member suffers, all the members suffer together with him. Never would a mouth say, "I don't care. It's not me, it is the tooth or the stomach which aches." It would rather say, "I have pains," and all the members would collaborate to evince or ease the pain.

With a hard look in his eyes, with a face which had grown grey from care, a leading personality of the German Lutheran Church warned me: "No point in publicizing such facts. It will only make things to become worse." My hands began to quiver, and I said with vehemence, "It was centuries ago that the Chinese might have refused to rescue a drowning man for fear of antagonizing the water demons. Such a mentality is obsolete in the twentieth century. Crocodiles do not eat men because zoologists have upset them by writing about their voracity, but because it is in their character. Russian Communists began with torturing Christians when I was the age of nine. They will continue to do it, and even grow in ruthlessness, because this is their teaching, not because I protest against the terror and organize relief for those persecuted."

page 55 If That Were Christ, Would You Give Him Your Blanket?

CHAPTER 7

Red China

An ingenious person has estimated that if a man stood by a roadside and watched the whole people of China walk past him at the rate of one individual per second, more than twenty years would elapse before the last member of the procession went by. But in this huge and steadily increasing crowd, very few would be Christians.

Even before the Communist take-over, there was in China only one Christian to 475 non-Christians. We must be aware of the quantitative insignificance of missionary work. Ten per cent of the population of the world are English-speaking. They have ninety per cent of the preachers and pastors. Only ten per cent of the preachers work among the ninety per cent of those who have committed the sin of being non-English-speaking and belong therefore to the spiritually under-developed peoples. As far as I know, Norway and Northern Ireland are the exceptions, and the missionary effort of churches in other western countries is minimal. From the immeasurable incomes of the churches of the U.S.A. only six per cent is used for charitable and missionary purposes. We have not fulfilled the great commission, "Go and teach all nations.

In China, the Christians have always been a small minority.

And now the Christians had to face the onslaught of a new religion, "the Mao worship." Giant Mao statues began going up throughout the length and breadth of China. Millions were mesmerized by the method of brainwashing brought to its final perfection.

Many of the influential Christian leaders had not realized the danger of Communism. Some had sympathized with it. Others would confine themselves to what they understood to be a pure Gospel, not mentioning the Communist menace because this would mean becoming involved in politics. But when Communist politicians enter in the sphere of religion, introducing there their poison or persecuting the children of God, politics is forced upon us. It cannot and should not be avoided. Who thinks that he can separate religion from politics, knows neither religion nor politics.

Just mark in your Bible all the parts which have political connotations. You will find they are seventy per cent of Scriptures. The formation of a nation, the freeing of slaves, minute laws regulating state life, rules of judges and kings, prophets expressing their thoughts about big empires and nations surrounding the Jews, "Render to Caesar," "be submissive to authority," but also the description of these authorities as wild beasts in Daniel and Revelation, all these and many other parts of the Bible are political. Christians must speak out on political questions, only without distorting politics with personal greed or national ambitions.

In any case, the Chinese Christians were unprepared for the onslaught. When the Communists took over China, Communism had ruled Russia already thirty years. Nothing was taught in Chinese churches and seminaries about the experiences and methods of work of the Underground Church. The examples of the Russian martyrs were not known.

No bells ring any more on the mainland of China under Communist occupation. All the churches have been closed and desecrated. You can see on them the inscription, "Hang God," which is also shouted as a slogan at their parades.

An eye-witness who escaped to Hong Kong reports about the stoning to death of a Christian girl in a Communist slave-labour camp. She was bound hand and foot, and made to kneel in the centre of a circle of people who were commanded to stone her. Those who refused to participate were shot. The eye-witness says that she died with her face shining, like St. Stephen. At least one of those who saw her was led to faith in Christ through that girl who sealed her testimony with her blood.

Five students who were sent out to dig deep holes into which they were then placed, sang Christian hymns as they were buried alive.

~Vart Land~ of the 11th of February 1969 reports how a pastor from the district of Swatow had been dragged through the streets with a dunce's cap on his head. The cap had ugly inscriptions on it. Faithful pastors would be led, with shaved heads, in mocking processions, exposed to revilings. But these pastors continued to gather their flocks in small groups, usually not larger than four to ten people.

Christians have to kneel in the streets. They are spat upon. With some, their hair was cut, leaving them with only a cross as a mark that they are Christians.

The most minute descriptions of the tortures inflicted upon Christians have been given by their Russian comrades, upset against them for a while. A thief whom I knew in prison had very high moral principles! He told me once that he condemned decidedly and considered as unethical, any theft committed by somebody other than himself. That is how the Russian Communists think. They demand the monopoly of directing the torturing of innocents in the whole world. The Chinese Communists, not being obedient in this, are denounced now for their cruelty, learned in the Soviet Union, by ~Literaturnaia Gazeta~, a Moscow magazine (quoted in ~Russkaia Jizn~ of the 18th of June 1969).

During one torture called "the small criticism," the man is paraded through the street having a dunce's cap on his head, with an inscription on his breast listing the charges against him. This continues for three consecutive days. After parades, he is put to fulfil the dirtiest and heaviest work. He receives food only once a day, but before receiving the food he has to bow ninety times to the earth, before the portrait of Mao.

If this treatment does not re-educate him, then follows the "big criticism." With hands tied behind his back, he has to attend daily meetings for two months. At these meetings his sin of not believing in Mao is exposed. He is ruthlessly beaten and spat upon. After every meeting, again the respectful ninety bows before the picture of Mao.

The third torture is called "airplane." A rod is put upon the man's shoulders. The hands, tied to the back are strung upwards towards this rod, until they are out of joint. In this position he has to bow 180 times before the one who is better than all gods.

During the torture called the "Golden Scale," on the shoulders of the guilty one a heavy desk is placed. On each side of the desk the Red Guards put three bricks. With the bricks on his shoulders, he has to stand at attention before the picture of Mao for two hours. Everv twenty minutes, a brick is added on each side. In the end he has eighteen bricks to bear. Woe to him if they move. If he bows his knees even a little bit, the whole torture begins again.

Another torture is to shave the heads of Christians and to put ashes on them. So they must stand at attention before the sacred ikon of Mao. No moving is allowed.

A Christian bore all the humiliations, but refused to bow answering again and again, "I know one single thing: there is a God. Apart from this, I know nothing." (He had not read the "God-is-dead" theologians.) He answered again and again, "Do with me whatever you like, but I will not deny my faith." Brave Sung-Fu. We do not know his end.

Christians were obliged to hand over their Scriptures and religious books in order that they should be burned publicly. To some their own hearts told them, others had learned it from church history, that in the early centuries whoever handed a Scripture to the persecutors was expelled from the Church for ever.

Christ is the Word of the living Father. So are the Scriptures. To give the Scriptures to be burned is like giving Christ to be killed. There were Christians who realized the respect due to the written word of God. They hid the Bible. ~Asian News Report~ of March 1968 says: "In Canton, a Christian lady who had hidden her Bible in a pillow was subjected by the Red Guards to the grossest humiliation. She was stripped naked, smeared all over with honey and made to stand in the fierce sun for many hours."

Parcels from abroad containing Bibles, are returned with a slip stating that its teaching is "against the law and morality of the People's Republic of China."

To possess a Bible is to be in deadly danger. A brother who had been sent there from the West to help, was taken by a Chinese Christian into his room. He closed the shutters to be sure nobody saw from the outside. Then he removed some boards from the floor. There he kept a Bible and hymnal. When he was sure he was not observed, he would take them out and read them.

The well-known book by the German Christian Rittling, entitled ~Red or Dead~, states that Red Guards are burning men with red-hot pokers. There have been cases of crucifixion. But the same report states that sometimes Communists preferred to be jailed instead of continuing to be torturers of Christians. One of them was overheard saying, "If we cut their tongues and forbid the Christians speech, they love with their hands, with their feet and with their eyes, they love always and everywhere until their last respiration. Does nobody know how to take out the power of love from these stupid Christians? Does nobody know a way to put hands on their Christ?"

CHAPTER 8

The Christian Church at Midnight

A refugee in Hong Kong tells that in a little Christian cell-group of the commune where he was made to engage in forced labour, they would meet together in the very early morning in a basement, before they went to work. If they were not able to meet together, they would join two by two in the early hours, as they walked to work and, on the pretext of being engaged in conversation, they would quietly quote Scripture verses to each other. How well it is for those who have gathered a treasury from the word of God in their hearts!

This little cell group was discovered by the Communists. The refugee and his friend were put in prison. His friend died there.

Chinese prisons are real hells: dirty, humid, cold and full of insects. It is considered that some forty thousand Protestants are today in prison. The number of Catholics must be higher.

But the dirty cells are the setting for episodes of heavenly beauty.

Two Christians trembled from cold in a cell. Each had a the blanket. One of the Christians noticed how the other trembled, and the thought shot into his mind, "If that were Christ, would you give him your blanket?" Of course he would. He immediately spread the blanket over his brother.

Next day they were given more blankets.

The Christian prisoners have to pass through brainwashing. Communist indoctrinators visit them regularly while they are sitting in the yard of the prison.

One Christian, when the Communist tried to convert him to his beliefs, wrote on the sand the Chinese characters for righteousness. The Chinese letters are painted rather than written. The ideogram for "righteousness" in Chinese is showing a lamb over the personal pronoun "I." The Christian asked the Communist, "Could you tell me what this character means?" He answered correctly, "Righteousness." Then the Christian pointed to the lamb over the I and quoted from the New Testament, "Behold, the Lamb of God which takes away the sins of the world," the Lamb of God which covers the sinful "I." The Communist indoctrinator walked out silently. He might have had a Christian background himself.

Two Christians were led towards torture and death. "It is finished now," said one in a whisper. His brother answered, "No, this is not what Jesus said when He suffered. His words were 'It is accomplished.'"

By His cross Jesus redeemed mankind. In order to bring souls to salvation made possible by the Redeemer, others must be ready to bear crosses. Our Chinese brothers and sisters, when enduring water being forced up their noses, pieces of wood put between the knuckles and compressed tightly, severe electric shocks and even crucifixion, they share the sufferings of Jesus for the salvation of mankind.

page 63 If That Were Christ, Would You Give Him Your Blanket?

Not only the heroes of faith suffer. China's Church had not only faithful, but also treacherous leaders. No wonder. The first band of apostles had a Judas. These traitors had collaborated with the Communists from the first, leading astray the rank-and-file believers and making 278,000 to sign the Communist manifesto.

Communists love treason, but not the traitor. After having used them, the Reds sent the traitors to sit in prison together with the faithful Christians whom they had denounced. They now have time for reflection in their dirty cell. What is better? Compromise with the tyrants or purity of soul?

Many pastors committed suicide out of fear of betraying secrets of the Underground Church in some moment of weakness. We know also Christian laymen who did the same.

Others went mad, for example, Rev. Beda Tsang, who repeated continually, "Tsang Beda, 47 years of age. Tsang Beda, 47 years of age." He was deprived of sleep until he died.

Some told me, "I could not bear to read your books to the end. They give you sleepless nights." This is just what I aimed at. I wished you to find fellowship with those to whom sleep is denied. I have known a prisoner to whom sleep was denied twenty-five days and nights.

China had 6,000 missionaries before the Communist take-over. Now they have not a single one. Some missionary agencies make big plans for an uncertain future when the doors of China may open. No, I am for breaking down the doors. We cannot allow millions of Chinese to die without the knowledge of Christ in the hope that in a future generation others will die saved. God tore in two the veil in the temple of Jerusalem. Why not tear the Bamboo Curtain? Why not penetrate with the Gospel into Red China secretly, risking imprisonment and death? The multitude of missionaries who died in China during the Boxer rebellion and the martyrs of Communist times, now glorified saints in heaven, call us to follow their example.

page 64 If That Were Christ, Would You Give Him Your Blanket?

CHAPTER 9

Romania: A Liberal Communist Country

I had a whole committee of church leaders before me.

"Your fault, Mr. Wurmbrand," said one of them, "is that you mix up things. You put all Communists in the same pot. I admit that things are very bad in Red China (that is what the Chinese Christians have from his side: an admission of the tortures they endure. And what a rich church this interlocutor of mine represented!). Things could be better in Russia, too. But I have just returned from Romania. You cannot contest the full liberty there."

Pleased with himself, he looked around to his colleagues. Then he stretched out his hand towards me: "Would you contest?" From some hands power emanates: none emanated from this.

About Romania, the opinion seems to be unanimous. The Pope, the World Council of Churches, the Bible Society, the Lutheran World Federation, the Baptist Union - what a unity of opinion. In praising the liberty of religion under the Romanian Communists even Pentecostal leaders agree with the Pope.

They all have a virtue which I don't have - candour.

A candour which makes them see geese as swans.

In January 1968, the Pope received the Prime Minister of Romania and the Minister of External Affairs, Mr. Manescu. At that time, some 1,200 Greek Catholic churches had been stolen. They were not given back after this visit. All the Greek Catholic bishops except one had died in prison. ~Unirea~ of June 1969 reports that Romanian Greek Catholic priests and laymen have received a total of five thousand years of imprisonment. All their schools and philanthropical institutions had been confiscated. The Pope shook hands with the murderers of his flock. Blessed is he if he used the opportunity of this visit to call them to Christ.

After this visit, from the five dioceses of the Roman Catholic Church, the situation continued that only one had a titular bishop. The Roman Catholic bishops had also died under tortures. The one surviving, Marton Aron, is not allowed even to visit his priests.

He could not attend the Council of Bishops in Rome, but when foreigners were gathered for the anniversary of 250 years since the building of a famous monastery, he was led by force and under threat was compelled to be present.

A Western bishop who visited Romania published a report in his diocesan magazine. In his article the word "dinner" occurs six times, the word "luncheon" five times, and once the word "breakfast." (This has nothing to do with the etymology of the word. There has been no fasting. What he ate did not break a time during which he would have fasted.) Not once does the word "martyr" appear. His fellow-bishops had been martyred. Now the Western bishop has eaten at table with their executioner, Dogaru, and he praises the dinners. They had been really good.

There appear in Romania religious and patriotic magazines, which have only one defect: nobody sees them in Romania. They are for foreign use only. If anyone does not believe this, let him ask at a kiosk in Bucharest for ~Glasul Patriei~ (Voice of Fatherland). He'll not obtain it. But you can get it easily everywhere in the West and so be persuaded what good magazines appear in Romania.

In one issue Father Staniloaie praises greatly the religious liberty in Romania. He himself has been in prison for five years, together with me. He writes under compulsion.

I was interrupted. The one who did so, a short, bald man, with light eyes, told me in all sincerity, "There have been bad things in the past. But Ceaushescu has changed."

I replied, "And where are T. Dumitrache, Iorgu Stavar, Elena Sincai? They were arrested at Christmas 1968 having committed the crime of demonstrating on the street demanding religious liberty. Since then they have disappeared. There exists fears that they may have succumbed to the harsh prison regime." (~Bire~ of the 1st of December 1969.)

The Romanian Communists lie just like the others. They have asked American Baptists and Pentecostalists to give dollars, for which they will build churches of these denominations. But why give dollars for this? Two-thirds of the Romanian-speaking Baptists, Pentecostalists, Brethren and Adventist Churches have been closed and the buildings confiscated. Why not restore and re-open these?

The aim of Romanian Communists is the same as that of Leninists all over the world: the destruction of religion. ~Romania~ of the 5th of June 1969 announced that Mihai Gere, one of the Communist Party secretaries, speaking at a meeting of the National Council of "Pioneers," the Red Children organization, said that the political education of the pioneeers was inadequate, because there was insufficient emphasis on atheistic and anti-religious orientation.

Romania a country of religious liberty? The Bible Society is forbidden. The same is true of the Y.M.C.A., the Salvation Army (called there, "Army of the Lord"), the Church of the Nazarenes, and many other organizations.

Nobody is allowed to be a Baptist, or Pentecostalist, or Adventist preacher without the licence of the Government, which is given only if the Communists are sure that you will preach as they permit. Believers' baptisms must be authorized by the Commissioner of the Government. He authorizes an average of twenty-five per cent of the requested baptisms. So there exists the practice of secret baptisms, made during the hours of darkness. Those who are caught are sentenced.

In January 1970 we received the news of the sentencing of the Baptist deacons - Gheorghe Potoc of the village Leasa, Lupei Vasile of the village Bontesti, Popa Ioan from Sic and Florea from Suseni - for the crime of having baptized illegally.

To protect others from being arrested, Christians often turn to self-baptism. They go alone to a river and submerge in the water after having said, "I baptize myself in the name of the Father, the Son and the Holy Ghost."

From 165 Baptist pastors the licence to preach has been withdrawn. The number of Orthodox monasteries has been reduced from 182 to seventy-four; the number of monks and nuns from 6,097 to around 2,000. There are in Romania 800 Greek Catholic priests who are not allowed to fulfil their vocation because they did not comply with Communist orders.

page 69 If That Were Christ, Would You Give Him Your Blanket?

CHAPTER 10

The Absolute Torture

A government cannot be judged only according to what it does now. We must have in view also what it has experimented with, its future purpose and what it is prepared to do. The government of the Soviet Union wages no war. But it has experimented with the nuclear bomb and stockpiles it. So do other governments.

In the same way, whoever wishes to judge the religious situation in Romania must remember that members of its government, or of the Central Committee of the Party in power now include Ceaushescu, Maurer, Manescu and Bodnaras, among others.

Romania was the laboratory for experimenting in the perfect torture which breaks the power of will.

The big innovation of Russian and Chinese Communists has been the application of Pavlov's brain-washing technique to the re-education of prisoners. The results have been astonishing. Remember only what an enormous percentage of American prisoners of war in Korea became collaborators with the Communists. Remember the Bolsheviks like Zinoviev, Kamenev, page 69 If That Were Christ, Would You Give Him Your Blanket?

Bukharin, confessing to crimes they had not committed, and pathetically demanding that death sentences should be passed upon them. Remember Cardinal Mindszenty confessing that he had been a spy and a black marketeer.

But Pavlov's method, the result of many experiments on dogs, is not perfect, because men are not like dogs. You can create conditioned reflexes in men, but here you will encounter also resistance to the forming of these reflexes. I myself have been subjected to brainwashing techniques for nearly three years and my brain still remained in a state which the Communists would consider dirty.

To brainwashing you can oppose heartwashing. While the brainwashing indoctrinator talks without much conviction what is commanded of him, you can repeat to yourself silently but endlessly some short proposition, always the same, in the contrary direction. When the brainwashers said, "Christianity is dead," I repeated to myself again and again, "Christ is alive."

But Romania has been the place of tortures which can break any power of resistance.

Christians could bear beatings on genitals, being strung to ropes, standing on tiptoes for hours, the tying of hands and feet behind the back and hoisting the victim into the air, the slamming of fingers in a door, etc., when these things were done by the Communist foe.

The Romanian Communists invented the torturing of Christians and patriots ~by their fellow-prisoners~. A Communist officer would finish torturing after a couple of hours. With the fellow-prisoners you were in the same cell day and night. This torture never ended. Secondly, from a Communist you did not expect anything else than ordeals. But it was terrible to see a fellow-Christian, with whom you had taken Communion earlier, or with whom you had worked in a patriotic organization, finding now delight in torturing you in a most refined manner. He has been corrupted and forced to do this by promises that he will be released, by threats, or by having himself first passed through torments in which he proved weak. The refinement of cruelty consisted in the fact that the Christians corrupted by the Reds would first pray with you who were completely unaware that they had become Communist tools, or they would speak about the Gospel and at a certain signal jump at you to inflict terrible ordeals.

When I came out from Romania, I had reservations. I did not say everything that happened in Romanian prisons. I had not witnesses to prove my assertions which would have seemed unbelievable. Therefore I did not describe all the suffering and nightmares. Now I have the testimonies.

Mr. D. Bacu and Ion Cirja, former fellow-prisoners, have published books about the perfect torture by the Communists in our country. Unfortunately, these books are available only in Romanian.

I quote from the book of Mr. Bacu, called ~Piteshti~, which is the name of a Romanian town, with a famous prison. The very name of the town comes from the Slavic word ~pitka~, which means "torture." What predestination there is in names sometimes! The things which he describes have happened just the same also in other jails. Remember these tortures were practised not by Communists (though under Communist guidance), but Christians tortured Christians, patriots tortured patriots.

"We had to scrub the floors while two or three other prisoners rode on us ... We were obliged to eat like the swines. We had to kneel, with the hands handcuffed to the back, lapping the hot soup from the dish. At noon, bread was thrown before you, which you had to eat in the same position, using only the mouth. The last crumb had to be gathered from the floor with the lips or tongue. The whole day you had to sit at the bedside with the feet stretched out, with your hands on the knees, head up, looking straight forward without the right to move. After sixteen hours of such torture, you were allowed to sleep, but only on your back, the face upwards, the body perfectly stretched, with the hands over the blanket. If you changed your position you were hit powerfully with a stick by the one who watched.

Sixteen prisoners were put one over another. Under the pressure of this weight, the muscles of the abdomen of the last yielded. He made in the cell what he was not allowed to do in the toilet. He was compelled to cleanse his undertrousers with his tongue. He refused first. His fingers were bruised between two pieces of wood. In the end ... The student A.O. was compelled to fulfil his necessities in his dish, then to receive the food in the same dish and to eat. The student N.V., not succeeding to cut his veins, threw his head in the bucket with hot food, hoping to die. He did not die. (Christians trying to commit suicide! What a nice subject of moral indignation in the free world, from the side of those who eat apple pies!) Some tried to tear up their veins with their teeth.

It was forbidden to hit in the temples, in the region of the heart, in the neck, wherever death might follow. They did not wish physical death ... They made a devilish experiment: the death of the soul, > putting in its place conditioned reflexes. Not physical, but moral death.

>
> At Easter, they clothed a prisoner in sheets, he having to play the role of Jesus Christ. Out of soap they made a genital organ, which the theological student, the would-be Christ, had to wear on his chest instead of the cross. He had to walk around the room, beaten with sticks - the road to Golgotha. Other Christians had to bow before him, to kiss this genital organ and say, "I bow before your Almightiness." There was only one who did not accept to descend to such blasphemy. He was tortured for hours."

I have told in my book ~In God's Underground~ what happened to an Armenian Catholic priest who was compelled to say the Holy Mass over excrements and urine. I did not venture to say everything then. Now that it has been said by others, I can add: those who compelled him to do this were corrupted fellow-Christians who previously had confessed to him, prayed with him, who had been instructed to play their role perfectly. When he relied on them as being his flock, they tortured him until he became half-mad and did whatever he was commanded. May I add, that after being released from prison, he confessed his sin to another priest. This was reported to the hierarchy and as a result he was excommunicated. I consider that the church leaders of the West who did not move a finger to help us should have been excommunicated instead.

I have known an Adventist farmer whose toes were cut off by his former fellow-Christians, slowly, with intervals. The cutting was done bit by bit and lasted for weeks.

Later on, some of these corrupted Christians had terrible excesses of remorse. My former fellow-prisoner, Ion Carja, tells the story of one who threw himself head down to the shoulders in a big bucket of faeces and urine. With the dregs on his face, he cried, "Don't wash me. So I wish to remain. What I have on my face is nothing. My soul is dirtier." He had tortured to death his brethren in the faith. I will not tell you how far I went to transpose myself into the situation of this poor, precious soul, beloved by Christ, which has gone astray. But I could identify myself with him, to feel his dirt as mine, his guilt as mine, to be sure that I am not a little bit better than he. That is what Christ did when He took our guilt upon Himself.

To take upon yourself the sins of others is essential.

Jesus says to His adversaries, "Upon you may come all the righteous blood shed upon the earth, from the blood of righteous Abel ..." (MTT 23:35). Now, of one crime the Pharisees were surely not guilty. They had no part in the slaying of Abel. There were neither Jews, nor Pharisees at that time. How can Jesus call them to account for the blood of Abel? Why does Jesus in the same discourse say, "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets ..."? (MTT 23:37). Nowhere is it written in the Bible that any prophet had been killed in Jerusalem. Neither does profane history report such a happening.

There is sense in it. Who does not learn to consider the guilt of others, of people completely foreign to him, even people belonging to past generations, as his own, will never be able to grasp deeply as his own the righteousness of somebody else.

If I don't learn to see myself in every other man, if I cannot identify myself with Cain, the murderer of thousands of years ago, and see my hands stained with the blood shed by him, how will I grasp deeply that Jesus is my real self and that His sacrifice, which also happened a long time ago, is my righteousness, how will I learn this identification with Christ?

It is the daily practice of Christians wherever they meet sin and crime to appropriate them, to feel them as their own.

I was able to show that man when he quietened down that Christ had besmeared Himself with mire, that He allowed Himself to be treated as dung, to expiate even the crime of torturing fellow-Christians. To think that I will be able to see in heaven as a beautiful, glorious saint, clothed in white, the man who had felt this mad impulse to throw himself into excrement, this is really exhilarating.

But let us not deceive ourselves. Cases of remorse and the recovering of Christians who have gone to the extreme of torturing their fellow-Christians, and this in the service of atheists, have been extremely rare. In ninety-nine per cent of these cases their hearts were hardened for ever. Who knows if there does not exist a point beyond possibility of return?

Just study ~Psychopolitics~, the book of Lavrentii Beria, former Minister of Interior Affairs of the Soviet Union, and you will see how scientifically the Communists have thought all this out.

Lenin had passed nights with Professor Pavlov to learn how his experiments of forming conditioned reflexes in dogs could be applied to men. They can be applied. Men, like dogs, can be brought to what is called in reflexeology, the ultra-paradoxical behaviour, to lick the hand of the one who beats him, and to bite the hand of the one who feeds him. Necessary for this are nervous exhaustion through sleeplessness, lack of food, humiliations, refined tortures, prolonged detention in darkness, or with a blinding light, etc. With men, one thing more had to be added in order to obtain perfect results. The cruelties must be inflicted by those whom you love most and in whom you trusted.

Those who have not studied Pavlov, and the Soviet policy based on his theories, or have not experienced them personally, will always be a dupe of the Communists. Metropolitan Manuil Lemeshevski of Russia has passed twenty-seven years in prison. After this, he broke down. He became a member of the Soviet-controlled Orthodox hierarchy whose work consists on serving and flattering the regime which had made him to suffer so cruelly.

Monsignor Augustin, the real head of the Roman Catholic Church in Romania has passed through prisons. I was with him. His love and faith shone until a certain moment. Then he cracked. Can the Communists now rely fully on him?

It is interesting to see with what confidence the Romanian Communists have sent Orthodox priests, who have been in jail together with me, who have been beaten, treated with electric shocks, sentenced to long terms, to make their propaganda in the U.S.A. and in France. They travel now around the world praising the liberties under Communism. They don't defect. By the Pavlovian system they have been changed into neurotics with ultra-paradoxical behaviour. Their reaction to the stick is no more abhorrence, but loyalty. They are faithful to those who have beaten them. At a certain stage, those who are made to drink urine in prison would no more recoil from it, but beg during the night, "Give me more urine." A Romanian Orthodox priest, Anania, who has suffered much in Communist prisons, now in the U.S.A., is loyal to the Red-controlled Patriarchy.

This belongs to the world of madness, but it is a madness scientifically produced and entertained.

page 77 If That Were Christ, Would You Give Him Your Blanket?

A Western church leader has before him some Russian or Romanian Baptist or Orthodox leader. He is fully assured that this man has many years of Communist prison behind him. How can this Westerner be convinced that this man is not a reliable Christian, but a lackey of Communism? First of all he would have to study reflexeology and Communist psychopolitics. But what Western Church leader has studied Communism? In what seminaries is it taught under this aspect, even though Communism rules one-third of the world?

To whom should we tell that young men trained to become officers of the Secret Police have to desecrate in an obscene manner the image of the Holy Virgin? It makes them ruthless torturers of Christians.

I was told that never will a Western publisher publish such gruesome things, and that Westerners would not read it. Well, we will have to circulate this information in handwriting, as the Bible circulates in handwriting in Russia. But the Christians of the free world must know all these things, and in detail, because it might be their future fate. I will not tailor what I have to say, I will not trim my thought in order to ensure it will be published.

From hundreds of prisoners in Piteshti, some detained there for their Christian beliefs, others for patriotic activities, three succeeded in committing suicide. Two kept their faith undefiled. All the others denied their beliefs, divulged secrets, denounced even their parents, became, in their turn, torturers of other prisoners. The experiment has succeeded.

Ceaushescu and Kosygin and Tito and Ulbricht know now how to do it. Blasts with nuclear power have been made. Today, the big powers only stockpile nuclear bombs. But they are piled with the purpose of using them in the future. The same is true here. A terrific experiment has been made in Romania, unequalled in the history of tortures. It was not made only by the late Prime Minister Gheorghiu-Dej, who has died. Ceaushescu, Maurer, Manescu and the rest of the gang collaborated with him. The method was also exported to Red China. Today Romanian Communists wish to trade with the West. They want loans, so they behave themselves for a time. But their character has remained the same. They have never repented of what they have done. They have never given up Leninism. Their aim is still the uprooting of religion. And at the moment which they will consider convenient, the Romanian and other Communists will begin again with the sure methods of Piteshti.

page 78 If That Were Christ, Would You Give Him Your Blanket?

As regards the liberalization in Romania, it is more important to know what Romanians think, not casual visitors who do not know the truth. I will tell the situation in the form of a joke which circulates widely in my country: a tourist calls to a taxi-driver, "Are you free?" He answers, "No, sir, I am a Romanian."

And a second joke. Ceaushescu went to inspect an asylum for madmen. These were instructed to shout "Hurrah"; Ceaushescu was very pleased, but he observed that one of those present did not cheer him. He asked that man why. The man answered, "Comrade Ceaushescu, I am not mad. I am a doctor."

page 79 If That Were Christ, Would You Give Him Your Blanket?

CHAPTER 11

Beauty Shines at Midnight

A courier of the Christian missions to the Communist world reports: "I saw a wife of a Christian martyr in Romania. He had left many children behind. She looked amazingly young, though she had grown-up boys. I expressed my amazement. She answered, 'Suffering has renewed my youth.'"

Another Christian told him, "We would like an easing of our conditions but not the full ceasing of oppression. We fear that liberty will make us lose our burning love." Yet another, "We, when we think of the cloud of witnesses in the spiritual skies (HEB 12:1), are happy that the part of the sky which is most cloudy is over the Communist countries. We are glad to give the greatest number of confessors and martyrs."

The Romanian Churches all know what has happened in Piteshti. They know that in the future excess of torture might break them, too. But as long as it has not happened they speak out for the Lord.
An eye-witness at the trial of the Seventh Day Adventist pastor Boian told us what happened. The judge asked Boian, "Do you believe that Jesus will return and destroy His enemies?" "He surely will." - "Will He destroy me also?" "Without the slightest doubt, if you do not repent." - "Do you regret to have preached illegally?" - "I have done what was pleasing to the Lord. As for you, God will punish you here and in eternity." - "You were not allowed to preach." - "God not only allowed it, but commanded me to preach. Read yourself the order in the Bible. It is in Matthew 28 [MTT 28]."

He was sentenced to eight years' imprisonment. This happened in 1969, in the liberalized Romania of Ceaushescu. I had been in prison with the same Boian in 1964. At that time he was sentenced for only three years. Romania had not been liberalized then!
We have news that important leaders of the Communist Party listen to Christian broadcasting and are greatly impressed by it.
Our brethren in Romania allow themselves jokes. I was at the end of a conference with church leaders belonging to the World Council. Their aim had been to convince me about the liberties in Romania. Some of them were Lutherans and they were not aware that for twenty-five years the Romanian Lutherans were not allowed to publish one issue of a religious magazine. But one of the leaders handed me a letter. It was in Romanian. A Romanian Christian had asked him to smuggle this letter out and give it to me, which he did. In the letter our Romanian brother ridiculed the naivety of this very church leader who had expressed to him his enthusiasm about the huge attendance in the Romanian-speaking Protestant Churches. "Your churches are so over-crowded," he said with excitement. "There are people sitting on the floor, on the windows, standing crammed." He did not wonder why it was so. It is wrong that a church should be over-crowded. The normal thing is to have as many churches as are needed to give people the opportunity to worship in comfortable conditions. It did not even pass through the mind of this church leader that Christians had walked forty miles and had arrived seven to eight hours before the meeting started to be sure to have a sitting-place.

He would not believe what the writer of the letter had told him that two thirds of the Romanian-speaking Protestant assemblies were closed. It could not be true. The important leader from the West had spoken himself with the butcher Dogaru, head of the Communist Departments of Cults and with the official Baptist leaders. They had assured him that there is full religious liberty. "Should I not believe such a high official and a leader of a Baptist Union?"

God mocked him by making him to bring out the letter in which his own unfitness for his high position in the Church was made clear.

But in this same letter, our brother told us about a meeting of pastors, at which the Commissioner of the Communist Government was present, who complained that since the Red rule the number of believers has increased by three hundred per cent. "We, the authorities, do not wish this to happen, and will give you no increase of liberty." Some official church leaders congratulated the commissioner and assured him that they would obey all the rules of the Communists and do nothing that would bring about a further increase of the number of Christians. In any case, their numbers increase in spite of and not because of these leaders.

The letter finishes by telling us that Jesus had been tempted with words of Scripture. The Christian leaders in Communist countries are also tempted by Bible verses. Foremost among these is ROM 1:3: "Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers," forgetting that this chapter describes the legitimate ruler. He is a minister of God for the good and an executor of wrath upon him who does evil. If a ruler rewards evil and punishes good, it is not about him this chapter speaks, and to him we owe rebellion, not subjection.

Ah, and what about those hundred thousand Bibles printed in Romania? I am still waiting for someone to come forward and to assert that some team from the West has counted 100.000 Bibles and has seen to the distribution of 100,000, no more and no less. The assertion of Communists has been believed. Any cashier who issued a receipt for œ100,000 without having counted them one by one would be fired.

page 83 If That Were Christ, Would You Give Him Your Blanket?

CHAPTER 12

Persecutions of Christians in Africa

When I wrote ~Tortured for Christ~ and ~The Soviet Saints~ there was still something like an Iron and Bamboo Curtain. Since then, these have ceased to exist. Communism does not begin any more somewhere at the Berlin wall finishing with North Korea. Two countries of Africa, the Sudan and Congo Brazzaville have become avowedly Communistic. Syria has an extreme left pro-Maoist Government. There are Communist guerilla fights in many parts of Africa. Moscow- and Peking-instructed Arab guerillas fight believing that they do it for their national cause. But Communists are not so unselfish as to train guerillas for something which will benefit another ideal than theirs. The Reds have made great advances in Laos, too.

I am sorry that lack of space does not permit me to give details about other European and Asian Communist countries, but I wish to write a few words about Africa.

My heart breaks for the Sudan. Kumm, the founder of the Sudan Interior Mission had written at the beginning of this century, "Was there no Christ of God for all these people of Sudan, no Jesus, no life set free from sin and fear? The vast Sudan, 3,000 miles across ... hundreds of languages, all, all non-Christians to this hour. I cannot escape these eyes. Walk away. They follow. Meet them, they watch you still."

page 84 If That Were Christ, Would You Give Him Your Blanket?

He and others worked hard. The souls brought to Christ by them had to seal their faith with blood when the Arabs persecuted them.

Now the Communists rule the country. Twelve of the ministers are members of the Party. The others are sympathizers. The major-general Nimeri, who heads the revolutionary council, has had his military training in America. Then he earned his reputation in killing non-Arabs in the south. The first thing which the new government did was to enter into friendly relations with the Communist dictatorships in other countries. There are now talks about uniting the Sudan, Libya and Egypt (the latter having become now in reality a Soviet colony) in one state. In it the dominant role will be played by the Communists. The Christians can await a new bloodbath.

The hammer and hoe is now on the flag of Congo-Brazzaville (the sickle is unknown there). At the first governmental rally in Brazzaville, "The Internationale" was sung as the national anthem. Christians still remember the cruelties of the Sambis who had killed a multitude of missionaries and native Christians just a few years ago. Now the murderers rule the country.

Let us remember just a few of the crimes committed by those who rule this part of the Congo today. They opened the chests of living men, tore out their hearts, and ate them. They cut the ears and genitals of native Christians and compelled them afterwards to eat their own organs. They opened forcibly the mouths of Christians and poured benzine into their bellies; afterwards, they split open the belly and set fire to the benzine. (From the book of Rev. W. Van Straaten, ~Where God Weeps~). Those who committed these crimes were Chinese-, Russian-, Cuban-trained guerillas. They have conquered the leadership of the country now. You shudder when you think what Christians are passing through there.

It would be useful specially for American Christians to think over the fact that in the United States, Communism can rule only under the form of black power, and that such treatments will be applied to American Christians if ever the country falls under Communist rule.

Milton Obote, Prime Minister of Uganda, declared, "We will go left," which means in the historical situation of today, "We will pursue a policy, the ultimate result of which will be the harrassing of Christians." Odinga in Kenya has allowed his house to become a meeting place for all leftist sympathizers, for Communist diplomats, and for all who wanted the victory of the red star. Communist friends gave Odinga money to send students to universities in the red Camp. A coup from his side has been prevented at the last moment by Kenyatta, as has been prevented that by another Communist-paid adventurer in Lesotho.

Seventy tons of atheist literature are brought into Africa from Red China every month. But it is not only the thoughts of Mao which are used to attract people. The Communists attract youth in Southern Africa by sex demonstrations of black and white nude parties, as a recent trial has shown.

At Nambuanfongo and Luvo, in the Portuguese territories, Communist guerillas trained in China, Cuba and the Soviet Union have bound Christians and others who dared to oppose them, to long boards, and fed them through rotary saws like trussed-up logs of wood. One of the criminals, describing afterwards the events to a reporter of the Paris newspaper ~Le Monde~, said, with a broad smile, that once the Christians have been bound, "We sawed them lengthwise." Christian women, black and white, were raped before and after they were split open. Some were raped, still alive, with their entrails dragging to the ground. They stuffed the vitals into the mouths of those who had dared to keep their own faith and would not accept cruelty as a religion. Al Venter, a journalist of remarkable objectivity, says in his book ~The Terror Fighters~: "The incidents as described here were not isolated."

Blood and tears - this is the story of Communism everywhere.

CHAPTER 13

The Attitude of the Church of the Free World Towards Communism

In Italy every third man votes for the Communists, in France every fourth man. Even Christians vote unknowingly for those who will torture them when they come to power. Communists are masters of deceit. They assure everyone in the West that they will give religious libery. But this is what Lenin promised also in Russia.

To promise costs nothing. Italy and France have had already the rehearsals of revolution. Christians who sympathize with Communism would do well to ponder the following quotation from ~Voprosi Filosofii~, a Moscow magazine, of January 1968: "From the point of view of Marxism-Leninism, freedom of conscience demands full denial of religion, its definitive defeat and its exclusion from social life."

In the United States, revolutionism has taken an extremely subtle form. Be it enough to quote from ~Do It~, the book of Jerry Rubin, a leftist leader: "We've combined youth, music, sex, drugs and rebellion with treason - and that's a combination hard to beat." This man has been freed by a court of appeal, being considered as not dangerous. Bombings and killings of policemen and occupation of campus buildings or churches are daily happenings.

Should all this make us become anti-Communist? What will we have gained by this? Hitler was surely an anti-Communist. Notwithstanding, he was a tyrant and a rogue. In my eyes, to be an anti-Communist means just nothing. I am much more interested to know what a man is for than what he is against.

The Communists are men and must be loved.

I am against any compromise with Communism, because it always starts from lies. Niemoeller, at that time vice-chairman of the World Council of Churches, asserted in the Norwegian press, that Communism has made no more martyrs since 1920. The Evangelical Relief Committee for interned persons of the German Lutheran Church and the department of External Affairs of the same, denied in 1969 the existence of Christian prisoners in the Communist camp. This is contrary to obvious evidence. The policy is not to upset the Reds.

All such compromises disarm the Christian fighters who have to oppose Communism. The ~Journal of the Moscow Patriarchate~ No. 3/68 reports on a symposium of church leaders in East Germany. Buievski, foreign secretary of the Moscow Patriarchate, stated there, "The fifty years since the October revolution characterize a new Socialist society as serving peace and love of mankind ... Every Christian must accept the fact that the foundation of the Communist revolution is love of mankind and he must thank God for the revolution."

Those attending swallowed these infamies. Buievski's boss, Khrushchev,had told mankind how many innocent victims were killed by Stalin in this revolution for which we are called to thank God. Stalin's own daughter gave other facts.

I don't believe in what is usually called anti-Communism, and I refused to join any anti-Communist organization, but neither do I believe in compromising with Communism in the religious or in the political sphere. Every bridge built towards Communism will make it easier for the Reds to cross rivers and oceans to destroy freedom.

Communism is a religion of hatred. I believe in what St. John of the Cross taught, "Where there is no love, put love and love will spring up." I believe that it is right to follow the example of St. Patrick who, after having been held as a slave by the Irish, and treated as slaves were treated at that time, when he escaped to England, prepared himself for a noble mission. Passing over many hindrances, he went back to his former slave-holders and brought them to Christ.

PSA 104:35 is inexactly translated. In Hebrew the words are: "Let the sins (not the sinners) be consumed out of the earth and let the wicked be no more." The Talmud comments: "When the sins disappear, there will be no more sinners."

It is written in PRO 24:29, "Say not, I will do so to him as he hath done to me: I will render to the man according to his work." When you tread a flower under your feet, she rewards you by giving you her perfume.

Christians are on the side of people oppressed by the Communists. Their duty is to help them and their churches by providing them with Bibles and Christian literature, by broadcasting to them the Gospel, by sending relief to the innumerable families of Christian martyrs.

Christians are on the side of the Underground Church in Communist countries, not on the side of the official church leaders there, who have become stooges of the Communists. The Communists are anti-man, something similar to what anti-matter is in the physical realm. If anybody makes friendship with them and obeys them now, what will be his attitude when the Anti-Christ will appear?

But by helping the Underground Church, we embrace in our love its torturers, too. Our ministry must extend to them. They should also be won for Christ.

St. Patrick won Ireland. We wish to win the Communist world for Christ.

Every missionary work in which the passion of Christ is passionately preached is valuable. But the missionary work in the Communist lands should have the top priority. From the point of view of salvation, all men are equal, not so from the point of view of missionary strategy.

When St. Paul wrote that the gospel of Christ is the power of God unto everyone that believes, to the Jews first and also to the Greeks (ROM 1:16), it was not because the salvation of a Jew would be more precious to God than that of a man of another nation. He speaks here from the point of view of the strategical priority. The most powerful arguments St. Paul had for his assertion that Jesus is Saviour, were the prophecies contained in the ancient Holy Scriptures of the Jews. A Gentile had to think it over well if he should become a Christian or not. To become a Christian could mean that he could be thrown to the wild beasts. Caution would counsel him first to ask some Jewish neighbour if the assertion of St. Paul regarding the contents of the Scriptures was true, he, very often, not having access to them. As a rule the Jews would answer, "No, Jesus has been a deceiver," in this way cancelling all the missionary efforts of the apostle. It was, therefore, of the utmost importance to preach the Gospel first to the Jews, to those depositories of the sacred scrolls, in order to have an impressive group of Hebrew Christians, who would testify that their prophecies had been fulfilled in the person of Jesus. Then followed the possibility of winning those of other nations.

The same happens now. The salvation of an aboriginal in New Guinea or in South America is as important as that of a Russian. But if the aboriginal in the jungle remains unsaved, he cannot destroy the Church and Christian civilization. If we do not bring salvation to the Communist world, the Communists can destroy these. Don't forget they have piled up the experience of perfect torture. They can wipe out Christianity in a huge part of the world, as Mohammedanism has wiped it out for centuries in the north of Africa, where in previous times it flourished. Gone will then be all missionary societies which work at spreading the Gospel to the primitives. Gone will be most of the church life in the free world as well.

~The Times~, London, of May 1968 announced that Russian nuclear-power submarines patrol full time the Atlantic and Pacific coasts of the U.S.A. They have submarines, containing sixteen missiles each with a range of 2,000 miles, and they are patrolling at only eighty miles distance. Should we answer to the ravages which they can inflict with retaliatory nuclear ravages?

What about winning the crews of such Soviet submarines for Christ? What about winning the Communist world, oppressors and slaves? Once converted, Communists would never destroy our cities, which they will know to be full of churches and believing souls. I understand, surely, by conversion something entirely else than the phenomenon usually called so, which did not stop Christians of different nations from killing each other with the benediction of their priests and pastors in two world wars. I mean by conversion a new birth, becoming a new creature, embracing all men in the love of God.

This is our attitude towards Communism - neither hatred nor compromise, but soul-winning love.

Will we succeed in winning the Communist world? Surely, under two conditions:

(I) We must be able to answer the questions of the Communists and the objections they raise against our religion. This means a huge intellectual task to which the best heads of the church must dedicate themselves.

(2) We ourselves should live up to the standard of what we teach. We do not demand the impossible. "Be ye perfect," or "Love from all your heart" are commandments which cannot be fulfilled all at once. But it is the same as the conquest of a country in war. You have a strategy for attaining the final aim. And you have daily tactical decisions for each step forward towards the goal. The standards of Jesus are the final end to be attained. Demanded from us is only the daily step forward in this direction. Neither God nor men can ask us more than this. But we will never win the Communist world without such decided steps. Winning the Communist world for Christ is therefore connected with an urgent Christian revolution in the free world.

Our love extends surely also to the anti-Communists, to whom we show a new constructive way. It extends also to those who compromise. We have full understanding of the religious leaders of the West who do so. Eighty-five per cent of the Orthodox of the world and two-thirds of the European Baptists live in Communist lands. To break relationship with their official leaders means to be left with very little.

But St. Athanasius preferred to remain alone with the truth, having against him a whole ecumenical council, which expelled him under no less slanderous accusations than the killing of a bishop and the raping of a virgin. A Pope preferred to lose Britain for his Church than to yield once in the matter of what Christ had taught about divorce. We can understand the Western Church leaders and the accounts they make, but we cannot approve of them. No compromise, but secret Christian mission in the Red camp is our line.

page 93 If That Were Christ, Would You Give Him Your Blanket?

page 94 If That Were Christ, Would You Give Him Your Blanket?

CHAPTER 14

What we should not do

Through letters or in big rallies with question and answer sessions, I have been asked again and again, "What can we do to help our suffering brethren? What can we do to hinder the spread of Communism in the free world?"

Before answering the question "What can we do?" I would say first what we should not do.

Don't remain asleep. The Ukrainian writer Shevchenko wrote, "It is terrible to fall in prison and chains, but it is much worse to sleep in liberty." Your country and your Church is also a target of world-Communism. They work already at the subversion of your country and they wish to destroy your Church.

Free yourselves from illusions. Don't believe such general vulgar sentences as "right triumphs in the end." The end might be after centuries. Mohammedanism triumphed over Christianity in northern Africa a thousand years ago, and the situation has not been reversed until now. When Jesus promised that the gates of hell will not prevail against His Church, He relied on the fact that His disciples would not sleep, expecting victories to fall from heaven. Leave the beautiful looking but false sentence, "God will save us." God does not help two and two make anything else but four. He will never make spiritual sleep and apathy give, as a result, Christian triumph. If we go on as until now, the persecution of Christians will become worse in Communist countries and Communism will expand further. The world in which we live is harsh and unromantic. Nice, hope-inspiring slogans do not prove true.

Do not see the main foe in Communism, without realizing that we are its accomplices. The great hindrance to spreading the Gospel in Communist lands is not the Iron Curtain. We can easily break through that. The hindrance is the Silk Curtain of easy living. I saw in Miami an ocean show. A barefooted man fought with an alligator. He hit him with a stick on his head, he drew him by his tail. The alligator snapped occasionally at him, but never did him any harm. I asked the man, "You seem healthy. You can make your living in some other manner. One day the alligator will bite you and you will be gone." He answered, "Out of the question." Marvelling about his assurance, I asked him if he had an agreement with the alligator. He said, "No, but before every show the alligator is over-fed. An over-fed alligator does not bite." This is the situation of many Christians in the free world. The U.S.A. spends more money on chewing-gum than it gives to missions.

When I preached about these things in the West, many Christians told me, "You are right." This is not enough. Take the decision. What useless or even useful things do you renounce in order to be able to do more for the holy cause?

A church with comfortable pews, with philosophical sermons which you can enjoy, a church without missionary endeavour, but debating trifles, while humanity is engaged in a race with catastrophe, can become the Judas Iscariot of Christianity. THE CHURCH, the Bride of Christ, is undefiled, unpolluted. She will never betray. The churches - Roman Catholic, Anglican, Orthodox, Lutheran, Baptist, Pentecostal - are human institutions. They have played many ugly roles in past times. Remember the Inquisition, the anti-Semitism, the connivance with Hitler, the splits in matters in which nobody knows the real truth, the blasphemous heresies. These churches can betray again if they do not watch Opinions differ about the much-debated Baptist Church in Moscow. Is she genuine or not? Apply the test: on what unevangelised field does it do a missionary work? Well, she has accepted not to do missionary work even within the Soviet Union. A Church without missionary work is no Church. The persecuted Church under the Roman emperors sent missionaries to countries far away. The official Baptist Church in Moscow has no mission - no secret mission, if no open mission is allowed. By this simple fact, she has stepped out of the rank of Churches.

But what about our Churches? Christian missions are on the decrease. There are less Protestant missionaries than ten years ago, and these at the ratio of five women for one man. The population of the world grows with sixty-three millions a year. Only two millions will have a chance of hearing the gospel.

Fight Communism, but don't be arrogant towards it. Communism has not the monopoly of evil. There are shortcomings in Christianity, too. We are forgetful of the needs of the world we are commissioned to save.

Beware of anti-Communist hysteria or bigotry which makes you suspect a Soviet spy in everyone who speaks out for the poor, the hungry, for those who are victims of racial, national or religious discrimination. Communism thrives on the injustices of our society.

Don't hope that politicians will solve the Communist problem. Churchill wrote, "It is the duty of a civilized world to conquer Russia. The Soviets do not represent Russia. They represent an international concept, entirely foreign and even hostile to what we call civilization." But it was he who had given at Yalta half of Europe into the hands of the Communist butchers. Richard Nixon wrote in ~Reader's Digest~ of September 1961, "The U.S.A. goal must be nothing less than to bring freedom to the Communist world." When he became President of the United States, he danced with the Communist Prime Minister of Romania, Ceaushescu, on a public square.

I don't think that the Communist threat will be abolished by military means. Neither do I wish it. We don't know much about life after death. But by killing a Communist I might deprive him of all opportunity of being saved. Soldiers are right to kill in legitimate defence of their country, but the aim must always be peace, a peace based on righteousness.

The whole military fight against Communism is dubious. If anyone should have a Vietcong flag in South Vietnam, an American soldier would shoot him. But thousands parade with Vietcong flags in the U.S.A. itself. Nobody bothers them. Americans don't fight Communism in Cuba. They don't fight it at home, but fight it in Vietnam, while making friendship with the Soviets who support the Vietcong. The political and military fight is led without decision to conquer and therefore might not succeed. No hope from this side!

page 98 If That Were Christ, Would You Give Him Your Blanket?

CHAPTER 15

What Can Be Done?

Humans do not have the habit of committing suicide for another's grief, but that is exactly what we demand from you: "To deny yourself, to die for yourself and to live for Christ, who is in grief and suffers again in his mystical body, to feel every pain of his holy martyrs as your own, to remember those in bonds as bound with them" (HEB 13:3). At this moment you have brothers and sisters kept in chains tied behind their backs, sometimes for weeks, having to lap their food like dogs. You have brethren and sisters in strait-jackets and gagged. At this moment, Mrs. Malozemlova weeps in her home. Seven children have been taken away from her, because she had taught them about God. And her children and the children of the family Sloboda and thousands of others weep, crying desperately, "Mummy, Mummy." They will not see their mothers again. At this moment in Red China Christians have their eyes gouged out, their tongues cut. Die to yourself and live their life.

A Christian, even if he is well-to-do, free, young, healthy, is like his Master always a Man of Sorrows,

page 99 If That Were Christ, Would You Give Him Your Blanket?

acquainted with grief (ISA 53:3). This, because like a sponge, he sucks in the sorrows of every innocent and shares them.

Share our griefs, help us to bear our heavy cross, as Simon of Cyrene helped Christ to carry his - this is the appeal of the Underground Church.

You hear again and again in churches, "Crucified under Pontius Pilate." Two thousand years have passed. The stain has not been washed away. Will it not be said once, that Christians in Communist countries suffered persecution, were without a Gospel, that families of Christian martyrs hungered, while Christians of the free world were richer than ever before?

Your riches, even if they are relative, will be a terrible burden for you at the last judgement. So will be, even more than your riches, your comfort, your easy-going, pleasure-loving ways. Unburden yourselves, prepare yourselves for meeting Jesus who will tell you, "I was in jail." You seek His fellowship. Be in jail with Him. It is the only place where you can be with him. He has never said that He will be in cathedrals.

Pray for the Underground Church. Elijah was a man with the same weaknesses as ours, but the fate of a country depended upon the prayers of this one man. Pray, having the same consciousness. The Christians of the Underground in Russia have organized a chain of prayer. They pray uninterruptedly twenty-four hours a day for the Christians in the free world. Do the same. Pray yourself. Organize prayer groups. Ask from your pastor or priest that there should be public prayer for the martyrs in Communist countries at every religious service. An old canon of an ecumenical council says that every liturgy at which the martyrs are not mentioned is not valid. Don't mention only the martyrs of centuries ago. Mention those killed today by the Communists.

page 100 If That Were Christ, Would You Give Him Your Blanket?

And when you pray, be careful to do it as many prayer-books righteously say, "together with the angels and archangels." Everyone of us has a guardian angel. These angels have wings. Why? Because they wish to be our messengers. We have left them unemployed. Tell your angel: "The Berlin wall and the Iron Curtain are not too high for you. Fly over them to a Christian in chains, to a mother deprived of her children, to a brother who passes through tortures and tell them that they are not forgotten, that somebody prays for them. Strengthen them in their faith."

Don't simply pray, but agonize in prayer as Epaphroditus [PHP 2:25-30], yes, as Jesus Himself did.

Prevailing prayer is united with regular fasting. The Underground Church of the Soviet Union fasts on Fridays. They fast even in slave labour-camps, where they are hungry the whole week long. The Church Fathers and the great Evangelists believed in fasting. Tertullian wrote a treatise on this subject. St. Polycarp saw in fasting a powerful aid against temptation. Luther, Calvin, Spurgeon, the Catholics until not long ago, all stressed the necessity of fasting.

The thousands of Christians in Red prisons have no Communion Service. Remember them at every Communion. When you hear the words, "This is my body broken for you," remember the body of our Lord broken on Golgotha, but remember also His mystical body, broken by Communists today. Not only His blood was shed, His bride's blood is also shed on many modern Golgothas. Have a tear for those who give their body and blood today. Don't eat the wafer just as cattle eat grass.

When I came to the West, and afterwards to Australasia and Africa, bringing the message of the Underground Church, when my books ~Tortured for Christ~,

~The Soviet Saints~ and ~In God's Underground~ appeared, the response of the Christians was huge. The books were translated in a total of twenty-three languages. And in nineteen countries of the free world, missions to the Communist world were created.

The purpose of these missions which collaborate in an international fellowship is to help the Underground Churches in Communist countries with Bibles and Christian literature, with Gospel broadcasts, with relief for underground pastors and families of Christian martyrs, as well as to spread the Gospel among the revolutionaries in the free world. An ounce of prevention is better than a pound of cure. It is better to prevent Communist revolutions by winning leftish youth for Christ, than to help the persecuted Christians after Communism has won.

Spurgeon said once, "I would be missionary-minded just for selfish reasons. What a joy it will be, when I enter into heaven and find some souls saved through my efforts or prayers or gifts. They will come and say, 'We are here because of your missionary interest and efforts.'"

Not many Christians have this holy selfishness. They make concrete plans for going to church or to a movie, they make concrete preparations for going on vacation. They don't make detailed preparation for their going to heaven.

Every time we take a breath, four souls pass away. Every hour 4,000 men die. It is 100,000 a day. One third of these live under Communist rule prevented by force from hearing the Gospel.

Leave aside discussions regarding post- or pre- or a-millenialism, leave aside debating infant or believers' baptism, apostolic succession, quarrels about the interpretation of the Bible (which was not inspired by God so as to become subject for debate), leave aside the stupid modern theologies of whatever kind. Theology is sin. It produces only quarrelling. If the carpenter Jesus tried to read the books of Karl Barth, Bultmann, John Robinson and others like them or those of their theological opponents, He would put them aside after the first pages. He would not understand them. They are much too cleverly written. Believe in God, in love, in eternal life and tell the story of Jesus to lost souls.

Don't expect your church leaders to do it. It was rarely they who started it. The Bible Society was started when a girl from a Welsh farm met one faithful pastor. The China Inland Mission was started by an employee in a drug-store. The pioneer of Protestant missions in India was a cobbler, Carey. Moody was a salesman of shoes. Spurgeon never went to college. Up, cobblers, salesmen, men of little culture, men without degrees but with ardent love toward Christ! You do the work! Many pastors and bishops join you. Welcome them when they do. But don't wait. The Lord's work is urgent.

CHAPTER 16

The Need for Literature

~Pravda~ of August 1969 states that one quarter of all the literature produced on the whole earth is produced in the Soviet Union (it has less than one tenth of the world's population).

Christians believe the Word to be God and yet do so little in the matter of literature. The most widely-translated book in the world is no longer the Bible, but Lenin's writings. It has had 968 new translations since 1946, the Bible has had only 887.

The world is simply flooded with the book of Mao Tse Tung.

In the Communist world, Bibles and other Christian literature are very scarce. A Communist book ~Children and Religion~ by Ogrizko, tells how parents in the Soviet Union feed their children with the Word of God. The Party has published ~The Comical Bible~, a book ridiculing the word of God, but which contains excerpts from the Holy Scriptures. The Christians glue paper over all the mocking words, leaving only the Bible verse and feed thus the souls of their children. In the same way they also use other atheistic books.

The underground printing-presses work. Much literature is smuggled in. But how much is this much? There are in the Soviet Union alone some 220 million inhabitants with a hunger for the word of God as it is not known in the West. We have to give them the literature.

We find no difficulty in doing so in the Far East. Literature is flown in by balloons from South Korea.

We have broken also through the Iron Curtain.

Let us listen to what the Communists have to say about this. ~Leningradskaia Pravda~ of the 12th of October 1967, writes about "a stream of religious literature and leaflets directed towards our country." In the article we are told that the literature is spread by Christians who come disguised as tourists. In other articles they complain that it is smuggled into sacks or ballots with different goods imported into the Soviet Union. The Moscow magazine ~Voprosi Filosofii~ No. 6 of 1967 enumerated among the causes of the persistence of religion in the U.S.S.R., "the distribution of literature ... which comes from abroad." At the big trial of Soviet writers, Galanskov was accused of having met a foreigner, who introduced herself under the nickname Nadia, in the monastery Troitsa Sergheievska. Nadia had brought religious literature from abroad to Galanskov.

You can help so that Communist countries should have Bibles and Christian literature.

In the Chinese town of Chungking, the Bibles, hymnals, prayerbooks, were burned publicly, the Christians being compelled to attend. One of them profited from a moment's inattention of the Red Guards and snatched out of the jar just one page which had not been consumed by fire. He had to act quickly and could not get more than one page. For years, the Underground Church of this town feeds on this single page of Scripture.

I wondered which page it was. It could have been a page from Genesis or Nehemiah, full of genealogies, which have their importance, but which they would not have understood. I expect to see in heaven the angel of the church in Chungking and to congratulate him for the skill wherewith he directed the hand of that Christian towards the right page. Because after two years of striving, I have succeeded in getting the information as to which page they have.

Every Sunday they read, "On this rock will I build my church; and" neither Mao Tse Tung, nor the burying alive of Christians, nor the gouging out of eyes, nor the cutting of tongues, nor the desecration of church buildings, nor the gates of hell shall prevail against it (MTT 16:18). They have the page with this text. Really something to live on.

But it is a righteous thing to give them more of the Bible so that they might learn new things about the Person who builds the Church, about hell and heaven.

CHAPTER 17

Broadcasting the Gospel

The Communist customs officers cannot prevent streams of Christian literature from entering Communist countries, but they still make the work difficult and dangerous. Secret printing-presses are sometimes discovered, and this leads to arrests.

The Communists have no customs officers in the air. The radio-waves arrive. In Red China death sentences have been passed upon some for listening to Gospel broadcasts from abroad. But still they listen. In the Soviet Union they have jamming stations, but these are very expensive. The territory of U.S.S.R. is huge. There are large portions of this country where the radio is well heard. In the European satellite countries the messages are clearly heard.

The radio work is most effective. We know about Communist members of governments and diplomats who listen regularly to them. We know cases of conversion among them as the result of this broadcasting of the Gospel.

A young Chinese smuggled out a letter in which he said that he had been an atheist. But once he saw in a movie-picture a lady wearing a cross. He inquired what the cross meant and was told that it is the symbol of Christianity. But he could not find out what Christianity meant. There were no Christians in his area. By chance, he tuned into a Gospel transmission. He listened to one broadcast after the other and began to love Christ. He asked, "Does God accept somebody from Red China? You have mentioned the church several times in your sermons. But with us it is so, that God is in heaven, we are in Red China, and we have no church in between. All the churches have been closed. How can we enter heaven?" The poor lad did not know that he has many churches. The whole Church universal is his. Then he puts a second question, "How should I pray? You always finish by prayer. I don't know how to pray." But then he says what he imagines prayer to be, and gives the most beautiful definition of it which, to my knowledge, has ever been given - "Prayer means to speak the whole day so as to be able to say after every talk, 'Amen.'" I think we must all learn from this definition. You cannot well say "Amen" after having quarrelled with your wife.

We possess letters from Russia of men converted by radio transmissions, though they have never seen a Bible in their lives.

New congregations are created in this manner. I quote a letter from Romania: "We wish you to know that in the last three months over fifty souls in our village were converted, listening to the radio. Among them the wife of the head of the police. In this village there were no believers before. Now they all listen to the word of God. Work. Work as much as possible and God will reward you."

The Missions to the Communist world broadcast the Gospel in the languages used in the various Communist countries.

page 108 If That Were Christ, Would You Give Him Your Blanket?

CHAPTER 18

Help to Underground Pastors and Families of Christian Martyrs

The Christians in Communist countries are poor, they have to pay heavy fines. They have difficulty in supporting their pastors. Here help is required.

Innumerable Christians are in Communist prisons. Marchenko, a prisoner in a Soviet camp, has written the renowned book, ~My Testimony~. In it he says that in nearly every cell he met some believers. How many prison cells does the Soviet Union have? And what about other Red countries? The families of martyrs and confessors of the faith are hungry.

It is not easy to help them. Not so much because of the Communists watching. We have learned to work so that they do not know what we do. But we find resistance within the families of Christian martyrs themselves. One sister whose husband is in prison said, "Why do you wish to deprive us of the privilege to bear a heavy cross? Why do you wish to separate us from our loveliest friend, sister poverty?" Russian Christians have inquired if they could not help their Western brethren financially. Seeing that in the fifty years since

page 109 If That Were Christ, Would You Give Him Your Blanket?

Communist dominion the Western Christians have done nothing to help the sufferers, our Russian brothers who could not imagine that we are indifferent to their fate, draw the conclusion that we are very poor in the West. They thought about helping us.

We overcome the resistance and help the families. From one we received a beautiful letter of thanks. She is the mother of nine children. Her husband is sentenced to ten years: "I thank God for the privilege he has given me to bear a chip of the cross of Christ. My small children ask me when Daddy will return. But Daddy has put his life at stake for the faith once for all delivered to the saints. When the Communists took my husband, they mocked us saying, 'Now let your God come and help you. You will see that you will starve.' But love has a long arm. It stretched us a piece of bread from far away and now the Communists are ashamed."

We have succeeded in bringing food and clothes into Siberian slave-labour camps and in getting letters of thankfulness from there.

"I thank God for the privilege to bear a chip of the cross of Christ." Only a chip, so much is it to have a husband in prison and nine children to care for. I have heard somebody complaining in the West about a heavy cross that he had to bear with having to buy a cheaper car rather than a more luxurious one.

Those who have eaten excrement and drunk urine because they believed in the same Lord, have the right to receive from the Christians of the free world a piece of bread. Even a piece of chocolate would not be too much for them.

~The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles~, an early Christian book, says, "A prophet who asks money is a false prophet." This applies also to missionary organizations. I personally would never give to an organization which demands money. Its cause must be so luminous that people should ask the organization to accept its gifts.

It is ugly for preachers to speak about the verse, "set your affections on things above," and then to fuss because the mission income is not high enough. It is higher than that of the first band of apostles.

My duty as a teacher in Israel is only to convey to you what has been always and everywhere the doctrine of Christianity in this matter. St. Ambrose said, "If my brother hungers and I do not help him, I am a thief. And if my brother dies of hunger, I am a murderer, too." I have seen many Christian prisoners literally starving from hunger.

The words, "I have been young and now am old; yet have I not seen the righteous forsaken, nor his seed begging bread" (PSA 37:25), hold true only where a David is king. Under the Communists, children of righteous fighters for the faith eat sometimes from the garbage. They have to be helped. Ask your church to do it, by whatever means she will know best.

~Soviet Lithuania~ of the 4th of June 1967 stated that the Easter collection at the Kaunas Orthodox Cathedral was 1,274 roubles. This is approximately the salary for a year of a Soviet factory-worker. In the West we are far from this. ~Questions of Scientific Atheism~ of May 1968, tells that in a village in which, according to their description, the average church attendance is about 300 persons, the income of the church has doubled in one year. The latest report about yearly income was of 23,000 roubles. Thus a churchgoer in an official village church gives on the average eighty roubles per year, which is one and a half times the monthly salary of a worker on a collective farm.

I don't ask you for money for a certain mission. I don't ask you for money at all. I have described to you the Christian life of the underground fighters. It is of such a beauty that you have to go immediately to your pastors and friends to find out how you and your church can have the privilege of sharing the sufferings and future glory of the elect among the elect.

CHAPTER 19

Answer to the Most Frequent Criticisms

We don't pay much attention to criticisms. We have found that, as a rule, those who criticize our activity never care to help the persecuted Christians. Those who help never criticize. I, personally, do not care what the whole world thinks of me. It did not think highly of Jesus.

But I wish to answer some sincere doubts about our work.

There are some Christians who ask, "Don't you endanger even more the persecuted Christians by your secret work of smuggling in Bibles and relief, by supporting the whole underground movement?"

We, surely, could endanger them. Did Jesus endanger men by exhorting them to become His disciples? He says, "I send you forth as sheep in the midst of wolves" (MTT 10:16). This surely was to endanger lives. The apostles would not have died a premature martyr-death if Jesus had not called them to such a risky task. St. Paul endangered the life of his converts. Listening to him, they arrived to be thrown before wild beasts. Every Christian soldier must be ready to die for his Lord. Every officer in the Christian army must be ready not only to die, but also to send others to death for the good cause. If the Reformers had not preached their doctrines, thousands would not have been burnt at the stake. Neither would Catholics have died, killed by the Protestants, if the Pope had not taught them to withstand what he considered to be a heresy. If you are convinced that your cause is the cause of Christ, it is right to give your own life and to teach others to do the same.

In the end, it is very dangerous to feed a starving man. You might spoil his stomach. Should we, therefore, not give food to the hungry? No, they should be fed, but with caution. So, the underground work must be done, though it is dangerous, but avoiding blunders and wrong methods.

A Hungarian Christian wrote an article against me, in which he says that by my activity I am fixing the noose of the rope wherewith the Christians in Communist countries will be hanged. This was in 1967. Time enough. Not only was not a single Christian in Hungary hanged or even imprisoned because of our activity, the contrary happened. At this moment, not a single Protestant Christian is in prison for his faith in Hungary. Neither was anyone jailed because of our activity in any other Communist country. We know how to work cautiously.

If the figures of those arrested in the Communist camp after publishing my book had been increased, the guilt would have been put on me, but since I published it the Bible Society received the freedom to print Bibles in some Communist countries. The merit is not attributed to me!

I am criticized as being an anti-Communist. I will answer with a word of Spurgeon, "We cannot do otherwise than contend with those who contend with God."

page 114 If That Were Christ, Would You Give Him Your Blanket?

Lenin wrote: "All modern religion and churches are agencies of bourgeois reaction, which serve to protect exploitation and benumb the working class." The Leninists desire the destruction of the Christian religion. This is their plan and it must be defeated. We have to fight against Communism. Christianity has always fought against its foes. Never has the Church canonised any leader who has compromised with the enemy, only those who stood up against him. Those whom we call saints, far from bearing tyrannies quietly, went rather in the opposite direction. The gentle St. Bernard of Clairvaux wrote, "The Christian glorifies in the death of an infidel, because Christ is thus glorified," and Anselm of Canterbury, referring to the crusaders, said, "Our men, returning in victories and bearing many heads, fixed upon spikes, furnished a joyful spectacle to the people of God." If there is a general consensus in Christianity to call men who have spoken like this about the adversaries of Christianity, "saints," why should I criticize who say much less? My message is: "Expose the evil of Communism, defeat it, but glory in converting the Communists, not in having killed them."

Everyone honours Dietrich Bonhoeffer, martyred for Christ, who justified under the Nazis the murder of the tyrant. Why then should I be criticized as deploying an unjustified anti-Communism because I exhort Christians, "Win the tyrants for Christ."

Dear brethren criticized me for not preaching the pure Gospel.

My Gospel is full of the tears and blood and spittle and excrements and urine which sully the faces of the saints of God in Communist countries. It is a dirty Gospel. A Gospel which hides these ferocities committed against Christians, which does not call us to fight for freedom and righteousness, to sympathy and sharing with sufferers, is not a Gospel at all.

page 115 If That Were Christ, Would You Give Him Your Blanket?

Neither do I know any one important preacher in the history of the Church who should have preached the so-called pure Gospel.

John Chrysostom has also been charged with not sticking to the Gospel, because he said in his sermons that the Archbishop Theophilus of Alexandria was guilty of simony, of misappropriating funds and practising brutality. This saint raged against degenerate Eudoxia, Empress of Byzantium, calling her a second Jezebel. He had to go into exile for this. Was he wrong? Was St. Ambrose wrong not to allow the king to enter the church when he returned from an unjust war?

Why did Charles Spurgeon not stick to the pure Gospel? It was the time of the war of secession. And Spurgeon spoke out on the side of the Northern Confederation which fought for the abolishment of slavery in the Southern States. His books, yes, he himself, was burned in effigy in the Southern States by his fellow-Baptists. He did not restrict himself to preach only the personal salvation of souls.

From these preachers I have learned which is the true Gospel.

I am criticized for my strong attitude against the Orthodox Metropolitans and Protestant leaders in the Red camp who flatter the Communists.

How many truths exist? When Hitler invaded Norway, the Lutheran Archbishop Berggrav refused any compromise with him. He preferred to become a prisoner. Nearly unanimously, his pastors followed his example. This was, probably, right. But Romania, Bulgaria, the Baltic countries, Hungary and Czechoslovakia have been invaded by Soviets. I expect the world church leaders to tell me that Berggrav was wrong. Then I would understand. They greatly honour his attitude as right, but at the same time put in the leadership of the World Council of Churches the bishops and Protestant leaders of Russia, the Balticum, of Romania, Czechoslovakia and so on, who flatter the oppressors of their native countries.

Pope Pius XII and the leaders of the German Lutheran Church of that time, are criticized for not having taken up the defence of the Jews against Hitler. But the Jews were driven out of Poland and are discriminated against in the Soviet Union today. The very existence of the state of Israel is put under a question mark because of the Soviets. Do the official leaders of the churches in the Soviet Union take up the defence of the chosen people? Has the World Council of Churches done it?

Hitler had invaded Czechoslovakia. It was a shame that the church leaders of Germany of that time had not protested. With this everyone would agree. But Czechoslovakia has been invaded again by the Soviets. Did the official church leaders of the Soviet Union protest? The underground fighter, Krasnov-Levitin, protested publicly and was sentenced to seven years' imprisonment for this. Who represents the conscience of Christ in Russia today?

Others tell me, "Whatever you say about Communism might be right. But we should first put in order Christianity's house." It is like saying that every policeman must first be born again and become a saint before he gets a right to fight the gangsters. Christianity may have many shortcomings and failures. But it has the truth about Christ and about eternal life. The Church has a divine and human side. The divine side is constituted by the word of God, the sacraments, the fellowship with angels and the glorified saints, the Lordship of Christ, the beautiful examples of those who follow him in truth The Church has also a human side. It is constituted of sinners who can and do commit bad deeds. Communism has no divine side. It is not even human. It is anti-human. Communists don't persecute only Christians, they just hate. They hate each other. The Communist Kosygin hates the Communist Dubcek, the Communist Mao hates the Communist Kosygin, comrade Brezhnev hates comrade Tito, Stalin killed his nearest friends and Khrushchev kept his own wife in prison for eight years. In opposing Communism the Church is right, even as the unconverted policeman is right when he fights a gangster.

Christians should simultaneously put their own house in order and fight Communism.

"But," I am told, "there is surely something valuable in the work of the legal Churches. The activity of your mission meant a death-blow to the legal work." It did not. On the contrary, we helped it. Pastor Paul Hansson, secretary of the Lutheran World Federation, declared in ~Kristeligt Dagbladet~, Copenhagen, that they could help legally the official churches in Communist countries with four and a half million crowns, more than in previous years.

I will mention one more objection: "The church has its leaders, its Presidents of Protestant Unions, moderators or bishops. We have to listen to them. Some of these do not agree with you. Should we not rather listen to our bishops than to you who are not a bishop or hold no other high position in the church hierarchy?"

My answer might seem histrionic but it will be, "Ask that a bishopric should be given to me." How is it that Wurmbrand who has brought the message of the suffering Church in one third of the world has not yet been made a bishop or leader of some other Protestant denomination? That he does not belong to that denomination does not count. St. Ambrosius was made bishop before even being baptized. Neither did he have a D.D. He had only a commission from God for the Church. It is not my fault that the Underground Church is not considered and that its messengers are not received in high places. Milan Haimovici, the greatest hero of the Christian fight in Romania, a man who has suffered beyond human imagination and always maintained the highest standards, though an ordained Lutheran pastor and one of the greatest preachers in Romania, works now as a caretaker of a church in Western Germany. They had no place for him. He does not mind it. Violets enjoy the shadow. Neither do I care for high positions in the church. But I had to give this answer for those to whom church authority is everything. Not every Church leader is a child of God.

When two Church leaders wrote circular letters against me, one in U.S.A., the other in West Germany, I remembered that a fourteenth-century Catholic historian wrote about Wycliff: "That instrument of the devil, that enemy of the Church, that author of confusion to the common people, that image of hypocrites, that idol of heretics, that author of schisms, that sore of hatred, that coiner of lies, being struck with a horrible judgement of God, was smitten with palsy and continued to live till St. Sylvester's day, on which he breathed out his malicious spirit into the abodes of darkness." Excommunicated after death, Wycliff's skeleton has been exhumed and thrown away.

There are many faithful bishops and other Church leaders who have supported us.

To summarise, all the well-meant criticisms have two common denominators: critics consider Church life as they know it in the free world as being the normal. The

page 119 If That Were Christ, Would You Give Him Your Blanket?

Underground Church with its devices, nicknames, passwords, meetings in the wood, non-submission to state laws, infiltration into Communist ranks, they see as a Church gone wrong instead of seeing it as an entirely new phenomenon. It is the Church of the catacombs adjusted to conditions of the twentieth century, which has a perfected police, but also a perfected conspiratorial technique.
Others cannot find a label for me. They do not know in what frame to put me. I enter in no fixed set of rules. Every order of monks has its rules. So has any Protestant missionary society. But according to what rules did St. Francis Xavier, the first missionary to India, work, or, later on Hudson Taylor, Carey, Morrison, Patton, Livingstone? They established rules for those who would come after them. Until then they were rules for themselves, as it is always with pioneers, with spearheads. I do not compare myself with these great personalities, but on my modest level I am also a forerunner, the first to bring to the Western Evangelicals the message of the Underground Church. Neither did I have a predecessor to set me rules when I started the secret missionary work in the Soviet Army. I can be judged according to nobody's rules. If your country should be taken over by the Communists and you are forced to work underground, you will have to do it according to the rules learned from me.
There have been personal attacks against me - "madman, demon-possessed, Nazi, Fascist, anti-Semite, Communist, Anarchist, Jesuit agent, illiterate, fake, racketeer, etc." The slanders have never amounted to what has been said against those who shine today as beautiful stars in the spiritual sky. If these had to endure much worse than me, why should I, an unworthy servant of the Lord, defend my person?

page 120 If That Were Christ, Would You Give Him Your Blanket?

But I do defend the cause of the Underground Church. What I assert about its sufferings and victories is unchallengeable. This fact makes opponents try to side-track Christians from the message to the messenger. They would like people to discuss, "Who is Wurmbrand?" instead of "What is the Underground Church?" They will not succeed. The cause of the Underground Church has already become the cause of faithful Christians all over the free world. In one country of the free world after another, missions are formed to support it. Christ is on our side. We will win. Making no apologies to the critics, we go brazenly ahead, burning the candles at both ends.

I know very well that I am one-sided. There exists a holy one-sidedness. When the Jews were burned by the Nazis, a man had to be one-sided. It would have been wrong to put the questions: But have Jews never sinned against the German people? Have not some Jews done very wrong things in the time of the Weimar Republic? Was it absolutely wrong for Hitler to rebel, asking for more vital space when Britain had a world-wide empire, and Russia had a huge territory badly managed, and so on? Men, even children were burned. They had to be defended. All other things did not count. One-sidedness was the right attitude.

The Underground Church is not ideal. It has its sins, as has the legal Church in Communist countries. But it is persecuted. This obliges me to be on the side of the underground fighters. The Talmud says: "If an unrighteous man persecutes a righteous, God is on the side of the persecuted righteous. If a righteous man persecutes an unrighteous, God is on the side of the unrighteous. God is always on the side of the persecuted."

But taking decidedly the part of only one side, I don't have the deceptive certitudes which usually accompany one-sidedness. There exists no face without a back, no reality without a counter-reality. There is much to say for dialogue with the Communists. Contacts with the official Church are also very useful. And I ask all those in position for these to continue, but never forgetting the brethren in chains.

CHAPTER 20

My Last Word

Many Christians of the free world, if they had lived in Noah's time, would have said, "There are no signs of rain. It's just ridiculous to speak about the menace of a flood. Noah must be a right-wing crank who sees sinners under every bed. Why does he not keep to true religion, to the pure Gospel, instead of predicting an approaching geological catastrophe which is not his business? Geology does not belong to religion, neither floods, but only the personal, individual salvation through the blood of the Messiah who will come one day. In any case, there is no hurry." If they had lived in Noah's time they would have perished with the ungodly. The exceptions would have been few.

There are surely more signs of a Communist menace today than signs of a flood when Noah began to construct his ark. As for Noah's Gospel, he had it directly from God. God must have some idea as to which is the pure Gospel. And He instructs a teacher of righteousness not to stress for a while personal salvation, but to speak about geology and to make weather-predictions.

page 123 If That Were Christ, Would You Give Him Your Blanket?

This because the catastrophe to follow was to be a punishment from God, just as is Communism.

We have more signs of approaching catastrophe than in Noah's time. John Kennedy has been killed by Moscow-trained Oswald, Robert Kennedy by Sirhan, who declared in his diary that Communism is the best system. There is hardly a day in the U.S.A. without Communist-inspired blasts, killing of policemen, riots, occupation of university buildings.

Gus Hall, the secretary of the Communist Party of America, then a little man, said some twenty years ago, "I dream of the hour when the last congressman is strangled to death on the guts of the last preacher. And since the Christians seem to love to speak about the blood, why not give them a little of it? Slit the throats of their children and drag them over the mourner's bench and the pulpit and allow them to drown in their own blood and see whether they enjoy singing their hymns." (Quoted from the Hearing of the U.S.A. Senate Sub-Committee 86th Congress, p. 798). But Hall has worked hard since and he has arrived to say that Communists and liberal Christians share so many goals, that they can and should work together for the same thing. This same goal cannot be the victory of Christianity. Hall would not work for that. Then which is it? Should theologians and pastors have arrived to prepare unconsciously the bloodbath against their brethren? Communists are now sometimes guest speakers at the principal services of churches in the U.S.A.

The influence of Communism in Italy and France has been already mentioned.

In Britain their influence is great in the trade unions. But not only there. The ~Liverpool Daily Post~ of the 29th of May 1968 has an admission of Sir Hugh Greene, then the Director-General of the British Broadcasting Corporation, that he has Communists on his staff, "but they are none of his business." They are the business of the listeners who can be brain-washed by disguised pro-Communism.

In all Arab countries, the trade-unions, the universities, the army, the police, and the Moslem brotherhoods are infiltrated by the Communists.

According to ~A.B.N.~ of May 1969, the Kremlin finances its world-wide offensive as follows: Brazil, 40 millions a year, Argentina 30, Mexico 24, Chile 14, India 30, Indonesia 300. Apart from India, only Kerala gets a part of 66 millions, West Germany 60, Turkey 10 and so on.

In Japan, professors have committed suicide because of the Communist-inspired turmoil on the campuses, during which they have been compelled to confess publicly their crimes, exactly as in China.

We have shown the clouds of a near tempest in Africa.

By 1972 the Chinese Communists, who already have the nuclear bomb, will also have the missile to launch it and they are determined to do so. The Russian Communists have their orbital bomb. It may fly over your head as you read these lines. Treaties with them are of no value. They don't keep their promises.

Communism can be overcome. God has a chosen tool for this purpose. It is the Underground Church which gives to the peoples oppressed by the Communists the inspiration of the highest possible ideal - the service of Christ; the Underground which infiltrates even the high-rank Communists and can win them for Christ.

I have before me a bunch of letters from Christian prisoners of the Soviet Union. They show us the quality of its fighters.

A few quotes from them. From one: "Communists have put on the wall of our cell a poster 'Reason is against Religion.' But weapons are used only against the living, never against the dead. So this poster told me that religion is alive, and I thanked God." Another describes a scene from his trial. A Christian child was brought as witness for the prosecution against him. "But our children are unafraid. When asked by the judge, 'Who performs the baptisms?,' the child answered, 'This is an internal affair of the Christian Church. I can give you no information about it. The secrets of the Church are not for unbelievers. You first repent, then you'll be in the right to know what happens in the Church.'" This child knew that by speaking thus he might be taken away for ever from Mummy and Daddy. But behind the Iron Curtain, Christ is loved in the only manner in which He should be loved, i.e. to the point of folly, and sacrifices do not count.

My son, Mihai, has also been brought up in the aura of arrests and trials. They were familiar to him.

In another letter from Soviet prisons we find Brother Alfred Boettcher's last word before court: "I have one aim in my life. This is to bring as many sinners as possible to Christ. Communists usually finish by putting in prison their own comrades. When you, Mr. Judge, will sit on this form, remember my witness for Christ."

The Underground Church fights for the salvation of souls. But like Noah, she does not remain in the sphere of pure religion. She is also a vanguard fighter for freeing the world of the Communist menace.

She is persecuted, but she can say the words addressed once by Theodor Beza to the king of Nevarra: "Sire, it belongs in truth to the Church of God, in the name of which I speak, to receive blows and not to give them. But it will please your Majesty to remember that it is an anvil which has worn out many hammers."

The Christians of the free world must support whole-heartedly the Underground Church or see in this generation their own Churches subverted and destroyed. This is the choice.

There is one greater than the Church. Its head, Jesus Christ, will pour out the spirit of grace upon His followers everywhere. Instead of useless talks about the merging of empty churches of different denominations in the West, there will be a real union of the free Church and the Church of the martyrs.

One of our couriers writes: "I recall the joy the sister in Russia had last night, when she saw the Russian Bibles on the table. She literally ran to it and kissed the stock of Bibles, then circled around them the husband, the wife and I and prayed. The next morning, the brother was up at five o'clock, wrapping them up to distribute them." Such joy and love is contagious. From the Underground Church, the Western Christians will learn the enthusiasm, the ecstasy, the cherishing of the Word of God, and of the high calling to be a soldier in Christ's army, the divine impatience to see the Kingdom of God coming.

If my personal desire counted for anything, I would retire for quiet communion with God, as I had it in the solitary cell. But God decides. I can have communion with Him only to the diapason of the shrieks of my beaten and tortured brethren. My place is on the twentieth century's Golgotha.

Christ suffers here again in His mystical body.

On His right side suffers the penitent thief. The last words of Zinoviev, president of the Communist International, shot by Stalin, were, "Listen, Israel, the Lord our God is one God." The last words of Iagoda, head of Russia's Secret Police, were, "There must be a God. He punishes my sins." The last words of Yaroslavski, president of the International Organization of the Godless, were, "Please, burn all my books. Look, the Holy One. He waits for me since long. He is here."

On the left side are the impenitent Communists. They have the deep suffering of a bitter heart.

Then there is the huge crowd of millions who just stand by and look upon what is happening, like on Golgotha. And you can hear from the bride's mouth the cry, a cry like that wherewith Jesus died. To make you hear that cry was the purpose of this book. It is not so much a cry of suffering. This they have learned to bear. It is a cry of anguish for the multitudes of Communists and Communist-indoctrinated souls who cannot come to Christ because there is nobody to instruct them.

I would like to leave the work of supporting the Underground Church and go to theological universities, to pastors' studies, to Church leaders, and tell them, "Just give up cutting the Bible asunder, your worthless theological debates, your endless and fruitless discussions about merging or not merging into nothingness." Some call me mad. I would cry like crazy that souls go to hell in the Soviet camp, after having lived their whole earthly life in hell. "It is because of your neglect. Don't you fear God? Don't you know that you will give account to Him?"
I can breathe not only gentle words, I can breathe also fire. If good words would not help, I would vituperate, like Jesus did at times.
The Christians in Communist countries have borne prison without expecting any help from the West. They have kept the faith. To spread it to all creatures, as their all-embracing love commands, is not in their power without our help.
The souls who perish because of the Communist poison are an overwhelming sorrow, a painful wound on their soul and mine. Would you not try to heal this wound?

I have described atrocious sufferings through which Christians pass there. It was not to make you pity those hapless ones, but to pity those who have the opportunity to be useful, and do not take it, leave alone the galleries of nonentities who quibble at this or that of my sayings. I am not infallible. Not everything that I say must be right. My character and my deeds are also far from perfect.
But that the Church of the free world must join hands with the Underground Church in the fight for Christ, against Communism, is surely right. This do, and God will bless you

The End of "If That Were Christ, ..."

In God's Underground

(formerly titled as "Christ in the Communist Prisons")
by Richard Wurmbrand
Copyright 1988

Edited by Charles Foley

Dedication

Dedicated to the Christian martyrs who sacrificed their lives in the service of God and died courageously following torture in Communist lands.

I am a Lutheran minister who has spent more than 14 years in different prisons because of my Christian belief, but that in itself is not the reason for the existence of this book. I have always disliked the idea that a man who has been unjustly imprisoned must write or preach about his sufferings. Campanella, the great author of ~City of the Sun~ was kept in prison for 27 years; but that he was tortured and lay 40 hours on a bed of iron nails we know from his medieval biographers, not from him.

The prison years did not seem too long for me, for I discovered, alone in my cell, that beyond belief and love there is a delight in God: a deep and extraordinary ecstasy of happiness that is like nothing in this world. And when I came out of jail I was like someone who comes down from a mountain top where he has seen for miles around the peace and beauty of the countryside, and now returns to the plain.

First, I should explain why, more than two years ago, I came to the West. When I was released from jail in 1964 with several thousand other political and religious prisoners, it was because the Rumanian Popular Republic had adopted a more "friend]y" policy to the West. I was given the smallest parish in the country. My congregation numbered 35. If 36 people entered the church, I was told, there would be trouble. But I had much to say, and there were many who wished to hear. I traveled secretly to preach in towns and villages, leaving before the police could hear that a stranger was in their district. This, too, had to stop. Pastors who helped me were dismissed by the State, and I could become the cause of new arrests and confessions obtained by torture. I was a burden to those I wished to serve, and a danger.

Friends urged me to try to leave the country so that I might speak for the underground church in the West. It was plain, from the statements of Western Church leaders, that some did not know and others did not want to know the truth about religious persecution under the Communists. Prelates from Europe and America came on friendly visits and sat down to banquets with our inquisitors and persecutors. We asked them why. "As Christians," they said, "we have to be friendly with everybody, you know, even the Communists." Why, then, were they not friendly to those who had suffered? Why did they not ask one word about the priests and pastors who had died in prison or under torture? Or leave a little money for the families that remained?

The Archbishop of Canterbury came in 1965 and attended a service. Dr. Ramsey did not know that the congregation consisted of officials and secret police agents and their wives - the same audience that turns out on every such occasion. It had listened to visiting rabbis and muftis, bishops and Baptists. After they had returned home, we read of their approving comments on freedom in Rumania. A British theologian wrote a book in which he declared that Christ would have admired the Communist prison system.

Meanwhile, I lost my license to preach. I was blacklisted and constantly followed and watched. I still sometimes preached at the homes of friends who did not count the danger, so I was not surprised when, some time after secret negotiations had begun for my departure to the West, a stranger asked me to his house. He gave the address, but no name. When I called he was alone.

"I want to do you a service," he said. I recognized that he was a secret police agent. "A friend of mine says that the dollars have been received for you. Probably you'd like to leave the country at once. My friend is worried. You are a man who speaks his mind, and you are fresh from prison. They think it might be better if you were kept a while - or that a member of your family stays here to vouch for your good behavior. Of course, your release will be unconditional..."

I gave him no assurances. They had the dollars and that must be enough. Christian organizations in the West had paid œ2,500 in ransom money for me. Selling citizens brings in foreign currency and helps the Popular Republic's budget. A Rumanian joke says, "We'd sell the Prime Minister if anyone would buy him." Jews are sold to Israel at œ1,000 a head, members of the German minority to West Germany, Armenians to America. Scientists, doctors and professors cost about œ5,000 apiece.

Next I was summoned openly to police headquarters. An officer told me: "Your passport is ready. You can go when you like, and where you like, and preach as much as you wish. But don't speak against us. Keep to the Gospel. Otherwise you will be silenced, for good. We can hire a gangster who'll do it for $1,000 - or we can bring you back, as we've done with other traitors. We can destroy your reputation in the West by contriving a scandal over money or sex." He said I could go. That was my unconditional release.

I came to the West. Doctors examined me, and one said: "You're as full of holes as a sieve." He could not believe that my bones had mended and my tuberculosis healed without medical aid. 'Don't ask me about treatment," he said. "Ask the One who kept you alive, and in Whom I don't believe."

My new pastorate for the underground church began. I met friends of our Scandinavian Mission in Norway, and when I preached there, a woman in the front row began to weep. Later she told me that years ago she had read of my arrest and had prayed for me ever since. "Today I came to church not knowing who would preach," she said. "As I listened I realized who was speaking, and I wept." I learned that thousands of people had been praying for me, as they still pray daily for those in Communist prisons. Children whom I had never met wrote, saying: "Please come to our town - our prayers for you have been answered.

In churches and universities all over Europe and America I found that people - although they were deeply moved, often, by what I said - did not believe that a danger really threatened them. "Communism here would be different," they said. "Our Communists are few, and harmless." We thought the same in Rumania, once, when the Party was small. The world is full of small Communist parties, waiting. When a tiger is young you may play with it: when it grows up, it will devour you.

I met Western Church leaders who advised me to preach the Gospel and avoid attacks on Communism; this advice I had also from the secret police in Bucharest. But wrong must be called by name. Jesus told the Pharisees that they were "vipers," and for this, and not the Sermon on the Mount, he suffered crucifixion.

I denounce Communism because I love the Communists. We can hate the sin, while loving the sinner. Christians have a duty to win the souls of Communists, and if we fail to do so, they will overwhelm the West and uproot Christianity among us here as well. The Red rulers are unhappy and wretched men. They can be saved, and God's way is to send a man. He did not come himself to guide the Jews from Egypt, he sent Moses. So we must win over to God Communist leaders in every field - artistic, scientific and political. By winning those who mold the minds of men behind the Iron Curtain, you win the people they lead and influence.

The conversion of Svetlana Stalin, only daughter of the greatest mass-murderer of Christians, a soul

page 5 In God's Underground

brought up in the strictest Communist discipline, proves that there is a better weapon against Communism than the nuclear bomb: it is the love of Christ.

page 6 blank

page 7 In God's Underground

PART ONE

The first half of my life ended on February 29, 1948. I was walking alone down a street in Bucharest when a black Ford car braked sharply beside me and two men jumped out. They seized my arms and thrust me into the back seat, while a third man beside the driver kept me covered with a pistol. The car sped through the thin traffic of a Sunday evening; then, in a street called Calea Rahova, we turned in through steel gates. I heard them clang behind us.

My kidnappers belonged to the Communist Secret Police. This was their headquarters. Inside, my papers, my belongings, my tie and shoelaces, and finally my name were taken from me. "From now on," said the official on duty, "you are Vasile Georgescu."

It was a common name. The authorities did not want even the guards to know whom they were watching, in case questions should be asked abroad, where I was well known. I was to disappear, like so many others, without trace.

Calea Rahova was a new jail and I was the first prisoner. But prison was not a new experience for me. I had been arrested during the war by the Fascists who ruled in Hitler's day, and again when the Communists took over. There was a small window high in the concrete wall of the cell, two plank beds, the usual bucket in the comer. I sat waiting for the interrogators, knowing what questions they would ask and what answers I must give.

I know what fear is well enough, but at that moment I felt none. This arrest, and all that would follow, was the answer to a prayer I had made, and I hoped that it would give new meaning to my past life. I did not know what strange and wonderful discoveries lay in store for me.

My father had a book at home which advised young people how to plan a career as a lawyer, a doctor, an army officer and so on. Once, when I was about five, he brought it out and asked my brothers what they would like to be. When they had chosen, my father turned to me, the youngest child. "And what will you be, Richard." I looked again at the title of the book, which was General Guide to the Professions, and thought about it. Then I replied, "I'd like to be General Guide."

Since then fifty years have passed, fourteen of them in prison, and I have often thought about those words. It is said that we make our choices early in life, and I know no better description of my present work than that of "general guide."

The idea of becoming a Christian pastor was, however, far from my thoughts, and from those of my Jewish parents. My father died when I was nine and our family was always short of money, and often of bread. A man once offered to buy me a suit of clothes, but when we went to the shop, and the tailor brought out his best, he said, "Much too good for a boy like this." I still remember his voice. My schooling was poor, but we had many books at home. Before I was ten I had read them all and become as great a skeptic as the Voltaire I admired. Yet religion interested me. I watched the rituals in Orthodox and Roman Catholic churches, and once in a synagogue I saw a man I knew praying for his sick daughter. She died next day, and I asked the rabbi, "What God could refuse such a desperate prayer?" and he had no answer. I could not believe in an all-powerful being who left so many people to starve and suffer, still less than he had put on earth one man of such goodness and wisdom as Jesus Christ.

I grew up and went into the business world of Bucharest. I did well. and before I was twenty-five I had plenty of money to spend in flashy bars and cabarets and on the girls of "Little Paris," as they called the capital. I did not care what happened so long as my appetite for fresh sensation was fed. It was a life which many envied, yet it left me in great distress of mind. I knew it to be counterfeit and that I was throwing away like trash something in me that was good and which could be put to use. Although I was sure there was no God, I wished, in my heart, that it was otherwise, that there should be a reason for existing in the universe.

One day I went into a church and stood with other people before a statue of the Virgin. They were praying, and I tried to say with them, "Hail Mary, full of grace..." but I felt quite empty. I said to the image, "Really, you are like stone. So many plead, and you have nothing for them."

After my marriage, I continued to pursue other girls. I went on chasing pleasure, lying, cheating, asking myself no questions, hurting others, until, at twenty-seven, these excesses combined with early privations to bring on tuberculosis. It was at that time a dangerous disease and it seemed for a while that I might die. I was afraid. At a sanatorium in the countryside I rested for the first time in my life. I lay looking out at the trees, and thought about the past. It came back to me like scenes from an agonizing play. My mother wept for me, my wife had wept; so many harmless girls had wept. I had seduced and slandered, mocked and bluffed, all for a sham. I lay there and tears came.

In that sanatorium I prayed for the first time in my life, the prayer of an atheist. I said something like this: "God, I know that You do not exist. But if perchance You exist, which I deny - it is for You to reveal Yourself to me; it is not my duty to seek You."

My whole philosophy had been materialistic until then, but my heart could not be satisfied with it.

I believed in theory that man is only matter and that, when he dies, he decomposes into salt and minerals. Yet I had lost my father, and had attended other funerals, and I could never think of the dead except as people. Who can think of his dead child or wife as a heap of minerals? It is always the beloved person who remains in the mind. Can our minds be so mistaken?

My heart was full of contradictions. I had passed hours in noisy places of amusement among half-naked girls and exciting music; but I liked also to take lonely walks through cemeteries, sometimes on winter days when snow lay heavy on the graves. I said to myself: "One day I, too, will be dead, and snow will fall on my tomb, while the living will laugh, embrace and enjoy life. I shall be unable to participate in their joys; I shall not even know them. I will simply not exist any more. After a short time, nobody will remember me. So what use is anything?"

In considering social and political problems I thought that perhaps one day mankind would find some system that would provide freedom, security and wealth for all. But when everybody is happy, nobody will want to die, and the thought that they will have one day to leave their happy life may make them unhappier than ever.

I remembered reading that Krupp, who had become a millionaire by creating weapons of death, was himself horrified of death. Nobody was allowed to speak the word "death" in his presence. He divorced his wife because she told him about the death of a nephew. He had everything, but was unhappy because he knew that happiness could not last, that he would have to leave it behind and rot in a tomb.

Although I had read the Bible for its literary interest, my mind closed at the point where the adversaries challenge Christ: "Descend from the cross if you are the son of God"; and, instead, He dies. It seemed to prove His foes were right, and yet I found my thoughts going spontaneously to Christ. I said to myself, "I wish I could have met and talked to Him." Each day my meditation ended with this thought.

There was a woman patient in the sanatorium who was too ill to leave her room, but somehow she heard of me and sent a book about the Brothers Ratisbonne, who founded an order to convert Jews. Others had been praying for me, a Jew, while I wasted my life.

After some months in the sanatorium, I grew slightly better, and went to convalesce in a mountain village. Here I became friendly with an old carpenter, and one day he gave me a Bible. It was no ordinary Bible, as I learned later: he and his wife had spent hours every day praying over it for me.

I lay on the sofa in my cottage, reading the New Testament, and in the days that passed Christ seemed to me as real as the woman who brought my meals. But not everyone who recognizes Christ is saved; Satan believes, and is not a Christian. I said to Jesus, "You'll never have me for a disciple. I want money, travel, pleasure. I have suffered enough. Yours is the way of the Cross, and even if it is the way of truth as well, I won't follow it." His answer came into my head, like a plea: "Come my way! Do not fear the Cross! You will find that it is the greatest of joys."

I read on, and again tears filled my eyes. I could not help comparing Christ's life with mine. His outlook was so pure, mine so tainted; His nature so selfless, mine so greedy; His heart so full of love, mine filled with rancor. My old certainties began to crumble in the face of this wisdom and truthfulness. Christ had always appealed to the depths of my heart, to which my conscience had no access, and now I said to myself, "If I had a mind like His, I could rely on its conclusions." I was like the man in the ancient Chinese story, trudging exhausted under the sun, who came to a great oak and rested in its shade. "What a happy chance I found you!" he said. But the oak replied, "It is no chance. I have been waiting for you for 400 years." Christ had waited all my life for me. Now we met.

page 12 In God's Underground

This conversation took place six months after my marriage to Sabina, a girl who had never spared a thought for spiritual things. It was a terrible blow to her. She was young and beautiful, and she had lacked so much in her childhood. She hoped a happier life was beginning, when the man she loved, her partner in pleasure, changed into a devout believer who talked of becoming a pastor. She confessed to me later that she had even thought of suicide

One Sunday, when I proposed going to evening service, she burst into tears. She said she wanted to see a film.

"All right," I said. "We'll go - because I love you." We walked from one theater to another and I chose the film which looked most suggestive. When we left I took her to a cafe and she ate a cream cake. I said, "Now go home to bed. I want to look for a girl and take her to a hotel."

"What did you say?"

"It is plain enough. You go home. I want to find a girl to take to a hotel."

"How can you say such things?"

"But you made me go to the cinema, and you saw what the hero did - why shouldn't I do the same? If we go tomorrow and the days after to such films ... every man becomes what he looks at; but if you want me to be a good husband, come to church with me sometimes."

She thought about it. Then, quietly, gently she began to come more and more often to church. But she still hankered after the gay life and when she wanted to go out somewhere, I went too. One evening we went to a drunken party. The air was full of smoke. Couples were dancing and making love openly. Suddenly my wife was disgusted with it all and said, "Oh, let's go! Now!"

I said, "Why leave? We've only just come." We stayed until midnight. Again she wanted to go home, and again I refused. It was the same at 1 A.M. And again at 2 A.M. When I saw she was thoroughly sickened by the whole affair, I agreed to go.

We came out into the cold air. Sabina said: "Richard! I'm going straight to the pastor's house to make him baptize me. It will be like taking a bath after all this filth."
I laughed and said, "You've waited so long. You can wait until morning now. Let the poor pastor sleep."

4

Our whole life changed. Before, we had quarreled over nothing. I should have divorced Sabina with barely a second thought if she had interfered with my enjoyment. Now a son was born to us. Mihai was a gift from God, for in the old days we did not want a child that might have hampered our pleasures.
We were happy when the Rev. George Stevens, head of the Church of England Mission in Bucharest, asked me to become its secretary. I did my best to adapt my business instincts, but trouble arose when I persuaded an insurance agent to accept a bribe for dropping a claim against the Mission. To my surprise, Mr. Stevens did not seem to understand the arrangement I proposed. "But who is right?" he asked. "The Company or we?" I said that, in fact, the claim was justified. "Then we must pay," he said, closing what was to me an enlightening exchange.
In 1940 relations between Rumania and Britain were severed, and the English clergy had to leave. Since there was no one else, I had to try and carry on the Church work.
I studied and taught myself to preach, and was ordained as a Lutheran pastor. I had considered Rumania's rival denominations. The Orthodox church, to which four out of five people belonged, seemed to be overfond of outward show. I felt in the same way about the Catholic ritual: one Easter Sunday, after sitting through the Latin liturgy and a political address by the bishop, I left without even hearing in my own language that Christ was risen from the dead. I was attracted by the simpler Protestant services which made the sermon - in which one could teach and set a feast for the mind - its central part. And then, without his greatness, I had some spiritual kinship with Martin Luther. He was a choleric, quarrelsome man, but he also loved Jesus so deeply that he came to think man is saved not by his good deeds but by his faith. So I became a Lutheran.

I had always regarded clergymen with wariness, and above all those who might ask whether I was "saved." Now, although I wore no clerical garb, the impulse was all but irresistible to take the whole world as my parish. I could not make enough converts. I kept a list of my congregation and pulled it out in buses and waiting rooms to ask myself what each was doing at that moment. If one of them defected, I was sunk in misery for hours. It was a physical pain like a knife in my heart and I had to ask God to take it from me. I could not go on living with it.

5

Under Stalin's conditions for economic help to Hitler during the war there was a partitioning of Eastern Europe. One-third of our national territory was divided between Russia, Bulgaria and Hungary. Nazi influence supported the growth of an "Iron Guard" movement whose members tried to harness the Orthodox church to political terrorism. The night before assassinating Premier Calinescu, their chief opponent, nine fanatics spent the hours prostrate on a church floor, with their bodies forming a cross. After that, the Iron Guard helped Hitler's protege, Gen. Ion Antonescu, to seize power. King Carol was forced to abdicate in favor of his young son Michael, in whose name Antonescu ruled as a dictator.

Now the Iron Guard had a free hand to deal with Jews, Communists, Protestants. Murder walked the streets. Our mission was accused of treachery. I was threatened daily. One Sunday from the pulpit I saw a group of men in the green shirts of the Iron Guard filing quietly into the back of the church. The congregation, facing the altar, were unaware of the strangers, but I saw revolvers in their hands. I thought, if this were to be my last sermon, it should be a good one.

It was about the hands of Jesus. I told how they had wiped away tears, and lifted children, and fed the hungry. They had healed the sick, and been nailed to the cross, and they had blessed the disciples before He ascended to heaven.

Then I raised my voice. "But YOU! What have YOU done with your hands?"

The congregation looked amazed. They were holding prayer books.

I thundered, "You are killing and beating and torturing innocent people! Do you call yourself Christians? Clean your hands, you sinners!"

The Iron Guard men looked furious. Yet they did not care to break up the service. They stood with guns drawn while I said a prayer and the benediction, and the audience began to leave. When nearly all had safely gone, I came down from the pulpit and stepped behind a curtain. I heard running footsteps and shouts of "Where's Wurmbrand? After him!" before I passed through a small door, turning the key behind me: this secret exit had been built many years before. Along corridors I found my way to a side street, and so escaped.

As the war progressed, many from the Christian minorities - Adventists, Baptists, Pentecostals - were massacred or driven into concentration camps with the Jews. All my wife's family were carried off - she never saw them again. I was arrested by the Fascists on three occasions; tried, interrogated, beaten and imprisoned. So I was well prepared for what was to come under the Communists.

6

Through the cell window at Calea Rahova I could see a corner of the yard. As I looked, a priest was let in through the gates. He moved quickly across the asphalt and through a door - an informer, come to report on his congregation.

I knew that I faced questioning, ill-treatment, possibly years of imprisonment and death, and I wondered if my faith was strong enough. I remembered then that in the Bible it is written 366 times - once for every day of the year - "Don't be afraid!": 366 times, not merely 365, to account for Leap Year. And this was February 29 - coincidence which told me I need not fear!

The interrogators showed no hurry to see me, for Communist jails are like archives, to be drawn on at any time when information may be needed. I was questioned again and again over the whole fourteen and a half years I spent in prison. I knew that in the eyes of the Party my connections with the Western church missions and with the World Council of Churches were treasonable, but there was much else of importance which they did not know and must not learn from me.

I had prepared myself for prison and torture as a soldier in peacetime prepares for the hardships of war. I had studied the lives of Christians who had faced similar pains and temptations to surrender and thought how I might adapt their experiences. Many who had not so prepared themselves were crushed by suffering, or deluded into saying what they should not.

Priests were always told by interrogators, "As a Christian you must promise to tell us the whole truth about everything." For my part, since I was sure of being found guilty whatever I said, I decided that under torture I might incriminate myself, but never betray friends who had helped me to spread the Gospel. So I planned to leave my interrogators more confused at the end of their investigation than at the start. I would mislead them to the hilt.

My first task was somehow to get a message out to warn my colleagues and let my wife know where I was. I was able to suborn a guard to act as intermediary, for at that time my family still had money. He received about œ500 for carrying messages over the next few weeks. Then everything we owned was seized.

The guard brought word that the Swedish Ambassador had protested about my disappearance, saying that I had many well-wishers in Scandinavia and Britain. The Foreign Minister, Mrs. Ana Pauker, replied that nothing was known of my whereabouts since I had secretly left the country some time ago.

7

The Ambassador, as a neutral envoy, could hardly press the matter further, least of all with Mrs. Pauker, a lady before whom strong men quailed. I had met her, and knew her father, a clergyman called Rabinovici, who told me sadly, "Ana has no feeling for anything Jewish in her heart." She studied medicine, then turned to teaching at the English Church Mission before embracing the Communist cause and marrying an engineer of similar views called Marcel Pauker. Both were in and out of prison for conspiracy, but Ana proved the more violent partisan. She went to live in Moscow and Marcel followed, with less enthusiasm. During one of Stalin's pre-war purges he was executed - shot, it was said, by his wife's hand, and few doubted the story. Ana was outwardly a woman: inwardly she was "topful," like Lady Macbeth, "from crown to toe of direst cruelty." After spending the rest of the war as a Soviet citizen in Moscow, with officer's rank in the Red Army, Mrs. Pauker returned in the role of Foreign Minister to become the dominating influence in Rumania.

Such was her loyalty to Russia that when, on a fine day, someone asked why she was walking through Bucharest with her umbrella up, Ana is said to have retorted, "Haven't you heard the weather report? It's raining heavily in Moscow."

After a group of political leaders, headed by young King Michael, had courageously deposed General Antonescu and ended his partnership with Germany, a meeting was summoned in Moscow to decide on the shape of the post-war world. Churchill said to Stalin, "How would it do for you to have ninety per cent predominance in Rumania, while we have ninety per cent of the say in Greece?" And he wrote these words on a sheet of paper. Stalin paused. Then he made a large tick with a blue pencil on the paper and passed it back.

A million Russian troops poured into Rumania. These were our new"allies."

"The Russians are coming!" was no joke-phrase for us. The new occupiers had only one idea in life: to drink, rob and ravage the "capitalist exploiters." Thousands of women of all ages and conditions were raped by soldiers who burst into their homes. Men were robbed in the street of such novelties as bicycles and wristwatches. When order in the Red Army was restored by shooting, and shops began to raise their shutters, the visiting troops were astonished by the goods on show, and even more when they learned that most of the customers were farmers and factory workers.

The capitulation proclaimed on August 23, 1944, is still celebrated each year as the day when Rumania was freed. In fact, its terms were used to strip the country of its entire navy, most of its merchant fleet, half its rolling stock and every automobile. Farm produce, horses, cattle and all our stocks of oil and petrol were carried off to Russia. It was thus that Rumania, which had been known as the granary of Europe, became a starvation area.

8

On the day of my conversion I had prayed, "God, I was an atheist. Now let me go to Russia to work as a missionary among atheists, and I shall not complain if afterwards I have to spend all the rest of my life in prison." But God did not send me on the long journey to Russia. Instead, the Russians had come to me.

page 19 In God's Underground

During the war, in spite of persecution, our mission's following had greatly increased, and many of those who had harried Jews and Protestants now worshipped side by side with their former victims.

After the war, my work for the Western church missions continued. I had an office, equipment, secretaries - a "front" for my campaign.

I speak good Russian. It was easy for me to talk to Russian soldiers in streets, shops and trains. I did not wear clerical dress, and they took me for an ordinary citizen. The younger men, especially, were bewildered and homesick. They were pleased to be shown the sights of Bucharest, and invited to a friendly home. I had help from many young Christians who also spoke Russian. I told the girls they could use their beauty to help bring men to Christ. One girl saw a soldier alone in a wine-shop. She sat beside him and accepted his offer of a glass, then suggested that they go somewhere quieter to talk. "With you, anywhere!" said the Russian, and she brought him to my house. The soldier was converted, and brought others to us.

We secretly published the Gospel in Russian. More than 100,000 books were distributed in cafes, parks, railway stations, wherever Russians were to be found, over three years. They were passed from hand to hand until they fell to pieces. Many of our helpers were arrested, but none gave me away.

We were astonished not only by the number of conversions, but by their naturalness. The Russians were wholly ignorant of religion, but it was as if, deep in their hearts, they had been seeking truth; and now they recognized it with delight. They were mostly young peasants who had worked on the land, sowing and harvesting, and they knew in their bones that someone orders nature; but they had been brought up as atheists, and they believed that they were, just as many people believe themselves to be Christians, and are not.

I met a young painter from outer Siberia on a train journey, and told him about Christ as we traveled.

"Now I understand!" he said. "I only knew what they taught us in schools, that religion is a tool of imperialism, and so on. But I used to walk in an old cemetery near my home, where I could be alone. I often went to a small, abandoned house among the graves." (I understood that this was the cemetery's Orthodox chapel.)

"On the wall there was a painting of a man nailed to a cross. I thought, 'He must have been a great criminal to be punished so.' But if he were a criminal, why did his picture have the place of honor – as if he were Marx or Lenin? I decided that they had first thought him a criminal, and later found that he was innocent, and so put up his picture in remorse."

I told the painter, "You are half-way to the truth." When we reached our destination, hours later, he knew all that I could tell him about Jesus. As we parted, he said: "I planned to steal something tonight, as we all do. Now how can I? I believe in Christ."

9

We worked among Rumanian Communists, too. Every book had to pass through their censorship. We presented books which had Karl Marx's picture as a frontispiece, and a few opening pages repeating his and Lenin's arguments against religion. The censor read no further - which was just as well, since the rest of the book was wholly Christian in content. The censor liked another of our titles - ~Religion: an opiate for the people~. Faced with piles of old and new books to read, he did not trouble to look inside, where he would have found only Christian arguments. Sometimes a censor would pass anything for a bottle of brandy.

The number of Rumanian Communists had increased from a few thousands to millions, for a Party card could mean the difference between eating and going hungry. Stalin had installed a "united front" government of his own choice with the leader of the "Ploughman's Front," Groza, at its head. Apart from Ana Pauker, who is said to have "invented" Groza, power was wielded by the Russians through three veteran Party comrades: Lucretiu Patrascanu, appointed Minister of Justice; Teohari Georgescu, who took over police and "security" as Minister of the Interior; and Gheorghe Gheorghiu-Dej, a tough railway worker who was First Secretary of the Party.

I attended, in the role of observer, a meeting of Orthodox priests which Gheorghiu-Dej addressed after the Communist take-over. Jovial and stubby, he assured them all that he was prepared to "forgive and forget." In spite of their church's many links in the past with the Iron Guard and other Right-wing organizations, the State would go on paying their salaries as before. His concluding remarks about the similarity between Christian and Communist ideals won a cheer.

On informal occasions Gheorghiu-Dej was frank about his atheism and his conviction that Communism would spread over the world, yet he could speak indulgently of his old mother, who filled their homes with icons and brought his daughters up as Orthodox believers. In eleven years in prison under the old regime, Dej had time to study the Bible and discuss religion with many imprisoned sectarians, with whom he expressed sympathy. Escaping from jail just before the Russians came, he would have been caught and killed by the dictator Antonescu if he had not been sheltered by a friendly priest. But if religion had touched Gheorghu-Dej's life in his days of struggle, there was no room for it now that he was on top. The wife who had waited so long for his return was discarded, her place being taken by a film actress. The house was full of servants and suitors, Dej was rich and famous, and in no mood to listen to anyone.

When someone guided the conversation at his meeting with the priests into spiritual channels, he replied with standard Party arguments. He assured us that we would all have complete liberty of conscience in the new Rumania, and in return my colleagues promised to make no trouble for the State. I listened, and kept my reservations to myself. Many priests came forward at that meeting as champions of the Communist way of life, but sooner or later they stumbled over some Party doctrine and ended up in prison.

The campaign to undermine religion developed rapidly. All church funds and estates were nationalized. A Communist Ministry of Cults controlled the priesthood completely, paying salaries and confirming appointments. The aging Patriarch Nicodim, a virtual recluse, was accepted as Orthodox figurehead, but the Party needed a more supple instrument and Dej decided that he knew the very man: the priest who had hidden him from the Fascists the year before. So Father Justinian Marina, an obscure seminary teacher from Rimincul-Vilcea, was made a bishop, and soon all Rumania's fourteen million Orthodox churchgoers knew that he was their Patriarch in everything but name.

The next task was to tear apart the Roman and Greek Catholics, of whom there were two and a half million. The Greek Catholics, usually called Uniates, while keeping many traditions of their own (including the right of priests to marry), accepted the Pope's supremacy. Now they were taken over and forcibly "merged" with the obedient Orthodox Church. Most of the priests, and all the bishops, who objected to this shotgun wedding were arrested, their dioceses abolished and their property seized. The Roman Catholics, ordered to break with the Vatican. refused; they, too, paid dearly for their resistance. With priests filling the jails and lurid stories of their treatment spreading through the country, the minority religions simply bowed the head and waited to hear their fate.

10

They did not have long to wait. In 1945, a "Congress of Cults" was called in the Rumanian Parliament building, with 4,000 representatives of the clergy filling the seats. Bishops, priests, pastors, rabbis, mullahs applauded as it was announced that Comrade Stalin (whose vast picture hung on the wall) was patron of the congress – they preferred not to remember that he was at the same time president of the World Atheist's Organization. The trembling old Patriarch Nicodim blessed the assembly and the Prime Minister, Groza, opened it. He told us that he was a priest's son himself, and his lavish promises of support, echoed by other personages who followed him, were appreciatively cheered.

One of the chief Orthodox bishops said in reply that in the past many political rivulets had entered the great river of his church – green, blue, tri-colored – and he welcomed the prospect that a red one should join it, too. One leader after another, Calvinist, Lutheran, the Chief Rabbi, rose in turn to speak. All expressed willingness to co-operate with the Communists. My wife, beside me, could bear no more. She said, "Go and wash this shame from the face of Christ!"

"If I do, you'll lose your husband," I replied.

"I don't need a coward. Go and do it!" Sabina said.

I asked to speak and they were pleased to invite me to the rostrum: the organizers looked forward to publishing a congratulatory speech next day from Pastor Wurmbrand, of the Swedish Church Mission and the World Council of Churches.

I began with a brief word on Communism. I said it was our duty as priests to glorify God and Christ, not transitory earthly powers, and to support His everlasting kingdom of love against the vanities of the day. As I went on, priests who had sat for hours listening to flattering lies about the Party seemed to awake as from a dream. Someone began to clap. The tension snapped, and applause suddenly broke out, wave after wave, with delegates standing up to cheer. The Minister of Cults, a former Orthodox priest called Burducea who had been an active Fascist in other times, shouted from the platform that my right to speak was withdrawn. I replied that I had the right from God, and continued. In the end, the microphone was disconnected, but by then the hall was in such uproar that no one could hear anything.

That closed the congress for the day. I heard that the Ministry of Cults intended to cancel my license as a pastor and was advised to seek the help of the influential Patriarch-elect. After several attempts I managed to reach Justinian on his return from a visit to Moscow, where a great fuss had been made of him. Black-bearded, smiling, full of his new dignity but no fool, this was the man who now had four-fifths of Rumania's church-going population under his care, and I suddenly decided that I might use my time with him better than to talk about my own affairs. So I said instead that, since his promotion, he had been constantly in my prayers. To have responsibility for fourteen million souls was truly a terrible load for one man to carry. He must feel like St. Ireneus, who wept when people made him bishop against his will, saying, "Children, what have you done - how can I become the man this burden demands? The Bible saith that a bishop must be righteous."

While I spoke, he said little, but after I had gone, he asked about me among friends. For a time the talk about withdrawing my license stopped. Later on, when I was held by the police for a six-week inquiry, Justinian was among those who helped to secure my release, and still later he invited me to Iashi, the seat of his bishopric, where we became friendly. His ignorance of the Bible was amazing, but not exceptional among Orthodox priests. He listened attentively when I reminded him of the parable of the Prodigal Son. Taking his hands in mine, I said that God welcomed back all who strayed, even Bishops. Other Christians besides myself used all the influence they could bring to bear on Justinian. He had begun a life of prayer and love for God when, regardless of his feelings, the Party launched a full-scale campaign against religion and I lost sight of him for several years.

The anti-God drive went hand-in-hand with the elimination of opposition parties, for after Stalin had all he wanted from his wartime allies, the last pretenses of democracy were dropped. Rumania's great National Peasant leader, Iuliu Maniu, was put on trial with eighteen others on false charges and, at the age of over seventy, sentenced to ten years' imprisonment - he was to die in jail four years later. In the reign of terror which followed, it is estimated that some 60,000 "enemies of the State" were executed.

Ironically, the Minister of Justice who presided over this wholesale purge, forty-seven-year-old Lucretiu Patrascanu, had received much help from Maniu in defending persecuted Communists before the war. The two men also worked together with King Michael to plan an armistice which Patrascanu then signed in Moscow in Rumania's name. Once Maniu was silenced, Patrascanu and other Party leaders forced our much beloved young king to abdicate.

So now a Popular Republic was proclaimed; but who would lead it? Not the puppet Groza, certainly. Ana Pauker was detested, even in the Party; the others were at odds. Many of Patrascanu's admirers saw in him a nationalist Communist who would guide the country away from Stalinist extremes. He was a "Western"-type Communist from a landowning family, and everyone thought the better of him for saying that he was a Rumanian before he was a Red.

The problem of the leadership was the subject of hot debate in the Central Committee of the Party.

My life as a pastor, until this time, had been full of satisfaction. I had all I needed for my family. I had the trust and love of my parishioners. But I was not at peace. Why was I allowed to live as usual, while a cruel dictatorship was destroying everything which was dear to me, and while others were suffering for their faith? On many nights, Sabina and I prayed together, asking God to let us bear a cross.

11

My arrest, in the widespread round-ups which were going on in this time, could have been considered an answer to my prayer, but never could I have supposed that the first man to join me in my cell would be Comrade Patrascanu himself.

When the door of my room in Calea Rahova opened, a few days after my arrival, to admit the tall Minister of Justice I supposed at first that he had come to question me in person. Why was I so honored? Then the door was locked behind him: stranger still, his shirt was open at the neck and he wore no tie. I looked down at his highly-polished shoes - no laces! The second prisoner in my brand-new cell was the man who had brought Communism to power in our country.

He sat down on the other plank bed and swung his feet up; a tough-minded intellectual, he was not going to allow the transformation from Minister to jailbird to affect his poise. Wrapped in our great-coats against the March chill, we began to talk. Although I knew Patrascanu's doctrines had shattered justice and caused so much destruction, it was possible to like him as a man and believe in his sincerity. He passed off his arrest with a shrug. It was far from being his first spell in prison. He had been arrested several times by the former rulers of Rumania. It seemed that his growing popularity had banded the other Party leaders against him. At a congress a few days earlier he had been denounced as a bourgeois traitor in the class war by his colleague Teohari Georgescu, Minister of the Interior. A second charge, that Patrascanu had been "potentially helped by the imperialist Powers," was backed by Vasile Luca, the Minister of Finance, who had been in prison with him under the old regime. The accusations were driven home by Ana Pauker, another of his old friends.

They had been plotting against him for some time, Patrascanu said, but one incident in particular had told against him as a Communist. He had asked one of Georgescu's officials if there was any truth in the rumors that prisoners were being tortured. Why certainly, said the man from the Ministry; they were counter-revolutionaries who deserved no pity, especially if they held back information. Patrascanu was deeply disturbed. Was it for this, he demanded, that they had struggled all these years to bring the Party to power? His protest was reported to Georgescu, and the denunciation at the Congress followed.

"As I left the hall," he said, "I saw a new driver waiting at the car. He said, 'Your chauffeur Ionescu has been taken ill, Comrade Patrascanu.' I stepped in, two secret policemen got in after me - and here I am!"

He was sure that he would soon be reinstated, and when supper came I began to think he might. Instead of boiled barley, he was given chicken, cheese, fruit and a bottle of hock. Patrascanu took a glass of wine and pushed the tray over, saying he had no appetite.

While I tried not to eat too ravenously, he told amusing stories. One was about the Swiss senator who wanted to be Navy Minister. "But we have no navy!" said the Prime Minister. "What does that matter?" the senator asked. "If Rumania can have a Minister of Justice, why shouldn't Switzerland have a Minister of the Navy?" Patrascanu laughed heartily at this anecdote, although it ridiculed the "justice" he had created, and of which he himself was now victim.

Next morning Patrascanu was escorted from the cell, I supposed for interrogation. He returned bad-temperedly in the evening to say he had not been answering questions but giving a lecture at the university, where he taught law. The Party wanted his arrest kept secret for the time being, and he, with thirty years of Communist discipline behind him, had to fall in with their wishes. He talked to me because he could talk, even outside prison, with nobody else. To reveal, even to his wife, that he was "under examination," or to ask anyone's advice, would be a capital offense. This isolation preyed on his nerves, as it was intended to. He could be himself only with me, because he had no reason to believe that I would never see the outer world again.

As Patrascanu told me something about his early life, I was interested to see that he had become a Communist through any objective judgment, but in revolt against early troubles. His father, a well-to-do man, supported the Germans so enthusiastically in World War I that, after the victory of the Allies, the whole family was ostracized. Young Patrascanu had to go to Germany for a university education, and on his return joined the only political party which offered him a welcome. His first wife, a Communist, died in the Stalinist purges, and when he remarried it was to another Party member, who happened to be a school friend of my wife.

I tried to show Patrascanu the source of his convictions. "You are like Marx and Lenin," I said, "whose ideas and actions were also the outcome of early suffering. Marx felt genius within him, but as a Jew in Germany when anti-Semitism was rampant, he could find no outlet for it except as a revolutionary. Lenin's brother was hanged for an attempt on the emperor's life - rage and frustration made him want to overturn the world. It has been much the same with you."

Patrascanu dismissed the idea. His nerves found an outlet in tirades against the wickedness of the Church. The evil days of the Borgia Popes, the Spanish Inquisition, the savagery of the Crusades, Galileo's persecution, were all surveyed.

"But it's the crimes and errors of the Church which give us so much more to admire in it," I said.

Patrascanu was startled. "What do you mean?"

I said, "A hospital may stink of pus and blood; in that lies its beauty, for it receives the sick with their disgusting sores and horrible diseases. The Church is Christ's own hospital. Millions of patients are treated in it, with love. The Church accepts sinners - they continue to sin, and for their transgressions the Church is blamed. To me, on the other hand, the Church is like a mother who stands by her children even when they commit crimes. The politics and prejudices of its servants are distortions of what comes from God - that is, the Bible and its teachings, worship and the sacraments. Whatever its faults, the Church has much that is sublime in it. The sea drowns thousands of people every year, but no one contests its beauty."

Patrascanu smiled. "I could make much the same claim for Communism. Its practitioners are not perfect - there are scoundrels among them - but that doesn't mean there's anything wrong with our theories."

"Then judge by results," I said, "as Jesus advised. Sad deeds have stained the history of the Church, but it has lavished love and care on people all over the world. It has produced a multitude of saints, and it has Christ, the holiest of all, at its head. Who are your idols? Men like Marx, who was described as a drunkard by his biographer Riazanov, director of the Marx Institute in Moscow. Or Lenin, whose wife tells us he was a reckless gambler, and whose writings drip with venom. 'By their fruits ye shall know them.' Communism has wiped out millions of innocent victims, bankrupted countries, filled the air with lies and fear. Where is its good side?"

Patrascanu defended "the logic of Party doctrine."

I said doctrines as such meant nothing. "You can do atrocious acts under polite names. Hitler talked about a struggle for ~Lebensraum~ (vital space) and murdered whole populations. Stalin said 'We must care for men like flowers,' and he killed his wife and yours."

Patrascanu looked uncomfortable; but he was frank. "Our long-range purpose is to communize the world. There are few who want to go all the way with us, but we always find some who are willing for their own reasons to go with us for a time. First we had the Rumanian ruling classes and the king, who backed the Allies against the Nazis. When they had served our purpose, we destroyed them. We won over the Orthodox Church with promises, then used the smaller sects to undermine it. We used the farmers against the landlords and later the poor peasants against the rich farmers - and now all of them will be collectivized together. These are Lenin's tactical ideas, and they work!"

I said, "Everyone knows that all your fellow-travelers have been jailed, executed or somehow destroyed in the past. How can you hope to go on using people and throwing them away?"

Patrascanu laughed. "Because they are stupid. Here's an example. Ten years after World War I, the great Bolshevist thinker Bukharin opposed Trotsky's plans for making world revolution by force of arms. He argued that it was better to wait until the capitalist countries came to blows among themselves - Russia could then join the winning side and take the lion's share of conquered countries. A remarkable prophecy - but no one took it seriously. If the West had known that half of Europe and two-thirds of Asia would become Communist as a result, the last war would never have taken place. Fortunately our enemies don't listen to our argument or read our books, so we can speak openly."

I pointed out a flaw in his argument. "Don't you see, Mr. Patrascanu, that as you used people and then cast them aside, so your comrades have used you and thrown you away? Haven't you blinded yourself to the evil logic of Lenin's doctrine?"

For once Patrascanu's bitterness was unconcealed. He said: "When Danton was driven to the guillotine and saw Robespierre watching from a balcony, he called out, 'You will follow me!' And I assure you now that they will follow me - Ana Pauker, Georgescu and Luca, too."

So they did, within three years.

12

We spoke no more that evening, but at 10 P.M., after we had gone to bed, the door opened and my new name was called. Three men stood outside. One, whom I later knew as Appel, told me to dress. I did so, and Patrascanu whispered to put my great-coat on as well: it might dull the blows. A pair of black goggles was put over my eyes so that I could not see where I was going, and I was led along a corridor to a room where I was put into a chair. Then the blindfold was taken off.

I sat before a table with a harsh, accusing light shining in my eyes. At first I saw only a shadowy figure opposite, but as I grew used to the glare I recognized a man called Moravetz. A former police inspector who had been in trouble for betraying secrets to the Communists, he had been rewarded now with the job of interrogator.

"Ah," he said, "Vasile Georgescu. You'll find paper and pen on that desk. Take your chair over and write about your activities and your life."

I asked what interested him particularly.

Moravetz raised sarcastic eyebrows. "As a priest, you've heard any number of confessions. We've brought you here to confess to us."

I wrote an outline of my life up to the time of my conversion. Then, thinking the statement might come to the notice of Party leaders and have some effect, I explained at length how I – an atheist like themselves – had my eyes opened to the truth. I wrote for an hour or more before Moravetz took the paper and said, "Enough for tonight." I was led back to the cell where I found Patrascanu asleep.

Again several days passed without my being troubled. The Communists reverse normal police methods, which rely on the shock of arrest to make a prisoner talk. They prefer to let him "ripen." The interrogator never says what he wants; he merely approaches his prey suggestively from this direction and that so as to create anxiety and guilt. While the man is racking his brains for the reason of his arrest, tension is built up by other tricks: a constantly postponed trial, the tape-recorded sound of a firing squad, screams from other prisoners. He begins to make false judgments. One slip leads to another, until exhaustion forces him to accept his guilt. The interrogator becomes sympathetic. He offers hope and an end to suffering if the prisoner admits that he deserves punishment and tells all. So Appel returned in a few days and the first of my innumerable interrogations began.

page 32 In God's Underground

I was taken this time to a basement room a few steps down from the cell by Appel, who gave me a chair, offered me a toffee from his briefcase and settled down on a sofa. One of his colleagues took notes. Chewing steadily, Appel checked points in my statement and commented that a man's thinking was decided by his class; not being of proletarian origin, I was bound to have reactionary views. I felt sure that Appel was no proletarian either, and I pointed out that none of the great Party thinkers were "workers" in that sense. Marx was a lawyer's son, Engel's father was a man of property, and Lenin came from the nobility. Class alone never dictated a man's convictions.

Appel broke in. "What were your connections with Mr. Teodorescu?"

"Teodorescu?" I said. "That's a fairly common name. Which one do you mean?"

But Appel did not say. Instead he turned to discuss the Bible and the prophecies of Isaiah on the coming of the Messiah. From time to time, without warning, he mentioned the names of people who had helped in distributing my books to Soviet soldiers or in handling relief for the World Council of Churches. The shafts came seemingly at random. Appel was always polite and never persistent. He appeared to be more interested in my reactions to sudden questions than in my answers and, after another hour, I was taken back to the cell to think what it might mean.

13

Patrascanu tried to amuse himself at my expense by talking about the Party's plans to uproot and eradicate Christianity in Rumania. Already Ana Pauker, Georgescu and other Central Committee members had met Justinian in secret and decided he would serve their main purpose well.

"Justinian," he said, "has as much to do with God as I have with the Emperor of Japan. As for old Patriarch Nicodim, he's in his dotage. What respect can you have for a man who was issuing encyclicals at the start of the war, calling on everyone to fight the seven-headed Bolshevik dragon and then, when we broke with Hitler, urged his flock to march with the glorious Red Army against the Nazi monster? That's what Patriarch Nicodim did, and the whole country knows it. These are the princes of the Church, and the rest aren't much better. They won't lead you far!"

I replied that if he did not leave prison as soon as he expected, he might come to meet more exemplary Christians.

"Patriarch Nicodim is a good man," I said, "but old and exhausted. Nor can I condemn the future Patriarch Justinian and those who have been tricked or forced into taking your road. It's too much like taking advantage of a girl and then calling her a harlot."

I thought this dig might carry my point with Patrascanu, who was apt to speak with crudity and predilection about sexual matters. I tried, too, to tell him what Christian love meant. He was too engrossed in his own troubles to listen much at first; but he was a bookish man, at a loss with nothing to read, and argued for the sake of distraction. On religion, he said, "I passed through all that at school. I used to pray, but later I gave it up."

I asked him why.

"Your Jesus asks too much. Especially when one is young."

I said, "I've never thought myself that Jesus asks anything from men. When my son Mihai was small, I gave him money to buy me a birthday present. So Jesus gives the virtues he seems to ask for and makes us better characters. But perhaps you didn't have good religious teachers."

"Probably. They're not too common." Patrascanu sat up and yawned. "Besides, there's a lot in Christianity I can't swallow."

"For example?"

"Humility, and especially submission to tyranny. Take St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans. It says all authority is from God, so we must behave ourselves, pay our taxes promptly and not kick against the pricks - this at a time when the ruler of the world was Nero!"

I said, "Read the Bible again and you'll find it full of revolutionary fire. It starts with the Jewish slaves revolting against Pharaoh. It goes on with Samuel, Jael, Jehu and many other rebels against tyranny. Before going further, ask yourself how the authority approved by God came to power. It's usually the result of an upheaval - so submission to authority means submission to those who have made a successful revolution. Washington became an authority by overthrowing the English."

"As Lenin overthrew the Tsars," Patrascanu put in.

"Only to introduce a worse terror. The man will come who will end the Communist tyranny, too, and bring free government. Then he will be the authority from God. Then we should submit. The real teaching in this part of the Scripture is not submission to tyrants, but avoidance of useless bloodshed in revolutions which have no chance."

Patrascanu said, "What about 'Render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's'? [MTT 22:21, MRK 12:17, LUK 20:25] With this axiom, Jesus was surely urging submission by the Jews to the Roman tyrant?"

"The first Caesar was a usurper," I said, "even in Rome. He was a general who had made himself dictator. His successors had no more right in Palestine, which became a Roman colony by force, than the Russians have here. So it's clear that Jesus meant, 'Give Caesar what we owe him, a boot in the backside, and pitch him out.'"

Patrascanu roared with laughter. "If every priest explained the Bible like you do, we'd soon reach a better understanding," he said.

I was not so sure.

One evening, he asked me to tell him the Christian belief in a nutshell. I recited the Nicean Creed and said, "In return you should tell me what the Communist creed really is."

Patrascanu thought for a moment. "We Communists believe that we will dominate the world," he said, and lay back on his grubby pallet.

Next morning he was taken from his cell. I never saw him again. We had become quite close in the week we had been together. I felt that he was moved by much of what I said, but it did not suit his plans to admit it, even to himself. It was years before I heard what became of him.

14

My next inquisitor, a little man called Vasilu who liked to talk out of the corner of his mouth, read from a typed list of questions. The first was also the hardest: "Write down the names of everyone you know, where you met them and what your relations with them were." There were many friends whom I wanted to shield, but if I left them out, and the police knew I had done so, they would be doubly suspect.

As I hesitated, Vasilu snapped, "Don't pick and choose. I said 'everyone.'"

To make a start, I wrote the names of my known assistants and parishioners. The list covered a page or two. I added Communist members of Parliament and every fellow-traveler and informer I could think of.

"Question Number Two," said Vasilu, "is to say what you have done against the State."

"What am I accused of?" I asked.

Vasilu slapped the table. "You know what you've done. Get it off your chest! Start by telling us about your contacts with your Orthodox colleague, Father Grigoriu, and what you think of him. Just write, and keep writing!"

Clergymen were always asked about one another – Protestants questioned about Orthodox priests, Catholics about Adventists, and so on, to stoke sectarian rivalries. Whatever you wrote might be used to trap you. A prisoner would be told, "Sign with a nickname – it's the way we work here." When he had given several statements in different names, he would be asked to denounce a friend – with the warning that if he refused, everyone would be told he was an informer who had already given statements under false names. The threat was enough to make many real informers. During the long, solitary waits between interrogations, fresh questions were prepared and you tried to remember what you had said before, and what you had concealed. The inquisitors usually came in pairs, with their typed questions. If one went out, the other did not speak until he returned. Some interrogators, in those early days, were decent enough men who had to live somehow. One showed me, when his companion was out of the room, statements made against me. Several were signed by men I trusted, and I could guess the pressure that had been used on them.

I was still in the first stage of a long process. The number of prisoners was overwhelming, and qualified interrogators were few, but more were being trained in Soviet methods every day. At least, I had time to prepare myself, and I was put in good heart when a barber, while shaving me, whispered that Sabina was well and carrying on our work. My relief was beyond words. I thought my wife might have been arrested also and Mihai, my son, left to starve or rely on the charity of neighbors. Now I was ready to ream off as many chapters from my spiritual biography as the interrogators liked. On other matters I revealed as little as possible. The simple fact that a friend had once visited the West might get his family arrested and earn him a savage beating.

So interrogations continued, month after month. You had to be convinced of your criminal guilt before Communist ideals could be implanted, and they took root only when you had succumbed to the belief that you were entirely, endlessly in the Party's power and had surrendered every fragment of your past.

It was said now in Rumania that life consisted of the four "autos": the "autocriticism" which had to be recorded regularly in office and factory; the "automobile" which took you to the Secret Police; the "autobiography" which they made you write; and the "autopsy."

15

Knowing that torture lay ahead, I resolved to kill myself rather than betray others. I felt no moral scruples; for a Christian to die means to go to Christ. I would explain and He would surely understand. If St. Ursula had been canonized for killing herself rather than lose her virginity to the barbarians who sacked her monastery, then my duty to protect my friends was also higher than life.

The problem was to secure the means of suicide before my intention was suspected. Guards checked prisoners and their cells regularly for possible instruments of death: glass slivers, a piece of cord, a razor-blade. One morning, on the doctor's round, I said I could not remember all the details the interrogators needed because I had not slept for weeks. He ordered me a nightly sleeping pill and a guard peered into my mouth each time to see that it was gone. In fact, I held the pill under my tongue and took it out when he had left. But where to hide my prize? Not on my body, to which anything might happen. Not in my pallet, which had to be shaken and folded daily. There was the other pallet on which Patrascanu had lain. I tore open a few stitches and every day hid another pill among the straw.

By the end of the month I had thirty pills. They were a comfort against the fear of breaking under torture, but I had fits of black depression at the thought of them. It was summer. I heard homely noises from the world outside. A girl singing. A tram-car grinding around the corner. Mothers calling sons, "Silviu, Emil, Matei!" Feathery seeds floated softly in to settle on my cement floor. I asked God what He was doing. Why was I being forced to put an end to a life which had been dedicated to His service? Looking up one evening through the narrow window, I saw the first star appear in the darkening sky, and the thought came to my mind that God had sent this light, which had begun its apparently useless journey billions of years ago. And now it passed through the bars of my cell, consoling me.

Next morning the guard came in and, without a word, picked up the spare pallet with my hoarded pills in it and took it for some other prisoner. I was upset at first. Then I laughed, and felt calmer than I had for weeks. Since God did not want my suicide, then He would give me strength to bear the suffering ahead.

16

The Secret Police had been patient, I was told, but now it was time for some results. Colonel Dulgheru, their grand inquisitor, never failed to get them. He sat at his desk, still and menacing, with delicate hands outspread before him. "You've been playing with us," he said.

Dulgheru had worked before the war at the Soviet Embassy. Then, under the Fascists, he was interned and thus fraternized with Gheorghiu-Dej and other imprisoned Communists. They noted his tough qualities, intelligence and ruthlessness. So here he was, with delegated powers of life and death.

At once, Dulgheru began to question me about a Red Army man who had been caught smuggling Bibles into Russia, Until now the interrogators seemed to know nothing about my work among the Russians, but although the arrested soldier had not given me away, it was discovered that we had met. Now, more than ever, I had to weigh every word, for in fact I had baptized the man in Bucharest and so enlisted him in our campaign.

Dulgheru's questions were persistent. He thought he had scented something important. In the weeks that followed, I was worn down by a variety of means. The beds were removed from the cell and I had barely an hour's sleep a night, balanced on a chair. Twice every minute the spy-hole in the door gave a metallic click, and the eye of a guard appeared. Often when I dozed he came in and kicked me awake. In the end I lost all sense of time. Once I awoke to see the cell door ajar. Soft music sounded in the corridor: or was it an illusion? Then the sound became distorted and a woman's voice was sobbing. She began to scream. It was my wife!

"No, no! Please don't beat me. Not again! I can't bear it!"

There was the sound of a whip hitting flesh. The screams rose to an appalling pitch. Every muscle in my body was strained in a rictus of horror. Slowly the voice began to die away, moaning; but now it was the voice of a stranger. It faded into silence. I was left drained of feeling, trembling and drenched with sweat. Later I learnt that it was a tape-recording, but every prisoner who heard it thought that the victim was his wife or sweetheart.

Dulgheru was a refined barbarian, patterned on the Soviet diplomats with whom he had mixed. "I order torture with regret," he told me. Being all-powerful in the prisons, he could dispense with notes and witnesses, and often came alone to my cell at night to continue interrogation. One critical session dragged on for hours. He asked about my contact with the Church of England Mission. What had I done there? I said that I'd visited Westminster Abbey. He became more and more incensed.

"Do you know," he said with venom, "that I can order your execution now, tonight, as a counter-revolutionary?"

I said, "Colonel, here you have the opportunity for an experiment. You say you can have me shot. I know you can. So put your hand here on my heart. If it beats rapidly, showing - that I am afraid, then know there is no God and no eternal life. But if it beats calmly, as if to say, 'I go to the One I love,' then you must think again. There is a God, and an eternal life!"

Dulgheru struck me across the face, and immediately regretted his loss of self-control.

"You fool, Georgescu!" he said. "Can't you see that you're completely at my mercy and that your Savior, or whatever you call him, isn't going to open any prison doors? You'll never see Westminster Abbey."

I said, "His name is Jesus Christ, and if He wishes, He can release me, and I shall see Westminster Abbey, too."

Dulgheru glared at me as if struggling for breath. Then he shouted, "All right. Tomorrow you'll meet Comrade Brinzaru."

I had been expecting this. Major Brinzaru, the colonel's aide, presided over a room where clubs, truncheons and whips were kept. He had hairy arms like a gorilla. Other interrogators used his name as a threat. The contemporary Russian poet Voznesensky writes, "In these days of untold suffering, one is lucky indeed to have no heart," and Brinzaru was lucky in this way. He introduced me to his range of weapons. "Is there any you fancy?" he asked. "We like to be democratic here."

He displayed his own favorite, a long, black rubber truncheon. "Read the label." It was inscribed, "MADE IN U.S.A."

"We do the beating," said Brinzaru with a show of yellow teeth, "but your American friends give us the tools." Then he sent me back to my cell to think about it.

The guard told me that Brinzaru had worked before the war for a prominent politician and been treated as one of the family. After the Communist take-over which hoisted him up the ranks of the Secret Police, a young prisoner was brought to him for questioning. It was the politician's son, who had tried to start a patriotic movement. Brinzaru told him, "I used to hold you on my knee when you were a baby!" Then he tortured the lad and executed him with his own hands.

Curiously, Brinzaru did not give me the threatened beating. On his nightly round of inspection, he flicked the spy-hole cover back to watch me for a moment. "Still there, Georgescu? What's Jesus doing tonight?"

I said, "He's praying for you." He walked away without replying.

Next day he was back again. Under his supervision, I was made to stand facing a wall with my hands raised above my head so that my finger tips just touched it. "Just keep him there," Brinzaru told the guard before leaving.

At last, the torture began. I do not want to make much of it, but it must be told because these things were common to all Secret Police prisons. First I stood for hours, long after my arms had lost all feeling, and my legs began to tremble and then swell. When I collapsed on the floor, I was given a crust and a sip of water and made to stand again. One guard relieved another. Some of them would force you to adopt ridiculous or obscene postures, and this went on, with short breaks, for days and nights. There was the wall to look at.

I thought of the walls referred to in the Bible, recalling a verse from Isaiah which saddened me: God says that Israel's wrongdoings put a wall between Him and the people. The failures of Christianity had allowed a Communist triumph, and that was why I had a wall before me now. Then I remembered a phrase, "With my Lord, I jump over the wall." I, too, might jump this wall into the spiritual world of fellowship with God. I thought of the Jewish spies who returned from Canaan to report that the cities were great and walled - but as the walls of Jericho came down, so the wall before me must also fall at the will of God. When pain was overwhelming me, I said to myself a phrase from the Song of Songs: "My beloved is like a roe or a young hart, behold, he standeth behind our wall." [SOS 2:9] I imagined that Jesus stood behind my wall, giving me strength. I remembered that, as long as Moses held up his hands on the mountain, the chosen people went forward to victory; perhaps our sufferings were helping the people of God to win their battle, too.

From time to time, Major Brinzaru looked in to ask whether I was willing to co-operate. Once, when I was on the floor, he said, "Get up! We've decided to let you see Westminster Abbey, after all. You start now."

"Walk!" ordered the guard. I tried to pull my shoes on, but my feet were too swollen. "Come on! Hurry! Keep going round! I'll be watching from outside."

The cell was twelve paces round: four steps - one wall; two steps - the next; then four, then two. I shuffled around it in torn socks. The spy-hole clicked. "Faster!" shouted the guard. My head began to spin. "Faster - or do you want a beating?" I bumped painfully into a wall. My eyes stung with sweat. Round and round, round and round. Click! "Halt, turn about! Walk!" Round, round in the opposite direction. "Faster!" I stumbled, and picked myself up. "Keep moving!" When I fell the guard charged in and cracked me across the elbow with a club as I struggled up. The pain was so agonizing that I fell again. "Get up! Get moving! This is the ~manŠge~!"

Nearly everyone had to go through the ~manŠge~, or training ring as it was known. Hours went by before you got a cup of water or anything to eat. The thirst drove out hunger. It was even fiercer than the stabbing of hot knives that ran up your legs. Worst of all was having to start walking again after being allowed a few minutes rest, or a few hours at night in a stupor on the floor. Stiff joints, cracked muscles, lacerated feet would not support the body's weight. You clung to the walls, while guards screamed orders. When you could no longer stand, you went on all fours.

I do not know how many days and nights I spent in the ~manŠge~. I began to pray for the guards as I moved. I thought of the Song of Songs, in which we are told of the holy dance of the Bride of Christ in honor of her bridegroom. I said to myself, "I will move with as much grace as if this were a dance of divine love, for Jesus." For a while it seemed to me that I did. If a man wills to do everything that he has to do, then he does only the things which he wills - and the hardest trials, being voluntary, become easier. And as I went round and about, it seemed as if everything was revolving around me. I could no longer distinguish one wall from another, or a wall from the door, just as in divine love one does not distinguish between good and evil men and can embrace everyone.

17

I had been virtually without sleep for a month when the guard fixed a pair of blacked-out goggles over my eyes and led me to a new interview office. It was a large, bare room. Behind a table sat three or four figures whom I saw only dimly because of the blinding light of the reflectors in my face. I stood before them handcuffed and in bare feet, wearing only a torn, filthy shirt. Familiar questions were repeated. I gave the same replies. This time there was a woman among the inquisitors. At one point she said shrilly, "If you don't answer properly, we'll have you stretched on the rack." The machine used last in England for forced confessions 300 years ago had been added to the Party's weapons of persuasion! I said, "In St. Paul's Epistle to the Ephesians it is written that we must strive to reach the measure of the stature of Christ. If you stretch me on the rack you'll be helping me to fulfill my purpose." The woman banged the table and there was a discussion behind the dazzle of the reflectors. Sometimes, a ready answer has the effect of deflecting a blow. I was not "racked"; instead, we went back to the Inquisition, to the ~bastinado~.

I was taken to another cell. A hood was pulled over my head. I was ordered to squat and place my arms around my knees. A metal bar was thrust between elbows and knees and then lifted on to trestles, so that I swung head down, trussed, with my feet in the air. They held my head while someone flogged the soles of my feet. The blows were like explosions. Some fell on my thighs and the base of my spine. I fainted and was revived by drenchings in cold water. Each time they said that if I gave just one of the names they wanted, it would stop. When they took me down from the spit I had to be carried to my cell.

On every journey to this room I wore the blacked-out goggles which prevented me from learning the prison layout. Sometimes the goggles were kept on while I was beaten. When you see a blow coming, you tense yourself to receive it. But blinded, not knowing where it will fall, or when, the fear is redoubled.

I passed through other tortures. Brinzaru had a nylon whip. After a few strokes with this, I lost consciousness. Once a knife was held to my throat while Brinzaru urged me to talk, if I wished to stay alive. Two men held me down. I felt them tighten their grip and the blade pierced the skin. Again I fainted, and woke to find my chest covered with blood. Water was poured down a funnel into my throat, until my stomach was bursting; then the guards kicked and stepped on me. I was left in a cell with two wolf dogs who were trained to leap forward, snarling, at the slightest movement: but not to bite. Some bread would be placed nearby, but you dared not touch it. In time you realized that the dogs would not attack; but often their teeth snapped inches from your face. I was also branded with a red-hot iron.

In the end I signed about myself all the "confessions" they wanted: that I was an adulterer and at the same time a homosexual, that I had sold the church bells and pocketed the money (although our church was a prayer-house without bells), that under cover of work for the World Council of Churches, I had spied with the object of overthrowing the regime by treachery; that I and others had infiltrated in times before the Party organization under false pretences and revealed its secrets.

Brinzaru read these confessions and asked: "Where are the names of those you passed the secrets on to?"

He was pleased when I gave him a score of names and addresses. It would certainly earn him a bonus and promotion. A few days later I received another flogging. The names had been checked. They were those of men who had fled to the West or who had died. But in the respite I recovered a little strength.

Perhaps waiting was the worst torture. to lie there, listening to screams and weeping, knowing that in an hour it would be my turn. But God helped me never to say a word which harmed another. I lost consciousness easily, and they wanted me alive. Every prisoner could be a source of further information, of use in some later twist of Party fortunes, no matter how long he was kept. A doctor was present at torture sessions to take the pulse and check that the victim was not about to escape into the next world while the Secret Police still had need of him. It was an image of Hell, in which torment is eternal and you cannot die.

It was hard to remember the Bible. Notwithstanding, I always tried to keep in mind how Jesus could have come to earth as a king, but chose instead to be condemned as a criminal and whipped. A Roman whipping was horrible, and I thought with every blow I received that He also knew such pain, and there was joy in sharing it with Him.

The mockery and humiliation were also more than many could support. Jesus often said that he would be scourged, mocked and crucified. I used to think that mockery, compared with scourging and crucifixion, was nothing. That was before I knew that a man could be forced to open his mouth so that others could spit or urinate in it, while our masters laughed and jeered.

It is not easy to believe, but just as the officers of the Spanish Inquisition thought it a sacred duty to burn heretics, so many Party men believed that what they did was justified. Colonel Dulgheru seemed to be one of these. He used to say, "It is in the vital interests of society that men should be maltreated if they withhold information needed to protect it." Much later on, when he saw me reduced to a wreck weeping from nervous fatigue, he said with something like pity, "Why don't you give in? It's all so futile. You're only flesh and you'll break in the end."

page 46 In God's Underground

But I had proof of the contrary: had I been just flesh I could not have resisted. But the body is only a temporary residence for the soul. The Communists relying on the instinct of self-preservation, thought a man would do anything to avoid extinction. They were mistaken. Christians who believed what they said in church knew that to die was not the end of life but its fulfillment; not extinction, but the promise of eternity.

18

I had been seven months in Calea Rahova prison. It was October and the winter was already on us. We suffered much from cold now, as well as hunger and ill-treatment, and months of winter lay ahead. Gazing from my window at the sleet falling on the prison yard, I shivered, yet my spirits were not low. Whatever I could do for God by patient love in jail would be small, I thought, but the good in life always looks small in comparison with the amount of bad. While evil in the New Testament is depicted as a huge beast with seven horns, the Holy Spirit descended as a little dove. It is the dove which will defeat the beast!

One evening, a plate of savory goulash appeared, with four whole slices of bread. Before I could eat it, the guard returned and made me gather up my things and follow him to a place where other prisoners were lined up. Thinking of my lost goulash I went by truck to the Ministry of the Interior. This splendid building is much admired by tourists, who do not know that it is built over an extensive prison with a labyrinth of corridors and hundreds of helpless inmates.

My cell was deep underground. A light bulb shone from the ceiling on bare walls, an iron bedstead with three planks and a straw pallet. Air entered through a pipe high in the wall. I saw there was no bucket and I would have to wait always for the guard to take me to the latrine. This was the worst imposition for every prisoner. Sometimes they made you wait for hours, laughing at your pleadings. Men, and women, too, went without food and drink for fear of increasing their agony. I myself have eaten from the dish in which I fulfilled my needs without washing it, because I had no water.

The silence here was practically complete - deliberately so. Our guards wore felt-soled shoes and you could hear their hands on the door before key found lock. Now and again there was the far-off sound of a prisoner hammering steadily on his door or screaming. The cell allowed only three paces in each direction, so I lay down and stared at the bulb. It burnt all night. Since I could not sleep, I prayed. The outside world had ceased to exist. All the noises I was used to, the wind and rain in the yard, steel boot studs on stone floors, the buzz of a fly, a human voice, were gone. My heart seemed to shrink, as if it, too, would stop in this lifeless silence.

19

I was kept in solitary confinement in this cell for the next two years. I had nothing to read and no writing materials; I had only my thoughts for company, and I was not a meditative man, but a soul that had rarely known quiet. I had God. But had I really lived to serve God - or was it simply my profession?

People expect pastors to be models of wisdom, purity, love, truthfulness; they cannot always be genuinely so, because they are also men: so, in smaller or greater measure, they begin to act the part. As time passes, they can hardly tell how much of their behavior is play-acting.

I remembered the deep commentary which Savonarola wrote on the fifty-first Psalm, in prison, with his bones so broken that he could sign the self-accusatory paper only with his left hand. He said there were two kinds of Christian: those who sincerely believe in God and those who, just as sincerely, believe that they believe. You can tell them apart by their actions in decisive moments. If a man, planning to rob a rich man's home, sees a stranger who might be a policeman, he holds back. If, on second thoughts, he breaks in after all, this proves that he does not believe the man to be an agent of the law. Our beliefs are proved by what we do.

Did I believe in God? Now the test had come. I was alone. There was no salary to earn, no golden opinions to consider. God offered me only suffering - would I continue to love Him?

My mind went back to one of my favorite books, ~The Pateric~, concerning certain fourth-century saints who formed desert monasteries when the Church was persecuted. It has 400 pages, but the first time I picked it up I did not eat, drink or sleep until I had finished it. Christian books are like good wine - the older the better. It contained the following passage:

> A brother asked his elder, "Father, what is silence?" The answer was, "My son, silence is to sit alone in your cell in wisdom and fear of God, shielding the heart from the burning arrows of thought. Silence like this brings to birth the good. O silence without care, ladder to heaven! O silence in which one cares only for first things, and speaks only with Jesus Christ! He who keeps silent is the one who sings, 'My heart is ready to praise Thee, O Lord!'"

I wondered how you could praise God by a life of silence. At first, I prayed greatly to be released. I asked, "You have said in Scripture that it is not good that a man should be alone - why do You keep me alone?" But as days passed into weeks my only visitor was still the guard, who brought wedges of black bread and watery soup, and never spoke a word.

His arrival reminded me daily of the saying, "The gods walk in soft shoes": in other words, the Greeks believed that we cannot be aware of the approach of a divinity. Perhaps in this silence I was coming closer to God. Perhaps, too, it would make me a better pastor; for I had noticed that the best preachers were men who possessed an inner silence, like Jesus. When the mouth is too much open, even to speak good, the soul loses its fire just as a room loses warmth through an open door.

Slowly, I learned that on the tree of silence hangs the fruit of peace. I began to realize my real personality, and made sure that it belonged to Christ. I found that even here my thoughts and feelings turned to God and that I could pass night after night in prayer, spiritual exercise and praise. I knew now that I was not play-acting, believing that I believed.

20

I worked out a routine to which I kept for the next two years. I stayed awake all night. When the 10 P.M. bell signaled time to sleep, I began my program. Sometimes I was sad, sometimes cheerful, but the nights were not long enough for all I had to do.

I began with a prayer in which tears, often of thankfulness, were rarely absent. Prayers, like radio signals, are heard more clearly by night: it is then that great spiritual battles are fought. Next, I preached a sermon as I would in church, beginning with "Beloved brethren," in a whisper which no guard could hear, and ending with "Amen." At last I preached with complete truth. No longer need I care what the bishop would think, the congregation say, or spies report. I was not preaching to a void. Every sermon is heard by God, his angels and saints; but I felt that among those around me listening were those who had brought me to faith, members of my flock, both dead and living, my family and friends. They were the "cloud of witnesses" of which the Bible speaks. I experienced the "communion of saints" of the Creed.

Every night I talked to my wife and son. I pondered on all that was fine and good in them. Sometimes my thoughts reached Sabina over the prison walls. She has a note in her Bible from this time:

"Today I saw Richard. I was lying in bed awake and he leaned over and spoke to me." I had concentrated all my power to transmit a message of love to her. We were richly rewarded for a few minutes' thought towards each other, every day; while so many marriages were destroyed by prison, ours held firm and was fortified.

Thinking about my family could also wound. I knew that Sabina would undergo intense pressure to divorce me. If she refused, and carried on her Church work as well, they would almost certainly arrest her. Then Mihai, who was only ten years old, would be left alone. I lay face down on the pallet and hugged it as if it were my son. Once I leapt up and smashed my fists on the steel door, shouting, "Give me back my boy!" The guards ran in to hold me down, while I was given an injection which made me unconscious for hours. When I awoke, I thought I might be going mad. I knew many who had done so.

It gave me courage to think of Jesus's mother, who stood at the foot of the cross with no word of complaint, I wondered whether we were right to interpret her silence as sorrow unalloyed; surely she was proud, too, that He was giving His life for man? In the evening of that day, being Passover, she must have sung God's praises, according to Jewish ritual. I, too, must thank God for the suffering through which my little son might pass. Again, I took hope: even if Sabina had gone, we had friends who would surely care for Mihai.

One of my constant spiritual exercises was to imagine as if in a picture that I was surrendering all my life to Christ: past, present, future; my family, my church, my passions, my secret thoughts; every member of my body. I confessed my past sins to Christ without reserve and saw Him wipe them out with his hand. Often I wept.

In the first days, I spent much time searching my soul. It was a mistake. Love, goodness, beauty are shy creatures who hide themselves when they know they are observed. My son had given me a lesson on this point when he was five. I had reproved him,

"Jesus has a big exercise book and one of the pages bears your name. This morning he had to write that you disobeyed your mother. Yesterday you fought another boy and said it was his fault, so that went down too." Mihai said, after thinking a minute, "Daddy, does Jesus write only the bad things we do, or the good things as well?"

My son was so often in my mind! I remembered with delight how he had taught me theology. When I read from the Epistle to the Corinthians, "Examine yourself to see whether you are holding to the faith," he asked, "How should I examine myself?"

I replied, "Thump your chest and ask, 'Heart, do you love God?'" I gave my chest a blow as I spoke.

"That's not right," said Mihai. "Once the man at the station who hits train wheels with a hammer let me try, and he said, 'You only give them a little tap in case they break, not a big thump.' So I don't have to give myself a thump either to see if I love Jesus."

Now I knew that the quiet "Yes" of my heart when I put the question, "Do you love Jesus?" was enough.

Each night I passed an hour living in the minds of my chief adversaries - Colonel Dulgheru, for instance! Imagining myself in his place, I found a thousand excuses for him; in this way I could love him and the other torturers. Then I considered my own faults from his point of view and found a new comprehension of myself. It is easier to console others than to comfort oneself, just as we can read with calm sympathy of the guillotine's victims, but are shocked when a revolution threatens us. So now, I went on to reverse events in time, to think of the present as if it were happening in some previous era and about the past as if it were happening today. In this way one can even hope to meet the saints of old.

I thought what I would do if I were a great statesman, a multimillionaire, the Emperor of China, the Pope. I dreamed of what life would be if I had wings or the cloak of invisibility, and decided that I had chanced on a definition of the human spirit as an invisible, winged force which can transform the world. These were diverting fantasies, but time-wasting. A busy architect does not speculate about what he might do with non-existent materials - weightless stone, elastic glass. Meditation, like architecture, should be constructive. But such digression helped me to see how opposed entities can unite in the life of the spirit, and now I understood how Christ can contain all things, be lion of Judah and lamb of God.

Nor did I lack amusement in my empty cell. I told myself jokes and invented new ones. I played chess with myself, using pieces made from bread: Black versus Less-Black, with chalk from the wall. I could divide my mind so that Black should not know Less Black's next move, and vice-versa, and since I did not lose a game in two years, I felt that I could claim to be a master.

I found that joy can be acquired like a habit, in the same way as a folded sheet of paper falls naturally into the same fold. "Be joyful," is a command of God. John Wesley used to say that he "was never sad even one quarter of an hour." I cannot say the same of myself, but I learned to rejoice in the worst conditions.

21

The Communists believe that happiness comes from material satisfaction; but alone in my cell, cold, hungry and in rags, I danced for joy every night. The idea came to me with boyhood memories of watching dancing dervishes. I had been moved past understanding by their ecstasy, the grave beauty of these Moslem monks, their grace of movement, as they whirled and called out their name for God, "Allah!" Later I learned that many others - Jews, Pentecostals, early Christians, people in the Bible like David and Miriam, altar-boys in Seville Cathedral celebrating Easter, even today, also danced for God. Words alone have never been able to say what man feels in the nearness of divinity. Sometimes I was so filled with joy that I felt I would burst if I did not give it expression. I remembered the words of Jesus, "Blessed are you when men come to hate you, when they exclude you from their company and reproach you and cast out your name as evil on account of the Son of Man. Rejoice in that day and leap for joy!" I told myself, "I've carried out only half this command. I've rejoiced, but that is not enough. Jesus clearly says that we must also leap."

When next the guard peered through the spy-hole, he saw me springing about my cell. His orders must have been to distract anyone who showed signs of breakdown, for he padded off and returned with some food from the staff room: a hunk of bread, some cheese and sugar. As I took them I remembered how the verse in St. Luke went on: "Rejoice in that day and leap for joy - for behold your reward is great." It was a very large piece of bread: more than a week's ration.

I rarely allowed a night to pass without dancing, from then on; although I was never paid for it again, I made up songs and sang them softly to myself and danced to my own music. The guards became used to it. I did not break the silence, and they had seen many strange things in these subterranean cells. Friends to whom I spoke later of dancing in prison asked, "What for? What use was it?" It was not something useful. It was a manifestation of joy like the dance of David, a holy sacrifice offered before the altar of the Lord. I did not mind if my captors thought I was mad, for I had discovered a beauty in Christ which I had not known before.

Sometimes I saw visions. Once as I danced I seemed to hear my name called - not "Richard," but another name which I cannot reveal. I knew that it was I who was called under my new name and it flashed into my mind, I don't know why, "This must be the Archangel Gabriel." Then the cell was full of light. I heard no more, but I understood that I was to work together with Jesus and the saints to build a bridge between good and evil; a bridge of tears, prayers and self-sacrifice for sinners to cross over and join the blessed. I saw that our bridge had to be one that even the weakest in goodness could use. Jesus promised that at the Last Judgment those who have fed the hungry and clothed the naked will sit at his right hand, while wrong-doers will be cast into the outer darkness. Now every man, surely, sometimes helps others and sometimes fails to do so: the body is one, but the spirit is not. The Bible speaks of the "inner" man, and of the "outward" man, of the "new," and "old"; of the "natural," and "spiritual" man. It is the inner, spiritual man who may achieve happiness in eternal life.

I saw that I must love men as they were, not as they should be. Another night I became aware of a great throng of angels moving slowly through the darkness towards my bed. As they approached they sang a song of love that Romeo might have sung to Juliet. I could not believe that the guards did not hear this marvelous passionate music which was so real to me.

Prisoners who are long alone often have visions. There are natural explanations for such phenomena which do not invalidate them. The soul uses the body for its own purposes. These visions helped to sustain my life: that is enough to prove that they were not mere hallucinations.

22

One night I heard a faint tapping on the wall beside my bed. A new prisoner had arrived in the next cell and was signaling to me. I answered, and provoked a flurry of fresh taps. Presently I realized that my neighbor was conveying a simple code:

A - one tap, B - two taps, C - three taps.
"Who are you?" was his first message.
"A pastor," I replied.
From this cumbersome start we developed a new system: one tap to indicate the first five letters of the alphabet, two taps for the second group of five, and so on. Thus B was a single tap, followed by a pause, then two more taps; F was two taps followed after a space by one. Even this code did not satisfy my new neighbor. He knew Morse and passed on the letters one by one until I had learned them all.

He signaled his name.
"Bless you," I replied laboriously. "Are you a Christian?"
A minute went by. "I cannot claim so."
He was a radio-engineer, it appeared, awaiting trial on a capital charge; aged fifty-two and in poor health. He had lapsed from faith some years before, having married an unbeliever, and was in deep depression. I spoke to him through the wall every night, growing fluent in the use of Morse.
Before long, he tapped: "I should like to confess my sins."
It was a confession broken by many silences. "I was seven... I kicked a boy... because he was a Jew. He cursed me... May your mother... not be able to see you ... when she dies.... Mother was dying... when they arrested me."
When the man had unburdened many things from his heart he said he felt happier than he had for years. We became Morse friends as others become pen-friends. I taught him Bible verses. We exchanged jokes and tapped out the movements of chess games. I sent him messages about Christ, preaching in code. When the guard caught me at it, I was transferred to another cell, with another neighbor, and there began again. In time, many of us learned the code. Prisoners were often moved, and more than once I was betrayed by an informer, so I tapped out only Bible verses and words about Christ: I was not prepared to suffer for political arguments.
Men were forced by solitary confinement to delve into deeply-buried happenings. Old betrayals and dishonesties returned with inescapable persistence. It was as if they came into your cell and looked at you in reproach: Mother, father, girls long ago abandoned, friends slandered or cheated of their due. All confessions I heard in Morse began, "When I was a boy," "When I was at school... I" The memory of old transgressions stood like savage watchdogs before the sanctuary of God's peace. But when all other gates to heaven are shut for a man, the Kabbala tells us that there remains the ~bab hadimot~, the gate of tears, and it was through this gate that we prisoners had to pass.

23

One morning, when a neighbor tapped that it was Good Friday, I found a nail in the lavatory and wrote "JESUS" on my cell wall, hoping it might comfort those who came after me. The guard was angry. "You're for the carcer!" he said.

I was taken down to the corridor to a cupboard built into a wall, just high enough to stand in and twenty inches square, with a few small airholes and one for food to be pushed through. The guard thrust me in and closed the door. Sharp points stung my back. I jerked forward, to be pierced again in the chest by a second set of spikes. Panic went through me, but I forced myself to stand still. Then, moving cautiously in the dark, I felt the sides of the cupboard – all were studded with steel projections. Only by standing rigidly upright could I avoid impalement. This was the carcer.

My legs began to ache. By the end of an hour every muscle seemed to hurt. My feet, sore from the manŠge, were swelling up. When I collapsed, lacerating myself on the spikes, they let me out for a rest, then put me back. I tried to keep my mind on Christ's sufferings, but my own were too strong. Then I remembered that my son Mihai, when very young, had asked, "What shall I do, Daddy? I'm bored." I said, "Think about God, Mihai!" He replied, 'Why should I think about Him? I've only a small head: He has a great big head, so He ought to think about me." So now I told myself, "Don't try to think about God. Don't think at all." In that suffocating darkness I reminded myself that Indian yogi clear their minds of thought by repeating a sacred formula, over and over again. Much the same method is used by monks on Mount Athos with their interminable "prayer of the heart," in which a word is said for every heart-beat: "Lord Jesus Christ, Son of God, have mercy upon me!" I knew already that Christ was merciful, but just as I used to tell my wife every day that I loved her, so I thought, "I'll do the same with Jesus." I began to repeat, "Jesus, dear bridegroom of my soul, I love you." The quiet beating of a loving heart is a music that carries far, so I said this phrase to the same rhythm. At first I seemed to hear the devil sneering, "You love Him, and He lets you suffer. If He's all-powerful, why doesn't He take you out of the carcer?" I continued to say quietly, "Jesus, dear bridegroom of my soul, I love you." In a short time the significance of the words was blurred and then lost. I had ceased to think.

Later I was often to practice this detachment in bad moments. Jesus says in the Gospel according to St. Matthew, "For in such an hour as ye think not the Son of Man cometh." This has been my experience of Him. Don't think - and Christ will come, taking you by surprise. But the clarity of His light is hard to bear. Sometimes I reversed the process and fled from it to my own thoughts.

24

I spent two days in the carcer. Some were kept in it for a week or more, but the doctor warned that my condition had become dangerous. Already I was living in a borderland between the living and the dead. As a result of my long confinement, and the lack of sun, food and air, my hair had ceased to grow. The barber did not need to shave me for days. My finger-nails were pallid and soft as a plant kept in the darkness.

Hallucinations began to possess my mind. I stared at my tin cup of water to convince myself in moments of despair that I was not in Hell, where there is no water - and then it turned into a helmet. I saw delicious dishes laid out on a table that stretched out far beyond the cell. From a long way off my wife approached, she carried a plate piled high with smoking sausages, but I snarled at her, "Is that all? How small they are!" Sometimes my cell expanded into a library, with shelf after shelf of books in bindings reaching up into the darkness: famous novels, poetry, biographies, religious and scientific works. They towered up above me. At other times, thousands of faces turned eagerly towards me: I was surrounded by huge crowds, waiting for me to speak. Questions were shouted. Voices answered them. There were cheers and counter-cheers. A sea of faces stretched into infinity.

I was also troubled by dreams of violence against those who had put me in prison, and tormented by erotic fantasies. This is a Hell which is not easily understood by those who have not dwelt in it. I was thirty-nine when I entered prison, healthy and active, and now the return of tuberculosis brought increased sexual desire. Lying awake, I had hot sweaty dreams of sensual pleasure with women and girls, then - although I tried to drive them out - came visions of perversions and exaggerations of the act of love. Frustration and the sense of sin caused me horrible suffering: sometimes sharp and searing, at others dull, but always present.

I found a way of shaking off such hallucinations by treating them as hostile intruders, like the T.B. microbes in my body. So, far from blaming myself for their inroads, I claimed credit for resisting them. Once I regarded the hallucinations not as sins but as enemies, I could plan how to destroy them. Evil thoughts can be subdued by reason, if their consequences are calmly considered. I did not try to drive them out, knowing that they would slip in again by a side door; instead, I let them stay while I worked out the cost in real life if I surrendered to them. To give way to such temptations would surely bring misery to other families and my own. My wife would have to divorce me. My son's future would be wrecked. My parishioners would lose faith. And then, despised by all, I should still have to answer to God for the harm I had caused. As doctors employ one virus to fight another, so we can use the Devil's maxim, "divide and rule," to defeat him. The devil of pride - the fear of losing face - can be turned against the devil of lust. The devil of avarice hates vices that cost money!

25

One day, our latrines being blocked, they took me to the toilet used by the guards. There was a piece of mirror on the wall over the washbowl, and for the first time in two years I saw myself.

I had been young and healthy on entering jail. I had been considered handsome. Now, as I looked at what I had become, I laughed: sad laughter, Homeric laughter. So many had admired and loved me: now if they could see the fearful old man who stared back at me they would be appalled. It was a lesson to me that what is really fine in us is invisible to the eye. I would become uglier still - a skeleton and a skull; and, remembering this, my faith and desire to keep to the spiritual life were strengthened.

There was a torn newspaper in the toilet, the first I had seen since my arrest. It contained the news that Premier Groza had firmly decided to wipe out the rich, which struck me as funny - a Government bent on liquidating the wealthy, while the rest of the world was trying to end poverty. I looked for Patrascanu's name, in case he had been reinstated, but it was not among the Ministers in the Chamber where Groza's speech was made.

On my way back to my cell under escort, I heard a woman weeping and crying out in a crazed way. Her shrieks seemed to come from a level of the prison below us; they rose to a paroxysm, then were suddenly stopped.

A few days later a new prisoner was put in the cell next to mine. I tapped out a "Who are you?" message and received a prompt reply. It was Ion Mihalache, who had been a member of several pre-war governments and a colleague of the great political leader Iuliu Maniu. When the Party terror began, Mihalache joined a group which tried to flee abroad. He was arrested at the airport and, in October 1947, sentenced to life imprisonment. Mihalache was over sixty. "All my life I have struggled to help my countrymen, and this is my reward," he said.

"When you will all that happens, then what happens is only what you will," I signaled. "Renunciation is the way to peace."

He tapped back. "There is no peace without liberty."

I said, "In a country where tyranny reigns... prison is the place of honor."

He said that God was lost for him.

I signaled, "God is never lost for any man... We are the lost ones.... If we find ourselves... we find the Godhead within us.... Prison can help us in this search." He said that he would try again.

Before Mihalache was moved on two days later he told me that the woman whose screams we heard was the wife of a former Prime Minister, Ion Gigurtu. The way her cries stopped showed that they were giving her injections to silence her. When I rapped on the wall next there was no reply. Mihalache was gone.

26

Soon after this, my interrogation was resumed. It was usually conducted by Lieutenant Grecu, a tough young man, intelligent and self-assured, who had been indoctrinated with the belief that he was making a better world. His questioning brought us back once more to the famine relief which I had undertaken for the Scandinavian church mission. Did I still deny, he asked, that the funds were used for spying?

I said, "I can understand your suspecting the British and Americans of spending money for espionage here, but what interest could Norway or Sweden have in such activities?"

He retorted, "Both are tools of the imperialists."

"But Norway is famous for its democratic spirit, and Sweden has had a socialist government for forty years."

"Nonsense!" he said. "They're as Fascist as the rest."

At our next meeting, Grecu said he had checked and thought I might be right.

He enquired next about the distribution of the Gospel in Russian. I suggested that a director of the Bible Society called Emile Klein might be behind it. He asked why I had made repeated visits to the town of Iasi (one of the centers of this work). I said I had a standing invitation to call on the actual Patriarch.

Next morning I was called again. Grecu was at his desk, with a rubber truncheon in his hand.

"Your story was lies," he shouted. "Emile Klein died before you were arrested. That's why you named him. They've checked the dates of your trips to Iasi - the Patriarch Justinian was hardly ever there."

He pushed back his chair. "Enough! Here's some paper. We know you've communicated in code with other prisoners including Mihalache. Now we must know exactly what each of them said. We want to know your other breaches of prison rules. And tell the truth. If you don't..."

He cracked the truncheon on the desk. "You have half an hour," he said, and left the room.

I sat down to write. The first word had to be "Declaration." I had trouble in starting: it was two years since I had held a pen. I admitted that I had broken rules. I had tapped the Gospel message through the walls. I had hoarded pills to kill myself. I had made a knife out of a piece of tin, chessmen out of bread and chalk. I had communicated with other prisoners, but did not know their names. (I did not mention that I had received confessions and even brought men to faith with Morse.) I wrote, "I have never spoken against the Communists. I am a disciple of Christ, who has given us love for our enemies. I understand them and pray for their conversion; so that they will become my brothers in the Faith. I can give no statement about what others may have tapped to me, for a priest of God can never be a witness for the prosecution. My calling is to defend, not to accuse.

Grecu returned on time, swinging his truncheon. He had been beating prisoners.

He picked up my "Declaration" and began to read. After a while, he put the truncheon aside. When he came to the end he looked at me with troubled eyes. He said, "Mr. Wurmbrand (he had never called me "Mr." before), why do you say you love me? This is one of your Christian commandments, that no one can keep. I couldn't love someone who shut me up for years alone, who starved and beat me."

I said, "It's not a matter of keeping a commandment. When I became a Christian it was as if I had been reborn, with a new character which was full of love. Just as only water can flow from a spring, so only love can come from a loving heart."

For two hours we talked about Christianity and its relation to the Marxist doctrines on which he was brought up. Grecu was surprised when I said Marx's first work was a commentary on St. John's Gospel; nor did he know that Marx, in his foreword to ~Das Kapital~, wrote that Christianity - especially in its Protestant form - is "the ideal religion for the renewal of lives made wretched by sin." Since my life had been made wretched by sin, I said, I was simply following Marx's advice in becoming a Protestant Christian.

After this meeting Grecu called me to his office almost every day for an hour or two. He had confirmed the quotations. This became the pretext for long discussions about Christianity, in which I stressed its democratic and revolutionary early spirit.

Repeatedly, Grecu said, "I was brought up an atheist, and I'll never be anything else." I told him, "Atheism is a holy word for Christians. Our forefathers when they were thrown to the wild beasts for their faith, were called atheists by Nero and Caligula. So if anyone calls himself an atheist, I respect him."

Grecu smiled. I went on, "Lieutenant, one of my ancestors was a rabbi of the seventeenth century. His biographers record how he met an atheist and said,

'I envy you, dear brother! Your spiritual life must be so much stronger than my own. When I see a man in trouble I often say, "God will help him," and pass on. You don't believe in God, so you have to take on his burdens and help everyone you meet.'

"Christians don't criticize the Party for atheism, but for producing the wrong type of atheist. There are two sorts - those who say, 'There is no God, so I can do all the evil I like,' and those who reason, 'Since there is no God, I must do all the good that God would do if He existed.' The greatest of all atheists in this second sense, was Christ himself. When he saw men hungry, sick and in distress, he didn't pass on, saying, 'God will help them.' He acted as if the whole responsibility were his own. So people began to ask, 'Is this man God? He does God's work!' That is how they discovered that Jesus was God. Lieutenant, if you can become this sort of atheist, loving everyone and serving everyone, men will soon discover that you have become a son of God; and you yourself will discover the Godhead in you."

These arguments may shock some people. But St. Paul tells us that missionaries must be Jews among the Jews, Greeks among the Greeks. I had to be a Marxist with the Marxist Grecu and speak the language he understood. The words went to his heart. He began to think and to love Jesus. Two weeks later, in his khaki uniform with the blue tabs of the Security Police at his collar, Grecu confessed to me in my patched prison rags. We became brethren.

From then on, he bravely helped prisoners as best he could, through difficulties and dangers. He still gave lip-service to the Party and played an outward role, but one day he disappeared, and no one knew what became of him. I made cautious enquiries among the guards, who thought he had been arrested. To hide a true conversion is not easy.

page 64 In God's Underground

I met other secret believers among the Secret Police, and some still go about their duties. Don't say a man cannot torture and pray at the same time! Jesus tells us of a tax-gatherer (whose work in Roman times went hand-in-hand with extortion and brutality) who prayed for mercy as a sinner, and went home "justified." The Gospel does not say that the man immediately abandoned his unpleasant job. God looks into the heart and sees in a good prayer the promise of a new life in the future.

During my second year of confinement, one of these divided souls was put in my cell. All the time he stayed with me, his hands were chained behind his back. I had to feed him and do everything for him.

Dionisiu was a young sculptor, full of new ideas in a world which asked only flattering busts of Stalin. He had no money to buy bread, so he took a post with the Secret Police which obliged him to beat prisoners; but at the same time he ran great risks to warn them of informers. Finding himself under suspicion, Dionisiu decided to flee the country; then, when close to freedom, was compelled by some inner urge to return and give himself up. These split personalities are found everywhere under Communism. Dionisiu had been pulled in two directions all his life.

For ten nights, all through the night, I taught Dionisiu from the Bible. His sense of guilt was driven out. Before they moved him from my cell he said, "If one of the fifteen priests in my little town had stopped to talk to me when I was younger, I should have found Jesus long ago."

28

Interrogation did not cease with Lieutenant Grecu's departure but God granted me the gift of being able to forget the names of all for whom I could cause trouble. Although in prison I composed more than 300 poems, totaling 100,000 words, and wrote them all down on my release, I could make my mind a blank during interrogation. So a new device was tried.

On the pretext that my tuberculosis had worsened - and, indeed, my coughing was almost continuous - the doctors ordered me a new drug: a yellow capsule which brought long sleep filled with delightful dreams. When I awoke I was given another. I remained unconscious for some days, awakened only by guards bringing meals which had become light and wholesome.

My recollection of the resumed questioning is hazy. I know that the drug did not make me betray my friends, because when I was put on trial later, I was tried alone. No grand trial of the men behind the World Council of Churches' "spy net" ever took place. The drug was used on Cardinal Mindszenty, the Trotskyists and many others. It weakens will-power until the victim goes into a delirium of self-accusation. Later, I was to hear men who were taking the course, banging on cell doors and demanding to see the political officer so that they might make new charges against themselves. The treatment can also have long-term effects: men who had taken it months before later confessed to me sins they had no chance of committing. Perhaps the tuberculosis in my body counteracted the drug. Perhaps I had received too big a dose of it. At all events, by God's grace, I was saved from treachery.

29

I became still weaker after the drugging, and one day collapsed completely. But although I could rise from bed only with extreme effort, my mind remained alert for a time. I was ever afraid of its lucidity.

It is no myth that the great St. Anthony, Martin Luther and many other more ordinary men have seen the Devil. I saw him once, as a child. He grinned at me. This is the first time I have spoken of it in half a century. Alone in the cell, now, I felt his presence again. It was dark and cold, and he was mocking me. The Bible speaks of places "where satyrs dance," and this had become such a place. I heard his voice day and night, 'Where's Jesus? Your Savior can't save you! You've been tricked, and you've tricked others. He isn't the Messiah - you followed the wrong man!" I cried aloud, "Then who is the true Messiah who will come?" The answer was plain, but too blasphemous to repeat. I had written books and articles proving Christ was the Messiah, but now I could not think of one argument. The devils who made Nyils Hauge, the great Norwegian evangelist, waver in his faith while in jail, who made even John the Baptist doubt in his dungeon, raged against me. I was weaponless. My joy and serenity were gone. I had felt Christ so close to me before, easing my bitterness, lightening the darkness, but now I cried, "~Eli, Eli, lama sabachthani?~" and I felt utterly forsaken.

During those black, horrible days, I slowly composed a long poem which may not be easily accepted by those who have not known any similar physical and spiritual state. It was my salvation. By word, rhythm and incantation, I was able to defeat Satan. Here is an unrhymed and unmetrical version which gives the exact meaning of the Rumanian:

> From childhood I frequented temples and churches. In them God was glorified. Different priests sang and censed with zeal. They claimed it right to love You. But as I grew, I saw such deep sorrow in the world of this God that I said to myself, "He has a heart of stone. Otherwise He would ease the difficulties of the way for us." Sick children struggle with fever in hospital; sad parents pray for them. Heaven is deaf. The ones we love go to the valley of death, even when our prayers are long. Innocent men are burned alive in furnaces. And heaven is silent. It lets things be. Can God wonder, if, in undertones, even the believers begin to doubt? Hungry, tortured, persecuted in their own land, they have no answers to these questions. The Almighty is disgraced by the horrors that befall us.

How can I love the creator of microbes and of tigers that tear men? How can I love Him who tortures all his servants because one ate from a tree? Sadder than Job, I have neither wife, child nor comforters, and in this prison there is neither sun nor air and the regime is hard to endure.

From my bed of planks they will make my coffin. Stretched upon it, I try to find why my thoughts run to You, why my writings all turn towards You? Why is this passionate love in my soul, why does my song go only to You? I know I am rejected, soon I will putrefy in a tomb.

The bride of the Song of Songs did not love when she asked if You are "rightly loved." Love is its own justification. Love is not for the wise. Through a thousand ordeals she will not cease to love. Though fire burns and the waves drown her, she will kiss the hand that hurts. If she finds no answer to her questions she is confident and waits. One day the sun will shine in hidden places and all will be made plain.

Forgiveness of many sins only increased Magdalene's burning love. But she gave perfume and shed tears before You said Your forgiving word. And had You not said it, still she would have sat and wept for the love she has towards You, even being in sin. She loved You before Your blood was shed. She loved You before You forgave. Neither do I ask if it is right to give You love. I do not love in hope of salvation. I would love You in everlasting misfortune. I would love You even in consuming fire. If You had refused to descend to men, You would have been my distant dream. If You had refused to sow Your word, I would love You without hearing it. If You had hesitated and fled from the Crucifixion and I were not saved, still I would love You. And even if I found sin in You, I would cover it with my love.

Now I will dare to say mad words, so that all may know how much I love. Now I will touch untouched strings and magnify You with a new music. If the prophets had predicted another, I would leave them, not You. Let them produce a thousand proofs, I will keep my love for You. If I divined that You were a deceiver, I would pray for You weeping and, though I could not follow You in falsehood, it would not lessen my love. For Saul, Samuel passed a life in weeping and severe fasting. So my love would resist even if I knew You lost. If You, not Satan, had risen wrongly in revolt against Heaven and lost the loveliness of wings and fallen like an archangel from high, hopeless, I would hope that the Father would forgive You and that one day You would walk with Him again in the gold streets of Heaven.

page 68 In God's Underground

If You were a myth, I would leave reality and live with You in a dream. If they proved You did not exist, You would receive life from my love. My love is mad, without motive, as Your love is, too. Lord Jesus, Send some happiness here. For more I cannot give you.

When I had completed this poem, I no longer felt the nearness of Satan. He had gone. In the silence I felt the kiss of Christ, and everyone is silent when he is kissed. Quiet and joy returned.

page 69 In God's Underground

PART TWO

After nearly three years of solitary confinement, I was close to death. I spat blood often.

Colonel Dulgheru said, "We're not murderers like the Nazis. We want you to live - and suffer." A specialist was called. Anxious to avoid infection, he made his diagnosis through a spy-hole in the cell door. Orders were given for my transfer to a prison-hospital.

They carried me up from the underground cells, and in the yard of the Ministry of the Interior I saw moonlight and stars again. Lying in an ambulance, I caught familiar glimpses of Bucharest. We were moving in the direction of my house and for a moment I thought I was being taken home to die. When we were almost there, the ambulance turned off and began to climb a hill on the outskirts of the city. I knew then that we were going to Vacaresti, one of the great monasteries of Bucharest which during the last century had been turned into a jail. The fine church and chapel-of-ease had become store sheds. Many walls had been knocked down between monks' cells, making them into big rooms in which prisoners lived by the score. A few cells remained in which men could be isolated.

A sheet was wrapped around my head before the guards lifted me out of the ambulance. They gripped me under the arms and I was half-carried across the courtyard, up some stairs and along a balcony. When the sheet was removed, I was alone in a narrow, bare cell. I heard an officer talking to a guard on the verandah outside.

"No one is allowed to see this man except the doctor, and then you must be there," he said. My continued existence was to remain a secret.

The guard, a grizzled little man, was made curious by these precautions. When the officer had left he asked what I had done. I said, "I am a pastor and a child of God."

He whispered, bending over me, "Praise be to the Lord! I'm one of Jesus's soldiers!" He was a secret member of "The Army of the Lord," a revivalist movement which had branched off from the Orthodox Church. In spite of being persecuted by Communists and clergy alike, it had spread rapidly through the villages, gathering hundreds of thousands of followers.

The guard's name was Tachici. We exchanged

Bible verses and he helped me as much as he dared - warders had been sentenced to twelve years for giving an apple or a cigarette to a prisoner. I was too weak to leave the bed, and often I lay in my dirt. For a short spell in the morning, I could think clearly, then I tossed and turned in delirium. I slept little. But there was a small window through which I could see the sky again. And in the morning I was awoken by a strange sound - it was so long since I had heard the song of the birds!

I told Tachici. "Martin Luther, when he walked in the woods, used to raise his hat to the birds and say, 'Good morning, theologians - you wake and sing, but I, old fool, know less than you and worry over everything, instead of simply trusting in the heavenly Father's care.'"

The window revealed a corner of grass and yard, usually empty. Sometimes white-coated doctors scurried across, afraid even to glance up. They had to practice medicine "in the spirit of the class-war."

I could hear men talking when they were out for exercise. In the past I had sometimes longed for the sound of a human voice, but now it was an irritation.

page 71 In God's Underground

Men spoke nothings. Their thoughts seemed trivial and false.

An old man's voice came from the next cell one morning. "I'm Leonte Filipescu. Who are you?"

I recognized the name of one of Rumania's first Socialists, a brilliant man whom the Party had used and then discarded. "Fight your illness," he called. "Don't give in! We'll all be free in two weeks' time."

"How do you know?" I asked.

"The Americans are driving the Communists back in Korea. They'll be here in two weeks."

I said, "But even if they meet no opposition, it will surely take them more than a fortnight to reach Rumania?"

"Bosh! Distance is nothing to them. They have supersonic jets!"

I did not argue. Prisoners lived on their illusions. If the daily gruel was a little thicker, it implied that an American ultimatum had frightened Russia, and so our treatment was being improved! If someone was knocked down by a warder, it meant the Communists were making the most of their last days of power. Men came back in high spirits from the exercise yard: "King Michael has broadcast that he will be back on his throne next month!"

No man could bear to think that he would really spend the next ten or twenty years in prison. Filipescu was still hopeful of early release when he was moved out, a month later, to another prison-hospital, where we were to meet again. In his place came a leader of the Fascist Iron Guard, Radu Mironovici, who claimed to be a fervent Christian but was always spouting hatred of the Jews.

I asked Tachici to help me up in bed and called to Mironovici, "When you take Holy Communion in your Orthodox church, are the bread and wine transformed into the actual body and blood of Jesus Christ?" He answered that they were.

"Jesus was a Jew," I said. "If the wine becomes His blood, then that blood is Jewish, isn't it?"

Reluctantly, he supposed so. I went on: "Jesus says that whoever eats His body and drinks His blood will have eternal life. So, to have eternal life, you have to add to your Aryan blood a few drops of Jewish blood. How then can you hate Jews?"

He had no answer. I begged him to see that it was absurd for a follower of Jesus, who was a Jew, to hate Jews - just as it was absurd for the Communists to be anti-Semitic, since they believed in a Jew called Karl Marx. Mironovici was presently moved to a distant cell but he told Tachici: "A part of my life which was false has fallen away. I was a Christian who was too proud to follow Christ."

2

On a day when I was running a high temperature and feeling sick and faint, the guards came for me again. They draped a sheet over my head and led me along a corridor. When the sheet came off, I was in a large, bare room with barred windows. Four men and a woman sat facing me behind a table. This was my trial and they were my judges.

"A lawyer has been nominated to defend you," said the president of the court. "He has waived your right to call witnesses. You may sit down."

Guards held me on a chair, while I was given an injection to steady me. When the waves of nausea and dizziness cleared, the prosecutor was on his feet. He was saying that I stood for the same criminal ideology in Rumania as Josef Broz Tito did in Yugoslavia. I thought I must be delirious. At the time of my arrest Marshal Tito was held up as a model Communist – I did not know that he had since been revealed as a deviationist and traitor. He continued his interminable speech about my guilt: spy work through the Scandinavian church missions and the World Council of Churches, spreading imperialist ideology under cover of religion, infiltrating the Party under the same pretense, with the real purpose of destroying it, and so on. As the voice continued, I felt myself slipping from the chair, and proceedings were delayed while I received another injection.

The defense lawyer did what he could. It was not much.

"Have you anything to say?" asked the president. His voice seemed far away and the room was growing dark. Only one thing came into my confused brain.

"I love God," I said.

I heard my sentence: twenty years' hard labor. The trial had taken ten minutes. As I left, the sheet was wrapped around my head again.

3

Two days later, Tachici whispered to me, "You're leaving. God be with you!" Another guard followed and, between them, they carried me to the main gate. I had a view of Bucharest spread below – the last time I was to see it for six years. Regulation chains weighing fifty pounds were hammered into place around my ankles. I was lifted into a truck in which there were already some forty men and a few women. All, even the sick, were chained. Near me, a girl began to weep. I tried to comfort her.

"You don't remember me?" she sobbed.

I looked more closely, but her face meant little.

"I was one of your congregation." After my arrest, poverty had turned her to theft, she told me, and now she had to serve three months. "I'm so ashamed." Her voice was full of tears. "I was in your church, and now you're a martyr and I'm a thief."

"I'm a sinner, too, saved by the grace of God," I said. "Believe in Christ and your sins will be forgiven you."

She kissed my hand, promising that on her release she would let my family know that she had seen me.

At a railway siding, we were loaded into a special wagon for transporting prisoners. The windows were tiny and opaque. As we rattled slowly across the plain and into the Carpathian foothills, we found that all of us had tuberculosis and decided that we must be bound for Tirgul-Ocna, where there was a sanatorium of sorts for T.B. prisoners. For some 400 years convicts had worked at the local salt mines, and thirty years ago a famous doctor, Romascanu, built the sanatorium and gave it to the State. It had an excellent reputation before the Communists took over.

After a 200-mile journey, which took a day and night, we came to the station of Tirgul-Ocna, a town of 30,000 people. With six other men unable to walk, I was laid on the back of a cart. The others hauled us, while the guards looked on, to a big building at the edge of the town. As I was carried in, I saw a familiar face. It was Dr. Aldea, an ex-Fascist who had been converted and become a family friend. When I had been helped to a bed in the quarantine room, he examined me.

"I'm a prisoner myself," he said, "but they let me work as a doctor. There are no nurses and only one physician, so we must look after each other as best we can."

He took my temperature and made his check.

"I won't deceive you," he said. "There's nothing we can do. You may have about two weeks to live. Try to eat what they give you, although it is not good. Otherwise..." He touched my shoulder and moved on.

During the next days, two men died who had been in the cart from the station. I heard another of them pleading hoarsely with Aldea, "I swear I'm better, doctor. The fever's going, I know. Listen, please! Today I coughed blood only once. Don't let them put me in Room Four."

I asked the man who brought my watery gruel what happened in Room Four. He put the plate down carefully and replied, "That's where you go when they know there is no hope."

I tried to eat the gruel but could not. Someone fed me with a spoon. The food would not stay down. Dr. Aldea said, "I'm sorry, but they insist. You'll have to go to Room Four."
I rejoined my companions from the cart.

page 75 In God's Underground

4

I might already have been dead. Prisoners crossed themselves as they passed the foot of my bed. I lay most of the time in a coma. If I groaned, others turned me on my side or gave me water.
Dr. Aldea could do little. "If only we had some modern drugs," he said. A new American discovery, streptomycin, was rumored to be doing wonders against tuberculosis; but the Party line ruled that this was all Western propaganda.
During the next fortnight, four men who entered the room with me died. Sometimes I was not sure myself whether I was alive or dead. At night I slept in snatches, woken by stabs of agony. Other prisoners turned me on my side an average of forty times to ease the pain. Pus was running from a dozen sores. My chest was swollen with it, and the spine was also affected. I spat blood constantly.
My soul and body were linked by the feeblest ties, and I moved to the borders of the physical world. I put a question to my guardian angel: "What kind of guardian are you who cannot keep me from this suffering, nor even from un-Christian thoughts?" And in a flash of dazzling light that seemed to last a thousandth part of a second, I saw a being who was many-armed as Krishna and heard his voice: "I cannot do all I should for you. I, too, am a convert."
I didn't know the Bible, nor dogma at that time. My mind didn't work so I couldn't judge the objective value of the vision. Vaguely I remembered that Orthodox mystics speak about isolated cases when black angels have been brought back to God's service. However, conversion can't change completely the character of those who have been very evil, even when the repentance has been deep. In any case, under those circumstances, the vision offering some explanation for things through which I passed helped me greatly then.

I survived the first crisis. Dr. Aldea's look of pity began to change to puzzlement as I clung to life. I received no medicine, but for an hour in the morning the fever fell slightly and my mind was clearer. I began to look round and take stock of my surroundings.

5

The room contained twelve beds, close together, and some small tables. The windows were open and I could see men working in a vegetable patch, and beyond them high walls and barbed wire. It was very quiet. There were no alarm bells here, no shouting warders - indeed, no warders. They feared infection and kept away from the patients as much as possible. So Tirgul-Ocna was administered from a distance, and through neglect and indifference became one of the less rigorous prisons. Scarcely anything was provided or done for us. We wore the clothes in which we had been arrested, patched together over the years with whatever could be found.

Food was brought by common-law criminals to the door of the political section, and carried from there to the cells. Those who could walk, went for their ration, the rest were given it in bed. There was watery cabbage soup, a few haricot beans, or a thin skilly made of barley or maize.

A few prisoners who were well enough dug the plot outside the building. The rest lay on their plank beds and gossiped the hours away. But in Room Four the atmosphere was different. Because no one ever left it alive, it was known as "the death room."

Scores of men died, and their places were taken by others in the thirty months I lay in this room. But here is a remarkable fact. Not one died an atheist. Fascists, Communists, saints, murderers, thieves, priests, rich landowners and the poorest peasants were shut together in one small cell. Yet none of them died without making his peace with God and man.

Many entered Room Four as firmly convinced unbelievers. I saw their unbelief collapse, always, in the face of death. I have heard it said: "If a cat crosses a bridge, it doesn't mean the bridge is sound; but if a train crosses, then it surely is." So if a man calls himself an atheist as he sits with his wife over tea and cakes, that is no proof of atheism. A true conviction must survive enormous pressure, and atheism does not.

6

Old Filipescu often recited passages of Shakespeare, whom he loved, or told us stories from his life to pass the time. He had been a revolutionary for fifty years. The first of his many arrests for political agitation was in 1907. But in 1948, the Secret Police came for him. "I suffered for Socialism before you were born," he told them. They retorted that he should have joined the Communists, in that case, and shared the fruits of victory.

"I told these youths, 'Socialism is a living body with two arms – Social Democracy and revolutionary Communism. Cut off one and Socialism is crippled!' They laughed."

Filipescu was sentenced to twenty years. A warder told me, "you're going to die in prison!" I replied, 'I haven't been sentenced to death, so why do you want to kill me?'"

He told us how he had started life as a shoemaker, but had given himself an education and learned to appreciate the beautiful in life. He accepted Marxist teachings on religion – that the Church was on the side of the oppressor, that the clergy were kept by the rich to persuade the poor that their reward would come in Heaven.

But no one knows the depths of his own heart. Just as many think themselves religious and are not, so some think they are atheists, without being so. Filipescu denied God, but he was denying only his primitive conception of the word, not the realities of love and righteousness and eternity.

I suggested this to him.

"I believe in Jesus Christ and love Him as the greatest of human beings," he said, "but I cannot think of Him as God."

His condition was growing steadily worse. Within a fortnight, after a series of hemorrhages, the end came. He spoke his last words to me. "I love Jesus," he murmured. There had been several deaths that week, and he was thrown naked into a common grave which the prisoners had dug.

General Tobescu, a former chief of the Gendarmerie, raised his voice from the corner when he heard this: "This is the fate the Socialists in the West are preparing for themselves when they make allies of the Communists."

The Abbot Iscu of Tismana, my neighbor, crossed himself. "At least we may be grateful that he came to God at the end," he said gently.

Sergeant-Major Bucur disagreed, from across the room. "Nothing of the sort! He told us he couldn't think of Christ as God."

I said, "Filipescu will have found out the truth by now in the other world, for he loved Jesus, who will never reject anyone. The robber converted on Golgotha to whom Jesus promised paradise also called him simply man. I believe in the Godhead of Jesus - and also in His love towards those who cannot see it."

Bucur loved no one, but he worshipped his conception of the State, with himself as viceroy of the village where he had dispensed his own brand of justice. He was fond of telling everyone how, as gendarmerie sergeant, he had beaten thieves and beggars, beaten his own men when they dared to answer back, and - especially - beaten Jews. "Not a mark on any of them," he would say proudly; "You put sacks of loose sand across their backs first. It hurts just as badly, but they can't complain, because they've nothing to show!"

Bucur could not understand why he had been deposed under the new regime. He was ready to thrash anti-Communists with as much relish as anyone else in the way of duty.

Although he was very ill, Bucur would not admit it. When Dr. Aldea was examining him one evening, he burst out, "Why are you keeping me here? There's nothing much wrong with me. I'm not like these others!"

Aldea looked at the thermometer and shook his head. "No," he said. "You're much the worst. You should stop arguing and think about your soul."

Bucur was furious. "Who do you think you are?" he shouted after the doctor's retreating back.

"I suspect Aldea has Jewish blood," he added - it was the worst that Bucur could think of anyone.

Bucur liked to quarrel with Moisescu, a small, middle-aged Jew whose bed was close to his.

"The Iron Guard knew how to deal with you," he said.

"Do you know," said Moisescu mildly, "that it was as a member of the Iron Guard that I was arrested?" A laugh went round the room.

"It's true," he protested. "After the Iron Guard were overthrown, it was a terrible crime to have a green shirt in your possession because it was regarded as their uniform. We Jews had lost so much during their reign that I thought, 'Here's a chance to get some of our own back. Buy up all the green shirts left unsold, dye them blue and sell them.' My house was crammed with all the green shirts in Bucharest when the police came for a search. They wouldn't listen to my explanation, so I was labeled as an Iron Guard. So a Jew was sent to prison as a Nazi sympathizer!"

Although Bucur loudly declared that he was a militant Christian, his whole life had been a quarrel with God. He went to church, but found no guide. The priests of his village were not ministers of religion, but masters of ceremonial. He could not understand, now, why he was suffering and dying, nor what true faith meant.

I told him: "You feel now that you have no reason to hope. But the night is darkest before sunrise.

Christians believe that the dawn will come. Faith can be put in two words: 'though' and 'yet.' In the Book of Job [JOB 13:15] we read, 'Though the Lord slay me, yet I will trust Him,' Many times these words come together in the Bible. They tell us to have faith in the darkest moments."

Bucur was pleased that someone should take an interest in him. But he showed no remorse for the cruelty and evil of his past; until the day on which he realized that Dr. Aldea had been right. His life was ebbing quickly. He said, in a frightened voice, "I'm dying for my country."

For hours he was unconscious. When he awoke, he said, "I want to confess - before you all. I have sinned so much. I cannot die thinking of it." His voice gained a strange calm. He told us how he had killed scores of Jews, acting not under orders, but because he knew he would never be punished. He had murdered women, and a boy of twelve years. He had been thirsty for blood, like a tiger.

At the end of the recital, he muttered, "Now Mr. Wurmbrand will hate me."

I replied, "No - you yourself hate this creature who killed. You have reviled and rejected him. You are no longer that murderer. A man can be born again."

Next morning he still clung weakly to life. "I did not tell everything yesterday," he said. "I was afraid."

He had shot children in their mother's arms. When his ammunition had gone he had clubbed them to death. His terrible story seemed endless, but when at last it was over, he fell into a sleep. His breathing was hoarse and irregular. His breast rose and fell as if he could have never enough air. We were all silent. His hands clenched and unclenched on the soiled blanket, and then hands clasped themselves around the small cross at his neck. There was a tortured rattling from his throat and the breathing stopped.

Someone called out to a prisoner in the corridor. Two men came to take Bucur's body. The morning sun poured through the open windows on to his face, but now that the eyes were closed and the hard lines of the mouth relaxed, his features in death showed a great peace, such as he had never known in life.

7

Prisoners from other wards came often to Room Four to pass the night with us, helping the dying and offering comfort.

At Easter, a friend brought something wrapped in a twist of paper for Valeriu Gafencu, a former Iron Guard trooper. They came from the same town. "It's been smuggled in," he said. "Open it!"

Gafencu undid the paper and revealed two lumps of a glittering white substance - sugar! None of us had seen pieces of sugar for years. Our wasted bodies craved for it. All eyes were on Gafencu, and the prize in his hand. Slowly he wrapped it up again.

"I shall not eat it yet," he said. "Someone might be worse off than I during the day. But thank you." He put the present carefully beside his bed, and there it stayed.

A few days later, my fever increased and I became very weak. The sugar was passed from bed to bed until it came to rest on mine.

"It's a gift," said Gafencu. I thanked him, but left the sugar untouched in case someone needed it more next day. When my crisis passed, I gave it to Soteris, the elder of two Greek Communists whose condition was grave.

For two years the sugar went from man to man in Room Four (and twice it returned to me); each time the sufferer had the strength to resist it.

Soteris and Glafkos were Communist guerrillas who had fled to Rumania at the end of the Greek civil war. They had been arrested, like many of their comrades, for fighting poorly; now they never tired of boasting of their exploits before the tide of battle turned against them. They had raided the famous monasteries of Mount Athos, looting all they could carry, smashing what they had to leave. Women are forbidden on Athos and many of the 2,000 monks had not seen one for years. "We took a band of girl partisans with us," Soteris said. "You should have seen those old boys run!"

Soteris was proud of his atheism while he could joke and hope for life: but as death approached he cried out for help from God. Only the priest's murmuring voice, promising heavenly forgiveness could quieten him. Then he, too, found the great moral force to renounce the two pieces of sugar.

His body was prepared for burial by a prisoner from outside who often came to help us. He was known, respectfully, as "The Professor" and his name was Popp. Rarely did his stooped and scholarly figure appear unaccompanied by someone to whom he was teaching history, French or some other subject.

I asked once how he managed without writing materials. He explained: "We rub the table with a piece of soap and scratch the words with a nail."

When I admired his persistence, the innocent blue eyes sparkled. "I used to think I taught for a living. In prison I've learned that I teach because I love my pupils!

"You have a vocation, as the priests say?"

"Well," he replied, "here we are shown what we are worth."

When I asked if he was a Christian he looked upset. "Pastor, I have had too many disappointments. At my last prison, Ocnele-Mari, the church was turned into a storeroom and they asked for someone to tear down the cross on the steeple. No one cared to do it. In the end it was a priest who volunteered."

I said that not every man in holy order has a priestly heart, nor were all who called themselves Christians disciples of Christ in the true sense of the word. "A man who visits a barber to be shaved, or who orders a suit from a tailor, is not a disciple, but a customer. So one who comes to the Savior only to be saved is the Savior's customer, not his disciple. A disciple is one who says to Christ, 'How I long to do work like yours! To go from place to place taking away fear; bringing instead joy, truth, comfort and life eternal!'"

Popp smiled. "But what of those who become disciples at the eleventh hour? I have been puzzled to see so many convinced atheists turn into believers at the end."

I said that our minds do not always work on the same level. "A genius can talk nonsense at times or bicker with his wife, but he is not judged by that. We should respect our minds, like his, when they are at their best - when they are straining to find a way out at the moment of supreme crisis. It is when the mind has to pass through the gap of death that the facade of atheism nearly always collapses."

"And why do you suppose that a man like Sergeant Bucur longs to confess his crimes publicly?"

I said, "Once I lived near a railway and never noticed the trains by day because the town was noisy. But at night I heard their whistles clearly. So the clamor of life can deafen us to the quiet voice of conscience. It is when death approaches in the silence of the prison, where there are no distractions, that men hear the voice who never have before.

The Abbot said: "In my last prison, at Aiud, there was a poor murderer in solitary confinement. He kept waking in the night and shouting, 'Who's that in the next cell? Why doesn't he stop knocking on the wall?'"

"Well?" said Popp.

"The next cell was empty."

"I can cap that," offered Moisescu. "In my last place there was an Iron Guard who had killed a rabbi. He was sure the rabbi was riding on his shoulders and digging spurs into his flesh."

8

Since I had no strength to wash myself, Professor Popp took on the task. I asked whether there were showers in his part of the prison.

"Yes!" he said. "In the People's Republic of Rumania we have the most modern equipment. Only it doesn't work. The showers have been dry for years." He straightened his back and went on:

"Have you heard of the Communist and the Capitalist who died and met in Hell! They found two gates. One was labeled 'Capitalist Hell' and the other 'Communist Hell.' Although the men were class enemies they put their heads together to decide which would be better. The Communist said, 'Comrade, let's go into the Communist department. There, when there's coal, there'll be no matches. When there are matches, there'll be no coal. And even when they have both coal and matches, the furnace will break down!'"

The professor continued to wash me while the others laughed. Aristar the farmer said, "The first Communists were Adam and Eve."

"Why?" asked the obliging Popp.

"Because they had no clothes, no house, they had to share the same apple - and still thought they were in paradise."

The telling of jokes and stories was important to us. Men lay all day with only their miseries to think of, and anyone who could help them to forget was doing an act of mercy. I talked often for hours on end, although ill and dizzy with hunger: a story, as much as a piece of bread, could sustain the life of man.

When Popp urged me to save my strength, I said I had enough for one more anecdote that morning.

"The Talmud tells us of a rabbi walking in the street when he heard the voice of the prophet Elijah saying, 'Although you fast and pray, never have you deserved the high place in Heaven which awaits those two men on the other side of the road.' The rabbi ran after the strangers, and said, 'Do you give much to the poor?'

"They laughed. 'No, we are beggars ourselves.'

"'Then do you pray continuously?'

"'No. We are ignorant men. We don't know how to pray.'

page 85 In God's Underground

"Then tell me what you do."

"'We make jokes. We make people laugh when they are sad.'"

Popp looked surprised. "Are you telling us that those who make men laugh may have greater honor in Heaven than those who fast?"

"That is the teaching of the Talmud, which is a book of Jewish wisdom. But we can also read in the Bible - the second Psalm - [PSA 2:4] that God himself laughs sometimes."

Popp said, helping me back into my clothes, "He wouldn't find much to laugh at here - but where is God, Pastor, and why does He not help us?"

I said, "There was a pastor called to a man's deathbed. He found the mother trying to comfort her sobbing daughter. The girl said, 'Where is the protecting arm of God you preach about, Pastor?' He replied, 'It is on your shoulder, in the shape of your mother's arm.'

"Christ is with us in prison in many ways. Firstly, he can be seen in our Christian doctors, who are beaten and bullied but go on helping us. Some official doctors in Vacaresti have also smuggled in drugs and earned themselves ten years in jail.

"Secondly, Christ is here in the priests and pastors who work to ease others' burdens, and in the form of all Christians who give food, clothes and help to men worse off than themselves. Thirdly, He is with us in the form of those who teach about God, and also of the story-tellers. And you have Him with you not only in the person of those who serve you, but also in the shape of those whom you can serve.

"Jesus tells us that, at the Last Judgment, God will separate the good from the bad, on His right hand and His left. Jesus will say to those on the right, 'Come, enter and possess the kingdom that has been ready for you since the world was made. For I was hungry and you gave me meat; I was a stranger and you took me in; naked and you clothed me; sick and you visited me; I was in prison and you came to me.' The good will ask, 'Lord, when did we do all this?' And Christ will reply, 'Inasmuch as you have done it to the least of my brethren, you have done it for me.'" [Read MTT 25:34-40]

9

Gafencu had spent his whole adult life in prison, but like other Iron Guard followers in whom Christian belief had prevailed, he could not do enough to make up for his mistakes. Every day, he set the example of putting aside part of his meager ration to help build up the weakest among us. His anti-Semitism had been left behind, and when some of his old Fascist friends came to see him in Room Four, he suddenly came out with a remark which shocked them: "I'd like to see the country ruled entirely by Jews."

His comrades stared at him in horror.

"Yes," said Gafencu calmly, "Prime Minister, legislators, civil servants - everyone. I'd make only one condition. They must be men like the old Jewish rulers, like Joseph, Moses, Daniel, St. Peter, St. Paul and Jesus himself. Because if we have any more Jews over us like Ana Pauker, then Rumania is finished."

Gafencu had been jailed when he was nineteen. His youth had gone by without his ever knowing a girl. When others talked about sex, he asked, "What is it like?"

He told me one day, "My father was deported from Bessarabia by the Russians. We never had enough to eat. I was beaten in school, then put in jail for running away and joining the Iron Guard. I'd never met a single good, truthful, loving person. I said to myself, 'It's just a legend about Christ. There isn't anyone in the world like that today and I don't believe there ever was.' But when I'd been in prison a few months I had to say that I was wrong. I met sick men who gave away their last crust. I shared a cell with a bishop who had such goodness that you felt the touch of his robe could heal."

Gafencu had been in Room Four a year, and in all that time he had not been able to lie on his back. It gave him too much pain. He had to be propped up continually. Every day he had a little less control over his body, often fulfilling his necessities where he lay; then having to wait, sometimes at night for hours, until someone came to clean him.

Stronger patients from outside had to take over the washing for those of us who could not help ourselves, scrubbing shirts, underwear, pillow-cases, sometimes twenty sheets a day, although they had to break ice in the yard to reach the water. My own things were always stiff with pus and blood, but when I tried to stop a friend from washing them he was angry.

Gafencu never complained. He sat very still in bed, sometimes moving his head a little to nod agreement or convey a word of thanks. When it was known that he had not long to live, his old friends and new ones gathered around his bed with tears in their eyes. His last words were, "The spirit of God wishes us jealously for Himself."

When he had gone, the others knelt and prayed. I said, "Jesus tells us that if a seed does not fall into the earth and die, it cannot bring forth fruit, and that as a seed is reborn in a beautiful flower, so man dies and his mortal body is renewed in a spiritual body. And his heart which has come to be filled with the ideals of Christianity will surely bear fruit."

After a priest had said a prayer, Gafencu was wrapped in his sheet and carried to the mortuary. During the night he was buried in a common grave by criminal convicts, who always performed this task.

10

A steady flow of new arrivals at Tirgul-Ocna kept us informed of events outside, and sometimes it seemed that we in prison were hardly worse off than the "free" workers and peasants. Wages had never been so low. An eight-hour day had been proclaimed, but you might work twelve before completing your "norm," and then "voluntary" work and Marxist lectures left no time for family life, in any case, every apartment housed two or more families.

Strikes were illegal. One newcomer, a gnarled old trade unionist called Boris Matei, told me: "It's forty years since I was jailed for fighting for the eight-hour day, and now that there's a Communist government I'm working fourteen hours in prison." His crime was to write an anonymous letter to Comrade Gheorghiu-Dej, the Party boss, protesting on behalf of his workmates against the severity of their conditions and saying they would be entitled in any capitalist state to withdraw their labor. The Secret Police came to his rolling-stock depot and took handwriting samples from the 10,000 workers. After weeks of investigation, Boris was accused of trying to foment a strike and given fifteen years for attempted sabotage.

Boris remained unshaken in his Marxist creed. He had no sympathy for the dissenting groups who had been herded with him into prison: freemasons, rotarians, theosophists, spiritualists. Nor could he feel for the poets and novelists who had been locked up for their independent outlook: they had been summoned in turn to Party H.Q. to be given their orders, and should know better than to chase the will-o'-the-wisp of objective truth.

Boris argued that Lenin had underlined in his books the importance of finding and clinging to one point of view in life.

"The Party line?" I said. "But this doctrine reverses all philosophical concepts. If I look at the cell from my bed I see only the window. If I look from where you're sitting, I see the door. If I look at the floor, the room has no ceiling. Every viewpoint is in reality a point of blindness, because it incapacitates you totally from seeing other points of view. It is only when we abandon all 'points of view' and accept our intuition of the whole that we find truth. St. Paul says 'Love believes everything' - not just the creed of this group or that."

But talk of religion made Boris angry. "There is no God, no soul! Only matter exists. I defy you to prove otherwise."

I said he must take his arguments from a Communist textbook in which I had seen the following definition of a kiss: "'A kiss is the approach of two pairs of lips, with reciprocal transmission of microbes and carbon dioxide.' The love, the longing, or the falsity of the kiss has no place in your philosophy. This impoverishment of spiritual values affects the material side of life, which you consider all-important. It takes the heart out of the workers, so that the poor quality of goods from Communist countries has become a byword."

Boris said, "I know the saying that the Sabbath is made for man, not man for the Sabbath, but we all exist to benefit the State. The loss of individual liberty and private property are steps on the way to world freedom.

I thought that even a dog will fight with anyone who tries to take his bone, but if a fifteen-year sentence had not cured Boris of his illusions, arguing was unlikely to do so. He might also be one of the latest crop of informers.

Informing had spread like a disease. You might be denounced for speaking of God or praying aloud; even for learning or teaching a foreign language. Often the man who pointed the finger might be friend, inside or outside prison, a son, father, wife, husband. The pressure to inform was cruelly strong. Indeed, the informer was probably a worse menace for "free" men than for those already behind bars, and in Room Four we exercised more free speech than was heard anywhere else in Rumania, since none of us was going to live.

11

It was the anniversary of the "ten days that shook the world" - the Russian revolution of November 1917 - and Professor Popp commemorated it with an anecdote.

"On the first anniversary of the triumph of Bolshevism," he said, "the new rulers held a hunting party in the forest outside Moscow. Later, they rested by the fire and Lenin asked, 'Tell me, comrades, what you consider the greatest pleasure in life?"

"'War,' said Trotsky.

"'Women,' said Zinoviev.

"'Oratory - the power to hold a vast crowd under your spell,' said Kamenev.

"Stalin, as always, was taciturn, but Lenin insisted: 'Tell us your choice!'

"At last, Stalin said: 'None of you knows what real pleasure is. I will tell you. It is to hate someone, and to pretend for years that you are his best friend, until one day he rests his head trustingly on your breast. And then to plunge the knife into his back. There is no higher pleasure in the world than this!'"

There was a long silence. Already, at that time, we knew something of Stalin's ruthlessness: the rest, to be made known after his death by his own companions, proved the truth of this chilling story.

page 91 In God's Underground

PART THREE

For some time there had been frightened talk of a system of "re-educating" prisoners, which was practiced at Suceava and Piteshti jails. It was carried out not with books, but by beating. The tutors were usually turncoat Iron Guards, who had been formed into an "organization of prisoners with Communist convictions" (PCC). We heard the names of Turcanu, Levitkii and Formagiu as the organizers of these groups. They seemed to be behaving like savages.

We feared that the process would be introduced among us; but Boris scoffed. He could not believe that his former associates of the Left would allow atrocities.

He said, "They know that 'terror can never uproot ideas.' That's what Karl Kautsky, the Social Democrat thinker, wrote at the start of the Russian revolution."

I said, "Yes. I remember what Trotsky, who was War Minister, replied: 'Mr. Kautsky, you do not know what terror we will apply.' It's ironic that Trotsky's own ideas have been as effectively uprooted by terrorism in Russia as has Capitalism."

The Abbot said, "I fear that terror and torture, applied ruthlessly and long, may crush any man's resistance, without a miracle of God."

"I don't believe in miracles," said Boris. "I'll get along without them, thanks. Nothing has touched my convictions yet."

The prison's atmosphere grew worse after a brief visit by the "re-education" leader Formagiu, from Piteshti, with instructions to inaugurate the system. Up to now, although you were tormented for most of the day, you knew that sooner or later the guards would go to eat or sleep. Now the "prisoners with Communist convictions" moved in with us. They had the power to beat and bully at will, and had rubber truncheons for their work. They had been handpicked by the authorities from the worst and most violent prisoners, and there was no escape from them: to every fifty prisoners there was a group of ten or twenty "PCC" men, and the number grew steadily. Those who declared themselves ready to become Communists had to prove their conversion by "converting" others in the same way.

Crude violence has punctuated by sessions of more refined cruelty, under medical supervision to ensure that prisoners did not die. Doctors were often PCCs themselves. I knew a Dr. Turcu who, after examining a cellmate, would advise a pause, give the man an injection to increase his resistance and tell the re-educators when to start again. It was Turcu who decided when the man had reached his limit and might be thrown back into his cell until next day.

A wave of madness swept the prison. Tuberculosis patients were stripped, laid on the stone floors and drenched with buckets of freezing water. Pigs' swill was thrown on the ground before men who had been starved for days; with hands tied behind their backs they were forced to lick it up. No humiliation, however vile, was spared. In many prisons men were made by the PCC bullies to swallow excrement and drink urine. Some wept and begged at least to be given their own, not that of others. Some went crazy and began to scream for more. Convicts were also made to perform sexual perversions publicly. I had not thought that such mockeries of body and soul were possible.

Those who clung to their faith were the worst treated. Christians were tied for four days to crosses, and daily the crosses were placed on the floor. Then the other prisoners were ordered to defecate on their faces and bodies. After this, the crosses were put up again.

A Catholic priest brought into Room Four told us that in Piteshti jail, on a Sunday, he had been pushed into the latrine cesspit and ordered to say Mass over excrement and give men Communion.

"Did you obey?" I asked.

He buried his face in his hands and wept. "I've suffered more than Christ," he said.

These things were done with the encouragement of the prison administration, on orders from Bucharest. Turcanu, Formagiu and the other specialists were taken from jail to jail, recruiting PCCs and seeing that the campaign did not flag. Party leaders, even men from the Central Committee, like Constantin Doncea and the Under-secretary of the Interior Ministry, Marin Jianu, came to watch the sport. Boris, who had worked with Jianu, broke through the guards to protest, but if Jianu recognized his former colleague he did not admit it. "We don't interfere when one swine beats another!" he said; in other words, the Party dissociated itself from the torturers, but allowed them to torture. "Take him away," said Jianu. Boris was beaten until he screamed for mercy.

The old union fighter broke down completely. Exposed to humiliation and torture day and night, something had burned out in him. He crawled to kiss the hands of the men who beat him.

"Thank you, comrade," he said. "You have brought me to the light." Then he began to prate about the joys of Communism, and how criminal he had been to persist in error. After such a collapse his self-respect demanded a total shift of loyalty; otherwise he would have appeared ridiculous in his own eyes. Boris joined the PCC group. One of the first he used his truncheon on was Dr. Aldea.

The re-education system - imported from Russia - brought incredible results. Victims blurted secrets they had kept back under months of interrogation. They denounced friends, wives, parents. So thousands more arrests were made.

2

During this time a group of six men from the lead-mines were brought to a special cell at Tirgul-Ocna. They were joined by other prisoners who, finding that some of the newcomers were priests, confessed to them and so gained their confidence. The men from the mines spoke freely of their secret religious and political activities. Then they were moved to a larger cell, for re-education - and learned that they had been talking to informers.

One of them was carried bruised and bloody into Room Four. He told us that the "re-educator" in charge was a well-built young man with a set smile, who made jokes all the time. "Does that hurt?" he would ask. "So sorry! Let's try something new. Did you enjoy that?"

"If I ever get my hands on that man," said the victim, "I'll skin him alive."

"That's right," crackled the old farmer Badaras. "Put salt and pepper on, that's the spirit!" Badaras had a daily prayer: "In the name of the Father, the Son and the Holy Ghost, God destroy the Communists, make them suffer, hurt them, the pigs!"

"Why say such things?" I asked him. "That's not what is expected of a Christian."

He shook his fists to Heaven in invocation. "I say them because God will not let anyone into paradise who does not curse the bastards!"

Many like Badaras lived for the day on which they could torture their torturers, believing in Hell, so that the Communists might fry there.

"We mustn't give way to hatred," I said. "These men like Boris have broken under terrible pressure."

But Boris was now a sore topic in Room Four. An attempt to prove his Communist conversion by beating Dr. Aldea - who made very plain his contempt for Turcu and the other PCC doctors - had made Boris one of the most hated men in prison. Aldea suffered great pain from boils on his back and shoulders, and Boris had beaten him on the back. Prisoners would have given their lives for Aldea, who was giving his for them. After the beating, the doctor was found a bed in Room Four. Then someone came to say that a seriously-ill prisoner was asking for him.

"The doctor is too sick to move," said the Abbot.
Aldea asked, "Who is it?"
"Boris," said the man.
Aldea climbed painfully out of bed and no one spoke as he walked from the room.

3

Abbot Iscu spoke sometimes of his experiences in the slave camps at the Danube-Black Sea canal, where thousands were dying of ill treatment and hunger. The canal had been begun largely on Russian instigation - since it would help to drain Rumania of her produce even faster than they were already doing - and also as a prestige project for our government. It was an immense scheme, and it had become such a symbol of Communist achievement that when a group of engineers warned that the river was unlikely to supply enough water for both the canal and its irrigation network, they were shot as "economic saboteurs." Rumania's resources were thrown prodigally into the plan, and over 200,000 political and common-law prisoners labored to build it between 1949 and 1953.

The Abbot found himself at Poarta Alba, one of the penal colonies along the route. Living in ramshackle barracks, behind wire, 12,000 people had each to move by hand eight cubic meters of earth a day. They pushed wheelbarrows up steep inclines, under the blows of guards. Temperatures fell to minus 25 Centigrade in winter, and water, brought in barrels, froze solid. Disease was rife. Many prisoners broke through into the forbidden areas around the camp, hoping to be shot.

The most brutal criminals were put in charge of "brigades" each of a hundred or so prisoners and paid on results, in food or cigarettes. Christians were herded into a so-called "Priests' Brigade" where, if a man as much as made the sign of the cross - a reflex action among the Orthodox - he was beaten. There was no day of rest, no Christmas, no Easter.

Yet at Poarta Alba, the Abbot said, he witnessed the most noble acts. A young Catholic, Father Cristea, incurred the hatred of an Orthodox priest turned informer, who asked him, "Why do you close your eyes so often? Is it in prayer? I challenge you to tell the truth: do you still believe in God?"

To answer "yes" would mean, at least, a flogging.

Father Cristea considered. "I know, Andreescu, that you tempt as the Pharisees tempted Jesus, to accuse me. But Jesus told them the truth and I will tell it to you. Yes, I believe in God."

"Well! Do you believe in the Pope, too?" Andreescu went on.

Cristea replied, "I believe in the Pope, too."

Andreescu hurried to the political officer, who came over and called the young man out before the others. Cristea was thin, exhausted; he shivered in his rags. The officer was well-fed, wrapped in a greatcoat and wearing a Russian fur hat. "I hear that you believe in God," he said.

Father Cristea opened his mouth to answer, and in that moment one could understand why it is written in the Gospel according to St. Matthew, before the Sermon on the Mount, that Jesus "opened his mouth and spoke" - surely a strange thing, for no one speaks with a closed mouth. Now Cristea had only parted his lips to speak, but everyone sensed that a great pearl could come from his mouth at this moment of decision. The Christians there were overcome with awe.

Cristea said, "When I was ordained, I knew that thousands of priests, throughout history, had paid for their faith with their lives. And as often as I went to the altar I promised God, 'Now I serve Thee in beautiful robes, but even if they should put me in prison,

I will serve Thee still.' And so, lieutenant, prison is no argument against religion. I believe in God."

The silence that followed was broken only by the sound of the wind. The lieutenant seemed at a loss for words. At last he said, "And do you believe in the Pope?"

The answer came, "Since St. Peter there has always been a Pope. And until Jesus returns there will always be one. The present Pope has made no peace with Communism; and nor will his successors. Yes, I believe in the Pope!"

The Abbot ended his story and said, "I found it hard to forgive my Orthodox brother who had turned informer, and I am no follower of Rome, but at that moment I felt like crying 'Viva il Papa!'"

"What happened to Father Cristea?" someone asked.

"He was locked for a week in the carcer, where you stand and never sleep: then beaten. When he still refused to deny his faith, he was taken away. We never saw him again."

4

Re-education was claiming new victims every day, and the feeling grew that unless something was done soon we should all be "converted" or killed. A rumor reached Room Four that some kind of protest was brewing among the Communist prisoners, who were the boldest among us: the guards were more careful with them, for those who were in jail today had been in power yesterday and might again be tomorrow.

Christians debated what we should do: if there were a riot, should they join in? Or was it a time to "turn the other cheek"? Several prisoners argued against a fight.

I said, "Jesus is usually portrayed as 'meek and mild' - but he was a fighter, too. He drove the merchants from the temple with a whip and gave as guide to his first followers the Old Testament with its fire and fierceness."

We decided to work with the rebels. Little could be done in secret because of the many informers among us and the suspicions between anti-Semite and Jew, peasant and landowner, Orthodox and Catholic.

In the town of Tirgul-Ocna, the one relaxation was a weekly football match in a stadium which was near the prison. On May 1, which coincided with a savage new outburst of re-education, we heard that a Labour Day game would be played in the stadium, at 5:00 P.M, and the whole town would be there. It was our chance for a demonstration. The signal was to be the smashing of a window.

Soon after the game began there was faint tinkle of breaking glass somewhere, and the whole prison burst into bedlam. Windows shattered. Plates and mugs were hurled out. Chairs were smashed.

Someone started a steady chant: "Help us! Help us!" From higher windows overlooking the stadium men cried, "We are tortured here! Your fathers and brothers and sons are being murdered!"

The game came to a stop. The crowd was on its feet and soon hundreds had gathered in the road below the walls. Inside, one of the prisoners had cut his wrists and the guards began lashing out with clubs. The crowds in the street were quickly driven away by troops wielding riflebutts. There remained the task of putting the prison to rights and counting the casualties. Among them was Boris, who had been knocked down and badly hurt while trying to rescue another prisoner from under the feet of the guards. Again Dr. Aldea had to tend him. We sent friendly messages, but there was no reply. Then we learned he had been moved to another jail.

News of the revolt spread rapidly through the country. There were no outright reprisals; only a stiffening of the regime. Those suspected of being ringleaders were moved out to other prisons; deprived of such medical attention as they received at Tirgul-Ocna, many of them died.

page 99 In God's Underground

5

Abbot Iscu was coughing for longer spells each day. His body, wasted by years of starvation and exposure at the canal, was racked by terrible bouts. We lay and watched him dying. Sometimes he did not recognize friends who came to help him. When he was conscious he passed hours in whispered prayer, and always he had words of comfort for others.

Other survivors from the canal had come to Tirgul-Ocna, and their stories of its horrors made it sound like the slavery of Israel in Egypt, with the added bitterness that the oppressed had to praise their oppressors. A famous composer among the prisoners had been forced to write hymns exalting Stalin, and to their accompaniment the brigades marched to work.

Once, when a man collapsed and a doctor pronounced him dead, Colonel Albon, the hated Poarta Alba commandant, shouted, "Rubbish!" He gave the corpse a kick. "Put him to work!"

My bed was between those of the Abbott and young Vasilescu, who was a canal victim of a different kind. Vasilescu was a common-law criminal who had been put in charge of the Priests' Brigade. He had worked them until they dropped. But for some reason Colonel Albon took a dislike to him and he was treated in turn so brutally that he was also dying. His tuberculosis was well advanced.

Vasilescu was not an inherently bad young man. He had a rough-hewn, square face with dark curly hair that grew low on his forehead, making him look like a bewildered young bull. Tough, ignorant, he was too fond of what he thought the good things in life to settle down to a steady job; and he had had a hard life. He was like the hired murderer in ~Macbeth~ - "One whom the vile blows and buffets of the world hath so incensed that I am reckless what I do to spite the world."

He told us, "Once you get in those camps you'll do anything to get out, anything! And Albon said if I did what he told me, they'd let me go free." He wanted clothes, a girl to take to a dance. And the Party offered him the choice of joining the tortured or the torturers.

"They took a crowd of us to a special camp where they train secret police," he said, "and one of the things we had to do was shoot cats and dogs and then finish off the ones still living with steel spikes! I said, 'I can't do that!' And the chap said, 'Then we'll do it to you!'"

Vasilescu was sorry for himself now. He told me again and again of the terrible things he had done at the canal. He had not spared the Abbot. Vasilescu was obviously dying and I tried to give him a little comfort; but he couldn't rest. One night he woke up gasping for breath. "Pastor, I'm going," he said. "Please pray for me!" He dozed and woke again, and cried, "I believe in God!" Then he began to weep.

At dawn Abbot Iscu called two prisoners to his bed and ordered, "Lift me out!"

"You're too ill to move," they said. The whole room was upset. "What is it?" said voices. "Let us do it!"

"You cannot do this," he said. "Lift me out!"

They picked him up. "To Vasilescu's bed," he said.

The Abbot sat beside the young man who had tortured him, and put a hand gently on his arm. "Be calm," he said soothingly. "You are young. You hardly knew what you were doing." He wiped sweat from the boy's forehead with a rag. "I forgive you with all my heart, and so would other Christians too. And if we forgive, surely Christ, who is better than us, will forgive. There is a place in Heaven for you, also." He received Vasilescu's confession and gave him Holy Communion, before being carried back to his bed.

During the night both the Abbot and Vasilescu died. I believe they went hand in hand to Heaven.

page 101 In God's Underground

6

Dr. Aldea said I should have a pneumothorax. It could be done in a few minutes and consisted of running a hollow needle into me which allowed air to enter and cushion the lung. It was relatively painless and afterwards I fell asleep. When I awoke I was very happy to find Professor Popp sitting by my bedside. He had been away for months in Jilava prison, and he too had suffered much under the "re-education" system. We talked for hours.

The professor told me that there had been many suicides at Jilava. It was the same in other prisons. At Gherla and Piteshti men threw themselves down from the upper floors until the spaces between the landings were covered with wire to stop them. Some cut their wrists with glass, some hanged themselves, some died after drinking cleaning fluid. One poor old Orthodox father had thrown himself down from a top bunk to the floor, cracking his skull. He had done this several times before he succeeded in killing himself.

"He'd been tortured," the professor said. "He was afraid that if the re-educators started on him again he would break down and betray his faith. He was a very rigid man - a prisoner confessed to him that he'd once worked for the Communists, and Father Ioja forbade him to take Communion for fifteen years!"

Some of the suicides were famous men, like George Bratianu, a great pre-war figure in Rumanian politics. He found no other means of taking his life than to starve himself to death, unnoticed among prisoners who neither knew nor cared. The leader of the Liberal Party, Rosculet, had killed himself at Sighet jail: he was one of those who had thought that "local" Communists were not like the Russian variety, but after using his name as Minister of Cults, the Party imprisoned him as a counter-revolutionary.

The brutalities of "re-education" caused unrest in many prisons, and rumors spread across the country.

page 102 In God's Underground

Then two unconnected incidents brought the truth into the light of day.

During an inspection at Tirgul-Ocna, a hated Secret Police colonel, Sepeanu, spotted a new fence. 'Why did you build this?' he asked Commandant Bruma. "The wood might have been better used to beat these counter-revolutionaries." He laughed heartily.

The story caused wild rage. The atmosphere of revolt was still simmering in Tirgul-Ocna. A former major shouted, "Something must be done!" And he decided that he was the man to do it. When Sepeanu had gone, the major asked that an interrogator be brought specially from Bucharest to hear a secret which he had failed to confess.

The interrogator came. The major told him, "You know that I am serving twenty years as a war criminal for executing Russian prisoners. As Brigade Major, I did not shoot these men myself. I can tell you who did. He was a lieutenant named Sepeanu, who today is a Secret Police colonel."

So Sepeanu was also tried for war crimes and sentenced to twenty years. During the trial he spoke about what was happening in the prisons under the "re-education" system.

The second incident involved another Secret Police chief. Col. Virgil Weiss had been a friend of Ana Pauker and others in the Government. Then he fell foul of them, and at Piteshti jail he came into the hands of Turcanu, leader of the "Prisoners of Communist Convictions."

A man who helped Turcanu to torture victims told me later that Colonel Weiss fainted three times in an hour while they worked on him. They brought him round with cold water. He said, "All right - I'll tell everything I kept back - and let us see if your bosses can stand it." Turcanu believed he had stumbled on secrets that would bring him at last the release he had been promised. "If you lie now, I'll kill you," he warned. Weiss said, "I have important things to say, but not to you. They concern traitors in high places."

page 103 In God's Underground

He was taken to Bucharest, where he spent several weeks in hospital. Members of the Party's Central Committee, rivals of the Pauker clique, interviewed him there. He revealed that Pauker, Luca and Georgescu, the ruling ministers, had enlisted Weiss's aid in obtaining false passports, with which they could, if need be, leave Rumania quickly. They had also transferred large sums of money to Swiss banks.

The information was passed to the Party Secretary-General, Gheorghiu-Dej, chief schemer against the Pauker group.

Colonel Weiss told the story of re-education and showed Dej's friends its effects on his own body. They were alarmed. Another reversal of Party fortunes lay ahead: they might soon face the same treatment. Some had been unaware of the excesses, and others pretended not to have known; but now inquiries were begun. The leading "re-educators" were interrogated at Secret Police headquarters and several of them, Turcanu included, were sentenced to death.

The re-education scandal was used as a weapon against the Ministry of the Interior, which was headed by Theohari Georgescu, and in the political purge of 1952 the triumvirate which had ruled Rumania since the Communist take-over was overthrown. The other Ministers involved in Colonel Weiss's charges, Vasile Luca and Ana Pauker, were made scapegoats for the catastrophic inflation and the disasters brought by collectivization.

7

Many of those who came to help us in Room Four were farmers who had rebelled against forcible collectivization of their land. The prisons of Rumania were full of them. Thousands more had been put before firing squads.

They told some terrible stories. Their property had been seized, and under the 1949 "land reform" law, they received no compensation. Turned overnight into vagabonds who had nothing to lose, they fought back. Officials were liable to be shot, beaten or burned alive with petrol. It was all for nothing. The farmers lacked organization. Their rebellions occurred at different times and in different regions so the government could always stamp them out.

A leathery old sheep farmer called Ghica told me, "The Secret Police showed me two rusty rifles. 'We dug them up in your barn,' they said. 'If you join the collective, you might avoid a trial.' Well, I agreed. But when they came to take my animals, I lost my head and tried to stop them. They beat me up - and here I am serving fifteen years. I've lost everything. Land, sheep, wife, children!" All farmers lamented their losses in that order.

Another told how he had been deprived of his flock. He begged at least to keep the bells from their necks. The officials laughed but let him have his way. He took the bells up to his loft and tied them to a rope. All night, he sat there, ringing the bells from time to time. When morning came, he ran through the village to the Party headquarters, and stabbed the secretary to death.

A third farmer had two plough-horses. His greatest pleasure was to feed and groom them. When they were taken he burned down the stables of the collective farm.

That year, fewer countryfolk came into prison. Gheorghiu-Dej, while retaining the Party leadership, made himself Prime Minister in 1952, and sought popularity by slowing down collectivization. Luca, Pauker and Georgescu were all dismissed from their posts.

Winter came on, with heavy snowstorms. Thick icicles hung from the roof, and hoar frost patterned the window-panes. Outside the cold made you gasp. By December the snow was six feet deep. It was the coldest winter for a hundred years, so they said. There was no heating, but until now we had two or three blankets each, instead of the regulation one, for every time a man died in Room Four we took his bedclothes. Then there was a check - and we were left with a single covering each. We slept in our clothes all winter. Often we were without bread. The soup, made of carrots too rotten to be sold, became still thinner.

On Christmas Eve, prison talk became more serious. There were few quarrels, no swearing, little laughter. Every man thought of those he loved and there was a feeling of communion with the rest of mankind, which was usually so remote from our lives.

I spoke of Christ, but all the time my feet and hands were cold as steel, my teeth chattered, and an icy lump of hunger in my stomach seemed to spread through my body until only the heart lived. When I stopped, a simple farming lad took up where I had left off. Aristar had never been to school. Yet he talked so naturally, describing the scene of the nativity as if it had happened in his own barn that week, that there were tears in the eyes of all who listened.

Someone began to sing in the prison that evening. At first his voice was quiet, and hardly came in among the thoughts that occupied my mind, of my wife and my son. But gradually the voice swelled wonderfully in the crisp, clear air until it echoed through the corridors and everybody stopped what they were doing.

We were very quiet when he ceased. The guards, huddled in their quarters around a coke stove, did not stir all evening. We began to tell stories, and when I was asked for one, I thought of the song, and told them this old Jewish legend:

King Saul of Israel brought David, the shepherd honored for killing Goliath, to his court. David loved music, and he was delighted to see a harp of great beauty standing in the palace. Saul said, "I paid much for that instrument, but I was deceived. It gives forth only ugly sounds."

David took it up to try, and drew from it music so exquisite that every man was moved. The harp seemed to laugh and sing and weep. King Saul asked, "How is it that all the musicians I called brought discord from this harp, and only you could bring out music?"

David, the future king, replied, "Before me, each man tried to play his own song on these strings. But I sang to the harp its own song. I recalled how it had been a young tree, with birds that chirped in its branches and limbs green with leaves that blossomed in the sun. I reminded it of the day when men came to cut it down, and you heard it weep under my fingers. I explained then that this is not the end. Its death as a tree meant the start of a new life in which it would glorify God, as a harp; and you heard how it rejoiced under my hands.

"So when the Messiah comes, many will try to sing on his harp their own songs, and their tunes will be harsh. We must sing on His harp His own song, the song of His life, passions, joys, sufferings, death and resurrection. Only then will the music be true."

It was a song like this we heard that Christmas in the jail of Tirgul-Ocna.

8

Aristar died in February. We had to dig through deep snow and break ground like iron to bury him in the prison yard, alongside Abbot Iscu, Gafencu, Bucur and a score of others he had known in Room Four. His bed was taken over by Avram Radonovici, who had been a music critic in Bucharest.

Avram knew long passages from the scores of Bach, Beethoven and Mozart, and could hum them for hours - it was as good as a symphony concert. But he had brought a more precious gift with him. Because of his tuberculosis, which had affected his spine he was encased in a plaster cast when they brought him to Tirgul-Ocna, and as we watched he pushed a hand into the breast of this grey shell and extracted a small, tattered book. None of us had seen a book of any kind for years. Avram lay there quietly turning the pages, until he became conscious of the eager eyes fixed on him.

"Your book," I said. "What is it? Where did you get it?"

"It's the Gospel according to St. John," said Avram. "I managed to hide it in my cast when the police came for me." He smiled. Would you like to borrow it?"

I took the little book in my hands as if it were a live bird. No life-saving drug could have been more precious to me. I, who had known much of the Bible by heart and had taught it in the seminary, was forgetting it every day. Often I had tried to remind myself of a great advantage in this lack of a Bible while reading what God told prophets and saints, we may forget to listen for what He has to say to us.

The Gospel went from hand to hand. It was difficult to give it up. I think prison was harder for educated men. Factory workers and farmers found more varied society than they had known before, but the reading man was like a fish thrown on the sand.

Many learned the Gospel by heart and we discussed it every day among ourselves; but we had to be careful which prisoners were let into the secret. This Gospel helped to bring many to Christ, among them Professor Popp, who, by being near to many living Christians, had come steadily closer to faith. The words of St. John were completing the work, but there was a last barrier.

"I've tried to pray again," said the professor. "But between reciting the Orthodox formulas I learned as a boy and demanding favors of the Almighty to which I have no claim, there is nothing much to say. Like the king in ~Hamlet~, my words fly up, my thoughts remain below."

I told him of a pastor who was called to an old man's deathbed. He went to sit in an armchair close to the bed, but the old man said, "Please don't sit there!" So the pastor pulled up a stool, heard his confession and gave him Holy Communion.

The old man revived and said, "Let me tell you the story of that armchair. Fifty years ago, when I was a lad, the old pastor here asked if I said my prayers. I replied, 'No. I have no one to pray to. If I shout at the top of my voice the man of the floor above doesn't hear, so how will God in Heaven?' The old pastor replied mildly, "Do not try to pray then! Just sit quietly in the morning with another chair before you. Imagine that sitting in it is Jesus Christ, as he sat in so many homes in Palestine. What would you tell him?' I said, 'If I were honest, I'd say I didn't believe in him.' 'Well,' said the pastor, 'that shows at least what's really in your mind. You could go further and challenge Him: if He exists, then let Him give proof of it! Or if you don't like the way God runs the world, why not tell Him so? You wouldn't be the first to complain. King David and Job told God they thought He was unjust. Perhaps you want something? Then say exactly what it is. If you receive it, give Him thanks. All these exchanges are in the realm of prayer. Don't recite holy phrases! Say what is really in your heart!'"

The dying man went on. "I didn't believe in Christ, but I did in the old pastor. To please him, I sat before that armchair and pretended Christ was in it. For a few days it was a game. Then I ~knew~ that He was with me. I spoke to a real Jesus about real things. I sought guidance and received it. Prayer became dialogue. Young man, fifty years have passed and every day I speak with Jesus in that chair."

The pastor was there when the man died, stretching out a hand with his last gesture towards the unseen friend in the armchair.

The professor asked "Is that how you pray?"

I said, "I like to think that Jesus stands near me, and that I can talk to Him as I do to you. People who met Him in Nazareth and Bethlehem didn't recite prayers to Him. They said what was in their hearts, and so ought we."

Popp said, "Why do you suppose that many who did talk to him in Palestine two thousand years ago didn't become his followers?"

I said: "For centuries the Jews prayed for the coming of the Messiah, and none more loudly than the Sanhedrin, the supreme council. But when he came, they mocked and spat and sent him to his death, for the last thing they wanted was someone who would upset their comfortable routine. That's true of many of all nations today."

Professor Popp became a Christian. He told me, "When I first saw you I had a premonition that you had something to give me." Such intuitions are not uncommon in jail. When the outer world is cut off from sight, a new sense opens for the unseen.

We became very close. Sitting together in silence sometimes, he would say the thought that was stirring in my mind. So it should be, but rarely is between friends, and between man and wife.

9

A thaw came in March. The icicles melted and the snow lay in patches against the wall. Buds appeared on the bare trees and we heard the birds sing. Through our chilblained hands, our feet wrapped in rags, our faces stiff with cold, we felt life start again.

News galvanized the prison. A prisoner had been taken to the hospital in town, where a woman scrubbing the floor had wept. "What's wrong?" he asked. "Our father Stalin is dead," she sobbed. "It's in the newspapers." We shed no tears. Everyone speculated excitedly on what it would mean.

Popp said, "If Stalin is dead, so is Stalinism; a dictatorship doesn't survive its dictator."

"But Communism has survived Lenin," said someone.

A few days later we heard train whistles blowing and bells tolling to mark Stalin's funeral in Moscow. The prison echoed with laughter and curses. The guards looked surly and the officers were nervous. No one knew what might happen next.

After weeks of uncertainty, a high official came from the Legal Department and we understood that he had been sent to study prison conditions. Silence greeted him as he went from cell to cell asking for complaints. Many thought it was a trick. When he reached Room Four, I said, "I have something to say, but I won't start unless you promise to hear me to the end."

"That's what I've come for," said the official politely.

I said, "Prosecutor, you had a renowned predecessor in history, called Pontius Pilate. He was asked to handle the trial of a man he knew to be innocent. 'Never mind,' said Pilate to himself. 'Am I to risk my career for a Jew and a carpenter?'

"Although two thousand years have passed, this betrayal of justice has not been forgotten. In my church you enter throughout the world you hear it said in the Creed, that Jesus was crucified under Pontius Pilate."

The others in Room Four were looking worried for me.

I said, "Look into your heart and you'll see that we are the victims of injustice. Even if we're guilty in the Party's eyes, we were to purge our crimes in prison - but this is a long-drawn death sentence. Before you make your report, look at our food, the lack of heating and simple medicine, the dirt and disease. Ask about some of the barbarities we've suffered. Then write the truth. Don't wash your hands of helpless men as Pilate did."

The prosecutor looked at me somberly, turned on his heel and left without a word. The news that he had heard me out spread through the prison and encouraged others to speak. Before he left, we heard that there had been angry words in the commandant's office. Later that day the guards became polite, almost apologetic. A week afterwards the commandant was dismissed.

With the improvements in prison routine I began to get out of bed and walk a few paces each day. Dr. Aldea brought the official doctor to see me.

Aldea said, "We can't make you out. Your lungs are like a sieve, the spinal vertebrae are affected, couldn't put you in plaster and there's been virtually no surgical intervention. You're no better, but you're getting no worse, and so we're going to move you out of Room Four."

My friends there were very happy. They took courage from the fact that, after two and a half years, I was the first man to leave the cell alive.

"How's it done, Pastor?" said one, jokingly. "Why doesn't that old body of yours obey doctor's orders and die?"

I said, "I expect you could find a medical reason if you tried. But in the war I learned a lesson about looking for explanations. I met some Party men who had been in Russia. When I asked why the Soviet Union had eased its campaign against religion at the time, one man said, 'You tell us.' I replied that I thought it was a concession to Britain and America, who were helping to keep Russia in the war. The official smiled. 'That's the explanation which I would give, as a Communist. If I were a Christian I'd say it was God's answer to prayer.' I was silent, because he was right. In the Bible, it is said that an ass once reprimanded a prophet. So I say to you now, that if I have recovered, it is a miracle of God and an answer to prayer."

I knew that many people – prisoners I had met, as well as my congregation - prayed for me; but not for many years did I learn how many thousands around the world had joined in their prayer.

page 112 blank

page 113 In God's Underground

PART FOUR

Room Four had been like an altar on which men were transformed and transfigured for their faiths. I was glad to be still alive, but leaving it was a descent. From an atmosphere of nobility and self-sacrifice, I returned to the world of quarrels, vanity and pretenses. It was sad and comic to see how many of the old upper-class clung to their illusions. Grubby "excellencies" wished each other good-day. Starved "generals" inquired after one another's health. Endlessly, they discussed the return of their vanished affluence.

One of these, Vasile Donca, accepted from me a piece of string to hold up his trousers. String was a precious thing in jail. But when, next day, I spoke to him I was ignored – I had failed to address him as "brigadier."

Donca, like many others, would do anything for a cigarette. The guards were the only source of tobacco, and although they were forbidden to hand it on, they smoked a lot at night, littering the yard with butt-ends. Cell leaders and informers were let out first in the mornings so that they had a monopoly of butt collecting. But sometimes another prisoner would make a find, and his friends would stand in a circle with him, smoking it on the end of a pin.

One morning a guard lit a cigarette as he lolled by the cell door near my bunk. Donca edged his way round the cell and began to talk to him in a low, urgent voice.

page 114 In God's Underground

"Guard! What do you want for that cigarette?"

The guard grinned. "What have you got to offer, Brigadier?"

Donca had nothing, but he tried to bluff. "I am not without friends in high places. You shall be rewarded for any attention you show me!"

"Influential friends?" said the guard. "So you are really a Communist after all, Brigadier?"

"I am a loyal Rumanian, Sergeant."

"Well, if you were a loyal Rumanian Communist, Brigadier, I might give you this cigarette."

Donca hesitated and looked furtively around. The guard moved as if to go away, "Wait! Of course I'm a loyal Rumanian Communist!"

The guard beckoned to his comrades to come and share the joke.

"So you dance to a Russian tune, Brigadier? Give us a dance! Dance like a Russian bear!" He held out the cigarette.

With his arms spread and a pained grin on his face, Donca began to hop from foot to foot; The guards collapsed into laughter. The prisoners averted their faces as Donca rooted among their legs for the discarded cigarette.

When Donca moved elsewhere, his bunk was taken by another former member of the Staff, General Stavrat. Epaulettes no more make the officer than the habit makes the monk, and Stavrat was everything that Donca was not. Though short in stature, he dwarfed his fellow-prisoners by sheer strength of personality. Crusty, quick to despise weakness, yet full of kindness and good sense, he liked to address the cell at large as "Men!"

Juliu Stavrat was a general without boots. He had given his away. We shared my pair, going out in them on alternate days for exercise in the yard. Soon after his arrival, the first food parcels were allowed and one was delivered to General Stavrat. He opened it before an excited audience. A gasp went up. Ham, smoked sausage, fruit-cake, chocolate - what sacrifices his wife must have made to buy such things! Stavrat, who had lived on scraps for eight years, wrapped up the parcel again and came over to my bed. "Pastor," he said, "be good enough to divide this among the men."

Stavrat was a Christian before he was a soldier.

When we heard that Russia had exploded her first A-bomb, he said, "Then we must no longer look for full-scale American military intervention: it is better for us to rot in jail than for millions of people to die in an atomic war."

"You think it would destroy humanity?" I asked him.

.

"The future of humanity and its past as well," he said. "There will be no one left to know our struggle and progress through the ages." Stavrat had a deep feeling for history. He could talk eloquently of Rumania's past.

"But if nuclear war solves nothing," he added, "and civilization and Communism cannot live together, I don't know what the answer is."

"It's Christianity," I answered, "in a vital form. It can change the lives of great men and lesser. Remember the many barbarian rulers like Clovis of France, Stephen of Hungary, Vladimir of Russia, who were converted and made their countries Christian. It can be done again. Then we'll see the Iron Curtain melt."

"Shall we start with Gheorghiu-Dej!" smiled Stavrat. "A tall order!"

2

Gheorghiu-Dej, his rivals all eclipsed, was now our dictator. He admitted freely that grave mistakes had been committed, and among the gravest was the Danube-Black Sea Canal project. After three years in which millions of pounds had been wasted and thousands of lives lost, only five of its projected forty miles had been completed. Leading engineers and camp administrators were accused of sabotage. Three were sentenced to death, two summarily executed. Thirty others were given prison terms from fifteen years to life. A fresh survey now proved that the Danube could not supply sufficient water for the project - exactly what the engineers consulted at the start were shot for saying. The canal was abandoned. All that remained of use in Rumania's major investment of time and money in the first decade of Communist rule were the labor camps. These could not accommodate the overflow from the prisons.

While we were talking about the fiasco, Professor Popp took me aside. He said, "I have been keeping something from you since my return to Tirgul-Ocna. Dr. Aldea thought it might be too much of a shock for you in your condition. Your wife is now in prison, and she has been at the canal."

Popp had pieced the facts together from various prisoners who had worked there. Sabina had been arrested two years after me. No charge was brought against her. She led the women in the church as a deaconess and was told what to preach, but that was not her way. At Poarta Alba, she was put among women who had to shovel earth into wheelbarrows and cart it great distances. Those who did not fulfill their quota were kept without bread. There were schoolgirl patriots and prostitutes, society women and women suffering for their faith. At Camp Kilometre 4, Commandant Kormos was later sentenced to hard labor for raping thirty girl prisoners: the charge was "damaging the prestige of the regime."

My wife came under the orders of a notorious figure, Colonel Albon, the Poarta Alba chief. She ate grass like an animal: rats, snakes, dogs, everything was eaten. Some of those who had eaten dog said it was good. I asked them, "Would you eat it again?" "Oh, no!" they said. Sabina was tiny and fragile, so a favorite joke of the guards was to throw her into the freezing Danube and fish her out again. But she survived. Her life was saved by the collapse of the project. She was sent with other prisoners to a state farm where pigs were bred, and there, too, the work was hard.

The professor said that a prisoner from Vacaresti had spoken with my wife in the hospital there.

"She has been very ill," said Popp, "but she will live. She knows that you are safe. The women around her spoke of a pastor who was supposed to be dying, and who preached from behind the walls. They told your wife that they stopped hearing your voice in 1950 - that you must have died. But she said no, that she believed you to be alive, whatever the evidence against it."

This news almost shattered my self-control. I tried to pray, but a black gloom settled on my mind.

For days I spoke to no one. Then one morning in the prison yard I saw a very dignified old priest by the guard-room, his white beard blowing in the cold wind. He had just arrived and they had left him there. Several officers were standing about.

"What's this old priest doing here?" asked one of them.

"He's come to confess them," mocked another.

That is what Father Suroianu soon did. There was such an aura of holiness around him that you felt a great impulse to tell this man the whole truth. I, too, although not believing in sacramental confession revealed to him my sense of despair, and sins which I had never told before. The roots of evil are not often laid bare in the confessional. But the more I accused myself, the more Father Suroianu looked at me not with contempt but with love.

Suroianu had more reason to mourn than any of us. Tragedy had struck his whole family. One of his daughters, a cripple, had been deprived of her husband, who was in Tirgul-Ocna with us. Another daughter, and her husband, had been sentenced to twenty years. One of his sons had died in prison. The second, on whom Suroianu had set great hopes as a priest, had turned against him. His grandchildren had been driven out of school or had lost their jobs because of their parents' "anti-Party activities." Yet

Father Suroianu, a simple, self-educated man, spent his day encouraging and cheering others.

He never greeted people with "Good morning," but always with the Biblical "Rejoice!" He told me, "The day you can't smile, don't open your shop. It takes seventeen muscles of the face to smile, but forty-three to frown!"

I asked him, "You've had so much misfortune how can you 'rejoice' always?"

"Why, it's a grave sin not to do so," he said. "There's always a good reason to rejoice. There is a God in Heaven and in the heart. I had a piece of bread this morning. It was so good! Look now, the sun is shining! And so many here love me! Every day you do not rejoice is a day lost, my son! You will never have that day again."

3

I, too, could rejoice, in the sense at least that I was now fulfilling the wish I had cherished since being ordained - to be a prison pastor. In everyday life one rings the bells and waits for people to come to church; but here my parishioners were "in church" with me, not on one morning in the week, but all day and every day. They had to listen, if not always willingly.

Lazar Stancu, a clever linguist whose crime had been to work for a foreign news agency, broke in to say, "Not more about Christianity, please! There are other interesting religions."

"Well," I said. "I know something about Confucius and Buddhism." And I told one of the lesser-known New Testament parables.

"Fascinating!" Stancu exclaimed, and praised its beautiful and original thought.

"I'm glad you think that," I said, and explained that it was really Christ's teaching. "Why do you run after other religions?" I asked. "Was it the case of an old Rumanian proverb, 'Your neighbor's hen is always a turkey?' Or simply the restless intellectual's search for novelty?"

Stancu said, "Bernard Shaw once suggested that people are so inoculated in childhood with small doses of Christianity that they seldom catch the real thing."

One evening, a young prisoner jumped up and cried, "Stop it! Stop it! Stop it!" There was a silence. He was a new arrival and the others looked at him surprised. He turned and ran to his bunk, where he flung himself down. I went over to him. He had a fine sensitive face, but his jaw and neck were covered by improvised bandages. He gave me a tearful glare and turned his back. Feeling that I would only upset him further by trying to talk - at the moment, I did not persist.

Dr. Aldea told me his name was Josif. "A nice lad," he said, "but he'll be scarred for life by an ulcer on the face. He's another bone tuberculosis case." He told me that four years before, when only fourteen, Josif had been arrested while trying to reach Germany, where his sister was living. The Secret Police put him under the guard of trained dogs, which leaped at him if he moved, snapping at his throat. Shock and fear had filled his mind: he talked again and again of the hours he had spent on the frontier at the mercy of the dogs. "Next, suspected of being a pawn in some political game, Josif was taken to Bucharest and tortured for information which he did not possess. Then he was sent with a forced labor gang to the canal, where he starved and fell victim to T.B.

I watched Josif as he settled down among us. He had a native honesty and openness that life had not corrupted. At times, forgetting his troubles, he threw back his dark shock of hair and roared with laughter at some ancient prison joke. But often his hand went to his damaged face. It hurt him: but worse was the thought that his good looks were gone for life.

Sure that I could help him, I bided my time.

4

For a few months after Stalin's death, monthly parcels from home were permitted. We looked forward keenly to these. On the postcards they gave us I wrote asking, in addition to food, for cigarettes and "Doctor Filon's old clothes."

Smoking I dislike, but since men were so desperate for cigarettes I always asked for my full quota to give away. The result was that those for whom I had none were resentful and those to whom I gave often suspected me of giving more to others.

The request for Dr. Filon's clothes puzzled my family. The doctor was a small man. I was very tall. I hoped that they would guess that what I really wanted from him was streptomycin. Aldea told me that Socialist medicine now conceded that the drug, discovered in America ten years before, had value. If I received some, he could treat me; but we were not allowed to ask for it in our parcels.

Apart from tuberculosis, I was suffering also from one of the frequent bouts of toothache which plagued us all. Teeth decayed quickly for lack of food and treatment, or were broken in beatings. Sometimes I had fifty-pound chains around my ankles and could not even walk a few steps to ease the pain. But never was it worse than during this spell at Tirgul-Ocna. An upper tooth had me in agony all day; then at sunset the pain moved down to the lower jaw. We had no dentist and no hope of relief. Pascal is said to have combated toothache with mathematical problems, so I tried to compose sermons; but pain must be more amenable to calculation than composition, for they were miserable sermons. I began poems, but they were poems of desperation.

I tried to forget the pain by talking to Josif. I sat by him and asked why he had been so angry when I spoke.

He said, "I hate God! If you go on I'll call the guards." His eyes began to fill with tears. "Leave me alone!"

But the boy's good nature always broke through, and a day or two later he was telling me of his hopes of meeting his sister in Germany and going on together to join relations in America.

"You must start to learn English, then," I said.

"I'd love to, but who'll teach me here?"

I said I could give him lessons if he wished.

"Could you? Really?" He was overjoyed, and proved a bright pupil, although we had no books, paper or pencil.

I told him of books in English I had read, and had him repeat after me passages which I knew by heart from the Bible.

5

Josif was not the only prisoner who threatened to report me, but the real danger in our midst was the hidden informer. Often such men used the pretense of patriotism to serve their purpose, especially with the young.

The partisans who held out for years in the mountains of Rumania inspired many youngsters to form their own anti-Communist groups, so that boys and girls of seventeen and eighteen were arrested and herded into jail: there was even a fourteen-year-old with us at Tirgul-Ocna. They loved to hear the stories which a former intelligence colonel called Armeanu used to tell of our King Stephen the Great and other patriot-heroes who had struggled against foreign domination.

General Stavrat, who had known Armeanu before, said, "I don't trust that man. We must keep an eye on him."

Later that day, I walked by slowly while Armeanu was with a young partisan called Tiberiu. "They got me," Tiberiu said, "but others are carrying on the fight...." When I walked past again, I heard him say that a young girl was among them. Armeanu, seeing me near, clapped him on the shoulder and went off.

I asked Josif to listen; Armeanu would take even less notice of him. Indeed, a few evenings later, he heard snatches of conversation.

"Hasn't a good-looking chap like you got a girl?" Armeanu was asking Tiberiu. "Of course you have - I bet she's pretty, too. What's her name?... Maria... - and where does she come from?... Yes, I know the place. In fact, I was friendly with a family called Celinescu who had a daughter of the same name... Ah, your Maria is a Miss Cuza. And her father? An army captain, eh? Not in the 22nd regiment by any chance?... Oh, the 15th. Yes, yes."

After this report, I agreed that Armeanu was probably an agent and that the girl Maria would be arrested in a few days. General Stavrat wanted to confront him at once, but I knew that we could prove nothing against the man. When next I found Armeanu alone, I struck up a conversation. He asked why I was in prison and I saw a desperate chance.

"For spying," I said, adding that I knew I could speak freely to a nationalist like him. "My arrest doesn't matter. I'm only a minor dog in the organization." I dropped further hints and allowed him to wheedle names and addresses of my "contacts." I saw a look of cunning triumph in his face: he thought he had the information which would secure his release.

As soon as the cells opened next day, Stavrat saw Armeanu whispering to the guard. Immediately afterwards the colonel was called for a "medical inspection" - this was a frequent pretext for consulting informers. Then I was sent for by the political officer. He must have imagined an extra star on his shoulder already, for without any attempt to shield Armeanu he at once demanded the full story of the great international spy-network I had mentioned.

"Lieutenant," I replied, "if you pass on the information which I gave Armeanu yesterday it will start a furor in Bucharest. That's why I advise you not to do it. You'll only harm yourself."

"What do you mean?" he asked.
I said, "I invented the whole thing. I wanted to check my suspicions about Armeanu. Now I know."
The officer stared at me in disbelief. Then, he burst out laughing.
I went back and told Stavrat. He tackled Armeanu. "Brave men have died under your command," he said, "and now you turn to treachery!"
Armeanu tried to bluster, but he was an outcast from that day. I heard years later that he had died in prison. All his betrayals brought him only shame.

6

My next month's parcel included 100 grams of streptomycin. The hint had been taken! Thinking of the men I had left behind in Room Four, I asked General Stavrat to offer it to the most serious case there.
"That's Sultaniuc," he said with distaste. "A thorough-paced Iron Guard Fascist. He's at death's door, though he won't admit it. Much better take the stuff yourself.... Very well, if you insist."
Stavrat was soon back. "He wanted to know where the drug came from, and when I told him it was yours he said he wouldn't take anything from an opponent of the Iron Guard. There's nothing to be done with a fanatic like that."
I thought there might be a way around. When Stavrat had left, I asked Josif - whom no one would suspect of duplicity - to act as a go-between.
"Tell Sultaniuc the general was mistaken. Say it's a gift from Graniceru. He's an Iron Guard man, too, and I hear he recently received some drugs."
Josif was unsuccessful. "Sultaniuc doesn't believe that Graniceru would give him anything. He won't look at the powder unless you swear on your oath that it doesn't come from you."

"Why not?" I said. "I've given him the drug and I can give him an oath to go with it. The streptomycin is really not mine, but God's. I gave it to Him the moment it arrived."

Dr. Aldea, who was busy elsewhere when the streptomycin arrived, was speechless when he heard what had become of it. Even Stavrat was puzzled at my giving "a false oath." He said, "I thought you clergy always insisted on the whole truth and nothing but the truth."

Stavrat soon had an example of what "the whole truth" can cost when two new prisoners, one of whom had testified against the other, were put into our cell. The first was a Catholic bishop, who wanted Rome to know how bitterly his Church was being persecuted. The second was a lawyer who delivered the bishop's letter of complaint to the Papal Nuncio - when there was still one in Bucharest - for transmission to the Vatican. As the lawyer left the Nuncio's palace, he was arrested and, having denied delivering a letter, was confronted by the bishop. The bishop said, "I cannot lie. Yes, I did give him a letter."

Both men were tortured and ended up in Tirgul-Ocna, where they argued over which was right. The bishop expected my support, but I could not give it. I said, "If a man refuses to tell a lie, well and good, but then he should keep dangerous questions in his own hands. If he decided to risk someone else's safety, he must defend him at all costs."

The bishop protested, "The whole affair has brought me much sorrow, but how could I say something which was untrue?"

I replied that if we do good to our enemies, surely we should help our friends. "If my hostess has spent all day preparing a disastrous dinner, I still feel obliged to compliment her: that's not a lie, it's simple courtesy. When men here ask, 'When will the Americans come?' I tell them, 'It can't be too long now.' It's not the truth, I'm afraid, but it's not a lie either. It is word of hope."

The bishop was unconvinced. I continued, "If you submit to the purists, all art becomes a lie. Faust didn't really sign a contract with the devil, you know; it's just that liar Goethe at work. Hamlet never existed - that's a Shakespearean lie. The simplest jokes (I hope you laugh at jokes) are a fabrication."

"That may be so," the bishop replied, "but here is a personal issue. When ~you~ are interrogated by the Communists, Mr. Wurmbrand, do you not feel that you must tell the truth?"

"Of course not. I have no qualms about saying the first thing that comes into my head, so long as it misleads those who are trying to trap my friends. Am I to give these people information which they can use to attack the Church? I'm a minister of God!

"The world uses fine words for ugly things. Fraud becomes cleverness. Meanness is called economy. Lust wears the crown of love. Here the ugly word 'lie' is used for something which instinct tells us is right. I respect truth, but I'd lie' to save a friend."

When we were alone, Josif asked me, "What do you call a lie, then?"

"Why should you expect a definition from me? Your own conscience, if guided by the Holy Spirit, will tell you in every circumstance of life what to say and what to leave unsaid. You don't think the oath you carried to Sultaniuc about the streptomycin was a lie, do you?"

"Oh no," said Josif, with his sweet smile. "That was an act of love."

7

Josif's bitterness was eased, and one day after our English lesson I asked him, "Why do you say that you hate God?"

"Why?" he echoed. "You tell me first why God created the T.B. microbe." He considered that that should end the conversation.

"I can explain," I said. "If you will listen quietly."

He replied woefully, "I'll listen all night if you can do that."

page 126 In God's Underground

I warned him that I would keep him at his word. It was a problem, I said, which went to the root of human suffering, and evil. Josif was not the only one to ask why such things could happen under the eye of a merciful God - probably all of us in prison had asked the same question, and there was not one answer, but several.

"Firstly, we tend to confuse the unpleasant with the bad. Why is the wolf bad? Because it eats sheep and this upsets me. I want to eat the sheep myself! And whereas the wolf must eat the sheep to live, I have no need to do so, for I can eat other things. Worse still, the wolf has no duty towards the sheep, whereas we rear it all its life, feed and water it, and when it puts its full trust in us, then we cut its throat. No one thinks we're bad."

Josif sat watching me, his head propped in his hand.

"It's the same with bacilli. One bacillus lives - and makes dough ferment; another lives - and damages a child's lung. Neither germ knows what it does, but I approve one and condemn the other. So things are not good or bad in themselves - we label them according to whether they are convenient to us. We want the whole universe to conform to us, although we are an infinitesimally small part of it."

The cell was dark and unexpectedly quiet. "Secondly," I said, "what we call 'bad' is often simply unfinished good."

"That will take some proving," Josif put in, "in my case."

I said, "You had a namesake four thousand years ago, who was sold into slavery by his brothers, and suffered many other injustices in Egypt. Then he rose to be Prime Minister and so he was able to save the land, and his own ungrateful brothers, from starving in a famine. So until, like Joseph, you reach the end of the story, you can never know if what has happened so far will prove good or bad. When a painter starts a portrait, all you see is a blur of color. It takes time for the sitter to emerge. Everyone admires the portrait of Mona Lisa, but it took Leonardo forty years to finish. The ascent of a mountain is hard going before you can enjoy the view from the summit."

"But the men who die here in prison," Josif said, "may never see the view."

"On the other hand, a spell in jail may help them to the summit. Would Comrade Gheorghiu-Dej have come to power in Rumania if he hadn't been in prison like us?"

"And those who don't live to see freedom again?"

"Lazarus died in poverty and sickness," I said, "but Jesus tells us in a parable that the angels took him into eternal blessedness. After death there comes to all of us a compensation. Only when we see the end of everything can we hope to understand."

Josif promised to think about it.

8

One rapid cure for toothache is good news, and the letter which came for me raised my spirits to the skies, for it said my wife was free. She was still confined to Bucharest, but my son would shortly be allowed to visit me! The letter ended there: it was all the information they allowed.

I had left Mihai at the age of nine, and now he was fifteen. I could not imagine my son so grown up. We had always been so close. I began to worry about the meeting day and night. At last they led me into a large hall, where I had to sit in a box with a window blocked by three iron bars, so small that the visitor opposite would see only a small part of my face. The guard shouted, "Mihai Wurmbrand!" and he came and sat down before me. He was pale and thin and hollow-cheeked, with the beginnings of a moustache.

He said with a rush, in case he was cut off, "Mother says even if you die in prison you must not be sad because we'll all meet in paradise."

Consoling first words! I did not know whether to laugh or cry. I pulled myself together. "How is she? Have you food at home?"

"She's well again," he said. "And we have food. Our Father is very rich."

The guards assigned to listen to us grinned. They thought my wife had re-married.

To every question, Mihai found some reply in a verse from the Bible, so that in the few minutes which were allowed I received little family news; but he did tell me he had left a parcel with the guards at the gate.

I received the parcel next day, in excess of my allowance, because Mihai had addressed it to "Richard Wurmbrand." The others had gone to my prison self, Vasile Georgescu. Shortly afterwards, restrictions were fully restored: no visits, no parcels, no letters.

9

Before the easier times ended, a warder dragged a basket into the cell. It contained sheets and towels, and more than enough of these unimaginable luxuries for all.

"There's been a miscount," said Emil, a tailor. "Let's cut up the extra ones for clothes! I can run up some warm shirts out of this stuff."

Ion Madgearu, a lawyer, said uneasily, "It would be stealing state property."

"Who's to know? There's no inventory!"

"I'm a political prisoner, not a criminal."

"You're a fathead!"

Sides were taken and the argument raged. Josif appealed to me.

I said, "All this 'state property' is stolen from us. We've been reduced to rags and we are entitled to take back what we can. We owe it to our families to do all we can to survive the winter. It's just the same as when the guard comes in half asleep in the morning to ask, 'How many are you in this cell today? We try to exaggerate our numbers to get a little extra bread - and quite right too!"

Madgearu said, "I prefer to abide by the law."

"But every law is unfair to someone," I replied. "The law tells a millionaire who lacks nothing not to steal, and it says the same to you and men who have nothing. Jesus excuses David for doing unallowed things when he was very hungry."

Madgearu fell in with the rest of us eventually, but later he told me he had a special reason for wishing to make no compromise of this kind.

"I used to be a state prosecutor and in my time I've sent hundreds to jail. I thought, 'Well, it makes no difference what I say; the Party will send them to prison in any case.' When later I became the scapegoat for some mistake and received a fifteen-year sentence myself, I was stunned. They sent me to the lead-mines at Valea Nistrului. There, a Christian prisoner befriended me. He shared his food and was my good shepherd. I felt we'd met before, so I asked why he was in jail. 'Oh,' he said, 'I helped a fellow in trouble, like you. He came to my farm, seeking food and shelter. Then he was arrested as a partisan and I got twenty years,' I said, 'Disgraceful!' and he gave me a strange look.... Then it came back to me. I had been the prosecutor in his case. The man never reproached me, but his example of returning good for evil decided me to become a Christian."

10

Josif sang as he tried on the shirt which Emil had made him out of the surplus toweling. It was like a tunic, with a hole for his head, but he was happy to have something fresh near his skin. "State property! Everyone steals these days," he said cheerfully

Stavrat said, "He takes it for granted. In ten years we've turned into a nation of thieves, liars and petty spies. Farmers steal from land they once owned; farm-workers steal from the collective, even the barber steals a razor from his own shop which the cooperative has seized. Then they have to cover their thefts. Did you, pastor, make absolutely accurate tax returns?"

I admitted that I saw no reason to give the parishioners' money to the atheistic Party.

"Stealing will be a subject taught at school, next," said Stavrat.

Josif put in, "I didn't listen to anything at school. The teachers said that Bessarabia, which everyone knows was stolen from us, had always been part of Russia."

"Good lad!" said the general.

"I hope you'll reject their teaching against religion, too, Josif," I added and told him about a professor I knew who had to lecture regularly on atheism. "After crossing himself alone in his room asking God's forgiveness, he would go out and tell the students that God did not exist."

"Well, of course," said Josif, "they would be spying on him." He could not imagine a world in which you did not have to look around before opening your mouth.

The talk turned to a new informer called Jivoin who had deserted from the Yugoslav army and had been arrested on the border as a spy. Now, to ingratiate himself with the prison authorities, he played the anti-Titoist and got the guards into trouble by reporting them if they relaxed the rules.

"Some of us have decided to give Jivoin a shock," Josif said. "If we all jump on him together they can't punish us too badly."

"Wait a day," I said. "I've an idea which may work better."

Since Jivoin was used to the cell turning its back on him, he was flattered when I sought him out and asked about his homeland. Soon he was repeating Croat jokes and Serbian proverbs, and recalling the beauty of Montenegro, its songs and dances. He grew steadily more excited under my prompting.

"And what's your new National Anthem?" I asked.

"Oh, it's magnificent - haven't you heard it?"

"No, I'd like to, very much."

Delighted, Jivoin jumped up and raised his voice in song. The guards outside did not recognize the Titoist hymn until he came to the chorus. Then Jivoin was seized and rushed off to face a wrathful political officer.

"Well, that's the end of him," said Josif. We began to laugh.

Not long after Jivoin was neutralized, a former Iron Guard man, Captain Stelea, was moved to our cell from one further down the gallery. There he had left, with regret, an old wartime comrade.

"What was his name?" General Stavrat asked.

"Ion Coliu," Stelea replied. "He was put in with me the night after my arrival at Tirgul-Ocna and we had a wonderful talk about old times."

Stavrat asked whether Stelea had told Coliu any secret which he had held back under interrogation and torture.

"Yes, everything," said Stelea. "He's been my closest friend for years. I'd stake my life on him."

When Stavrat told Stelea that Ion Coliu had become the most reviled stool-pigeon in Tirgul-Ocna, he could not believe it. I was asked to confirm the fact. For hours Stelea sat on his bunk like a shell-shocked soldier. Then he leaped up and began to shout and fight with us hysterically, until the guards carried him off.

A room is set aside in every prison for those who break down. They are left to rave and scream, excrete on the floor and fight among themselves, sometimes to death. Food is pushed through a hatch and left. No guard risks his life among them.

11

Josif's sentence had only weeks to run. He was planning for the future, he told me. "My sister in Germany will work for a permit for us to go to America. I'll perfect my English and learn a trade!"

But still he hated his disfigured face. One evening, I told him how Helen Keller, although blind, deaf and dumb, became one of America's great personalities. He was fascinated as I described how she taught herself to become a fine pianist, aided only by a piece of sounding wood held in her teeth, the other end of which was fixed in the piano; and how her work brought Braille to thousands of blind people.

"She wrote, in one of her famous books, that although she had never seen the starry Heaven, she had Heaven in her heart. That is why she could spread before a world that has these senses, but often fails to use them, the beauty of God's creation."

I told him that Helen Keller came from a wealthy family. If she had been "lucky" like other girls in having all her senses, she might have frittered away her life in trivialities. Instead, she used what men called "evil" as a stimulus to reach new heights of achievement.

Josif pondered. "Helen Keller must be a case in a thousand," he said.

"No. There are many like her. The Russian writer Ostrovsky was blind, paralyzed, and so poor that he had to write his novel on wrapping paper. It is world-famous today. Great men have often been sick men. Schiller, Chopin, Keats were tubercular like us. Baudelaire, Heine and our own poet, Eminescu, had syphilis. Scientists tell us that the microbes of such diseases excite our nervous cells and so they heighten our intelligence and perception, although they may bring madness or death in the end. T.B. may make a bad man worse, but good ones become better; they see their lives running out and want to do all the good they can in the time left to them."

Josif helped often in Room Four. I said, "Haven't you seen the special serenity, gentleness and lucidity which comes to some of those who suffer from tuberculosis?"

His eyes lit up. "That's true. How strange!"

I said, "For thousands of years men regarded fungus - mold that grows on walls - as bad. Then twenty-five years ago Sir Alexander Fleming found the good in it, and penicillin, which heals so many diseases, was discovered. Until its real use was known, this mold was evil. It may be that we have yet to learn how to put the T.B. microbe to work for us. When once this incurable disease of ours has finally been conquered, our children will perhaps be inoculated with small doses of the germ to enliven their intelligence.

"God made Heaven and earth, and your life, and so much beauty, Josif! There is sense in your suffering, as there was in Jesus's, for it was His death on the cross which saved mankind."

Josif was shivering in his new shirt, which was already growing threadbare.

I took the woolen jacket which my relatives had sent and tore out the lining, for myself. I persuaded him to take the jacket. He clasped his arms over his narrow chest to show how warm he was.

Josif's conversion began on that day. Yet something was needed to lift him into faith.

It happened during the distribution of the bread rations. They were laid in rows on a table each morning. Each portion was supposed to be three and a half ounces, but some were a shade larger, some smaller. There were often disagreements over whose turn it was for first choice, and quarrels over who had to be last. Men asked each other's advice: which was the biggest portion left? Having acted on it, they suspected they were being misled, and friendships turned sour over a mouthful of black bread. When a surly prisoner called Trailescu tried to cheat me, Josif was watching.

I told Trailescu, "Take mine, too. I know how hungry you are." He shrugged and stuffed the bread into his mouth.

We sat translating New Testament verses into English that evening and Josif said, "We have read nearly everything Jesus said now, but still I wonder what He was like to know as a man."

I said, "I'll tell you. When I was in Room Four there was a pastor who would give away everything he had - his last bit of bread, his medicine, the coat from his back. I have given these things also sometimes, when I wanted them for myself. But at other times when men were hungry and sick and in need I could be very quiet, I didn't care. This other pastor was really Christ-like. You felt that just the touch of his hand could heal and calm. One day he talked to a small group of prisoners and one asked him the question you have asked me: 'What is Jesus like? I've never met anyone like the man you describe, so good and loving and truthful.' And the pastor replied, in a moment of great courage, simply and humbly, 'Jesus is like me.' And the man, who had often received kindness from the pastor, answered, smiling, 'If Christ was like you, then I love Him.' The times when one may say such a thing as that, Josif, are very rare. But to me that is what it means to be Christian. To believe in Him is not such a great thing. To become like Him is truly great."

"Pastor, if Jesus is like you, then I love Him, too," Josif said. There was innocence and peace in his gaze.

The moment passed and we went on with our lesson. I told him how Jesus answered the Jews who asked for a sign so that they might believe him. "Our ancestors," they said, "had bread from Heaven. Moses got it for them." And Jesus replied, "I am the bread of life. Whoever comes to me shall never be hungry or thirsty. Your forefathers ate, and are dead. I speak of bread which comes from Heaven, which a man may eat and never die."

Next day Josif worked in Room Four, as he often did now. When we met in the evening, he said, "I want to be a Christian more than anything." I baptized him with a little water from a tin mug, saying, "In the name of the Father, and the Son and the Holy Ghost." The bitterness left his heart completely before he was released.

On the day of his departure, he embraced me. There were tears in his eyes. He said, "You've helped me as though you were my own father. Now I can stand by myself, with God."

Years afterwards we met again. He was a Christian. But now he was proud to bear the scar he had hated once.

page 135 In God's Underground

12

Our prison administrators soon got over their fright at Stalin's death. There had been serious trouble in the slave-camps of Siberia, and they were determined to show no weakness. Old restrictions were revived, new ones created. The windows were closed and painted over, despite the doctor's protests, and we could open them only an inch at night when the guards were not looking. In summer the heat and stench were horrible.

Outside, too, the sufferings of the Church increased. We heard, from newly arrested Orthodox priests, how Patriarch Justinian had become wholly a tool of the Party.

One of his worst acts was his treatment of Mother Veronica, a nun venerated throughout Rumania. Years before, as an unlettered peasant girl, Veronica claimed to have had a vision of the Virgin Mary, who appeared to her in a field and said a convent must be built on the spot. After several such apparitions had been recorded, contributions poured in, and 200 young girls took the veil. In the years that followed the Holy Virgin's shrine became a place of pilgrimage like Lourdes, and after the Communist take-over the legend that she would redeem Rumania acquired a new meaning. One day Justinian arrived in a glossy black car and began his ministrations by excommunicating the priest of the convent church. Then, as head of the Church, he told the nuns that they were wasting their time preparing for an after-life; much better go out and take their pleasures in the world - why should they forego their sexual rights for an illusion of future bliss? The nuns closed their ears to him. They refused to leave their refuge. So Justinian's visit was followed by a Security Police raid. The sisters who would not break their vows were shamefully ill-treated, and finally the convent was shut down.

The news shocked Rumania: for a time the Party

page 136 In God's Underground

was worried. Mother Veronica was subjected to intense pressure in a secret prison and made to confess that her vision had been a delusion. After her release she married and had children. That was the end of the Rumanian Lourdes.

Another blow for the faithful was the fate of Petrache Lupu, known as "the shepherd saint" from Oltenia. While tending his flock many years before, he had seen the figure of an old man. The old man introduced himself as God, declaring that more churches must be built and money given for the poor. Although Lupu was a hereditary syphilitic who could hardly speak intelligibly, his story was believed. Thousands came to see him. When war broke out, and he was flown to the front to inspire the troops, the soldiers competed to kiss his hand. He went from one sector to another telling them that God wanted them to kill more Russians. On his arrest by the Communists, Petrache Lupu asked his fellow-prisoners when the Americans would rescue them. "Why wait for the Yanks?" they said. "Your 'Old Man' will surely free you soon enough!" Lupu cackled, "He'd like to, but he hasn't got a gun!"

The Orthodox priests sadly quoted another instance: that of a wonder-working monk, Arsene Boca, whose followers said they did not need to confess to him because he knew their sins at a glance. Boca spent a spell in prison. Then he gave up his habit, married and lived as other men.

Many of the blows the Party struck at religion simply lopped off branches of credulous superstition, leaving true faith sounder than ever. But human nature is such that if religious superstition is too drastically shorn it may be replaced by atheist superstition. Instead of excessive veneration for holy images we then have the idolatry of Stalin, the mass murderer, and the second devil is worse than the first.

page 137 In God's Underground

13

A new batch of prisoners came in and one of them who had been beaten badly asked for me. I went with Professor Popp along the passage.

It was Boris. The old trade unionist had been in several prisons since re-education ended. He lay on the stone floor where the guards had thrown him. The others from the cell were out on exercise and no one had given him any help until Popp came past. We eased him on to a plank bed. His grubby shirt was stuck to him with congealed blood. Slowly and painfully we soaked it off, revealing a back criss-crossed with lash strokes, fresh and old. It was his reward for co-operating with the re-educators, and the reward of all his companions who had thought to win favor with the Party by wielding a truncheon.

The prisoners began to file in from exercise and many cast looks of hatred and contempt at Boris.

"I asked for it," said the old fellow as Popp and I cleaned the wounds.

"You got it!" said someone.

Boris clutched my arm. "I met someone you know. Patrascanu gave me a message for you."

Boris said that Lucretiu Patrascanu, the former Communist Minister of Justice who had shared my cell after our arrest in 1948, was dead. During the year of uncertainty which followed Stalin's end, the Party bosses were as fearful as our guards that they might be submerged in a counter-revolution. They saw the imprisoned Patrascanu as a man with a popular following who might lead a liberalizing movement and take revenge on them. After six years in jail, he was given a rushed trial and death sentence.

Boris had been with him briefly. He said that Patrascanu, who had done so much to bring Communism to power, was tortured before he died. He complained of the cold and they gave him heavy clothes and put him in chains. "Still cold?" they said, and heated the cell until, gasping and soaked in sweat, he begged them to turn off the steam heat. They did so, after stripping him to his shirt, and then let the cell temperature fall to freezing. So Patrascanu was alternately roasted and frozen, and since he did not die, he was taken out and shot.

Boris said, "He told me, 'If you meet Wurmbrand again, tell him he was right.'"

Dr. Aldea came. "We'll have to take you to Room Four," he said to Boris.

14

I spent all the time I could with Boris in the "death room," and after a few days he seemed to be on the mend. Although his pride would not let him admit it, he was happy to be back in an atmosphere of human kindness.

He nodded towards his neighbor, a Jehovah's Witness. "Old Losonczi's praying for me. He says enough prayers for both of us." Raising his voice, he said, "Losonczi, you tell God everything, don't you?"

The old fellow said, "I ask good for us all."

"You haven't had an answer yet," said Boris. "He's pulling your leg, perhaps; trying you out, like Job!"

He caught hold of my wrist. "It's something to explain, isn't it? Year after year, men pray for liberty, for news of their families, for one single meal they might enjoy. What do they get? Nothing!"

Boris went on. "I was in Jilava, the worst prison in Rumania. My friends were praying, 'God, if you love us, give us something to eat without worms in it.'"

"And did the food get better?" Losonczi asked.

"No, it got worse!"

I said, "When the doctor treats you, doesn't he often have to cause you pain? Think for a moment of animals that die in scientific experiments. If there were a dog that knew what it went through might save the lives of millions of higher beings, might it not accept pain willingly, even death? I believe that what we suffer may be serving future generations.

Jesus bore His pain, knowing that it would save mankind."

Losonczi intervened. "All over the world, every day, people say 'Our Father' and declare that His Kingdom shall come, and it does not come. But I think I know why. It's because the people who pray don't really want it to! They say, 'Thy Kingdom come' but it's not a prayer from the heart. What they really want is the Iron Guard back, or the Americans to come, or the King to return, or anyone else to come who will help them."

Boris was listening seriously.

"But the last thing in their minds, be sure, is the Kingdom of Heaven, though they could have it for certain if they thought and worked for it. In my village we had a service to pray for the poor. Everyone was there except one rich farmer, whose pew was empty. While we were thinking how much better we were than he, his son arrived with four sacks of wheat. He put them down at the church door, and said, 'My father has sent his prayer.' That man did something to create the Kingdom of God."

I said, "You're answered, Boris! The Bible promised that the Jews would come from the ends of the earth and be given their kingdom in Palestine – but the prophecy might not have come true for another thousand years if men like Herzl and Weizmann had not worked and struggled to fulfill it."

Others nearby, gaunt, earnest men in this room of death, asked me questions about the meaning of prayer and how it could help. I spoke aloud my thoughts. "Many look on God as if He were a rich man to whom they appeal for favors. Many cling to superstition. But Christians in prison know that we must try to achieve a purer form of religion, even though it is not for everyone. Our prayers take the form of meditation, acceptance, love.

"Millions call on the Father daily. But since we on earth are the children of God, and children share their father's responsibilities, then these prayers are turned to us, too. Is not the Father to whom all pray in my heart?

"So, when I say 'Hallowed be Thy name,' I must hallow God's name. 'Thy Kingdom come,' so I must fight to end the rule of mad beasts over a great part of the world. 'Thy will be done,' and the will of good men, not bad. 'Forgive us our sins,' so I must also forgive. 'Lead us not into temptation,' so I must keep others from being tempted. 'Deliver us from evil,' so I must do all I can to free man from sin."

Losonczi and I became friends. He was an interesting man, a farmer, whose simple good sense shone through the strange views he held as a Jehovah's Witness. I found that the sect had chosen him, not he the sect. Disillusioned with the Orthodox Church, and seeking religion because of a personal crisis in his life, he had embraced the first faith he met. There were many of these "refugees" from the larger confessions. Had Losonczi been drawn into a legally approved sect such as the Baptists or Adventists he would not have been serving a twenty-year sentence as one of the outlawed Witnesses.

One day, as I was talking to him, he asked me, "Do you know why I am really here?" It was not, he said, only because the Party hated the Witnesses for their rigid attitude. "Years ago I committed a great sexual sin. I repented and asked God to let me suffer and atone for it. I am still atoning."

Losonczi was not in a state to listen to another doctrine now. He was dying.

"Even the saints had difficulty in subduing their carnal nature," I said. "Jesus knew this. He has atoned for our sins, and there's no need for you to go on atoning by yourself." He replied, "I can't forget."

A few days later I came into the room and found Losonczi's bed empty. He had died during the night.

15

The old man had died thinking of a sexual sin in his youth, and here he did not suffer alone. Sex was an abiding torment to everyone in jail. Prisoners sat gazing at nothing, their heads filled with fantasies of men and women in the act of sex, and in every perversion of it. They tried to find relief in endless talk and often in baiting me with provocative questions.

Married men, thinking of what their wives were doing, suffered most of all. A good half had already been divorced in their absence; the pressure to divorce "counter-revolutionaries" was strong, and wives who had left their imprisoned husbands for other men had no reason to resist it.

A leader in the obsessive sex-talk had once owned a department store and - according to his own account - seduced many pretty girl assistants. A fleshy man of middle age, Nicolas Frimu took pride in his prison nickname, "The Great Lover." He boasted often of the young actress wife who, he said, adored him.

When he was called to the Commandant's office, he expected to hear the result of his appeal against sentence. "I'll soon be out now," he said. "And then - !" he kissed his fingers loudly.

He was back soon, flushed with rage. "My appeal's been rejected - and she's divorced me and remarried!" he exploded. For several minutes, without pause he described the revenge he would take on the woman and her new husband - a director of the State theater. Other discarded husbands urged him on, shouting and laughing bitterly as they invented still more atrocious punishments.

I said, "But how many of us would be faithful to our wives if we were free and they in jail?"

"Don't start lecturing!" shouted Frimu.

I said: "I'm sorry about your bad news. But you're always talking about the girls you've led astray: how can you expect women to be pure, with men like you about!"

Novac, a dean who was usually reserved and shy, surprised us by saying, "The husband is not always to blame. I tried to make my wife happy. I thought I had. When I went home after my first prison term, my front door was opened by a stranger. My wife came out and said, 'I'm married to him - so please go!' I tried to speak to her, but she wouldn't listen. 'I've had enough trouble, I want no more revolutionaries in my home,' she shouted. So I spent my first night of freedom in a railway station waiting-room."

"More fool you!" said Frimu.

Petre, an airman, asked, "How about the second night?"

The dean flushed and turned away.

Emil, a farmer, trembled with anger as he told how he had returned after a previous sentence. "My dog scented me from half-way down the street. She tore her chain from the fence and rushed to greet me, and when I bent down she jumped up to lick my face. Then I went into the house, and found my wife in bed with another man."

He glared round at us. "Which of the two was the dog, Pastor?"

16

The Communist Party worked deliberately to corrode morality. But, putting this factor aside, was Christian teaching in sexual matters respected? It seemed unlikely from the talk in prison, and a handful of Christian prisoners tried to find out by asking for a truthful answer to a simple question: "Have you always obeyed the basic rule of the Christian church in remaining chaste in word, thought and deed before marriage, and faithful thereafter?"

Of 300 prisoners, all nominal Christians, two men answered yes. One was saintly old Father Suroianu, and the other a boy of fifteen.

We sat comparing notes. General Stavrat said, "The Church will have to think again. An army cannot go into battle with orders which no one obeys."

"To preach what nobody practices devalues all a priest may have to say," remarked Stancu, the journalist.

"We cannot go against the Bible," objected Dean Novac.

"Surely not," I said. "But though we cannot compromise with sin, we must have more understanding for the sinner. In Biblical times women wore veils and dresses like tents. You had to be a virtuoso of vice then to lead a girl astray. Nowadays their clothes are designed to lure the male, and opportunities abound.

"We can remember how Jesus treated the woman taken in adultery. Nobody there could cast the first stone. They crept away and Jesus asked, 'Woman, has no one condemned you? Go, and sin no more.'" [JHN 8:3-11]

The dean was worried. "Young people have so much license today. They need guidance."

I agreed, but added, "We must also teach that sex is a gift that God gives mankind. We must tell the whole truth to free it from any taint of obscenity. There is divinity here. The world's oldest religious book, the ~Maneva-Darma Sostra~, says: 'Woman is an altar to which man brings as a pleasing sacrifice to God, his seed.'"

"Most of us look at a woman in a more humdrum way," complained Stancu. "She's something to be used. An object of pleasure, or a well-dressed doll to be seen about with. A slave to clean and cook, or an idol in whose service a man can lose himself. Nobody seems to regard her as an equal, even in sexual enjoyment."

"The main thing is to choose a partner who can make you happy," said the dean.

"Or vice-versa," I suggested. "One of the happiest men I knew chose the plain girl of the village because he thought she would find no one else to marry."

"What a romantic!" scoffed Stancu. "Marriage is only a contract. When my parents found a nice girl with the right size of dowry, the deal was done. We've been quite content, going our own ways."

"So you're not really married at all," I said.

"The knot was tied in church!"

"I consider a marriage for material interest is invalid in God's sight, even if it's blessed by the Pope in Rome."

Stancu laughed. "Then there must be plenty of invalid marriages about. Boys sell themselves to rich girls, just as poor girls are sold to rich men. Isn't it more unreasonable to be valued for good looks, which don't last, than a solid bank balance, which does?"

I answered by telling Stancu about a young woman whose parents had made her marry a wealthy man. After years of unhappiness she fell in love with the tailor who made her clothes, and went to live with him. Many churchgoers would have nothing to do with her. To live with a man out of wedlock is sin, but I tried to understand her position. Her parents, by beatings and other means, had forced her into this marriage. The best thing was not to despise this woman, but to help her by encouraging her to put things which were irreversible in order legally. I asked my people not to judge her hastily.

"The young woman came in tears to thank me. I said that the register of church members was not the same as the register God keeps in Heaven. 'God has understanding even if not approval for the feelings which brought you to the arms of another man. God continues to love you.' She flung her arms round my neck and kissed me, and at that moment my wife came in."

The others roared with laughter. Stancu asked, "And how did you explain the situation to her?"

"There was nothing to explain," I said. "The woman lived happily with the tailor, and when he died, years later, I told my wife what had happened."

17

Prisons are supposed to encourage homosexuality, but we saw no evidence of this, perhaps because of the illness, the exhaustion, the overcrowding we had to live with. Professor Popp spoke strongly against one or two suspected instances.

I said that we should condemn the sin, but try to understand these often unhappy men and forgive their failings, as we did other human faults, and try to cure them. Many great men had been homosexual – Alexander, Hadrian, Plato, Leonardo; and many had shown a deep Christian feeling in their work, from Socrates – who was called, "a Christian before Christ" – to Michelangelo and, in our own time, Oscar Wilde and Andre Dunant, who founded the International Red Cross.

"Yes, I know their honors list," said Popp, "but so many of them, in the theater and so on, flaunt their problem and turn a private matter into a public one. Since society condemns this tendency, they should at least practice a little prudence."

A rabbi recalled a word of advice from that book of great practical wisdom, the Talmud. "It says that if a rabbi cannot conquer a bad impulse, he should at least avoid scandal, put on a veil and go to another town; and then return to preach the law."

Paul Cernei, a young man who had once been in the Iron Guard, had been lying on a nearby bed. Now he swung his feet to the floor and said, "I'll put a real problem to you. One that wrecked my life.... Some years ago I met a girl – let's call her Jenny. We fell in love. She would never let me take her home, so in the end I decided to ask her father's approval of our marriage. When I found the house and gave my name, he came out and said, 'My son, Jenny has told me all about you!' I looked at him in horror. He was a rabbi with a Star of David on his breast. I was an anti-Semite, I didn't know what to do. I mumbled that I had no idea Jenny came from a Jewish family, and walked away."

He paused. "I never saw the girl again. I never married. I couldn't forget her. I've heard that she's still single, too."

Cernei told the story movingly. Stavrat said, "When you get out, it may not be too late...."

"But if we could get married," Cernei asked, "who should change religions? I'm Orthodox and she's a Jewess."

I said, "Either your faith has meaning for you, and then you can't change it for anything in the world; or it doesn't, and then you might as well abandon it. But since you love each other, why can't you both keep the religion of your choice?"

"I'd want children," he replied. "We should have to bring them up in one religion or another."

I thought that as the children grew up, Cernei and his wife could both explain their beliefs - each respecting the other's - and let the children choose for themselves later on. "You could make your love a means to bring her, with meekness, to the truth."

"Her parents would never approve her change of religion," Cernei said.

"She should listen to them, certainly, but she shouldn't submit if she knows they're wrong."

Stavrat shook his head. "Honor thy father and thy mother," he quoted.

"But, general," said Cernei, "my father left the house while I was still in the cradle. My mother went off with someone else. I was brought up in an orphanage."

No one could find an answer to that.

"I wish I'd stopped to think before I walked away that day," Cernei said.

How often I heard prisoners speak words like that. We are like cars with headlights behind. Looking back, we see the damage we have done and the people we have hurt. We realize too late that if we had only stopped to count the cost to our families, our health or simply our self-respect, we would not have acted as we did.

When Cernei left us, the general said, "He's a decent young man. People always blame a bad upbringing when men go wrong these days, but bad blood matters too. We take care in breeding animals, but degraded, worthless criminals are not discouraged from breeding their kind."

Christians cannot ignore this fundamental problem of heredity. We try to reform the adult, or punish the criminal, but we never ask would-be parents to consider whether something in their descent may harm the unborn. Sex does not exist only to bring babies into the world: it has its own value in making life nobler and happier. And this is our excuse when we bring children into the world casually, for a moment's pleasure, and forget that procreation is a sacred act.

Most prisoners, who are always short of food, put sexual need on an equal footing. At the Last Judgment men will be reproached for failing to feed the hungry; and they will be reproached, too, some say, if they have not satisfied their partners' thirst after love, whenever they could have done, ennobling their partners and making them happier.

There is sexual injustice, of course, just as there is social and economic injustice. It is one of the great causes of human suffering. But then every law, even divine law, has unavoidably an element of injustice in it in giving the same tasks to unequal men living in unequal conditions. The law lays down the same rules for rich and poor, for under-sexed and over-sexed, for the ignorant and the intellectual.

Marriage must be a question of honor. It is a duty you take upon yourself - to be faithful. Love is a sentiment, and all sentiments change, nobody loves or is angry forever in equal measure. It is a law of nature that passion lowers in intensity as one grows older, so it cannot be a guarantee of a happy marriage, either. There must be something else: the decision to be loyal, the decision to make the other happy.

Since it is obviously impossible to satisfy everyone's sexual need, we discussed chastity as an alternative. The Catholics spoke up in favor of celibacy for the priesthood.

I said, "If celibacy is imposed, and marriage forbidden by vow, then failure to abstain may damage a priest's faith."

"It can become a great creative force," the professor said. "It's doubtful whether Spinoza, Kant, Descartes, Newton, Beethoven ever knew a woman in the Biblical sense."

I thought the chief aid to be given was to teach men to sublimate this natural drive into works useful to society and God. Chastity, in my view, was for the few. Yet we must understand more and more that our bodies are not ours to misuse for selfish pleasures, but temples of God, to be consecrated to His service.

18

Popp and I took turns to look after Boris, who lay in Room Four, coughing weakly. Dr. Aldea said, "If he eats, he may last ten days. My visits are not really helping him. He's filled with remorse over that beating he gave me. It harms him to see me."

I asked if the man could be moved into my cell. Aldea arranged it. So Boris was carried to the bed next to mine, and I nursed him through the last week of his life.

He withered away under our eyes. His hair was reduced to a few strands, his cheeks were sunken. He sweated feverishly, as I sponged him down, day after day.

"All over soon," he murmured. "A priest once told me 'You'll rot in hell.' So be it!"

"What made him speak like that!" I asked.

"I was cursing God for my sufferings. He said I'd be punished for eternity."

A pastor named Valentin intervened: "Men curse the Communist Party, but eventually it may release them. If hell were endless, then God would be worse than our Secret Police."

Boris opened his eyes. "Do you mean you don't believe in Everlasting Fire?"

"The Biblical doctrine of the endlessness of hell is true subjectively, no doubt, but what is hell? Dostoevsky calls it a state of conscience, and he was an Orthodox believer. In the ~Brothers Karamazov~ he wrote of hell, 'I believe it is the suffering of being unable to love.'"

"I don't think I'd mind that sort of hell," said Boris.

I said, "Perhaps you've never known what it may be to live where there is no love. When the bad have only the bad for company, imagine what it will be like! It is said that when Hitler went to hell he

page 149 In God's Underground

looked about until he found Mussolini. 'What's it like down here?' he asked. Mussolini replied, 'Not so bad, but there's a lot of forced labor.' Then he began to sob. 'Come, Duce,' said Hitler, 'let's know the worst.' 'Well, then, it's this - Stalin's in charge of the working party!'"

Boris smiled. "I'd certainly hate to find my old boss Ana Pauker down below." He lay thinking. "That Catholic priest who told me I'd burn for blasphemy was a good man. He never harmed anyone, but he still thought that, simply for revenge, God would torture me endlessly. The God he believed in was worse than he."

Pastor Valentin said, "I don't doubt that those in hell feel it as an eternal punishment. In this sense the Bible calls it endless, as prison seems endless to us. But even under the worst conditions, we see men coming to love God and to realize they have done wrong. Dives, in Jesus's parable of poor Lazarus, shows signs of a change of heart in hell! He had been an egotist, now he is concerned about his brothers. Nothing is fixed anywhere in nature. If there is some evolution in hell towards goodness, then it opens a door to hope!"

Boris called weakly to prisoners on bunks nearby, "Good news, my lads! Pastor Valentin says we may not fry for ever, after all!"

There was laughter. Frimu, Stavrat and others came across to us.

"Well," asked Frimu, "what's going to be my punishment?"

Frimu was a gluttonous man. I said, "The early Christians used to tell of a man who went to hell and was surprised to find a banquet laid. He recognized many historical figures around the table. 'Do you always feast like this?' he asked. 'Certainly, we may order whatever we wish!' 'Then what is your punishment?' 'It is that we can never bring the hand which holds the food to our mouths.' The newcomer saw a way out. 'But can't each of you feed your neighbor and let him feed you?' 'What!' cried the other. 'Help him? I'd rather go on starving!'"

page 150 In God's Underground

General Stavrat said, "I was taught at school and in church that God will punish eternally those who die unrepentant and without faith. It is the received dogma."

"Received in your mind, but not, perhaps in your heart, General. We see men around us cursing God and denying his existence because they suffer unjustly. They will surely be judged according to their deeds and words and thoughts. And then? Suppose you see a stranger in danger of being killed - you'd be the first to run and help him. And if a Christian really believed that his neighbor will be tortured in all eternity in hell, he should try day and night to persuade him to repent and believe. How sad that this doesn't happen."

19

Boris's old prejudices fell away one by one, but instead of becoming cheerful he grew depressed. "I feel I've wasted my life," he said. "I thought myself clever. I've misled a great many people in the last fifty years. If your God exists, he won't want me in Heaven! So down I go to join that old sow Pauker - I'm really scared now!"

Often when he could not sleep he asked me to talk to him.

"Who's going to pray for me when I'm gone?" he asked. He thought Lutherans forbade prayer for the dead. I said that Luther simply did not want people to suppose that, however much they sinned, they might pay a priest to pray them out of purgatory.

Pastor Valentin said: "We pray for our fellow-prisoners, who are dying every day. It wouldn't be an act of love to stop praying just when the soul leaves the body - because Catholics and Protestants quarreled about public prayer four hundred years ago.

"And does prayer help them?"

"Yes," he said. "Before God all are living - and so they are for me. And if they are living, I am sure prayer can help them."

"If I were you, I wouldn't waste prayers on me." He laughed a little at this, and brought on a fit of coughing.

Valentin said, "I'm sure you've done much good. There are certainly many worse men. But I pray for the worst of all - Stalin, Hitler, Himmler, Beria."

"What do you pray?" Boris asked me with a weak voice.

I said: "God, forgive the great sinners and criminals and, among the worst of men, me also."

I sat with Boris a long time. It was so quiet that we could hear Frimu's boastful voice in the next cell. There was laughter and giggling over his sexual exploits.

For some hours, Boris was silent. I thought he was asleep. Suddenly he murmured, "What can it be like?"

"What?" I asked him.

"The judgment of God. Does he sit on a tall throne, saying 'Hell, Heaven... Hell, Heaven' as the souls come before him? I can't see it, myself."

I told him how I imagined it.

"God sits on a throne with a great curtain behind Him and, one by one, we come before Him. Then God makes a sign with His right hand, and from behind the curtain come beings each more beautiful than the other; so splendid that we cannot bear to look at them. Each of these beings stands before one of those to be judged. We who are accused ask, 'Who is this beautiful being with me?' God answers, 'That is you, as you would have been if you had obeyed Me.' And then comes, for the disobedient, the eternal hell of remorse."

"Remorse," Boris whispered.

During the night he had a hemorrhage. I had a difficult time with him, then he fell into a coma. He lay quietly, his eyes staring blindly at the ceiling for an hour. His pulse was weak but still present under my fingers. Suddenly he pulled his hand away and half sat up. He gave a cry which seemed to tear soul from body, "Lord God, forgive me!"

Some of the prisoners around us awoke and muttered angrily, before going back to sleep.

When dawn came, I began to wash the body and prepare it for burial, and while I was doing this, someone informed the Orthodox bishop in a cell down the corridor that a man had died. He came along and began the ritual. I went on with my work. Now and then the bishop interrupted himself to hiss at me, "Stand up! Show some respect!" but I did not look up. When the ritual was finished, the bishop upbraided me again.

I said, "Where were you when this man was dying all last week? Did you hold a cup to his mouth when he wanted water? Why do you come only now to perform a ceremony which meant nothing to him?"

We were both angry. His ritual seemed such a hollow thing beside that simple cry from the depths of the heart, "Lord God, forgive me!"

20

Spring, 1955, brought signs of a political thaw. A number of prison commandants were arrested for "sabotage." To Tirgul-Ocna came many of the slave workers who had been victims of the "saboteurs." Beds had to be found for them, and I was among a group who were ordered in early June to get ready for transfer to another jail.

Dr. Aldea said, 'You're not fit to move, but there's nothing we can do. Take care of yourself. And if you lay hands on any more streptomycin - don't give it away!"

I said goodbye to my friends amid many tears.

"We'll meet again: I know it," said Professor Popp.

I heard my name shouted, and joined a line of men out in the yard. We were a bizarre gathering, with our shaven heads and suits of many patches, each clutching a bundle of rags - all that we possessed. Some could hardly walk, nevertheless, those of us serving long sentences were ordered to march a step forward and then sit on the ground while our ankles were chained.

The political officer stood over the blacksmith as he moved from man to man. When my turn came, the officer smiled unpleasantly.

"Ah, Vasile Georgescu! Surely you have something to say about being put in irons?"

Lying on my side, I looked up and replied, "Yes, Lieutenant, I can answer you in song."

He folded his hands behind his back and said,

"Oh, please! I'm sure we'd all like to hear you."
I sang the opening words of the Republic's anthem, "Broken chains are left behind us..." The blacksmith's hammer finished the task in a few more blows, and in the uneasy silence I added, "You sing that broken chains are left behind - but this regime has put more people in chains than any other."
The lieutenant had not found a reply when a shout from the guard-room announced the arrival of transport. We were taken to the station and herded into wagons. There we lay for hours before the train began to creak and rattle across country. Through holes in the tiny, painted-out windows, we glimpsed forest land and mountains. It was a warm and beautiful summer's day.

page 154 blank

page 155 In God's Underground

PART FIVE

The journey across the plains westwards from Bucharest was about 200 miles, but there were so many stops and starts that it took almost two days and nights. Word of our destination went round even before the thick, 100-year-old walls of notorious Craiova Prison came into sight.
Our chains were struck off in the stone-flagged courtyard, and we were goaded with blows along dark passages thick with dirt. We were thrust, in small groups, into cells along a gallery. Loud protests came from inside them: "There's no room here! We're suffocating already!" The guards squeezed the new arrivals in forcibly. It was like rush hour on the underground railway, with the porters wielding truncheons.
A push in the spine sent me stumbling forwards and the door banged behind me. The stench in the cell made me feel sick. At first I could see nothing. I felt about, and my hand drew back from an almost naked, sweating body. Slowly, as I grew used to the dim light from a ceiling bulb, I saw rows of bunks rising in tiers, packed with men who lay gasping for breath. More men, also half-naked, sat on the floor, or leaned against the walls. No one could move without waking a neighbor, whose curses aroused everyone else.
My stay in this cell over the next two months was broken only by journeys to the stinking sump outside, carrying lavatory pails.

page 156 In God's Underground

I told the prisoners I was a pastor, and said a brief prayer. A few swore at me, but many listened quietly. Then someone called my name from an upper bunk hidden in the darkness.

"I recognize your voice," he said. "I heard your speech at that Congress of Cults many years ago."

I asked who he was. He replied, "We'll speak tomorrow."

The long night ended at 5:00 A.M., when reveille was sounded by a guard who beat on a dangling piece of railway line with an iron bar. The man from the upper bunk, a little fellow with a twist of cloth around his head, came down to shake my hand.

"It's as well I knew your voice in the dark," he said, gazing at me with bloodshot eyes. "I wouldn't have recognized you by sight. The Party has had its revenge for your protest, I see. How thin you are!"

He was a hodja called Nassim, who had represented the small Moslem community at the 1945 Congress of Cults.

Our friendship began while I was trying to eat my first meal at Craiova. The vile, greasy smell of the soup preceded its arrival in the cell. Shreds of rotten cabbage and unwashed offal floated in a scum. But to eat was a duty and I emptied my dish.

"How can you?" asked the hodja, whose stomach had revolted.

"It was a Christian secret," I said. "I think of St. Paul's words 'Rejoice with those that rejoice.' Then I remember friends in America who are now eating grilled chicken, and I thank God with them as I take the first mouthful of soup. Next, I rejoice with friends in England who may be eating roast beef. And I get down another mouthful. So, by way of many friendly countries, I rejoice with those that rejoice - and stay alive." [ROM 12:15]

The hodja and I had to share a bunk through the hot, stuffy nights. I was lucky not to be on the floor.

"You lie very still," he said as others coughed and fidgeted around us. "What are you thinking? Does St. Paul help you now, too?"

I replied, "Yes, for now I rejoice with those in the West by thinking of their comfortable homes, and the books they have, the holidays they can plan, the music they hear, the love they have for their wives and children. And I remember the second part of the verse, from the Epistle to the Romans, 'And weep with those that weep.' I am sure that in the West many thousands think of us and try to help us with their prayers." [Rom 12:16]

2

All men in prison feel a need to assert themselves. They like to argue. They flare up at a word. And when they find someone who does not return insult for insult, they torment him all the more. In the conditions of Craiova the difficulties I faced were almost insuperable. When I preached I had to raise my voice over groans and pretended snores. The prisoners were desperately bored. They had no inner resources and they longed for their familiar distractions. I found that sermons turned into discussions, and then into quarrels. But anyone who could tell a story, particularly a crime story, was sure of an audience. So I told them thrillers of my own invention, in which the Christian message played a central but inconspicuous part.

My most popular hero was a bandit called Pipa, whose name everyone in Rumania knew. I described how my mother, as a girl, had once seen him in court and had never forgotten his savage, hunted looks.

Pipa's parents were wealthy. They died while he was still a boy, leaving him in the care of a guardian, who cheated him of his property. Pipa took work at an inn, where the owner promised to keep his wages for him until he returned from military service, so that he could set up his own business. When Pipa returned from the army, the inn-keeper denied their agreement, and in blind fury the youth stabbed him to death.

Pipa became an outlaw. From his mountain lair he made a series of raids - all on inns. Over the years he killed thirty-six inn-keepers. (Amazed whistles from my listeners at this point.) He did not lack company. With two other outlaws, all in their best stolen clothes, he went down to a village and persuaded three girls to dine with them. They drugged the wine and carried the girls to their cave.

So much was fact; but at this point in my version the girls, awakening, kept their captors at arm's length by telling them stories, in the style of the ~Thousand and One Nights~. These romances ended with the prettiest girl relating the story of the Gospel and winning the outlaws over.

"Pastor," said a forester called Radion, "I've heard many crime stories, but none like yours, which always end with the criminal, the victim and the policeman all going to church together."

Well received also was an epic account of Dillinger, whose progress from hungry down-and-out to America's worst gangster was the pattern for many lives in the cell. A ruined childhood, or social injustice, are the usual preludes to a criminal career, and Dillinger had begun his by robbing a cinema cashier of a few dollars.

When we understood how Pipa and Dillinger had become what they were we could pity them, I said; and from pity came love, and love among mankind was the chief aim of Christianity. We condemn men, but how rarely we offer the love which might save them from crime.

I could have spoken for twenty-four hours a day without exhausting the demand for stories. I began to draw on classics with a Christian viewpoint: Dostoevsky's ~Crime and Punishment~, Tolstoy's ~Resurrection~, told in episodes.

Often the other prisoners told their own stories, farcical, tragic or both. Radion, tall and lean as the trees he used to tend, had led an uneventful life, until the day when he passed through a wood with two friends and looked back to see the forest in flames.

"When we reached the next village we were arrested and charged with starting the fire," he said. "We were beaten until we confessed that we'd done it to sabotage the local 'collective.' But at our trial the real culprit came forward, and we were acquitted.

"We were not freed. They took us back to the police station and said, 'Now confess what else you have done!' Under torture, we confessed to a sabotage plot that was a complete invention. I would have said anything to stop the pain!" They were sentenced to fifteen years each.

There were many stories like this at Craiova. Before long we knew each other inside out. It was a nervous, highly-charged atmosphere. No one could bear contradiction, and all sense of proportion or logic was lost.

When I re-told Knut Hamsun's novel ~Hunger~, many eyes were bright, and a prisoner called Herghelegiu told me, as the group broke up for supper, how touched he had been. I suggested that he might offer a little of his bread to the hodja, who feared that the food might contain pig-fat, forbidden by the Koran. But if Herghelegiu was moved to the heart, he was not moved to the stomach. My proposal was ignored.

The intellectuals were prisoners of words. If someone mentioned an American scientific discovery, it was scoffed at as U.S. propaganda. If someone talked of a modern Russian writer, he would be dismissed as a state-subsidized hack. Catholics rejected unheard the wisdom of Jewish philosophers. The Jews knew little of the thought of the Church.

Once I described a religious book I had been thinking out at nights. Judgment was instantly passed. "Riddled with Lutheranism!" cried one Orthodox listener. "It's easy to see you're a Protestant," said another. Some days later, during a conversation with the same couple, I quoted extensively from ~The Problem of Truth~, by a "great Rumanian writer" called Naie Ionescu. The reception was rapturous. I decided that if ever I wanted a fair hearing for my views, they had better be published anonymously, since both books were the same.

Alexandru, a student, raised patronizing smiles

when he recited some verses of his own. I quietly suggested that he should read another one, which was announced as a Shakespearian sonnet. "Superb!" the critics chorused. Without revealing Alexandru's secret, I told them one should not be over-awed by famous names. Shakespeare, Byron - to take English poets only - often exalted unworthy ideas.

An old cavalry officer disagreed. "I'm no literary man," he said, "but I've always admired Gunga Din. Kipling created a soldier's hero there!"

I said, "Gunga Din may have been a better man than I am, but he gave his life fighting for the British against his own people. What would you say of a Rumanian who died fighting for the Russians against his countrymen?"

An English scholar championed Shakespeare's nobility of thought.

I answered that when Shakespeare was writing, the problems of the Reformation and Puritanism were drawing even street-sweepers into excited argument - yet a historian who had only Shakespeare's plays to read would hardly know that Christianity had reached England.

"In all his plays there is not a single Christian character," I said, "except, perhaps, for poor Cordelia. Claudius slays his rival. The Queen weds her husband's murderer. Hamlet dreams of revenge, will not act and cannot forgive. Polonius is an intriguer. Ophelia's only escape is into insanity. Othello is a professional killer. Desdemona merely plays cow to his bull. Iago is a monster of cynicism and deceit.... Shakespeare was a magnificent poet and a born psychologist, but he had no idea of Christian character."

The scholar said, "Perhaps there's really no such thing as 'Christian character' to describe."

I told him that I knew he had been in prison only a few weeks; when he had been there longer, he would know better. He would see some of the goodness which I had experienced: the sinners who confessed with their last breath, the saints who forgave their murderers, as we hope to be forgiven in the end.

And I quoted to him some lines which showed how great a Christian poet was lost in Shakespeare:

> They say the tongues of dying men enforce > attention like deep harmony.
> Their words are scarce, they're seldom spent > in vain
> For they breathe truth that breathe their words > in pain.

How well he could have applied this passage to the last words of Jesus on the Cross.

3

The little hodja had much to teach about submission to the will of God. He often reminded us that every chapter of the Koran, the most widespread book in the world after the Bible, begins with the invocation, "In the name of Allah, the Merciful, the Compassionate," and he tried to make this precept a part of everyday life. Five times a day, Nassim knelt on the hard floor and made obeisance in the direction of Mecca.

Men made fun of him, I told them: "When an Englishman asks for bread, a German for brot, and Italian for pane, they are all asking for the same thing. Gheorghe is a Catholic, so he makes the sign of the Cross like this. Carol, an Orthodox believer, makes it like that. Ion, a Baptist, clasps his hands. So why shouldn't Nassim address his prayers to the East? We all approach God differently, but He sees past our gestures of love and honor into the heart. That is where we should look, too."

Nassim and I had many talks, sitting alongside on a low bunk amid the squalor and confusion of the cell. He spoke of his faith which Moslems believe was revealed to the Prophet by the Angel Gabriel - with a fervor that momentarily transformed that dismal place. To my surprise, he talked of Jesus with great love.

"Jesus is for me a most holy and wise prophet, who speaks the language of God himself. But he cannot in our view be the Son of God. I hope I haven't offended you."

"By no means," I replied. "In fact I agree with you.

"How can a Christian say that?"

"I say it because a son results from a man and a woman making love. No Christian believes in that sense that Jesus is the son of God. We call him 'Son of God' in another, unique sense, as an emanation from the Creator. He is the Son because he bears the very stamp of God, as a man does of his father. He is the Son in the way he brims over with love and truth. In those ways we have no doubt of it."

"In that way I, too, can accept," said Nassim, with his grave Muslim smile.

Jesus turns away nobody who loves him, even if a man does not know the true title of the One he loves. The penitent thief spoke of Him only as a man, but Jesus promised that he should sup in paradise.

4

Prisoners came and went; only the air never changed. Each time men left, others took their place, and I started my "parish work" again.

Among newcomers was General Calescu, a former head of Military Justice who loved to fight his battles over again. Most had taken place, he admitted, in the "boudoir," and his best days were during the war. "So many pretty spies - I always tried to let them off if they were kind to me!"

When Calescu was not talking of women, it was food. One evening, he announced, "Today's my birthday: I invite you all to dinner!" And since he had spent many happy anniversaries in Paris as a young man - "We shall repair to Maxims. Be my guests!" For an hour or two, regardless of expense, he regaled us on the best the house could offer. "Maitre d'h‟tel!" he called. "What do you recommend? A ~bouillabaise~ of every fish, swimming in rich saffron sauce? Perhaps too much to start with? How about ~foie gras~, with truffles, from P,rigord, with hot toast and fresh Normandy butter? All quite simple! Then ~canard … l'orange - you like duck, don't you, pastor? Or a ~coq au vin~? And, for the hodja, ~shaslik~ on a flaming sword!"

Each dish was accompanied by an elegaic list of wines: Burgundy and Hock, a magnum of champagne, a golden Chateau Yquem, liqueurs and old brandy. Cigars were chosen: Henry Clay, Romeo y Julietta. There was no stopping this panorama of pleasures. Then the door opened, and in came the usual barrel of rotting tripe and cabbage.

In this talk of food, as in day-dreams of sex, imagination took over. Simpler souls than Calescu invented fantasies of chicken stuffed with bananas, potatoes piled with strawberry jam and many other dishes now fortunately lost to mind. In fact, the food at Craiova was the worst I encountered anywhere except for one day, when to our complete and unbelieving surprise, the guards brought in a canister of onion soup, another of stew with real meat, white mashed potatoes, fresh carrots, two bread rolls for each man and a big basket of apples. We almost expected one of Calescu's cigars to complete the meal.

What did it mean? Prisoners see great significance in the slightest change in their routine, and we hoped for new wonders. During the afternoon General Calescu called excitedly from the window, "Women, dammit - and they're leaving!" A crowd gathered round the bars and peered down. Half-a-dozen well-dressed women were being led towards the gate by the commandant. They were, said a guard, a delegation of "democratic women" from the West, leaving after an hour, with comments on the excellence of the food.

The meals were even worse during the following week. Later we heard that the visitors' eye-witness reports on Rumania's model prisons were circulated in Britain, France and the United States.

5

There were several of these guided tours at the time. When the Russian leadership changes hands there is usually a brief thaw, and now, after a hidden struggle among Stalin's successors, Marshal Bulganin emerged as Chairman of the Council of Ministers.

Calescu said that the rise to power of this former War Minister means that "the Americans would have to fight at last." Prison rumor supported his opinion. President Eisenhower's "very words" on the question were quoted: "I have only to do up the last button on my uniform and the captives of Eastern Europe will be free!"

Calescu's dream was that once the Red armies had been routed, the king would return to his throne. This faith in the monarchy was shared by the majority of farmers and landworkers. Their reasoning was simple: 'When the king was here, I had my field and my cattle. Now he's gone I have nothing."

On Rumania's former national day, many in the cell joined in a service which included prayers for King Michael and the Royal family. The informers decided that it would be safer to look the other way. But our cell republican, the schoolmaster

Constantinescu, argued against the monarchy and its "futile ceremonial."

Radion, the forester, said, "Pomp and glory may mean nothing to you, but to a king they come naturally. He doesn't need to strive for them. He's not like a politician, who has to make a name with wars and revolutions, and does so always at our expense. He leaves us in peace. That's why I'm for the king!"

Radion also bested General Calescu, who liked to joke about religion.

"If Jesus could really turn wine into water," Calescu said, "why didn't he set up shop and make a fortune?"

Radion said, "No one alive can prove that the Savior performed this miracle, surely. But I can give you the evidence of my own eyes that He can turn wine into furniture."

"Amazing!" tittered Calescu.

"Yes," said Radion. "Before my conversion I used to spend every penny on drink, and my wife didn't have so much as a chair to sit on. When I gave it up, we saved the money and furnished our home instead."

The spring brought news, this time official, which put an end to General Calescu's war games. The Russians had promised to withdraw their troops from Austria, and the first "summit meeting" between East and West after ten years of cold warfare was to take place in Geneva.

Soon "peaceful co-existence" was all the rage. Constantinescu was full of it. "Why shouldn't the West live harmoniously with the Communist East?" he demanded.

I said, "I'm no politician, but I know that the Church, at least, can never make peace with atheism, any more than police can make peace with gangsters, or disease with health."

"You hate atheists, then?" said Constantinescu.

I replied, "I hate atheism as a creed, but I love atheists, just as I hate blindness, but love the blind. Since atheism is a form of spiritual blindness, it must be fought."

Constantinescu's long face registered mock surprise. "You talk of fighting, pastor? I thought Christians turned the other cheek. Didn't St. Francis save a wolf from those who wanted to kill him, and say,

'Don't kill brother wolf, he is one of God's creatures.'"

"I admire St. Francis deeply," I replied, "but if I don't shoot brother wolf he will eat sister sheep. My duty to kill the wolf if I can't control him is inspired by love. Jesus told us to love our enemies, but He himself used force when there was no other way. God takes thousands of lives daily: it is in His nature to give death, as well as life."

A newcomer to Craiova, the engineer Glodeanu, said he had heard BBC broadcasts which took the line that the Western powers should no longer try to interfere in the internal affairs of the Communist bloc.

I objected, "But if I start to knock a hole in a boat which we are sharing, and say, 'Don't interfere - this is my side of the boat,' will you agree? No! The hole in my side will end by drowning us all!" The Communists, I went on, had seized whole countries and tried to poison youth with hatred. Their plan to overturn the established order all over the world was not an internal affair.

"It's international banditry!" said Calescu.

Constantinescu rallied. "The West can't always be right, general," he said, "and Stalin wasn't wholly evil. He could say, 'Man is our most precious capital.'"

"So that's why we're kept locked up," snorted Calescu. But Constantinescu insisted that there had been industrial, and even cultural, progress under Communism. "You can't deny that," he said.

I replied, "A visitor to Egypt in ancient times would have been amazed by Pharaoh's monuments, but God did not admire them. They were the work of slaves, whom God sent Moses to free. In Russia and the satellites today, slave labor is building the houses, factories and schools you talk about. And what is being taught in the schools? Hatred of everything Western."

"The Communists say they plan for the future!" said Constantinescu. "A generation or two may be sacrificed, but the basis is being laid for the future good of mankind."

I said, "To make future generations happy, men must be good themselves. But Communist leaders are constantly denouncing one another as the worst of criminals. The most powerful men in the Soviet Union have been murdered by their own comrades. What Communist can be happy, knowing he may fall in the next Party purge?"

"There is good in them," Constantinescu objected. "No man is entirely bad, and Communists are men, who keep something of God's image."

My reply was: "I agree. There was even good in Hitler. He improved the lot of most Germans. He made his country the strongest in Europe. His death with Eva Braun in the bunker, his marriage with her at the last moment, might be considered moving. But who would make this point, when he murdered so many millions? Hitler gained the world for Germany, and destroyed its soul, even before his defeat. Communist successes have also been made at the expense of the soul, by crushing man's most vital element, his personality."

"You cannot tar all Communists with the same brush," said Constantinescu. "Tito, for instance, is regarded as a mild dictator."

"But they all have one aim: to carry the Communist revolution through the world, and uproot religion. 'Mild' Tito has killed thousands of enemies, and jailed his friends."

"I still say there's been progress," said Constantinescu.

"For my part, I admire no progress that is bought with tears and blood, however impressive it may look from outside. Never has any people chosen Communism in a free election, or got rid of it with another."

"The world wants peace; what's your alternative - atomic war?"

I said, "Nuclear war is not the alternative; nobody wants that. The world has a great problem with drug addiction, but we don't think of adopting Hitler's solution of herding the addicts into gas chambers. All the same, we can't settle down to 'peaceful coexistence' with the dope traffic; a solution must be found, even if we have to struggle for fifty years. How can we live peacefully with people who cannot stay at peace among themselves, because all their leaders want is power and then more power? The Communists lull our suspicions while they plan their next grab."

I could make no impression on Constantinescu's resolve to take Soviet gestures at their face value. Leaning out from my bunk, I snatched his pillow - the small, lumpy bundle of personal things he used as a head-rest. His skull hit the wall. He was furious.

"But why can't you co-exist peacefully with me?"

I asked. "I'm ready to be friends, now I've stolen all you have."

But I had to restore his property before the talk turned to other things.

Constantinescu was a victim of wishful thinking about Communism. Men trained in the school of Lenin and Stalin see goodwill as weakness to be exploited. For their own good we must work for their defeat. Love is not a universal panacea, it does not take the place of corn plaster. Communist rulers are criminals on an international scale, and only when the criminal is vanquished does he repent; only then can he be brought to Christ.

In the Roman Senate, whenever a problem was raised, Cato would reply, "First destroy our enemy Carthage and then all things can be arranged! ~Delenda est Carthaga!~" I was sure that the fate of the West was either to destroy Communism or be destroyed by it.

6

A desire to show Communism in a better light before the summit meeting diminished some of the worst excesses in the prison system. At Salcia, where punishments had included hanging prisoners by the heels and plunging women in icy water for hours, the whole staff was arrested. Official evidence said fifty-eight people had died in the competitions between "brigade leaders" to see who could work to death the most prisoners - in fact, Salcia survivors who came to Craiova said there had been at least 800 deaths.

With a show of judicial indignation, the Salcia staff were given long sentences, and the purge had a chastening effect in other jails. Beatings stopped. Guards became carefully polite. When the Jilava commandant, Colonel Gheorghiu, asked for complaints, and had a plate of barley thrown at him, the culprit suffered nothing worse than a day in solitary confinement.

page 169 In God's Underground

The reforms were short-lived. Soon beatings and insults became routine once more; and a year or so later, when the trials had been forgotten abroad, the mass-murderers of Salcia were reinstated, with promotion. Only the common-law prisoners, who had acted as their tools in torturing others, stayed in prison.

During this shake-up in the jails, I was moved several times. These nightmare journeys have merged into one in my mind. I close my eyes and see a frieze of stubble-chinned, shaven-headed convicts, jogging gently with the movement of the train. Always we wore fifty-pound chains, which chafed us through our clothes and made sores that took months to heal in our under-nourished state.

On one journey we came to a halt during the night, and the silence was broken by a wail of anguish: "I've been robbed!"

I sat up to find little Dan, a petty crook from Bucharest, moving from one prone figure to the next, shaking everyone awake. Dan was cursed and cuffed, but he went on howling, "I had five hundred lei hidden away and it's gone! It's all I had in the world!"

In the hope of quieting him, I said, "My friend, I hope you don't suspect a pastor of stealing, but if you do you may search me to the skin."

The others also allowed Dan to search them for the sake of peace, but nothing was found. The train moved off at last and, one by one, we fell asleep. I was awakened at dawn by a new and worse uproar. All the other eighteen prisoners had been robbed as well.

"I knew we had a thief among us!" Dan cried.

Days later, at Poarta-Alba, our next stop, I told the story to a man serving a year for theft. Bursting with laughter, he said, "I've known Dan for years. He simply wanted to find out where each of you kept anything worth lifting!"

There were many "Dans" at Poarta-Alba, where "politicals" and common criminals were held together. Once I dozed off while a group were playing with home-made dice. A tickle on my foot awoke me. I sat up rubbing my eyes, to find a prisoner unlacing one of my shoes. The other was already off.

"What are you doing with my shoes?" I demanded.

"I've just won them at dice," he grinned, and was offended when I would not give them up.

It is a world apart, the world of thieves. I found that they like to talk of their exploits, the riskier the better. They loved the excitement as other men love drink, gambling or women. I wondered at the dedication they brought to their work.

One evening, when most prisoners were outside, the door crashed open and the guards flung in a pickpocket, known to everyone as "Fingers." He rolled on the floor, gasping and groaning, as I helped him to his bunk. Soaking a rag in water, I began to wash the blood from his swollen mouth. It seemed he had been pilfering from the kitchen.

"You're not a bad sort, Pastor," Fingers said. "When I get out and make my next good haul, I won't forget your share."

I said I hoped he would find a better means of living. He laughed. "They're wasting their time beating me," he said. "I love my work. I'll never give it up."

I put my arm around his shoulder and told him, "Thank you. You've taught me a great lesson."

"What do you mean?" Fingers asked.

"If beatings don't persuade you to give up your ways, why should I listen to those who want me to change mine? I must put at least as much thought into winning a soul as you do into pulling off your next coup. The more I listen to the stories which you and your friends tell, the more I learn."

He grinned painfully, "You're joking, Pastor."

"No," I said. "For example, you work at night, and if you fail the first night, you try again the next. So I, as a pastor, should spend my night in prayer, and if I don't get what I want, I shouldn't give up. You steal from others, but there is honesty among thieves: we Christians should be as united among ourselves. And although you risk your liberty and lives for money, as soon as you get it you throw it right and left; we should not overvalue money, either. You thieves don't let punishment deter you, nor should we shrink from suffering. Just as you hazard everything, so too, should we, knowing there is a paradise to win.

The prison at Poarta-Alba consisted of the remains of the labor camp beside the canal project on which my wife had been forced to work. I knew that now she was living somehow in Bucharest. No hour passed without thoughts of her. We lived in long, bare huts which held fifty men each. All around were derelict barracks and vegetable patches which Sabina must have known. This melancholy comfort was taken from me when, after a few weeks, I was told to prepare for another move.

Fingers came up to say goodbye. With him was an associate called Calapod, a villainous bandit who had been feared throughout the countryside. He slapped me on the back, shouting, "So this is the Holy Reverend who likes thieves and robbers!"

"Mr. Calapod," I said, "Jesus did not mind comparing himself with a thief. He promised, 'I will come as a thief in the night.' Just as those whom you have robbed never knew you were coming, so one night Jesus will come for your soul, and you will not be ready."

7

Weeks in the dank chill of Craiova and Poarta-Alba, and on journeys in chain-gangs, worsened my tuberculosis. I arrived at my next prison at Gherla, in the Transylvanian mountains, in such a state that I was put into one of a group of cells known as "the hospital." Our doctor, a young woman called Marina, said this was her first post. Other patients told me that on her first day she had turned pale as she went from cell to cell. Nothing in her training had prepared her for the dirt, the hunger, the lack of simple medicines and equipment, the uncaring cruelty. They thought she was going to faint, but she carried on.

Marina was a tall, fragile girl with fair hair framing an exhausted face. After an examination, she told me, "You need good food and plenty of fresh air."

I could not help laughing. "But don't you know where we are, Dr. Marina?"

Tears rose in her eyes. "That's what I learned at medical school."

Some days later, high-ranking officers came on a visit. Dr. Marina tackled them in the gallery outside our cells. "Comrades, these men haven't been sentenced to death. The state pays me to keep them alive, just as it pays you to keep them safe. I only ask for conditions which will allow me to do my job."

A man's voice said, "So you side with convicted outlaws!"

"They may be outlaws to you, Comrade Inspector," she replied, "but to me they are patients."

Conditions got no better, but instead we had news that was worth all the drugs in the pharmacopoeia to me. Before the summit meeting at Geneva, visits by relatives were to be allowed.

Excitement mounted high. We were all nervous. At one moment a man would be filled with joy; at another, near to tears. Some had been ten or twelve years without news of their families. I had not seen Sabina for eight.

The day came, and when my name was called I was marched into an echoing hall and made to stand behind a table. Some twenty yards further on, I saw my wife, behind another table. The commandant, flanked by officers and guards, stood near the wall between us, as if ready to umpire a tennis match.

I gazed at Sabina, and it seemed to me that in the years of her suffering she had achieved a peace and beauty such as I had never seen before. She stood there with folded hands, smiling.

Gripping the table, I called, "Are you well at home?"

My voice sounded strange in the room. She replied, "Yes, we are all well, thank God."

The commandant broke in, "You are not allowed to mention God here."

"My mother is still alive?" I asked.

"Praise God, she is alive."

I HAVE TOLD YOU THAT YOU ARE NOT ALLOWED TO MENTION GOD."

Then Sabina asked, "How is your health?"

"I am in prison hospital -"

The commandant: "You are not allowed to say where you are in prison."

I tried again, "About my trial, is there hope of an appeal?"

The commandant: "You are not allowed to discuss your trial."

So it went on, until I said, "Go home, Sabina, dear. They won't let us speak."

My wife had brought a basket of food and clothes, but she was not allowed to give me as much as an apple. As they took me away I looked over my shoulder and saw her being escorted by armed guards through the door at the further end of the hall. The commandant lit a fresh cigarette, his thoughts elsewhere.

That evening, Dr. Marina stopped at the foot of my bed. "Oh dear!" she said, "and I thought your wife's visit would do you so much good."

We became friends. She told me that she had been taught nothing about religion, but supposed herself to be an atheist. "Isn't everyone, these days?"

One day, when alone with Marina and another Christian prisoner in the little cubicle which served her as a surgery, I mentioned that it was the day of Pentecost.

"What is that?" she asked. A guard on orderly duties was going through the files, so I waited until he left with the card he wanted. Then I replied, "It's the day on which God gave us the Ten Commandments, thousands of years ago."

I heard the guard's returning footsteps and added loudly, "And it hurts here, doctor, when I cough."

The guard returned the card to the files and moved off again, so I continued, "Pentecost is also the day on which the Holy Spirit came to the Apostles.

Again the warder's footsteps, so I continued hastily, "And at night the pain in my back is terrible."

Dr. Marina bit her lips to stop laughing. I went on with my interrupted sermon, while she tapped my chest, and told me to cough and peered down my throat, until at last she burst into laughter. "Do stop!" she gasped, holding a handkerchief to her mouth as the guard's stolid face again appeared in the doorway. "Tell me later."

I told her the story of the Gospel in the weeks that followed, and when I, and others at Gherla, had brought Dr. Marina to Christ she took even greater risks to help us.

Years later, in another prison, I heard that she had died of rheumatic fever which had affected her heart. She had always overworked herself.

8

I was moved back to Vacaresti, the prison-hospital where I had spent a month after my solitary confinement in the cells beneath the Ministry of the Interior. The place was more crowded than ever. Tubercular patients had to share rooms and exchange infections with sufferers from other diseases.

Two Secret Police officers who came to interrogate me asked quizzically what I thought of Communism now. "How am I to say?" I replied. "I know it only from the inside of its prisons."

They grinned, and one said, "Now you can learn about it from a VIP; Vasile Luca - the old Minister of Finance - is in your cell."

Luca's dismissal for currency scandals in March 1953 had helped to bring down the Ana Pauker clique. With Theohari Georgescu, Minister of the Interior, he had been expelled from the Party, and now all three were in various prisons with the victims of their five-year reign. In his days of power, Luca was much flattered, but little loved. Now guards and prisoners took the chance to show their contempt. Luca sat alone, in a corner of our cell, biting his knuckles and muttering to himself; old, ill, and unrecognizable as the man whose photograph had appeared so regularly in the newspapers.

Luca could find no relief from his sufferings. A Christian, whatever his troubles, knew that for his faith he was treading the road that Christ had trod, but Luca, who had worked all his life for Communism had neither hope nor belief left. If the Nationalists came to power, or the Americans arrived, Luca and his comrades would be the first to hang. In the meantime, they were punished by their former Party friends. Luca was close to the breaking point when we met.

After his political disgrace, he told me, he was forced to confess under torture to absurd charges. A military court condemned him to death, but the sentence was commuted to life imprisonment.

"They knew I wouldn't last for long," he said, coughing.

He was given to outbursts of rage against his Party enemies. One day, when he could not eat the food pushed into our cell, I offered him my bread. He took it hungrily.

"Why did you do that?" he growled.

"I've learned the value of fasting in prison."

"And what might that be?"

I said, "Firstly, it shows that the spirit is master of the body. Secondly, it saves me from the quarrels and hard feelings over food which are so common. Thirdly - well, if a Christian does not fast in jails, what means has he of helping others?"

Luca admitted that the only help he had been given since his arrest had come from Christians. Then his bile rose again.

"But I know far more clergymen who are first-rate scoundrels. As one of the Party's Central Committee I kept a firm hand on sects and religions. My department had a file on every priest in the country including you. I began to wonder if there was a priest in Rumania who wouldn't soon be knocking at my back door after dark. What a band of brothers!"

I said that man might degrade religion, but religion ennobled man much more. This was shown by the host of saints: not only those of old, but the many great Christians who could be met today.

Luca grew angry. His spite against the world would not allow him to admit goodness in anyone. He recited familiar atheist arguments about the Church's persecution of science. I reminded him of the great scientists who have been Christians - from Newton and Kepler to Pavlov and the discoverer of anaesthetics, Sir James Simpson.

Luca said, "They conformed to the conventions of the time."

I said, "Do you know the declaration of Louis Pasteur, who discovered microbes and vaccination? 'Je crois comme une charbonniŠre le plus que je progresse en science.' He believed like a coalminer, like a woman coalminer of the last century. This man who spent most of his life at the head of a body of scientific studies had the faith of the simplest human creature."

Luca said indignantly, "What of all the scientists the Church has persecuted?"

I asked if he could name them.

"Galileo, of course, who went to prison. Giordano Bruno, whom they burned..." He stopped.

I said, "So you can only find two cases in two thousand years! That's a triumph for the Church by any human standards. Compare the Party record in the last ten years, here in Rumania alone. Many thousands of innocent people,shot, tortured and imprisoned; you yourself sentenced on the strength of perjured evidence obtained by threats and bribes! How many miscarriages of justice do you think there have been in all the countries under Communist rule?"

One evening I spoke of the Last Supper, and Jesus's words to Judas, "What you have to do, do quickly."

Luca said, "Nothing will make me believe in God, but if I did, the one prayer I'd make to Him would be, What you have to do, do quickly.'"

His condition worsened. He spat blood, and in his fever a cold sweat broke out on his forehead.

At this time I was moved to another prison. Before I left, he promised to give thought to his soul. I have no way of knowing what happened, but when a man starts to argue with himself, the chances of finding the truth are small. Conversions are usually instantaneous. The message pierces the heart, and from its depths something new and healing breaks out at once.

I met many like Luca at that time, and often discussed with friends how Communist leaders and their collaborators should be dealt with when Communism fell. Christians opposed revenge but were divided among themselves: some who thought that forgiveness should be complete, and those who said that Jesus - in telling Peter to forgive men who had wronged him "Not seven times, but seventy times seven" - had fixed a limit which the Communists had long overstepped.

My view is that, having judged each man singly, with understanding of the evil forces that made him, we have only the right, without being vindictive, to put the wrongdoer into a position where he can do no further harm. Communists already spend much time and effort in punishing each other. Stalin poisoned Lenin, it is said. He had Trotsky murdered with an ice-pick. Khrushchev so hated his "comrade" that he destroyed his reputation and despoiled his tomb. Luca, Theohari Georgescu, Ana Pauker and so many more were victims of their own cruel system.

9

My next journey was by road, in a truck labeled "State Food Trust." Security vans often bore such signs so that people should not know how many were on the move, and perhaps also for fear of rescue attempts. Two men were with me. One was a former Iron Guard leader serving a twenty-year sentence. The other, a minor thief, was due to be freed shortly after doing six months.

"I won't see these again," said the Iron Guard cheerfully, shaking his shackles. Then, turning his back to me, he told the thief that it had been agreed to free all "politicos" before the summit meeting, and that he would be among the first to be released. The thief explained in turn that all he wanted was a decent job, but nobody would give him one.

The Iron Guard sympathized. Then, seizing his neighbor by the sleeve, he said, "I've an idea! Why can't we help each other? Now the Russians have given way, the Americans will be here within the month. I have influential friends among them. Supposing we changed identities - at the next stop, you answer to my name and I to yours. As soon as they let me go in your place, I'll start preparing the way for the American take-over. You, bearing my name, will be released as a political prisoner on the day they arrive. Leave the rest to me - your future will be made!"

The thief was enraptured. When the van pulled up in the prison yard, the two men answered to each other's names and were marched to different compounds. Ten days later, the Iron Guard who had gone to the short-service section was released. The thief saw weeks and months go by without news of the Americans. Faced by the prospect of fulfilling the other man's sentence to the end, he told the commandant the truth. The Iron Guard was hunted down, and the thief expected to be freed at last. Instead, he was tried for helping a Fascist criminal to escape and was given a twenty-year sentence of his own. So the two men had to go on living together - like so many others who had wronged one another.

The new prison was called Jilava, which means "wet place" in Rumanian. It was justly named. To enter it, the truck drove down a steep ramp, and we sank below the earth into darkness. The deepest levels of Jilava were more than 30 feet below ground. It had been designed as a fortress, with trenches around, and strangers could pass by unaware of its existence.

page 179 In God's Underground

Sheep grazed above it, and we felt buried alive, under thousands of tons of earth. Jilava was intended to hold 500 troops, but now it had to keep 2,000 prisoners in a series of ill-lit cells and tunnels which now and then widened out into small courtyards where men exercised. At some points streams ran down the walls, which were stained with great patches of green damp.

The man in the next bunk to me, a former police chief from Odessa, Colonel Popescu, said conditions were far worse when he arrived. A hundred men had been crushed together in our small cell with the windows boarded up, and some had died from suffocation.

Popescu told me he had hidden from the Russians for twelve years after the war in a cave with the entrances blocked up. He slept on straw and ate what friends pushed in through a small hole. But in the end, the Secret Police found him. Crouching in that cramped space so long, his legs had become paralyzed. It was months before he could walk.

It was plain from Popescu's ribald talk that religion had been outside his thoughts for many years. I asked how he had passed the time in his lonely cave.

"I composed a novel," he said. "If I wrote it down, it would run to five thousand pages. But no one would dare to publish it."

I saw why, when Popescu recited bits of it. Never have I heard such a torrent of obscenity.

Our meal was announced by a shout from the corridor. I took my rotten-carrot soup over to a neighbor's bunk, and we sat talking for a while. He was a young radio engineer who had sent information to the West for a patriotic group, and he mentioned that he had been brought to Christ through his knowledge of Morse.

"It happened five or six years ago. I was interrogated in the cells of the Ministry of Interior and, while I was there, an unknown pastor next door tapped Bible verses to me through the wall."

When he told me the position of his cell, I said, "I was that pastor."

With his help I built up a nucleus of Christians who spread their influence through the prison. But there was one man whom everyone left alone.

Gheorge Bajenaru was the son of an Orthodox bishop. He was known as "the wickedest priest in Rumania." He forged his father's signature to honors and degrees. He embezzled the funds from a school where his wife was headmistress. When she committed suicide to conceal his guilt, Bajenaru showed no remorse. He even informed on his own father for money. Then he went to the West, posing as a refugee. He was made a bishop, with charge over all Rumanian Orthodox exiles. He obtained funds from them, and from the World Council of Churches. Meanwhile the Communists waited.

Bajenaru had been a worldly, arrogant man, built like a bull, but now he was thin and shrunken. He told me what had happened. He had gone to Austria for the wedding of a wealthy Rumanian, and stayed on a few days. Leaving a restaurant in the French sector one night, he heard steps behind him. A club came down on his head. Bajenaru recovered in a moment, and turned to fight. Four men grappled with him. He felt a needle jab into his leg.

"I woke up in the Soviet zone. There was a looking glass on the wall, and I didn't know the man who looked back at me. My black beard had gone. They had cropped my hair and dyed it red. I was flown to Moscow. Interrogators in the Lubianka prison thought I might be a key figure in the Anglo-American spy world. They wanted to know what the World Council of Churches was planning to do behind the Iron Curtain and about the intrigues of Rumanian exiles in the West. I could tell them nothing. I had merely been enjoying myself. The Russians wouldn't believe me. 'Very well, Your Grace,' they said, 'we shall stimulate your memory in the surgery.'"

Bajenaru held up his hands to show that nearly all the fingernails were gone.

"They broke them one by one," he said. "The doctor was in white. So were the two nurses. There was every scientific aid you can think of, except anaesthetics."

page 181 In God's Underground

Bajenaru was tortured for weeks. He was close to insanity when the Russians, deciding that he had nothing for them at all, passed him on to the Secret Police in Bucharest. There he was again tortured.

At Jilava his interrogation was still going on, and when he returned to our cell from questioning, prisoners accused him of informing. In fact, he wished only to atone for what he had done. Suffering had purified him. But the others could not believe it, although Bajenaru showed his change of heart in many ways. Once, when he held a public liturgy, praying aloud for the king and the royal family, someone told the guards. He was sent to the "Black Room" with myself and some other clergy who were among the informer's victims.

We were driven down a steep flight of steps to a windowless, underground chamber in the depths of the fort, which was probably an old ammunition store: no shell could penetrate there. Water, dripping from the roof, kept the floor of the "Black Room" awash, and even in summer it was bitterly cold. "We must keep moving," said a voice in the pitch darkness. So we began to walk in a circle, slipping on the slimy floor, and we kept on until many hours later, exhausted and bruised from falls, we were let out.

Others said we had been lucky. Men were often stripped to the skin before being locked in the "Black Room." The story of how one group of eighteen had survived in it for two days was still told. They were all middle-aged or elderly members of the National Peasant Party. To avoid freezing to death they formed themselves into a human snake in the darkness. Each man clung to the one in front for warmth as they stamped around in an endless circle, splashed from head to foot in filth. Often a man collapsed, but the others always dragged him up from the water and forced him on.

Bajenaru continued to pray for the king. When at last he was sent for trial, he returned to say calmly that he had been sentenced to death. He had achieved humility. I have noticed that humble men, who had sinned grossly, can often resist persecution better than Christians of high spirituality. St. John Chrysostomos, who lived in the days of the Roman chariot races, once said, "If a car drawn by the horses of Righteousness and Pride were matched with another drawn by Sin and Humility, I believe the second chariot would reach Heaven first."

Colonel Popescu suggested to Bajenaru that he should appeal for mercy. Bajenaru replied, "I do not recognize these judges. I obey God and the king."

When Bajenaru had been moved to the condemned cell, Popescu said, "Perhaps we were wrong in trying to be his judges, too."

We heard nothing of him for four months; then he returned to our cell, his sentence commuted to life imprisonment. Although his whole character had changed, the majority of prisoners would not accept him. "Another trick, you devil!" they said. It was unjust. Bajenaru had been offered release if he agreed to work for the Secret Police. He replied, "I'll leave prison when the last priest goes free."

His reprieve was regarded as suspicious because it was more common for a sentence to be increased than lessened. At any time, under Communism, the State can obtain a more severe penalty for a sentenced man. In fact, a prisoner who had served twelve years of a life sentence had been told, without explanation, that his sentence had been reviewed. He was shot next day.

Bajenaru was shifted to another cell, where he was kicked and beaten by the prisoners. Twice he attempted suicide. Then he was transferred to another jail, where he died.

10

The first execution while I was at Jilava was of two brothers, named Arnautoiu. They had lived in the forest for years as partisans, until a woman who visited their hideout was trailed by soldiers and they were caught.

Executions were conducted with grim ceremonial.

page 183 In God's Underground

Before midnight, guards lined the corridors, and from the cells hundreds of eyes watched through cracks and spy-holes as the commandant led a small procession out into the yard. Two senior officers came first; then the brothers carrying their chains, each gripped by a guard on either side, and followed in turn by a doctor and guards with machine guns. We heard the clang of hammer blows in the cold morning air, as the men's chains were struck off. Sacks were pulled over their heads and they were pushed into the car which drove them a short distance to a field, where they were shot in the back of the head at point blank range. We heard the shooting.

The executioner was a man of gypsy blood called Nita, who received a bonus of 500 lei on each occasion. He was the best-mannered guard we had: they called him the Black Angel of Jilava.

"I always give them a last cigarette in the cell before their time comes," he told us. "I try to keep their courage up, and it's not so hard as you might suppose, because every one of them thinks to the last moment that he'll be saved."

This happened in the instance of a youth of nineteen, called Lugojanu. His father, a former government minister, had been tortured to death in prison. The boy, aided by some friends, made a series of attacks on militiamen in revenge. One of the raiders talked, on being captured, so Lugojanu and eight accomplices were sentenced to die.

The first two were marched out into the yard, then a second pair. The others heard their chains being removed. They heard the shots. They heard the guards coming to fetch the rest. One of them told me later, "I felt perfectly calm. I saw the Holy Virgin and she spoke to me so gently. I was confident that I should be reprieved." The door of the cell opened. It was the commandant. Word had come from Bucharest that the sentences on the remaining men had been commuted. Many times in jail I saw at work this mysterious power which sustains men in their last moments.

page 184 In God's Underground

The Black Angel's politeness was by way of an apology for his hideous job. "I'm no monster," he said, in effect. The other guards, and their trustees among the prisoners, felt no such need.

The spirit in Jilava was particularly bad. It was a transit jail, where men often met old enemies. Many prisoners were former policemen. The old police hands, even those who had worked against Communism, had been kept on for two years to train the Party's candidates. These experienced men were then ordered to arrest some of their own comrades. Then they, in turn, were arrested by the men whom they had trained. After sentence, scores of these police had to share the same cell, for in the end no officer of the old regime escaped the purge.

One day, recriminations were suspended in favor of a new focus for the hatred which festered in them all.

He was thrown into our cell from another - bruised, disheveled, dirty, his jaw hanging loose. He gazed around in terror. Then a roar went up: "Albon!"

The commandant of Poarta-Alba, who was responsible for the deaths of thousands, had been made a scapegoat for the failure of the canal. We remembered how Colonel Albon had greeted new arrivals at his camp. "Professors, doctors, lawyers, priests - all my clever friends! Here we've no use for brains; only for hands, your gentlemanly hands! For your labor, you are paid with the air you breathe. Don't think you'll be freed except by death - or when they stop work on the canal and lock me up!"

Now Albon looked at us like a hypnotized rabbit. A prisoner seized him by the collar and dragged him to his feet. Another swung him round. A third kicked him in the groin. Albon went down under a torrent of blows, shrieking hysterically.

I tried to save him. The men turned on me: "So you side with this murderer!"

Albon struggled up, streaked with blood and dust, amid laughter, jeers and boos. He fell again on his way to the door, cutting himself on the sharp corner of a bunk. In a fresh scrimmage, the shirt was torn from his back. He held his hands before his face to shield it. Finally, he collapsed and lay still on the floor.

Albon was treated like this in cell after cell until he was moved to Ocnele-Mari prison, which the authorities reserved for disgraced officers and officials.

Days later, I recognized another familiar face. Colonel Dulgheru, who had questioned me for a week in solitary confinement, had landed in jail. I told him what happened to Albon, and he tried to keep out of trouble, but it was inevitable that someone else would soon spot him.

He told me he had been accused of being a police spy in pre-Communist days - the usual charge when the Party wanted to incriminate one of its own men - and described how he had been arrested. He went to the cells to interrogate someone, with his retinue of three subalterns. They opened a cell door politely and ushered the colonel in, then closed it again behind him. Dulgheru found himself locked in an empty cell. He banged on the door demanding to be let out. His men laughed. He heard one of them say, "This time, you're the one to stay there!"

When Dulgheru's identity was discovered at Jilava, he also was set upon by the prisoners and had to be removed to Ocnele-Mari. The Party prison soon became as overcrowded as the rest.

Soon after his departure, I was sent for interrogation to Bucharest. Shields like motor-goggles were placed over my eyes before I was taken by car the few miles to the capital. At Secret Police H.Q. the questions of a uniformed colonel seemed designed to sound out my attitude to the regime rather than to get information. He gave me no clue to his real purpose in seeing me.

The place was crowded and "secret" prisoners were sharing cells. I was put with a thick-set, sullen man. He was Vasile Turcanu, the chief "re-educator," who had been sentenced to death by the regime which had once given him license to kill. The Party had kept him alive for three years, intending, in the usual way, to announce his execution when some need for a political distraction arose.

Turcanu described how they had arrested Theohari Georgescu, Minister of the Interior, during the 1953 purge. He was sitting in his office before a row of telephones when three of his own security officers stalked in with revolvers. They made Georgescu face his own portrait, hanging on the wall in its gold frame, while he dropped his trousers for a search.

I tried to bring some Christianity into Turcanu's life in the few hours I was with him, but little could be done for a man so deeply ensnared in doctrines of violence.

The most startling news I gleaned from the cells at Secret Police H.Q. was that Stalin had been denounced as a murderer and tyrant by his successor Khrushchev. The first reports of how Beria and six of his top men were executed on Christmas Eve, 1953 - along with thousands of lesser Soviet secret agents - had just been published, and the process of discrediting Stalin had begun in Rumania. Gheorghiu-Dej, the new Rumanian dictator, was introducing a more popular policy. Dej liked to live well himself, and his temperament, at least, was an improvement on that of the Pauker circle.

11

The news I took back to Jilava threw the cell into uproar. Everyone was delighted that Stalin had been pushed from his pedestal. They hoped it would hasten their own release.

But Popescu said, "I know the Party. They'll denounce the robber - and they won't repay the robbed."

"Anyway, Stalin's finished," another prisoner said.

"May he burn in hell!" shouted a second.

Amid laughter, cheers and jeers, two prisoners waltzed round together, screaming obscene remarks about "Uncle Joe." Only the guards were silent. Stalin's denunciation left their future unsettled.

Popescu called to me, "You're not looking so happy, pastor!"

I said, "I can't take pleasure in explosions of hatred towards anyone. We do not know Stalin's fate. He may have been saved at the last hour, like the thief on the cross."

"What! After all the crimes Stalin had committed?" asked someone.

"Perhaps he is like the rich man who had only moments of repentance in his life, and yet ended in Heaven," I said.

I told them how a man who had lived by exploiting the poor developed a great hatred for the village minister, simply because he was good. When they met in the street, the man spat in the minister's face - and he let him do it, thinking, "This is a pleasure for the poor creature." Once a year, however, the rich man, who was called Bodnaras, went to church. It was always on Good Friday, and as he heard the story of the Crucifixion, two tears would roll down his fat cheeks. He wiped them away quickly and left before the collection was taken.

One Good Friday, a large congregation waited for the service to begin. The minister did not appear, nor did Bodnaras. An hour passed. At last someone looked behind the altar. There was the pastor, stretched on the floor, breathing calmly, his eyes closed and with such a look of bliss on his face that the people saw he was transfigured by a holy ecstasy.

That morning Bodnaras had died and gone to judgment and when the devils placed all his bad deeds upon the scales, his guardian angel had nothing to put on the other side except the two tears he had shed every year. Yet those tears weighed exactly as much as all the evil deeds together.

What could be done? Bodnaras began to sweat and tremble. But just at that moment God looked away and the rich man snatched a few bad deeds off the scale. The balance swung up on the side of Good.

But God sees even when he looks away. He said sadly to the rich man, "Never in all creation has anyone tried to cheat Me on the Day of Judgment." And looking around Heaven, he asked, "Who will defend this man?"

The angels were silent. "Come," said God, "this is not the People's Republic of Rumania. We can't condemn someone without a defense."

Even the rich man's guardian angel shrank from the task. "But," he added, "there is a minister in his town of so saintly a character that he might be willing to speak for him."

So the minister was brought to Heaven, while his body remained below. Bodnaras thought his last chance had gone when he saw the man he had often humiliated, but the pastor accepted the brief at once.

"Heavenly Father," he began, "which of us is better, you or I? If I'm better than You, come down from Your throne and let me take Your place, for every day I allowed Bodnaras the joy of spitting on me, and was free of bitterness. Certainly if I can forgive him, so can You.

"My second plea is that Jesus died on the cross for the sins of man, and although in our unhappy country we may now be punished many times for the same crime, it is not right that Bodnaras should suffer again for his sins, when they have been punished already in Jesus's body.

"And thirdly, God, a practical question - what do You lose if he goes to Heaven? If paradise is too small, You can enlarge it. If You do not wish to put evil among the good, then make another Heaven for lost souls - give them a little happiness, too."

These words were so pleasing to God that He called at once to Bodnaras, "Go now to Heaven!" The rich man scuttled off. Then God turned to the minister, deeply moved, and said, "Stay here a while, and talk with Me."

"Thank You," said the pastor, "but I haven't taken service yet, and everyone in church is waiting to get home to dinner. I must go back and do my duty, and tell men to beware of sin. But I shall teach them also that You fulfill your duty, forgiving us, for Your love is given even to the worst of sinners. If You began to judge man according to his deserts, none of us would escape."

The cell heard this story in silence.

"And would you," Popescu asked, "defend Stalin before God?"

"Who knows if Stalin has not wept over his sins?" I said. "Psychologists say that the worse a man's crimes, the less he is responsible for them. A maniac like Hitler, who burns in ovens millions of harmless people he has never met, a mass-murderer like Stalin who kills thousands of his own comrades - such men are not normal, and we cannot judge them by standards we apply to others."

Colonel Popescu said, "I've heard many Christian teachings in this cell, but this is the best - and the hardest to put into effect."

12

In the spring of 1956 some swallows nested high up in the roof of the cell, near the window. One day a chirp announced that the eggs had hatched. A prisoner stood on another's shoulders and peered in. "Four of them!" he called. The parent birds never seemed to rest. It made a change from talk about our release to count the times they darted in and out to feed the chicks - 250 trips a day! An old countryman said, "They'll fly in twenty-one days." The others laughed. "You'll see," he said. On the twentieth day nothing had happened, but on the twenty-first, with cheeps and flutterings, the young birds flew. We were so pleased. "God has arranged their schedule," I said. "He can do as much for us."

The weeks passed, and it seemed that the denunciation of Stalin did indeed herald another "thaw." It could not last; yet many prisoners were being released under the terms of an amnesty. Would I be one of them? The thought only saddened me: if they let me go now, what use would I be? My son had grown up and could hardly remember his father.

page 190 In God's Underground

Sabina was used to going her own way. The Church had other pastors, who made less trouble.

Early one morning a voice broke into these thoughts: "Interrogation, at once! Move!"

Back to the bullying, the fear, the questions to which I had to find false answers! I started to gather my things, while the guard bellowed, "Come on, come on! The car's waiting." I hurried with him through the corridors and across the yard. One after another the steel gates were unlocked as we climbed the steps. Then I was outside.

There was no car in sight, only a clerk who handed me a slip of paper. I took it. It was a court order and it declared that, under the amnesty, I was free.

I stared at it stupidly. All I could say was, "But I've only done eight and a half years and my sentence is for twenty."

"You're to leave at once. This comes from the highest tribunal."

"I've got nearly twelve years yet to serve."

"Don't argue! Get out!"

"But look at me!" My ragged shirt was gray with dirt. My trousers were a map of colored patches tacked together. My boots might have been borrowed from Charlie Chaplin. "I'll be arrested by the first policeman."

"We've no clothes here for you. Do get off!"

The clerk turned back into the prison. The gate glanced and its bolt was driven home. Outside the prison walls there was not a soul to be seen; I was alone, in an empty, summery world. The warm June day was so quiet that I could hear insects buzzing about on their business. A long, white road stretched away under trees of an amazing deep green. In the shade of a grove of chestnuts, cows were browsing. How still it was!

I called out, so that the guards could hear behind their walls, "God, help me not to rejoice more because I'm free than because You were with me in prison!"

page 191 In God's Underground

It is three miles from Jilava to Bucharest. I heaved my bundle on my shoulder and set off across the fields. It was only a collection of smelly rags, but they had been so precious to me in jail that I never considered leaving them. Soon I left the crown of the road to walk in the deep grass and touch the rough bark of the trees as I went along. Sometimes I stopped to gaze at a flower or a budding leaf.

Two figures came towards me - an old country couple. They stopped me and said curiously, "You come from there?" The man brought out a leu, a coin worth about a penny, and gave it to me. I looked at it in my hand, and almost wanted to laugh. No one had ever given me a leu before.

"Give me your address, so that I may repay you," I said.

"No, no, keep it," he urged me, using "thou," as people do in Rumania to children and beggars.

I went on with my bundle. Another woman stopped me. "You come from there?" She hoped for news of the priest of Jilava village, arrested months before. I had not met him, but explained that I was a pastor myself. We sat on a wall by the roadside. I was so happy to find someone who wanted to talk about Christ that I felt in no hurry to get home. When I went on at last, she, too, brought out a leu: "For the tram fare."

"But I have a leu already."

"Take it for Our Lord's sake, then."

I walked on until I reached a tram stop on the outskirts of the capital. People crowded around me, knowing at once where I had come from. They asked after brothers, fathers, cousins - all had someone in prison. When I boarded the tram, they would not let me pay. Several stood to offer me a seat. Released prisoners in Rumania, far from being outcasts, are highly respected men. I sat with my bundle on my knees, but just as the car started I heard cries from outside. "Stop! Stop!" It was my heart that nearly stopped. We jerked to a halt as a militiaman's motorcycle swerved in front. There had been a mistake - he was coming to take me back! But the driver turned and shouted, "He says there's someone standing on the steps."

Next to me was a woman with a basket of fresh strawberries. I looked at them unbelievingly.

"Haven't you had any this year?" she said.

"Not for eight years," I replied.

She said, "Go on, take some!" and filled my hands with the soft, ripe fruit. I ate them in hungry mouthfuls, like a child.

At last I reached my own front door and hesitated a moment. They were not expecting me, and I was a fearful sight in my filth and rags. Then I opened the door. In the hall were several young people, among them a gawky young man who stared at me and burst out: "Father!"

It was Mihai, my son. He was nine when I left him: now he was eighteen.

Then my wife came forward. Her fine-boned face was thinner, but her hair was still black; I thought she was more beautiful than ever. My eyes blurred. When she put her arms around me, I made a great effort and said, "Before we kiss, I must say something. Don't think I've simply come from misery to happiness! I've come from the joy of being with Christ in prison to the joy of being with Him in my family. I'm not coming from strangers to my own, but from my own in prison to my own at home." She sobbed, and I said, "Now if you wish, you may kiss me." Later, I sang softly a little song I had made for her years before in prison to sing if we ever met again.

Mihai came to say that the place was full of visitors who would not leave without seeing me. Members of our church had been telephoning all over Bucharest; the doorbell rang continuously. Old friends brought new ones. People had to leave so that others could find standing room. Every time I was introduced to a woman, I had to bow politely in my absurd trousers, held up by string. By the time all were gone it was nearly midnight and Sabina pressed me to eat something, but I felt no hunger. I said, "Today we have had happiness enough. Let's make tomorrow a day of fasting in thankfulness, with Holy Communion before supper."

I turned to Mihai. Three of our visitors – one a philosophy professor from the university whom I had not met before – had told me that evening that my son had brought them to faith in Christ. And I had feared that, left without father or mother, he would be lost! I could find no words for my happiness.

Mihai said, "Father, you've gone through so much. I want to know what you've learned from all your sufferings."

I put my arm around him and said, "Mihai, I've nearly forgotten my Bible in all this time. But four things were always in my mind. First, that there is a God. Secondly, Christ is our Savior. Thirdly, there is eternal life. And, fourthly, love is the best of ways."

My son said, "That was all I wanted." Later he told me that he had decided to become a pastor.

In my clean, soft bed that night, I could not sleep. I sat up and opened the Bible. I wanted the Book of Daniel, which had been a favorite, but I could no longer find my way to it. My eye was held instead by a line in the Epistles of St. John. "I have no greater joy than to hear that my children walk in truth." [3JN 1:4] I had this joy, too. I went into my son's room, because I had to be sure that he was really there. In prison I had dreamed so often of this, only to wake in my cell.

It was two weeks before I could sleep regularly. By then I was being treated in the best-placed bed of the sunniest ward of the best possible hospital. As an ex-prisoner, everyone wanted to help me - in the streets, the shops, everywhere - and the stream of visitors began again.

page 194 blank

page 195 In God's Underground

PART SIX

Now that I was free, I longed in the depths of my heart for quietness and rest. But Communism was working everywhere to complete the destruction of the Church. The peace I desired would have been an escape from reality and dangerous for my soul.

I returned to a poor home, but I was luckier than many. We had a tiny two-roomed attic, with hardly any furniture. I slept on an old wooden bed with a soft mattress lent by a neighbor; the bed had a cushion to extend it for my length. Water came from the basement, three floors down, and the nearest lavatory was in another building. I expected nothing better. We all knew in prison of the housing and food shortages, and of church buildings closed or taken over, as ours had been.

Our comfortable flat had been confiscated on my wife's arrest. Because she refused to divorce me after her release, she could not get work and lived in extreme poverty, darning women's stockings and living on the kindness of friends. She said that it would have gone hard for them but for Mihai.

When he was thirteen, Mihai had been allowed to visit his mother during her three years of forced labor on the canal. Deprived of both parents, living on charity, he felt bitter.

"I borrowed the money to go to the camp," he said. "We met in a place where there were two sets of iron bars dividing us. Mother was in prison uniform,

page 196 In God's Underground

dirty and thin. She was half-crying, and had to shout to make me hear. She said, 'Mihai, believe in Jesus and be faithful!' I answered, 'Mother, if in a place like this you can still believe, then so must I.'"

On her return to Bucharest Sabina found that Mihai had become a piano-tuner after being taken on as an apprentice by a tuner at the Opera House: his ear was so true that he was able to work at his craft by himself from the age of eleven. Soon he earned enough to help his mother and send himself to school. It was a poor life, but he had bread.

Mihai's troubles with the Party began early when he won the right granted to model pupils to wear a red tie - and refused to do so because it was "the symbol of the oppressors." Publicly expelled, he was quietly taken back to the school when the fuss died down because his teachers gave only lip-service to the regime. At fourteen, he was expelled again for saying that he had read the Bible for himself and that attacks on religion in the school books were based on falsehoods. Now he was trying to continue his studies in evening classes.

Mihai was a Christian, with no love of Communism. But a song-bird with a nest near a family of crows will fall into discordant notes, and Mihai had heard little else. On the day after my return I had to tell him that he was mistaken in believing that the workers in capitalist countries were dying of hunger. His student friends took it for granted, and one girl told me that she had wept in school over the starving children of America.

Even the best young people seemed confused and disorientated. Not only were they deprived of the chance of reading great Christian authors, but you could not buy the works of thinkers like Plato, Kant, Schopenhauer and Einstein. Mihai's friends said their parents told them one thing, their professors another, and often they asked for my advice.

A young theology student from the university of Cluj wanted help in his thesis.

"What is the subject?" I asked.

"The history of liturgical song in the Lutheran church."

I said, "You should begin by writing that we should not be filling young men's heads with historical trivialities, when tomorrow they may face death for their faith."

"What should I be studying, then?" he asked.

I replied, "How to be ready for sacrifice and martyrdom."

I told him some of the things that I had seen in prison, and soon he was bringing his friends. All had the same trouble as they tried to chart a course. I questioned them about their studies.

One of them said, "Our theology teacher says that God gave three revelations. The first was to Moses. The second was to Christ. And the third was to Karl Marx."

"What does your pastor think of that?"

"The more he talks, the less he seems to say."

The upshot of these conversations was that I agreed to go to Cluj and preach in the cathedral there. The students wanted my books, but all my writings had been banned.

Before I went I had a call to pay, in fulfillment of a promise made in prison to members of the Army of the Lord, a sect which is not unlike the Salvation Army and which was being harassed unrelentingly by the Secret Police. It was several years since I had met the Patriarch Justinian Marina, and I thought that he might help. The harm he had done to the Church was great; it was also in his power to do some good.

I found him walking in the grounds behind his palace. I suspect he chose to see me in the garden because it was free from microphones and away from his eavesdropping clerks. I said, "You are Patriarch and men come to you for places and pensions, and everywhere you must preach and sing - so I thought that I should come and sing to you. It's a song of the Army of the Lord, which I learned in prison." I sang it, and asked him to do something for these good and simple people: "They must not sit in prison for ever, merely because they belong to a certain sect." He said he would try, and we had a long talk.

I tried to call him back to God. I said, "In the Garden of Gethsemane, Jesus called even Judas 'friend,' opening the way to salvation." I wanted to plant a seed from which a change of heart might grow. He listened quietly, and even with humility, but said he could do little because at his side had been put the Metropolitan of Iasi, Justin Moisescu, if he went too far or resigned, Moisescu would replace him as Patriarch and things would be worse. Justinian had kept a kind of respect for me, but although his divided heart did not love what his hand did, his waverings always ended in submission to the Party's demands.

Later I heard he had raised the matter of the "Army" in the Holy Synod, where he was opposed by the Metropolitan – who (above all men in Rumania!) had become accepted as Orthodox representative for the World Council of Churches. Next, he was reproved by the Ministry of Cults for receiving me – his secretary, of course, had reported my visit, just as the Patriarch always reported on his secretary. Justinian had agreed to meet representatives from the "Army," but when they arrived he sent them packing, "So Wurmbrand told you to come, did he? It's time he was back in jail again!"

2

The news that I had promised to deliver a series of talks at Rumania's ancient university town was at once reported to the authorities, with the warning that my real purpose was to attack Marxism and make trouble among the students under the guise of lecturing on Christian philosophy. The zealous informer in this case was a Baptist minister, who told me to my face what he had done.

His action did not surprise me. I had met many of his colleagues since my release – priests, pastors, even bishops, who put in such reports to the Ministry of Cults. Usually, the reports concerned their own flocks, and usually the clergy were ashamed and sorrowful at what they did. They said it was not so much for their own safety, but to save their churches from being closed down. Every town had its Secret Police representatives from the Ministry of Cults, who questioned ministers regularly on the conduct of their congregation; quite apart from politics, they wanted to know which parishioners were frequent communicants, which of them tried to obtain converts, which sins people confessed. Those who refused to answer such questions were dismissed, and if there was no one "suitable" to take over, their churches were shut. So by now Rumania had four categories of ministers: those in prison, those who informed under pressure and tried to keep things back, those who shrugged and did what they were told, and those who had acquired a taste for informing. These were only a few. The more honorable official pastors who did not collaborate soon lost their license to preach. But traitors, like street-walkers, thrive by being brazen, and my Baptist colleague was such a man.

His warning was taken up at once by an official spy called Rugojanu. The Ministry of Cults, too, had its categories. Some of the employees were slack, others used their power to extract "protection money" from the clergy, but Rugojanu was a fanatic who went from church to church, tirelessly sniffing out "counter-revolutionaries." He attended my lectures himself.

At Cluj, on the first evening, there was a group of fifty students and a few teachers of theology. As Darwin and his evolutionary theories were always to the fore in theological classes, I tried to deal with them. I said that the new Rumania, advanced and Socialist, rejected all capitalist ideas; was it not odd that an exception was made for the English bourgeois, Sir Charles Darwin?

Rugojanu, hunched forward in a pew, was staring at me. I looked back at him as I went on. "A doctor's son wants to be a doctor, a composer's son a musician, a painter's son an artist, and so on. If you believe you were created by God, then you will try to become Godlike; if you prefer to believe that you spring from a tribe of apes, you are in danger of turning into a beast."

I started my lectures on a Monday. On Tuesday the audience had doubled. By the end of the week more than a thousand faces looked up at me - the whole university, it seemed, was crowding into the cathedral. I knew that many of them were eager to hear the truth, but feared the consequences of embracing it, so I told them of the advice given me by a pastor who died for his faith at the hands of the Fascists. He said, "You give your body as a sacrifice to God when you give it to all who wish to beat and mock you. Jesus, knowing his crucifixion was near, said, 'My time is at hand.' His time was the time of suffering, and it was His joy to suffer for the salvation of mankind. We, too, should regard suffering as a charge given us by God. St. Paul wrote, in the Epistle to the Romans [ROM 12:1]: 'My brothers, I implore you by God's mercy to offer your very selves to Him: a living sacrifice dedicated and fit for His acceptance.'"

I looked out at the silent congregation. It was, for a moment, as if I were back in my church during the war on the day when the Iron Guard bullies filed in with their guns. Menace was around us; not only in the place where Rugojanu was taking notes.

I continued: "Don't let suffering take you by surprise! Meditate on it often. Take the virtues of Christ and His saints to yourself, by thought. The pastor I spoke of, my teacher who died for his faith, gave me a recipe for a tea against suffering, and I will give it to you.

I told them the story of a doctor of early Christian times who was unjustly imprisoned by the emperor. After some weeks his family were allowed to see him, and at first they wept. His clothes were rags, his nourishment a slice of bread with a cup of water every day. His wife wondered and asked, "How is it you look so well? You have the air of one who has just come from a wedding!" The doctor smilingly replied that he found a remedy for all troubles, and his family asked him what it was. The doctor told them, "I have discovered a tea which is good against all suffering and sorrow. It contains seven herbs, and I shall number them for you.

"The first herb is called contentedness: be satisfied with what you have. I may shiver in my rags as I gnaw on a crust, but how much worse off I should be if the emperor had thrown me naked into a dungeon with nothing at all to eat!

"The second herb is common sense. Whether I rejoice or worry, I shall still be in prison, so why repine?

"The third is remembrance of past sins: count them, and on the supposition that every sin deserves a day in prison, reckon how many lives you would spend behind bars - you have been let off lightly!

"The fourth is the thought of the sorrows which Christ bore gladly for us. If the only man who ever could choose his fate on earth chose pain, what great value He must have seen in it! So we observe that, borne with serenity and joy, suffering redeems.

"The fifth herb is the knowledge that suffering has been given to us by God as from a father, not to harm us, but to cleanse and sanctify us. The suffering through which we pass has the purpose of purifying us, and preparing us for heaven.

"The sixth is the knowledge that no suffering can harm a Christian life. If the pleasures of the flesh are all, then pain and prison bring an end to a man's aim in living; but if the core of life is truth, that is something which no prison cell can change. In prison or out of it two and two make four. Prison cannot stop me from loving; iron bars cannot exclude faith. If these ideals make up my life, I can be serene anywhere.

"The last herb in the recipe is hope. The wheel of life may put the emperor's physician in prison, but it goes on turning. It may put me back into the palace, and even put me on the throne."

I paused for a moment. The crowded church was still.

page 202 In God's Underground

"I have drunk barrels of this tea since then," I said, "and I can recommend it to you all. It has proved good."

As I finished speaking, Rugojanu stood up and pushed his way out of the cathedral without a backward glance. I came down from the pulpit and the audience broke into a babble of talk. Outside, students applauded and cheered and tried to take my hands. I telephoned Sabina, who was glad at what I had done, although she knew reprisals would follow.

Next day I was summoned by my bishop, who told me that Rugojanu was making trouble. While he was telling me about protests from the Ministry of Cults, Rugojanu himself strode into the room. "Ah, you!" he cried. "What excuses are you trying to make? A torrent of sedition - I heard it!"

I asked the man what in particular had displeased him. Everything had - but particularly my cure for suffering.

"But what was wrong with my poor tea?" I asked. "Which herb did you not like?"

He said violently, "You told them the wheel always turns. But in this counter-revolutionary outburst, you are mistaken. The wheel will not turn, my friend - Communism is here for ever!" His face was distorted with hatred.

"I didn't mention Communism," I replied. "I said simply that the wheel of life keeps turning. For instance, I was in prison, now I am free. I have been ill, now I am better. I lost my parish, now I may work..."

"No, no, no! You meant that Communism would fall, and they all knew what you meant. Don't imagine you've heard the last of this!"

Rugojanu called church leaders to a meeting at the bishop's palace in Cluj, where I was denounced for trying to poison youth with concealed attacks on the government. "You may be sure that he will never preach again," shouted Rugojanu, working himself into an ugly rage. At the end he cried, "Wurmbrand is finished, Wurmbrand is finished, Wurmbrand is finished!" He gathered up coat and hat and walked out of the building.

page 203 In God's Underground

A hundred yards from the door a car, swerving to avoid a dog, mounted the pavement and crushed him against the wall. He died on the spot.

The story of Rugojanu's last words and their sequel spread through the country. Often during these years God showed His sign.

The revocation of my license as a pastor did not stop me from preaching, but now I had to work as secretly as I did among Soviet soldiers after the war. A new danger was presented by visits from old prison friends asking for advice and help. Some of whom, having turned informer, were trying to provoke me. These unhappy men had expected too much from release, on finding their domestic world turned upside down, they had turned to the pursuit of sexual pleasure to win back their lost youth. This usually cost more than they could afford, and the short cut to a new start with the regime and quick profits lay in providing the Party with information. Their freedom was more tragic than their confinement.

Our best safeguard against informers lay in the warnings we received from friends in the Secret Police. Many of our followers held Party jobs of one kind or another. One young couple who spent their days in the propaganda department passed their evenings praying with us, and more than once we met in the home of a leading Secret Police officer while he was away, his maid being one of us. At other times we met in basements attics, flats, country homes. Our services were as simple and as beautiful as those of the first Christians 1900 years ago. We sang aloud, if questions were asked, it was a birthday celebration; Christian families with three or four members had thirty-five birthdays a year! Sometimes we met in open country. The sky was our cathedral; the birds supplied our music, the flowers our incense, the stars our candles, the angels were the acolytes who lit them, and the shabby suit of a martyr just freed from prison meant far more to us than the most precious priestly robes.

page 204 In God's Underground

3

I knew, of course, that sooner or later I would be re-arrested. After the revolution in Hungary the situation grew more difficult with every month. Khrushchev announced a new Seven-Year Plan, "to eradicate the vestiges of superstition." Churches were closed or converted for use as Communist clubs, museums, grain stores. Those whom the Party newspapers reviled as "swindlers in black soutanes" were rounded up in thousands.

I prayed, "God, if You know men in prison whom I can help, souls that I can save, send me back and I will bear it willingly." Sabina sometimes hesitated, then said, "Amen." There was at this time an inner joy about her, which came from knowing that we would serve Christ more fully soon. Once more, I wondered if our image of the Mother of the Lord, standing grief-stricken by the Cross, is not mistaken; was she not also filled with joy that her son would be savior of the world?

They came for me at 1 A.M. on January 15, 1959. Our little attic was turned inside out in a search that lasted four hours. My son saw a belt of his behind a dislodged cupboard. "And yet people say the Secret Police are useless!" he remarked. "I've been looking everywhere for that." Next day he was barred from night-school for his insolence.

When they had taken me away, Sabina picked up my Bible. She found, on a scrap of paper, a sentence I had noted down from the Epistle to the Hebrews (xi.35) which said "through faith... women received back their dead raised to life." I had written below it, "I have such a woman for my wife."

4

It was still dark and the streets were covered with icy slush when we reached Police Headquarters in Bucharest. I went through the familiar reception processes before guards led me to a cell. Here I found a man of about thirty named Draghici, one of the hated re-education leaders at Piteshti. Each time the cell door opened he jerked round. He said, "I'm sorry to be so jumpy. I never know if they're coming to take me out for a bath or to be shot. I've been under sentence of death for four years."

Draghici told me his life story. As a boy he had revered the local priest, who one day said, "Your father's a watchmaker - ask him to repair the church clock, cheaply." Draghici persuaded his father to do the work for nothing. The priest then asked for a receipt for 500 leu, so that he could pocket the money, which he debited to the church. Draghici sneered as he added, "I might have grown up as a Christian and given the Church a lot of money over the years, except for that."

His father, a drunkard, disappeared with the family savings, and at fourteen the boy enlisted in the Iron Guard for the sake of the green shirt, the marching songs, the admiration of the girls. A few months later, the Guard was overthrown. Draghici went to prison, and when the Communists took power was automatically sentenced to eleven years as an active Fascist. After serving seven years he was promised at Piteshti, "Beat the other prisoners, and you'll be freed."

He told me, "I was now twenty-one. I didn't want to stay in jail, so I did what I was told. I believed them, and now I have to die for it."

It looked to me as if he were dying already, of tuberculosis. "It's no more than I deserve," he said.

I lay awake, listening to Draghici coughing and I thought: if God called me now and asked, "After fifty-six years on earth, what do you think of man?" I should have to reply, "Man is a sinner but the guilt is not his. Satan and his fallen angels are at work to make us as wretched as they are themselves."

For ten days and nights I reasoned with Draghici. "It is not of your free choice that you became a criminal," I said, "but your sense of guilt demands atonement. Jesus has taken on himself this punishment you feel that you deserve."

On the tenth evening, Draghici broke down in tears. We prayed together, and his remorse and fear were lifted. So my request to be allowed to help other prisoners was answered in my first days back in prison.

5

I was taken next for interrogation at Bucharest's Uranus jail. A Secret Police major tried to make me name "counter-revolutionaries" I had met.

I said that I should be glad to name counter-revolutionaries: in Russia as well as at home. Several thousands of them had been killed in the Soviet Union during the 'thirties by Yagoda, then Minister of Interior, but in the end the real counter-revolutionary was revealed as Yagoda himself. Then, under his successor, Beria, the Soviet secret police drove hundreds of thousands to their death, until Beria, too, was shot. I added that the supreme enemy of the revolution, the killer of millions, was Josef Stalin, who had since been turned out of his tomb in the Red Square. So it would be best, I suggested, to look elsewhere than in my poor church for counter-revolutionaries.

The officer ordered me to be beaten and kept in solitary confinement. There I stayed until my trial. It was a ten-minute re-hearing, in secret session, of the previous trial ten years before. My wife and son were present this time to hear me denounced.

I waited in a cell later for transport to the next prison. While I spoke to the others about Christ, an officer came in to announce the new court decision. I thanked him, and went on with what I was saying. The sentence had been increased from twenty years to twenty-five.

PART SEVEN

There were other newly-sentenced clergy with me in the Secret Police truck. After a short journey it descended a steep ramp and halted. My heart sank, for I knew that I was back in the underground prison of Jilava. Voices shouted, "Get them out!" and the van doors burst open.

A party of baton-swinging guards drove us with blows along the passage. They had been drinking and at the sight of priests there was a whoop of joy. Gray, grubby prison uniforms were flung at us. Those who were slow in changing had the clothes torn from their backs. Beards were cut off amid roars of laughter. Heads were roughly shaved. Bleeding and half-naked, we were driven into a large cell.

We sat on the stone floor, huddling together in the February cold. Presently a guard lurched in, bawling, "All priests outside." There were suppressed giggles and snorts from beyond the door. We filed out, and into another gauntlet of baton-blows, through which we ran, protecting our heads with our arms as best we could. Those who fell were kicked by heavy boots, and spat on.

Half an hour later all priests were again called out. No one moved. Guards rushed into the cell, lashing out indiscriminately.

I tried to comfort those near me. One man had lost some teeth and his lip was badly split. As I cleaned the blood from his face he said, "I'm Archimandrite Cristescu."

We had met, years before. I had been waiting to see the Orthodox patriarch. Miron Cristescu was working in his office, so I had told him about our troubles. He had placed his hands on my shoulders and said, "Brother, Christ will come again: we hope for it" - something a man of God should say often, yet rarely does. I did not forget him. But shaven, with his face streaked by blood and dirt, he was unrecognizable.

The hours passed as we sat and shivered. Miron Cristescu talked of how he and others around the Patriarch had tried to save the Church from becoming an instrument of the State. They thought they could work on the Patriarch's better nature. But Gheorghiu-Dej had chosen well. Justinian was sent on a visit to Moscow, where his head was further turned. He delivered blow after blow at the Catholics, the Uniates and all within his fold who would not compromise.

"Here I am like all the rest," said Archimandrite Cristescu. "I was mistaken to try - I should have resisted from the start."

"Don't let such thoughts sadden you too much," I said.

He raised his fine eyes to my face and answered, "Brother Wurmbrand, I know only one sadness, the sadness of not being a saint."

Spoken from a pulpit this would have been just a beautiful phrase; in that horrible cell, after a ferocious beating, the words showed his true greatness.

2

Miron was with me when a few days later I joined a convoy that headed into the mountains. After many hours the Transylvanian town of Gherla, and its largest building, the prison, came into view. Here my wife had visited me during my two-months' stay in 1956. It had other memories for me, too. From the upper windows of the jail, which was built during the reign of Empress Maria Theresa in the eighteenth century, you could see the old gallows, now no longer used; for the Communist method of execution is a shot in the back of the head. Beyond the high walls we saw life going on in the town. Prisoners gazed out at the passing scene and dreamed. But at noon no one could bear to watch. It was then that the children came from school, shouting and laughing as they chased each other home, and every man thought of his own family.

Some 10,000 prisoners were packed into primitive accommodation intended for 2,000, and the regime was as harsh as in the worst days of the re-education campaign. The previous summer there had been serious rioting at Gherla. Prisoners had barricaded themselves into a wing in protest at the nailing up of shutters which kept out light and air. The doors were smashed down by warders. A running fight began. The militia were called in and opened fire, killing and wounding many prisoners. As a punishment food was reduced to starvation level; and hundreds of convicts were dispersed to other jails.

We, priests and pastors, soon took their place, along with thousands of other political prisoners caught in the new wave of arrests - landowners, army officers, doctors, shopkeepers, artisans who would not be herded into co-operatives, farmers who opposed the final seizures of land which the Party was then preparing. After two disastrous Five-Year Plans, Dej had announced a Sixteen-Year Plan, which would last until 1975 - "If anyone remains at liberty to operate it," a prisoner said to me.

The cells were long, dark, echoing barrack-rooms, each containing 80 to 100 men but only 50 to 60 bunks. Many shared a bed. Sleep was difficult. Apart from the usual night-long procession to the lavatory buckets, which soon overflowed, we had a dozen regular snorers: each performed an individual tune; and if one stopped another joined the resonant chorus. Nor could you rest by day, when discipline was enforced by whips and studded boots. The guards made surprise "security visits" to the cells, banging the iron bars across the windows with their batons to ensure that they had not been filed. At the same time the prisoners lay face down on the floor in rows, to be counted. The guards walked on each man in turn as his name was called.

The slightest breach of the rules brought a minimum of twenty-five lashes, with a doctor standing by - for men had died under such castigation. There was scarcely a man in the prison who had not been flogged, and some had received "the twenty-five" several times. We agreed that rods hurt more than sticks or batons. The blows burned like fire: it was as if your back were being grilled by a furnace, and the shock to the nervous system was great. Very noticeable, too, was the brutalizing effect these floggings had on the guards, our masters. Blood and power seemed to affect even the best among them, like drink; and they carried the poison of cruelty from the jail out into society every day.

There was one flush-toilet on each landing and to this Miron and I carried the lavatory buckets every day. We had to queue with other prisoners waiting their turn to pour the contents down the drain. The Archimandrite was a fastidious and cultured man, but he forced himself to these chores. One morning he slipped on the greasy stone floor and some liquid splashed a warder's boot.

"Cretin!" the man yelled, striking Miron a vicious blow on the shoulder. "You'll end up in Rozsa Sandor!"

As we spooned up our gruel later, he asked me what this meant.

"The graveyard," I replied. "They always say that - take no notice."

Rozsa Sandor was the prison cemetery; its gray headstones, deep in weeds, could also be seen from the windows. It was named after a murderer who, during the last century had been sentenced to twenty years, when he was nineteen years old. Looking down through the bars of Gherla he saw in a garden a woman with a baby in her arms. Day after day he watched them. The priest called to baptize the girl child; her first communion party was held; she went to school, and grew into a young woman. All the time Rozsa Sandor watched. She became his life: he decided that they would marry when he was free. At last the day came and he emerged from jail. He hurried over the road and found a party in progress - a wedding feast. She had thought to receive him in this way! He ran up to her and said, "I cannot tell you how happy I am that you will be my wife today." The girl stared at hideous, toothless Rozsa Sandor and began to laugh. "What can the silly old man mean?" she asked. Then, taking the hand of the young man beside her, she said, "This is my bridegroom." Rozsa Sandor gaped at the couple. In a fit of rage and madness he snatched up a carving-knife and stabbed them both to death. He was hanged for the murders and buried in the prison cemetery which was called now after his name.

"You'll end in Rozsa Sandor!"

The shouted threat was a daily reminder that we were growing older. Prisoners never realize how time is passing. To themselves they remain the same age as when they entered prison; they dream of the young wives and sweethearts they have left, never the careworn women to whom they will return.

Even the clock over the main gate at Gherla had stopped. It never moved in the six years I was to spend there.

3

The prison commandant was a gross, red-faced little Nero who could not stop eating. Prisoners brought before Major Dorabantu were startled when, in the middle of some tirade, his hand burrowed into a drawer and emerged clasping a garlic-sausage roll or an apple.

My first meeting with him was typical. I stood at attention listening to a rambling, muddled hymn of hate. It seemed that there were only two things Dorabantu did not hate: food and the sound of his own voice.

"So, Wurmbrand!" he cried, showering the table with a mouthful of cakecrumbs. "A monk, huh!"

I said that I was a pastor.

"Pastors, priests, monks! All the same to me. Grinding the faces of the poor to feather your own nests. I know!" He waved his arms clownishly as he told stories of his wretched boyhood. He had kept his father's sheep near one of the richest monasteries in Rumania; when they strayed on to Church land, the monks had thrashed him brutally.

"Ever seen a priest firing a double-barreled shotgun at a hungry child, Wurmbrand? A pretty holy picture!"

Dorabantu also complained that he had been exploited as a factory worker in later life. So now he was making good use of his opportunity to pay back the capitalists and priests.

There were some tough characters in my cell, murderers and thieves who were nominally political prisoners because they had killed a Communist or because thieving was something called economic sabotage. Others were war criminals serving life sentences for massacring Russians and Jews. They were bitter, angry men, and all my attempts to offer religious consolation were shouted down. Those in particular who had killed Jews were very bitter against me, because I am myself of the Jewish race. I never hid this fact, and often when I was questioned about it, I expressed the natural love I had towards my nation, although using every man's right to choose his faith. I have chosen another faith than that of most of my people. When I began speaking quietly to a single man in a corner, others formed a menacing circle around us.

"We told you to shut up!" snarled the leader. I stood up and someone pushed me. Another put a leg out and I landed on my face. I felt a violent kick in the ribs. But as the pack fell on me, there was a shout of warning.

page 213 In God's Underground

A warder, peering through the peep-hole, had seen the struggle and was calling for help. The crowd scattered. When the cell door opened everyone was in his bunk.

"Wurmbrand!" The commandant, prowling the corridors, had heard the story. The guard had recognized me as the tallest in the room, but in the half-darkness he could not identify the attackers.

"Wurmbrand, who did it?"

Nursing a cut lip, I said I could not answer.

"Why not?"

"As a Christian I love and forgive my enemies, I don't denounce them."

"Then you're an idiot!" snapped Dorabantu.

"There you are right," I said. "Anyone who is not a Christian from all his heart is an idiot."

"Are you calling me an idiot?" thundered the commandant.

"I didn't say that - I meant I was not as good a Christian as I should be."

Dorabantu smote himself on the forehead with the palm of his hand. "Take him away. Thirty strokes!"

He waddled off, growling, "Crazy monks!"

When I returned the guards were still questioning prisoners. Since no information was forthcoming, no one else was punished. But after this there were few interruptions when I tried to preach.

4

At times, prison quarrels were comic, although those involved rarely thought so. I lived in several different cells, never with less than sixty men, always with two narrow, barred slits for windows. Should they be open, so that we lay freezing in our beds, or dosed, making the air stuffy and evil-smelling, so that we woke each morning with a headache? The topic was debated, literally for hours, day after day, as though we were in Parliament. There were two parties.

page 214 In God's Underground

Those away from the window said, "Fresh air harms no one." Those near it replied, "Thousands die from pneumonia every year."

"If powerful material interests dictate that twice two should be something other than four, then it will be," is an axiom of Lenin. We saw this proved in prison. The guards grew bored as we exercised. "The hour's up - everyone inside!" they shouted. We protested, "We've not had fifteen minutes yet." Both sides believed they were right; self-interest dictated our sense of time.

The common criminals quickly settled in, as much at home here, almost, as outside. They had their routine, their order of precedence, their own slang. They were wonderfully clever at smuggling scraps of food. They called the warders by nicknames and tried to cadge cigarettes through the spy-hole in the door. They got the positions of trust, leaving the dirty work to the politicals - and the dirtiest to the priests and practising Christians.

Owing to the overcrowding, I was edged in a bunk between two men who quarreled like moulting birds of prey locked in the same cage. Tall, emaciated ex-Sergeant Grigore had shot Jews by the hundred, in obedience to orders. His enemy Vasile, an "economic saboteur," made Grigore the scapegoat for all his wrongs. Vasile, who was small and scrawny, quickly found his adversary's weak spot. His face contorted with triumph as he spat out the word, "Murderer!" Grigore cringed and could not answer.

I told Vasile, "Why say this? He's old and ill, and we don't know where he will spend eternity: if it's with Christ you're abusing a future citizen of Heaven; and if it's in hell, why add curses to his suffering?"

The thief looked surprised. "Don't you know how many Russians and Jews that rat killed?"

"That happened during a horrible war twenty years ago," I replied, "and he's paid for it with fifteen years of hunger, beatings and prison. Do you call me a clown because I used to turn cartwheels in the middle of the room when I was three? Or illiterate because I couldn't read when I was four? Those days are past."

Vasile was annoyed. Next day, a group began talking dose to me of how they would treat the Russians if they had the chance.

"Hanging's too good for them," Vasile screeched. "They should be flayed alive..." Eventually I could not bear it any longer and objected that neither Russians nor anyone else should be treated thus.

"But yesterday," protested Vasile, "you defended a man who killed hundreds of Russians, and now you say killing Russians is wrong!"

Grigore was deeply unhappy over the memory of his crimes, and he asked me, "Have I atoned if I suffer like this... when suffering is forced on me?"

"Yes - the Bible says that he who has suffered in the body has finished with sin." I told him of poor Lazarus who suffered and went to Heaven. "If you believe in Christ, you will be saved," I said.

"People think different," he said. "Look at Eichmann, the man they want to hang in Israel."

"There's no evidence that he's suffered - but in any case I don't think a man should be accused of crimes committed so long ago. He may not be the same man. I know I am not," I said. "And I'm sure that many Jews would agree." (It was not until years later that I heard that Martin Buber, the great Jewish thinker, had objected to Eichmann's sentence.)

Grigore said, "I'm not the same because I've repented for what I did; but others might be ready to do it again."

"Nobody can be punished for what he may possibly do wrong in the future. Wickedness is only a part of us all. Some of the worst men also have great virtues. And so have you, Grigore."

At this thought he cheered up a little.

There was no lack of laughter in the cell. Gladness, in the Acts of the Apostles, is called a witness to the existence of God; and without such a belief the presence of joy in prison is inexplicable.

Some could laugh at their sufferings. Major Braileanu was one: a short, spry ex-officer with a boyish quiff of hair, he brought a new rumor to the cell. There was to be another summit conference that spring of 1959, between the Soviet Foreign Minister Gromyko and Western representatives. It was said that the meeting would be held on May 10. Prisoners adopted a new greeting - they held up all ten fingers to indicate the hoped-for day of release.

On the day of the conference the guards did, in fact, open the cell and call out four men, Major Braileanu among them. Were they the first to be released? We watched them enviously. But soon we heard shrieks of agony coming from the small recess at the end of the corridor where floggings took place. It was impossible to shut out the sound. Three men were beaten; but when the fourth's turn came he did not utter a murmur under the usual twenty-five blows. Braileanu followed the others back to the cell, pale and unable to speak. He pulled himself up. "Gentlemen," he said. "I give you our new salute." He held up two fingers of his right hand, five of his left, to signal twenty-five.

Stories and riddles were told by the hour. Everyone had to contribute. There was a certain kind of nonsense that made us laugh better than anything.

"What has three colors, hangs on trees and sings tara-boom-cha-cha?" asked Florescu, a half-gypsy thief. No one could answer. "A herring." "A herring hasn't three colors!" "If I paint it, it has." "They don't hang on trees, either." "They do if I tie them on." "They don't sing 'tara-boom-cha-cha'!" "I only said that so that you wouldn't guess."

Gaston, a thin-faced Unitarian pastor who wore thick spectacles, posed another riddle: "A man traveling on a train has a wife called Eve and they live in a red house: what's his name?" There was puzzlement on all faces - if a man went by train and shared a red house with his wife Eve, how did that help to know his name? "Easy," said Gaston, "it's Charles." "But how do you know?" "I've known him for years, he's my best friend."

Archimandrite Miron told what he swore was a true story - about the commandant: strolling down a line of convicts on parade, he asked each man the same question: "What is your crime?"

"I've done nothing sir, and I've got ten years."
Dorabantu moved on. "And what is your crime?"
"Nothing sir, and I've got twenty years."
"Lying swine," said Dorabantu indignantly.
"Nobody in the People's Republic gets more than ten years for nothing!"

The small thieves and pickpockets were the best storytellers. They lived, outrageously, on their wits. Florescu said he had robbed a jeweler in Carol Street, Bucharest, which was lined with jewelers' shops. He told the story like this:

Mr. Hershcovici, courtliest of jewelers, welcomed an elegant young couple to his premises. "Good morning," said the man, who was, of course, Florescu. "This is my fiancee, the sweetest girl in Bucharest!" And one of the richest, too, according to their chatter. "We've come to choose the ring - diamonds, of course... Oh no, those are too small." From rings they proceeded to a jewel-faced watch for the girl's mother, an alligator dressing-case for her father, and then the girl broke in with, "Oh dear, we mustn't forget the bishop. He's my uncle, so he won't accept a fee for the service and you know our tradition: a service not paid for is not acceptable to Heaven." "True, true, but what does one give a bishop?" And at this moment the eyes of both turned to a showcase which held a complete set of gilded episcopal robes. "Just the thing!" cried Florescu. "But, dear," said the girl, "we don't know whether they'll fit him." Florescu looked the jeweler up and down. "They're just the same build!" And Hershcovici, hoping to sell the costly robes, allowed himself to be draped in a golden cassock. They tied the belt around his waist and jammed a glittering miter on his head. "A perfect fit!" said Florescu. "Just hold this scepter!"

With that, the couple swept the jewelry into the alligator case and ran from the shop. Hershcovici was paralyzed with shock; then he followed, screaming, "Thieves! Stop them! Help!" The Jewish merchants ran to their doors and saw Hershcovici galloping down an empty street in the full regalia of an Orthodox metropolitan. "Hershcovici's gone mad!" they shouted. Three of them brought him down and held him as he struggled and protested. "No, no! What are you doing? The thieves are escaping!" So they did, up a side street, never to be caught.

When the laughter stopped, Pastor Gaston said, "But they caught you in the end, Florescu." The thief did not want to discuss that episode.

"Well, suppose you tell us why you're here, Pastor," he said.

"Very well," said Gaston. "It's a funny story too. I was given seven years for a Christmas sermon on the flight of the Holy Family into Egypt."

Gaston had been denounced by one of his congregation. At his trial it was said that in deploring Herod's attempt to kill the child Jesus in the massacre of the innocents, Gaston was really attacking the Communist campaign against religion; while his references to Egypt revealed too his hope that Nasser would join the imperialist camp.

Pastor Gaston asked an interrogator afterwards what he had really done to upset the Party. "I always sided with the workers," he protested. "I started a school and a co-operative. I doubled my congregation."

The officer laughed. "The kind of priest we want is the man in the next parish to yours - a lecherous old drunkard whose church is always empty."

Gaston sometimes spoke to me about his poor childhood. He was always hungry, and he had stolen when there was nothing to eat. "Once I raided a hencoop," he said. "They paraded me through the village with a notice round my neck saying 'Thief!'" He grew up "wanting to overturn the world."

He studied various systems of politics and philosophy and joined the Unitarian Church. When the police came, they found among his hundreds of books a copy of Adler's ~Individual Psychology~.

"Aha!" said a detective. "An individualist!" and carried the book off as evidence.

page 219 In God's Underground

5

In a batch of new prisoners I was shocked to see Professor Popp. He looked ill, and he moved like an old man. We had not met after the amnesty of 1956 and my letters had gone unanswered. Popp explained why that evening.

Like many other released prisoners he had plunged into a hunt for pleasure. "I felt starved," he said. "I was afraid life had passed me by. I had to prove that I could enjoy myself again. I spent lavishly, I drank too much, I left my wife for a younger woman.

"Then I was sorry. I hadn't forgotten my Christian vows. I wanted to see you, but you were far away. I told everything to another pastor, and blamed Communism for destroying the country. He listened - and then denounced me."

Popp had been given another twelve-year sentence. His first prison term had brought out all the strength and goodness in him. He had been like a sea-bird that rises highest on its wings in the face of the wind, and falls as the wind falls. Now his will was weak. I tried to bring him back to God, but life seemed empty of meaning to him.

He said that, soon after his sentence, he had been informed of his "civic burial." This was a new feature of life in the People's Republic. When a counter-revolutionary went to jail, his colleagues, friends and family were gathered together by a Party official who told them, "Comrades, this man is dead for ever and for everyone. We are here to bury his memory." One by one, his offences against the State had to be denounced by the "mourners." Popp's widowed daughter spoke with the rest. Had she refused, she might have lost her job, and she was the mother of two young children.

Popp was put to work with me on the second day. We had to clean the floor of the large cell, scrubbing it from end to end. A prisoner elected by the guards as a room leader walked up when we were almost finished and kicked over the bucket of dirty water, saying, "Now do it again!" Finally a guard came to inspect. He grabbed the room leader, bringing his face down towards some mud he had brought in on his own boots. "Filthy!" he yelled. We scrubbed for another hour, to the accompaniment of kicks and insults from the room leader. There is no oppressor worse than the oppressed.

This experience left Popp shaking with exhaustion. As a distraction, I introduced him over the meal to Pastor Gaston. A look of shock passed over Gaston's face. Popp simply turned away and closed his eyes.

As the days passed, the professor withdrew further into himself. We had to urge him to eat and help him get ready each morning. He neither laughed, nor wept, nor joined in the life of the cell. But one morning, stung by some jeering remark from the room leader, he seized the man's throat, clinging to it like a madman until two guards clubbed him down. He was carried unconscious to the hospital wing; next day we heard that he was dead.

6

The tragedy filled the cell with sorrow. While others prayed for Popp's soul, according to the Orthodox habit, Gaston lay in silence on his bunk, and when I spoke of eternal life he rose and moved away.

There was talk in the cell that evening of life after death. Gaston was asked what he thought on the question. "Progressive Unitarians don't believe in a supernatural survival," he said.

"But we are not talking to Progressive Unitarians," I replied. "We are talking to you. Let's have the courage to be ourselves. Not always 'we Catholics, we Protestants, we Rumanians...'"

"Speaking personally, then, I don't believe in it."

"If you are speaking personally," I said, "that is the first step to believing, for personality is - God's greatest gift to man, the one thing that remains as your body changes. The atoms of oxygen and hydrogen in my body are the same as in yours. My body's heat can be measured on the same instrument as yours. All bodily energies - chemical, electrical - are alike from man to man. But my thoughts, my feelings, my will are my own. Physical energy is like a poker chip, which has no mark on it. Spiritual energy is like a coin that bears the head of a king. Why, then, should it share the body's fate?"

- Florescu, who had drawn up a stool, said - with an obscenity, "I believe in what I can see, taste and feel. We're all matter, like this bit of wood I'm sitting on, and when you're dead, that's it."

I went over and kicked the stool from under him. It shot across the floor, and Florescu went down with a bump. He scrambled up furiously and made for me, but the others held him. "What's the idea?" he snarled.

I replied mildly, "But you said you were matter like the stool. I didn't hear the stool complain!"

There was some laughter, in which even Gaston joined.

"I'm sorry, Florescu," I said. "I just wanted to prove that since matter does not react with love or hate, it is, after all, different from us."

Florescu sulked for a while, then interrupted again:

"I might believe if the dead ever came back to talk to us."

"I am sure that men have been in touch with the dead," I replied. "Great scientists from Newton to Sir Oliver Lodge have believed in spiritualism. The Bible describes the evocation of the dead King Saul. Scriptures forbid it but say it is possible."

The row over the stool had brought others to listen, and I began to preach earnestly about life after death. It was for us no academic matter, but a topic of burning and immediate interest. Men died every day in Gherla.

"If God had made us for this life only," I said, "he would first have given us age with its wisdom, then youth with its vigor. It seems senseless to gather knowledge and understanding simply to take it to the grave. Luther compares our life on earth to the life of an unborn child: he says that if the embryo could reason in the womb it would wonder why it grew hands and feet, and it would surely come to the conclusion that there must be another world to come in which it would play and run and work. Just as the embryo is preparing for a future state, so are we."

I forgot the guards and raised my voice to preach to prisoners lying in bunks that rose in tiers to the ceiling. Eyes watched me in the dim light which the weak bulb hanging above us seemed to make still more dismal.

I said, "Suppose I argue that there is room in a pint bottle for ten pints of milk. You would say I am mad. Yet I can have together in my head thoughts of an event like the Flood, which happened thousands of years ago, of my wife and son in the room where I left them, of God and the devil. How does it happen that within the narrow limits of my head there are encompassed the daily things of life, and the infinite and the eternal? The illimitable must be contained by something illimitable: this is the spirit. When your unfettered spirit can go anywhere in time or space, do you believe that it can share the fate of this husk which is the body?"

While I spoke of these things there was a silence such as there never is in church. No one yawned or fidgeted, no thoughts strayed. The prisoners, in soiled clothes, their cheeks hollow and their eyes big with hunger, received the thought of survival after death as thirsty soil receives rain.

7

Next day before reveille I awoke to find Gaston's bunk empty. Then I saw the outline of his frail body at the window. I threw a blanket round my shoulders and joined him. We looked down through the bars. The light was ashen. Mist hung in the yard, but we could see a row of black coffins lying by the main gate. They contained men who had died in the last twenty-four hours: one would be Popp. This was a daily scene at Gherla, and I wondered why Gaston had chosen this day to rise and watch. I tried to get him back to bed, but he would not move.

Under our eyes, a guard crossed the yard and raised the lids of the coffins, exposing the bodies. Behind him came a hulking figure with a steel stake in his hand. He lifted it and plunged the steel into each corpse in turn.

"God rest their souls," I said.

The guards were making sure that no life remained and that no would-be escapees had replaced the bodies. Gaston was trembling. I put the blanket around him, but he continued to stand watching while the coffins were closed and loaded on to the lorry which would take them to Rozsa Sandor cemetery.

For days after this, Gaston brooded. Whatever was on his mind he would not reveal it to us. He rebuffed all my attempts to break into his misery. In the evenings he would listen to the others exchanging stories, but only once did he contribute one himself.

The prisoners exchanged glances, he had been silent and morose so long that they did not know what to expect.

He said: "I was sitting in a restaurant just before my arrest. I thought it would raise my spirits to have a good meal. So I hung my overcoat by a corner table and ordered all the things I liked. Another customer nearby looked at me in a worried way and rose to speak, but I waved him away. 'Please,' I said, 'We all have our troubles and I should like to dine in peace.' The meal was good. I lit a cigar and I thought I should apologize for being uncivil: I asked the man's pardon and said perhaps he would like to tell me the trouble now. 'Too late,' he said, 'the stove's burned a hole in your overcoat.'"

Gaston's story won some laughter, but he went back to his bunk and lay down in the darkness. At one period Gaston had spent hours telling us how he honored Christ as the greatest teacher, but not as God, and what the Unitarians accepted as true in the Bible and what not. Their reappraisal did not leave much to hold on to. They were not over-concerned with eternal life, he said. But now he began to talk again about Professor Popp. What proof was there that anything remained after the horrible scene we had watched together that dawn? The male human creature, he said, needed four things to survive: food, warmth, sleep, a woman companion. "And the last can be dispensed with," he added. "My wife's gone to live with another man. Our two children are in a state home."

"You yourself don't believe this," I said. "We live here on the very minimum of these things, yet every day you hear laughter and men singing. Their bodies have nothing to sing about. It's something else in them that sings. You believe in the soul, don't you? What the ancient Egyptians called ~kaa~, the Greeks ~psyche~, the Hebrews ~neshama~? Why else do you worry about your children's upbringing? If it will be over for them in a few decades, what do any of us want with religion, morals, or decency?"

"It's too late," he said. "I can't change now. My life has been smoldering away, like my coat in that restaurant, and people have tried to warn me before; but it's gone too far at last. I've nothing to live for, and the only thing that keeps me from suicide is that I'm scared of dying. I kept a piece of glass the other day - I meant to slash my wrists; but I didn't have the courage."

I said, "Suicide proves nothing except that the soul is strong and independent enough to kill the body for its own reasons. Even if you were free and had all you wanted, you might feel this way. It's terrible about your wife and children: but I feel there is something else troubling you, something you have not told anyone."

Gaston was silent

I continued, "I knew a prisoner who knowingly starved himself to give bread to his son who was in jail with him, until he died of malnutrition. That's how strong the soul is. A man like Kreuger, the Swedish match millionaire who had everything the body can possibly need, killed himself, leaving a note that spoke of 'melancholia.' He had had something else than the body, the soul for which he had not cared. But you have inner resources, you have Christianity, to help you. Speak to Jesus: He will give you comfort and strength."

Gaston sighed in the darkness. "You make it sound as if He was here with us, alive."

"Certainly he's alive," I said. "Don't you believe even in the Resurrection? Tomorrow I'll prove it to you!"

"How you persist!" he said. "You're worse than a Communist!"

8

While the prisoners were talking next evening I reminded him that Easter was approaching - my second in Gherla.

"If we had any hard-boiled eggs we could dye them red and crack them together, following the Orthodox custom," I said. I held out my hand as if offering an Easter egg, and said, "Christ is risen!"

Old Vasilescu, one of the farmers, hit my fist with his own and cried, "He is risen indeed!" A chorus of voices echoed the traditional response.

"That's a strange thing to say!" I said, turning to the others. "Surely Christ died on the Cross? What proof have you that He is risen?"

There was a silence. Vasilescu tugged at his heavy moustaches. "I'm a simple farmer, but I believe it because my father and mother and his father and all our priests and teachers told me so. I believe it because I see how nature is resurrected every year. When the snow is on the ground, you can't ever believe that the fields will bear crops in spring. But the trees bud and the air grows warm, and the grass green. If the world can come alive again, so can Christ."

"A sound answer," said Miron.

"But in a world where every Christian assertion is challenged, that's not enough," said Gaston.

"We need the strongest proofs, I agree," I said, "and they exist. Mommsen, the great historian of the Roman Empire, calls the Resurrection the best-proven fact in history. Do you believe the classical historians were largely truthful?"

No one argued.

"They were usually courtiers, the flatterers of kings, men who praised for profit or to please powerful protectors. How much more should we believe Paul, Peter, Matthew, Andrew, Apostles who died a martyr's death to spread the truth!"

I asked Major Braileanu, "When you served on courtsmartial, did you take account of a witness's character as well as his words?"

"Of course," he replied. "In a clash of evidence it is all-important."

"Then we must credit the Apostles on that ground, for they spent their time doing and preaching good."

"It's miracles like the feeding of five thousand with five fishes that stretch my belief," said the major.

"What is a miracle?" I asked. "Missionaries from Africa say they are at first received as miracle workers; the primitive tribesman is astounded to see a match struck. Pearl Buck told women in a remote part of China that in her own country carriages moved without horses. "What a liar!" they whispered. So a miracle is simply something a superior creature can do, and Jesus was a man of exceptional powers."

"Gaston objected, "A primitive man might accept such a thing. It remains hard for a rationalist."
"It is rational to believe that Christ rose from the dead - otherwise we must accept the impossible - that the Church, which has survived the external assaults and internal corruptions of two thousand years, is built on a lie. Only consider that Jesus in his lifetime organized no church, wrote no books. He had a handful of poor disciples and one of these betrayed him for money, while the rest fled or denied him when the test came. He died on the Cross crying, 'My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken me?' His tomb was closed with a huge stone."

"Not a hopeful start," said Braileanu.
"Then how do you explain that it led to a world religion?"
"The disciples came together again," said Gaston doubtfully.
"But what gave them the power to preach and to die for their faith?"
"They overcame their fear in time, I suppose."
"Yes, they say how they mastered it: on the third day Christ appeared in person and gave them courage. Peter, who had been frightened by a housemaid, stood in Jerusalem and declared that he and his brethren had seen and spoken with Christ, that He had risen indeed. Peter said they might kill him before he denied it again. So the Romans did."
"Was it rational to believe," I asked, "that Peter and the disciples went to be crucified for a liar? Peter gave his first sermon about the Resurrection five hundred yards from the empty tomb. He knew that the facts could not be contradicted, and no one among Christ's enemies attempted to do so."
"Why was Saul of Tarsus so easily converted by his vision of Christ reproaching him, on the road to Damascus? Saul was the scourge of Christianity," I said.
"It may have been an auditory and visual hallucination," said Braileanu.
"Paul knew about these things. An apparition is no argument to an expert like him. He yielded so quickly and completely because, as a member of the Sanhedrin, he knew the great secret - that the tomb was empty!"

    Archimandrite Miron had sat sewing a patch on his trousers as we talked. He raised his intense luminous eyes to Gaston and said, "Years ago I had a postcard from my brother in New York, who had been to the top of the Empire State Building. He didn't investigate the foundations first, Pastor Gaston. The fact that it had been there forty years is proof that the foundations are good. The same with the Church, which has rested two thousand years on the truth."

    Our arguments had an effect on Gaston. His pain was eased and his faith deepened. The wish to kill himself faded as the weeks passed; but still he seemed to carry a load of guilt.
    The summer brought a fresh influx of prisoners. We were moved into different cells, and I lost sight of him.

9

    Months went by, and I preached and worked in a dozen cells at Gherla. I was often punished, and it was because of a beating that I met Gaston again.
    We were playing chess in the cell with figures made out of pieces of bread one day when Dorabantu, who still prowled the corridors burst in. "I'll have no gambling!" he bellowed.
    I suggested that chess was a game of skill, not chance.
    The commandant expanded his chest, "Tcha! Ridiculous! Skill is also a matter of chance!"
    Pleased with this answer, he strutted away. When he had gone the prisoners burst into laughter and started to mimic his voice. The door crashed open again. Dorabantu had been eavesdropping.
    "Wurmbrand - out you come!" Others were ordered out with me.
    "You'll laugh on the other side of your faces this time," shouted the commandant.
    We received twenty-five strokes each and afterwards were moved to an isolation cell. There, alone on a bunk, lying face down, I found Gaston. He, too, had been beaten. His back was a mass of bloody wounds. We tried to ease the pain with applications of a shirt soaked in water, and when the worst had passed, I examined the raw flesh for splinters of wood. His body shook as if in a fever. He could not speak much at first, but slowly, in broken phrases, he explained that he had been punished for preaching. A prisoner had informed on him.

He said, "I want to tell you something..."

"You mustn't talk."

"Now or never. About Professor Popp... and the pastor who betrayed him..." He stopped, his lips trembling.

"You needn't tell me," I began.

"I couldn't stand the pressure! I've suffered. When he died..." He began to sob.

We prayed together. He said that he could never forgive himself.

"The professor didn't; how could anyone?" he asked.

"Of course they can. So would Popp if he had known everything," I said. "Let me tell you about a man who was far worse than you. It will help us to pass the night. He was the murderer of my wife's family. She forgave him, and he became one of our closest friends. There are only two men my wife kisses - her husband, and the man who murdered her family." I told Gaston the story.

When Rumania entered the war on Germany's side, a pogrom began in which many thousands of Jews were killed or deported. At Iasi alone 11,000 were massacred in a day. My wife, who shares my Protestant faith, is also of Jewish origin. We lived in Bucharest, from which the Jews were not deported, but her parents, one of her brothers, three sisters and other relatives who lived in Bucovine were taken to Transmistria, a wild border province which the Rumanians had captured from Russia. Jews who were not murdered at the end of this journey were left to starve, and there Sabina's family died.

I had to break this news. She recovered herself and said, "I will not weep. You are entitled to a happy wife, and Mihai to a happy mother, and our Church to a servant with courage." If she shed tears in private I do not know, but from that day I never saw Sabina weep again.

Some time later our landlord, a good Christian, told me sadly of a man who was staying in the house while on leave from the front. "I knew him before the war," he said, "but he's changed completely. He has become a brute who likes to boast of how he volunteered to exterminate Jews in Transmistria and killed hundreds with his own hands."

I was deeply distressed and I decided to pass the night in prayer. To avoid disturbing Sabina, who was unwell and who would have wished to join in my vigil in spite of that, I went upstairs after supper to the landlord's flat to pray with him. Lounging in an armchair was a giant of a man whom the landlord introduced as Borila, the killer of Jews from Transmistria. When he rose he was even taller than I, and there seemed to be about him an aura of horror that was like a smell of blood. Soon he was telling us of his adventures in the war and of the Jews he had slaughtered.

"It is a frightening story," I said, "but I do not fear for the Jews - God will compensate them for what they have suffered. I ask myself with anguish what will happen to the murderers when they stand before God's judgment."

An ugly scene was prevented by the landlord who said that we were both guests in his house, and turned the talk into more neutral channels. The murderer proved to be not only a murderer. Nobody is only one thing. He was a pleasant talker, and eventually it came out that he had a great love of music.

He mentioned that while serving in the Ukraine he had been captivated by the songs there. "I wish I could hear them again," he said.

I knew some of these old songs. I thought to myself, looking at Borila, "The fish has entered my net!"

"If you'd like to hear some of them," I told him, "come to my flat - I'm no pianist, but I can play a few Ukrainian melodies."

The landlord, his wife and daughter accompanied us. My wife was in bed. She was used to my playing softly at night and did not wake up. I played the folk-songs, which are alive with feeling, and I could see that Borila was deeply moved. I remembered how, when King Saul was afflicted by an evil spirit, the boy David had played the harp before him.

I stopped and turned to Borila. "I've something very important to say to you," I told him.

"Please speak," he said.

"If you look through that curtain you can see someone is asleep in the next room. It's my wife, Sabina. Her parents, her sisters and her twelve-year-old brother have been killed with the rest of the family. You told me that you had killed hundreds of Jews near Golta, and that is where they were taken." Looking into his eyes, I added, "You yourself don't know who you have shot, so we can assume that you are the murderer of her family."

He jumped up, his eyes blazing, looking as if he were about to strangle me.

I held up my hand and said, "Now - let's try an experiment. I shall wake my wife and tell her who you are, and what you have done. I can tell you what will happen. My wife will not speak one word of reproach! She'll embrace you as if you were her brother. She'll bring you supper, the best things she has in the house.

"Now, if Sabina, who is a sinner like us all, can forgive and love like this, imagine how Jesus, who is perfect Love, can forgive and love you! Only return to Him - and everything you have done will be forgiven!"

Borila was not heartless within, he was consumed by guilt and misery at what he had done, and he had shaken his brutal talk at us as a crab its claws. One tap at his weak spot, and his defenses crumbled. The music had already moved his heart, and now came - instead of the attack he expected - words of forgiveness. His reaction was amazing. He jumped up and tore at his collar with both hands, so that his shirt was rent apart. "Oh God, what shall I do, what shall I do?" he cried. He put his head in his hands and sobbed noisily as he rocked himself back and forth. "I'm a murderer, I'm soaked in blood, what shall I do?" Tears ran down his cheeks.

I cried, "In the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, I command the devil of hatred to go out of your soul!"

Borila fell on his knees trembling, and we began to pray aloud. He knew no prayers; he simply asked again and again for forgiveness and said that he hoped and knew it would be granted. We were on our knees together for some time; then we stood up and embraced each other, and I said, "I promised to make an experiment. I shall keep my word."

I went into the other room and found my wife still sleeping calmly. She was very weak and exhausted at that time. I woke her gently and said, "There is a man here whom you must meet. We believe he has murdered your family, but he has repented, and now he is our brother."

She came out in her dressing-gown and put out her arms to embrace him: then both began to weep and to kiss each other again and again. I have never seen bride and bridegroom kiss with such love and passion and purity as this murderer and the survivor among his victims. Then, as I foretold, Sabina went to the kitchen to bring him food.

While she was away the thought came to me that Borila's crime had been so terrible that some further lesson was needed. I went to the next room and returned with my son, Mihai, who was then two, asleep in my arms. It was only a few hours since Borila had boasted to us how he had killed Jewish children in their parents' arms, and now he was horrified; the sight was an unbearable reproach. He expected me to accuse him. But I said, "Do you see how quietly he sleeps? You are also like a newborn child who can rest in the Father's arms. The blood that Jesus shed has cleansed you."

Borila's happiness was very moving: he stayed with us that night, and when he awoke the next day, he said, "It's a long time since I slept like that."

St. Augustine says, "Anima humana naturaliter

Christiana est" - the human soul is naturally Christian. Crime is against one's own nature, the result of social pressure or many other causes, and what a relief it is to cast it off as he had done!

That morning Borila wanted to meet our Jewish friends and I took him to many Hebrew Christian homes. Everywhere he told his story, and he was received as the returning prodigal son. Then, with a

New Testament which I gave him, he went to join his regiment in another town.

Borila later came to say that his unit has been ordered to the front. "What shall I do?" he asked. "I'll have to start killing again."

I said, "No, you've killed more than a soldier needs to already. I don't mean that a Christian shouldn't defend his country if it is attacked. But you, personally, shouldn't kill any more - better allow others to kill you. The Bible doesn't forbid that!"

10

As I told the story. Gaston grew quieter. At the end, he smiled and reached out to clasp my hand; and so he fell into an untroubled sleep.

In the morning we were moved back together into another cell. Among the prisoners, I found Grigore, who was also a war criminal responsible for massacring Jews. He knew Borila.

I told Gaston, "There's an epilogue to the story of the man who killed my wife's family. This man can tell you it."

Grigore explained how he had served with Borila in Transmistria, where they had massacred the Jews. "When we went to Russia again, he was a changed man," he said. "We couldn't understand it. He put aside his weapons and instead of taking lives, he saved them. He volunteered to rescue the wounded under fire, and in the end he saved his officer."

11

The months turned into years: two had gone by, and except that the faces came and went, all else remained the same. Prison made of some men saints, and of others brutes, and it was difficult to tell who would be saint, and who brute; but one thing was sure - that the majority of prisoners would go on living, as it were, in a vacuum. They sprawled on their bunks, hour after hour with nothing to do. Talk became the whole life. I wondered what would happen if science should ever make work unnecessary. There is a limit to innovation in sex, films, and other drugs; and so many have nothing else in their minds.

As my third year in Gherla progressed, things eased a little. We gained a little more freedom of speech, a few mouthfuls more of food. Conditions outside were changing again, we gathered. We did not know in what way, nor that the greatest trial still lay ahead.

page 235 In God's Underground

PART EIGHT

On a morning of March, 1962, the guards burst into the cells shouting "All priests outside!" The others gathered their few belongings and filed dutifully into the corridors. I did not stir.

We had a new commandant, a martinet called Alexandrescu. This move, whatever its purpose, meant more trouble, and I wanted to work and preach without fresh hindrance. It turned out that the whole jail was being divided into class groups: "intellectuals" in one cell, peasants in another, military men in a third, and so on. Overcrowding and the stupidity of the guards led to muddles. A member of a sect called "Students of the Bible" was placed in a cell of writers and teachers; he was an ignorant laborer, but to the officials, all "students" were intellectuals.

When the clergy had departed, a guard asked me what I was. "A pastor," I replied in a country accent. So I was placed in a cell with shepherds and farm hands. "Pastor" is the usual word for a shepherd in Rumanian.

I escaped segregation for a few weeks. Then an informer betrayed me, and I was taken, after a beating, to the cell in which priests had been gathered. It was to be my home for the rest of my stay in Gherla - cavernous, with walls of gray, dirty cement. The only light was from two narrow windows. Bunks were closely packed in tiers four-high. There were some low benches, and a table. The prisoners

page 236 In God's Underground

- mostly clergy, but with other Christian believers - numbered about 100. There was always a queue waiting to use the lavatory bucket.

As I entered, a deep voice cried, "Welcome, welcome!" It was old Bishop Mirza, an exemplar of the Orthodox faith and a man of great goodness. His rusty black pullover was full of holes. He had sad gentle eyes and an aureole of white hair.

Heads were raised and I greeted men I knew - including Archimandrite Miron, who had a bunk above the bishop and Gaston.

That evening, in the hour which the priest's room had set aside for prayer, Catholics collected in one corner, the Orthodox occupied another, the Unitarians a third. The Jehovah's Witnesses had a nest on the upper bunks; the Calvinists assembled down below. Twice a day, our various services were held: but among all these ardent worshippers I could scarcely find two men of different sects to say one "Our Father" together.

Far from fostering understanding, our common plight made for conflict. Catholics could not forgive the Orthodox hierarchy for collaborating with Communism. Minorities disagreed about "rights." Disputes arose over every point of doctrine. And while discussion was normally conducted with genteel malice, as learned in seminaries on wet Sunday afternoons, sometimes tempers flared

When mass was celebrated a few feet from his bunk day after day, the evangelical pastor Haupt evoked some words of Martin Luther.

"What's that?" one of the Catholics demanded.

Haupt raised his voice obligingly: "I repeated the words of Luther. 'All the brothels which God condemns, all murders, thefts, adulteries do not make so much harm as the abomination of the Papal mass.'"

After the service had broken up, One of the Catholics, Father Fazekas, said: "Dear brother, have you not heard the saying, 'Mankind has suffered three great catastrophes - the fall of Lucifer, and of Adam, and the revolt of Martin Luther'?"

Father Andricu, an Orthodox priest, joined in the counter-attack: "Luther and Lucifer," he put in, "are one and the same!" So Catholic and Orthodox followers became temporary allies. But before nightfall, they were squabbling over the supremacy of Rome.

Fazekas was of Hungarian origin, and this was held against him even by his fellow-Catholics. When he prayed aloud to the Virgin Mary as "patron of Hungary," general displeasure was shown.

"Isn't the Blessed Virgin Rumania's patron too?"

asked a patriotic Orthodox priest.

"Certainly not, she is Hungary's patron."

Gaston ironically wondered if the Virgin was not patron of Palestine, since it seemed treacherous to leave the country of her birth to become patron of another.

"Perhaps you haven't heard that the Jews murdered her son?" said Fazekas.

Bishop Mirza, smiling gently, tried to calm everyone down. "The Virgin is not bound to any one country," he said. "She leads the Church, she is Queen of Heaven, she moved the planets and heads the choirs of angels!"

I said that didn't leave God much to do.

Other Protestants supported me but in a manner which I disliked. "Why should I venerate Jesus's mother like this?" said one. "She cannot save."

Fazekas replied, "Poor man! Do you venerate only those who will save you? The mother of the Lord sings in the Magnificat, 'All generations will call me blessed.' They do so because she was Jesus's mother, not because she distributes favors."

It was a good answer, yet, much as I honor the Virgin Mary, I believe her role has been exaggerated by her following, and that this distortion began in ancient times. When Christians first thought about Heaven, they had visions of an Oriental court: a place of luxury, music and sweet scents. A man requiring a favor from the sultan found a friend, who said a word to a vizier, who might pass it on to the sultan's favorite wife, and she to her husband. It created the idea of a spiritual hierarchy, in which simple men put their requests to priests, priests to the saints, the saints to the Virgin.

The bedrock of my faith is that a man may speak directly to God, but there are times when argument only encourages anger. I told the others of the two martyrs of different confessions who were sent together to the stake. They were asked if they had a last wish before the fire was lit. Both said, "Yes! Tie us back to back so that I didn't have to see that damned heretic as I die."

Sometimes I too could not hide my feelings. For hours I listened to Father Ranghet, a Dominican in the bunk below, telling his beads.

At last I said, "Why do you have to appeal a thousand times a day to the Virgin? Is she deaf, or indifferent or reluctant to hear? When I ask someone here for a favor he grants it if he can - but I do not keep on asking, if he doesn't."

Ranghet was cross. "Since you Lutherans have no belief in the infallibility of the Holy Father, you have still less cause to believe in your own," he said. "What's wrong in your impaired sight is right in mine." And he went back to repeating "Hail Mary..." rather louder than before.

"You speak often of the 'Holy Father' - do you mean God?" I asked.

"I mean His Holiness the Pope!" he answered.

"To me it seems blasphemy to use divine titles for a human being," I replied. "You call him Christ's Vicar on earth, which means his substitute - but I cannot accept such a substitute, any more than I could allow my wife to have a substitute for me."

"You go too far!" he cried.

And I had thought it was he who went too far. Only that day Father Ranghet had said that all the sacrifices, of life, of liberty, offered by all men, were as nothing compared with the offering he made at the altar when he sacrificed the son of God. I could not accept that a priest made God from a piece of bread, or that there was any need for such a thing. I could not believe that my eternal destiny depended on absolution from a man who might not be too sure of Heaven himself.

I looked for topics on which we could agree. When Pastor Weingartner, a modernist Protestant, took issue with Catholics on the Virgin Birth, I felt bound to take their side.

Weingartner said he could not accept such a scientific improbability.

I replied, "It is too late to make an historical inquiry into the Virgin Birth, but it is also too early to dismiss it as scientifically impossible. An American biologist called Loeb has already produced a birth without male seed in infra-organisms. What a biologist can do for a small being surely God can do for man?"

"But the history of religion is crowded with virgin births," said Weingartner. "It can only be a myth."

I answered by telling the story of a famous rabbi who lived in the Ukraine in Czarist times, and was once called upon to give evidence in defense of a follower. The noble looks and spirituality of Rabbi Hofez Haim impressed the court, but the old man refused to take the oath; he was unwilling, he said, to involve God's name in his evidence. The prosecution protested, "We must have a guarantee that he is telling the truth."

The defense lawyer rose. "Your honor," he said, "may I mention something which will prove the character of my witness and show that we can accept his evidence, even if, for religious reasons, he cannot be put on oath? Rabbi Hofez Haim often goes from shop to shop collecting money for the poor. One day a thief knocked him down and snatched the purse containing the collection. The rabbi was upset - not so much at the loss of the money, which he instantly decided to replace from his own small savings at home - but at the harm done to the thief's soul. He ran after him calling, 'You have no guilt before God, it is my money and I give it to you freely! The money for the poor is safe at my house! Spend what you have taken with a clear conscience!'"

The judge gazed sternly at the lawyer. "Do you believe this story?" he asked.

"No, I don't."

"Then why tell us stories you don't believe?"

"Your honor, has such a story ever been told of you, or me or my friend, the prosecutor? They say instead - of course it's quite untrue - that we are too fond of women, or drink, or gambling. What a saint this man must be to have such legends woven around his name!"

Weingartner said, "Very amusing - but I don't know if the story about the rabbi was true, and I cannot believe the story of the Virgin Birth either."

"Christians believe the word of God," I said. "But if it were a myth, as you call it, don't scoff. Myths have a profound place in human thought. They are often the measure of a man's greatness."

"You mean that people must have thought Jesus very great to believe that he was not born like other men?" he said.

"My own son, when he was very young, asked me how Jesus was born," I said. "So I told him again the story of the manger. 'No,' he objected, 'that's not what I want to know. Sometimes people say, "What's born of a cat eats mice," and if Jesus had been born like us, he would have been bad like us.'"

Bishop Mirza had been listening to us. "A child spoke like that!" he said.

"You have a point," admitted Pastor Weingartner. "We must try harder to understand each other's views."

I said, "I confess that I would have accepted Christianity in another form than Lutherism, if it had been so presented to me at the time of my conversion. What matters is respect for the Scriptures as the only rule, and salvation by faith in Jesus. The names and forms don't count."

Next morning a pleasing thing happened. Bishop Mirza came to me and said, "I thought in the night of the Lord's Prayer which tells us to say, 'Our Father which are in heaven... forgive our trespasses.' Jesus did not tell us to confess to a priest, or receive absolution from him - he told us to pray for it to the Father. Of course the question is not a simple one, but if I were a Protestant, I should use this argument. So I thought that in friendship I would make you a present of it in exchange for your defense of the Virgin Mary."

The bishop had set us an example. If we failed to live in peace together, we fell into the trap which the Communists had laid: by locking us up together, they deprived the other prisoners of spiritual guidance while we vitiated our cause with quarrels. But what else did they have in mind?

Electricians had been working in the prison for some time, and in many cells loudspeakers had been fitted, one to each wall. So we were to have broadcasts.

Gaston said, "It won't be light music."

2

When the entire prison had been divided into classes, a series of lectures began. They seemed absurd. A brash young political officer would explain that an eclipse of the sun was about to occur, but there was no cause for alarm - socialist science had freed us from superstition. He proceeded to explain the workings of a solar eclipse to a yawning audience of dons and doctors. The event was to take place on February 15, and since it was the duty of the People's Republic to broaden our views, we could watch from the courtyard.

Weingartner's hand went up. "Please, if it rains can we have the eclipse in the hall instead?"

"No," said the lecturer seriously, and began his explanation again from the start.

The indoctrination lectures lasted for hours. The same points were driven home over and over again. At the end of the day, exhausted and ill-tempered, we were left to our own disputes.

These were often started by Father Andricu, to whom Luther and Lucifer were as one. His extremism swung him between a crusade against the Russians during the war to championship of Communist ideas after it was over. He had traveled the country preaching in favor of the Party until his former comrades decided that "the Red Priest" had outlived his usefulness, so he was arrested, beaten and sentenced to ten years for his wartime activities. Now he was an all-too-vociferous champion of the Orthodox faith. "It's the only true religion!" he would trumpet. "The rest are frauds and mockeries!"

Once I asked: "When you were baptized, Father Andricu, was it in the Orthodox Church?"

"Of course! By a bishop!" he answered.

"And you studied religious doctrine at an Orthodox school?"

"The finest in Rumania!"

"Then you won't be upset if I give you the one honest, logical reason why you're an Orthodox believer? It is that fifty years ago a Rumanian Orthodox man copulated with a Rumanian Orthodox woman."

Andricu was furious; but I said that this principle was true for most of us. We are put in a mold from earliest youth and taught only the arguments which favor our parents' religion. Yet we are convinced that we have thought it all out for ourselves.

I went on, "Once I overheard the inmates of a stable discussing their beliefs. The lambs said the only true religion was to say, 'Baa, baa!' Calves said the correct ritual was to say 'Moo!' Pigs asserted that the right song of praise was 'Honk! honk!'"

"Don't put us on a level with the animals," Andricu protested. "I may be a simple priest, but I have studied other faiths besides my own."

I said that we had all done that, but from a viewpoint which is ours through the accident of birth. Turning to a group of Protestants, I asked at random, "How many of you know the ninety-five theses which Luther nailed on the church door at Wittenburg?"

They all did. Pastor Haupt quoted Luther's words, "Here I stand; I can do no other!"

I asked if the Protestants could also repeat from the Papal Bull the reasons for Luther's excommunication. "Leo X was no madman," I said, "we ought to know his reasons." But not one of them had read that great historical letter.

Father Andricu was by now arguing with a rabbi who turned on him to say, "Are you by any chance acquainted with our Talmud?"

Andricu retorted: "Have ~you~ looked into our New Testament?"

The answer in each case was clearly "No."

To avert another clash, I asked the company, "Do you know Tolstoy's story of how he once explained his faith point by point to a rabbi: meekness, humility, patience... 'We don t need the New Testament for these virtues; we too honor them,' said the rabbi. Finally Tolstoy said, 'Jesus has taught us one thing which Jewish religion does not. He tells us to love our enemies.' 'This we do not practice,' the rabbi admitted, 'But neither do you Christians.'"

3

As the prison lectures continued, I saw that although they were in themselves ridiculous, there lay behind them a clever plan. The speakers turned from politics to appeals directed at the pleasure-seeking, irresponsible side in all of us which Freudians called the Id. They told us how much we were missing in the world. They talked of food, drink, sex - subjects with which they were more at home than Marxist dialectic, although that was not forgotten. One talk took us again among Darwin's apes. A young political officer worked his way through a brief on the theory of evolution, and with mangled quotations from Marx, Lenin and Darwin progressed by way of conflict between Christianity and science to its sad consequences in America where millions were starving.

At first, we were encouraged to argue, and when a lecturer said that "only a handful of chemicals" remained of the body after death. I asked why, if that were so, some Communists had given their lives for their beliefs: "For a Christian to sacrifice himself,"

I said, "may be considered wise. To give up the transitory things of life to win eternity is like laying down ten dollars to win a million. But why should a Communist give his life - unless he too has something to gain for himself?"

The political officer could find no reply. So I suggested that the answer had been given by St. Augustine when he said that "the soul is naturally Christian."

"Atheism is a mask for your feelings. In the depths of your heart - which is never reached unless a man practices meditation or prayer - you, too, believe there is a reward for living up to ideals. Deep in your heart, you also believe in God."

"Let us see what Lenin has to say about that!" said the lecturer, and from a well-thumbed booklet, which had often given him inspiration before, he read, "'Even flirting with the idea of God is unutterable vileness, contagion of the most abominable kind. Filthy deeds, acts of violence and physical contagions are far less dangerous.'" He grinned. "Any more questions?"

"Have you a child?" I asked.

"I have a daughter in the Young Pioneers."

"And would you prefer that she should be stricken with a horrible disease rather than come to believe in her Creator? That is what Lenin says - that cancer is better than religion."

The political officer called me up and slapped my face.

Under this onslaught of indoctrination, a blow seemed a modest price to pay for upholding one's beliefs. Clearly, there was more to come. We had a sense of being constantly spied on. We puzzled over the silent loudspeakers.

Until recently we had been starved, beaten, abused, but no one had cared what we thought. "Invent all the new Cabinets you like in your cells, you bandits - we have the Government in Bucharest!" Commandant Dorabantu used to say. But he had gone - removed for falsifying the accounts.

The lectures showed how this attitude had changed, following the new policy of Gheorghiu-Dej, Rumania's dictator, who was trying to ease the Kremlin's grip and do business with the West. For this Dej had to show a more "democratic" facade. The army of political prisoners held in Rumania was an embarrassment to him, yet we could not simply be set free to spread "counter-revolutionary beliefs." Our ways of thought were to be altered, by mass brainwashing.

To prisoners in Gherla in 1962, this was one theory among many, and few believed it. There was uncertainty about what actually happened in brainwashing. Feelings were summed up by Radu Ghinda, a well-known author and Christian writer, who had recently joined us: "If they haven't changed me in fifteen years, how will they do so now?"

We were talking this over when the cell door opened to admit more new arrivals. Among them was a large hang-dog figure who took a few halting steps from side to side, as if to escape the stares of prisoners.

Radu Ghinda was the first to recognize him. "Daianu!" he cried.

The man shuffled over to embrace his friend. Nichifor Daianu had been a great figure in Rumania. Poet, Professor of Mystical Theology, leader of the anti-Semitic "National Christian Defence League," he had come to Gherla from Aiud jail to continue his twenty-five-year sentence.

At first I hardly recognized the man. His great belly had gone. The skin hung in folds at his chin like a turkey's. The ~bon viveur~ and lady-killer, whose face had once been slapped in a Bucharest restaurant, had become a trembling, spidery old man.

Fellow-prisoners from Aiud told us what had happened there. Daianu, who was used to plenty of food, had tried to get a second helping of barley gruel from the cooks. The prison governor had him turned away. On the following day the governor was there again. "Stop!" he said. "That man is too fat. Let him wait until tomorrow." Next day, as Daianu's turn came, the governor said, "Tell me, Daianu, is there a God?" The cook held the ladle suspended, Daianu mumbled something. "Speak up, let us all hear!" Daianu said, "There is no God." "Louder," said the governor. "There is no God!" shouted Daianu. The governor nodded for him to be served. Daianu stuffed the gruel into his mouth. This spectacle so pleased the governor that he had it repeated every day for the next week. The story was told all over Rumania, and later abroad as well.

But Daianu's gift for writing religious poetry remained. Friends from his Fascist days encouraged him to recite some of the verses he had composed at Aiud. They were songs of grief and repentance, more beautiful than any he had yet written. He had retained, too, his anti-Semitism, like his friend Radu Ghinda. Their following among ex-Iron Guard prisoners smuggled scraps of food and even cigarettes to them in the priests' room. Anti-Semitism dies hard, and Daianu and Ghinda were martyrs to the cause.

When theories about brainwashing were being discussed one evening, Ghinda scoffed. "Rubbish! Pavlov played tricks with the behavior-patterns of dogs, and the Communists in Korea adapted some of his ideas to make American prisoners change sides - but these methods won't work on people of education and intelligence. We're not G.I.s!"

"Nor dogs," said Daianu.

No one disagreed.

4

Pastor Weingartner told us of a simple personality test he had learned while studying psychology: you drew a line down the center of a card, then asked people to make of it the first thing that came into their heads. We used a soaped board and a nail.

One man drew a sword, another a helmet, others a flower, a crucifix, a book, a geometric figure. I said, "I need another board - this is too small for what I have to draw."

Not one in ten of us showed in our drawings the touch of mysticism which is at the heart of a priestly nature.

Weingartner laughed. "No wonder they wouldn't let me try it at the seminary! Perhaps we should all learn to make shoes - for it's the shoemaker among us who seems to have a truly spiritual character."

He referred to Gelu, a sectarian believer who had a great knowledge of the Bible. This seemed to irritate Daianu.

"My dear man," he said, "if you want to tell us about shoes and how to mend them, well and good. But you are among men here who possess theological degrees from the great universities of Europe and need no Bible classes."

"You're right, professor," replied Gelu. "It's I who need instruction. Could you tell me what the Old Testament book of Habakkuk is about?"

"A very minor prophet," said Daianu. "Don't worry your head about him."

"Well, then, the Book of Obadiah?"

Obadiah was another prophet whom shoemakers did not need to know.

"Perhaps you can tell me about Haggai?"

Daianu could not. There was not a theologian in the room who could muster three sentences on the subject. Gelu astonished us by quoting whole chapters from these prophets by heart.

The clergy studied books about the Bible rather than the Holy Scriptures themselves. Another reproach that could rightly be made against them was that they were grounded in dogma and dialectic, but knew next to nothing of the Communist ideology that was working to destroy them.

During 1963 we had news of Pope John's appeal for a reconciliation between the "separated brethren," and soon we were quarreling over how unity might be achieved.

"We fight over the Kingdom of Heaven, which none of us has," I said. "If we possessed it, we should not dispute. Those who truly love Christ must love one another. Like so many blind men whom Jesus has healed, we discuss how our sight was restored. One says, 'It was done by the power of faith.' Another, 'He touched my eyes.' A third, 'He rubbed clay mixed with spittle on my eyelids.' If Jesus came among us, He would say, 'I have made you whole in different ways. Now you should not quarrel, but rejoice!'"

Goethe says that "color is the pain of light": passing through a prism, light is torn to pieces. I saw our division in the search for truth as a pain borne by Christ.

5

The loudspeaker on the wall at last crackled into life. "One-two three-four-testing," said a voice repeatedly. Then came the words: "Communism is good. Communism is good. Communism is good." A pause. More crackling. The voice returned with increased volume, resonance and authority:

Communism is good
Communism is good
Communism is good
Communism is goad

It continued all night and into the next day. Soon we were only intermittently conscious of the tape-recorded words, but still they penetrated our minds, and when finally the voice stopped, switched off at a control center somewhere in the prison, the words rang in my head: "Communism is good. Communism is good. Communism is good."

Weingartner said this was the first stage in a long process. "Our rulers have learned it from the Russians and the Russians from Peking. Next it will be public confession. Under Mao-Tse-Tung, the Chinese must attend lectures in their factories, offices and streets. Then they are made to denounce themselves, to say how they plotted against the proletariat, five, ten or twenty years ago. If you don't confess you're imprisoned as a stubborn counter-revolutionary: if you do confess, you go to jail for what you have said. So people try to confess and yet not to confess, to admit to treacherous thoughts, while denying they have acted on them. One man denounces another. All trust between friends and in families is destroyed. The same procedure has begun with us!"

Father Fazekas said, "Satan always apes God.

It is a mockery of Christian confession."

"How long will it last?" asked Gaston.

"Until you believe that 'Communism is good,' perhaps for years," said Weingartner.

Our next lecturer was plump and jolly. He told us of the wonderful, new Rumania which was developing under Gheorghiu-Dej's Sixteen-Year Plan, and of the paradise which those whom the Party considered worthy were already enjoying. He described the privileges granted to loyal workers, the good food, the flowing wine, the glorious holidays at Black Sea resorts with girls in bikinis everywhere.

"But I forget!" he laughed. "Most of you fellows have never seen a bikini. You don't even know what it is, poor chaps! Let me explain. The best things in life are not left to the decadent West!"

His eyes gleamed and his voice became thick as he began a gloating description of breast and belly and thigh, and mixed the pleasures of wine and travel into his gross talk. I have never seen on human faces such hungry lust as I saw then on most of those around me in the big hall. They were ugly and frightening in their suggestion of animals in heat. Their human decency was stripped away by the man's unbridled talk, and only sensual greed remained.

So much pleasure waited for us outside, the lecturer said. "There's the door. ~You~ can open it, if you choose. Throw off the reactionary garbage of ideas which have made criminals of you! Come to our side! Learn to be free!"

Little was said after these talks. No one thought now of the wives and hard work that awaited them outside. The raw desire which is part of our will to live had been skilfully revived.

Protestants and Orthodox priests who had been married suffered surely much more from this appeal to the sex instinct than the Catholic priests who had led a life of celibacy from their very youth.

We had been kept for months past on low rations, and weighed regularly to ensure that we remained forty pounds below normal. Now the food improved, but it had a strange flavor. I suspected the presence of aphrodisiacs, and imprisoned doctors later agreed with me that sexually-stimulating drugs had been added to our meals. Many of the staff left and now the doctors, the clerks who came to read out an announcement or a court verdict were nearly always girls. They wore tight, teasing dresses and used scent and make-up. They seemed to linger deliberately in the cells.

"You've only one life," the lecturer said each day. "It passes quickly. How much time have you left? Throw in your lot with us. We want to help you to make the most of it!"

This appeal to the ego, the self-enhancing, self-protective side of one's nature, came when primitive emotions were well in ferment. Finally, as the veneer cracked, came the appeal to the super-ego, our conscience, social values and ethical standards. The lecturers said our patriotism had been false, our ideals a fraud, and in their place they tried to plant the Communist ideology.

"Struggle meetings" was the name given to these mass-suggestion sessions, and the struggle never stopped. "What are your wives doing now?" asked the jolly lecturer. "What you'd like to be doing yourselves!" We were exhausted, and hysteria was close. The tape-recorders ground out the message that Communism was good during every hour when lectures were not in progress. Prisoners quarreled among themselves.

Daianu the poet was the first to break. At the end of a lecture, he jumped to his feet and began to babble about his crimes against the State. "I see it now, I see it all! I have thrown away my life for a false cause!" He blamed his land-owning parents for putting him on the wrong road. No one had asked him to attack religion, but he repudiated his faith, the saints and sacraments. He ranted against "superstition" and blasphemed against God. On and on he went.

Then Radu Ghinda stood up and continued in the same vein. "I have been a fool," he shouted. "I have been misled by capitalist and Christian lies.... Never again will I set foot in a church except to spit in it."

Daianu and Ghinda called on the prisoners to give up their old beliefs with greater enthusiasm than the lecturers themselves. Both were gifted speakers, and many who heard their eloquent praises of the joy and liberty that Communism brings were deeply shaken, convinced that they spoke from genuine faith.

When Ghinda sat down, a gaunt, trembling old man shouted, "You all know me - Ceneral Silvianu of the Royal Army. I disown my rank and loyalty. I am ashamed at the role I played in making criminal war on our ally, Russia. I served the exploiting classes. I disgraced my country..."

The general was followed by an ex-police chief, who "confessed" that Communism would have come to power sooner had the police not hindered it; as if every man there did not know that Communism had been imposed by the Russians.

One after another, men stood and parroted their confessions. This was the first fruit of months of planned starvation, degradation, ill-treatment and exposure to mass suggestion. The first to give way were those, like Daianu and Ghinda, whose lives were already eaten by private guilt. Daianu had preached asceticism but practiced gluttony and pursued women. He told students to give up the world for God, and himself became a propagandist for Hitler. He said, "Love Jesus"; and he hated the Jews. He thought he was a believer, but what a man believes is shown in his daily life: his poems, fine as they were, expressed aspirations, not fulfillment. Ghinda, too, was torn ideologically by anti-Semitism on the one hand, and his faith on the other. And both men were growing old: they had served more than fifteen years in prison, and faced many more.

Others in the priests' room did not yield so quickly, and for them further suffering lay in store. Our quarrels, at least, came to a halt. We learned that all our denominations could be reduced to two: the first is hatred, which makes ritual and dogma a pretext for attacking others; the second is love, in which men of all kinds realize their oneness and brotherhood before God. At times it had seemed that a mission to priests would be more valuable than any other. More often now it was as if the cell were ablaze with the spirit of self-sacrifice and renewed faith. In such moments the angels seemed all around us.

For the Communion service, bread was needed and many were ready to sacrifice their ration. But the Orthodox ritual requires that the bread be consecrated over an altar containing a relic from the body of a martyr. There was no relic.

"We have living martyrs with us," said Father Andricu. They consecrated the bread and a little wine in a chipped cup, which had been smuggled from the hospital over the body of Bishop Mirza as he lay ill in bed.

6

Soon the prisoners who had been "converted" were asked to lecture in turn to the others, and they did so with passion, believing that their release depended on their efforts. Then word went around of a terrible sequel to the defection of Daianu and Ghinda. Two members of the Iron Guard stole a chisel from the carpenters' shop, opened their veins and bled to death as protest.

I found Daianu and Ghinda in a corner of the cell. "What do you think of yourselves now that your betrayal has cost the lives of two men who believed in you?" I asked.

Ghinda said, "They died so that the people may live!"

"A week ago you were counted among the enemies of the people yourselves," I said.

Daianu burst out: "I mean to get out of here, whoever suffers!"

Feeling against them became so strong that they were taken to another cell. Miron said, "Strange that men who wrote with what seemed deep Christian faith should turn traitor so easily!"

Perhaps the answer was that in their writings Daianu and Ghinda praised Christ for the gifts. He gives us - peace, love, salvation. A real disciple does not seek gifts, but Christ himself, and so is ready for self-sacrifice to the end. They were not followers of Jesus, but customers; when the Communists opened a shop next door with goods at lower prices, they took their custom there.

7

I had become very ill again. During 1963 I was moved to the prison hospital. I had been there one week, when every man was ordered up. Some could hardly walk, but we helped each other out into a big yard where the whole prison had been assembled. We stood while an hour-long play was acted by chosen prisoners. The play mocked Christianity and when the officers around the commandant clapped or laughed, the audience did the same.

When it was over, Alexandrescu raised his harsh voice to ask for positive or negative comments. It was not enough to show approval, reasons must be given. Daianu led the way. Ghinda followed. One after another men went up to repeat slogans against religion. As they rejoined the ranks, some embraced me tearfully, and said, "We ~must~ say these things until it is over!"

page 254 In God's Underground

When the commandant called me out, I remembered what my wife had said to me many years before, at the Congress of Cults: "Go and wash this shame from the face of Christ!"

I was well-known at Gherla; I had been in so many cells.

Hundreds of eyes were on me, and they all seemed to ask one question: "Will he praise Communism too?"

Major Alexandrescu called, "Go on! Speak!" He did not fear opposition. When the stubborn ones broke - and it was only a matter of time, they thought - it showed the Party's power.

I began cautiously, "It is Sunday morning, and our wives and mothers and children are praying for us, in church or at home. We should have liked to pray for them, too.... Instead we have watched this play."

As I spoke of their families, tears came into the eyes of prisoners. I went on, "Many here have spoken against Jesus, but what is it that you have against Him? You speak of the proletariat, but wasn't Jesus a carpenter? You say that he who doesn't work shall not eat, but this was said long ago, in St. Paul's Epistle to the Thessalonians. You speak against the wealthy, but Jesus drove the moneylenders from the temple with whips. You want Communism, but don't forget that the first Christians lived in a community, sharing all they had. You wish to raise up the poor, but the Magnificat, the Virgin Mary's song at Jesus's birth, says that God will exalt the poor above the rich. All that is good in Communism comes from the Christians!

"Now Marx has said that all proletarians must unite," I continued. "But some are Communists and some are Socialists and others Christians, and if we mock each other, we cannot unite. I would never mock an atheist. Even from the Marxist point of view this is wrong, for if you mock you split the proletariat."

I quoted what Marx says in his introduction to ~Das Kapital~, that Christianity is the ideal religion for remaking a life destroyed by sin. I asked if there was anybody, even a Communist, who was without sin - for if he had not sinned against God, he had against the Party. I gave them many quotations from their own authors. Major Alexandrescu shifted in his chair, and kicked the ground with his toe, but did not interrupt.

The prisoners, too, were quiet, and seeing they were moved I forgot where I was and began to preach openly about Christ, and what He had done for us, and what He meant to us. I said that just as no one had heard of a school without examinations, or a factory where work was not scrutinized to see that it was good, so all of us would be judged, by ourselves, by our fellows, by God. I looked at the commandant and said, "You will be judged, too, Major Alexandrescu."

He let it pass again, and I told how Jesus teaches love and gives eternal life. At the end prisoners burst suddenly into cheers.

When I returned to my place Miron said, "You have undone all their work," but I knew this was untrue. Gaston whispered, "Did you hear the cheers?" I answered, "They were cheering what they had found in their own hearts, not me."

Until now only a noisy minority of priests had fallen under the influence of brainwashing. We who opposed it openly were also few, but our sympathizers were many, even if they lacked the courage or the wit to fight back.

It was not easy. As a result of this speech I lost my sanctuary in the prison hospital and was sent back to the priests' room.

The political officers told us that Daianu and Radu Ghinda, in their private cells, had volunteered to write about the wonders of the People's Republic, which neither of them had set eyes on for some fifteen years. They were given pen and paper and all the Party literature and tourist propaganda they might need. The two men made full use of this chance to prove their new convictions, for some weeks later they were freed. It was a powerful blow against our resistance. They were the first to be released under the new system, and we could not know that they were also to be the last.

Lieutenant Konya, the political officer, brought a newspaper into the priests' room and called to Father Andricu.

"Read this out," he said, "so that everyone can hear."

Andricu read the headline: "A COUNTRY THAT LAUGHS AND HEARTS THAT SING. It was an article by Radu Ghinda, with a smiling photograph taken before his arrest.

Lieutenant Konya said, "We want you to know that every one of you has the same chance of freedom and work, just as soon as you give up your nonsensical, out-of-date beliefs and join the people of the new Rumania!"

Hearts that sing! Everyone remembered Ghinda as a bag of bones. We knew that his family was in distress and his child had been refused education.

Daianu also lent his name to glorifications of freedom in Socialist Rumania, but, like the French medical students who blotted their copy-books and were marked down as ~bon pour l'Orient~ - "good for the East" - the output of Daianu and Ghinda was good only for the West. There they could trade on the ignorance of those who did not know the country. The articles they wrote appeared in special newspapers and magazines sent to thousands of Rumanians abroad, but nobody oould get them in Rumania itself.

Everyone was excited - at the two men's release. Many who had suffered cruelty and humiliation for years, without giving way, now began to waver. But those who did yield, instead of being freed, had to prove their conversion by volunteering to work fourteen or sixteen hours a day. On returning to their cells they had to attend more lectures, or give them. They had to keep a "temperature chart of political health" - which meant that everyone had to write about his neighbors' attitude to Communism, whether it was lukewarm, or cold or even hostile.

The authorities cannot have received good reports about me. Lieutenant Konya came to bring me two pieces of news. First, he said that my wife was in prison, and had been for some time. Second, that I was to be flogged at 10 P.M. that evening for my repeated defiance and insolence, culminating in my speech at the "play."

The news about Sabina was a terrible shock, and my pain at the thought of it added to my fear of the beating to come. We all dreaded this period of waiting. Time dragged, and then passed all too quickly when I heard footsteps coming down the passage. The tramping boots went by. Someone was taken from the next cell. Presently I heard blows falling and screams from the room at the end of the corridor. Nobody came for me that night.

Next morning I was again warned. For six days the suspense was maintained. Then I was led up the passage. The blows burned like fire. When it was over, Lieutenant Konya, who supervised, shouted, "Give him some more!" Then I was slow in getting to my feet. "Ten more!" said Konya. I was half carried back to the cell, where the loudspeakers were blaring:

Christianity is stupid
Christianity is stupid
Christianity is stupid
Why not give it up?
Why not give it up?
Why not give it up?
Christianity is stupid
Christianity is stupid
Christianity is stupid
Why not give it up...?

Sometimes beatings were administered by warders in the cell, for "minor irregularities."

"Drop your trousers for a beating!"

We dropped them.

"Lie on your bellies!"
We lay on our bellies.
"Turn over on your backs, hold your feet up."
We rolled over.
We went on trying to pray. Sometimes a priest would say, "I call on 'Our Father' but what kind of father, what God abandons me to my enemies like this?" And we urged him, "Don't give way. Go on saying 'Our Father.' Be obstinate. By persisting you will renew your faith!" He could listen to us, because we shared his suffering.

When the guards became bored with beating, they grabbed a couple of prisoners. "Right!" they said. "Slap your friend in the face!" If the man failed to do so, they said, "You've lost your chance," and told the second man to strike the first. He hit out blindly. "Now slosh him back!" They struck at each other's faces until blood flowed. The guards roared with laughter.

One evening Lieutenant Konya told me to gather my things. Since I had not responded to treatment, a spell in the special block might help. There were many rumors about this section of the prison. Those who returned from it were few. They died, or they succumbed to brainwashing and were moved out. Some joined the indoctrination staff and learned to brainwash others.

We crossed the yard, turned several corners and stopped before a row of doors. One was opened and double-locked behind me.

I was alone in a cell walled in white tiles. The ceiling reflected fierce white light from concealed lamps. It was full summer, but the steam heating - which worked nowhere else in Gherla - was full on. Konya had left me in handcuffs, so that I could lie only on my back or side. I was soaked in sweat. The spy-hole clicked open, and the guard outside sniggered. "Something wrong with the heating?" My stomach ached. There had been a peculiar taste in the food, and I thought it was drugged again. The loudspeakers here had a new message:

Nobody believes in Christ now
Nobody believes in Christ now
Nobody believes in Christ now

No one goes to church
No one goes to church

page 259 In God's Underground

Give it up
Give it up
Give it up
Nobody believes in Christ now...

Konya was back in the morning, letting a flood of cool air through the open door. My handcuffs were unlocked. I stretched stiff arms and obeyed his order to follow him along the corridor.

A new cell awaited me, and fresh clothes. There was a bed with sheets, a table with a cloth, flowers in a vase. It was too much: I sat down and began to weep. When Konya left, I recovered. I looked at a newspaper on the table. It was the first I had seen in all my years of imprisonment. I tried to find in it news of a rumor going around Gherla that the U.S. Sixth Fleet had entered the Black Sea to demand free elections in the captive countries, but what I found was an item about a Communist dictator who had taken power in Cuba and was defying America on her own doorstep.

My first visitor was Commandant Alexandrescu. He said my new surroundings were a sample of the good life which was open to me. He began to attack religion. Christ, he said, was a fantasy invented by the Apostles to delude slaves into hopes of freedom in paradise.

I picked up the newspaper and gave it to him. "This is printed on the Party presses," I said. "It gives a date in July 1963. That means 1,963 years since the birth of someone who - according to you - never existed. You don't believe in Christ, but you accept him as the founder of our civilization."

Alexandrescu shrugged. "It means nothing; it's customary to count that way."

"But if Christ never came on earth, how did the custom arise?" I asked.

"Some liars started it."

I said: "Suppose you tell me that the Russians have landed on Mars, I need not believe you. But if I turn the radio-knob to hear New York and the Americans congratulate them, then I know it must be true. In the same way, we must accept Christ's existence as a historical fact when it is recognized in the Talmud by his worst enemies, the Pharisees, who also give the names of his mother and some of his Apostles. And again, we must be impressed when the Pharisees attribute miracles to Christ, while protesting that they were worked by black magic. Many heathen writers also recognized Him. Only Communists deny this plain fact of history, simply because it does not suit their theory."

Alexandrescu did not pursue the argument. Instead, he sent me a book. It was wonderful to have a book in one's hands after all these years, even if it was only ~The Atheist's Guide~. This manual, unknown in the West, is essential reading for all who want to make themselves careers behind the Iron Curtain.

My copy was well-bound, illustrated and carefully argued. From the origins of religion it made its way through Hinduism, Buddhism, Confucianism and Islam. Then came Christianity, with a chapter for each confession. Catholicism came out badly, Lutherism much better (Luther had defied the Pope), but all were shown to be impostures. Science had proved this, so the Church had always persecuted science. A full chapter portrayed the Church as a tool of capitalism through the centuries; Christ's exhortation to love your enemies meant no more than to bow to the exploiter. A special section was devoted to the corruption of the Russian priesthood (the book had evidently been translated from the Russian). One picture after another was used to show misleadingly, that Christian rites were based on heathen superstition. A last chapter analyzed "Forms of Atheist Propaganda" and concluded with a list of Soviet decrees aimed against religion. Over this I fell asleep.

8

During the next few weeks I alternated between promises and threats, between my flowery private room and the blinding cell with loudspeakers, between good, but probably drugged meals, and starvation, between argument and punishment. While undergoing the heat treatment I was joined one morning by Father Andricu, the former "Red priest" who had repented. He sat panting until he could bear no more. Then he jumped up and hammered wildly on the door, begging to be let out. Presently the commandant appeared.

"It can be hotter yet," said Alexandrescu. Or we could be free men if we chose, he repeated. "But if you were released, how would you act and what kind of sermons would you preach? I want you to write a draft." He gave us pen and paper and went out.

We sat down and wrote. When I had finished, I gave Andricu my sheaf of paper and took his to read through.

"You can hear sermons like that every Sunday," he said defensively, "Progressive, in a scientific, Marxist way."

I said, "Don't deceive yourself, Father Andricu. You know this is a recantation of all that you believe. Even if a priest loses his faith, he should be silent. I don't speak of judgment before God. What would your parishioners, your friends, your family think if they heard you preach this stuff? Don't let the Communists cheat you again. They buy you with promises that they never keep."

I argued for a long time with Andricu, telling him that in his heart he knew still the truth of Christianity. At last he said, "Give me back the sermons," and tore them into pieces."

9

A new series of "struggle meetings" attended by hundreds of prisoners began in the main hall, and we were sent from the special block to hear them. Most lectures were now - being delivered by men who, not long ago, were our cell-mates. After instruction, they came back to declaim praises of the Communism that had given them years of suffering. Their attacks on religion were based often on modern theologians who deny the Scriptures: propagandists like those of the "God is dead" school. "Study your own thinkers!" we were told. "They have proved that there is no objective truth in Christianity."

For ten to twelve hours a day we listened to lectures, joined discussions, absorbed the tape-recorded slogans. The brainwashed lectures made the appeal to the Id more frequently and more grossly than the official speakers; and their visions of freedom, money, a job with standing - the assault on the Ego - were more convincing.

In each cell, a handful of men reported daily on the "political health" of the others. Those who truckled to them were fairly safe. Those who did not usually ended in the special block. Informing touched everyone like a fever. A man near me complained to an officer that a guard had searched his bunk without looking beneath it!

On August 23, the anniversary of the armistice with Russia, most prisoners were ready to believe whatever they were told. A large meeting in the hall was addressed by Major Alexandrescu. "We have good news," he started.

Peasants whose farms had been seized broke into smiles when he announced that their land was flourishing in the collectives. Former merchants and bankers applauded when he said that trade was beginning to boom.

"Some of you," said the commandant, "are seeing reason at last. Others are being very foolish. You idiots! You have sat in prison for ten or fifteen years, waiting for the Americans to come and free you. I have news for you. The Americans are coming - but not to release you. They are coming to do business with us!"

Alexandrescu said the Party, under Premier Gheorghiu-Dej, had taken steps to win commercial favor in the West. Loans were being raised, factories built, nuclear plants operated, all with Western aid.

"You fools!" he spat out the words again. "You've all been living in illusion. We know the Americans better than you. If you beg, they give you nothing. If you insult and mock them, you get all you want. We've been cleverer than you."

Somebody laughed, high-pitched laughter, and others joined in. Soon the whole hall was rocking. The noise was becoming hysterical when, with a raised hand, the commandant quelled it. In good humor, he said that to compensate us all for being unable to join the "Freedom Day" celebrations, he had arranged that we should watch them - television had been installed for the occasion.

The TV show began with speeches by Gheorghiu-Dej and others on the fall of the Fascist regime in Rumania. None of the orators, of course, mentioned the vital roles played on August 23, 1944, by young King Michael, nor by the National Peasant statesman Juliu Maniu and the Communist Minister of Justice Patrascanu, since the King had been exiled, and the other two had died in jail.

I remembered that during Communism's early days people tried to avoid the anniversary parade, but now when the march-past began I was astonished by the endless columns tramping past the portraits of Marx, Lenin and Dej among the red flags flapping in the breeze. We heard the brassy music, the crowds' cheers, the shouts, "August 23 brings us freedom!"

"It was never Like this in the past," I said to Father Andricu beside me.

He hissed back: "The first time a girl is violated, she struggles. The second time she protests. The third time she enjoys it."

When the performance ended, another began.

"We shall now discuss the celebrations," Alexandrescu said.

One after another, the audience testified. Ex-soldiers, former policemen, landowners, peasants, industrialists. Each ended his contribution with the cry, "August 23 has brought us freedom!"

My turn came. I started in the mood of the day.

"If there's anyone to whom August 23 had brought liberty, it is I," I said. The Fascists hated me, and if Hitler had won his war I should be a piece of soap by now. But I'm alive, and the Bible has a saying, 'A live dog is better than a dead lion.'"

I continued to approving murmurs. "But in another way, I was free before August 23. Let me tell you how. In ancient times the Tyrant of Syracuse read the book of Epictetus, the philosopher-slave, and admired it so greatly that he offered to set him free. 'Free yourself!' replied Epictetus. His visitor protested, 'But I'm the king!' The philosopher answered, 'A tyrant ruled by his lusts is in bondage; a slave who rules his passions is free. King, free yourself!'"

The hall was quiet now. "Although I am in prison, I am free. I have been freed by Jesus from my guilt, from darkness in my mind. I can thank the events of August 23 for freeing me from Fascism. But for the other freedom, the freedom from all that is transitory, from death, I thank Jesus."

The commandant was on his feet. "Tell that nonsense to Gagarin. He's been up in space, but he saw no sign of God!"

He laughed. The prisoners laughed with him.

I replied in a matter-of-fact way, "If an ant walked around the sole of my shoe, it could say it saw no sign of Wurmbrand."

10

I was punished by another spell in the Special Block, and I was there when Alexandrescu called specially to inform me that the American President had been assassinated.

"What do you think about that?" he enquired.

I said, "I can't believe it."

He showed me a newspaper which reported Mr. Kennedy's death in a single paragraph

"Well?" he insisted. Pursuing questions of this sort was part of the technique to discover how prisoners' minds were working.

When I replied that if Kennedy were a Christian, then he was happy now in Heaven, Alexandrescu walked out.

page 265 In God's Underground

Later I was in a cell with Father Andricu when the guards came for us. We were blindfolded and handcuffed before being led out - for all we knew, it might have been to execution.

The guards said, "Turn right here!" and "Now turn left!"

In a distant part of the prison our blindfolds came off. We were in a suite of clean, warm offices. Andricu was taken off to another part of what must have been the central administration section. I remained outside a door, alone with a guard who, in the past, had listened when I spoke quietly of Christ.

He whispered: "My poor friend! You're having a hard time, but in God's name, go on!"

He moved some paces away, his face blank, but his words warmed me.

When the door opened, I was led into the presence of a man in general's uniform. It was Negrea, the Deputy-Minister of the Interior, whose intelligence was matched by the energy burning in his strong, gypsy face. The political officer and some officials from Bucharest sat beside him.

Negrea said politely, "I've been studying your case, Mr. Wurmbrand. I don't care for your views, but I like a man who sticks to his guns. We Communists are obstinate, too. I've often been in prison myself and plenty was done to make me change my mind, but I stood firm.

"I believe it's time we met half-way. If you're prepared to forget what you've suffered, we'd forget what you've done against us. We could turn the page and become friends instead of enemies. So far from acting against your own convictions, you could act upon them and still enter a period of fruitful cooperation."

A file lay open before him. "I've even read your sermons. The explanations of the Bible are beautifully put, but you must realize we live in a scientific age..."

"What now?" I asked myself, as Negrea went into the Party's science lecture. Had an important minister come 200 miles for this?

page 266 In God's Underground

Like the Danube, which twists and turns through the plains but reaches the sea at last, his discourse came to an end.

"We need men like you! We don't want people to join us out of opportunism, but because they see the fallacies in their past thinking. If you are prepared to help us in the struggle against superstition, you can start a new life at once. You will have a post with a high salary and your family around you again in comfort and in safety. What do you say?"

I replied that I found joy in the life I was already leading; but as for helping the Party, I had thought of a way of doing so if I were released.

The political officer sat up. Negrea said, "You mean you'll work for us?"

"I suggest that you send me from town to town and village to village along with the best Marxist teacher you have. First I shall expose my ignorance and the stupidities of my retrograde Christian religion; then your Marxist can explain his theories and the people will be able to make up their own minds between the two."

Negrea gave me a hard stare. "You're provoking us, Mr. Wurmbrand. That is what I like about you. It's just the way we Communists used to answer the bosses in the old days. So let's not argue. I'll make you a better proposal still. Nobody wants you to become an atheist propagandist. If you're really so attached to an outworn faith – though I can't understand how a cultured man can accept such nonsense – then keep to it. But also keep in mind that we have the power! Communism has conquered a third of the world; the Church must come to terms with us.

"Let's put our cards on the table, for once. Frankly we're tired of Church leaders who do everything in the eyes of the people; they're no longer in touch with what's going on."

One by one, Negrea listed the remaining bishops. All were powerless, he said, or Party men; and everybody knew it.

"Now if a man like you became a bishop you could have your faith and still be loyal to the regime. Your Bible says you should submit to authority because it comes from God, so why not to ours?"

I said nothing. Negrea asked the other officials to leave us alone for a moment. He was convinced that I would accept the offer, and gave me his confidence on something he did not want the others to hear.

"The Party made a mistake," he began, "in attacking your World Council of Churches. It began as a spy-ring; but the pastors concerned are often of proletarian origin; they aren't shareholders, so to speak, but superior servants. Instead of opposing such men we should win them over to our side so that the council itself becomes our instrument."

He leaned over the desk. "Mr. Wurmbrand, this is where you can help. You've worked for the World Council of Churches. You're known widely abroad: we still get many enquiries about you. If you became a bishop, you could help our other WCC allies to build a bulwark for us – not of atheism, but of Socialism and peace. Surely you recognize the universal idealism behind our campaigns to ban the bomb and outlaw war? And you'll be able to worship to your heart's content: there we won't interfere."

I thought for a moment.

"How far must this co-operation go? Bishops who worked with you in the past have had to inform on their own priests. Will I be expected to do that, too?"

Negrea began to laugh. "You'd be under no special obligation by virtue of your office," he said. "Everyone who knows of any act which may harm the state is obliged to denounce the man who does, and as a bishop you'll certainly hear such things.

"The present Lutheran Bishop of Rumania is very old. You'd be Bishop-elect and effective Head of your Church in Rumania from the start."

I asked for time to reflect and Negrea agreed.

"We'll meet before I leave again for Bucharest to put your release papers through," he said.

I was taken back to an isolation cell and lay thinking for many hours. I remembered the old Jewish story of another man who asked for time to think: a rabbi, facing the Inquisition, who was asked to deny his faith. Next morning the rabbi said "I will not turn Catholic, but I make one last request - that before I'm burned at the stake my tongue should be cut out for not replying at once. To such a question 'No!' was the only answer."

But that was only one side of the case: on the other, I knew that the official Church in a Communist country can survive only through some compromise; even by paying taxes to an atheist state a Christian compromises. It was easy to say the Church could go "underground," but an underground Church needs cover for its work. Lacking this cover, millions of people would be left with nowhere to meet for worship, no pastor to preach, no one to baptize them, marry them, bury their dead - an unthinkable alternative, when I could help to avoid it by saying a few words in favor of collectivization or the so-called peace campaigns.

And then, I had not seen my wife and child for years; I did not know if they were alive. The political officer had said that Sabina was in prison; what would become of her and Mihai if I refused this proposal?

I needed strength from above to say no, when doing so meant serving eleven years more, with the sacrifice of my family and almost certain death under terrible conditions; but at that moment God's face was veiled and my faith failed me. I saw before me the huge shape of Communism which already covered so much of the world and threatened to cover the rest as well; and my imagination was overcome by the danger of dying, and being beaten again and again, and the hunger and privations to which I was condemning my wife and son. My soul was like a ship driven from side to side, rocked by a violent tempest, one moment plunged into the abyss, the next carried up to Heaven. I drank in those hours the cup of Christ, it was for me the Garden of Gethsemane. And like Jesus, I threw myself with face upon the earth and prayed with broken cries, and asked God to help me overcome this horrible temptation.

After prayer, I felt a little quieter. But still I saw before me Nichefor Daianu and Radu Ghinda and so many more who had harmed the faith, including the Patriarch; they numbered thousands, and now I had become a man mean in faith, and I would be swallowed up like them for my weakness of the flesh. I began to think carefully of all the times I had argued the truth of Christianity. I repeated to myself the simplest questions. Is the way of love better than hatred? Has Christ lifted the burden of sin and doubt from my shoulders? Is He the Savior? There was no difficulty eventually in answering "Yes." And when I had done so, it was as if a great weight had been removed from my mind.

For an hour I lay on my bed, saying to myself, "I shall try now not to think of Christ." But the effort failed: I could think of nothing else. There was a void in my heart without Christianity. For a last time my mind went to Negrea's proposal. I thought of the tyrants from Nebuchadnezzar who set a king over the Jews, to Hitler who set his puppets over Europe. My visiting card would read "Richard Wurmbrand, Lutheran Bishop of Rumania, by appointment of the Secret Police." I would not be a bishop of Christ in a holy place, but a police spy in a state institution.

I prayed again, and afterwards I felt tranquillity of soul.

Next day I was called again. Commandant Alexandrescu was there, among several others around Negrea, and when I said I could not accept, the whole question was argued again. Only when we reached the subject of the World Council of Churches did Negrea once more ask the rest to leave. Then he urged me to reconsider my refusal.

I said, "I don't feel worthy to be a bishop - I wasn't worthy to be a pastor, and even to be a simple Christian was too great for me. The first Christians went to their deaths saying ~Christianimus sum!~ - 'I'm a Christian!' - and I haven't done that; instead, I considered your shameful offer. But I cannot accept it."

"We'll find another who will," he warned.

I replied, "If you believe you can prove that I'm wrong, bring me your atheist arguments! I have the arguments for my faith and I seek only the truth."

page 270 In God's Underground

He asked me, "You know, of course, what this will mean for your future?"

"I have considered well, and weighed the dangers, and I rejoice to suffer for what I am sure is the last truth."

Negrea gave me the look of a man who realizes he has been wasting time. Polite to the last, he nodded to me, closed his briefcase, stood up and crossed to the window, where he stood looking out while the guards handcuffed and led me away.

For a long time I remained in the "special block"; how long I am not sure. Time has telescoped all days of certain periods in my prison life into one enormous day. The brainwashing increased in its intensity, but changed little in method. The loudspeakers now said:

Christianity is dead
Christianity is dead
Christianity is dead

I recall one day clearly. They had given us postcards to invite our families to come and bring parcels. On the day named, I was shaved and washed and given a clean shirt. Hours passed. I sat in the cell, staring at the glittering white tiles, but no one came. Evening brought only a change of guard. I was not to know then that my postcard had never been sent, and the same trick was played on other stubborn prisoners. The loudspeakers said:

Nobody loves you now
Nobody loves you now
Nobody loves you now

I began to weep. The loudspeaker said:

They don't want to know you any more
They don't want to know you any more
They don't want to know you any more

I could not bear to hear these words and I could not shut them out.

Next day brought a brutal "struggle meeting," confined to the disappointed men. Plenty of other wives had come, the lecturer said. We were the fools. We had been abandoned. Our womenfolk were in bed with other men - at that very moment. He described what was happening between them with all the obscenity at his command. And where were our children? Out in the streets, atheists every one! They had no wish to see their fathers. How stupid we were!

In the special block I listened to the speaker, day after day.

Christianity is dead
Christianity is dead
Christianity is dead

And in time I came to believe what they had told us for all those months. Christianity was dead. The Bible foretells a time of great apostasy, and I believed that it had arrived.

Then I thought of Mary Magdalene, and perhaps this thought, more than any other, helped to save me from the soul-killing poison of the last and worst stage of brainwashing. I remembered how she was faithful to Christ even when He cried on the Cross, "My God, why have you forsaken me?" And when He was a corpse in the tomb, she wept nearby and waited until He arose. So when I believed at last that Christianity was dead, I said, "Even so, I will believe in it, and I will weep at its tomb until it arises again, as it surely will."

page 272 blank

page 273 In God's Underground

PART NINE

In June 1964 all prisoners were gathered in the main hall. The commandant entered with his officers, and we prepared for a new stage in the "struggle campaign." Instead, Major Alexandrescu announced that under the terms of a general amnesty granted by the government, political prisoners of every category were to be freed.

I could not believe it. Looking around, I saw blankness on every face. Then Alexandrescu shouted an order, and the entire hall broke into cheers. If he had told them, "Tomorrow you will all be shot," they would still have cheered, and cried, "Quite right! We don't deserve to live!"

The announcement was not, as we first thought, another trick. The summer of that first year saw the release of innumerable thousands of prisoners. For this we had to thank another so-called "thaw" between East and West, and also - though I did not know it at the time - a true change of heart in our Prime Minister, Gheorghiu-Dej. After many years of doubting Communist dogma, he had returned to the faith in which his mother had raised him and kept all her life. Dej had been converted through a maidservant in his home and her uncle, a good old man who often spoke to him of the Bible. Christianity, although he did not confess it openly, gave him the strength to defy his Soviet masters. Ignoring their threats, he opened new relations with the West, and in doing so set an example to other captive countries. Unhappily, he died a few months later, his end being hastened, it is said, by Soviet agents.

page 274 In God's Underground

My turn came for release. I found myself among one of the last groups of a hundred or so men gathered in the big hall. We were almost the last prisoners left in Gherla. A strange silence had descended on the corridors. Our hair was cut and we were given worn but quite clean clothes.

While I wondered what had become of the original owner of the suit I wore, I heard a man call, "Brother Wurmbrand!" He came up and said he was from Sibiu, so I supposed that he was a member of our church there.

"I've heard so much of you from your son," he added. "We shared a cell together."

I said, "My son - in prison? No, no; you're mistaken!"

"You mean you didn't know?" the man went on. "He's been in jail six years now."

I turned away and he left me. The blow was almost more than I could bear. Mihai's health had not been good; it would never stand up to the strain of prolonged prison life.

My mind was still frozen with pain and shock when Commandant Alexandrescu came up. "Well, Wurmbrand," he asked in a curious tone. "Where will you go now that you are free?"

I replied, "I don t know. I've been told officially that my wife is in prison, and now I hear my only son is, too. I have nobody else."

Alexandrescu shrugged. "The boy, too! How do you feel, having a jailbird for a son?"

"I am sure he is not in jail for theft or any other crime, and if he is there for Christ's sake, then I am proud of him."

"What!" he shouted. "We spend all this money keeping you for years, and you think it's something to be proud of to have a family in prison for such things!"

"I did not want you to spend anything on me," I said.

page 275 In God's Underground

So we parted. I walked out of prison, in another man's clothes. The streets of Gherla seemed dazzling. Cars roared past and I started nervously. The colors of a woman's coat, of a bunch of flowers, shocked my eyes. Music from a radio, coming through an open window, had a texture rich as over-sweetened coffee. The air smelled clean and new, as if the hay was being carted beyond the confines of the little town. But everything was saddened by the thought of my wife and son in prison.

I went by bus to the nearby town of Cluj where I had friends, but they had moved. I tramped from one house to another in sweltering midsummer heat, until I found them at last. They brought out cake and fruit, all manner of good things. But there was a beautiful brown onion on the table, and it was that I wanted. I had hankered so often for an onion to take away the taste of prison food. Now I did not like to ask for it.

I made a telephone call to a neighbor of ours in Bucharest. The voice that answered was Sabina's!

"It's Richard," I said. "I thought you were in prison!"

There was a confused noise. Mihai came on the line. "Mother's fainted - hold on!" There were more strange sounds. Then he said, "She's all right. We thought you were dead!"

Mihai had never been in prison. The false news I had been given was a last turn of the screw to test my reactions to brainwashing.

I took the train to Bucharest. As it drew into the station, I saw a crowd of men, women and children. Their arms were full of flowers and I wondered what lucky person was receiving such a welcome. Then I recognized faces, and leaned from the window of the carriage to wave. As I climbed down, it seemed as if all the people of our church were running to meet me, and then my arms were around my wife and son.

That night Sabina told me that she had been given news of my death years before. She refused to believe it, even when strangers called on her who claimed to be ex-prisoners who had attended my burial.

"I will wait for him," she said.

The years passed and no word came, until my telephone call. It was for her as if I had been resurrected from the dead.

2

One Sunday, months after my release, I took a group of schoolchildren for a walk. The Secret Police dogged us first but seeing that we went into the zoo they left us.

I led the children to the lions' cage and gathered them around me so that I might speak quietly.

I said, "Your forefathers in the Christian faith were thrown to wild beasts like these. They died gladly, because they believed in Jesus. The time may come when you also will be imprisoned, and suffer for being a Christian. Now you must decide whether you are ready to face that day."

With tears in their eyes, each in turn said "yes." I asked no other questions in this, the last confirmation class I held before leaving my country.

I have described in the preface why I decided that I must leave my country, and how I came to the West. Now I have only this to add. On the wall of a civic building in Washington, D.C., there is a large plaque containing the Constitution of the United States, skilfully engraved in copperplate. When you first look at it, you see only the engraved words of the Constitution; then, on stepping back, so that the angle of the light changes, the face of George Washington appears, carved into the text.

So it should be with this book, which contains episodes from a man's life, and the story of those who were with him in prison. Behind them all stands an unseen being, Christ, who kept us in faith and gave us strength to conquer.

Acknowledgment

I cannot name all those to whom I am indebted from their kindness and help since my release from prison and my arrival in the West. But I do wish particularly to thank the Rev. Stuart Harris, director of the European Christian Mission, and now Chairman of the British Mission to the Communist World, a mission which works to propagate the Gospel in countries under Communist rule, secretly sending in Bibles and other Christian literature, helping underground pastors and families of persecuted Christians. It was late in the night when he came first to the tiny attic in Bucharest where I lived with my family after release from jail. He brought us our first news from the West - that Christians there had not forgotten us, but included us daily in their prayers; and he brought the first relief for needy families. I, and many others, owe him much.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

RICHARD WURMBRAND began a secret, "underground" ministry both to captive Rumanians and to Soviet soldiers in the invasion force following the Communist seizure of Rumania in 1945.

Arrested in 1948, he was committed to prison where, according to his testimony before the U.S. Internal Security Subcommittee in May, 1968, he served three years in solitary confinement and five additional years in "mass" cells, during which time he was subjected to medieval tortures. As proof of these tortures, he bared his body above the waist, where committee members viewed more than a dozen of his Communist-inflicted scars.

His wife, Sabina Wurmbrand, was also arrested in 1948 and separately imprisoned for three years, during which time she served as a slave laborer on the never-completed Danube Canal.

Following his 1957 release, Wurmbrand resumed his underground work; rearrested in 1959, he was sentenced to twenty-five years in prison. A general amnesty in 1964 again brought his release and resumption of his underground work. Finally, in 1965, in great danger of a third arrest and imprisonment, he was "ransomed" out of Rumania by Christian friends in Norway, who paid $10,000 to the Rumanian Communist authorities for his release.

In the United States, Wurmbrand is pursuing his support of the Underground Church activities, which are being continued vigorously in Communist countries.

Through the international Christian Missions to the Communist World and its U.S. affiliate, Jesus to the Communist World, Inc., of which he is general director, he helps the Underground Church by smuggling Bibles, Christian literature, and relief to families of martyrs through secret couriers.

In August, 1967, Wurmbrand testified before the U.S. House Committee on Un-American Activities, bringing to light new evidence of continued persecution in the Communist-dominated countries.

The End of "IN GOD'S UNDERGROUND"

Jesus (Friend to Terrorists)

---

by Radu Valentin

Copyright 1995
The Voice of the Martyrs Inc.

Published by Living Sacrifice Book Company, a division of The Voice of the Martyrs, P.O. Box 2273, Bartlesville, OK 74005-2273

For the security of the author, we have used a pseudonym for the author's name.

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data
Valentin, Radu
Jesus:friend to terrorists / Radu Valentin
p. cm.
ISBN 0-88264-308-8
1. Terrorism - Religious aspects - Christianity - Controversial literature. 2. Nonviolence - Religious aspects - Christianity. 3. Witness bearing (Christianity). 4. World Politics - 20th century. I. Title.
BT736.15.W87 1995
241'.697-dc20

All rights reserved.
Printed in the United States of America.

Contents Page

A Friend to Terrorists?..... 5
Are Terrorists Totally Wrong?..... 9
Take Time for Reflection.....15
Enlarge Your Love.....19
Is Terrorism a Universal Remedy?.....27
What Will You Think About Your Deeds After Committing Them?.....31
The Positive Side of Terrorism.....35
Side-Effects of Terrorism.....37
Think Now About What You Will Say on YOur Deathbed.....41
The Justification of Unbelief.....47

How Is It That Belief Exists?.....49
The Challenge of Evil in the World.....53
What Happens After Death?.....57
Did Jesus Arise from the Dead?.....59
How Can You Contact Jesus Personally?.....71
Does God Have a Son?.....77

page 4 JESUS (Friend to Terrorists)

Can God's Existence Be Proved?.....79
Make Great Plans.....81
Who Is Your Adversary.....Your Friend?....85
The Real Revolution.....89
Jesus, Your Friend.....91
A Law of the Other World.....93

page 5 JESUS (Friend to Terrorists)

A Friend to Terrorists?

THE PERSON writing this is a Christian pastor. For decades I have followed the actions, pronouncements and, where they existed, the publications of terrorist groups in different countries.

Today, I realize that mankind has entered a new age. The era of Fascist domination has passed. The age when the Soviet dictator representing the Eastern Communist bloc could tell Americans "We will bury you!" has also passed. The cold war has passed to the history books. We have now entered the age of terrorism.

Terrorist groups have mushroomed on all continents and claim dedicated supporters and sympathizers.

Most people react to them with horror as headlines assault them from all over the world. How should Christians react?

I tell my fellow Christians that we should consider terrorists our friends. To the terrorists themselves who read this, I say, "I am your friend and the friend of those who think like you."

Most Christians will disagree strongly, saying, "We've never heard anything like this. Should we be the friends of murderers? So many were killed or wounded in the attack on the World Trade Center in New York. So many are killed in Peru, Egypt, Algeria, Israel, India, South Africa, the United Kingdom, Latin America, and (other countries. Why should we call the terrorists 'friends'?"

The devil plays the role of accuser. ("Devil" comes from the Greek ~diabolos~, which means "to hurl accusations against.") It is written that Jesus is "the friend of sinners" (MTT 11:19), including thieves, adulterers, traitors, and murderers.

The night before His crucifixion, Jesus called His disciples "friends," then went out of His way to confer this title also on Judas Iscariot, who had departed the group to betray Him. He called Judas "friend" when Judas already had the price of betrayal - 30 pieces of silver, his traitor's reward - in his pocket and came with soldiers to arrest Him (MTT 26:48-50).

We don't know much about Judas, some believe "Iscariot" is from the Hebrew ~Ish Kerioth~, which means "man of Kerioth." But there is another possibility. In Jesus' time was a group of Jewish terrorists called ~Sikkarim~, which means "men of the dagger." They used this weapon against their Roman oppressors and also against Jewish collaborators. Iscariot could have belonged to this group.

Had Judas been a terrorist who was received kindly by Jesus, but later had a controversy with Him that led him, in a moment of extreme anger, to play the part of traitor? When Jesus was convicted in a mock trial, Judas regretted his rash act and, full of remorse, committed suicide.

So for a brief period at least, a terrorist emotionally identified with Jesus.

This explanation might seem far-fetched if it were not for the fact that Jesus had named as an apostle a man called Simon the Zealot. Zealots too were extreme Jewish nationalists who resorted to the use of force against the Roman oppressors. Also, the apostle Peter in Gethsemane was armed, and he was not the only armed apostle (LUK 22:38) . Although Simon may have been a terrorist, he was not a terrorist during his discipleship, and was approached by Jesus as a friend. And so Christians, thinking about these parts of the Bible, might not be surprised that I address this book to "terrorist friends."

page 8 [blank]

page 9 JESUS (Friend to Terrorists)

Are Terrorists Totally Wrong?

I BELIEVE IT is totally wrong to consider anyone totally wrong.

Jesus, referring to those who would persecute believers down through the ages, said, "Those who kill you will believe that they are serving God" (John 16:2). Many inquisitors of different confessions (Catholics were not the only ones to use inquisitorial methods against believers with whom they differed) adored the Savior and intended to please Him with their acts.

We should not wonder about this. Many personalities of the Old Testament acted in a strange manner that no Christian would imitate and with the firm conviction that they were doing God's will. Perhaps this was the case with those who built the Tower of Babel, whose objective was never possible (GEN 11:1-9).

Jesus makes a difference between the "why" and the "what" of a person's actions. Some persecute Christians because they erroneously believe that Christians are wrong. The Christian New Testament, part of our holy book, tells about a Jew full of zeal for God who participated in the stoning of a Christian named Stephen. Both heartily loved God but had different levels of knowledge of Him. Later, Saul of Tarsus accepted the religion of his victim Stephen and also died as a martyr for Christ. They must have met again in the same beautiful heaven.

page 10 JESUS (Friend to Terrorists)

Today's terrorists are convinced that they serve well their nation, religion, race, or party. We may wholeheartedly agree with them that one should do his utmost in the service of these entities. Thus we have a point of contact.

In differences between men it is good to stress the points that unite them. When Christians confront the thinking of those with other convictions, they should not always ask themselves first, "What separates me from the other man?" but "In what ways are we in agreement?"

On a certain occasion, the apostle Paul, a dedicated Christian, spoke in Athens, Greece to a crowd of men who worshiped gods that he despised as idols. Yet he does not begin by telling them what was wrong about their beliefs. Instead he says, "I found you to be very religious" (Acts 17:22). Paul had something in common with those he wished to criticize. The Athenians knew ~correctly~ that there was something superior to be worshiped.

Knowing that every point of view is a point of blindness because it incapacitates one for every other point of view, we should keep an open mind even for those with whom we disagree. All of us, Christian and non-Christian alike, know only in part. Therefore, we can't speak to one another condescendingly as the wise to the ignorant. And so we ask you to recognize your own limitations, as we do ours, and listen to a voice different from what you are accustomed to hearing.

Are you a terrorist because you consider your cause the best? Do you say to yourself, "There is no better cause for which I can give my life and, if necessary, take another's life?"

I once spoke with a fanatical Zionist who was ready to shoot hostile Arabs. I asked him, "Suppose you had been born an Arab, what would be your ideal?" He laughed, embarrassed, realizing that if his mother had conceived him by a different man, he might have killed Jews. What is the value of an ideal that depends on the circumstance of partners in the sexual act?

I was acquainted with a young lady who had not known her father and presumed he was an Indian. In her youth her heart glowed for India's fight for independence. She was unable to agree with Gandhi that it should proceed at his slow pace. It had to be achieved immediately, even at the cost of shedding British blood. Then she found out that her father had actually been a Jew. From that moment she became a Zionist fighter.

Isn't this tragic? But isn't it the history of each one of us? Should not some of the impressive personalities of the liberation movements take themselves less seriously? They are ready to shed blood for an ideal, not because after calm reflection they have decided it is the highest, but just because they were born on one side of a border or social pyramid instead of the other.

We agree with terrorists in their readiness to sacrifice themselves for the highest cause they know. The Latins had a proverb: ~Dolce et decorum est pro patria mori~ - "It is sweet and beautiful to die for the fatherland." The same can be said of other high ideals.

Let us never think about terrorists as just killers, ignoring the fact that they are also ready to suffer in jail and even to die for the cause they serve. We are united with them in hatred for unjust structures. It is wrong for one nation to oppress another. Those who fight against this are right. It is wrong for privileged nations, races, or classes to exist at the expense of others. It is wrong to be a dictator and amass great wealth while others suffer. It is also wrong to slaughter embryos indiscriminately. Terror against unborn children and the killing of abortionists are also wrong.

Lenin started the Russian Communist revolution, and as a result tens of millions of innocent people died. He had no scruples about sentencing not only individuals but whole categories of people to death - because he claimed to want a better future for mankind. It was said that "he loved mankind so much that he was ready to kill all men for the benefit of humanity."

Lenin's older brother had been hanged for his attempt to kill the Russian emperor. Lenin shared his brother's ideal to get rid of oppressors,

page 13 JESUS (Friend to Terrorists)

but he thought that individual acts of terror would not achieve this end. He says in his writings that a party of well-trained professional revolutionaries have to seize power in the state. These will kill their opponents wholesale, after which, in time, the happy Socialist society will arise. He died disillusioned.

Stalin had been a terrorist. Together with a few comrades he attacked a big transport of state money en route from one bank to another and plundered it. He took not one cent for himself but gave all he had stolen to the Communist party, then called Bolsheviks, to be used for revolutionary purposes. He was thrown in jail and deported for twelve years. He suffered for what he considered right. His purpose had been to do good to the poor and downtrodden people. We share this sentiment.

Stalin was not totally wrong, nor are any of the terrorists. The tragedy is that, when he later came to power, he jailed and killed wholesale not only the rich exploiters and tyrants but also millions of peasants in order to collectivize agriculture. He also killed his own comrades, those with whom he had previously fought and suffered. He even killed his own family.

Hitler had no selfish motives. He really loved the German nation, though he himself was Austrian. For the good of the fatherland he was ready to kill millions of Jews, gypsies, and people of other nations he considered a hindrance to

page 14 JESUS (Friend to Terrorists)

Germany's progress. He killed even German dissidents. He loved - but with what limited love!

There was something terribly amiss about these characters, as well as other terrorists who participated in crimes though not to such a horrendous extent. We cannot say that they were totally wrong. The point of departure - the desire to help the poor and downtrodden - was right.

I cannot totally reject a Muslim terrorist either. He kills, but he also sacrifices his own life with the shout ~Allahu akbar!~ - "God is great!" In my homeland of Romania, Fascist terrorists called "legionnaires" were fanatical Orthodox Christians. Before killing the prime minister, Calinescu, they spent a whole night stretched out on the floor of a church praying that God might bless their endeavor. Their zeal for God was commendable. What they knew about God and His will was insufficient.

page 15 JESUS (Friend to Terrorists)

Take Time for Reflection

TERRORISTS are wrong in being led by passion. They do not meditate thoroughly about their ways.

In Hebrew, one of the languages of the Bible, the word for "to think" is ~lekhshov~. The root of this word, ~kheshbon~, reveals that in the Hebrew mentality "to think" means "to calculate." In all major aspects of life, we have to calculate the possible profits or losses resulting from an action. Jesus asks men, "What does it profit to gain the whole world and lose your own soul?" (MRK 8:36).

The prophet Isaiah writes, "God teaches you to profit" (ISA 48:17), not in the ugly sense of exploiting poverty and ignorance, but in order to engage in activities that lead to a noble aim. Anyone inclined toward terrorist acts should calculate the chances of success, learning from the history of terrorism. By the same token, he should calculate whether the overthrow of an unjust structure would lead to a better one.

The Nazis used terror. Hitler summarized their intent by saying they were building a "thousand-year empire." His "empire" lasted a mere fifteen years and left Germany in shambles. It was the same with Italian fascism. In Russia, communism had as its predecessor the terrorist organization ~Narodnaya Volya~ (The People's Will). This began what the Communists practiced

page 16 JESUS (Friend to Terrorists)

for decades: terrorist attacks against the royal family and political leaders. The Communists succeeded in gaining power, which they retained for seventy years, even exporting it to many other countries.

The result? The Russian Empire is a basket case. Socialism appears to have been only a mirage. Communism deprived a whole nation of liberty. The people are now far poorer than in capitalist countries. Was it worthwhile for the terrorists to give their blood and shed the blood of others? Did they serve the people?

Yugoslavia has experienced decades of terrorism. Serbian terrorists killed the Austrian Prince Ferdinand. A Croatian killed the Serbian King Alexander I. These are only the most illustrious victims. The Communist Tito and the Fascist Ustashi killed wholesale. Yugoslavia is in ruins.

The intentions of the terrorists might have been right, but isn't it time to learn from the past that terror does not pay?

How much terror had been exercised in the violent French Revolution, which overthrew the monarchy in 1789 with the slogan "Liberty, equality, fraternity"? After the bloody Reign of Terror, the revolutionists celebrated their victory under this banner. Do equality and fraternity reign in France?

In the nineteenth century, France expanded its hegemony over vast African and Asian territories and became an empire by oppressing the indigenous peoples. From among these, terrorist groups arose and succeeded. In our century, French power was overthrown on both continents. Algeria was freed, but Islamic fundamentalist terrorists arose against the new Algeria government and then were hanged without any mercy. Likewise, in Egypt, revolutionists overthrew King Farouk. Now a democratic republic, Egypt has produced a new type of revolutionist adversary. These too are hanged. If they came to power, they would hang others.

page 17 JESUS (Friend to Terrorists)

The Vietnamese fought to free themselves from France, after which followed a cruel Communist dictatorship. Now their government is begging for help from capitalists.

But haven't there been useful armed fights against injustice? Who can say? Perhaps American independence could have been attained without war. Almost all British colonies and those of other empires obtained their freedom without war and its destruction. King George II, against whose injustice the American colonists rebelled, did not live forever. Perhaps under another king the immediate cause of the rebellion would have disappeared and the painful separation between two English-speaking peoples could have been avoided.

America's war of secession was not absolutely necessary. Slavery had been abolished in the British Empire without the shedding of blood.

page 18 JESUS (Friend to Terrorists)

For the same reason, it is questionable if armed fighting of governments against terrorists will make them disappear.

page 19 JESUS (Friend to Terrorists)

Enlarge Your Love

TERRORISTS are idealists, usually with beautiful concepts of liberty, justice, a readiness for self-sacrifice, a willingness to go to the uttermost in the service of what they consider a worthy cause, and also loyalty, measured by the severe punishment they mete out to disloyal comrades.

We are wrong to think there is little love in the world. Tigers kill to provide food for their cubs. I knew a man who killed for money to buy his little son a costly toy the boy had seen in a shop window. The father was poor and could not bear the tears of his child, who knew other boys received toys from their fathers. This man committed a crime prompted by love.

Tigers and men (even the worst) have some love, however instinctive or misguided, for their young. There is love in the world. But it needs to be enlarged to embrace wider spheres and to be channeled toward better causes. Wolves kill men; dogs defend men to the death. Yet both wolves and dogs have common ancestors.

God enabled me to bring to Christ a mass-murderer who, during World War II, had killed many Jews, even children, and boasted of what he had done. He had been told that Jews were a threat to his fatherland, which he loved. God gave him the grace to see that love limited to one's fatherland can be enlarged. It can comprehend men of other nations and other social groups. Later I had written proof that this criminal became a savior of men, saving the lives of many who were condemned to death.

In the thirties, Germany had a Jewish secretary of state. A young fanatical German nationalist, unable to bear the shame that a Jew should be a government official, shot him. Mrs. Rathenau, a Christian, visited the murderer in jail and taught him to enlarge his love to include all men because all are creatures of the same God. During World War II, this murderer became a high-ranking officer in the German army stationed in Marseille, France and used his position to save many Jews from death. The Nazis discovered this and hanged him. He died for the right cause - a superior love. Everyone desires higher positions, greater revenues, more influential friendships. Why not a higher quality of love?

Love is a better counselor than hatred. William Wilberforce achieved his goal of abolishing slavery in the British Empire without shedding one drop of blood. He did so with loving words. Mahatma Gandhi was appalled at the injustice Indians suffered under British rule. He obtained his country's liberty through ~ahimsa~, non-violence. His adherents did not commit any acts of violence.

When Gandhi's ideal - freedom from British rule - had been achieved, millions of innocents died in violent fights between Hindus and Muslims. Instead of the one free country Gandhi dreamt of, there are now three: India, Pakistan, and Bangladesh, which are at loggerheads with one another. Was the fight worthwhile?

When a white racist attacked the black American Baptist pastor Martin Luther King as he was preaching, members of the congregation quickly leaped to his defense. But King deflected them, saying, "If I had been educated like this man, I would also have acted like him. Understand and forgive him! Let him go."

In 1917, there was a prolonged battle at the river Isonzo between Austrian and Italian troops. It was a battle of position. For many months the warring troops fought from trenches only a few yards apart. At Christmas a group of Austrian soldiers, wishing to mock the enemy, filled a soldier's boot with dirt, wrapped it nicely like a gift, then had a powerful man hurl it directly into the Italian trench. Some Christians among the Italians decided to reciprocate. After washing the boot thoroughly, they filled it with oranges and candy, wrapped it, and threw it back to the Austrian trench. When the soldiers there unwrapped it, they found a brief message that read, "Everyone gives what he has."

Since some oppress others and commit injustice, should we act at their low level? Can't we do better?

Though Christians comprise less than one percent of Japan's population, it was a Christian who organized their trade union movement:

Toyohiko Kagawa. He taught workers to obtain their rights while avoiding violent conflict. The Japanese were not aware of massive strikes and lockouts in other industrial countries.

At a certain point, a large manufacturing company decided to lower salaries. Some workers, revolted by this injustice, proposed a violent reaction – a strike – which would have paralyzed the factories. "Don't do it," Kagawa advised. "Rather, send a delegation to the president of the company, bow politely before him, and say, 'We regret that we were so heartless as not to realize the difficulties through which you are passing. Our children are used to deprivations, while yours aren't. We will gladly work for you without taking any salary just to show you our faithfulness to the enterprise.'"

They accepted no further salary, but in the evening workers would station themselves on Tokyo's great boulevards carrying baskets with a large inscription: "Give for our poor company," which they named. They also explained matters to passers-by, thus engaging the sympathy of the public.

No longer were salaries lowered; rather, they were increased.

On the other hand, Kagawa organized a strike of the employees on trams. However, they continued to run the trams regularly so as not to paralyze the life of a big city. The only difference was that they refused to collect the fare, allowing people to ride free of charge. In the end, this original kind of strike was successful. Love and goodness are not doomed to failure. They can win.

In South Africa, apartheid – which made nonwhites second-class citizens – has been abolished, but not as a result of an armed fight, terrorist acts, or rebellion, which had proved ineffective. Apartheid bowed to pressure applied by the Western powers, mobilized by a wave of sympathy on the part of those who favored racial justice.

One thought would restrain me from committing violent acts: the one I injure is my brother. He may not suffer like me, but he has his own sufferings. There exists much pain among the ruling classes of a nation. Proof of this is the fact that depression and suicide are as frequent among the rich as among the poor. I have known well a multitude of men on both sides of the social spectrum: on the whole, one class is no happier than the other.

Among Christians are adherents of what is called Liberation Theology. This philosophy originated within the Catholic Church and extended into the Protestant camp belonging to the World Council of Churches (WCC). They went very far by providing support to many terrorists in the armed fight. Some priests were even known to set aside Bibles for guns.

The Liberationists did not consider those they helped "terrorists" but "freedom fighters." I too don't like to call people by names they abhor. It is all right to call them freedom fighters if you make it clear that they fight heroically for their concept of how they think freedom can be attained. Others, just as well-intentioned as these freedom fighters, think otherwise. Catholics used to call Protestants "heretics." Now they say "separated brethren," which is much nicer. William Shakespeare wrote, "That which we call a rose by any other name would smell as sweet."

However, the adherents of Liberation Theology showed a bias that excluded truth. They supported only leftist fighters against tyrannies, ignoring the millions of innocents who were killed at the same time by Communist regimes. Russian, Romanian, and similar newspapers now reveal this about governments that recently have fallen from power. The U.S. also supported guerrilla movements, but only those that suited their interests. South African governments supported such movements in Mozambique and Angola that fought against communism to the exclusion of others.

As a well-motivated "freedom fighter" willing to shed blood for a noble cause, are you also willing to be used as a pawn by others not honest in their intentions? Ponder this.

One of the most violent terrorist groups in the world is the Irish Republican Army (IRA). It is composed of Catholics who fight to have Northern Ireland, which is now under the British Crown, reunited with Ireland. But the English and the Irish speak the same language and share the same culture. The old Irish language is virtually obsolete. English is the language spoken in the Irish parliament, government, and universities. The religious cleavage also belongs to the past. Church attendance is very low in both countries, and the respective religions are mostly hereditary.

page 25 JESUS (Friend to Terrorists)

In the South, Catholics and Protestants get along well. There is not the slightest discrimination. Why should the Northerners be adamantly opposed to uniting with the South? Why should the Southern terrorists be just as determined that the North leave the British Empire?

This fight, like so many other battles between humans, has no reasonable motives. The reasons invoked by each side are rationalizations arising from the impulse to rebel for rebellion's sake. The ideal proclaimed is a pretext.

page 26 [blank]

page 27 JESUS (Friend to Terrorists)

Is Terrorism a Universal Remedy?

DO TERRORISTS think about the effect their fight will have on the social group to which they belong?

In Romania, three Jewish Communists - Goldstein, Osias, and Lichtblau - placed a bomb in the Senate. Two men died and others were wounded. In Bulgaria, a terrorist group led by a Jewish Communist named Friedman put a bomb in the cathedral of Sofia. Many died. A Jew, Grunspan, killed a German diplomat in Paris in Nazi times. The result was a strengthening of anti-Semitism, which is also completely unreasonable. In (Germany, the result of the one killing of a diplomat was what was called "the crystal night." All Jews had to pay a fine of one billion marks. Jewish properties were confiscated and destroyed. Uncounted Jews were put in concentration camps where many died.

The Latins used to pose the question, ~Cui prodest?~ - "Who profits?" Surely not the cause for which terrorists stand.

When Arabs plotted terrorist acts in the U.S., anti-Arab sentiment arose among Americans. The terrorists are Muslims, but the resentment extends beyond Muslim Arabs to include Christian Arabs. They too are shunned.

page 28 JESUS (Friend to Terrorists)

Around the globe there are countless terrorist movements with widely divergent and even contradictory aims. With such diversity, can terrorism be a universal panacea able to cure all social ills of whatever stripe? Consider just a few: The African National Council (ANC), fighting apartheid in South Africa; the opposition of white Afrikaaners to the abolition of apartheid; the IRA, fighting to incorporate Northern Ireland into the Irish Republic; Protestant terrorists in northern Ireland who kill IRA members; the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) and Hamas (whose slogan is "Only a dead Jew is a good Jew"), which planned the destruction of the State of Israel; the fanatical Zionist organization "Kach," whose aim is to drive all Arabs from Israel; the "Opposition of White Aryans," fighting to deprive American Blacks and Asians of their rights; the Communist organization "Sendero Luminoso" (Shining Path) in Peru, which kills recklessly; "Tupamaros," active in several Latin American countries; the Islamic organizations Hezb Islami, Jamiat Islami, and Ettchad Islami, which fought in Afghanistan against their former comrades in arms who have come to power in the capital of Kabul; Kamredine Kherbane fighting in Algeria for the introduction of Sharia, the Islamic law (members of this organization are often hanged by the government); Jamiat Islami and Hizbul Mujahideen in Kashmir (India), as well as the organization of rebellious Sikhs in Punjab (India); Islamic Liberation

page 29 JESUS (Friend to Terrorists)

Front of Ormya in Ethiopia; Abou Sayaf in the Philippines; All-Ittihad-al-Islami in Somalia; the Party of Islamic Renewal and that of Islamic Resistance in Tadjikistan; the Khmer Rouge in Cambodia; the ETA, Basque terrorists fighting the Spanish government. I could go on and on.

Would you have confidence in a medical school that offered one pill to cure tuberculosis, syphilis, malaria, stroke, and toothache? It is just as unreasonable to believe that one method - killing all adversaries or overthrowing them from power - will cure all social ills.

page 30 [blank]

page 31 JESUS (Friend to Terrorists)

What Will You Think About Your Deeds After Committing Them?

ALL SUCH organizations fight for power without considering that the possession of power is useful only if one has the capacity to rule a nation. Lenin once wrote that "under communism a cook will be able to rule a country." As a result, under communism men without a knowledge of politics, economics, and social problems ruled a huge state. The result was predictable: the bankruptcy of Communist governments in the whole of Eastern Europe. Similarly, nazism and fascism led to the ruin of Germany and Italy at the end of World War II.

Terrorism starts with a limited purpose - but who is master of his will? Tempted by increasing power, who sticks to his original intent? Political and religious power is addictive, like gambling. Many gamblers can't stop until they have lost everything. Terrorists begin by aiming at certain individuals or categories of men they consider dangerous to their cause, but soon they degenerate.

Racist terrorists desecrate Jewish cemeteries. In Yugoslavia there have been directed attacks against cultural objects. South African terrorists entered a church and shot worshipers indiscriminately during a religious service. Why did they pick a church, and why did they decide to kill victims as they worshiped? One man of the organization "Kach" shot Muslims while they prayed in a mosque in Israel. So often terrorism resorts to acts that no longer correspond to its primary purpose.

When you think about defining your ideals and the methods for achieving them (the details of some terrorist acts are elaborated with remarkable efficiency), evaluate your thinking. What kind of mind do you have? The Romanian word for "mind" is the same as the one for "to lie." The mind can be a liar. The mind calculates all of your attitudes, but how good a calculator is your mind? Consider only the fact that the mind can fool us in some of our dreams. Then why always trust it when you are awake?

Terrorists do not practice self-criticism. They are absolutely sure they are right. Without this conviction they could not kill. But at a certain time they thought otherwise, never planning to kill or even having a revulsion to killing. How will they feel after their first murder - or the tenth?

Fyodor Dostoyevsky, the renowned Russian writer, was a terrorist in his youth. He and a few comrades were sentenced to die. While waiting his turn, he looked down at the crowd that had assembled to enjoy the spectacle and realized the vanity of the aim he had set for himself. He had desired to help free these people, but they did not wish to be helped or freed by him. They preferred the macabre amusement of watching him die, knowing they too would someday die. All his grandiose plans and futile endeavors for his brief life now seemed plain stupid. Doesn't religion speak about eternal life? If indeed it exists, would it not be much more important than being concerned about the merits of monarchy, democracy, or socialism?

This was the beginning of Dostoyevsky's conversion. Just before he was executed, his sentence was commuted to four years in a labor camp. Once freed, he became one of Russia's most important Christian writers.

No individual knows what he will think the very next day. Since this is true, should I kill today when I may spend the rest of my life regretting what I have done? By way of contrast, Christian martyrs say with the apostle Paul, "I am nothing" (1CO 13:2). He also writes that all true Christians "are nothing" (GAL 6:3). Christ requires that Christians deny themselves so that He may live in them and direct every step of their life. Christians walk with secure steps. Even when they do something very different from what they previously thought, they are at peace. Yesterday was ordered by the same One who orders today. It was a preparation.

The elementary, childish things you are taught in school in the first grade are not wrong. At that stage of development, they are the right thing. First a child learns the alphabet, then he is taught to write words, then sentences. So it is with other matters in life.

Our lives as Christians are governed by the One who created life; therefore, we can be serene, without the terrible crises of unbelievers. We know God's love to be the thread that ties together the events of our lives like a string of pearls.

The Positive Side of Terrorism

THERE IS not only a negative side to terrorists, but also a positive. There is a basis on which we can try to build friendship, if only they will agree to enlarge their capacity for love and loyalty. A man can do better than to love just one race, one party, one nation, one culture, one class, one ideology. So we say to you, our terrorist friends, don't keep to your narrow loves and loyalties. Enlarge them, expand them.

We appreciate the fact that, since you are ready to suffer greatly for an ideal, you have freed yourselves from much selfishness.

One song often sung in churches is "Hosanna [in Hebrew, "Save, please"] in the highest." We urge you to aim for the highest. Allow yourselves to be saved in the highest sense of the word. Grasp the all-embracing love, and all-embracing ideals of God, which should multiply what Jesus did two thousand years ago. The Christian ideal lies beyond what was expressed in the limited Hebrew language during His earthly life.

Paul said, "You are a new creation" (2CO 5:17), just as you would say to a caterpillar, "You are not meant to crawl on the ground; you are called to be a beautiful, multicolored butterfly that flits from flower to flower giving joy to children." You have the possibility of overcoming sin, temptation, all human pettiness. You have the possibility of sitting with Jesus and His Father, the supreme God, on His throne to reign with Him (REV 3:21).

page 36 JESUS (Friend to Terrorists)

We admire you for your readiness to sacrifice yourselves; but don't do it in the service of too narrow a cause. Jesus offers you an ideal worthy of this supreme sacrifice: life eternal.

page 37 JESUS (Friend to Terrorists)

Side-Effects of Terrorism

RIGHT JUDGMENT demands an analysis of all the aspects of an action, without neglecting any. A terrorist act is planned. It will kill an important enemy. But this enemy has innocent children or an old mother whose heart may break. Have you taken this into consideration?

In Dostoyevsky's novel ~Crime and Punishment~, we are told about a poor student who could not bear the thought that his sister was ready to give herself to a disgusting old rich man only to enable her brother to continue his studies. He knew an old lady who lived by letting students pawn their little valuables for small loans. She knew they would not be able to pay back the money plus the enormous interest she charged, so the precious objects would remain hers.

He asked himself, "What good is it that such a bedbug should live? She serves no one. She only does harm. If I kill her and take her money, I can save my virtuous sister from prostituting herself."

He thought about every detail of the murder he would commit and was satisfied. He could not fail. But just as he was killing her, the old woman's sister, generally known to be a good Christian, entered the room. To keep her from denouncing him, he had to kill her too.

page 38 JESUS (Friend to Terrorists)

A newly discovered medicine might cure an illness but might also have dangerous side-effects. Do you think about all the side-effects of a terrorist act?

In many countries under a dictatorship and in the third world, when terrorists are caught, the whole family goes to jail. Do you ever think about how your mother weeps to know you're a terrorist, to know you're in jail or sentenced to death, or even executed? Is it right to expose to such an ordeal the one who gave you birth and nursed you as an infant?

Terrorist friends! Just think of your mothers. What pain and irreparable harm you cause them. Is it right to do so? Should mothers be made to weep?

Libyan terrorists blew up a plane over Lockerbie, Scotland, causing the death of a hundred innocent people. What was their guilt and what good resulted for the cause of the terrorists? In Lebanon, 220 U.S. marines were killed in a car-bomb explosion. What guilt did these men bear, and what did the cause of Palestinian liberty win by this act?

And what is the end result of terror? Look at the many countries recently freed from communism. The Communists used terror to gain power, then used terror to "liberate" the population from poverty. Contrary to all promises and expectations, the population became poorer, not richer. Only a very small percentage profited from the revolution. In Russia, Stalin jailed or

page 39 JESUS (Friend to Terrorists)

shot all the former terrorists who had somehow escaped the Czar's gallows. In the end, commmunism collapsed.

While we as Christians do not agree with much of the terrorists' agenda, can we look upon them with less than love? They are the natural product of the society we have built. On American television programs for children, 32 acts of violence are shown per hour. By the time a child is twelve, he has viewed 18,000 murders. What results could such an education give? We instilled in the younger generation the spirit of destruction. We reap what we have sown. Some of them find delight in setting forest fires, others in wanton murder. Such things happen in the U.S. as well as in Mediterranean lands.

In some American and Western newspapers, Fidel Castro and Mao Tse-tung have been hailed as valuable reformers. Mao taught that "power lies in the barrel of a gun."

page 40 [blank]

page 41 JESUS (Friend to Terrorists)

Think Now About What You Will Say on Your Deathbed

DEAR TERRORIST friends, we tell you frankly that we have no illusions. We know that the chances of convincing you to forgo your ways and become disciples of love are very slim. But perhaps you will have a moment of illumination.

Andropov succeeded Brezhnev as dictator of the USSR. As a young officer of the Secret Police, Andropov was once confronted with the prisoner Nikolai Hrapov, a Christian pastor, for interrogation .

Hrapov argued his case with the dictator: "I have read atheist books; I suppose you must have read Christian books. Can you tell me what is wrong about our convictions?"

Andropov with a smile - it is said he always smiled - put a bullet in his revolver and told Hrapov, "You see, a bullet costs only fifty cents. This is enough to overthrow all the proofs you have that God exists."

Such men who worship violence exclude themselves from the realm of reason. But we rely on the fact that they cannot forgo reason totally. Andropov left a notebook at his death in which he had written, "The world existed millions of years without me. I have lived a very short while. Soon I will die. And the world will continue to exist for more millions of years. I will be completely forgotten. It is terrible to think about this."

Atheists too have moments of light, if not earlier, then on their deathbed. We rely on miracles. We believe that our weak challenge will be heeded by the best and wisest of you.

Andropov had not been a fool to trust in the power of bullets. Almost all those who instigated the Russian Revolution of 1917 were shot by their own comrade Stalin. Even more, they consented to declare at public trials, after being tortured by their own comrades in the Secret Police and threatened with guns that had bullets in their barrels, that they had never been revolutionists but agents of Western imperialism. They believed the promise that they would escape the death sentence if they gave this testimony. The promise was not kept.

After this, all heads of the Soviet Secret Police were arrested by Stalin and tortured - Yagoda, Ezhov, Beria. They also confessed in public that they had never been true Communists but spies of capitalists. Together with them thousands of officers of their Secret Police were killed by the same Secret Police.

Was the fight of Russian terrorists to overthrow the unjust czarist regime worthwhile if what followed - the cruel Soviet regime - was the result? Should one escape from a bear only to be torn by a lion?

page 43 JESUS (Friend to Terrorists)

My heart breaks thinking about the many terrorists hanged in such countries as Algeria, Egypt, and Iran, and about the tortures they must have endured in some countries before their execution.

Are states unable to find another way to handle their young citizens who have gone astray?

Look at those who are hanged. The great majority of terrorists come from the poorer class. They have known unemployment, hunger, despair. Those of the wealthier classes had no moral education in schools and no examples of morality in public life. In school I learned trigonometry and Latin, which I never had to use. I never learned what life was all about, what my duties were and where I could obtain the spiritual power to fulfill them.

I have shown you, my terrorist friends, that I have understanding for you. Until now we have reasoned. But is reason alone enough to give us truth and guide us in life? Reason helps us sort out and react rightly to the realities of our life in the world we know. But what part of the world do we know? And how much do we know about the world we do know?

Astronomy tells us that there are millions of galaxies containing countless billions of stars. Our sun is one of them in a corner of one medium-size galaxy. This is the macrocosm. What and who is in these galaxies and beyond them?

page 44 JESUS (Friend to Terrorists)

But there is also the microcosm, composed of trillions of elementary particles in constant movement, colliding with each other, with a lifespan of a billionth of a second! As they disappear, others are formed. There is not one cubic inch of matter that is not the theater of such clashes between elementary particles.

Is there any sense in the tremendous events that take place in the macrocosm and microcosm?

We live on the earth, a speck of dust in an infinite universe or perhaps multiverse. Who knows? Much of the universe is constituted of what astronomers call dark matter. We know it exists because it exercises attractions that we can measure, but it does not give signals that make it perceptible. What is happening in that arena?

We live in a world that turns on its axis and revolves around the sun, then moves with the whole solar system around the galaxy center, and finally moves with our galaxy through space.

The rotation of the earth sometimes experiences sudden stops or slowdowns. You have never sensed it. Perhaps there are some other very important things that you do not sense.

In addition to the material universe, there is also the universe of thoughts, sentiments, emotions, passions, desires, aspirations, hopes, inclinations. There are not only jails and gallows where men suffer and die. There is also the hell of remorse, guilt, fear, and anxiety; the fixation on the retina of scenes of horror either endured or perpetrated; the nightmares of evildoers whose sins have never been discovered by society; horrible sufferings in dreams, described by the prophet Daniel (The book of Daniel chapter 7).

Therefore the political and economic changes envisioned by terrorists are not sufficient because they don't address the inner man, the burdened conscience. They don't take into account the unconscious, the subconscious, and the superconscious aspects of a man's being. There are intuitions, not learned, of things you never perceived. There exist high ideals. Where do they come from? Are they from our material structure?

I know I have lungs although I have never seen them. The fact that I breathe is proof enough for me that I have lungs. Sometimes thoughts occur to me that did not originate solely within my brain. I feel an ardent love for ideals that surprise me in their ability to inflame me when usually I am entirely otherwise than the ideal Richard Wurmbrand I wish to realize. Why?

If breathing is proof enough that I have lungs, these high thoughts - like the thoughts of terrorists to sacrifice themselves for what they consider a noble cause - indicate that there must be a higher intelligence and a higher love that inspires them, even if dimly perceived. In English, we believe that the source of all that is most beautiful, right, good, and loving is "God" - this word evokes in our minds a mighty and benevolent person.

page 46 JESUS (Friend to Terrorists)

Whatever image you have of the source of all power, there is surely a supreme Being who created, rules, and has put in us tremendous possibilities to be grand for all eternity ourselves.

page 47 JESUS (Friend to Terrorists)

The Justification of Unbelief

I DO NOT HOLD it against you, my terrorist friends, that you do not entrust your life to God or to His messenger Jesus. I realize that it may be difficult for you to believe in a supernatural Being.

The story is told of a Chinese gentleman who sat in his home quietly sipping his tea. A knock came at the door. It was the police.

"You are sentenced to twenty lashes. Quick! Bare yourself and stretch out to receive them."

He did so, and the police left. Then he returned to the table to finish his tea. He knew he lived under a dictatorship where this was a common occurrence.

The next day, as he sat at the breakfast table, again someone knocked at the door. Again it was the police. "You are sentenced to receive twenty lashes."

Without uttering a word, he bared himself and received them. On the third day the ritual was repeated. On the fourth day again there was a knock at the door as he drank his tea. Baring himself, he called, "Enter."

Instead of the police, beloved friends walked in. "Have you also come to beat me?" he asked, unable to believe that people could come to his house with good intentions.

page 48 JESUS (Friend to Terrorists)

So many have lied to us and led us astray that we have come to the point where we can't even believe God. Our total capacity to believe has been thwarted. God does not complain. He is not the only one who is not believed. We no longer believe in the stranger who knocks at our door.

Nazi terrorists were lied to by Hitler, who had promised a thousand-year Aryan Empire. Communist leaders promised an earthly paradise - another lie. So many comrades of the terrorists proved to be agents of the Secret Police infiltrated into their ranks. Even parents, children, and spouses prove to be denouncers. For terrorists it is simply difficult to believe unknown persons. No wonder they cannot believe God.

page 49 JESUS (Friend to Terrorists)

How Is It That Belief Exists?

TERORISTS surely do well to count on the fact that people are often unreliable. That being so, why in the world do we have within us the ability to believe and to trust? We must find it useful. We have the ability to breathe, to smell, to taste, to think, to work, because these are useful activities. Why the ability to believe?

We have hands because they are needed for work. We have feet because they are needed for transport. We have the ability to believe and to trust because there is One worthy of being trusted and believed in: God, the all-loving Creator. It is God who revealed to us the sense of life. Through all His prophets and through Jesus, He revealed that this topsy-turvy world, whose injustices you do well to hate, is not the whole world. It is the preparatory stage for a world of truth, justice, light, love, and joy.

What good are the puzzles you find in magazines? They stimulate your mind to find a solution. What good are obstacle races? They challenge you to develop your athletic skills. Just so, the intricate world into which we have been born has stimulated the human mind to create and develop in the arts and sciences. As a result, we now have fast travel by land, sea, and air; amplified hearing through microphones, hearing aids, stereo systems; extended vision through space telescopes, electronic microscopes, and X-rays.

Why do we have such brains and such minds? What need was there for mankind to have a brain that would search out distant galaxies and explore the past looking for a beginning of the universe? What need was there for a Shakespeare or a Beethoven? A simple "human organism" would have fared well without compositions.

We have a higher calling that tells about another world.

Suppose an unborn child could think. Doubtless it would regard as "stupid religion" the idea that it would eventually have a life outside the womb. Can a child conceive of what awaits him as an adult? I am now 85. In my youth I knew thousands of old people, but it was beyond me to understand the life and thinking of an old man. So we cannot imagine our next stage as being in eternity.

Now supposing a child in the womb could think rationally, it might ask, "How come I have eyes? I live in complete darkness. Am I being prepared for another existence where there is light and color? Why do I have legs? They embarrass me. Since I can't even stretch them out, might they serve me in another world where I will have to walk or run? What good are my arms and hands? They crowd my body uselessly. Perhaps someday I will need them to work, to grasp, to build. Why do I need a tongue? I cannot speak or eat. This too must serve a future purpose."

But adults are in the same predicament. Just when they have accumulated knowledge, wisdom, and experience in life, the hearse awaits them. It would seem that all is in vain. But just as the embryo has a sequel, even so our earthly life has a sequel: eternal life, life after death.

Every seven years all the cells in my body are replaced. By the age of 85, I have exchanged all my cells twelve times. Only nerve cells are permanent, but they too have a metabolism. The molecules of which they are constituted change continually. I can say, without the slightest exception, that I have not one molecule left of those I had seven years ago, and at that time I had none of those I had fourteen years ago.

Who is the "I" who had these different bodies that are replaced continually? One cannot bathe twice in the same river. The water you see in it today is not the same you saw yesterday. Likewise I am not the same entity I was yesterday. I am in a process of becoming. Becoming what?

People believe that man is a body that has a soul. The inverse is the truth: we are eternal souls that during their earthly life don different bodies, from that of an embryo to that of an old man.

Our mental structure also changes constantly. Do you still think like a child or a lad of fourteen? Do you have the same affections? Do you like or dislike the same persons, books, games, food? Then who is the "I" who changes your mentality? Has anybody ever seen this mysterious "I" dying?

Man needs very few basic things to be fully satisfied: food, clothing, housing, health, some possibility of intellectual preoccupations, little pleasures, and a sexual partner. Yet there have been millionaires with access to all these things who committed suicide. The cause: deep depression. What depressed them, since they had everything a person could need or desire? The soul that inhabits the earthly body.

On the other hand, when I was in jail with men imprisoned for their convictions, I saw them sing though they were beaten, hungry, trembling with cold, separated from all they loved, with no books. What caused them to be happy? Their soul.

The amazing thing is that the soul can be independent of external circumstances and events. It can remain unaffected by death, which is an advancement to a higher sphere where earthly quarrels seem like child's play.

page 53 JESUS (Friend to Terrorists)

The Challenge of Evil in the World

ALL THE EVILS you see in this life are challenges. Everything that is wrong in the world - and it is much - should be a calling not to become angry but to do better than others. The apostle Paul wrote, "Run so as to get the prize" (1CO 9:24). In a world of hate, injustice, and greed, be an example of love, mercy, and goodness! Among the haughty, shine with the power of good character, while at the same time exhibiting modesty. Be the servant of all! This is the secret of real power.

Hear what Jesus said about the ideal life to lead:

"You have heard that it was said to those of old, 'You shall not murder,' and whoever murders will be in danger of the judgment. But I say to you that whoever is angry with his brother without a cause shall be in danger of the judgment. And whoever says to his brother, 'Idiot!' shall be in danger of the council. But whoever says, 'You fool!' shall be in danger of hell fire.

"Therefore if you bring your gift to the altar, and there remember that your brother has something against you, leave your gift there before the altar, and go your way. First be reconciled to your brother, and then come and offer your gift.

page 54 JESUS (Friend to Terrorists)

"Agree with your adversary quickly, while you are on the way with him, lest your adversary deliver you to the judge, the judge hand you over to the officer, and you are thrown into prison."

"I tell you not to resist an evil person. But whoever slaps you on your right cheek, turn the other to him also.
"If anyone wants to sue you and take away your tunic, let him have your cloak also. And whoever compels you to go one mile, go with him two. Give to him who asks you, and from him who wants to borrow from you do not turn away.
"You have heard that it was said, 'You shall love your neighbor and hate your enemy.' But I say to you, love your enemies, bless those who curse you, do good to those who hate you, and pray for those who spitefully use you and persecute you, that you may be sons of your Father in heaven; for He makes His sun rise on the evil and on the good, and sends rain on the just and on the unjust.
"For if you love those who love you, what reward have you? Do not even the tax collectors do the same? And if you greet your brethren only, what do you do more than others? Do not even the tax collectors do so? Therefore you shall be perfect, just as your Father in heaven is perfect."
"Do not lay up for yourselves treasures on earth, where moth and rust destroy and where thieves break in and steal; but lay up for yourselves treasure in heaven, where neither moth nor rust destroys and where thieves do not break in and steal. For where your treasure is, there your heart will be also.

"Why do you worry about clothing? Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow: they neither toil nor spin; and yet I say to you that even Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these.
"Now if God so clothes the grass of the field, which today is, and tomorrow is thrown into the oven, will He not much more clothe you, O you of little faith?
"Therefore do not worry, saying 'What shall we eat?' or 'What shall we drink?' or 'What shall we wear?' For after all these things the Gentiles seek. For your heavenly Father knows that you need all these things.

"But seek first the kingdom of God and His righteousness, and all these things shall be added to you. Therefore do not worry about tomorrow, for tomorrow will worry about its own things. Sufficient for the day is its own trouble.

"Judge not, that you be not judged. For with what judgment you judge, you will be judged; and with the same measure you use, it will be measured back to you.

"And why do you look at the speck in your brother's eye, but do not consider the plank in your own eye? Or how can you say to your brother, 'Let me remove the speck out of your eye'; and look, a plank is in your own eye? Hypocrite! First remove the plank from your own eye, and then you will see clearly to remove the speck out of your brother's eye."

page 56 JESUS (Friend to Terrorists)

"Therefore, whatever you want men to do to you, do also to them, for this is the Law and the Prophets."

Later the apostle Paul summarized some of Jesus' teachings:

"And though I bestow all my goods to feed the poor, and though I give my body to be burned, but have not love, it profits me nothing.

"Love suffers long and is kind; love does not envy; love does not parade itself, is not puffed up; does not behave rudely, does not seek its own, is not provoked, thinks no evil; does not rejoice in iniquity, but rejoices in the truth; bears all things, believes all things, hopes all things, endures all things."

page 57 JESUS (Friend to Terrorists)

What Happens After Death?

DURING THE period of harsh dictatorship in the former Soviet Union, I met an important person from its bureaucracy who wanted to talk politics. I replied, "I have something more important to say. I am an old man, and you too are advanced in age, though younger than I. One day I will no longer be a pastor and you will no longer represent your government, which opposes religion. One day we will both be dead.

"For a while, family and friends may come to put flowers on our graves. Then they too will die. We will be forgotten, as are most of the dead. We may lie undisturbed for a long time, but someday our graves may be plowed. It will be as if we had never been. What happens after death?"

Then I told him something about my life. I had been a sickly child. When I was very small, I overheard a doctor telling my mother, "This child cannot be cured. He will die." When he left, I asked Mother, "What does it mean to die?" She began to weep and left me without reply.

Soon after this my father died. At the funeral I saw Father lying in a coffin, then watched as the earth was shoveled over him. No Father any more? Will earth be shoveled over my corpse someday too?

In school, I was considered a good student and did well on my exams. But school did not really interest me. Why should I learn algebra, trigonometry, and Latin when I saw adults who never made use of them? The main subject that interested me was what happened after death.

I liked to take walks through cemeteries and read the tombstones. Highly valuable literature! I take such walks even now. One inscription says the person buried there was a general. There exists no higher rank. But he died. Another was a renowned millionaire. He died too. What happened to his millions? A third was a famous poet. He no longer enjoys the fame. Some were saints, others criminals; some revolutionists, others police officers who arrested them.

Later, when I was mature, I was shown the grave of the colonel of the Secret Police who had had me arrested, and I put a flower on it. If, as he believed, there is no life after death, he did not enjoy the flowers.

It seems that at death the curtain falls, and what had once been tragedy or comedy is ended. But in the theater, when the play is finished, the actor who died onstage arises and goes home. So it happens also at death.

I told the official that after many years of desiring an answer, I was given a Gospel. In it I read the story of One who had been, so to speak, thrice dead: first, crucified on a rude cross, then speared in the region of the heart, then immured in a rock-hewn tomb with a stone rolled against a door that was sealed and guarded by soldiers to make sure He stayed dead.

page 59 JESUS (Friend to Terrorists)

Did Jesus Arise from the Dead?

BUT THIS Man, Jesus the crucified, was resurrected on the third day. Unbelievable? So is our universe - except for the hard fact that it is there. This Man whose corpse was guarded by Roman soldiers met, walked, talked, and ate with His disciples.

This happened two thousand years ago. But down through the centuries thousands upon thousands of people in all walks of life have experienced His presence. You can too.

Consider impartially, as if you were on a jury, the following proofs of Jesus' resurrection:

What is the source of our knowledge of ancient history? The historians of their age, among them men like Homer, Herodotus, and Julius Caesar. What is the source of our knowledge of the activities of Jesus? Contemporary historians: their names are Matthew, Mark, Luke, John, Paul, and so on. Why should we believe some historians and not others?

Our intelligence should behave like an impartial court of law, carefully and competently weighing the statements of witnesses. In evaluating evidence we must consider not only what the witness says, but also his character and his trustworthiness. The credibility of the historians who described the life of Jesus is undoubtedly much greater than that of other historians. Who were the latter? Generally, they were paid to write by a royal personage, and their aim was not to make known the truth but rather to flatter their master, their people, or the social class to which they belonged.

page 60 JESUS (Friend to Terrorists)

By contrast, the historians who wrote the Gospels are of an entirely different stature. They risked loss of liberty and death for what they wrote. Matthew died as a martyr in Abyssinia, John was condemned to slave labor on the island of Patmos, and Paul was beheaded in Rome. Peter was crucified upside down.

No impartial court would lightly dismiss the evidence of witnesses ready to suffer such hardships for what they assert. All of them declare unanimously that they were convinced, by seeing, hearing, and touching, of the reality of Jesus' resurrection from the dead.

I know that this argument can be contradicted. What the other historians relate are things that can easily be understood and believed. They write about court intrigue, kings' favorites, plots, murder, war, things that happen even today, whereas the writers of the Gospels tell us of things that run counter to our human experience.

Among other things, they write of a virgin birth, of the healing of lepers by a simple touch, of walking on water, of the feeding of a great multitude with a few loaves, of men rising from the dead, and finally of Jesus' own resurrection, which was followed by His ascension into heaven. All these things come into the category of miracles, whereas today some "enlightened" people no longer believe in miracles.

The miracles that Jesus performed occurred in the sphere of the exceptional, whose existence cannot be denied. In everyday life it is not only ordinary things that occur. A man who does not believe in miracles is not a realist.

Furthermore, men consider as miracles things that a person with greater than average intelligence or muscular power can do and that a weak person with an ordinaly intelligence is incapable of doing. Missionaries who have worked among primitive tribes record that the savages regard them as miracle-workers. This is not surprising since primitive people spend hours rubbing two pieces of wood together in order to produce a spark, whereas the missionary knows how to produce fire from a box of matches. He can even make stinking water burn. How is the savage to know that this "water" is gasoline?

The writer Pearl Buck informs us that when she told peasant women in backward parts of China that in England there were houses built on top of one another and that carriages moved through the streets without being drawn by horses, one of the women whispered, "What a lie! That sort of thing is impossible."

With sixty Spaniards under his command, Cortez conquered the powerful Aztec kingdom because he appeared to the people he conquered to be a miracle-maker. In the first place, the very appearance of the Spaniards was miraculous. Never before had the Aztecs seen white men. Secondly, the newcomers possessed miraculous things that the Aztecs had never seen before: horses and firearms. And so a huge kingdom fell without a struggle into the hands of a few adventurers.

Jesus had a spiritual force such as no other person has ever possessed. It is not surprising that He was capable of performing miracles. Being exceptional, He could do unique things that would be impossible for ordinary men.

It is foolish to be prejudiced, declaring that miracles are impossible and rejecting them without carefully examining the evidence of people as trustworthy as the apostles. Either you can believe in Jesus' miraculous resurrection from the dead, or you have to believe in another miracle that is still greater: that an effect exists without a cause, because if Jesus did not arise from the dead, the existence of the universal Church would be such a miraculous happening.

Let's examine the evidence: Jesus wrote no book, and while He lived on earth He did not establish anything but a very small sect within Judaism, a sect consisting mostly of unlearned people who were not considered reputable citizens - sinful men, publicans, and fallen women. Finally, one of His closest followers betrayed Him, another denied Him, and the others deserted Him. He died on a cross, abandoned and apparently despairing, because as He hung on the cross He cried out, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken Me?"

[PSA 22:1; MTT 27:46; MRK 15:34]

After His death, He was buried, a large stone was placed in front of His sepulcher, and guards were posted. Meanwhile, His former disciples remained in hiding behind locked doors, and their only concern was to escape a death similar to that of their Master. This was how Jesus' life on earth ended. If He did not arise, how has the Christian Church come into being?

We have an explanation. On the third day, Jesus came back to life from the dead and appeared on numerous occasions to His apostles, assuring them that it was really Himself they saw, touched, and dined with. They came together again as they had previously, and the risen Jesus spent time instructing them, giving them guidance, and providing the power to do signs and wonders.

The very same cowardly Peter who had denied any knowledge of Jesus with curses and oaths stood up in the marketplace in Jerusalem and courageously testified that he had seen the risen Jesus. The other apostles did so too. Risking death, they traveled from one country to another, sealing with a martyr's death their conviction that Jesus had risen. In this way, the universal Church was born, it has grown, and it has survived, despite persecution and the unworthiness of its members.

If you are not prepared to admit that Jesus has risen from the dead, then this tremendous effect represented by the Christian Church - a Church that has survived for two thousand years and has millions of members - is an effect without a cause. It takes a greater naivete to accept the existence of such an effect without cause than to admit that Jesus Christ has really risen.

When a man enters a tall building, it might be a good idea, before climbing the stairs to the tenth floor, to go down first into the cellar and make sure that the foundations are sound. But why should it be necessary to do this? The fact that the building is standing is proof of the strength of the foundations.

The foundation stone on which the Christian Church was built is the resurrection of Jesus. The large, well-known building founded on this stone has stood for two millenniums and has resisted tremendous earthquakes. The existence of the Church is a proof that Christ has risen.

Another argument: Nowhere do we find that the enemies of the primitive Church at any time denied that the sepulcher of Jesus was found to be empty on Easter morning. It would have been quite natural for an investigation to be set on foot to discover whether the body had been stolen or desecrated. The reaction of the Jewish priests does not contradict the assertion that the grave was empty; they merely told the soldiers who had guarded the sepulcher to spread the rumor that His disciples had come during the night, while they were asleep, and stolen the body.

Now, if they were asleep, how could they have identified the thieves? Augustine rightly asks: "Does the synagogue introduce us to witnesses who were asleep when this deed was carried out?" If the Jewish priests really believed that Jesus' disciples had stolen the body, why were they not arrested, interrogated, and punished?

A strong movement must be carried forward by a strong impetus. The strong movement that has lasted for two thousand years and has had a worldwide effect, based on the belief in the resurrection of Jesus, cannot have been the product of hallucination. None of Jesus' disciples were men who suffered from hallucinations, certainly not doubting Thomas and the practical businessman Matthew, nor such men of the sea as Andrew, nor the cautious Nathaniel, nor Peter with his weak character. Only an event as tremendous as a real resurrection could have produced an impetus capable of starting a movement of this kind.

Nor must we forget that during the first thirty years after this event, most of Jesus' disciples suffered a violent death, and many of them were condemned to death precisely because they maintained that Jesus had risen from the dead. These things cannot have been invented.

Under the very noses of the Jewish priests, Jesus' apostles started to preach to the Jewish people, declaring that Jesus was the Messiah, a fact proved by His resurrection. In this way they came into conflict with the authorities. Any sensible person might ask, "Would it be possible to launch a movement of this kind and recruit thousands of supporters in a single day if the dead body of Jesus had really existed?" Peter preached his first sermon only a few hundred yards from His sepulcher. If Jesus' enemies had been in a position to prove that His body was still there, the sermon would have been a failure and would never have persuaded thousands of people to be baptized. But Jesus was not in the tomb. His enemies were powerless.

The apostles did not visit the tomb of Jesus because it had no significance as far as they were concerned. (Saul of Tarsus, after he was converted, came to Jerusalem and met the apostles but was not concerned with visiting the tomb, not even out of mere respect.) Nor did His enemies investigate the tomb to convince themselves and others that Jesus was still there. This is yet another proof that Jesus really rose from the dead. A great many people undertake pilgrimages to the tombs of minor saints. Even though the first apostles knew of this custom in Israel (MTT 23:29), they were not interested in visiting Jesus' tomb because they knew it was empty.

All this was so universally accepted that the disciples started preaching, not in a provincial town where it would be difficult to check their statements, but in Jerusalem itself, arousing the enthusiasm of thousands of people and - what was still more remarkable - facing enemies who were impotent, because they were not in a position to deny that Jesus' tomb was empty. When the priests maintained that the body of Jesus had been stolen by the apostles, anyone could have answered them, "Why don't you arrest and sentence the men who have carried out this theft?"

The suggestion that Jesus did not actually die on the cross but merely fell into a deep swoon and recovered consciousness in the cool tomb is still more ridiculous. The soldiers saw that he was dead. Furthermore, how could He have pushed aside the stone, which had been sealed by the Roman authorities, and overpowered the guards after so much suffering? Could He have gone anywhere, naked as He was, with only a winding sheet for cover? He could have sought shelter only with one or more of His disciples. Had He done this, however, His disciples would have realized that He had not risen from the dead. Would they have been willing to give their lives for a lie they themselves had hatched?

We are compelled to believe what the Gospel writers say because they reveal such naivete when relating unflattering things about themselves. What induced them to spread abroad by word of mouth and in their writings that Peter, one of Jesus' closest friends, had been called "Satan" by his Master and had denied Him three times on the night that He was betrayed? The only motive I can discover is that they showed an uncompromising regard for the truth. The band of apostles was a collection of men who were guided by the truth. We can trust their evidence.

The remarkable thing is that when the apostles affirm the resurrection of Jesus to an audience of doubters (even in those days people were skeptical about stories of angels, resurrections, and so on), they merely affirm, without producing a single confirmatory piece of evidence. This was possible because what they maintained was a well-known and undisputed fact among the inhabitants of Jerusalem. After all, the risen Jesus had at one time appeared to five hundred persons, who must have had several thousand relatives with whom they shared their story.

The resurrection of Jesus can also be proved by two very famous conversions that could not be explained in any other way.

The first was the conversion of James, the brother of Jesus, to a faith in Him as the Messiah. While Jesus lived on earth, James did not believe in Him but considered Him to be out of His mind. The historian Josephus Flavius describes James as a very upright man. How was it possible that he became an apostle and martyr after the death of Jesus? Anyone reading James' letter will note that this is a Jewish letter, without any Christian characteristics. This leads us to realize that it was not the teaching of Jesus that made an impression on James and brought about his conversion.

page 69 JESUS (Friend to Terrorists)

What was the cause? It can only have been what we are told in the New Testament, that Jesus after His resurrection appeared to His brother and that the latter admitted his mistake and in remorse wrote the chapter in which he condemns his own former sin of judging and speaking against Jesus.

The second conversion was that of the rabbi Saul of Tarsus. This man had a vision on the road to Damascus in which Jesus appeared to him and spoke to him, whereupon Saul immediately became a disciple. Would this have been possible on purely psychological grounds? Even though Mohammed were to appear to me ten times, I would tell myself that I was suffering from hallucinations, and I certainly would not become a Mohammedan. Why should things have turned out so differently for the man who was to become the apostle Paul?

The truth is that he knew Jesus' tomb was empty, without being able to find a plausible explanation for this fact unless he admitted to himself that Jesus had risen. This was the crux of the matter: when he encountered Jesus, the last shred of doubt disappeared. He was converted. He later made his way to Jerusalem, but he had not the slightest intention of going to the tomb in order to shed tears of remorse there. He knew it was empty. He surely discussed with the apostles how to preach the resurrection. It would have been a psychological impossibility for the apostles, being the sort of men they were, to discuss how best to preach a lie.

Probably the most telling proof of the resurrection is the fact that millions of sinners in the history of mankind have changed their mind and become holy people. This miracle is happening daily in the Church. If you ask these people how this miracle of rebirth happened, their answer is always that Jesus did it. It is certain that it is a living Jesus, not a dead one, who has brought about these new births. I am one of these people.

The cumulative force of these arguments compels me to believe in the resurrection of Jesus. But let me turn to an argument from a person of real authority. Professor Theodor Mommsell, the great historian of the Roman Empire, wrote: "The resurrection of Jesus is the event in ancient history which has been more conclusively proved than any other event."

There is something more. If a woman's husband is missing in a war and believed to be dead, and then one, two, three, four people, in fact countless people, come and tell her that they have seen him in a prisoner-of-war camp, then the wife will trust those people. We are in the same situation. Those who believed that Christ was dead heard the witness of the women, of the apostles, of the disciples on the road to Emmaus, of five hundred people who had seen Him on the same day. After this it was only normal for them to believe that Jesus was no longer dead, but alive.

page 71 JESUS (Friend to Terrorists)

How Can You Contact Jesus Personally?

WHEN I FIRST heard sensible arguments for the existence of God and the resurrection of Jesus, I decided to find out for myself. I said, "I will pray - or rather un-pray - to the non-God."

I said in effect, "God, I know for sure that you do not exist. It would be nice to have somewhere a loving, almighty father. It is sad that You are only a figment of the imagination, a fancy of ignorant believers. But supposing that perchance You exist, it is not my duty to believe in You. It is Your duty to reveal Yourself to me. I have done many vain things in life. This prayer is one more link in the chain of stupid things I have said. I'm sorry about that, God. I would have preferred that You exist."

Well, this un-prayer was accepted. I read the Bible. I spoke with believers, not about their creeds but about their real experiences. Afterwards, I experienced some encounters myself. I am as sure that I have seen Jesus and heard Him speaking to me as I am sure of having spoken to my wife, though a tape recorder would have registered nothing. But have you never heard voices of persons who love or hate you much, encouraging and strengthening, or warning or threatening you? Aren't our perceptions broader than the sound-range of a machine?

page 72 JESUS (Friend to Terrorists)

Since every individual is different, encounters with Jesus also take different forms. I encourage you to try. If you wish, you can succeed.

I will tell you how one person came to have a personal fellowship with Jesus.

A pastor once asked a young man from a godly family who had drifted away from church, "Do you ever pray?"

He answered, "Never. I don't have anyone to pray to. No matter how loudly I shouted, those in the floor above me would not hear. I never had any sign that anyone in the air or beyond would be interested in listening to me."

The pastor told him, "I know you are interested in many sports, as well as art and science. You must also have many hobbies. I propose that you make an experiment. If it does not succeed, you have lost nothing except a few moments of your life - if one can say that an experiment with negative results is lost time. Dr. Wassermann made 605 negative experiments to find a remedy for syphilis. On the 606th he succeeded. Therefore the medicine against syphilis is called 606. The 605 negative experiments were not squandered efforts, but rather steps toward the discovery of truth.

"Tonight before going to bed, sit in a comfortable chair with an empty chair before you and imagine that Jesus sits in it. You know He is not there and consider Him long since dead, but you also know from general culture what He is believed to have been: a powerful, all-loving Son of God who came to earth to die for the sins of all mankind. It is a matter of record that He died on the cross. His adherents believe that He was resurrected and is alive. If - as I believe - He is God, He is omnipresent and can hear you.

"Never mind that you don't believe this. When Marco Polo returned from his travels in Asia in the fourteenth century and said he had been in places where men are yellow and have slanted eyes, that they write vertically instead of horizontally, he was called 'Marco Polo the liar.'

"There may be a grain of truth even in what everyone considers a lie.

"If the experiment has no result, you will have an amusing story to tell and will be more confirmed in your unbelief.

"Now, imagine that this Jesus, who is only a fancy, sits before you. What would you say if He were really there? Each of us leads imaginary conversations with members of our family who are not present or friends and loved ones far away. There is no one without such imaginary discussions.

"So imagine you are talking to Jesus. Don't use religious phrases. He is weary of religious cliches uttered by people without conviction. Those who sentenced Him to death had uttered beautiful prayers the night before. If you think His teachings are wrong, tell Him so. Tell Him that you consider Him a figment of your imagination and that you only amuse yourself, that you wish to lead a life of self-fulfillment in your trade and leisure. He has heard worse words. When His own people swore at Him, He was not angry at them. He knew their stage of spiritual development.

"I can assure you that what you say the first time will be just a monologue. But do it again the next day and say to Him, 'If you had a real existence, which I contest, I would have some earnest questions to put to you. What kind of God are You? You are said to be almighty and good. Then why all the tragedy and suffering in the world?'

"Tell Him the worst things you have endured in life. Carry on a monologue, with the other chair before you, about the evils in this world. By the way, you might remember to tell Him about some evils you yourself have done. There is no one else in the room. Just recount the evil done to you and by you. Such an emptying of the mind from the things that burden it is very useful, even if there is no one to listen." (In Freudian psychiatric sessions, the psychiatrist sits behind the patient so that he sees nobody.)

"On the third day, still with the armchair opposite you, speak to Him about the good and beautiful things you have encountered. You might remember that you have often neglected to show thankfulness. You have seen lovely flowers. You have met or read about great and good men. You wonder how such splendid characters and so many geniuses have developed in an evil world. Tell Him how amazed you are at the vastness of the sky and the multitude of stars. Mention the sun that gives light and life to evil and good alike.

page 75 JESUS (Friend to Terrorists)

Think of how nice it would be if you could also be like them spreading around you the light of joy, truth, and love. Ask Jesus how to be such a model of life.

If you succeed in following all my suggestions and earnestly ask the question, "How can bring happiness into the lives of those I encounter and bring a smile to their lips?, your monologue will become a dialogue.

I cannot tell you specifically what He will reply to you because I am not Jesus. He knows that each person is unique and tailors His answer accordingly. But He will speak to you.

I know about one unbeliever who acted just as I have described above and came to converse with Jesus. He did so daily for many years. One present at his death recounted that his last gesture before dying was to stretch out his hand to his unseen Friend in that armchair which he always kept near his bed.

I have already given you proofs of Christ's resurrection. You can have one proof more, a decisive one: that you have talked with Him yourself.

page 76 JESUS (Friend to Terrorists)

page 77 JESUS (Friend to Terrorists)

Does God Have a Son?

JESUS ACCREDITED Himself as God's messenger. He is acknowledged by Christians to be God's Son, which should not offend Muslims or Jews who believe in God but claim that He has no wife and does not procreate. If you are among these, understand that the appellation "Son" was never meant to be understood biologically.

The Jews of old had a language of few words. The Hebrew Bible has only 6,500 words, in contrast to the massive vocabulary of the English or German language. The word "Son" was used for many notions, for which we today have different words.

Son was used for "descendant." Jesus was called the Son of David though He was twenty-eight generations removed from him. It was also used for "disciple," as in the Biblical expression "sons of the prophets."

The Hebrew language was especially limited in adjectives. The Jews called hot-tempered people "sons of thunder" (MRK 3:17), and peaceful men "sons of peace" (LUK 10:6). Generally male believers are called "sons of God" (2CO 6:18).

Don't be offended at expressions used thousands of years ago by men of an entirely different culture. Simply understand that believing souls who met Jesus experienced an encounter with God. They said to themselves that if God were to walk on earth as a man, He would be like Jesus. They knew they had met God.

Can God's Existence Be Proved?

ISN'T THE notion "God" false?

Well, I never had any proof that I exist, that I have a brain or lungs. But surely I do exist. If not, who is the one who asks the question? I breathe, therefore I have lungs. I think, therefore I have a brain.

I perceive a reality apart, which in religion is called "God."

Do I perceive Him as I perceive other realities? Would video cameras record this presence? No. Then doesn't this make me doubt what I experience? No, because it is a perception much more intense than everyday realities I experience. The power with which this presence impacts me goes beyond all the limits of human technique. It also exceeds the very limited power of the human mind. The apostle Paul, a deep thinker in matters of religion, calls man's wisdom "the foolishness of God" because God goes beyond human reason. He also belongs to another sphere.

Columbus discovered a world unknown to Europeans. God's children have also discovered a reality unknown to others.

We cannot put much of this experience in human words, because the vocabulary of all languages comes from sense perceptions. But there is also a supersensory reality. We had a glimpse of the Creator and then received through Jesus His revelation for mankind.

No arguments for the existence of God are needed. What argument do we need for the existence of existence?

Make Great Plans

YOU ARE right to desire changes in society. The best revolutionaries are those who start on themselves. Therefore become a light yourself.

You wish the good of your race, religion, class, party, country, but you use your energy within the limits of only a small portion of reality. Other races, classes, nations, religions, and parties have their own agenda, and you will find yourself in conflict with them. The end result will be as much unhappiness as before. Therefore don't make small plans.

Jesus lived as a Man among men. He was a poor, unknown carpenter. What if He had applied His power to save the Jews from Roman oppression? The Jews were a small people. If they had defeated the Romans, the Greeks or another empire would have oppressed them. What if Jesus had fought the existing religious institutions in which truth had been corrupted? More recent history provides an example. Centuries ago there was a struggle to overthrow Catholicism, which had suffered corruption. As a result, Protestantism arose, which has gone the same route of corruption.

A small group of Serbian terrorists wanted a free Serbian state of their own, without belonging to the Austro-Hungarian monarchy. Therefore they killed the Austrian crown prince.

The result was World War I, in which all continents were involved and ten million died. The whole political structure of the world was altered. Seventy years have passed since the incident. Today Serbia is much worse off than it once was. In retrospect, was it wise for the terrorists to murder the Archduke Ferdinand?

Jesus says that His intention is "to save the world" (JHN 3:17), not to destroy it. If His purpose is achieved by us, there would be true peace and happiness. It would be wise to make Jesus' universal plan of salvation your own.

There exists in the universe the law of unintended consequences: in a complex system it is not always possible to predict what the consequences of any change will be.

Terrorists use stone-age methods in twentieth-century society. Savages knew only how to throw a stone or hurl a spear at the enemy. They had no language skills for negotiating with an adversary. In fact, even today there are primitive tribes with a vocabulary of only a few hundred words. Without such words as sympathy, tenderness, compromise, how could they come to an understanding with their fellow men?

Today most nations have a rich vocabulary and various means of communication: the printed word, radio, TV, even a knowledge of psychology. Talk is a much more efficient means of solving problems than violence.

The heart of many men is like a dark cellar full of cockroaches, termites, and snakes. We men are limited and therefore can never find a solution valid for all the problems of the world. Jesus is an exceptional being. He demonstrated a truth adequate under all circumstances and in all ages. It is love and faith.

With his limitations man can only provide remedies of limited value. But Jesus has the key to the kingdom of eternal peace and holiness because He is both human and divine. He has been rightly identified as the Son of God.

The majority of those who knew Him when He walked on earth refused His message. They preferred their sins and their petty enmities to divine love. Sin crucified Jesus two thousand years ago. Sin still kills today.

You will agree with the Bible when it speaks about the evil in men. You rightly consider your adversaries to be evil. But the Bible also asserts that "the best of men are like a briar" (MIC 7:4). You too need repentance and forgiveness.

In our knowledge of the universe and of man himself, we have only scratched the surface. About our own selves we have scant knowledge. One virus or one sudden burst of unreasonableness - and who does not have such? - can destroy all our plans. To serve mankind successfully, we need God's wisdom.

Who Is Your Adversary...Your Friend?

WHILE in prison in Nuremberg, Goering (Hitler's right-hand man) was asked before being sentenced to death, "How is it that the mightiest German army, with the best generals and finest armaments, has suffered an unprecedented total defeat, surrendering unconditionally?"

He replied, "We did not know how powerful the Soviet army was or that the Western armies would ally themselves with it." Lack of knowledge ruined Hitler's plan to erect his thousand-year empire.

How much do you really know? Won't you end up on the gallows like the Nazi leaders or in jail hecause you did not know well your adversaries, or even the head of your own trusted organization? And what if he proves to be unreliable?

In the Bible we read that the eyes of God run to and fro over all the earth. He is the only One who has foresight, insight, hindsight, throughsight, the only One who sees all aspects of a thing or situation. If you take God as your guide, you cannot fail.

Since man was created for a Christlike life, it is our duty to live this life. Because we have not lived up to this ideal it does not mean that we have lost all chance for change. When Jesus died on the cross, He prayed that His crucifiers might be forgiven. In the history of mankind there has never been a sin greater than this: to kill the One who has come to save. But if even this sin can be forgiven, then all of our sins can be forgiven. When one of the thieves crucified near Him entreated for forgiveness, Jesus readily forgave him and promised him a place in paradise. [LUK 23:43]

One can object that if the worst of criminals can be so easily forgiven, justice is no longer possible. If a person is obliged to give to whoever asks - without discerning if he is entitled to ask - then one has no defense against a robber. If everyone turned the other cheek when physically abused, if thieves who stole one thing were recompensed with something even more precious, society would soon disintegrate. In fact, criminals would flourish in a society where evil deeds are rewarded.

We understand that you would have a hard time adapting to such all-forgiving and all-embracing love. But Jesus knew that mankind, as it is, could not live according to these laws.

These are precepts for a special category of people who are spiritually beyond the average person. They have passed through a new experience:

they have received a new heart. The very seat of sentiments, emotions, and high thoughts has been changed. Such individuals are spiritually born again, though physically they continue to be citizens of this world.

page 87 JESUS (Friend to Terrorists)

But just as geniuses are beyond the intellectual level of their fellows, so Jesus' disciples are qualitatively beyond other men, because in them the character of their Master is embodied. They have identified with Him as His body. He works through them. They have a calling different from the rest of the world.

The marrow of Jesus' teachings is the idea of substitution. In crucifixion, He substituted Himself for sinners. He identified with them. He bore the punishment for our sins and thus obtained forgiveness and cleanliness for us. He has risen from the dead and ascended to heaven, but the world is not without His visible presence. We are now called to do His exceptional works - yea, even greater ones than His - [JHN 1:50] to speak His words, to bring His peace to a troubled world.

He is our substitute before the heavenly Father. We identify with the Holiest of all, and He identifies with us because we are one with Him. All of His righteousness is attributed to us. We bring into the world His love. In exchange, He has taken upon Himself all of our sins as if He had committed them. He became the personification of human sin, enduring on the cross the punishment we deserved. Our ugly past is washed away. Through Him we become white as snow.

We can have fellowship with God as with a loving father; we have angels as our ministers. We are called upon to be lights in the world. The rules in the Sermon on the Mount are for us.

page 88 JESUS (Friend to Terrorists)

Only we can accomplish them. We will work on ourselves more and more as Christ leads us in order to obtain His character. This can be the content of our whole earthly life.

Other men's striving for self-improvement is vain. For what purpose is all of their effort? To prepare for the grave? But we know that this life is only an episode preparatory to an eternal one. It is a prologue. We prepare ourselves for blessings without end.

page 89 JESUS (Friend to Terrorists)

The Real Revolution

MICHELANGELO was opposed to painting a portrait of a maid if she lacked classic beauty. In his works of art he eliminated the imperfections of nature. So we must allow Jesus to eliminate from us everything that is imperfect. This is the revolution to be accomplished.

Terrorists are opposed to rulers, governments, rich men, captains of industry, and so on. Christians desire to be men "after God's own heart" - men of love. We recommend this to you as well.

Terrorists are not isolated individuals or groups. They express very widespread feelings. In Italy, a certain Pietro Maso killed his parents. While in jail, he received hundreds of letters of solidarity for his revolutionist courage, despite the fact that he belonged to a dangerous species. Civilization has at once reached the highest peak of artistic sensibility and the lowest depth of mindless bestiality.

We call you, our friends, to the highest: to be Christlike. We pray you may accept this calling. But there is an old maxim of wisdom: "What cannot be turned to good must at least be kept from being very bad."

Francis of Assisi was told that bandits had settled in the forest near his monastery and that they were a threat to the lives of worshipers. He was asked, "Should we call the police?"

page 90 JESUS (Friend to Terrorists)

He answered, "No. Instead, go to them with some food and wine and tell them, 'Francis blesses you and asks one thing of you. He understands that you cannot change your lives all at once. He understands that you cannot do without stealing. But promise at least not to kill.'" This they promised. After a time, he asked them not to steal at least on Sundays and on great feasts because then many worshipers came to church. Thus successively he convinced them to give up stealing.

I knew a wise Christian mother whose son had become a robber. She was unable to bring him to conversion, but he listened to her when she advised him to change from robber to pick-pocket. "Robbers can be shot when they break into houses and can also be tempted to shoot. A pickpocket's life is safer," she told him. He was convinced. Later he also gave up being a pick-pocket.

It is always good to make worthwhile steps to improve yourself a step at a time. But there exists also the possibility of a total inner revolution.

You can have complete forgiveness in a moment for every wrong you have ever done. You can also obtain a new character that will make you a blessing to others and will fit you for a beautiful life here and in eternity.

page 91 JESUS (Friend to Terrorists)

Jesus, Your Friend

I END WITH the thought with which I began.

Many look at terrorists with fear, others with hate. Jesus fears and hates no one. Like God who gives sunshine and rain to all, so He loves and desires to forgive and save all. You can rely on Him as on a friend.

The story is told of two brothers who once lived completely opposite lives. The older was a God-fearing man, good to everyone. The younger was rebellious, even violent. The older brother tried to influence him, but in vain.

One evening, while the older sat quietly in his home, the brother stormed in with blood on his clothes, shouting, "Save me if you can! I have killed a man and the police are after me!"

The older replied, "Quick! Let's change clothes."

They did so. The murderer donned the white garment, and the innocent put on the blood-stained one.

Scarcely had they finished when the police arrived. Seeing the older brother in bloody clothes, they knew they had found their man and dragged him from his home. They had no doubt that he was the one they sought.

Brought to court, the accused admitted his guilt. The judge bowed to what seemed clear evidence and sentenced him to death.

page 92 JESUS (Friend to Terrorists)

He had one last wish: "At the moment of my execution, please give my brother this letter." His wish was granted.

Later, when the brother opened the letter, he read: "I died in your place, in your bloody garment, for your guilt. I was happy to make this sacrifice for you and ask only one thing, that you live a life of love and goodness."

The innocent was dead. Nothing could change that fact. But as often as former comrades asked the younger to participate in an act of violence, he replied, "I cannot do it in the white garment I received from the brother who died for me."

This is exactly what Jesus did for each one of us. He Himself was without any sin. But He took upon Himself the sins of us all and bore our punishmeut as He expired on the cross. His blood can cleanse you from all of your sins, just as He cleansed me from mine. Believe in Him and you will be saved from hate and despair. He will make you a child of God who will spread love and light.

So says God in His holy book, the Bible.

page 93 JESUS (Friend to Terrorists)

A Law of the Other World

BESIDES THE visible, palpable world, there also exists a world of ideals, aspirations, hopes, sentiments, reason, and intuition. There is the world of the spirit, which is different from the material world.

The metaphysical realm has laws very different from those of the world we perceive with our senses.

In this world everyone has to deal with the consequences of their own decisions. Not so in God's world where love reigns. Love always identifies with the beloved. Jesus, the perfect Son of God, became sin out of love for sinners. For their part, sinners who love Him to the point of receiving Him become sons and daughters of God in His image. It is an exchange of garments.

In the spiritual world, a Lover can take upon Himself the guilt of others just as if it were His own. In return, the guilty obtains the lily-whiteness of the Lover, who is Jesus.

You might be burdened with the remembrance of some very evil deed you have committed, and you might ask yourself if God's pardon extends to someone like you.

Be confident! No human sin can be greater than God's grace.

page 94 JESUS (Friend to Terrorists)

Once a very poor girl from a small town went to the big city to earn some money to support her old mother. Soon after her arrival, she realized that an attractive girl can earn more money without working than by honest work.

Recognizing her own assets, she became all too .successful. She pleased men and soon had money, jewels, and a life of revelry. Her mother was forgotten. What does a mother count when one dances to popular tunes?

Years passed by. One day she was stricken with remorse and asked herself, "I wonder how my mother is. I have neglected her completely."

She took the first train to her old village, arriving late at night. To her amazement, she found the gate of her house wide open. Her mother was always careful to lock it at night. Then she saw a light burning in the window of her mother's bedroom. A lamp burning so late? Mother usually went to bed early. Might she be sick?

     When she crossed the threshold, she heard her mother's voice: "Joan, is that you?"
     "Yes, mother," she replied. "But how is it that the gate is wide open so late at night?"
     "Since you left, the gate has not been closed."
     "But why is the light burning so late? Why aren't you asleep?"
     "Since you left, it has never been extinguished. A loving mother's heart waited for you."

The end of "Jesus: Friend to Terrorists"

Marx & Satan

Richard Wurmbrand
Copyright 1986

Introduction

This work started as a small brochure containing only hints about possible connections between Marxism and the Satanist church.

No one had ventured to write about this before. Therefore I was cautious, even timid. But in the course of time more and more evidence has accumulated in my files, evidence I hope will convince you of the spiritual danger part and parcel of communism.

Marxism has governed over one-third of mankind. If it could be shown that the originators and perpetrators of this movement were indeed behind-closed-doors devil-worshipers, consciously exploiting Satanic powers, would not such a startling realization require action?

If some were to reject my thesis out of hand, it would not surprise me. Science and technology advance at a rapid pace because we are always ready to scrap obsolescent machinery in favor of new conveniences. It is quite different in affairs of sociology or religion. Ideas die hard, and a mindset, unlike a computer chip, is not easily altered or replaced. Even fresh evidence may fail to persuade. The doors of some minds have rusty hinges. But I offer credible proofs to support my thesis, and I invite you to carefully consider them.

The Communists certainly took note of this book which has been translated into Russian, Chinese, Romanian, German, Slovak, and other languages, and was smuggled into Iron Curtain countries in great quantities. For instance, the East Berlin journal ~Deutsche Lehrerzeitung~, under the heading "The Killer of Marx," denounced my book vehemently, calling it "the most broadly based, provocative, and heinous work written against Marx."

Can Marx be so easily destroyed? Is this his Achilles' heel? Would Marxism be discredited if men knew about his connection with Satanism? Do enough people care?

Marxism is the great fact of modern life. Whatever your opinion of it, whether or not you believe in the existence of Satan, whatever importance you attach to the cult of Satan practiced in certain circles, I ask you to consider, weigh, and judge the documentation I present here.

I trust it will help you orient yourself to the problems with which Marxism still confronts every inhabitant of the globe today.

The majority of the members of the Russian Parliament remain Communists. Russia and its surrounding area remain on the brink of Civil war. -Ed. Notes 1993

Richard Wurmbrand

Table of Contents

Introduction

Chapter

Introduction.....vii
1 Changed Loyalties.....9
2 Against All Gods.....20
3 Ruined Faith.....36
4 Too Late.....46
5 A Cruel Encounter..... 51
6 A Spiritual Warfare..... 72
7 Marx, Darwin, and Revolution.....83
8 Angels of Light.....102
9 Whom Will We Serve?.....113

10 Marx or Christ?.....118
Appendix.....125
Notes..... 135

Marx's Christian Writings

Today much of the world is still Marxist. Marxism in one form or another is embraced by many in capitalist countries, too. There are even Christians, and amazingly, clergymen, some in high standing, who are sure that while Jesus might have had the right answers about how to get to heaven, Marx had the right answers about how to help the hungry, destitute, and oppressed here on earth.

Marx, it is said, was deeply humane. He was dominated by one idea: how to help the exploited masses. What impoverishes them, he maintained, is capitalism. Once this rotten system is overthrown after a transitional period of dictatorship of the proletariat, a society will emerge in which everyone will work according to his abilities in factories and farms belonging to the collective, and will be rewarded according to his needs. There will be no state to rule over the individual, no wars, no revolution, only an everlasting, universal brotherhood.

In order for the masses to achieve happiness, more is needed than the overthrow of capitalism. Marx writes:

P010

The abolition of religion as the illusory happiness of man is a requisite for their real happiness. The call to abandon their illusions about their conditions is a call to abandon a condition which requires illusions. The criticism of religion is, therefore, the criticism of this vale of tears of which religion is the halo. [1]

Allegedly, Marx was antireligious because religion obstructs the fulfillment of the Communist ideal, which he considered the only answer to the world's problems.

This is how Marxists explain their position, and sadly there are clergymen who explain it in the same way. Rev. Oestreicher of Britain said in a sermon:

Communism, whatever its present varied forms of expression, both good and bad, is in origin a movement for the emancipation of man from exploitation by his fellowman. Sociologically, the Church was and largely still is on the side of the world's exploiters. Karl Marx, whose theories only thinly veil a passion for justice and brotherhood that has its roots in the Hebrew prophets, loathed religion because it was used as an instrument to perpetuate a status quo in which children were slaves and worked to death in order to make others rich here in Britain. It was no cheap jibe a hundred years ago to say that religion was the opium of the masses.... As members of the body of Christ we must come in simple penitence knowing that we owe a deep debt to every Communist. [2]

Marxism makes an impression on people's thinking because of its success, but success proves nothing. Witch doctors often succeed too. Success confirms error as well as truth. Conversely, failure can be constructive, opening the way to deeper truth. So an analysis of some of Marx's works should be made without regard to their success.

P011

Who was Marx? In his early youth, Karl Marx professed to be and lived as a Christian. His first written work is called ~The Union of the Faithful with Christ~. There we read these beautiful words:

Through love of Christ we turn our hearts at the same time toward our brethren who are inwardly bound to us and for whom He gave Himself in sacrifice.

Marx knew a way for men to become loving brethren toward one another Christianity.

He continues:

Union with Christ could give an inner elevation, comfort in sorrow, calm trust, and a heart susceptible to human love, to everything noble and great, not for the sake of ambition and glory, but only for the sake of Christ. [3]

At approximately the same time Marx writes in his thesis ~Considerations of a Young Man on Choosing His Career~:

Religion itself teaches us that the Ideal toward which all strive sacrificed Himself for humanity, and who shall dare contradict such claims? If we have chosen the position in which we can accomplish the most for Him, then we can never be crushed by burdens, because they are only sacrifices made for the sake of all. [4]

Marx started out as a Christian believer. When he finished high school, the following was written on his graduation certificate under the heading "Religious Knowledge":

His knowledge of the Christian faith and morals is fairly clear and well grounded. He knows also to some extent the history of the Christian church. [5]

P012

However, in a thesis written at the same time he repeated six times the word "destroy," which not even one of his colleagues used in the exam. "Destroy" then became his nickname. It was natural for him to want to destroy because he spoke about mankind as "human trash" and said, "No man visits me and I like this, because present mankind may [an obscenity]. They are a bunch of rascals."

Marx's First Anti-God Writings

Shortly after Marx received this certificate, something mysterious happened in his life: he became profoundly and passionately antireligious. A new Marx began to emerge.

He writes in a poem, "I wish to avenge myself against the One who rules above." [6] So he was convinced that there is One above who rules, but was quarreling with Him. Yet, the One above had done him no wrong. Marx belonged to a relatively well-to-do family. He had not faced hunger in his childhood. He was much better off than many fellow students. What produced such a terrible hatred for God? No personal motive is known. Was Karl Marx in this declaration only someone else's mouthpiece? We don't know.

At an age when most young men have beautiful dreams of doing good to others and preparing a career for themselves, the young Marx wrote the following lines in his poem "Invocation of One in Despair":

So a god has snatched from me my all,
In the curse and rack of destiny.
All his worlds are gone beyond recall.
Nothing but revenge is left to me.

I shall build my throne high overhead,
Cold, tremendous shall its summit be.

P013

For its bulwark – superstitious dread.
For its marshal – blackest agony.

Who looks on it with a healthy eye,
Shall turn back, deathly pale and dumb,
Clutched by blind and chill mortality,
May his happiness prepare its tomb. [7]

Marx dreamt about ruining the world created by God. He said in another poem:

Then I will be able to walk triumphantly,
Like a god, through the ruins of their kingdom.
Every word of mine is fire and action.
My breast is equal to that of the Creator. [8]

The words "I shall build my throne high overhead" and the confession that from the one sitting on this throne will emanate only dread and agony remind us of Lucifer's proud boast, "I will ascend into heaven, I will exalt my throne above the stars of God" (ISA 14:13).

Perhaps it was no coincidence that Bakunin, who was for a time one of Marx's most intimate friends, wrote,

One has to worship Marx in order to be loved by him. One has at least to fear him in order to be tolerated by him. Marx is extremely proud, up to dirt and madness. [9]

The Satanist Church and ~Oulanem~

Why did Marx wish such a throne?

The answer is found in a little-known drama which he also composed during his student years. It is called ~Oulanem~. To explain this title, a digression is needed.

One of the rituals of the Satanist church is the black mass, which Satanist priests recite at midnight. Black candles are put in the candlesticks upside down. The priest is dressed in his ornate robes, but with the lining outside. He says all things prescribed in the prayer book, but reads from the end toward the beginning. The holy names of God, Jesus, and Mary are read inversely. A crucifix is fastened upside down or trampled upon. The body of a naked woman serves as an altar. A consecrated wafer stolen from a church is inscribed with the name Satan and is used for a mock communion. During the black mass a Bible is burned. All those present promise to commit the seven deadly sins, as enumerated in Catholic catechisms, and never to do any good. An orgy follows.

Devil worship is very old. The Bible has much to say about and against it. For example, the Jews, though entrusted by God with the true religion, sometimes faltered in their faith and "sacrificed unto devils" (DEU 32:17). And King Jeroboam of Israel once ordained priests for devils (2CH 11:15).

So from time immemorial men have believed in the existence of the Devil. Sin and wickedness are the hallmark of his kingdom, disintegration and destruction its inevitable result. The great concentrations of evil design in times past as well as in modern communism and nazism would have been impossible without a guiding force, the Devil himself. He has been the mastermind, the secret agent, supplying the unifying energy in his grand scheme to control mankind.

Characteristically, "~Oulanem~" is an inversion of a holy name. It is an anagram of Emmanuel, Biblical name of Jesus which means in Hebrew "God with us." Such inversions of names are considered effective in black magic.

We will be able to understand the drama ~Oulanem~ only in the light of a strange confession that Marx made in a poem called "The Player," later downplayed by both himself and his followers:

The hellish vapors rise and fill the brain,
Till I go mad and my heart is utterly changed.

See this sword?
The prince of darkness
Sold it to me.
For me he beats the time and gives the signs.
Ever more boldly I play the dance of death. [10]

These lines take on special significance when we learn that in the rites of higher initiation in the Satanist cult an "enchanted" sword which ensures success is sold to the candidate. He pays for it by signing a covenant, with blood taken from his wrists, agreeing that his soul will belong to Satan after death.

(To enable the reader to grasp the horrid intent of these poems, I should mention - though with natural revulsion - that "The Satanic Bible," after saying "the crucifix symbolizes pallid incompetence hanging on a tree," calls Satan "the ineffable Prince of Darkness who rules the earth." As opposed to "the lasting foulness of Bethlehem," "the cursed Nazarene," "the impotent king," "fugitive and mute god," "vile and abhorred pretender to the majesty of Satan," the Devil is called "the God of Light," with angels "cowering and trembling with fear and prostrating themselves before him" and "sending Christian minions staggering to their doom.")

Now I quote from the drama ~Oulanem~ itself:

And they are also Oulanem, Oulanem.
The name rings forth like death, rings forth
Until it dies away in a wretched crawl.
Stop, I've got it now! It rises from my soul
As clear as air, as strong as my bones. [11]

Yet I have power within my youthful arms
To clench and crush you [i.e., personified humanity] with tempestuous force,
While for us both the abyss yawns in darkness.
You will sink down and I shall follow laughing, Whispering in your ears, "Descend, come with me, friend." [12]

The Bible, which Marx had studied in his high school years and which he knew quite well in his mature years, says that the Devil will be bound by an angel and cast into the bottomless pit (~abyssos~ in Greek; see REV 20:3). Marx desires to draw the whole of mankind into this pit reserved for the Devil and his angels.

Who speaks through Marx in this drama? Is it reasonable to expect a young student to entertain as his life's dream the vision of mankind entering into the abyss of darkness ("outer darkness" is a Biblical expression for hell) and of himself laughing as he follows those he has led to unbelief? Nowhere in the world is this ideal cultivated except in the initiation rites of the Satanist church at its highest degrees.

When, in the drama, the time comes for Oulanem's death, his words are:

Ruined, ruined. My time has clean run out.
The clock has stopped, the pygmy house has crumbled.
Soon I shall embrace eternity to my breast, and soon
I shall howl gigantic curses on mankind. [13]

Marx had loved the words of Mephistopheles in ~Faust~: "Everything in existence is worth being destroyed." Everything, including the proletariat and the comrades. Marx quotes these words in ~The 18th Brumaire~. [14]

Stalin acted on them and destroyed even his own family.

Satan is called in ~Faust~ the spirit that denies everything. This is precisely Marx's attitude. He writes about "pitiless criticism of all that exists"; "war against the situation in Germany"; "merciless criticism of all." He adds, "It is the first duty of the press to undermine the foundations of the existing political system." [15] Marx said about himself that he is "the most outstanding hater of the so-called positive." [16]

The Satanist sect is not materialistic. It believes in eternal life. ~Oulanem~, the person through whom Marx speaks, does not question this. He asserts eternal life, but as a life of hate magnified to its extreme.

It is worth noting that eternity for devils means torment. Note Jesus' reproach by demons: "Art thou come hither to torment us before the time?" (MTT 8:29).

Marx is similarly obsessed:

Ha! Eternity! She is our eternal grief,
An indescribable and immeasurable Death,
Vile artificiality conceived to scorn us,
Ourselves being clockwork, blindly mechanical,
Made to be the fool-calendars of Time and Space,

Having no purpose save to happen, to be ruined,
So that there shall be something to ruin. [17]

We begin now to understand what has happened to young Marx. He had had Christian convictions, but had not led a consistent life. His correspondence with his father testifies to his squandering great sums of money on pleasures and his constant quarreling with parental authority about this and other matters. Then he seems to have fallen in with the tenets of the highly secret Satanist church and received the rites of initiation.

Satan, who his worshipers see in their hallucinatory orgies, actually speaks through them. Thus Marx is only Satan's mouthpiece when he utters in his poem "Invocation of One in Despair" the words, "I wish to avenge myself against the One who rules above."

Listen to the end of ~Oulanem~:

If there is a Something which devours, I'll leap within it, though I bring the world to ruins -
The world which bulks between me and the abyss
I will smash to pieces with my enduring curses.

I'll throw my arms around its harsh reality,
Embracing me, the world will dumbly pass away,
And then sink down to utter nothingness, Perished, with no existence - that would be really living. [18]

Marx was probably inspired by the words of the Marquis de Sade:

I abhor nature. I would like to split its planet, hinder its process, stop the circles of stars, overthrow the globes that float in space, destroy what serves nature, protect what harms it - in a word, I wish to insult it in my works.... Perhaps we will be able to attack the sun, deprive the universe of it, or use it to set the world on fire. These would be real crimes.

De Sade and Marx propagate the same ideas!

Honest men, as well as men inspired by God, often seek to serve their fellowmen by writing books to increase their store of knowledge, improve their morality, stimulate religious sentiments, or at least provide relaxation and amusement. The Devil is the only being who consciously purveys only evil to humankind, and he does this through his elect servants.

As far as I know, Marx is the only renowned author who has ever called his own writings "shit," "swinish books." [19] He consciously, deliberately gives his readers filth. No wonder, then, that some of his disciples, Communists in Romania and Mozambique, forced prisoners to eat their own excrement and drink their own urine.

In ~Oulanem~ Marx does what the Devil does: he consigns the entire human race to damnation.

~Oulanem~ is probably the only drama in the world in which all the characters are aware of their own corruption, and flaunt it and celebrate it with conviction. In this drama there is no black and white. There exist no Claudius and Ophelia, Iago and Desdemona. Here all are servants of darkness, all reveal aspects of Mephistopheles. All are Satanic, corrupt, doomed.

Satan in Marx's Family

When he wrote the works quoted in the last chapter, Marx, a premature genius, was only eighteen. His life's program had thus already been established. He had no vision of serving mankind, the proletariat, or socialism. He merely wished to bring the world to ruin, to build for himself a throne whose bulwark would be human fear.

At that point, correspondence between Karl Marx and his father included some especially cryptic passages. The son writes,

A curtain had fallen. My holy of holies was rent asunder and new gods had to be installed. [1]

These words were written on November 10, 1837 by a young man who had professed Christianity until then. He had earlier declared that Christ was in his heart. Now this is no longer so. Who are the new gods installed in Christ's place?

The father replies,

I refrained from insisting on an explanation about a very mysterious matter although it seemed highly dubious. [2]

What was this mysterious matter? No biographer of Marx has explained these strange sentences.

On March 2, 1837, Marx's father writes to his son:

Your advancement, the dear hope of seeing your name someday of great repute, and your earthly well-being are not the only desires of my heart. These are illusions I had had a long time, but I can assure you that their fulfillment would not have made me happy. Only if your heart remains pure and beats humanly and if no demon is able to alienate your heart from better feelings, only then will I be happy. [3]

What made a father suddenly express the fear of demonic influence upon a young son who until then had been a confessed Christian? Was it the poems he received as a present from his son for his fifty-fifth birthday?

The following quotation is taken from Marx's poem "On Hegel":

Words I teach all mixed up into a devilish muddle.
Thus, anyone may think just what he chooses to think. [4]

Here also are words from another epigram on Hegel:

Because I discovered the highest,
And because I found the deepest through meditation,
I am great like a God;
I clothe myself in darkness like Him. [5]

In his poem "The Pale Maiden," he writes:

Thus heaven I've forfeited,
I know it full well.
My soul, once true to God,
Is chosen for hell. [6]

No commentary is needed.

Marx had started out with artistic ambitions. His poems and drama are important in revealing the state of his heart; but having no literary value, they received no recognition. Lack of success in drama gave us a Goebbels, the propaganda minister of the Nazis; in philosophy a Rosenberg, the purveyor of German racism; in painting and architecture a Hitler.

Hitler was a poet too. It can be assumed that he never read Marx's poetry, but the resemblance is striking. In his poems Hitler mentions the same Satanist practices:

On rough nights, I go sometimes
To the oak of Wotan in the still garden,
To make a pact with dark forces.
The moonlight makes runes appear.
Those that were sunbathed during the day
Become small before the magic formula. [7]

"Wotan" is the chief god of German heathen mythology. "Runes" were symbols used for writing in olden times.

Hitler soon abandoned a poetic career, and so did Marx, who exchanged it for a revolutionary career in the name of Satan against a society which had not appreciated his poems. This is conceivably one of the motives for his total rebellion. Being despised as a Jew was perhaps another.

Two years after his father's expressed concern, in 1839, the young Marx wrote ~The Difference Between Democritus' and Epicurus' Philosophy of Nature~, in the preface to which he aligns himself with the declaration of Aeschylus, "I harbor hatred against all gods." [8] This he qualifies by stating that he is against all gods on earth and in heaven that do not recognize human self-consciousness as the supreme godhead.

Marx was an avowed enemy of all gods, a man who had bought his sword from the prince of darkness at the price of his soul. He had declared it his aim to draw all mankind into the abyss and to follow them laughing.

Could Marx really have bought his sword from Satan?

His daughter Eleanor says that Marx told her and her sisters many stories when they were children. The one she liked most was about a certain Hal R”ckle.

The telling of the story lasted months and months, because it was a long, long story and never finished. Hal R”ckle was a witch ... who had a shop with toys and many debts.... Though he was a witch, he was always in financial need. Therefore he had to sell against his will all his beautiful things, piece after piece, to the Devil.... Some of these adventures were horrifying and made your hair stand on end. [9]

Is it normal for a father to tell his little children horrifying stories about selling one's dearest treasures to the Devil? Robert Payne in his book ~Marx~ [10] also recounts this incident in great detail, as told by Eleanor - how unhappy R”ckle, the magician, sold the toys with reluctance, holding on to them until the last moment. But since he had made a pact with the Devil, there was no escaping it.

Marx's biographer continues,

There can be very little doubt that those interminable stories were autobiographical. He had the Devil's view of the world, and the Devil's malignity. Sometimes he seemed to know that he was accomplishing works of evil. [11]

When Marx had finished ~Oulanem~ and other early poems in which he wrote about having a pact with the Devil, he had no thought of socialism. He even fought against it. He was editor of a German magazine, the ~Rheinische Zeitung~, which "does not concede even theoretical validity to Communist ideas in their present form, let alone desire their practical realization, which it anyway finds impossible.... Attempts by masses to carry out Communist ideas can be answered by a cannon as soon as they have become dangerous..." [12]

Marx Will Chase God from Heaven

After reaching this stage in his thinking, Marx met Moses Hess, the man who played the most important role in his life, the man who led him to embrace the Socialist ideal.

Hess calls him "Dr. Marx – my idol, who will give the last kick to medieval religion and politics." [13] To give a kick to religion was Marx's first aim, not socialism.

Georg Jung, another friend of Marx at that time, writes even more clearly in 1841 that Marx will surely chase God from His heaven and will even sue Him. Marx calls Christianity one of the most immoral religions. [14] No wonder, for Marx now believed that Christians of ancient times had slaughtered men and eaten their flesh.

These then were the expectations of those who initiated Marx into the depths of Satanism. There is no support for the view that Marx entertained lofty social ideals about helping mankind, saw religion as a hindrance in fulfilling this ideal, and for this reason embraced an anti-religious attitude. On the contrary, Marx hated any notion of God or gods. He determined to be the man who would kick out God – all this before he had embraced socialism, which was only the bait to entice proletarians and intellectuals to embrace this devilish ideal.

Eventually Marx claims not to even admit the existence of a Creator. Incredibly, he maintained that mankind shaped itself. He wrote, Seeing that for the Socialist man all of so-called world history is nothing other than the creation of man through human work, than the development of nature for man, he has the incontestable proof of his being born from himself.... The criticism of religion ends with the teaching that man is the supreme being for man.

When no Creator is acknowledged, there is no one to give us commandments, or to whom we are accountable. Marx confirms this by stating, "Communists preach absolutely no morals." When the Soviets in their early years adopted the slogan, "Let us drive out the capitalists from earth and God from heaven," they were merely fulfilling the legacy of Karl Marx.

One of the peculiarities of black magic, as mentioned earlier, is the inversion of names. Inversions in general so permeated Marx's whole manner of thinking that he used them throughout. He answered Proudhon's book ~The Philosophy of Misery~ with another book entitled ~The Misery of Philosophy~. He also wrote, "We have to use instead of the weapon of criticism, the criticism of weapons." [15]

Here are further examples of Marx's use of inversion in his writing:

Let us seek the enigma of the Jew not in his religion, but rather let us seek the enigma of his religion in the real Jew. [16]

Luther broke the faith in authority, because he restored the authority of faith. He changed the priests into laymen, because he changed the laymen into priests. [17]

Marx used this technique in many places. He used what could be called typical Satanist style.

Shifting gears somewhat, men usually wore beards in Marx's time, but not beards like his, and they did not have long hair. Marx's manner and appearance was characteristic of the disciples of Joanna Southcott, a cultist priestess of an occult sect who claimed to be in contact with the ghost Shiloh. [18]

It is strange that some sixty years after her death in 1814, the Chatham group of Southcottians were joined by a soldier James White, who, after his period of service in India, returned and took the lead locally, developing further the doctrines of Joanna ... with a Communistic tinge. [19]

Marx did not often speak publicly about metaphysics, but we can gather his views from the men with whom he associated. One of his partners in the First International was Mikhail Bakunin, a Russian anarchist, who wrote:

The Evil One is the satanic revolt against divine authority, revolt in which we see the fecund germ of all human emancipations, the revolution. Socialists recognize each other by the words "In the name of the one to whom a great wrong has been done."

Satan [is] the eternal rebel, the first freethinker and the emancipator of worlds. He makes man ashamed of his bestial ignorance and obedience; he emancipates him, stamps upon his brow the seal of liberty and humanity, in urging him to disobey and eat of the fruit of knowledge. [20]

Bakunin does more than praise Lucifer. He has a concrete program of revolution, but not one that would free the poor from exploitation. He writes:

In this revolution we will have to awaken the Devil in the people, to stir up the basest passions. Our mission is to destroy, not to edify. The passion of destruction is a creative passion. [21]

Marx, along with Bakunin, formed the First International and endorsed this strange program. Marx and Engels said in ~The Communist Manifesto~ that the proletarian sees law, morality, and religion as "so many bourgeois prejudices, behind which lurk in ambush just as many bourgeois interests."

Bakunin reveals that Proudhon, another major Socialist thinker and at that time a friend of Karl Marx, also "worshiped Satan." [22] Hess had introduced Marx to Proudhon, who wore the same hair style typical of the nineteenth-century Satanist sect of Joanna Southcott.

Proudhon, in ~The Philosophy of Misery~, declared that God was the prototype for injustice.

We reach knowledge in spite of him, we reach society in spite of him. Every step forward is a victory in which we overcome the Divine. [23]

He exclaims,

Come, Satan, slandered by the small and by kings. God is stupidity and cowardice; God is hypocrisy and falsehood; God is tyranny and poverty; God is evil. Where humanity bows before an altar, humanity, the slave of kings and priests, will be condemned.... I swear, God, with my hand stretched out towards the heavens, that you are nothing more than the executioner of my reason, the scepter of my conscience.... God is essentially anticivilized, antiliberal, antihuman. [24]

Proudhon declares God to be evil because man, His creation, is evil. Such thoughts are not original; they are the usual content of sermons delivered in Satanist worship.

Marx later quarreled with Proudhon and wrote a book to refute his ~Philosophy of Misery~. But Marx contradicted only minor economic doctrines. He had no objection to Proudhon's demonic anti-God rebellion.

Heinrich Heine, the renowned German poet, was a third intimate friend of Marx. He too was Satan-fancier. He wrote:

I called the devil and he came,
His face with wonder I must scan;
He is not ugly, he is not lame.
He is a delightful, charming man. [25]

"Marx was a great admirer of Heinrich Heine.... Their relationship was warm, hearty." [26]

Why did he admire Heine? Perhaps for Satanist thoughts like the following:

I have a desire ... for a few beautiful trees before my door, and if dear God wishes to make me totally happy, he will give me the joy of seeing six or seven of my enemies hanged on these trees. With a compassionate heart I will forgive them after death all the wrong they have done to me during their life. Yes, we must forgive our enemies, but not before they are hanged.

I am not revengeful. I would like to love my enemies. But I cannot love them before taking revenge upon them. Only then my heart opens for them. As long as one has not avenged himself, bitterness remains in the heart.

Would any decent man be an intimate friend of one who thinks like this?

But Marx and his entourage thought alike. Lunatcharski, a leading philosopher who was once minister of education of the USSR, wrote in ~Socialism and Religion~ that Marx set aside all contact with God and instead put Satan in front of marching proletarian columns.

It is essential at this point to state emphatically that Marx and his comrades, while anti-God, were not atheists, as present-day Marxists claim to be. That is, while they openly denounced and reviled God, they ~hated a God in whom they believed~. They challenged not His existence, but His supremacy.

When the revolution broke out in Paris in 1871, the ~Communard Flourens~ declared, "Our enemy is God. Hatred of God is the beginning of wisdom." [27]

Marx greatly praised the Communards who openly proclaimed this aim. But what has this to do with a more equitable distribution of goods or with better social institutions? Such are only the outward trappings for concealing the real aim - the total eradication of God and His worship. We saw the evidence of this in such countries as Albania, and today in North Korea, where all churches, mosques, and pagodas have been closed.

Marx's Devilish Poetry

We see this clearly in Marx's poetry. In "Invocation of One in Despair" and "Human Pride," man's supreme supplication is for his own greatness. If man is doomed to perish through his own greatness, this will be a cosmic catastrophe, but he will die as a godlike being, mourned by demons. Marx's ballad "The Player" records the singer's complaints against a God who neither knows nor respects his art. This emerges from the dark abyss of hell, "bedeviling the mind and bewitching the heart, and his dance is the dance of death." [28] The minstrel draws his sword and throws it into the poet's soul.

Art emerging from the dark abyss of hell, bedeviling the mind ... This reminds us of the words of the American revolutionary Jerry Rubin in ~Do It~:

We've combined youth, music, sex, drugs, and rebellion with treason - and that's a combination hard to beat. [29]

In his poem "Human Pride," Marx admits that his aim is not to improve the world or to reform, revolutionize it, but simply to ruin it and to enjoy its being ruined:

With disdain I will throw my gauntlet
Full in the face of the world,
And see the collapse of this pygmy giant
Whose fall will not stifle my ardour.

Then will I wander godlike and victorious
Through the ruins of the world
And, giving my words an active force,
I will feel equal to the Creator. [30]

Marx adopted Satanism after intense inner struggle. He ceased writing poems during a period of severe illness, a result of the tempest within his heart. He wrote at that time about his vexation at having to make an idol of a view he detested. He felt sick. [31]

The overriding reason for Marx's conversion to communism appears clearly in a letter of his friend Georg Jung to Ruge: it was not the emancipation of the proletariat, nor even the establishing of a better social order. Jung writes:

If Marx, Bruno Bauer and Feuerbach associate to found a theological-political review, God would do well to surround himself with all his angels and indulge in self-pity, for these three will certainly drive him out of heaven.... [32]

Were these poems the only expressly Satanist writings of Karl Marx? We do not know, because the bulk of his works is kept secret by those who guard his manuscripts.

In ~The Revolted Man~, Albert Camus stated that thirty volumes of Marx and Engels have never been published and expressed the presumption that they are not much like what is generally known as Marxism. On reading this, I had one of my secretaries write to the Marx Institute in Moscow, asking if this assertion of the French writer is true.

I received a reply.

The vice director, one Professor M. Mtchedlov, after saying Camus lied, nevertheless confirmed his allegations. Mtchedlov wrote that of a total of one hundred volumes, only thirteen have appeared. He offered a ridiculous excuse for this: World War II forestalled the printing of the other volumes. The letter was written in 1980, thirty-five years after the end of the war. And the State Publishing House of the Soviet Union surely has sufficient funds.

From this letter it is clear that though the Soviet Communists had all the manuscripts for one hundred volumes, they chose to publish only thirteen. There is no other explanation than that most of Marx's ideas were deliberately kept secret.

Marx's Ravaged Life

All active Satanists have ravaged personal lives, and this was the case with Marx as well.

Arnold Knzli, in his book Karl ~Marx - A Psychogram~, [33] writes about Marx's life, including the suicide of two daughters and a son-in-law. Three children died of malnutrition. His daughter Laura, married to the Socialist Lafargue, also buried three of her children; then she and her husband committed suicide together. Another daughter Eleanor, decided with her husband to do likewise. She died; he backed out at the last minute.

Marx felt no obligation to earn a living for his family, though he could easily have done so through his tremendous knowledge of languages. Instead, he lived by begging from Engels. He had an illegitimate child by his maidservant, Helen Demuth. Later he attributed the child to Engels, who accepted this comedy. Marx drank heavily. Riazanov, director of the Marx-Engels

Institute in Moscow, admits this fact in his book ~Karl Marx, Man, Thinker and Revolutionist~. [34]

Eleanor was Marx's favorite daughter. He called her Tussy and frequently said, "Tussy is me." She was shattered when she heard about the scandal of illegitimacy from Engels on his deathbed. It was this that led to her suicide.

It should be noted that Marx, in ~The Communist Manifesto~, had railed against capitalists "having the wives and daughters of their proletarians at their disposal." Such hypocrisy was not out of character for Karl Marx.

There was an even darker spot in the life of Marx, the great revolutionary. The German newspaper ~Reichsruf~ (January 9, 1960) published the fact that the Austrian chancellor Raabe donated to Nikita Khrushchev, then director of Soviet Russia, an original letter of Karl Marx. Khrushchev did not enjoy it, because it was proof that Marx had been a paid informer of the Austrian police, spying on revolutionaries.

The letter had been found accidentally in a secret archive. It indicated that Marx, as an informer reported on his comrades during his exile in London. He received $25 for each bit of information he turned up. His notes were about the revolutionary exiles in London, Paris, and Switzerland.

One of those against whom he informed was Ruge, who considered himself an intimate friend of Marx. Cordial letters between the two still exist.

Rolv Heuer describes Marx's ravaged financial life in ~Genius and Riches~:

While he was a student in Berlin, the son of papa Marx received 700 thalers a year pocket-money. [35]

This was an enormous sum because at that time only five percent of the population had an annual income greater than 300 thalers. During his lifetime, Marx received from Engels some six million French francs, according to the Marx Institute.

Yet he always lusted after inheritances. While an uncle of his was in agony, Marx wrote, "If the dog dies, I would be out of mischief." [36] To which Engels answers, "I congratulate you for the sickness of the hinderer of an inheritance, and I hope that the catastrophe will happen now." [37]

"The dog" died, and Marx wrote on March 8, 1855,

A very happy event. Yesterday we were told about the death of the ninety-year-old uncle of my wife. My wife will receive some one hundred Lst; even more if the old dog has not left a part of his money to the lady who administered his house. [38]

He did not have any kinder feelings for those who were much nearer to him than his uncle. He was not even on speaking terms with his mother. In December 1863 he wrote to Engels,

Two hours ago a telegram arrived to say that my mother is dead. Fate needed to take one member of the family. I already had one foot in the grave. Under the circumstances I am needed more than the old woman. I have to go to Trier about their inheritance. [39]

This was all he had to say at his mother passing.

In addition, the relationship between Marx and his wife was demonstrably poor. She abandoned him twice but returned each time. When she died, he did not even attend her funeral.

Always in need of funds, Marx lost much money at the stock exchange, where he, the great economist, knew only how to lose.

Marx was an intellectual of high caliber, as was Engels. But their correspondence is full of obscenities, unusual for their class of society. Foul language abounds, and there is not one letter in which one hears an idealist speaking about his humanist or Socialist dream.

Since the Satanist sect is highly secret, we have only reports about the possibilities of Marx's connections with it. But his disorderly life is undoubtedly another link in the chain of evidence already considered.

Engels's Counter-Conversion

Since Friedrich Engels figures prominently in Marx's life, I will give brief material about him. Engels had been brought up in a pietistic family. In fact, in his youth he had composed beautiful Christian poems. After meeting Marx, he wrote about him:

Who is chasing wild endeavor? A black man from Trier [Marx's birthplace], a remarkable monster. He does not walk or run, he jumps on his heels and rages full of anger as if he would like to catch the wide tent of the sky and throw it to the earth. He stretches his arms far away in the air, the wicked fist is clenched, he rages without ceasing, as if ten thousand devils had caught him by the hair. [1]

Engels had begun to doubt the Christian faith after reading a book written by a liberal theologian, Bruno Bauer. He had had a great struggle in his heart. He wrote at that time,

I pray every day, indeed almost all day, for truth, and I have done so ever since I began to doubt, but still I cannot go back. My tears are welling as I write. [2]

Engels never found his way back to the Word of God, joining instead the one whom he himself had called "the monster possessed by ten thousand devils." [3] He had experienced a counter-conversion.

What kind of person was Bruno Bauer, the liberal theologian who played a decisive role in the destruction of Engels's Christian faith and who endorsed Marx in his new anti-Christian ways? Did he have any connection with demons?

Like Engels himself, he started life as a believer and later as a conservative theologian, even writing against critics of the Bible. Afterward he himself became a radical critic of the Holy Scriptures and creator of a materialistic Christianity which insisted that Jesus was only human, not the Son of God. Bauer wrote to his friend Arnold Ruge, also a friend of Marx an(Engels, on December 6, 1841:

I deliver lectures here at the university before a large audience. I don't recognize myself when I pronounce my blasphemies from the pulpit. They are so great that these children, whom nobody should offend, have their hair standing on end. While delivering the blasphemies, I remember how I work piously at home writing an apology of the holy Scriptures and of the Revelation. In any case, it is a very bad demon that possesses me as often as I ascend the pulpit, and I am so weak that I am compelled to yield to him.... My spirit of blasphemy will be satisfied only if I am authorized to preach openly as professor of the atheistic system. [4]

The man who convinced him to become a Communist was the same Moses Hess who had previously convinced Marx. Hess wrote, after meeting Engels in Cologne,

He parted from me as an overzealous Communist. This is how I produce ravages.... [5]

To produce ravages was this Hess's supreme purpose in life? It is Lucifer's, too.

The traces of having been a Christian never disappeared from Engels's mind. In 1865 he expressed his admiration for the song of the Reformation, "A Mighty Fortress Is Our God," calling it "a triumphal hymn which became the Marseillaise of the sixteenth century." [6] There are also other such pro-Christian statements from his pen.

The tragedy of Engels is moving, and even more gripping than that of Marx. Here is a wonderful Christian poem written in his youth by the man who would later become Marx's greatest accomplice in the attempted destruction of religion:

Lord Jesus Christ, God's only son,
O step down from Thy heavenly throne
And save my soul for me.
Come down in all Thy blessedness.
Light of Thy Father's holiness,
Grant that I may choose Thee.
Lovely, splendid, without sorrow is the joy with which we raise,
Saviour, unto Thee our praise.

And when I draw my dying breath
And must endure the pangs of death,
Firm to Thee may I hold;
That when my eyes with dark are filled
And when my beating heart is stilled,
In Thee shall I grow cold.
Up in Heaven shall my spirit praise
    Thy name eternally,
Since it lies safe in Thee.

O were the time of joy but nigh
When from Thy loving bosom I Might draw new life that warms.
And then, O God, with thanks to Thee,

Shall I embrace those dear to me
Forever in my arms.
Ever, ever, ever-living,
    Thee abiding to behold
Shall my life anew unfold.

Thou camest Humankind to free
From death and ill, that there might be Blessings and fortune everywhere.
And now with this, Thy new descent,
On Earth all shall be different;
To each man shalt Thou give his share. [7]

After Bruno Bauer had sown doubts in his soul Engels wrote to some friends,

It is written, "Ask and it shall be given unto you." I seek truth wherever I have the hope of finding at least a shadow of it. Still I cannot recognize your truth as the eternal truth. Yet it is written, "Seek and ye shall find. Who is the man among you who would give to his child a stone, when it asks for bread? Even less will your Father who is in heaven."

Tears come into my eyes while I write this. I am moved through and through, but I feel I will not be lost. I will come to God, after whom my whole soul longs. This, too, is a witness of the Holy Spirit. With this I live and with this I die. ... The Spirit of God witnesses to me, that I am a child of God. [8]

Engels was very well aware of the dangers of Satanism. In his book ~Schelling, Philosopher in Christ~, Engels wrote:

Since the terrible French Revolution, an entirely new, devilish spirit has entered into a great part of mankind, and godlessness lifts its daring head in such an unashamed and subtle manner that you would think the prophecies of Scripture are fulfilled now. Let us see first what the Scriptures say about the godlessness of the last times. The Lord Jesus says in MTT 24:11-13: "Many false prophets shall rise, and shall deceive many. And because iniquity shall abound, the love of many shall wax cold. But he that shall endure unto the end, the same shall be saved. And this gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations; and then shall the end come." And then in verse 24 [MTT 24:24]: "There shall arise false Christs, and false prophets, and shall show great signs and wonders; insomuch that, if it were possible, they shall deceive the very elect." And St. Paul says, in 2TH 2:3ff.: "That man of sin shall be revealed, the son of perdition, who opposes and exalts himself above all that is God, or that is worshipped.... [The coming of the Wicked] is after the working of Satan with all power and signs and lying wonders, and with all deceivableness of unrighteousness in them that perish; because they received not the love of the truth, that they might be saved. ~And for this cause God shall send them strong delusion, that they should believe a lie~: that they all might be damned who believed not the truth, but had pleasure in unrighteousness."

Engels quotes Scripture after Scripture, just as the most Bible-believing theologian would do.

He continues:

We have nothing to do any more with indifference coldness toward the Lord. No, it is an open, declared enmity, and in the place of all sects and parties we have now only two: Christians and anti-Christians.... We see the false prophets among us.... They travel throughout Germany and wish to intrude everywhere; they teach their Satanic teachings in the market-places and bear the flag of the Devil from one town to another, seducing the poor youth, in order to throw them in the deepest abyss of hell and death.

He finishes this book with the words of Revelation:

Behold, I come soon. Keep what you have, that nobody takes away from you your crown. Amen. [9]

The man who wrote such poems and such warnings against Satanism, the man who prayed with tears to beware of this danger, the man who recognized Marx as being possessed with a thousand devils, became Marx's closest collaborator in the devilish fight, "for Communism abolishes eternal truths, it abolishes all religion, and all morality...." [10]

Liberal theology had accomplished this monstrous change. Thus it shares with Marx and Engels the guilt for the tens of millions of innocents killed by communism to date. What spiritual tragedy!

Marx Hates Whole Nations

Shifting now from Engels to Marx, Marx's whole attitude and conversation were Satanic in nature.

Though a Jew, he wrote a pernicious anti-Jewish book called ~The Jewish Question~. In 1856, he wrote in ~The New York Tribune~ an article entitled "The Russian Loan," in which we read:

We know that behind every tyrant stands a Jew, as Jesuit stands behind every Pope. As the army of the Jesuit kills every free thought, so the desire of the oppressed would have chances of success, the usefulness of wars incited by capitalists would cease, if it were not for the Jews who steal the treasures of mankind. It is no wonder that 1856 years ago Jesus chased the usurers from the Jerusalem temple. They were like the contemporary usurers who stand behind tyrants and tyrannies. The majority of them are Jewish. The fact that the Jews have become so strong as to endanger the life of the world causes us to disclose their organization, their purpose, that its stench might awaken the workers of the world to fight and eliminate such a canker.

Did Hitler say anything worse than this?

(Strangely, Marx also wrote to the contrary, in ~The Capital~, Volume I, under the heading "The Capitalist Character of Manufacture": "In the front of the chosen people it was written that they are the property of Jehovah.")

Many other Jewish Communists imitated Marx in their hatred of Jews. Ruth Fisher, renowned German Jewish Communist leader and a member of Parliament, said: "Squash the Jewish capitalists, hang them from the lamp posts; tread them under your feet." [11] Why just the Jewish capitalists and not the others remains an unanswered question.

Marx hated not only the Jews, but also the Germans: "Beating is the only means of resurrecting the Germans." He spoke about "the stupid German people ... the disgusting national narrowness of the Germans" and said that "Germans, Chinese, and Jews have to be compared with peddlers and small merchants." [12] He called the Russians "cabbage-eaters." [13] The Slavic peoples were "ethnic trash." [14] He expressed his hatred of many nations, but never his love.

Marx wrote in his new year's roundup of 1848 about "the Slavic riffraff," which included Russians, Czechs, and Croats. These "retrograde" races had nothing left for them by fate except "the immediate task of perishing in the revolutionary world storm." "The coming world war will cause not only reactionary classes and dynasties, but entire reactionary peoples, to disappear from the face of the earth. And that will be progress." "Their very name will vanish." [15]

Neither Marx nor Engels were concerned about the destruction of millions of people. The former wrote,

A silent, unavoidable revolution is taking place in society, a revolution that cares as little about the human lives it destroys as an earthquake cares about the houses it ravages. Classes and races that are too weak to dominate the new conditions of existence will be defeated.

p043 Chapter 3: Ruined Faith MARX & SATAN

In contrast, Hitler, who desired only the enslavement and not the destruction of these nations, was much more humane than Marx.

Engels wrote in the same vein:

The next world war will make whole reactionary peoples disappear from the face of the earth. This, too, is progress. [16]

Obviously this cannot be fulfilled without crushing some delicate national flower. But without violence and without pitilessness nothing can be obtained in history. [17]

Marx, the man who posed as a fighter for the proletariat, called this class of people "stupid boys, rogues, asses."

Engels well knew what to expect from them. He wrote, "The democratic, red, yes, even the Communist mob, will never love us."

Marx identified black people with "idiots" and constantly used the offensive term "nigger" in private correspondence.

He called his rival Lassalle "the Jewish nigger" and made it very clear that this was not intended as an epithet of disdain for just one person.

It is now absolutely clear to me that, as both the shape of his head and his hair texture shows, he is descended from the Negroes who joined Moses' flight from Egypt (unless his mother or grandmother on the paternal side hybridized with a nigger).... The pushiness of the fellow is also nigger-like.

Marx even championed slavery in North America. For this, he quarreled with his friend Proudhon, who had advocated the emancipation of slaves in the U.S. Marx wrote in response,

p044 Chapter 3: Ruined Faith MARX & SATAN

Without slavery, North America, the most progressive of countries, would be transformed into a patriarchal country. Wipe North America from the map of the world and you will have anarchy – the complete decay of modern commerce and civilization. Abolish slavery and you will have wiped America off the map of nations. [18]

Marx also wrote, "The Devil take the British!" [19]
In spite of such denunciations, there are plenty of British, as well as American, Marxists.

Satan Is in the Family

Marx's favorite daughter, Eleanor, with her father's approval, married Edward Eveling. He lectured on such subjects as "The Wickedness of God." (Just as Satanists do. Unlike atheists, they do not deny the existence of God, except to deceive others; they know of His existence, but describe Him as wicked.) In his lectures he tried to prove that God is "an encourager of polygamy and an instigator to theft." He advocated the right to blaspheme. [20] The following poem describes the attitudes of his movement toward Satanism:

To thee my verses, unbridled and daring,
Shall mount, O Satan, king of the banquet.
Away with thy sprinkling, O priest, and thy droning.
For never shall Satan, O priest, stand behind thee.

Thy breath, O Satan, my verses inspires,
When from my bosom the gods I defy.
Of kings pontifical, of kings inhuman:
Thine is the lightning that sets minds to shaking.

O soul that wanderest far from the straight way,
Satan is merciful. See Heloisa!

Like the whirlwind spreading its wings,
He passes, O people, Satan the great!
Hail, of reason the great Vindicator!
Sacred to thee shall rise incense and vows!
Thou hast the god of the priest disenthroned. [21]

A Housemaid's Revelation

An American, Commander Sergius Riis, had been a disciple of Marx. Grieved by the news of his death, he went to London to visit the house in which the admired teacher had lived. The family had moved. The only one whom he could find to interview was Marx's former housemaid Helen Demuth. She said these amazing words about him:

He was a God-fearing man. When very sick, he prayed alone in his room before a row of lighted candles, tying a sort of tape measure around his forehead. [1]

This suggests phylacteries, implements worn by Orthodox Jews during their morning prayers. But Marx had been baptized in the Christian religion, had never practiced Judaism, and later became a fighter against God. He wrote books against religion and brought up all his children as atheists. What was this ceremony which an ignorant maid considered an occasion of prayer? Jews, saying their prayers with phylacteries on their foreheads, don't usually have a row of candles before them. Could this have been some kind of magic practice?

We also know that Marx, a presumed atheist, had a bust of Zeus in his study. In Greek mythology Zeus, a cruel heathen deity, transformed himself into a beast and took Europe captive - as did Marxism later.

(Coincidentally, the naked figure of Zeus, known for his ferocity, is the only religious emblem in the main lobby of the United Nations building in New York.)

Family Letters

Another possible hint is contained in a letter written to Marx by his son Edgar on March 31, 1854. It begins with the startling words, "My dear devil." [2] Who has ever known of a son addressing his father like this? But that is how a Satanist writes to his beloved one. Could the son have been initiated as well?

Equally significant, Marx's wife addressed him as follows, in a letter of August 1844,

Your last pastoral letter, high priest and bishop of souls, has again given quiet rest and peace to your poor sheep. [3]

Marx had expressed, in ~The Communist Manifesto~, his desire to abolish all religion, which one might assume would include abolishing the Satanist cult too. Yet his wife refers to him as high priest and bishop. Of what religion? The only European religion with high priests is the Satanist one. What pastoral letters did he, a man believed to have been an atheist, write? Where are they? This is a part of Marx's life which has remained unresearched.

Biographers' Testimonies

Some biographers of Marx have undoubtedly had a suspicion about the connection between devil-worship and the subject of their book. But not having the necessary spiritual preparation, they could not understand the facts they had before their eyes. Still, their testimony is interesting.

The Marxist Franz Mehring wrote in his book ~Karl Marx~:

Although Karl Marx's father died a few days after his son's twentieth birthday, ~he seems to have observed with secret apprehension the demon in his favorite son....~ [4]

Henry Marx did not think and could not have thought that the rich store of bourgeois culture which he handed on to his son Karl as a valuable heritage for life ~would only help to deliver the demon he feared.~ [5]

Marx died in despair, as all Satanists do. On May 25, 1883, he wrote to Engels, "How pointless and empty is life, but how desirable!" [6]

Marx was a contemporary of great Christians: the composer Mendelssohn, the philanthropist Dr. Barnardo, the preachers Charles Spurgeon and General William Booth. All lived near him in London. Yet he never mentions them. They went unobserved.

There is a secret behind Marx which few Marxists know about. Lenin wrote, "After half a century, not one of the Marxists has comprehended Marx." [7]

The Secret Behind Lenin's Life

There was a secret behind Lenin's life too.

When I wrote the first edition of the present book, I knew of no personal involvement of Lenin with any rituals of the Satanist sect. Since then, I have read ~The Young Lenin~ by Trotsky, who was Lenin's intimate friend and co-worker. He writes that Lenin, at the age of sixteen, tore the cross from his neck, spat on it, and trod it underfoot, a very common Satanist ceremony.

There is not the slightest doubt that Lenin was dominated by Satanist ideology. How else could one explain the following quotation from his letter to the Russian writer Maxim Gorki, dated 13-14 November 1913:

Millions of sins, mischiefs, oppressions, and physical epidemics, are more easily discovered by the people, and therefore less dangerous, than the thinnest idea of a spiritual little god, even if disguised in the most decorous garb. [8]

In the end Satan deceived him, as he does all his followers.

Lenin was moved to write as follows about the Soviet state:

The state does not function as we desired. How does it function? The car does not obey. A man is at the wheel and seems to lead it, but the car does not drive in the desired direction. It moves as another force wishes. [9]

What is this other mysterious force which supersedes even the plans of the Bolshevik leaders? Did they sell out to a force which they hoped to master, but which proved more powerful than even they anticipated and drove them to despair?

In a letter of 1921 Lenin wrote:

I hope we will be hanged on a stinking rope. And I did not lose the hope that this would happen, because we cannot condemn dirty bureaucracy. If this happens, it will be well done. [10]

This was Lenin's last hope after a whole life of struggle for the Communist cause: to be justly hanged on a stinking rope. This hope was not fulfilled for him, but almost all of his co-workers were eventually executed by Stalin after confessing publicly that they had served other powers than the proletariat they pretended to help.

What a confession from Lenin: "I hope we will be hanged on a stinking rope."

It is interesting to note that at the age of thirteen, Lenin wrote what could be called prophetic poetry foretelling the bankruptcy in which his life would end. He had decided to serve mankind, but without God. These were his words:

Sacrificing your life freely for others,
It is a pity you will have the sad fate
That your sacrifice will be completely fruitless. [11]

What a contrast to the words of another fighter, St. Paul the Apostle, who wrote toward the end of his life:

I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course.... henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, shall give me at that day (2TM 4:7, 8).

There exists a "too late" in our spiritual affairs. Esau repented with many tears for having sold his birthright, but the deal could not be undone. And Lenin, founder of the Soviet state, said on his deathbed,

I committed a great error. My nightmare is to have the feeling that I'm lost in an ocean of blood from the innumerable victims. It is too late to return. To save our country, Russia, we would have needed men like Francis of Assisi. With ten men like him we would have saved Russia.

Bukharin, Stalin, Mao, Ceaushescu, Andropov

It might be instructive at this point to take a look at some modern Marxists. Bukharin, secretary general of the Communist International and one of the chief Marxist doctrinaires in this century, as early as the age of twelve, after reading the Book of Revelation in the Bible, longed to become the Antichrist. Realizing from Scripture that the Antichrist had to be the son of the apocalyptic great whore, he insisted that his mother confess to having been a harlot.

About Stalin he wrote, "He is not a man, but a devil." [1]

Too late Bukharin realized into whose hands he had fallen. In a letter which he made his wife memorize just before his arrest and execution, he said:

I am leaving life. I am lowering my head.... I feel my helplessness before a hellish machine.... [2]

He had helped erect a guillotine – the Soviet state – that had killed millions, only to learn in the end that its design had been made in hell. He had desired to be the Antichrist. He became instead a victim of the Enemy.

Similarly, Kaganovitch, Stalin's brother-in-law and closest collaborator, writes about him in his diary (soon to be published):

I started to understand how Stalin managed to make himself a god. He did not have a single human characteristic.... Even when he exhibited some emotions, they all did not seem to belong to him. They were as false as the scale on top of armor. And behind this scale was Stalin himself – a piece of steel. For some reason I was convinced that he would live forever.... He was not human at all....

Rosa [his wife] says he makes her climb a tree wearing nothing but stockings. I have a feeling he is not human at all. He is too unusual to be a regular human being. Although he looks like an ordinary man. Such a puzzle. What is it I'm writing? Am I raving mad, too?

Stalin described to Kaganovitch his spiritual exercise. Believers of various religions engage in the practice of meditation on what is beautiful, wise, and good, to help them become more loving. Stalin indulged in just the opposite practice.

He told Kaganovitch:

When I have to say good-bye to someone, I picture this person on all fours and he becomes disgusting. Sometimes I feel attached to a person who should be removed for the good of the cause. What do you think I do? I imagine this person shitting, exhaling stench, farting, vomiting - and I don't feel sorry for this person. The sooner he stops stinking on this earth, the better. And I cross this person out of my heart.

One of Stalin's amusements was to put green glasses on the eyes of horses to make them see hay as grass. Even worse, he put dark glasses of atheism on the eyes of men to keep them from seeing God's pastures, reserved for believing souls.

The diary contains many revealing insights:

Many times Stalin spoke of religion as our most vicious enemy. He hates religion for many reasons, and I share his feelings. Religion is a cunning and dangerous enemy.... Stalin also thinks that separation from children should be the main punishment for all parents belonging to sects, irrespective of whether they were convicted or not.

I think he secretly engaged in astrology. One peculiar feature of his always astonished me. He always talked with some veiled respect about God and religion. At first, I thought I was imagining it, but gradually I realized it was true. But he was always careful when the subject came up. And I was never able to find out exactly what his point of view was. One thing became very clear to me - his treatment of God and religion was very special. For example, he never said directly there was no God....

People ceased somehow to be their own selves in his presence. They all admired him and worshiped him. I don't think he enjoyed any great love of the nation: he was above it. It may sound strange, but he occupied a position previously reserved only for God.

Part and parcel of the tragedy of human existence is the fact that one has enemies and is sometimes obliged to fight them. Marx took delight in this sad necessity. His favorite saying, which he often repeated, was, "There is nothing more beautiful in the world than to bite one's enemies." [3]

No wonder his follower Stalin said that the greatest joy is to cultivate a person's friendship until he lays his head confidently on your bosom, then to implant a dagger in his back a pleasure not to be surpassed. [4]

Marx had expressed the same idea long before. He wrote to Engels about comrades with whom he disagreed:

We must make these rogues believe that we continue our relationship with them, until we have the power to sweep them away from our road, in one manner or another. [5]

It is significant that many of Stalin's comrades-in-arms spoke about him as demonic.

Milovan Djilas, prominent Communist leader of Yugoslavia who was personally well acquainted with Stalin, wrote:

Was it not so that the demonic power and energy of Stalin consisted in this, that he made the [Communist] movement and every person in it pass to a state of confusion and stupefaction, thus creating and ensuring his reign of fear...? [6]

He also says about the whole ruling class of the USSR:

They make a semblance of believing in the ideal of socialism, in a future society without classes. In reality, they believe in nothing except organized power. [7]

Even Stalin's daughter, Svetlana Alliluyeva, who never learned about the depths of Satanism, wrote, Beria (the Soviet minister of interior affairs) seems to have had a diabolic link with all our family.... Beria was a frightening, wicked demon.... A terrible demon had taken possession of my father's soul.

Svetlana further mentions that Stalin considered goodness and forgiving love to be worse than the greatest crime. [8]

Such is the Satanic priesthood that rules almost half of mankind and which orders terrorist acts all over the world.

Stalin was the illegitimate child of a landlord by a servant-maid. His father, fearing notoriety, bribed a cobbler to marry the pregnant girl, but the affair became known. During his childhood Stalin was mocked as a bastard. During Stalin's teen years, his real father was found murdered. Stalin was suspected, but no proof could be found against him.

Later, as a seminary student, he joined Communist circles. There he fell in love with a girl named Galina. Since the Communists were poor, Galina was given the assignment to become the mistress of a rich man and so provide the Party with money. When Stalin himself voted for this proposal, she cut her veins.

Stalin himself committed robberies for the Party, and in this he was very successful. He appropriated none of the stolen money for himself.

He was also assigned the duty of infiltrating the Czarist police. He had to play a dual role, denouncing secondary Party members in order to find out police secrets and protect more important Communists.

As a young man, therefore, Stalin had the worst possible heredity, education, and development. Thus he was easily susceptible to Satanist influence. He became what his name, Stalin, means: a man of steel, without the slightest human emotion or pity.

(Andropov, late premier of the Soviets, produced the same impression as Stalin. The French minister of external affairs, Claude Cheysson, who met him, described Andropov in ~Le Monde~ as "a man without warmth of soul, who works like a computer.... He shows no emotions.... He is extremely dispassionate.... He is accurate in words and gestures like a computer.") started out as a believer. At fifteen, he wrote his first poem, which begins with the words, "Great is the Almighty's providence." He became a seminarian because he felt it his calling. [9] There he became first a Darwinist, then a Marxist.

Stalin, like Marx, Engels, and Bauer before him,

When he began to write as a revolutionary, the first pseudonyms he used were "Demonoshvili," [10] meaning something like "the demoniac" in the Georgian language, and "Besoshvili," [11] "the devilish."

Other evidences of Satanist persuasion among Marxist leaders are also significant. Troitskaia, daughter of the Soviet marshal Tuhatchevsky, one of the top men of the Red Army who was later shot by Stalin, wrote of her father that he had a picture of Satan in the east corner of his bedroom, where the Orthodox usually put their ikons.

When a certain Communist in Czechoslovakia was named head of the State Council for Religious Affairs, an institution whose purpose is to spy on believers and persecute them, he took the name "Hruza," which means in Slovak "horror," an appellation used for "devil."

One of the leaders of a terrorist organization in Argentina took upon himself the nickname "Satanovsky."

Anatole France, a renowned French Communist writer, introduced some of the greatest intellectuals of France to communism. At a recent exhibition of demoniac art in Paris, one of the pieces shown was the specific chair used by that Communist writer for presiding over Satanist rituals. Its horned armrests and legs were covered with goat's fur. [12]

Britain's center of Satanism is Highgate Cemetery in London, where Karl Marx is buried. Mysterious rites of black magic are celebrated at this tomb. [13] It was the place of inspiration for the Highgate Vampire, who attacked several girls in 1970. [14] Hua Kuo-Feng, director of Red China, also paid it his respects.

Ulrike Meinhof, Eselin, and other German Red terrorists have also been involved in the occult. [15]

One of the oldest devil-worshiping sects, the Syrian Yezidi, was written up in a Soviet atheistic magazine, ~Nauka I Religia~ (July 1979). It is the ~only~ religious sect about which the magazine wrote not one word of criticism.

Furthermore, Mao Tse-Tung wrote:

From the age of eight I hated Confucius. In our village there was a Confucianist temple. With all my heart, I wished only one thing: to destroy it to its very foundations. [16]

Is it normal for an eight-year-old child to wish only the destruction of his own religion? Such thoughts belong to demonic characters.

At the other extreme is St. Paul of the Cross, who from the age of eight spent three hours in prayer every night.

Cult of Violence

Engels wrote in ~Anti-Duhring~, "Universal love for men is an absurdity." And in a letter to a friend he said, "We need hate rather than love - at least for now."

Che Guevara learned his Marxist lessons well. In his writings he echoes Engels's sentiments:

Hate is an element of fight - pitiless hate against the foe, hate that lifts the revolutionist above the natural limitation of man and makes him become an efficient, destructive, cool, calculating, and cold killing machine.

This is what the Devil wishes to make of men. He has succeeded all too well with many notorious leaders of the human race. In our lifetime we have witnessed more than our share: Hitler, Eichmann, Mengele, Stalin, Mao, Andropov, Pol Pot.

Marx writes in ~The Communist Manifesto~:

The Communists despise making a secret of their opinions and intentions. They openly declare that their aims can be reached only through the violent overthrow of the whole existing social structure.

Further:

There is only one method to shorten the murderous pains of death of the old society, the bloody birth pangs of a new society; only one method to simplify and concentrate them, that is revolutionary terrorism. [18]

There have been many revolutions in history. Each had an objective. The American revolution, for example, was fought for national independence, the French revolution for democracy. Marx is the only one who formulates as his aim a "permanent revolution," terrorism and bloodshed for revolution's sake. There is no purpose to be attained; violence to the point of paroxysm is its only objective. This is what distinguishes Satanism from ordinary human sinfulness.

Marx called terrorists executed for murder in Czarist Russia "immortal martyrs" or "amazingly capable fellows." [19] Engels wrote, too, of the "bloody revenge we take." This expression occurs often. "In the interior (of Russia), what a splendid development. The attempts at murder become frequent." "Leaving aside the problem of morality... for a revolutionist any means are right which lead to the purpose, the violent, as the seemingly tame." [20]

The Marxist Lenin, while living under the democratic rule of Kerensky in Russia, said,

What is needed is wild energy and again energy. I wonder, yea more, I am horrified that more than half a year has passed in speaking about bombs and not one single bomb has been fabricated. [21]

A further insight into the fundamental attitudes of Communists can be gained from a few brief quotes.

Marx: "We make war against all prevailing ideas of religion, of the state, of country, of patriotism. The idea of God is the keynote of a perverted civilization. It must be destroyed."

~The Communist Manifesto~: "The Communists disdain to conceal their views and aims. They openly declare that their aims can be attained only by the forcible overthrow of all the existing social conditions. Let the ruling class tremble at a Communist revolution."

Lenin: "We have to use any ruse, dodge, trick, cunning, unlawful method, concealment, and veiling of the truth. The basic rule is to exploit the conflicting interests of the capitalist states."

Lenin: "Atheism is an integral part of Marxism. Marxism is materialism. We must combat religion. This is the ABC of all materialism and consequently of Marxism."

Lenin in an address in 1922: "First we shall take Eastern Europe, then the masses of Asia. After that, we shall surround and undermine the U.S.A., which will fall into our hands without a struggle - like an overripe fruit."

Khrushchev: "If anyone believes our smiles involve abandonment of the teachings of Marx, Engels and Lenin, he deceives himself. Those who wait for that must wait until a shrimp learns to whistle."

Satanist Cruelty

Solzhenitsyn reveals in his monumental ~Gulag Archipelago' [17] that the hobby of Yagoda, the Soviet Union's minister of interior affairs, was to undress and, naked, shoot at images of Jesus and the saints. A couple of comrades joined him in this. Another Satanist ritual practiced in Communist high places!

Why should men allegedly representing the proletariat shoot at the image of Jesus, a proletarian, or the virgin Mary, a poor woman?

Some Pentecostal Christians recall an incident that took place in Russia during World War II. One of their preachers had exorcised a devil who threatened, upon leaving the possessed, "I will take revenge." Several years later the Pentecostal preacher who had performed the exorcism was shot for his faith. The officer who executed him said just before pulling the trigger, "Now we are even."

Are Communist officers sometimes possessed by devils? Do they perhaps serve as Satan's instruments of revenge against Christians who seek to overthrow his throne? There is no doubt.

In Russia, in Stalin's day, some Communist killed a number of innocents in the cellars of the police. After their bloody deed, one of the henchmen had second thoughts and went from corpse to corpse, apologizing: "I did not intend to do this. I don't know you. Speak to me, move, forgive me." One of his comrades then killed him. A third was converted and later related the incident.

~Russkaia Misl~, a Russian-language magazine in France, reported (March 13, 1975) the following from the Soviet Union:

D. Profirevitch, in Russia, had a daughter and a son whom he brought up in the faith. Naturally, they had to attend Communist schools. At the age of twelve the daughter came home and told her parents, "Religion is a capitalist superstition. We are living in new times." She dropped Christianity altogether. Afterwards she joined the Communist Party and became a member of the Secret Police. This was a terrible blow to her parents.

Later the mother was arrested. Under Communist rule no one possesses anything, whether it be children, a wife, or personal liberty. The state can take them away at any time.

After the mother's arrest, the son exhibited great sorrow. A year later he hanged himself. D. Profirevitch found this suicide letter:

Father, will you judge me? I am a member of the Communist youth organization. I had to sign that I would report everything to the Soviet authorities. One day the police called me, and Varia, my sister, asked me to sign a denunciation against Mother because as a Christian she is considered a counter-revolutionist. I signed. I am guilty of her imprisonment. Now they have ordered me to spy on you. The consequence will be the same. Forgive me, Father; I have decided to die.

The suicide of the son was followed by the jailing of the father. [22]

Priest Zynoviy Kovalyk was arrested by the Bolsheviks in the year 1941 and was confined in the Brygidka jail in Lviv, Ukraine. When the Germans put the Bolsheviks to flight that same year, the people of the city found the priest's blood-stained body nailed to the wall by the arms and legs, as if it were the crucified Lord. They also found about six thousand massacred prisoners, shot in the nape of the neck, whom the Bolsheviks had piled on top of each other in the cellars and covered over with plaster.

Dr. O. Sas-Yavorsky (U.S.A.), after the capture of Lviv by the Germans near the end of June 1941, went searching for his imprisoned father and saw in the jail a priest nailed to a cross. Into his slashed stomach the Communists had placed the body of an unborn baby, taken from the womb of its mother, whose corpse lay on the blood-soaked floor. Other eyewitnesses recognized that this was the body of the renowned missionary Father Kovalyk. [23]

Generally, to the Communists human life is cheap. Lenin wrote during the civil war,

It would be a shame not to shoot men for not obeying the draft and avoiding mobilization. Report more often about the results. [24]

During the Spanish civil war, Communists killed four thousand Catholic priests.

A renowned Russian Orthodox priest named Dudko reported that six Communists entered the house of Father Nicholas Tchardjov, pulled out his hair, gouged out his eyes, made many cuts on his body, passed a pressing iron over it, then shot him with two bullets. This happened on the Eve of St. Nicholas. It was not only a crime against the priest, but also a mockery of the saint.

The Western press reported on March 10, 1983, that in Zimbabwe three thousand of the Ndebele tribe were killed by the soldiers of the Communist dictator Mugabe. The army had been trained by North Korean instructors. Tribe members were asked to shoot their grown-up sons themselves; if they refused, they were shot along with their sons.

The Devil apes God by promising still waters and green pastures which are not his to give. Therefore he must pretend. And the less he can offer, the more he must pretend. To gain a foothold, he puts on a false front (did you ever wonder about Communist front organizations?) and makes benevolent gestures. But he delivers only misery, death, and destruction - "awful, complete, universal, and pitiless."

The Devil is jealous and becomes enraged at spiritual beauty. It offends him. Since he cannot be beautiful he lost his primal beauty because of his pride he does not want anyone else to be. If it were not for the saints' spiritual beauty, the Devil would not seem so ugly. Therefore he wishes to deface all beauty.

This is why Christians in the Romanian Communist prison of Piteshti, as well as other Communist jails, were tortured not only to betray the secrets of the underground church, but to blaspheme.

Regimes under which such horrors occur again and again, regimes that turn even Christians into murderers and denouncers of innocent victims, can only be abhorred by the children of God. Whoever bids them Godspeed is a partaker in their evil deeds (2JN 11).

Satanic Sin

I have written that Marxism is Satanic. But is not every sin Satanic by its very nature?

I pondered long about this. Then I had a dream one night that clarified my thinking.

In my dream I saw a prostitute hooking young men who were just leaving church. I asked her, "Why did you choose this particular place to work?"

She replied, "My delight is to lead young men into sin just as they come from worship. The Greek word for worship in the New Testament is ~proskune~, which means etymologically 'to kiss.' The worshiper stepping out of the house of prayer still has the imprint of Jesus' kisses on his mouth. What a satisfaction to defile him just then, to make him wallow in the bed of lasciviousness and then say to him, 'You see, Jesus to whom you prayed could not keep you from sin for even five minutes. He is not your Savior. My master is more powerful than He.'"

Sexual impurity is a common human sin. Mephistopheles asks Faust to seduce Gretchen just as she is walking to church with a prayer book in her hand. This is Satanic.

To write, read, or view pornography is another common sin. But it is a characteristic of American pornography, which promotes incest, pederasty, and perversion, that it is full of the names of God, Christ, and Mary. With every obscenity there is a sacred word, with every ugly gesture a heavenly expression, to defile and profane the holy. This is Satanic.

To slay the innocent is a very common sin as well. To crucify Jesus, the Son of God, between two thieves in order to suggest guilt by association is Satanic.

To kill political enemies, to make war and stir up revolution even with mass killings proves human sinfulness. But the Russian Communists, having killed millions of their enemies, turned their violence against even their friends, including their most illustrious comrades, the chief perpetrators of their revolution. This is the seal of Satanism. It is revolution not for attaining goal, but revolution and killing for killing's sake, what Marx called "the permanent revolution."

Of twenty-nine members and candidates in the Central Committee of the Soviet Communists in 1917 the year of the revolution, only four had the good fortune to depart this life before being deprived of it. One of the four was posthumously declared "an enemy of the revolution." Thirteen were sentenced to death by their own comrades or disappeared. Two were so persecuted by Stalin that they committed suicide. [25]

To be a criminal or a Mafioso is a heinous human sin, but the Satanic goes beyond even what the Mafia allows.

Tomasso Buscetta, a representative of the Sicilian Mafia, who became a police informer and revealed the crimes of that organization, said:

Crime is a necessity that one cannot avoid, but that always has a reason. With us gratuitous crime, which is an end in itself or the result of an individual impulse, is excluded. We exclude, for example, "transversal vendetta," i.e., the calculated killing of someone near the target of our crime, such as a wife, children, or relatives.

Satanic crime is of another order. Hitler killed millions of Jews, including babies, with the excuse that Jews had done harm to the German people. For the Communists it was a matter of course to imprison and torture the family members of a person they considered guilty. When I was jailed, it was taken for granted that my wife must be jailed too, and that my son must be excluded from all schooling.

Marxism is not an ordinary sinful human ideology. It is Satanic in its manner of sinning, as it is Satanic in the teachings it purveys. Only in certain circumstances has it openly avowed its Satanic character.

One can judge a teacher by his disciples. The painter Picasso said, "An artist must discover the way to convince his public of the full truth of his lies." [26]

Who was the man who wrote this monstrosity? The same who wrote, "I came to communism as one comes to a fountain.... My adherence to communism is the logical consequence of my entire life and work." [27]

So one becomes a Marxist because his ideal is a lie. How sad!

To gain an insight into the life and thinking of a Satanist, one need only read a few mild excerpts from the writing of Alister Crowley (1875-1947), notorious for his involvement in occult practices:

Pity not the fallen. I never knew them. I console not. I hate the consoler and the consoled. [28]

The wolf betrays only the greedy and treacherous, the raven betrays only the melancholy and dishonest. But I am he of whom it is written: He shall deceive the very elect....
I have feasted myself on the blood of the saints, but I am not suspected of men to be their enemy, for my fleece is white and warm, for my teeth are not the teeth of one that tears flesh, and my eyes are mild, and they know me not as the chief of the lying spirits....[29]

Beautiful art thou, O Babylon, and desirable.... O Babylon, Babylon, thou mighty mother, that ride upon the crowned beasts, let me be drunken upon the wine of your fornication; let your kisses wanton me unto death. [30]

Crowley quotes a multitude of sayings like this from completely unknown older Satanist works, unavailable to the uninitiated.

Blasphemous Versions of the Lord's Prayer

The Soviet newspaper ~Sovietskaia Molodioj~, February 14, 1976, added a new and shattering proof of the connections between Marxism and Satanism. I described how militant Communists stormed churches and mocked God under the Czarist regime. For this purpose the Communists used a bLasphemous version of the "Our Father":

Our Father, which art in Petersburg [today, Leningrad],
Cursed be your name,
May your Kingdom crumble,
May your will not be fulfilled,
yea, not even in hell.
Give us our bread which you stole from us,
And pay our debts, as we paid
yours until now.

And don't lead us further into temptation,
But deliver us from evil - the police of Plehve
    [the Czarist prime minister],
And put an end to his cursed government.
But as you are weak and poor in spirit and in power and in authority,
 Down with you for all eternity. Amen. [31]

The ultimate aim of communism in conquering new countries is not to establish another social or economic system. ~It is to mock God and praise Satan.~

The German Socialist Student Union also published a parody of the Lord's Prayer, indicating that the "true" meaning of the prayer upholds capitalism:

Our Capital, which art in the West,
May your investments be sure,
May you make a profit.

May your shares increase in value,
On Wall Street as in Europe.
Our daily sale give us today,
    and extend our credits,
As we extend those of our debtors.
And do not lead us into bankruptcy,
But deliver us from the trade unions,
For thine is half the world and the power, and the riches, for 200 years.
                Mammon. [32]

The identification of Christianity with the interests of capitalism is outrageous. The true church knows that capitalism, too, is stained with blood, for every economic system bears the marks of sin. Christians oppose communism not from the viewpoint of capitalism, but of the kingdom of God, which is their true social ideal. The above is nothing less than Satanic mockery of Jesus' most holy prayer, as is the one published by the Soviets.

Mockery of the Lord's Prayer is customary in many Communist lands. Ethiopian children were taught to pray as follows:

Our Party which rulest in the Soviet Union,
Hallowed be thy name,
Thy Kingdom come,

Thy will be done in Ethiopia and in the whole world.
Give us this day our daily bread, and don't forgive the trespasses of the Imperialists as we will not forgive them.
And may we resist the temptation to abandon the fight,
And deliver us from the evils of Capitalism. Amen.

Over an Ethiopian Lutheran radio station confiscated by the Communist government, a Satanist version of the Bible was broadcast. First Corinthians 13 [1Co 13] sounded like this:

Though I speak all the languages and have no enmity toward the landlords and capitalists, I have become as sounding brass.... Class hatred suffers no exploitation and is brutal. Class hatred envies their riches and vaunts itself with the successful revolutions in many Socialist states.... And now abide faith, hope, and class hatred, but the greatest of these is revolutionist hatred.

During the general strike organized by the French Communists in 1974, workers were called to march in the streets of Paris shouting the slogan, "~Giscard d'Estaing est foutu, les demons sont dans la rue!~ (Giscard d'Estaing [then French president] is done with. Demons are now in the street)." Why not "the proletariat" or "the people"? Why this evocation of Satanic forces? What has this to do with the legitimate demands of the working class to have better salaries?

Deification of Communist Leaders

Communist leaders have been and are deified. Listen to the following poem honoring Stalin in ~Pravda~ (Moscow, March 10, 1939). (~Pravda~ is the central organ of the Communist Party in the USSR)

The sun shines mildly and who would not know that you are this sun?
The pleasant noise of the sea waves sings an ode to Stalin.
The blinding snowy peaks of mountains sing the praise of Stalin.

The millions of flowers and meadows thank you.

Likewise the covered tables.
The beehives thank you.
The fathers of all young heroes thank you, Stalin;
Oh, Lenin's heir, you are for us Lenin himself.

Thousands of such poems have been composed. Here is another hymn to Stalin of extraordinary fervor and beauty, reminding one of Eastern Byzantine Christianity in the fourth and following centuries:

O great Stalin, O leader of the peoples,
Thou who broughtest man to birth,
Thou who purifiest the earth,
Thou who restorest the centuries,
Thou who makes bloom the Spring,
Thou who makes vibrate the musical chords.

Thou, splendor of my Spring, O Thou
Sun reflected from millions of hearts.

The foregoing hymn was published in ~Pravda~ in August 1936. In May 1935 the same official Party newspaper had published the following extraordinary effusion:

He commands the sun of the enemies to set.
He spoke, and the East for friends became a great glow.
Should he say that coal turns white,
It will be as Stalin wills....
The master of the entire world - remember - is now Stalin.

A much later composition by a leading Soviet poet shows development in style but hardly in subject matter.

I would have compared him to a white mountain - but the mountain has a summit.
I would have compared him to the depths of the sea - but the sea has a bottom.

I would have compared him to the shining moon - but the moon shines at midnight, not at noon.

I would have compared him to the brilliant sun - but the sun radiates at noon, not at midnight.

Mao Tse-Tung has been hailed as the one "whose mind created the world." Kim Il-Sung, dictator of North Korea, is also deified, as was Nicolae Ceaushescu, Communist dictator of Romania.

Ceaushescu was another Stalinist figure. He was the object of a personality cult and was likened to Julius Caesar, Alexander the Great, Pericles, Cromwell, Napoleon, Peter the Great, and Abraham. This distinguished roster, it seems, is not enough. So he was also called "our lay God."

(By the way, post-Communist Romania, which did not allow international religious conventions, permitted a witches' convention in the spring of 1979 in Curtea-de-Argesh.)

In Bucharest there was a museum containing gifts brought by the people to Ceaushescu. In it was a watercolor painted by a blind man who regained his sight through a miracle. He attributed it to the fact that "he concentrated all his thoughts on the President, who not only can make the blind to see but can move the Carpathian mountains."

Another portrayal showed Ceaushescu with King Vlad Tsepesh, who was known as "the vampire Dracula" because he used to impale his adversaries. In similar fashion, Stalin magnified the personality of Czar Ivan the Terrible.

The administrators of Romania today were Communist party members. The Leopard has not changed its spots.

The Little and the Big Devils

According to current official Marxist doctrine, which, as has been illustrated, is only a disguise, neither God nor the Devil exists. Both are fancies. Because of this teaching, Christians are persecuted by the Communists.

However, the Soviet newspaper ~Kommunisma Uzvara~ (April 1974) reported that many atheist circles were created in Red Latvia's schools. The name given the children in the fourth through sixth grades was "little devils," while seventh graders were called "servants of the Devil." In another school eighth graders had the name "faithful children of the Devil." At the meeting the children came clothed as devils, complete with horns and tails.

Thus, it was forbidden to worship God, though devil-worship was openly permitted and even encouraged among children of school age. This was the hidden objective of the Communists when they seized power in Russia.

In Vitebsk (USSR), Zoia Titova, a member of the Communist youth organization. was caught practicing black magic. When her case was brought before the assembly of Communist youth, there was unanimous refusal to punish her, though members who decided to worship God were expelled. The Communists consider it wrong to believe in God. For this "crime," many children were separated from their families and kept in special atheist boarding schools.

Incredibly, the Communists even wanted to make Satan-worshipers of church leaders. A Russian Orthodox priest named Platonov, an anti-Jewish agitator, went over to the side of the Communists when they came to power in Russia. For this, he was made a bishop and became a Judas who denounced members of his flock to the Secret Police, well knowing they would be severely persecuted.

One day, while on a bus, he met his sister Alexandra, an abbess who had been arrested many times, apparently with her brother's knowledge. He asked her, "Why don't you speak to me? Don't you recognize your brother?" She answered, "You ask why? Father and Mother would turn over in their graves. You are serving Satan." Though an official Orthodox bishop in the Soviet Union, he replied, "Perhaps I am Satan myself." [2]

~Pravoslavnaia Rus~ writes,

The Orthodox cathedral in Odessa, so much loved by the Odessites, became the meeting place of Satanists soon after the Communists came to power.... They gathered also in Slobodka-Romano and in Count Tolstoy's former home.

Then follows a detailed account of Satanist masses said by deacon Serghei Mihailov, of the treacherous Living Church, an Orthodox branch established in connivance with the Communists. An attendant describes the Satanist mass as a "parody of the Christian liturgy, in which human blood is used for communion." These masses took place in the cathedral before its main altar.

Also in Odessa, a statue of Satan used to be exhibited in the Museum of the Atheists. It was called Bafomet. At night, Satanists would gather in the museum for prayer and chanting before the statue. [3]

Religious Obscenities

It might be in some sense "logical" that Communists would arrest priests and pastors as counter-revolutionaries. But why were priests compelled by the Marxists in the Romanian prison of Piteshti to say Mass over excrement and urine? Why were Christians tortured into taking Communion with these as the elements? Why such an obscene mockery of religion? Why did the Romanian Orthodox priest Roman Braga, whom I knew personally when he was a prisoner of the Communists, and who presently resides in the U.S.A., have his teeth knocked out one by one with an iron rod in order to make him blaspheme?

The Communists had explained to him and others: "If we kill you Christians, you go to heaven. But we don't want you to be crowned martyrs. You should curse God first and then go to hell."

In the prison of Piteshti the Communists would force a very religious prisoner to be "baptized" daily by putting his head into the barrel in which his fellow-sufferers had fulfilled their necessities, meanwhile obliging the other prisoners to sing the baptismal service.

A theology student was forced to dress in white sheets (in imitation of Christ's robe), and a phallus made out of soap was hung around his neck with a string. Christians were beaten to insanity to force them to kneel before such a mocking image of Christ. After they had kissed the soap, they had to recite part of the liturgy. [4]

Some prisoners were compelled to take off their trousers and sit with their naked bottoms on open Bibles. [5]

Such blasphemous practices were perpetrated for at least two years with the full knowledge of the Party's top leadership. What have such indignities to do with socialism and the well-being of the proletariat? Were their anticapitalist slogans not merely pretexts for organizing Satanic blasphemies and orgies?

Marxists are supposed to be atheists who believe in neither heaven nor hell. In these extreme circumstances, Marxism has lifted its atheistic mask to reveal its true face, the face of Satanism. Communist persecution of religion might have a human explanation, but the fury of such perverse persecution can only be Satanic.

In Romanian prisons and in the Soviet Union as well, nuns who would not deny their faith were raped anally, and Baptist girls had oral sex forced on them. [6]

Many prisoners who were so treated died as martyrs, but the Communists were not satisfied with this. Using Luciferian techniques, they made martyrs die blaspheming because of the delirium provoked by torture.

Only once in all his works did Marx ever write about torture. During his own lifetime, many of his followers were tortured by Russian Czarist authorities. Since Marx is usually described as a humanist, one would expect him to write with horror about such an abominable practice. But his only comment was,

Torture alone has given rise to the most ingenious mechanical inventions and employed many honorable craftsmen in the production of the instruments. [7]

Torture is productive, it leads to ingenious inventions – this is all Marx had to say about the subject. No wonder Marxist governments have surpassed all others in torturing their opponents! This alone displays the Satanic nature of Marxism.

Marxism also is based on a hatred for God. In 1923, in the Soviet Union, mock trials of God were held in the presence of Trotsky and Lunacharsky. [8] But such opposition to God and His people do not belong only to the past.

Satanist desecrations of Catholic churches occurred in the 1970s in Upyna, Dotnuva, Zanaiciu, Kalvarija, Sede, etc., localities in Lithuania. One about which we know happened in Alsedeai on September 22, 1980. [9]

In his book ~Psychiatric Hospital 14, Moscow~, Georgi Fedotov tells of his conversation with the psychiatrist Dr. Valdimir Levitski about a Christian named Argentov who was detained there. The physician says, "You are pulling your friend Eduard toward God and we toward the Devil. So I'm using my rights as a psychiatrist to deny you and your friends access to him."

The Christian Salu Daka Ndebele was interrogated by the Secret Police of Maputo in Communist Mozambique. The officer said to him, "We want to kill your God." He raised his gun toward the head of the prisoner and declared, "This is my God. With this I have the power of life and death. If your God comes here, I will shoot Him dead myself." [10]

In Chiasso, Communist Angola, Communists slaughtered animals in a church and placed their heads on the altar and pulpit. A poster proclaimed, "These are the gods whom you adore." Pastor Aurelio Chicanha Saunge was killed, together with one hundred and fifty parishioners. [11]

When the Catholic Lithuanian priest Eugene Vosikevic was killed, his mouth was found to have been filled with bread, an apparent Satanist ritual. [12]

~Vetchernaia Moskva~, a Communist newspaper, let pass a Freudian slip of the pen:

We do not fight against believers and not even against clergymen. We fight against God to snatch believers from Him. [13]

A "fight against God to snatch believers from Him" is the only logical explanation for the Communist fight against religion.

We do not wonder at these words in a Soviet newspaper. Marx had said it already in his book ~German Ideology~. Calling God "the absolute Spirit," as his teacher Hegel had done, he wrote, "We are concerned with a highly interesting question: the decomposition of the Absolute Spirit."

It was not a fight against false belief in a nonexistent God that preoccupied him. He believed that God does exist and wanted to see this Absolute Spirit decompose, like many prisoners of the Communists who were made to rot in jail.

In Albania a priest, Stephen Kurti, was sentenced to death for having baptized one child. Baptisms must be performed in secret in many Communist lands, including North Korea.

The prosecutor at the trial of Metropolitan Benjamin of Leningrad said,

The whole Orthodox church is a subversive organization. Properly speaking, the entire church ought to be in prison.

The only reason all Christians are not in jail in the Soviet Union is that the Communists are not quite powerful enough. But the will to destroy is there. Unrestrained by the Spirit of God and empowered by the forces of evil, they would indeed destroy the whole earth, including themselves.

In the former Soviet Union baptisms could be officiated only after registration. Persons wishing to be baptized or to have their child baptized presented their identity cards to the representative of the church board, who in turn reported them to the state authorities. The result was persecution. Kolkhozniks (workers on collective farms) had no identity cards and could therefore baptize their children only secretly. Many protestant pastors received prison sentences for baptizing people.

The Communist fight against baptism presupposes belief in its value for a soul. Religious people in Israel or Pakistan or Nepal oppose baptism in the name of their own religious outlook, because it is a Christian seal. But for atheists - as Communists clearly declare themselves to be - baptism should mean nothing. Supposedly it neither benefits nor harms the baptized. Why then do these Communists fight against baptism? It is because Communists "fight against God to snatch believers from Him." Their ideology is not really inspired by atheism, but by a fervent hatred for God.

"Among other purposes," said Lenin, "we created our party specifically for the fight against any religious deceiving of the people."

Occult Practices

More about the relationship between Marxism and the occult can be found in ~Psychic Discoveries Behind the Iron Curtain~ [15] by Sheila Ostrander and Lynn Schroder. It is highly significant that the Communist East had been much more advanced than the West in research about the dark forces manipulated by Satan.

Dr. Eduard Naumov, a member of the International Association of Parapsychologists, was arrested in Moscow. The Moscow physicist L. Regelsohn, a Hebrew-Christian who took his defense, tells us the reason for his arrest: Naumov endeavored to keep the psychic sphere of life free from the domination of evil forces that used parapsychology as a new weapon for the oppression of the human soul.

In Czechoslovakia, Bulgaria, etc., the Communist Party spent huge sums on secret investigation into this science. They hid from the West information about what happened in the twenty parapsychological institutes located in the Soviet Union.

~Komsomolskaia Pravda~ (Moscow) published a lengthy article about hypnotists who help people "regress to past lives." For the induction process they use the following suggestions:

You descend into earth, deeper, even deeper. You and the earth become one.... You are deep in the earth. You are surrounded by thick darkness.... Around you is eternal night....

Now we approach a spot of light far away... nearer and nearer. We sneak through a small hole to the sky, leaving our own body deep in the earth.... We overcome the frontiers of time ... and we return to your past...."

In such articles the Soviets used intentional double-talk. Aware that some might become frightened, they were purposefully reserved, claiming they only inform without agreeing. But what would readers think of an editor who reprinted provocative articles and lustful pictures endlessly from ~Playboy~ while claiming that he did not agree fully with what he was purveying to the public?

Soviet writers said clearly that this "time machine" was not science fiction. "Transpersonalism" offered this voyage in time.

In the Satanist black masses, all prayers are said from the end to the beginning, and the priestly robe is worn inside out. Inversion is the Satanist rule, and this is applied even to the doctrine of reincarnation. Whereas Indian devotees are concerned about their future reincarnations and try to better themselves by obeying what they believe to be God's commandments, the Satanists offer a return to former incarnations. They care nothing about a better future in eternity.

Marxism as a Church

Just as Satan came to Jesus with Bible verses, so Marx used texts of Scripture, though with much distortion.

Volume 2 of ~The Works of Marx and Engels~ opens with Jesus' words to His disciples (JHN 6:63), as quoted by Marx in his book ~The Holy Family~: "It is the spirit which gives life." Then we read:

Criticism [his criticism of all that exists] so loved the masses that it sent its only-begotten son [i.e., Marx], that whosoever believes in him should not perish but have a life of criticism. Criticism became masses and lived among us, and we saw its glory as the glory of the only-begotten Son of the Father. Criticism did not consider it robbery to be equal with God, but made itself of no reputation, taking the form of a book-binder, and humbled itself up to nonsense - yes, critical nonsense in foreign languages. [17]

Those knowledgeable in Scripture will recognize this as a parody of Biblical verses (JHN 3:16; JHN 1:14; PHP 2:6-8). Here again, Marx declares his own works to be "nonsense," as well as "swinish books."

Marxism is a religion, and it even "uses" Scripture. Its main work, ~The Capital~ by Marx, is called "the Bible of the working class." Marx considered himself "the Pope of Communism."

Communism "has the pride of infallibility." [19] All who oppose the Communist "creed" (this expression is used by Engels) [20] are excommunicated. Marx wrote, "Bakunin should beware. Otherwise we will excommunicate him." [21]

Those who die in the service of Marxism are feasted as "martyrs." Marxism also has its sacraments: the solemn receptions in the toddlers' organization called "the Children of October," the oaths given when received as "Pioneers," after which come the higher grades of initiation in the Komsomol and the Party. Confession is replaced with public self-criticism before the assembly of Party members. [22]

Marxism is a church. It has all the characteristics of a church. Yet, its god is not named in its popular literature. But, as seen by the proofs given in this book, Satan is obviously its god.

It is strange that though Marxism is clearly Satanic, it is not seen as a threat by many churches in the free world. Some illuminating statistics on this are available.

Seminary professors in the U.S.A. were asked, "Can an individual consistently be a good member of your denomination and adhere to Marxism?"

Below are the percentage figures of those who answered Yes: [23]

Episcopalian	68%
Lutheran	53
Presbyterian	49
Methodist	49
Church of Christ	47
American Baptist	44
Roman Catholic	31

How sad that those who follow the Truth are duped by those who serve the father of lies.

What was the specific contribution of Marx to Satan's plan for mankind?

The Bible teaches that God created man in His own image (GEN 1:26). Up to the time of Marx, man continued to be considered as "the crown of creation." Marx was Satan's chosen tool to make man lose his self-esteem, his conviction that he comes from high places and is meant to return to them. Marxism is the first systematic and detailed philosophy which drastically reduces the notion of man.

According to Marx, man is primarily a belly which has to be filled and refilled constantly. The prevailing interests of man are economic in nature; he produces in order to satisfy his needs. For this purpose, he enters into social relationships with others. This is the basis of society, what Marx calls the infrastructure. Marriage, love, art, science, religion, philosophy, everything other than the needs of the belly, are all superstructure, determined in the last analysis by the state of the belly.

No wonder Marx praised Darwin's book

~The Descent of Man~, another masterstroke which makes men forget their divine origin and divine purpose. Darwin said that man springs from the animal world.

Man was dethroned by these two. Satan could not dethrone God, so he devalued man. Man was shown to be the progeny of animals and a mere servant to his intestines.

It is a strange coincidence that the nineteenth century gave the world three leading personalities opposed to Christianity, all bearing the name of Charles: Karl (German for Charles) Marx, Charles Darwin, and the French poet Charles Baudelaire. The latter wrote in "Abel and Cain":

Race of Cain, ascend to heaven
And throw God to the earth.

Marx wrote to Ferdinand Lassalle on January 16, 1861, "Darwin's book is very important and serves me as a basis in the natural sciences for the historical class struggle."

Marx's son-in-law, Paul Lafargue, in ~Socialism and the Intellectuals~, says,

When Darwin published his ~Origin of Species~, he took away from God his role as creator in the organic world, as Franklin has despoiled him of his thunderbolt.

(It was not Darwin's original intent to harm religion. He had written, "There is a grandeur in this view of life, with its several powers, having been originally breathed into a few forms or into one." In order to make his position more emphatic, Darwin inserted the phrase "by the Creator" after "breathed" in the second edition. It remained there in all the succeeding editions he published.)

Later Freud would complete the work of these two giants, reducing man basically to a sex urge, sometimes sublimated in politics, art, or religion. It was the Swiss psychologist Carl Gustav Jung who returned to the Biblical doctrine that the religious impulse is man's basic urge.

The age of Marx was a time of Satanist ferment in many spheres of life. The Russian poet Sologub wrote, "My father is the Devil." Another Russian poet, Briusov, said, "I glorify equally the Lord and the Devil."

Marx was a child of the time that gave us Nietzsche (Hitler's and Mussolini's favorite philosopher), Max Stimer, an extreme anarchist, and Oscar Wilde, the first theoretician of freedom for homosexuality, a vice which today has met with acceptance even among the clergy.

Satanic forces prepared Russia for the victory of Marxism. The time of the revolution was a period when love, goodwill, and healthy feeling were considered mean and retrograde. Girls hid their innocence and husbands their faithfulness. Destruction was praised as good taste, neurasthenia as the sign of a fine mind. This was the theme of new writers who burst on the scene out of obscurity. Men invented vices and perversions, and were fastidious in their avoidance of being thought moral.

How was it that Stalin became a revolutionist after reading Darwin? [1] As a student in an Orthodox seminary, he obtained from Darwin the concept that we are not creatures of God, but the result of an evolution in which ruthless competition reigns. It is only the strongest and most cruel who survive. He learned that moral and religious criteria play no role in nature and that man is as much a part of nature as a fish or an ape. Long live ruthlessness and cruelty!

Darwin had written a scientific book setting forth his theory of origins. It had no economic or political implications. But though many might go so far as to concede that God created the world through a long process of evolution, the end result of Darwin's theory has been the killing of tens of millions of innocents. He therefore became the spiritual father of the greatest mass-murderer in history.

Beyond the intellectual turmoil of the nineteenth century can be traced the influence of the French Revolution, which was spiritually very much akin to the Russian cataclysm of the twentieth century.

During the upheaval in France, Anarchasis Clootz, a leading French revolutionary and Illuminatus, declared himself to be "the personal enemy of Jesus Christ." He proclaimed before the Convention of November 17, 1792, "The people is the sovereign and the god of the world.... Only fools believe in any other God, in a Supreme Being." The Convention then issued a decree proclaiming "the nullification of all religions."

For those of us who take seriously the words of the Lord's Prayer, "Deliver us from evil," the meaning is clear: we implore a loving God to protect us and society around us from false doctrine, from pernicious art that accustoms us to evil under the guise of beauty, and from immorality in life. Then we need have no fear of the Devil's snares.

You have a choice: Do you want to become like the Devil, cruel and vicious, or like Jesus, the God-man of holy love and peace?

Moses Hess's False Zionism

To complete the picture, we will consider Moses Hess, the man who converted Marx and Engels to the Socialist ideal.

There is a tombstone in Israel inscribed with the words, "Moses Hess, founder of the German Social-Democrat Party." Hess expounds his beliefs in the ~Red Catechism for the German People~:

What is black? Black is the clergy.... These theologians are the worst aristocrats.... The clergyman teaches the princes to oppress the people in the name of God. Secondly, he teaches the people to allow themselves to be oppressed and exploited in God's name. Thirdly and principally, he provides for himself with God's help a splendid life on earth, while the people are advised to wait for heaven.

The Red flag symbolizes the permanent revolution until the completed victory of the working classes in all civilized countries: the Red republic.... The Socialist revolution is my religion.... The workers, when they have conquered one country, must help their brethren in the rest of the world. [2]

This was Hess's religion when he first issued the Catechism. In the second edition, he added a few chapters.

This time the same religion, i.e., the Socialist revolution, uses Christian language in order to accredit itself with believers. Together with the propaganda of revolution, there are indeed a few nice words about Christianity as a religion of love and humanity. But its message must be made clearer: its hell must not be on earth and its heaven beyond. The Socialist society will be the true fulfillment of Christianity. Thus Satan disguises himself as an angel of light.

After Hess convinced Marx and Engels of the Socialist idea, claiming from the very beginning that its purpose would be to give "the last kick to medieval religion" [3] (his friend Georg Jung said it even more clearly: "Marx will surely chase God from his heaven" [4]), an interesting development took place in Hess's life. He who had founded modern socialism also founded an entirely different movement, a specific brand of Zionism.

Thus Hess, founder of a socialism whose aim was to "chase God from heaven," was also founder of a diabolic type of Zionism that was to destroy godly Zionism, the Zionism of love, understanding, and concord with surrounding nations. He who taught Marx the importance of class struggle wrote in 1862 these surprising words: "Race struggle is primary, class struggle is secondary." [5]

He had lighted the fire of class war, a fire never extinguished, instead of teaching people to cooperate for the common good. The same Hess then breeds a distorted Zionism, a Zionism of race struggle. As we reject Satanic Marxism, so also must every responsible Jew or Christian reject this diabolical perversion of Zionism.

Hess claims Jerusalem for the Jews, but without Jesus, the King of the Jews. What need has Hess of Jesus? He writes,

Every Jew has the making of a Messiah in himself, every Jewess that of a Mater Delorosa in herself. [6]

Then why in the world did he not make of the Jew Marx a Messiah, a God-anointed man, instead of a hater bent on chasing God from heaven? For Hess, Jesus is "a Jew, whom the heathen deified as their Savior." [7] Neither Hess nor the Jews seem to need Him for themselves.

p089 Chapter 7: Marx, Darwin, and Revolution MARX & SATAN

Hess does not wish to be saved himself, and for an individual to seek personal sanctification is "Indo-German," he says. The aim of the Jews, according to him, must be "a Messianic state," "to prepare mankind for the revelation of the divine essence," [8] which means, as he acknowledges in his ~Red Catechism~, to wage the Socialist revolution through racial and class struggle.

Moses Hess, who allotted to his idol Marx the task of putting an end to medieval religion, replacing it with the religion of Socialist revolution, writes these amazing words: "I have always been edified by Hebrew prayers." [9] What prayers do those who consider religion the opiate of the people say? We have seen already that the founder of scientific atheism prayed while wearing phylacteries before burning candles. Jewish prayers can be misused in a blasphemous sense, just as Christian prayers are perverted in Satanist ritual.

Hess had taught Marx that socialism was inseparable from internationalism. Marx writes in his ~Communist Manifesto~ that the proletariat has no fatherland. In his ~Red Catechism~ Hess mocks the fatherland notion of the Germans, and he would have done the same with the fatherland notion of any other European nation. Hess criticized the Erfurt program of the German Social-Democrat Party for its unconditional recognition of the national principle. But Hess is an internationalist with a difference: Jewish patriotism must remain. He writes, Whoever denies Jewish nationalism is not only an apostate, a renegade in the religious sense, but a traitor to his people and to his family. Should it prove true that the emancipation of the Jews is incompatible with Jewish nationalism, then the Jew must sacrifice emancipation.... The Jew must be, above all, a Jewish patriot. [10]

p090 Chapter 7: Marx, Darwin, and Revolution MARX & SATAN

I agree with Hess's patriotic ideas to the extent that what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander. I am for every kind of patriotism - that of the Jews, the Arabs, the Germans, the Russians, the Americans. Patriotism is a virtue if it means the endeavor to promote economically, politically, spiritually, and religiously the welfare of one's own nation, provided that it is done in friendship and cooperation with other nations. But the Jewish patriotism of a revolutionary Socialist who denies the patriotism of all other nations is highly suspect. This seems to be a diabolical plan to make all peoples hate the Jews.

If I were a non-Jew who saw the Jews accept Hess's plan of unilateral patriotism, I would oppose it. Fortunately, no Jews have accepted this Satanic plan. In fact, it was Herzl who gave a sane turn to Zionism. In its modern form no trace of Satanism has remained.

The race struggle proposed by Hess is false, as false as the class struggle he enjoined.

Hess did not abandon socialism for this specific kind of Zionism. After writing ~Rome and Jerusalem~, he continued to be active in the world Socialist movement.

Hess does not state his thoughts clearly; therefore it is difficult to evaluate them. It is enough to know that according to him, "the Christian world views Jesus as a Jewish saint who became a pagan man." [11] It is enough for us to read in his book, "We today long for a far more comprehensive salvation than that which Christianity was ever able to offer." [12] From ~The Red Catechism~ it follows that this more comprehensive salvation is the Socialist revolution.

It could be added that Hess was not only the original source of Marxism and the man who attempted to create an anti-God Zionism, but also the predecessor of the liberation theology currently endorsed in the World Council of Churches and Catholicism. One and the same man, who is almost unknown, has been the mouthpiece of three Satanic movements: communism; a racist, hateful brand of Zionism; and a theology of revolution.

No one can be a Christian without loving the Jews. Jesus was Jewish, as were the virgin Mary and all the apostles. The Bible is Jewish. The Lord has said, "Salvation is of the Jews" (JHN 4:22). Hess, on the other hand, exalted the Jews as though he consciously wanted to create a violent anti-Jewish reaction. He said that his religion was that of Socialist revolution. The clergy of all "other" religions were crooks. Revolution was the only religion for which Hess had a high regard. He writes,

Our religion (the Jewish) has as its point of departure the enthusiasm of a race which from its appearance on the stage of history has foreseen the final purposes of mankind and which had a foreboding of the messianic time in which the spirit of humanity will be fulfilled, not only in this or that individual or only partially, but in the social institutions of all mankind. [13]

This time – which Hess calls "messianic" is the time of the victory of the Socialist world revolution. The idea that the Jewish religion had as its point of departure the concept of a godless Socialist revolution is an ugly joke and an insult to the Jewish people.

Hess speaks persistently in religious terms, but he does not believe in God. He writes that "our God is nothing more than the human race united in love." [14] The way to arrive at such a union is the Socialist revolution, in which tens of millions of specimens of his beloved mankind will be tortured and killed.

He makes no secret of the fact that he wishes neither the domination of heaven, nor that of earthly powers, which are both oppressive. There is no good in any religion, except that of social revolution.

It is useless and inefficient to elevate the people to real freedom and to make them participate in the goods of existence, without freeing them from spiritual slavery, i.e., from religion. [15]

He speaks in one breath about "the absolutism of celestial and earthly tyrants over slaves." [16]

The Satanic depths of communism can be understood only by knowing the kind of man Moses Hess was, for he influenced Marx and Engels, with whom he founded the First International, as well as Bakunin. Without a knowledge of Hess, Marx is unintelligible, because it is he who brought Marx to socialism.

Consider Marx's words already quoted:

Words I teach all mixed up into a devilish muddle. Thus, anyone may think just what he chooses to think.

Marx wrote in such a manner. Hess's writings are an even more devilish muddle, which are difficult to untangle but which must be analyzed for possible connections between Marx and Satanism.

Hess's first book was called ~The Holy History of Mankind~. He proclaimed it to be "a work of the holy spirit of truth," [17] saying further that as the Son of God freed men from their own slavery, Hess would free them from political bondage. "I am called to witness for the light, as John has been." [18]

At that time Marx, who was still opposed to socialism and had not known Hess personally, started to write a book against him. For unknown reasons, this book was never completed. He later became Hess's disciple. [19]

As previously indicated, Hess's avowed aims were to give a last kick to medieval religion and to produce ravages. In the introduction to his book ~Last Judgment~, he declares his satisfaction that the German philosopher Kant had allegedly "decapitated the old Father Jehovah together with the whole holy family." [20] (Hess covers his own ideas with the name of the great philosopher. Kant had had no such intentions. He had written to the contrary: "I had to limit knowledge to make place for faith." [21]

Hess declares the Jewish as well as the Christian religion to be "dead," [22] which does not prevent him from writing in ~Rome and Jerusalem~ about "our holy writings," "the holy language of our fathers," "our cult," "the divine laws," "the ways of Providence," and "godly life." [23]

It is not that at different stages in life he held different opinions. In his pseudo-Zionist book he declares that he does not disown his former godless endeavors. No, this is an intentional "devilish muddle." [24]

Hess was Jewish and a forerunner of Zionism. Because Hess, Marx, and other people like them were Jewish, some people consider communism a Jewish plot. Yet Marx also wrote an anti-Jewish book. In this respect, too, he has simply followed Hess.

This "Zionist," Hess, who elevates Jewry to heaven, wrote in his book ~About the Monetary System~:

The Jews, who had the role, in the natural history of the social animal world, to develop mankind into a savage animal, have fulfilled this, their professional job. The mystery of Judaism and Christianity has been revealed in the modern Judeo-Christian. The mystery of the blood of Christ, like the mystery of the old Jewish worship of the blood, appears here unveiled as being the mystery of the predatory animal. [25]

Don't worry if you fail to understand these words. They were written "mixed up into a devilish muddle," but the hatred for Jewishness contained in them is clear. Hess is a racist, Jewish as well as anti-Jewish, according to the needs of the spirit which inspired his works and which he calls "holy."

Hitler could have learned his racism from Hess. He who had taught Marx that social class is a decisive factor also wrote the contrary: "Life is an immediate product of race." [26] Social institutions and conceptions, as well as religions, are typical and original creations of the race. The problem of race lies hidden behind all the problems of nationalities and freedom. All past history was concerned with the struggle of races and classes. Race struggle is primary; class struggle is secondary. [27]

How will Hess manage to have so many contradictory ideas triumph?

I will use the sword against all citizens who resist the endeavors of the proletariat. [28]

We will hear the same from Marx:

Violence is the midwife which takes the new society out of the womb of the old one. [29]

Marx's first teacher was the philosopher Hegel, who merely paved the way for Hess. Marx, too, had sucked poison from Hegel, for whom Christianity was wretched in comparison to the glorious past of Greek culture. Hegel wrote: "Christians have piled up such a heap of reasons for comfort in misfortune ... that we ought to be sorry in the end that we cannot lose a father or a mother once a week," while for the Greek "misfortune was misfortune, pain was pain." [30]

Christianity had been satirized in Germany before Hegel. But he was the first to satirize Jesus Himself. He also wrote nice things about Christianity, the same

"devilish muddle."
We are what we feed upon. Marx fed upon Satanic ideas; therefore he set forth Satanist doctrine.

The Organization "Hell"

Communists have a habit of creating front organizations. All of the above suggests the probability that Communist movements are themselves front organizations for occult Satanism. The means to fight Satanism are spiritual, not carnal; otherwise, while one Satanist front organization, such as nazism, is defeated, another will rise to greater victory. Himmler, the minister of interior affairs of Nazi Germany, thought himself to be King Henry the Fowler's reincarnation. He believed that it was possible to harness occult powers to serve the Nazi army. Several Nazi leaders were involved in black magic.
What was mere supposition when I published the first edition of this present book is now a proven fact. The proof has been given by the Communists themselves. The story begins with the Netchaiev case, which prompted Dostoievsky to write his renowned novel ~The Demons~.
Netchaiev, called a "splendid, young fanatic" [31] by Bakunin, Marx's collaborator in founding the First International, wrote ~The Catechism of the Revolutionist~ as the guide for the Russian organization "Popular Revenge." It appeared around 1870.

The purpose of this organization was formulated as follows.

Our cause is terrible, complete, universal, and pitiless destruction.... Let us unite with the savage, criminal world, these true and only revolutionists of Russia. [32]

The first man the Netchaiev group killed was one of their founding comrades, Ivanov, who dared to criticize his leadership. No criticism was permitted.
Netchaiev's plan was to divide mankind into two unequal parts.

One tenth gets personal liberty and unlimited rights over the other nine tenths. These must lose their personality and turn into a kind of herd. [33]

They will engage in spy work. Each member of society will spy on the other and will be obliged to denounce.... All are slaves and are equal in slavery. [34]

Netchaiev wrote in his Catechism:

A revolutionist must infiltrate everywhere, in the upper and lower classes ... in churches ... in literature.

His disciple Peter Verhovensky commented:

We are already terribly powerful.... Jurors who acquit criminals are completely ours. The district attorney who trembles in courts not to be considered liberal enough is ours. Administrators, men of letters, we are many, very many, and they don't know they belong to us. [35]

On the basis of such a program an organization with an impressive name was formed – the World Revolutionist League. Its constitution was signed by Netchaiev and Bakunin, Marx's intimate collaborator. [36] In the beginning the League consisted of only a handful of men.

The revolutionist Duke Peter Dolgorukov wrote on October 31, 1862:

In London I met Kelsiev (who belonged to the above organization), a narrow-minded but good man, terribly fanatical, with the face of a soft man. Kelsiev told me softly, with a benevolent look: "If we have to slaughter, why not slaughter, provided this is useful?" ... All these London men speak continually about "burning down, slaughtering, cutting in pieces." These words have never left their tongue since Bakunin came to England....

In 1869, in Geneva, Netchaiev wrote a proclamation in which, referring to the man who shot Emperor Alexander II, he advises:

We must consider what Karakazov did as prologue. Yes, this was a prologue. Let us see to it that the drama itself begins soon. [37]

Another proclamation says,

Soon, soon the day comes when we will unfurl the great flag of the future, the Red flag, and we will attack with great noise the Imperial palace....

We will have one shout, "To the axes!" and then we will kill the party of the emperor. Do not pity.... Kill in public places if these base rascals dare to enter them, kill in houses, kill in villages.

Remember, those who will not side with us will be against us. Whoever is against us is our enemy. And we must destroy enemies by all means. [38]

p098 Chapter 7: Marx, Darwin, and Revolution MARX & SATAN

In 1872, a revolutionary society was formed under the simple name "The Organization," which had a super-secret circle chillingly called "Hell." Though its goals have continued to be pursued for well over a century by groups which continually change their names, its existence has been unknown to the outside world.

Soviet historians have dared to write about the activities of "Hell," a forerunner of the Russian Communist Party, only as recently as 1965, ninety-three years after its formation.

In ~Revolutionist Underground~ in Russia, E. S. Vilenskaia wrote:

"Hell" was the name of the center above the secret organization, which not only used terror against the monarchy, but also had punitive functions toward the members of the secret organization. [39]

In ~Tchernishevsky~ or ~Netchaiev~ [40] we read that one of the members (Fediseev) of "Hell" took it upon himself to poison his own father in order to give the organization his inheritance.

Tchernishevsky, who belonged to this movement, wrote,

I'll participate in revolution; I am not frightened by dirt, by drunkards with sticks, by slaughter. We don't care if we have to shed thrice as much blood as the rebels in the French revolution. So what if we had to kill a hundred thousand farmers? [41]

Here are some of the expressed aims of this Satanic organization:

Mystification is the best, almost the only means to impel men to make a revolution.

It is enough to kill a few million people and the wheels of revolution will be oiled.

Our ideal is awful, complete, universal, and pitiless destructlon.

And again:

Mankind must be divided into two unequal parts. One tenth receives personal liberty and unlimited rights over the other nine tenths. The latter must lose their personality and become a kind of herd. [42]

In their writings we constantly find the words, "We are not afraid." A typical example is the following proclamation:

We are not afraid that we might find out three times more blood will have to be shed for the overthrow of the existing order than the Jacobins (French revolutionists) had to shed in their revolution in 1790.... If for the fulfillment of our objectives we had to slaughter one hundred thousand landlords, we would not be afraid of this either. [43]

In reality, the number of victims was much greater. Churchill says in his ~Memoirs of World War II~ that Stalin confessed that ten million people died as a result of the collectivization of agriculture in the Soviet Union.

The important fact to remember is that the Communists have now confessed, after a delay of almost a hundred years, that at the inception of their movement was a circle called "Hell." Why "Hell"? Why not "The Society for the Betterment of the Poor" or "... of mankind"? Why the stark emphasis on hell?

Today the Communists are more cautious. But in the beginning their very name revealed that their avowed aim was to recruit men for eternal damnation.

The Satanist Mass

Dr. Lawrence Pazder, in ~Michelle Remembers,~ [1] gives us the exact words of a highly secret Satanist mass, obtained through regression analysis from a girl who had attended such some twenty years before.

In the mass Satan appears and says:

Out of dark and fire red
Comes a man of living dead;
I only walk the earth at night,
I only burn out the light.
I only go where everybody's afraid;
I go and find the ones who've strayed.
All the darkest forces they are mine.

Turn a light, make it night.

Satan is obviously personified by the high priest of the sect. Then Satan takes a Bible in his hand and says:

No eyes can see what this book said.
What's written in the book is dead.
No eyes can see, not even a friend.
The books are mine in the end.

You can write all day, you can write all night,
But writing won't bring light.
I'll burn it out, I'll make it black.
I'll burn your words from front to back.
I'll burn each page, I'll eat each word
And spit it out never to be heard.
The fire will grow, their eyes will see.
The book of words can't stand up to me.
When they grow old, they'll know and tell.
The only power comes from Hell.

Matthew, Mark, Luke and John
Burn in the fire and then you're gone.
Their words were lies,
My children will see.
In the fire their word dies.
The only thing left burning true

Is the light that shows me to you.

I'll be back, you wait and see.
I'll be back to take the world for me.
Everything that's gone must return.
I was thrown out, but I can burn.

Turn, my children, turn around.
Touch every piece of ground.
Touch everyone you can.
Make a beast of every man.

Then follows the chant of the congregation:

It's time to change from black to red.
It's time to change from alive to dead.
Prince of darkness ...
Help us celebrate the feast
Of the coming of the Beast.

Satan speaks again:

The Holy One, the One most high - Ha, not for long, pretty soon it will be I.

p104 Chapter 8: Angels of Light MARX & SATAN

All the countries you see, I put my traps,
Waiting for the boot to collapse.
Money and numbers and the power of hate,
These are the things on which I relate.
Numbers of people - so many, each one small,
Then, with so much money, the small are tall.

Friedrich Nietzsche, in the fourth part of ~Thus Spake Zarathustra~, under "Awakening," provides the text of another black mass he himself composed. Its spirit does not differ much from the one above. [2]

Tragically, it has come to light that black masses have infiltrated the lives of many Americans, especially children. [3]

"Satan, Satan, Satan. He is God; he is God; he is God." These blasphemous words are hidden in the lyrics of rock records that youth listen to by the hour, many with no awareness of what they are being subjected to. The words are hidden in the lyrics through "backward masking."

A number of rock groups have used this technique.

Led Zeppelin's best-selling record "Stairway to Heaven," which admittedly makes little sense as written, contains the masked message, "I will sing because I live with Satan." Another song contains the words, "I decide to smoke marijuana." Subliminal persuasion is more powerful, and therefore more dangerous, than conscious influence.

Public black masses are rare today, but Stefan Zweig in his biography of Fouch, describes one held in Lyon during the French Revolution.

A revolutionary, Chalier, had been killed, and the black mass was celebrated in his honor. On that day crucifixes were torn from all the altars and priestly robes were confiscated. A huge crowd of men carrying a bust of the revolutionary descended on the marketplace. Three proconsuls were there to honor Chalier, "the God-Savior who died for the people."

The crowd carried chalices, holy images, and utensils used in the mass. Behind them was an ass wearing a bishop's mitre on its head. A crucifix and a Bible had been tied to its tail.

In the end, the Gospel was thrown into the fire together with missals, prayer books, and ikons. The ass was made to drink from a Communion chalice as a reward for its blasphemous services. The bust of Chalier was put on an altar in place of the smashed image of Christ. Tens of former Catholic priests participated.

A medal was issued to commemorate this event. Secret black masses do not take this shape, but the spirit is basically the same.

The Russian magazine ~Iunii Kommunist~ describes in detail a Satanist mass in which bread and wine, mixed with dung and tears taken from operating on the eyes of a living cock, are "transubstantiated" into the alleged body and blood of Lucifer.

During this ceremony the words of the mass are read from the end to the beginning, as is customary in Satanist rituals. Then a covenant is concluded between Satan and his worshipers. The points of the contract are: renunciation of Christian teachings; new baptism in the name of the Devil, with a change of name; renunciation of godparents, with the substitution of other protectors; bringing some personal clothing as a gift to Satan; swearing loyalty to Satan while standing in a magic circle; inscription of the new member's name in "The Book of the Dead," as opposed to Christ's Book of Life; the promise to consecrate one's children to the Devil, as well as gifts and deeds pleasing to him; an oath to keep the secrets of the witches' coven and to demean the Christian religion.

Why would Communists dig out such teachings from old books of demonology and recommend them to the youth, saying, "they are rich food for thought"? Is that all that Marxism has to offer the human mind?

The Communist magazine continues:

In this devilish antiworld, which externally is completely like ours, man must reply with evil to every success in life.

Then it brazenly affirms the following as the slogan of Satanism: "Satan is not the foe of man. He is Life, Love, Light."

The article ends with a quotation from Uspenskii expressing the hope of the Communists:

There are ideas which touch the most intimate corners of our lives. Once these are touched, the marks remain forever. ... They will poison life. [4]

This insidious material is presented in a subtle manner as if to provide information, but its real aim is to arouse the reader's morbid curiosity, with ravaging effects.

During the initiation ceremony for the third degree in the Satanist church, the initiate has to take the oath, "I will always do only what I will." In other words, there is no authority beyond the polluted self. This is an open denial of God's commandment, "... seek not after your own heart and your own eyes, after which you used to go a whoring" (NUM 15:39).

Marxists appeal to the basest passions, stirring up envy toward the rich and violence toward everyone. "It is the evil side which makes history," wrote Marx, and he played a major role in shaping history.

Revolutions do not cause love to triumph. Rather, killing becomes a mania. In the Russian and Chinese revolutions, after the Communists had murdered tens of millions of innocents, they could not stop murdering and brutally killed one another.

Is Everything Permitted?

The Satanist cult is very old, older than Christianity. The prophet Isaiah might have had it in view when he wrote, "We have turned every one to his own way, and the Lord has laid on him (the Savior) the iniquity of us all" (ISA 53:6).

True religious feeling is at the opposite pole. Certain Hassidic rabbis never said "I," because they considered it a pronoun that belonged only to God. His will is binding on human behavior.

By contrast, when a man or woman is initiated into the seventh degree of Satanism, he swears that his principle will be, "Nothing is true, and everything is permitted." When Marx filled out a quiz game for his daughter, he answered the question "Which is your favorite principle?" with the words, "Doubt everything." [5]

Marx wrote in ~The Communist Manifesto~ that his aim was the abolition not only of all religions, but also of all morals, which would make everything permissible.

It was with a sense of horror that I read the mystery of the seventh degree of Satanism inscribed on a poster at the University of Paris during the 1968 riots. It had been simplified to the formula, "It is forbidden to forbid," which is the natural consequence of "Nothing is true, and everything is permissible."

The youth obviously did not realize the stupidity of the formula. If it is forbidden to forbid, it must also be forbidden to forbid forbidding. If everything is permissible, forbidding is permissible, too.

Young people think that permissiveness means liberty. Marxists know better. To them, the formula means that it is forbidden to forbid cruel dictatorships like those in Red China and the Soviet Union.

Dostoievsky had said it already: "If there is no God, everything is permitted." If there is no God, our instincts are free. The ultimate expression of this kind of liberty is hatred. Whoever is free in this sense considers loving-kindness a weakness of the spirit.

Engels said, "Generalized love of men is absurdity." The anarchist thinker Max Stimer, author of ~The I and Its Property~ and one of Marx's friends, wrote,

"I am legitimately authorized to do everything I am capable of."

Communism is collective demon-possession. Solzhenitsyn in ~The Gulag Archipelago~ reveals some of its horrible results in the souls and lives of people.

The Mythical Marx

Let me say again that I am conscious that the evidence I have given to date may be considered circumstantial. But what I have written is enough to show that what Marxists say about Karl Marx is a myth. He is not prompted by concern for the poverty of his fellowmen, for which revolution was the only solution. He did not love the proletariat, but called them "nuts," "stupid," "asses," "rascals," even obscenities. He did not even love his comrades in the fight for communism. He called Freiligrath "the swine,"[6] Lassalle "Jewish nigger," [7] Bakunin "a theoretical zero." [8]

A Lieutenant Tchekhov, a fighter in the revolution of 1848 who spent nights drinking with Marx, commented that Marx's narcissism had devoured everything good that had been in him.

Marx certainly did not love mankind. Giuseppe Mazzini, who knew him well, wrote that he had "a destructive spirit. His heart bursts with hatred rather than with love toward men." [9]

Mazzini was himself a "Carbonari." This organization, founded in 1815 by Maghella, a Genoan Freemason, declared its "final aim to be that of Voltaire and of the French Revolution the complete annihilation of Catholicism and ultimately of Christianity." It began as an Italian operation, but subsequently developed a broader European orientation.

Though Mazzini was critical of Marx, he maintained his friendship with him. ~The Jewish Encyclopedia~ says that Mazzini and Marx were entrusted with the task of preparing the address and the constitution of the First International. This means that they were birds of the same feather, though they sometimes pecked at each other.

I know of no testimonies from Marx's contemporaries that contradict Mazzini's evaluation. Marx the loving man is a myth constructed only after his death.

In fact, his favorite bit of verse was this quotation from G. Werth: "There is nothing more beautiful in the world than to bite one's enemies." In his own words, he said outright, "We are pitiless. We ask for no pity. When our turn comes, we will not shun terrorism."

These are hardly the sentiments of a lover.

p110 Chapter 8: Angels of Light MARX & SATAN

Marx did not hate religion because it stood in the way of the happiness of mankind. On the contrary, he simply wanted to make mankind unhappy in this world and throughout eternity. He proclaimed this as his ideal. His avowed aim was the destruction of religion. Socialism, concern for the proletariat, humanism - these were only pretexts.

After Marx had read ~The Origin of Species~ by Charles Darwin, he wrote a letter to Lassalle in which he exults that God - in the natural sciences at least - had been given "the death blow." [10] What idea, then, preempted all others in Marx's mind? Was it the plight of the poor proletariat? If so, of what possible value was Darwin's theory? The only tenable conclusion is that Marx's chief aim was the destruction of religion.

The good of the workers was only a pretense. Where proletarians do not fight for Socialist ideals, Marxists will exploit racial differences or the so-called generation gap. The main thing is, religion must be destroyed.

Marx believed in hell. And his program, the driving force in his life, was to send men to hell.

Robin Goodfellow

Marx wrote,

In the signs that bewilder the middle class, the aristocracy, and the prophets of regression, we recognize our brave friend, Robin Goodfellow, the old mole that can work in the earth so fast - the revolution. [11]

Scholars who have read this apparently never looked into the identity of this Robin Goodfellow, Marx's brave friend, the worker for revolution.

p111 Chapter 8: Angels of Light MARX & SATAN

The sixteenth-century evangelist William Tyndale used Robin Goodfellow as a name for the Devil. [12] Shakespeare in his ~Midsummer Night's Dream~ called him "the knavish spirit that misleads nightwanderers, laughing at their harm." [13]

Thus, according to Marx, considered the father of communism, a demon was the author of the Communist revolution and was his personal friend.

Lenin's Tomb

In his revelation to St. John, Jesus said something very mysterious to the church in Pergamos (a city in Asia Minor): "I know... where thou dwellest, even where Satan's seat is" (REV 2:13). Pergamos was apparently a center of the Satanist cult in that period. Now the world-famous Baedecker tourist guidebooks for Berlin state that the Island Museum contained the Pergamos altar of Zeus until 1944. German archaeologists had excavated it, and it had been in the center of the Nazi capital during Hitler's Satanist regime.

But the saga of the seat of Satan is not yet over. ~Svenska Dagbladet~ (Stockholm) for January 27, 1948 reveals that:

1) The Soviet army, after the conquest of Berlin, carried off the Pergamos altar from Germany to Moscow. This tremendous structure measures 127 feet long by 120 feet wide by forty feet high.

Surprisingly, the altar has not been exhibited in any Soviet museum. For what purpose was it transported to Moscow?

We have already indicated that men in the top echelons of the Soviet hierarchy practiced Satanist rituals. Did they reserve the Pergamos altar for their private use? There are many unanswered questions. Suffice it to say that objects of such high archaeological value usually do not disappear, but are the pride of museums.

2) The architect, Stjusev, who built Lenin's mausoleum, used this altar of Satan as a model for the mausoleum in 1924. [14]

Many visitors wait in line every day to visit this sanctuary of Satan in which Lenin's mummy lies in state. Religious leaders of the whole world pay their homage to the Marxist "patron saint" in this monument erected to Satan.

The Satanist temple at Pergamos was only one of the many of its kind. Why did Jesus single it out? Probably not because of the minor role it played at that time. Rather, His words were prophetic. He spoke about nazism and communism, through which this altar would be honored.

It is worth noting with irony that on the grave of Lenin's father there stood a cross with the inscription "The light of Christ illuminates all" and a multitude of Bible verses.

p113 Chapter 9: Whom Will We Serve MARX & SATAN

A Call for Action

This book has been written in an exploratory manner. Christian thinkers, like other scholars, often succumb to the temptation to prove preconceived ideas. They do not necessarily present only the truth as far as they have ascertained it. Sometimes they are prone to stretch the truth or exaggerate their argumentation in order to prove their point.

I do not claim to have provided indisputable proof that Marx was a member of a sect of devil-worshipers, but I believe that there are sufficient leads to imply this strongly. There are certainly enough leads to suggest Satanic influence upon his life and teachings, while conceding that there are gaps in a chain of evidence that would lead to a definite conclusion in this matter. I have provided the initial impulse. I pray that others will also continue this important inquiry into the relationship between Marxism and Satanism.

Meanwhile, how can the church defeat Marxism?

The secular anti-Communist world can use weapons of economic sanctions, political pressure, military

p114 Chapter 9: Whom Will We Serve MARX & SATAN

threats, and broad-based propaganda. The church should certainly support any actions conscience can endorse in the battle against the enemies of God. But it also has a weapon of its own.

The Ukrainian Metropolitan of the Catholic Church, Byzantine rite, Andrew Count Sheptytsky, once requested that Rome order prayers of exorcism against the Communists, whose "regime cannot be explained except by a massive possession of the Devil."

Jesus did not tell His disciples to complain about demons, but to cast them out (MTT 10:8). I believe this can be effectively accomplished, though this book cannot enter into details about such prayer.

Readers React

The first editions of this book produced interesting responses. Many greeted it as a new discovery in the understanding of Marxism and gave me valuable hints as to where I could find new material.

On the other hand, a Dutch personality dedicated several columns of his theological magazine to minimizing the importance of the discovery. "Well," he says, "Marx may have indulged in black magic, but this does not count for much. All men are sinners, all men have evil thoughts. Let us not be alarmed at this."

It is true that all men are sinners, but not all are criminals. All men are sinners, but some are murderers and some are righteous judges who pass judgment on them.

The crimes of communism are unequaled. What other political system has killed sixty million men in half a century? Another sixty million have been killed in Red China. (Some estimates run much higher.)

There are degrees of sinfulness and criminality. The enormity of crime is a measure of the intensity of Satanic influence on the founder of modern communism. The sins of Marxism, like those of nazism, surpass the ordinary. They are Satanic indeed.

I have also had letters from Satanists offering an apology for their religion. One of them writes:

A defense of Satanism needs only the Bible for documentary evidence. Think of all the thousands of earthly people, created in God's own image, mind you, destroyed by fire and brimstone (Sodom and Gomorrah), a lethal miscellany of plagues, and, to top everything off, the drowning of the earth's population, except for Noah's family. All of these devastations brought about by a "merciful" God/Lord/ Jehovah. What could a merciless god have done?

But in all the Bible there is no record of even one death being brought about by Satan! So, let's hear it for Satan!

This Satanist has not studied the Bible well. Death came into the world through Satan's deceit, his luring Eve into sin. This Satanist has also drawn his conclusions too soon. God has not yet finished with His creation.

Initially every painting is a senseless, often ugly mixture of lines and dots of many colors. It took da Vinci twenty years to make of these the beautiful Mona Lisa. God also creates in time. In time He shapes beings and destroys them to give them a new form. The seed which has neither beauty nor fragrance dies as seed in order to become a splendid, perfumed flower. Caterpillars have to die as such in order to become beautiful butterflies. Men are allowed by God to pass through the refining fires of suffering and death. The apotheosis of creation will be a new heaven and a new earth in which righteousness will triumph. Then those who have followed Satan will have to suffer an eternity of regrets.

Jesus endured flogging and crucifixion. But whoever wants to know God must look beyond the tomb to Jesus' resurrection and ascension. In contrast, the enemies of Jesus who plotted His death brought their people and their temple to destruction and lost their own souls.

Our critic wished to comprehend God through reason, which is not the right instrument for a creature. God cannot be comprehended by the mind, but only apprehended by a believing heart.

A Jamaican asked if the America that exploits his country is not as Satanic as Marx. It is not. Americans are sinners, as are all men. America has a small group of devil-worshipers. But the American nation as such does not worship the Devil.

~Nauka I Religia~, the principal atheist magazine of Moscow, contained a long article written by two philosophers, Belov and Shilkin. They said that Wurmbrand's temperament might be envied by the greatest football players. His shouting is savage. This fighter calls for a crusade against socialism, which he calls an offspring of Satan. He was imprisoned in Romania for distributing religious literature instigating revolt against the government! [2]

In this article two things are to be noted. First, I am called a "devilish pastor" for my book

~Was Karl Marx a Satanist?~ though the authors cannot produce one single fact to refute the documentation supporting Marx's links with a Satanist sect. Second, the article congratulates Christian leaders, even anti-Communists, who have taken a stand against me. They might be adversaries of communism, but as long as they oppose Wurmbrand, chief enemy of communism, they were approved by Moscow.

p117 Chapter 9: Whom Will We Serve MARX & SATAN

One remarkable letter came from a Nigerian who had been a Marxist labor union leader for twenty years. My writings helped him to see that he had been led astray by Satan. Furthermore, he has become a Christian.

p118 Chapter 10: Marx or Christ? MARX & SATAN

A Word to Marxists ...

If I were to address a rank-and-file Marxist, I would express the following concerns:

Many Marxists today are not animated by the spirit that controlled Hess, Marx, or Engels. They really love mankind; they are confident they are enrolled in an army fighting for universal good. It is not their desire to be tools of some weird Satanist sect.

Sadly, Satanic Marxism has a materialistic philosophy that blinds its followers to spiritual realities. But matter is not all that exists. There is a reality of the spirit, of truth, beauty, and ideals.

There is also a world of evil spirits, whose head is Satan. He fell from heaven through pride and drew down with him a host of angels. Then he seduced the progenitors of the human race. Since the Fall, his deceit has been perpetuated and increased through every conceivable device, until today we see God's beautiful creation ravaged by world wars, bloody revolutions and counterrevolutions, dictatorships, exploitation, racism of many kinds, false religions, agnosticism and atheism, crimes and crooked dealings, infidelities in love and friendship, broken marriages, rebellious children.

p119 Chapter 10: Marx or Christ? MARX & SATAN

Mankind has lost the vision of God. But what has taken the place of this vision? Is it something better?

Man must and will have some kind of religion. It is his nature to worship. If he has not a God-fearing religion, he will have the religion of Satan and will persecute those who do not worship his "god."

Presumably only a few top leaders of communism have been and are consciously Satanists, but there is also an unconscious Satanism. A man can be a Satanist without being aware that such a religion exists. But if he hates the notion of God and the name of Christ, if he lives as though he were only matter, if he denies religious and moral principles, he is in fact a Satanist. Those who delve into the occult are in the same class.

On Sundays in Frankfurt, West Germany, more people go to spiritualist meetings, where the dead are allegedly called up, than to church services. There are known Satanist churches in Munich and Dusseldorf, for instance. [1] There are many such churches in France, Britain, the U.S.A., and other countries as well.

In Great Britain there are thirty-five thousand practicing witches. American universities and even high schools offer courses in witchcraft, astrology, voodoo, magic, and ESP. In France forty thousand black masses are conducted annually.

Human beings may forsake God, but God has never forsaken His creatures. He sent into the world His only Son, Jesus Christ, to save the race of man. Incarnate love and compassion lived on earth in the life of a poor Jewish child, then of a humble carpenter, and eventually of a teacher of righteousness. Downtrodden man cannot save himself, any more than a drowning man can fetch himself out of the water. So Jesus, full of understanding for our inner conflicts, took upon Himself all our sins, including the sins of Marx and his followers, and bore the punishment for what we have done. He expiated our guilt by dying on a cross on Golgotha, after suffering the most terrible humiliation and agonizing pain.

Now we have His word that whoever puts faith in Him is forgiven and will live with Him in eternal paradise. Even notorious Marxists can be saved. It is worth noting that two Soviet Nobel prize winners, Boris Pasternak and Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn, both former Communists, after describing the extremities of crime to which Satanic Marxism leads, have confessed their faith in Christ. Svetlana Alliluyeva, the daughter of Stalin, the worst of the Marxist mass-murderers, also became a Christian.

Let us remember that Marx's ideal was to descend into the abyss of hell and draw all mankind in after him. Let us not follow him on this vicious path, but rather follow Christ who leads us upward to peaks of light, wisdom, and love, toward a heaven of unspeakable glory.

The Great Gulf

It is manifestly impossible to compare Jesus with Marx. Jesus belongs to an entirely different realm altogether.

Marx was human and probably a worshiper of the Evil One. Jesus is God and reduced Himself to the level of mankind in order to save it.

Marx proposed a human paradise. When the Soviets tried to implement it, the result was an inferno.

Jesus' kingdom is not of this world. It is a kingdom of love, righteousness, and truth. He calls to everyone, including Marxists and Satanists:

Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest (MTT 11:28).

All who believe in Him will have eternal life in His heavenly paradise.

There is no possibility of agreement between Christianity and Marxism, just as there can be no agreement between God and the Devil. Jesus came to destroy the works of the Evil One (1JN 3:8). As Christians follow Him, they strive to destroy Marxism while retaining love for the individual Marxist and trying to win him to Christ.

Some proclaim that they are Marxist Christians. They are either deceivers or are deceived. One cannot be a Marxist Christian any more than one can be a devil-worshiping Christian.

Over the years, the Satanist aims of Marxism have not changed one bit. The Marxist philosopher Ernst Bloch writes in his book ~Atheism in Christianity~ that the seduction of the first human couple by the serpent opens the way of salvation for mankind. So man starts to become a god; it is the way of rebellion. Priestcraft and the possessors of goods repressed this truth. The original sin consists in the fact that man does not wish to be like God. Man must conquer the power. The theology of revolution wills it that man should conquer the power of God. The world must be changed in the image of man. There should be no heaven at all. The belief in a personal God is the fall into sin. This fall must be repaired.

There is a gulf between Christianity and communism that can be bridged only in one sense: Marxists must abandon their devil-inspired teacher, repent of their sins, and become followers of Jesus Christ.

Marxists are concerned with social and political problems, but these will have to be solved outside the tenets of Marxism. For Marx, socialism was only a pretense. His aim was to ruin mankind for eternity, a diabolical plan. By way of contrast, Christ desires our eternal salvation.

In the fight between Christianity and communism, believers "wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places" (EPH 6:12).

Each of us has to choose not only between abstract good and abstract evil, but between God and Satan. Marx believed in God and hated Him. Even in his old age he worshiped Satan.

The average Marxist and the sympathizer of Marxism should not follow Marx in this spiritual aberration. Let us reject the bourgeois Marx, bearer of darkness, and Engels, factory owner and therefore, according to Marxist dogma, an exploiter. Let us rather choose the Light of the World and mankind's prime Benefactor, Jesus the working man, the Carpenter, the Savior, Lord of all.

"Proletarians of the World, Forgive me!"

That Marxist Satanism has ravaged the world is terrible. That it has penetrated high places in the church is unthinkable. Yet such is the case.

To give just one example, the late Pope John Paul I praised Giuseppe Carducci, an Italian university professor, as an example of a good teacher of youth. [2]

Who is the man recommended by no less than the Pope? Carducci became famous through his "Hymn to Satan," which begins: "My ardent verse is for Thee. I invoke you, Satan, king of the feast." It ends: "In holiness, incense and vows should ascend to thee, Satan. You have defeated Jehovah, the god of the priests." [3]

(I grant to this Pope that he might not have known whom he recommended, but it is wrong for a bishop to endorse an unknown.)

In 1949 a Soviet general said to a Catholic priest, Werenfried van Straaten, "We are Satan's elite, but you, are you God's elite?"

We must not remain silent about these matters.

We have seen in this book what length devil-worshipers are willing to go. May their dedication to evil be an incentive for us to behave like God's elect!

During the troubles in Poland in 1982, one could see mocking inscriptions on the walls. For example, "Marx said, Proletarians of the world, forgive me!" instead of the usual "Proletarians of the world, unite!"

I shuddered when I read these words.

It is said about Engels that he repented before his death. There is no such record about Marx. In 1983, many commemorated the centenary of his death. Might he have held this same commemoration in hell?

While writing this book, I have passed many a sleepless night, thinking of what Marx must endure viewing perhaps in hell the rivers of tears and blood that he has caused to flow.

Jesus told a story about a rich man in the eternal fire who expressed one ardent desire: his brethren should be warned not to end up in the same place of torment.

Does Marx also have the same desire that his followers should be warned not to walk in his footsteps leading to perdition?

Are the Polish people right when they have Marx say "... forgive me"? Does he indeed cry out from the fire - as it might truly be - "Send someone to my house, for I have many comrades, that he may testify to them, lest they also come to this place of torment"

(LUK 16:27, 28)?

The Soviet Communists did damage to their cause by disowning Stalin, who had become a popular idol. One can only speculate why they permitted such a reversal of policy, since it was certainly not in their best interests to remove Stalin's corpse from the mausoleum. Likewise, the Chinese Communists harmed their own cause by disowning Mao and jailing his wife.

Perhaps in the hidden depths of their souls, Soviet and Chinese Communist leaders felt what is now the burning desire of their former idols, who too late were remorseful about what they had done and taught.

As for me, I love every man, including Marxists and Satanists. If Marx and Engels and Moses Hess were alive today, my most ardent wish would be to bring them to Jesus Christ, who alone has the answer to man's ills and the remedy for his sins.

This is my wish for you, the reader. You have walked with me through the terrible pages of this book. Now I urge you to consider carefully your loyalties before it is too late. Abandon Satan and his evil cohorts. History proves he is never true to his own. Therefore, choose life and love and hope and heaven.

~Marxists and proletarians of the world, unite around Jesus Christ!~

p125 APPENDIX: Can Communism Be Christian? MARX & SATAN

A P P E N D I X

Marxist "Christian" Theology

Ernesto Cardenal is a Catholic priest who is a self-avowed Communist and was active in the Communist government of Nicaragua. He is also one of the most prominent exponents of so-called liberation theology, which exists within both Catholicism and Protestantism and seeks to blend Christianity with communism.

Here are a few excerpts from his book ~The Zero Hour~: A world of perfect Communism is the kingdom of God on earth. They are the same thing for me.... Through the Gospel I have arrived at revolution; not through Karl Marx, but through Christ. The Gospel caused me to become a Marxist.... I have the calling of a poet and prophet....

Castro told me that the qualities of a good revolutionist are also the qualities of a good priest.... Let us not forget that the first Christians were the best Christians, i.e., revolutionary and subversive Christians....

Marxism is the fruit of Christianity; without Christianity, Marxism would be impossible; Marx would be unthinkable without the prophets of the Old Testament. Changing the system of production, we can create the new man of the Gospel....

p126 APPENDIX: Can Communism Be Christian? MARX & SATAN

The Mexican Jesuit Jose Miranda says in his book ~Marx and the Bible~ that the Ten Commandments are Marxist, even the first commandment, to love God. For him, to love Jehovah above all means to love justice.... If the church ever asserted anything else, it was a monstrosity.

I believe that the Communists, too, belong to the church. I believe the true church includes many who don't perceive themselves as Christians, even those who consider themselves atheists. Many of these belong more to the church than some who sit in the Roman Curia.

Since Constantine, the church has always gone to bed with the state. If Christians and Marxists would read each other's writings, there would be no conflicts any more between Christians and Socialism.... It seems to me that worker-priests and revolutionists - the most progressive part of the church - are inspired directly by the Holy Ghost.

For me the God of the Bible is also the God of Marxism-Leninism.... The apostle John says, "No one has seen God." What the atheist Marxists say is very much akin to what Saint John says: "No one has seen God."

Another writer quotes Cardenal as follows:

I am above all a revolutionist and as such fight for a Socialist country which is in the course of passing through a dictatorship of the proletariat, in which surely it cannot show itself feeble toward the enemies of its fatherland, not even in moments when one comes to the point of having to execute men for this purpose. [1]

It is self-evident that a man who thinks like this has no trouble praising the regime in Cuba as a model of liberty.

Liberation theology is not an isolated phenomenon.

It is the by-product of a general tendency to synthesize Marxism and Christianity; it is also seen in various forms of compromise in politics, art, economics, and so on.

Two Jews, Bernstein and Schwartz, composed the musical ~The Mass~ for the inauguration of the John Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts in Washington in 1971. In it, during the singing of the Kyrie Eleison, the Gloria, and the Credo, a band of singers and dancers howl their doubts:

God made us the boss;
God gave us the cross.
We turned it into a sword
To spread the word of the Lord.
We use his holy decrees
To do whatever we please. Yeah.

Give us peace that we don't keep on breaking.
Give us something or we'll just start taking.
We're fed up with your heavenly silence,
And we only get action with violence.

The "Christian" multimillionaires present at the concert cheered. Their wives, appareled in slit skirts and decollete bodices, bejeweled and befurred, joined in the applause. The music is now standard repertoire.

I can understand men like the priest Cardenal. There is a ring of truth in the feeling he expresses of solidarity with the Communists, who appear to him as champions of the cause of the poor - always near to the heart of Christians.

In the Bible Job is called a righteous man. He describes to his dubious friends the program of his life:

... I delivered the poor that cried, and the fatherless, and him that had none to help him.... I was a father to the poor: and the cause which I knew not I searched out. And I broke the jaws of the wicked, and plucked the spoil out of his teeth (JOB 29:12, 16, 17).

These words could be uttered by any revolutionist. Job continues:

Did not I weep for him that was in trouble? Was not my soul grieved for the poor? (JOB 30:25). If I did despise the cause of my manservant or of my maidservant, when they contended with me, what then shall I do when God riseth up? (JOB 31:13,14).

True believers have always reacted like this.

Cardenal's assertion that "the church has always gone to bed with the state" is untrue. For example, the war of secession in the U.S.A., which led to the abolition of slavery, was influenced by ~Uncle Tom's Cabin~, written by a Christian lady, Harriet Beecher Stowe. She said simply, "The Lord wrote it."

During a Communion service she had a vision of an old slave being beaten to death by a white ruffian. This became the story of Uncle Tom's flogging. The book was a stick of dynamite driven into the foundations of slavery.

Charles Spurgeon, the greatest Baptist preacher of the last century, was also an ardent fighter against slavery. He wrote, "If slavery is not wrong, nothing is wrong." Wilberforce, a Christian and a capitalist, caused slavery to be abolished in the British Empire long before America's Civil War. Lincoln, also a Christian, issued the Emancipation Proclamation that freed the slaves in the USA.

The theology of liberation, which ignores these facts, is widely urged in the Third World. Its theoreticians can call themselves Christian only because of the chaos in thinking prevalent in the church at this moment.

According to the July 28, 1949 decree of the Holy Office of the Roman Catholic Church, the following categories of Catholics are to be excommunicated:

Whosoever belongs to the Communist Party;
Whosoever makes propaganda for it in any way;
Whosoever votes for it and its candidates;
Whosoever writes for the Communist press, reads and spreads it;
Whosoever remains a member in a Communist organization;
Whosoever confesses the materialistic and anti-Christian teaching of atheist Communism;
Whosoever defends and spreads it.
This punishment applies also to parties that make common cause with Communism.

Many of the revolutionist theologians belong only formally to the Catholic Church, and yet have a great influence among believers. In the Orthodox churches, too, there exists a tendency to exploit, for the benefit of communism, the spiritual energies that religion awakens and channels.

Liberation theologians proclaim an earthly paradise. Communism is this paradise, capitalism its foe. The church no longer waits for the coming of Jesus in the clouds of heaven. The triumph of communism will be equated with His coming. This explains why in Communist countries the God-hating Communist government has paid the clergy.

It needs to be said that among both Catholics and Orthodox, there are also bishops who fear absorption into earthly pursuits and seek rather a deeper spiritual life. Not all have bowed to Baal.

As for Protestants, in hearings before the U.S.A. House Committee on Un-American Activities on February 26, 1966, Richard Arens, general counsel to the Committee, declared:

Thus far, in the leadership of the National Council of Churches, we have found over 100 persons in leadership capacity with either Communist-front records or records of services in Communist causes. The aggregate affiliations of the leadership is in the thousands.

And the World Council of Churches for years has subsidized Communist guerrillas in Africa.

The Catholic Gustavo Gutierrez wrote in ~The Theology of Liberation~: "The church must place itself squarely within the process of revolution." The Lutheran theologian Dorothee Soelle, founder of ~Christians for Socialism~, wrote: "We are at the beginning of a new chapter in Christian history. It will not be written without Karl Marx."

These are the facts, open and uncontested, about what is happening in the church universal.

We did not heed the warning of the Lord to beware of wolves in sheep's clothing. If the clothing speaks to us about doing good to mankind, we get hooked, forgetting that the worst of men can speak beautiful things.

German Socialists in 1907 opened their convention with Luther's hymn, "A Mighty Fortress," replacing "God" with "Socialist League." Some revolutionist groups practiced baptism. One called for a new Communion service at which the pastor would proclaim, "This is the body of the bread which the rich owe to the poor." Revolutionist groups spoke of "the holy Communist church," "the egalitarian church outside of which there is no salvation." Their "Lord's Prayer" said, "No masters and no servants - Amen. Money and property shall be abolished" (see James Billington, ~Fire in the Minds of Men~, Basic Books, 1985).

The Devil disguises himself as an angel of light. When the Communists came to power, unprecedented slaughters followed, which eclipse even Hitler's Holocaust.

Clergymen who had been on the side of communism also became its victims. If communism would conquer the countries of the Third World, the theologians of liberation would sit in jail together with those who opposed this ideology.

Perfect Communism: Kingdom of God on Earth?

Cardenal says, "Communism and the kingdom of God are the same thing for me."

The word "communism" in itself is vague. It is taken to mean only an economic system in which everyone will work according to his abilities and will receive according to his needs. There will be no state, no division of the world into countries, and no social classes, because the means of production will belong to all mankind.

Suppose this could be attained - where is God in the picture? Why should this be equated with the kingdom of God? A society of unbelievers, even of men who hate and scorn God, could choose or be forced to live in such a state.

Scripture says that when the kingdom is the Lord's, "All the ends of the world shall remember and turn unto the Lord: and all the kindreds of the nations shall worship before thee" (PSA 22:27).

The kingdom of God will not be a stateless society. The people of the saints of the Most High will have dominion over it (DAN 7:27).

It is not a kingdom brought about by a political party, but by Jesus, the Son of man (MTT 16:28).

Obviously, there will be none of the evils that plague society now, such as war, famine, pestilence, pollution, injustice, exploitation, racism, etc. The kingdom of God will be one of righteousness, peace, love, joy, and the right to possess one's own mansion and garden (JHN 14:2).

Father Cardenal, who claims that he is a prophet, must know what his Biblical predecessor Micah said: "In the last days ... they shall sit every man under ~his~ vine and under ~his~ fig tree" (MIC 4:1, 4). The prophet Isaiah reinforces this idea: "They shall not build, and another inhabit; they shall not plant, and another eat" (ISA 65:22). Thus, Scripture endorses the notion of private ownership.

What would perfect communism look like in reality? Perfection as we humans experience it is the ultimate achievement of years of practice - in the field of sports, music, typing, or skills of any sort. A violinist perfects his performance of a Beethoven concerto by practicing his violin. A baseball pitcher achieves success by refining his technique through intensive, persistent effort.

Perfect communism, described as economic liberation, freedom, peace, and justice, could be attained only through the practice of such policies in the society it hopes to benefit.

But in actual experience Communists have jailed,

p133 APPENDIX: Can Communism Be Christian? MARX & SATAN

tortured, and terrorized hundreds of millions of people for almost seventy years. How could such practice result in a just, mild, and loving society?

Christian communism is a utopian impossibility, a nightmare of exploitation. The theology of revolution is patent absurdity, a contradiction in terms.

What fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness? and what communion hath light with darkness? And what concord hath Christ with Belial? or what part hath he that believes with an infidel? (2CO 6:14, 15).

"You cannot serve God ~and~ mammon," said Jesus. Choose you this day whom you will serve.

p134 blank

p135 NOTES MARX & SATAN

Abbreviations used in these notes include:

Marx, Karl and Engels, Friedrich, ~Historisch-kritisch Gesamtausgabe. Werke, Schriften, Briefe (Complete Historical Critical Edition. Works, Writings, Letters)~, on behalf of the Marx-Engels Institute, Moscow, published by David Rjazanov

(Frankfurt-am-Main: Marx-Engels Archiv, 1927), indicated as "MEGA."

Marx, Karl and Engels, Friedrich. ~Werke~. (Works) (Berlin: Dietz-Verlag, 1974), indicated as "MEW." The volume number is in Roman numerals, the page number in Arabic numerals.
Marx, Karl and Engels, Friedrich. ~Collected Works~ (New York: International Publishers, 1974), indicated as "CW."

Chapter 1

1. Karl Marx und Friedrich Engels, ~Zur Kritik der Hegelschen Rechts-philosophie (Critique of the Hegelian Philosophy of Law)~, Introduction 1, i (1), MEGA, pp. 607, 608.
2. Rev. Paul Oestreicher, ~Sermons from Great St. Mary's~ (London:Fontana, 1968), pp. 278-280.
3. Karl Marx, ~Die Vereinigung der Gl„ubigen mit Christo (The Union of the Faithful with Christ), Werke (Works)~ (MEW), Supplement, I, p. 600.
4. Karl Marx, ~Betrachtung eines Junglings bie der Wahl eines Berufes (Considerations of a Young Man on Choosing His Career)~, in ibid., p. 594. See also Payne, Robert, ~Marx~ (New York: Simon & Schuster, 1968), p. 34.
5. Karl Marx, ~Archiv fur die Geschichte des Sozialismus und der Arbeiterbewegung (Archives for the History of Socialism and the Workers' Movement)~, MEGA, I, i (2), pp. 182, 183.

6. Karl Marx, "Des Verzweiflenden Gebet" ("Invocation of One in Despair"), ibid, p. 30.
7. Ibid., pp. 30, 31.
8. Quoted in ~Deutsche Tagespost~, West Germany, December 31, 1982.
9. Bakunin, ~Works~, Vol. III (Berlin, 1924), p. 306.
10. Karl Marx, "Spielmann" ("The Player"), op. cit., ~Deutsche Tagespost~, pp. 57, 58.
11. Karl Marx, ~Oulanem~, Act 1, Scene 1, in ibid., p. 60.
12. Ibid., Act 1, Scene 2, p. 63.
13. Ibid., Act 1, Scene 3, p. 68.
14. Karl Marx, ~Louis Bonaparte~ (The 18th Brumaire), MEW, VIII, p. 119.
15. MEW, I, p. 344; I, p. 380; XXVII, p. 190; VI, p. 234.
16. Quoted in B. Brecht, ~Works~, Vol. I (Frankfurt, 1979), p. 651.
17. Op. cit., Marx, ~Oulanem~.
18. Ibid.

19. MEW, XXX, p. 359.
20. Paul Goma, ~Piteshti~.

Chapter 2

1. Karl Marx, letter of November 10, 1837 to his father, MEW, XXX, p. 218.
2. Ibid., Heinrich Marx, letter of February 10, 1838 to Karl Marx, p. 229.
3. Ibid., Heinrich Marx, letter of March 2, 1837 to Karl Marx, p. 203.
4. Ibid., Karl Marx, "Hegel," pp. 41, 42.
5. Quoted in ~Deutsche Tagespost~, West Germany, December 31, 1982.
6. Op. cit., MEW, XXX, Karl Marx, "Das Bleiche Madchen" ("The Pale Maiden"), pp. 55-57.
7. Mllern-Sch”nhausen, ~The Solution of the Riddle, Adolf Hitler~.
8. Op. cit., MEW, III, Karl Marx, ~Ueber die Differenz der Demokritischen und Epikureischen Naturphilosophie Vorrede (The Difference Between Democritus' and Epicurus' Philosophy of Nature~, Foreword), p. 10.
9. Jenny von Westphalen, ~Mohr und General, Erinnerungen an Marx und Engels (The Moor and the General, Remembrances about Marx and Engels)~ (Berlin: Dietz-Verlag, 1964), pp. 273, 274.
10. Op. cit., Payne, p. 317.
11. Ibid.
12. Karl Marx, ~Die Rheinische Zeitung (Rhine Newspaper)~, "Der Kommunismus und die Augsburger Allgemeine Zeitung (Conmunism and the Augsburger Allgemeine Newspaper)," MEGA, I, i (1), p. 263.

13. Moses Hess, letter of September 2, 1841 to Berthold Auerbach, MEGA, I, i (2), p. 261.
14. Ibid., Georg Jung, letter of October 18, 1841 to Arnold Ruge, pp. 261, 262.
15. Karl Marx, ~Zur Kritik der Hegelschen Rechtsphilosophie Einleitung (Critique of the Hegelian Philosophy of Law),~ Introduction, MEGA I, i (1), p. 614.
16. MEW, I, p. 372.
17. Ibid., p. 386.
18. Hans Enzensberger, Gespr„che mit Marx und Engels (Conversations with Marx and Engels)~ (Frankfurt-am-Main: Insel Verlag, 1973), p. 17.
19. James Hastings, ~Encyclopaedia of Religion and Ethics~, Vol. XI (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1921), p. 756.

20. Mikhail Bakunin, ~God and the State~ (New York:
Dover Publications, 1970), p. 112.
21. Roman Gul, ~Dzerjinskii~, published by the author in Russian (Paris, 1936), p. 81.
22. Op. cit., Enzensberger, p. 407.
23. Pierre-Joseph Proudhon, ~Philosophie de la MisŠre
(The Philosophy of Misery)~ (Paris: Union G,n,rale d'Editions, 1964), pp. 199, 200.
24. Ibid., pp. 200, 201.
25. Paul Garus, ~History of the Devil~ (East Brunswick, N.J.: Bell Publishing Co.), p. 435.
26. Heinrich Heine, ~Works~, Vol. I, p. LXIV.
27. Charles Boyer, ~The Philosophy of Communisn~
(10: "The Political Atheism of Communism" by Igino Giordani)
(New York: Fordham University Press, 1952), p. 134.
28. Op. cit., Marx, "Spielmann," pp. 57, 58.
29. Jerry Rubin, ~Do It~ (New York: Simon & Schuster, 1970),
p. 249.
30. Karl Marx, "Menschenstolz" ("Human Pride"),
MEGA, I, i (2), p. 50.
31. Ibid., Karl Marx, letter of November 10, 1837 to his father,
p. 219.
32. Ibid., Georg Jung, letter of October 18, 1841 to Arnold Ruge,
pp. 261, 262.
33. Arnold Kunzli, ~Karl Marx, Eine Psychographie (Karl Marx, a Psychogram)~ (Zurich: Europa Verlag, 1966).
34. David Rjazanov, ~Karl Marx: Man, Thinker and Revolutionist
(Karl Marx als Denker, Mensch und Revolution„r)~
(New York: International Publishers, 1927).
35. Rolv Heuer, ~Genie und Reichtum (Genius and Riches)~
(Vienna: Bertelsmann Sachbuchverlag, 1971), pp. 167, 168.
36. Karl Marx, letter of February 27, 1852 to Friedrich Engels, MEW, XXVIII, p. 30.
37. Ibid., Friedrich Engels, letter of March 2, 1852 to Karl Marx, p. 33.

38. Ibid., Karl Marx, letter of March 8, 1855 to Friedrich Engels, p. 438.
39. Karl Marx, letter of December 2, 1863 to Friedrich Engels, MEW, XXX, p. 376.

Chapter 3

1. Franz Mehring, ~Karl Marx - Geschichte seines Lebens (Karl Marx - Story of His Life) (Berlin: Dietz-Verlag, 1964),
pp. 99, 100.

2. Ibid., p. 97.
3. Ibid., p. 100.
4. Bruno Bauer, letter of December 6, 1841 to Arnold Ruge, MEGA, I, 1 (2), p. 263.
5. A. Melskii, ~Evangelist Nenavisti (The Evangelist of Hate, Life of Karl Marx)~ (Berlin: Za Pravdu Publishing House, 1933, in Russian), p. 48.
6. Friedrich Engels, ~Dialektik der Natur, Einleitung (Dialectics of Nature, Introduction)~, MEW, XX, p. 312.
7. Friedrich Engels, poem probably written in early 1837. MEGA, I, ii, p. 465.
8. Ibid., Friedrich Engels, letter of July 1839 to the Graber brothers, p. 531.
9. Friedrich Engels, ~Schelling und die Offenbarung (Schelling and Revelation)~, MEGA, pp. 247-249.
10. Karl Marx and Frederich Engels, ~Selected Works~ (London: Lawrence and Wishart, 1958), p. 52.
11. Ossip Flechtheim, ~The Communist Party of Germany in the Weimar Republic (Offenbach, 1948).
12. Op. cit., Knzli, p. 187.
13. Bertram Wolfe, ~Marxism - One Hundred Years in the Life of a Doctrine~ (New York: The Dial Press, 1965), p. 32.
14. Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels, ~The Russian Menace to Europe~ (Glencoe: The Free Press, 1952), p. 63.
15. Quoted in op. cit., Wolfe, ~Marxism~.
16. Engels, MEW, VI, p. 176.
17. ~Deutschland Magazine~, February 1985.
18. Quoted by Nathaniel Weyl, ~Karl Marx: Racist~ (New Rochelle, N.Y.:Arlington House).
19. Karl Marx, MEW, XXXV, p. 122.
20. Chushichi Tsuzuki, ~The Life of Eleanor Marx~ (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1967), p. 85.
21. Frederick Tatford, ~The Prince of Darkness~ (Eastbourne: Bible and Advent Testimony Movement, 1967).

Chapter 4

1. Sergius Martin Riis, ~Karl Marx, Master of Fraud~ (New York: Robert Speller, 1962), p. 11.

2. Edgar Marx, letter of March 31, 1854 to Karl Marx, MEW, II, p. 18.
3. Jenny Marx, letter (dated after August 11, 1844) to Karl Marx, MEW, Suppl. Vol. I, p. 652.
4. Franz Mehring, ~Karl Marx - The Story of His Life~ (New York: Covici, Friede, 1935), p. 18.

5. Op. cit., Mehring, p. 32.
6. Karl Marx, letter of May 20, 1882 to Friedrich Engels, MEW, XXXV, p. 65.
7. Walter Kaufmann, ~Hegel~
   (Garden City: Doubleday, 1965), p. 288.
8. V. Illitch Lenin, ~Complete Works~
   (Moscow: Political Literature Publishing House, 1964, in Russian), Vol. 48, pp. 226, 227.
9. Ibid., Vol. 45, p. 86.
10. Ibid., Vol. 54, pp. 86, 87.
11. "Budilnik," Russia, No. 48, of 1883.
    Quoted in ~The New Review~, New York: 140/1980, p. 276.

Chapter 5

1. George Katkov, ~The Trial of Bukharin~
   (London: B. T. Batsford, Ltd., 1969), 1, p. 29.
2. Roy Medvedev, ~Let History Judge~
   (New York: Alfred Knopf, 1971), p. 183.
3. F. J. Raddatz, ~Karl Marx~ (Berlin, 1925), p. 32.
4. Boris Souvarine, ~Stalin~.
5. MEW, XXVII, p. 292.
6. Milovan Djilas, ~Strange Times~, "Kontinent," 33, p. 25.
7. Ibid
8. Svetlana Alliluyeva, ~Twenty Letters to a Friend~
   (London: Hutchinson, 1967), pp. 64ff.
9. Paloczy Horvath, ~Stalin~ (Germany: Bertelmannsverlag).
10. Abdurakhman Avtorkhanov, ~Criminals in Bolshevism~
    (Frankfurt-am-Main: Possev Verlag, in Russian),
    Grani No. 89-90, pp. 324, 325.
11. Abdurakhman Avtorkhanov, ~The Provenience of Partocracy~ (Frankfurt-am-Main: Possev Verlag, 1973, in Russian),
    pp. 198-201.
12. ~Express~, Paris, October 6, 1979.
13. ~Tempo~, Italy, November 1, 1979.
14. P. Underwood, ~The Vampires Bedside Companion~ (Frewin).
15. H. Knaust, ~The Testament of Evil~.
16. Manfred Zach, ~Mao Tse-tung~
    (Esslingen: Bechtle Verlag, 1969), p. 13.
17. Aleksandr I. Solzhenitsyn, ~The Gulag Archipelago~
    (New York: Harper & Row, 1973), Vol. I-II, p. 173.
18. MEW, V, p. 457.
19. Ibid., XXXI, p. 191; XXV, p. 179.
20. Ibid., Vl, p. 283; VI, p. 286; VI, p. 279.
21 Lenin, ~Collected Works~, Vol, 32, p. 281.
22. ~Russkaia Misl (Russian Thought)~,
    Paris, March 13, 1975, in Russian.

23. Rev. Dr. I. Nahyewsky. "Spomyny Polovoho Dykhovnyka," ~America~, October 7, 1982, Vol. LXXI, No. 176, pp. 4, 18.
24. V. Ilyich Lenin, ~Military Correspondence~
(Moscow, 1954), p. 148.
25. Trotsky, ~Stalin~, quoted in ~Novii Journal~, 158, p. 85.
26. Pierre Daix, ~Picasso, the Man and His Work~
(Paris: Somogy), p. 8.
27. Ibid., pp. 188-190.
28. Alister Crowley, ~The Book of Thoth~
(Berkeley: Koshmarin Press, 1904), p. 97.
29. Ibid., pp. 134, 135.
30. Ibid., p. 137.
31. ~Sovietskaia Molodioj (Soviet Youth)~, Moscow, February 14, 1976, in Russian. "Let Thy Kingdom Be Destroyed," p. 4.
32. ~Rhein-Neckar Zeitung (Rhine-Neckar Newspaper)~, Heidelberg,
February 5, 1968. "Kultusminister antwortet Studentenpfarrer" ("Minister of Cults Answers Youth Pastor").
33. ~Paris-Match~, December 10, 1982.

Chapter 6

1. ~Kommunism Uzvara (Victory of Communism)~, Riga, April 1974, in Lithuanian.
2. Anatolij Levitin-Krasnov, ~B”se Jahre (Evil Years)~
(Lucerne: Rex-Verlag, 1977), pp. 144, 145.
3. ~Prasvoslavnaia Rus (Orthodox Russia)~, San Francisco,
No. 20,1977, in Russian, "Satanist Worshippers," pp. 9-12.
4. D. Bacu, ~Piteshti~ (Madrid: Colectia Dacoromania, 1963, in Romanian), pp. 71, 187.
5. ~Cuvantul Romanesc~, Canada, February 1980.
6. Hermann Hartfeld, ~Irina~
(Chappaqua, N.Y.: Christian Herald Books, 1981).
7. ~Theories of Surplus Value~, p. 375.
8. A. Reghelson, ~The Tragedy of the Russian Church~.
9. ~Catacombes~, France, September 1980.
10. Salu Ndebele, ~Guerrilla for Christ~
(Old Tappan, N.J.: Fleming H. Revell), pp. 9, 10.
11. ~Impact~, Switzerland, February 1981.
12. "Chronicle of the Lithuanian Catholic Church," No. 44, 1981.
13. Priest Dudko, ~O Nashem Upovanti (About Our Hope)~
(Paris: YMCA Press, 1975, in Russian), p. 51.
14. Igor Shafarevitch, ~La Legislation sur la Religlon en URSS (Religious Legislation in the USSR)~
(Paris: Seuil, 1974, in French), pp. 67-71.
15. Sheila Ostrander and Lynn Schroder, ~Psychic Discoveries Behind the Iron Curtain~

(Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice Hall, 1970).
16. ~Novie Russkoie Slovo (New Russian Language)~,
New York, July 30, 1975, in Russian,
"Para-Psychology in the USSR," p. 2.
17. MEW, Il, p. 9.

18. Bakunin, ~Works~, Vol. III, p. 206.
19. Quoted in Arnold Kunzli, ~Karl Marx, a Psychography~
(Vienna, 1966), p. 403.
20. MEW, XXVII, p. 107.
21. MEW, XXXII, p. 351.
22. Konrad Low, ~Why Communism Fascinate~s
(Germany: Deutscher Institute Verlag, 1983).
23. ~Christian News~, March 4, 1985.

Chapter 7

1. Montgomery Hyde, ~Stalin~
(London: Rupert Hart-Davis), pp. 28, 29.
2. Karl Markus Michel, ~Politische Katechismen: Volney, Kleist, Hess (Political Doctrines: Volney, Kleist, Hess)~
(Frankfurt-am-Main: Insel Verlag, 1966);
Moses Hess, ~Red Catechism~ for the German People~, pp. 71-73.
3. Hess, letter of September 2, 1841 to Berthold Auerbach,
MEGA, I, i (2), p. 261.
4. Jung, letter of October 18, 1841 to Arnold Ruge, ihd.
5. Moses Hess, ~Rome and Jerusalem~
(New York: Philosophical Library, 1958), p. 10.
6. Ibid., p. 15.
7. Moses Hess, ~Ausgew„hlte Schriften (Selected Works),
Rome and Jerusalem~ (Cologne: Melzer-Verlag, 1962), p. 229.
8. Ibid., p. 18.
9. Ibid., p. 27.
10. Hess, ~Ausgewahlte Schriften~, ibid., pp. 236, 237.
11. Ibid., p. 308.
12. Ibid., p. 243.
13. Ibid., p. 324.
14. ~Kommunistisches Bekenntnis in Fragen und Antworten (Communist Credo in Questions and Answers)~, ibid., p. 190.
15. ~Die Eine und Ganze Freiheit
(The One and Only Total Freedom)~ ibid., p. 149.
16. ~Philosophie der Tat
(The Philosophy of Action)~, ibid., p. 138.
17. Edmund Silberner, ~Moses Hess~ (Leiden: Brill, 1966), p. 31.
18. Ibid., p. 32.
19. Ibid., p. 121.

20. Ibid., p. 421.
21. Op. cit., Dudko, p. 53.
22. Op. cit., Silberner, p. 421.
23. Ibid.
24. Ibid., p. 418.
25. Moses Hess, ~Philosophische Sozialistische Schriften, 13, Ueber das Geldwesen (Philosophical Socialist Writings. About the Monetary System) (Berlin: Akademie-Verlag, 1961, p. 345.

26. Hess, ~Rome and Jerusalem~, ibid., p. 44.
27. Ibid., p. 10.
28. Moses Hess, ~Briefwechsel (Correspondence)~, letter of December 9, 1863 to Lassalle (The Hague: Mouton & Co., 1959), p. 459.
29. Karl Marx, ~Das Kapital (The Capital)~, MEX, XXIII, p. 779.
30. G. W. F. Hegel, ~Werke. Fragment ber Volksreligion and Christentum Works. Fragment on Popular Religious Beliefs and Christianity)~ (Frankfurt-am-Main: Suhrkamp Verlag, 1971), 1, pp. 35, 36.
31. U. Steklov, ~M. A. Bakunin, His Life and Activity~ (Moscow: Literature Publishing House, 1937), Vol. 3, p. 435.
32. Quoted from ~The Catechism of the Revolutionist~ by Dostoievsky in his ~Complete Works~, Vol. 12, p. 194.
33. Ibid., ~The Demons~, Vol. 10, p. 312.
34. Ibid., p. 322.
35. Ibid., p. 324.
36. Volodin, ~Tchernishevsky, or Netchaiev~ (Moscow: Koriakin and Pleeman, 1976), p. 247.
37. V Burtsev, ~During 100 Years: Compendium of the History of Political and Social Movements in Russia~ (London, 1897), p. 94.
38. Op. cit., Volodin, p. 223.
39. E. S. Vilenskaia, ~Revolutionist Underground in Russia~ (Moscow, 1965), p. 398.
40. Volodin, loc. cit.
41. Tchernishevsky, ~Complete Works~ (Moscow, 1939), Vol. 1, p. 8.
42. Russkaia Misl, November 17, 1983.
43. Op. cit., Volodin, p. 155.
44. P. F. De Villemarest, ~Les Pourvoyeurs du Goulag (Gulag Overseers) (Geneva: Famot, 1976, in French), Vol. III, pp. 233ff.

Chapter 8

1. Dr. Lawrence Pazder, ~Michelle Remembers~
(New York: Condon & Littes, 1982).
2. ~Selections from Nietzsche~ (New York: Viking, 1954), p. 600.
3. ~Weekly World News~, February 2, 1983.
4. ~Iuni Kommunist~, Moscow, December 1984.
5. David Rjazanov, ~Karl Marx als Denker, Mensch und Revolution„r (Karl Marx: Man, Thinker and Revolutionist)~
(Vienna: Verlag fr Literatur und Politik, 1928), pp. 149, 150.
6. Op. cit., Knzli p. 352.
7. Moshe Glickson, ~The Jewish Complex of Karl Marx~
(New York: Herzl Press, Pamphlet No. 20, 1961), p. 40.
8. Op. cit., Knzli, p. 361.
9. Ibid., pp. 323, 373.
10. Karl Marx, letter of January 16, 1861 to Lassalle, MEW, XXX, p. 578.

11. Op. cit., Payne, p. 306.
12. William Tyndale, ~Works~ (Parker So., 1849), quoted by the ~Oxford English Dictionary~
(Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1933), Vol. III, p. 735
13. William Shakespeare, ~Complete Works~
(Glenview: Scott, Foresman, 1973),
~Midsummer Night's Dream~, Act 11, Scene 1, 33-34, p. 189.
14. ~Svenska Dagbladet (Swedish Daily News)~, Stockholm, January 17, 1948, "An Unforgettable Night," by Alexei Stjusev, in Swedish.

Chapter 9

1. Op. cit., Solzhenitsyn, Vol. III-IV, p. 10.
2. ~Nauka I Religia (Science and Religion)~,
Moscow, December 1976, in Russian, Vol. 12, pp. 73-76.

Chapter 10

1. ~Idea~, June 3,1983.
2. ~Osservatore Romano~, September 17,1978.
3. Quoted in Gerhard Zacharias,
~The Cult of Satan and the Black Mass~.

Appendix

1. INF of ~Aide a'l' Eglise en D,tress~, April-June 1980.

The End of "MARX & SATAN"

My Answer To The Moscow Atheists

Richard Wurmbrand
Copyright 1975

TABLE OF CONTENTS

TOPIC: PAGE

THE ATHEISTS' HANDBOOK.....5
THE REASONABLENESS OF ATHEISM..... 8
THE UNREASONABLENESS OF ATHEISM.....13
THE WRONG PERSPECTIVE OF MOSCOW'S BIBLE.....17
WHO ARE OUR OPPONENTS?..... 21
THE DIFFICULTY OF BEING AN ATHEIST..... 30
THE DEFINITION OF RELIGION..... 34
THE ORIGIN OF RELIGION..... 39
THE ORIGIN OF CHRISTIANITY..... 42
ROMAN AUTHORS ABOUT CHRISTIANITY..... 43
THE WITNESS OF THE GOSPELS..... 48
ARGUMENTS AGAINST THE EARLY ORIGIN OF THE GOSPELS.....54
THE MESSAGE OF THE NEW TESTAMENT..... 55
IRREVERENT ATTACKS AGAINST THE BIBLE..... 63
DID THE CHARACTERS IN THE BIBLE REALLY EXIST?.....70
THE DELIVERY OF THE JEWS FROM EGYPTIAN SLAVERY..... 79
CONTRADICTIONS IN THE BIBLE.....83
DOES CHRISTIANITY TEACH SERVILITY TOWARDS TYRANNICAL AUTHORITIES?...90
HEAVENLY OR AN EARTHLY PARADISE.....98
IS THERE A GOD?....103
WHO IS GOD?.....109
LOOK TO JESUS OF NAZARETH.....123
THE CREATION.....126
GOD IS.....127
PROPHECY.....135
PROPHECIES ABOUT THE JEWISH PEOPLE.....137
PROPHECIES ABOUT THE LATTER DAYS.....143
WHO MADE GOD?.....147
LIFE AFTER DEATH...152
SCIENCE AND RELIGION.....164
ATONEMENT.....186

[What follows is from the book itself.]

page 5 My Answer to Moscow's Atheists

Wherever people know how to write, they have a holy book.

The Communist world also has its Bible. It is called The Atheist's Handbook. It was first issued by Moscow's Academy of Science in 1961 (State publishing house for political science), as the collective work of a great number of specialists, such as the historians Beliaiev and Belinova and the philosophers Tchanishev, Elshina, and Emeliah. Its final redactor is the university professor, S. Kovalev. It has been reprinted many times since publication.

This book, which is a summary of atheistic creeds, has been translated into many languages and widely distributed in other socialist countries. From the primary grades through college, on radio and television, in films, and at atheistic rallies, the ideas contained in this book are propagated. And when an atheist dies, the funeral speech, in line with the teaching of the Communist Bible, assures his broken-hearted family that the dead are dead for ever, that there is no comfort for the bereaved, that those separated now will never more be reunited, that there is no God and no such thing as eternal life.

The primary purpose of the book is to show that there is no God.

We could answer very simply with a question. If there is no God, how is it that sheep exist?

The question was actually raised at an atheistic meeting in Russia. The lecturer had explained that life appeared spontaneously and developed through natural selection, and that in the cruel fight for survival only the animals which were stronger or quicker than their neighbours survived, while the weaker succumbed.

page 6 My Answer to Moscow's Atheists

A believer asked, "But how is it that sheep survived, that they were not utterly destroyed by wolves? The female wolf produces five or six offspring a year, the sheep only one. The ratio is 5:1 for the destroyer, which has sharp teeth, claws, strength and swiftness in running.

The sheep has absolutely no defence. How is it that there still are sheep? Today man protects them. The animal world existed before man appeared. Who protected the sheep at that time? You can explain many things without resorting to the hypothesis that God exists. But sheep with four legs could not exist without him, any more than Christ's loving sheep, who have been defenceless against cruel persecutor's since the beginning of church."

The answer which this believer got was a few years in Soviet prisons.

The atheist book could get a very simple answer also on the subject of Christ.

At a party of Soviet intellectuals, Shakespeare was being discussed. Someone quoted Lady Macbeth's words after she had murdered King Duncan in his sleep. Looking at her blood-stained hands, she exclaims, "Out, damned spot! Out, I say."

A Christian put the question, "What are the possibilities of a Lady Macbeth being cleansed of her burden of guilt?" One Communist answered, "Man is a reasonable being. A proper education and good advice even at the last minute would have kept her from her ugly deed." The reply was of no help. Lady Macbeth had committed the murder, and philosophizing about the education she should have had was useless. Another Communist said, "I believe that murderers should get the death penalty." This proposal, too, was useless, because a man sentenced to death still dies with the consciousness of guilt. A third Communist assured those present that in the future happy Socialist society there would be no kings, no selfish ambitions to be gratified, no need or desire to commit crimes. But the Communist society exists nowhere.

The believer then said, "The solution of the Bible remains the only valid one: The blood of Jesus Christ cleanses us from all sins."

But we cannot stop with such simple answers. Members of an Academy of Science have written over six hundred pages to prove that religion in general, and Christianity in particular, is false. Let us try to understand them and to answer all the points they raise. It is a duty of courtesy and love to accept the challenge.

The atheist's Bible is boring. In fact, it could not be otherwise. Nobody can be eloquent for atheism. Atheism is a denial. Who can write enthusiastically about a negation? Who can address a sonnet to a negation, or dedicate a concerto to a negation, or sculpture a negation? Religion has inspired symphonies, paintings, statues, poetry. Atheism, by its very nature, could never have this impact. Atheism has no wings.

According to its own doctrine, men are only dust and shadow - mere matter. What impetus has matter to destroy religion? Can matter enlist passion in the fight for an ideal when ideals, not being matter, are by definition nothing?

Moscow's Bible also uses deceptive methods and a violence of speech which does not suit an Academy of Science well.

We propose to avoid as much as possible the tedium of pseudo-scientific arguments. We will respond, even in the face of irony and slander, with the sweetness of love.

We can afford to take this attitude because good anvils do not fear the blows of many hammers. In Paris there is monument to the Huguenots showing an anvil and a number of broken hammers, with the inscription, "Hammer away, ye hostile bands. Your hammers break; God's anvil stands."

page 8 My Answer to Moscow's Atheists

We can take this attitude because we ourselves sift our thoughts with severity and consider it an advantage to be criticized. It is to the detriment of atheism in Communist countries that it imposes a dictatorship. How can one who doesn't bear criticism know he is right?

In all the Christian countries of the West, atheism has full liberty for its propaganda. Christianity has not the slightest reason to fear it. In free debate, only Christianity can win. Imagine two rooms separated from each other by a thick curtain. In the one darkness reigns, the other is lighted by a candle. If the curtain is withdrawn, it is not darkness that prevails. Darkness cannot overcome the light from the candle, because it is not energy. It is the absence of light. Only light, being energy, can prevail. Thus, the room that was in darkness becomes visible, transformed by the burning candle.

Christians have not feared Communist prisons nor the implements of torture. Neither do we fear atheist books. In the struggle of ideas, the final victory can only be ours.

THE REASONABLENESS OF ATHEISM

Atheists should know, first of all, that we Christians are not their enemies but their best friends. We love atheists. And love understands.

We are not surprised that there are atheists.

In the twentieth century, when millions of innocent men have been burnt in furnaces or gassed and killed in concentration camps of different political regimes some of which proclaimed themselves Christian, it is difficult to believe in a God both almighty and good. If he is almighty, why did he not prevent the atrocities? If he is good, why did he create a world of such cruelty?

We cannot reproach someone for being an atheist when high prelates of the Christian church are often on the side of oppressors and exploiters, when they flatter tyrants or fight together with rebels, among whom are those who dream of becoming the tyrants of tomorrow.

When Jesus hung powerless on a cross and cried, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" it must have been difficult to convince anyone that the Crucified was the hope of humanity or that the One who thirsted after water and received only vinegar, possessed all power in heaven and earth. It took a resurrection to make the proclamation of the truth possible.

In our day, those who call themselves after the name of the Son of God have killed each other in two world wars. A man baptized in the name of Christ gave the order to drop the first atomic bomb.

And then, even if prodigal sons would like to return to the Father's house, they would not know where to find it. In its stead are many divergent denominations, each claiming to have the truth. They are united in only one point; not to practise the all-embracing love for innocents still behind bars or who have died in concentration camps.

Furthermore, in the minds of multitudes, religion is tied up with superstition, backwardness, or strange dogmas.

Atheism is the effect of these as well as many other causes. We could not expect otherwise; it is only logical that many should be atheists.

God allowed room for atheism in the world. The Bible teaches that God created a material world with intrinsic laws and an endless chain of causes and effects. He himself contracted to allow others than himself to exist. Therefore, the possibility of atheism was contained in the plan of creation, and when it was decided that Christ would atone by his blood for the sins of mankind, he agreed to atone for the sins of atheists too.

If God allows atheism to be, who are we to forbid it?

We have full understanding for atheists.

page 10 My Answer to Moscow's Atheists

But atheists, on the other hand, have to account for what is from their standpoint an anomaly: Many of those who suffer horribly in this world created by God, love him with all their heart. Tradition and custom can account for church-going and attendance at religious rituals. But how can atheists explain that burning love for God is sometimes seen precisely in men who suffer most? How can they explain what Christians call "joy in the Lord," felt by men who are beaten and tortured for their faith and who may have fifty-pound chains at their feet?

Religion is flourishing in some very poor countries. Hungry men gather on Sundays together with starving children and sing the glory of God. Why? How is it that widows with only "two mites" for their living gladly give their last coins in order that God may be served with greater pomp?

The questions put to Christians by atheists are reasonable. If God is almighty, why does he allow death to rule on earth? Why have I been bereft of my most beloved, asks the atheist? Why does my child suffer or my friend die young?

But how can atheists explain the fact that other men, similarly bereaved or themselves facing death, accept tragedy with serenity and even joy? For them death means to go to the Father.

From the time of building the pyramids, when slaves died under the whip, and denial of God or rebellion against Him would have seem normal, a poem has come down to us:

> Death is in my sight today
> Like the recovery of a sick man,
> Like going out into the open after a confinement.
> Death is in my sight today
> Like the odour of myrrh,
> Like sitting under an awning on a breezy day.

Death is in my sight today
  Like the odour of lotus blossoms,
  Like sitting on the banks of drunkenness.
Death is in my sight today
  Like the passing away of rain,
  Like the return of men to their houses from an expedition.
Death is in my sight today
  Like the clearing of the sky,
  Like a man fowling thereby for what he knew not.
Death is in my sight today
  Like the longing of a man to see his house again,
  After he has spent many years held in captivity.

Some men accepted death with serenity, others with joy, considering that to die meant to return to the world of the spirit.

Some plants are heliotropic. But there are also asphodels, plants which grow only in shade or darkness, just as there are men who love God in proportion to their suffering for him. These are the mystics, the ascetics, the martyrs. They lovingly bear all the hardships about which the atheists complain. Suffering does not make them swerve in their faith; on the contrary, some are brought to faith or strengthened by deep suffering.

Oscar Wilde cared nothing for God and led a life of depravity. In the end, this genius found himself in jail under most degrading accusations. Under these circumstances, he wrote: "If the world has been built of sorrows it has been built by the hands of love, because in no other way could the soul of man for whom the world was made, reach the full stature of its perfection."

In Dostoievsky's ~Crime and Punishment~, Raskolnikov has a discussion with Sonya, a prostitute. She took this profession because her father was a drunkard and her smaller brothers and sisters hungered. She suffered terribly under this condition imposed upon her by bitter circumstances. Raskolnikov asked her, "You pray to God a lot, Sonya;" She answered in a whisper, "What would I be without God?" He, probing deeper, asked again, "But what does God do for you in return?" Her reply is, "Don't ask me. You don't deserve to know ... He does everything."

Raskolnikov also questioned her poor, miserable, younger sister Polenka: "Do you know how to say your prayers?" Her answer is, "Oh, of course, we all know; have for ages: and now that I am a big girl, I say my prayers to myself, but Kolya and Lida say them aloud with mama. First they say 'Hail Mary' and then another one, 'God, bless and forgive our sister Sonya,' and then 'God, bless and forgive our second father,' because our first daddy is already dead, and this one is our second one, and we pray for the other one, too."

How is it that the Sonyas and Polenkas love God? Could their religion be only a pain-reliever like drugs or alcohol? But drugs and alcohol destroy the minds of men. Her faith in God made Sonya so strong that she could bring to repentance the murderer Raskolnikov and lead him to become a new man. So there must be some kind of reality behind her faith.

Sonya gave to Raskolnikov a cross and read to him from the Gospel. This made an undiscovered murderer surrender himself to the police, go to Siberia, and start a new life. What would have happened if she had given him the hammer and sickle and had read to him one of Stalin's tedious speeches or Marx's ~Das Kapital~?

Sonya, caught in the tragedy of prostitution, and Raskolnikov, awakened from the tragedy of crime, believed.

For many, religion is just one of the many joys of life, a refinement like art or luxury. But there are those to whom it means everything, who pant after God as the hart pants after rivers of water. These claim to know God. They say that he is lovable and trustworthy, even if his ways are mysterious and if life is very hard on them.

page 13 My Answer to Moscow's Atheists

These understand the atheist phenomenon. But can you, atheists, understand them?

In September 1932, a Moscow magazine ~Molodaia Guardia~ (The Young Vanguard), announced that in accordance with the atheistic five-year plan, by 1937 every manifestation of religion must be definitely destroyed and the word of God must be silenced for ever. But this did not happen. On the contrary, Christianity is flourishing in many Communist countries, though long interdicted and threatened with persecution. Why?

Atheism is reasonable only when it discovers the reason for deep faith.

THE UNREASONABLENESS OF ATHEISM

Society is changing very quickly. Religious systems have not kept pace with the transformations. Often, preachers comment on debates which Jesus had with men two thousand years ago regarding problems of that time, instead of providing answers in the spirit of Christ, to the problems of modern man. Therefore, many come to the conclusion that religion is irrelevant.

In addition, many rituals are obsolete.

Further, churches assert their wish to save men from a future hell. Well, then they should prove their love towards men by helping to save the world from today's hell of illiteracy, hunger, misery, tyranny, exploitation, pollution, and war.

Christians accept all this criticism from atheists. "Charity believes all things." We can believe the reasons for being an atheist. We say with Hegel: "Everything which exists is reasonable." Even an atheist's attitude can have profound reasons. But atheists are at a disadvantage, when they refuse the criticism of believers.

Great mystics like Meister Eckhart have taught that the man united with God no longer has a God to worship. From this height, he can understand those who do not worship because they know not God. The Christian mind mirrors the whole of reality, the atheist mind only part of it.

Atheists have a materialist philosophy which Christians share. The principal doctrine of our religion is that God has become flesh (i.e., matter), in Jesus Christ. The Christian God is not an idea, but a person. The aim of Christianity is not only the salvation of souls but the resurrection of the body in incorruptibility.

But we don't stop at materialism. Materialistic atheists are one-sided: they do not know about the Godhead and the Eternal Spirit of love and truth who rules this world.

Has anyone ever seen a coin with only one face? Or electricity with only one pole? Christianity embraces the realm of the spirit as well as the material. Because it is one-sided, atheism is false.

A fool was sent to buy flour and salt. He took a dish in which to carry his purchases. He was told not to mix the two ingredients but keep them separate. After the shopkeeper had filled the dish with flour, the fool, thinking of the instructions, inverted the dish, asking that salt be poured on the upturned bottom. Therewith, the flour was lost, but he had the salt. He brought it to his boss, who enquired, "But where is the flour?" The fool turned the dish over to find it. So the salt was gone too.

Atheists sometimes act like this man. They bring very earnest and useful criticisms against religion. They have the salt. But do they not thereby lose the flour? Do they not throw away arguments ~for~ religion which may also be right? And in the end will they not have to shed the salt of atheism, too, in moments of deep crisis? It is the pride of true Christianity to have the flour and the salt. Its philosophy is what Soloviev called "Theomaterialism," comprehending matter and Theos (in Greek, God), its creator. Indeed, Christianity is so sure about the truth it possesses that it is open to all criticisms of this truth, yes, welcomes such criticism as a spur that ensures a better ride on the horse of truth.

Faith lives by continual rejection of errors and continual acceptance of inspiration from quarters where new truths have been experienced.

Once the sun quarrelled with the moon. The sun said, "The leaves on trees are green," whereas the moon said that they are the colour of silver. The moon asserted that men on earth generally sleep, whereas the sun said that usually all men are moving.

The moon asked, "Then why is there such a silence on earth?" - "Who told you this?" the sun answered. "On earth there is much noise." The strife lasted for a long time.

And then the wind came, he listened to the debate and smiled. "Your quarrel is in vain. I blow when there is sun and when the moon shines. During the day, when the sun is in the firmament, everything happens just as the sun said. There is noise on earth and men work and the leaves are green. By night, when the moon rises, everything is changed. Men sleep, silence reigns, and the colour of the leaves changes to silver. Sometimes, when a cloud covers the moon, they even look black. Neither you, sun, nor you, moon, know the whole truth."

Atheists look at the material side of things and believe they encompass all reality. Buddhists believe that mind is the only reality and that the material world belongs to Maya, the sphere of illusion. But the Bible uses, in Hebrew as well as in Greek, the same word for "spirit" as for "wind." It blows at all times, from many quarters.

Those who have the spirit of God see the whole of reality. They cannot limit themselves to either the materialist philosophy or the idealist one.

As a matter of fact, the Bible warns us to be careful in philosophical matters, because most philosophers have individual points of view from which they look at reality. But every point of view is a point of blindness: it incapacitates us for every other point of view. From a certain point of view, the room in which I write has no door. I turn around. Now I see the door, but the room has no window. I look up. From this point of view, the room has no floor. I look down; it has no ceiling. By avoiding particular points of view we are able to have a intuition of the whole. The ideal for a Christian is to become holy, a word which derives from "whole." In Russian the word "holy" (sviatoi) suggests luminosity. The same is true in the Germanic idioms. To be holy means to have abandoned points of view.

Feuerbach said: "It is clear as the sun and evident as the day that there is no God; and still more, that there can be no God." It is not religion which asserts absolute clearness, but atheism. If the non-existence of God is as "clear as the sun," how is it that all mankind (without exception) acknowledges the existence of the sun, but not all mankind subscribes to the assertion of Feuerbach that there is no God?

Not even Darwin, the great favourite of my opponents, could adhere to it. He wrote: "The impossibility of conceiving that this grand and wondrous universe with our conscious selves arose through chance, seems to me the chief argument for the existence of God."

For atheists, atheism is self-evident. Then why the need to propagate the obvious? Christians do not consider Christianity as self-evident as the fact that two and two are four. If it were so, there would be no atheists. We find some of the attitudes of our opponents sensible. There is a place in our understanding for them. Atheism has only atheism and denies to religion every right to exist. Therefore it is not sensible.

Max Stimer, the theoretician of individualist anarchism, rightly saw the evils of society. His solution was to liquidate human society. But he was a part of it. Schopenhauer's school recommended suicide to mankind as the answer to its problems. But when cholera broke out in his town, he fled. He loved life. In the same category are those who wish to get rid of religion itself because of its great shortcomings in thought and deed.

Should we give up wearing coats because some have an unpleasant colour? Should we throw away the clean baby with the dirty bath water?

We have acknowledged what is reasonable in atheism. There is much besides. Now let atheists seek together with us what is reasonable in religion. Maybe we will arrive at a common denominator.

THE WRONG PERSPECTIVE OF MOSCOW'S BIBLE

Individuals gathered in Moscow have written a book about the greatest problems of life, problems over which the greatest minds have pondered since thinking began: the existence or non-existence of God, the sense of life, its hopes and sorrows, the role of religion, and so on.

Who are these individuals? It is much more important to know them than the contents of their book.

To know the teacher is much more valuable than to know his teachings. Knowledge always proceeds from "What am I?" If I do not know the answer to this, how do I know that what this "I" thinks is worth being shared with others? If the "I" is not great, everything it gives will be small change.

The authors of Moscow's Bible say that they were not created by any God. There was no design in the random processes of matter that produced them. Can the whirling of atoms and protons and their accidental coming together produce a brain that will distil pure truth?

I was a poor child. I would have liked to learn music, but my parents could not afford it. So I wrote music notes at random on a lined piece of paper. But they never produced a melody.

If, say, in the game of roulette there are two possibilities that a red or a black number will come out, the chance of a number turning up in the same colour forty times in a row is perhaps one in one hundred million. This when there are only two possibilities!

How many chances were there that such a perfect computer as the human mind should be produced by an accidental union of electrons and protons? I, the author of this book, speak many languages and know something like one million words, if I count all the inflections of the verbs and nouns. Like any cultured man, I have millions of bits of knowledge of mathematics, geography, physical science, art, etc., at my command. Yet at any given moment the mind can extract exactly the right word, with exactly the correct intonation, backed by the most suitable attitude expressive of character, that the occasion requires. The probability that this one phenomenon – let alone the organization of the whole universe – could be the product of an accidental coming together of elementary particles, arising from nothing, is mathematically impossible.

If I count three generations in a century and begin to calculate how many ancestors I have – two parents, four grandparents, eight great-grandparents, and so on – I quickly reach figures of tens of millions of men from whom I have inherited a genetic stock. I am the selected product of a struggle for life in which millions of predecessors were involved. What do I know about them? Nothing. What do I know about the heredity I have received from them? They formed the language in which I think, they created the institutions in which I was brought up. I do not know them, I do not know my own childhood, which is the most decisive period in the shaping of a future teacher of atheism or religion.

I live in an unspeakably small world. Our earth is a bit of dust in the universe. We consider it a noteworthy achievement to have reached a minuscule satellite of this speck of dust. On our small earth, the biosphere is a small thing; so also mankind that dwells in the biosphere.

page 19 My Answer to Moscow's Atheists

As for me, I am a most insignificant individual among billions.

Scarcely one in 10,000 will have ever heard the titles of the greatest books that have been written. Not one in a million will have read them. How many know about the existence of a most reverend bishop or about a member of the Soviet Academy, co-author of ~The Atheist's Handbook~?

I once had a lapse of memory. I could not remember who had written ~Crime and Punishment~. It was only the twentieth man I asked who could tell me that it was Dostoievsky.

We are infinitely small, and we know as much about what should rather be called the pluriverse than universe, as an ant knows about Marxism after walking over a book by Marx.

I enjoy the chirping of birds, not knowing which of them will be captured by an eagle this very day. I hear the wind passing through branches, but I do not know which tree is being eaten by a worm. We are greedy for fame, power, money, pleasure, knowledge. Those who had the same greed a couple of decades before us are now clay. The earth on your shoe-soles was once, perhaps, the beautiful face of a girl.

Bukharin was one of the greatest theoreticians of Communist atheism. In his book ~Dialectic Materialism~, he began by praising this philosophy because, he said, it allows for the possibility of foreseeing the future. The only thing the poor man did not foresee was that his own comrades would torture and kill him.

It is a daring thing to write a book, to become a teacher of humanity. Can one know what joys and tragedies will be experienced by future readers, and whether one's book will be helpful in moments of great trial?

Does a man know even one of the billions of cells that constitute his brain? A small disturbance in them can make one write foolish things. This has happened to geniuses. Can it happen to you? You recognize madness in the writings of others. Can there be none in yours? You know nothing about your body. What do you know about the depths of your psychology? I am daily a surprise to myself.

We live mysterious lives in a mysterious world, of which we know only some fringes. We are imprisoned in the jail of our senses.

If there were on earth beings that could emit rays outside the spectrum of our vision, if they could communicate among themselves on a wave-length beyond those we hear or apprehend, then they could observe us and we would never know anything about their existence, just as we lived for millenniums without knowing about the influence of viruses and microbes on our lives. What if angels do exist and we are unable to perceive them?

Atheists assert that there is no God. How can they be sure?

The present book was conceived in a prison. The guards regularly searched our cells for forbidden objects, such as chessmen, knives, needles, books, paper. They did not find them. We waited until they had left. Then we took them out of their hiding-places. You search a cell for an object and you do not find it. But is it right to maintain that it is not there? Who has searched the infinite universe to ascertain that there is no God?

Therefore, can you, atheist author, know for sure the things which you assert?

Until yesterday it was considered a certainty that the simple elements were immutable. This was an assertion based on thousands of years of experience, but nevertheless it was false. Men of considerable intellect were sure that the atom was indivisible and that man could not fly to the moon. These, who had the overwhelming experience of mankind on their side, erred. How many chances have you to be right, my atheist friend?

page 21 My Answer to Moscow's Atheists

The Christian teacher Tertullian has been much belittled for his words "Credo quia impossibile" (I believe because it is impossible). And now science makes real just what appeared absurd and impossible to reason.

We are small and insignificant. We do not know. "If any man think that he knows any thing, he knows nothing yet as he ought to know," says the Bible (1CO 8:2).

WHO ARE OUR OPPONENTS?

If a plain-clothes man asks me to show him my identity, my first reaction is to ask him who he is. He has to prove that he is from the police. Otherwise he has no right to question me.

If I confront the incomprehensible reality of the universe and ask the sphinx "Who are you? Is there a Godhead in you? Were you created by an artist or have you existed from eternity?" I might receive the reply: "Tell me first who you are, little man? Are you of such worth that the ultimate mysteries should be revealed to you? And if I were to share them with you, would you have the capacity to understand and to accept truth in all its purity, even if it were contrary to your own interests and to everything you believed and cherished till now?"

The authors of ~The Atheist's Handbook~ deny the existence of God. But do they themselves exist? Who are they? Can they prove their own existence?

In order for an atheist author to pose daring questions, he has to posit, billions of years before his birth, the existence of galaxies and astral dust. There had to be stars and celestial mechanics and a sun to regulate the movement of the earth, without which life would have been impossible. The atheist can put daring questions precisely because there exist water, herbs, animals, and heat, risen bread and fermented wine, cosmic rays and falling rain, and the overwhelming reality of human personality. There had to be a whole line of ancestors, and milk in his mother's breast, and love in her heart.

Even assuming the atheist's presuppositions, an unfathomable reality has produced, through the interaction of time and chance over an incomprehensible period of billions of years, both an atheistic lecturer and a Christian saint. Why? Who are they? Why are they? In fact, are they?

You know as much about this as you know why the earth, together with the whole solar system, runs uninterruptedly towards a certain constellation, as if it had an appointment. They are attracted. But what is this universal attraction? Attraction is a word which we use sometimes for lovableness. Who loves? Who is the beloved?

Atheists speak, as do preachers. How about leaving their confusing voices and listening to the voices of leaves, brooks, winds, storms, birds, little children? These might be more instructive than many of our words.

Those who live in tune with nature believe. Atheism started as an urban phenomenon in the distorted minds of those who had to live behind walls, social as well as structural.

And what about listening to the great silences? Whence the beauty of snowflakes, flowers, ferns, lichens, each a different piece of exquisite embroidery? Whence the wonderful arrangement of elementary particles in the atom?

How is it that the electron revolves in its orbit hundreds of millions of times every hundred-thousandth part of a second in order that what is in constant motion should give us solid objects to handle?

Did you ever hear about a machine with eighty trillions of electrical cells? One of its parts, weighing only fifty ounces, is a mechanism consisting of ten billion cells, which generate, receive, record, and transmit energy. This wonderful machine is your body. How grateful you would be if somebody presented you with a car. But you were given a much finer machine. By whom?

How is it that chemical changes in the neurons of the brain become, with a change of sentiments, another thought? How is it that a man exhaling the poison carbon dioxide transforms it into a word of love, or even a word carrying the message of eternal life?

How is it that when you wish to do an evil thing, it is as if an unseen hand would restrain you? Whose hand is this? Even if the voice of conscience is not powerful enough to make you abandon a wicked intention, you hear it later in the form of regret and remorse.

Who are you to ask reality's identity? What if this reality should answer: "Since in your arrogance you set yourself up as an authority, please indicate first who you are?" Could you indeed answer one of the thousands of questions that reality puts to you? The development of science has not so much increased the knowledge of facts as it has increased the number of questions, to which we must find the answers.

You question reality about its last mysteries, about its sense, about its design, about the existence of a Creator. To whom should reality answer, and in what language? Primitive tribes, to which the first missionaries went, had no words for such concepts as "love," "faith," "forgiveness," "spirit," "holy," "train." The missionaries were restricted in their ability to communicate their message or to share the realities of their own country. Have you a common language with the highest reality?

And again, to whom should this reality speak? You acknowledge only reason. But according to your materialistic doctrine, reason is the manner in which the human brain works. The elephant's brain is otherwise constituted. Its work is called instinct. To yours, you have given a nicer name. And yet both brains, you insist, are accidents of evolution, the random agglomeration of atoms over eons of time, without the impinging of a designer.

You consider atheism to be the truth. But before applying the notion "truth" to atheism, you have to define what you mean by "truth."

Pilate asked, "What is truth?" Whoever does not know the answer to that question has no basis on which to assert that anything is true.

Sceptics have said that "truth is a suspicion that has endured" or "a hallucination agreed upon by a majority." But what they mock as hallucination might be error pointed in the right direction. Alchemy and astrology were just such fruitful errors, precursors of chemistry and astronomy.

What is your definition of truth?

A Marxist would say that truth is conditioned by social class. The economic conditions in which a man lives, determine his convictions.

In a letter to Cluss dated December 7, 1852, Marx describes his own economic condition. He says that he is as good as imprisoned because he lacks trousers and shoes and that his family risks being plunged into deep poverty. We are moved to feel sorry for him. But then Marxism is the mentality of men without trousers and shoes. Today, all proletarians, in the West, have trousers and shoes, more than one pair. So Marxism does not suit us. We have to have a truth of our own.

Marxism proclaims itself as truth and has no valid definition of the word.

It is interesting that Marxism, allegedly the doctrine of the proletariat, excludes proletarian thinkers from truth. Marx writes in a letter to Sorge, dated October 19, 1877: "The workers themselves when ... they give up work and become professional literary men, always breed 'theoretical' mischief and are always ready to join muddle-heads..."

The radical student movements also cannot have truth. Marx writes about "the stupid nonsense the Russian students are perpetrating which is worthless in itself." Apparently for Marxists there is only one valid definition of truth: "Truth is what you think when you have no trousers and shoes." For some mysterious reason trousers seem to be a terrible hindrance to the possession of truth. Let us leave all this.

We will serve our opponents with a current definition: Truth is the consistency of the object of thinking (reality) with its product, our own mentality. However, such a consistency is no confirmation that you have apprehended reality rightly. Otherwise, how can you account for the existence of error? You assert that religion is error. But religion is the consistency between reality and another man's mentality. So a man can be very sure about the justice of his manner of thinking and still be mistaken. What if you were the victim of such a delusion?

Suppose a Christian became an atheist. He would then acknowledge his prior thinking to be false. With his mind open to error, he would embrace your ideology. How could he know for sure that he had not fallen into another wrong belief? He might feel sure his thoughts now correspond to reality. But thus he believed when he was still religious. Do you not see that there must be a light beyond reality and pseudo-reality, beyond what we call truth and error, to tell us with authority which is which? Even atheist convictions can exist consistently (how rare is consistency in human thought) only by acknowledging this supreme Light, which we adore in religion.

Should the Highest speak with you in the language of reason? But how much can reason comprehend? Reason justified slavery, absolute monarchy, superstition. It made us cheer dictatorships and justify world wars, which were mass-slaughters of innocent beings. Mephistopheles says: "He calls it reason and uses it only to be more animalistic than any animal." Man must always rationalize, conceptualize, and intellectualize all things.

Goethe suggested two centuries ago that "our planet is the mental institution of the universe." We have the reason of a race that has flickerings of genius and truth but shows clearly that it has gone mad. Even with the wisest of us, reason is only a harmony among irrational impulses.

Reason, in order to produce right results, would have to be unsullied by low sentiments.

Is this the case with my opponents?

Does fear play no role in their thinking? In nonCommunist countries atheists often turn to religion. Now suppose that a member of Moscow's Academy of Science, after examining all the pros and cons, came to the conclusion that Christianity was right - as did Svetlana Stalina, Pasternak, Siniavski, Solzhenitsyn; one's convictions can change in any direction - what would be the result? He would immediately lose his membership in the Academy, his professorial chair, the possibility of publishing any books. He would also lose his high standard of living. General-Major Grigorenko, member of Moscow's Academy, expressed on some political and military questions opinions different from those of the Soviet government. For this "deviation," he suffered in a mental asylum. Don't you, my opponents, fear at all? Without complete freedom of research and expression, whether your views prove true or false, reason cannot give right results. Your reason is biased by a sentiment fear.

I don't reproach you particularly. Everybody's reason is biased by sentiments of one kind or another. With some it would be the desire for fame or gain. Such sentiments are to be deplored, but in no case can reason alone give right results.

Why should you seek right results if you are not animated by a passion, the love of truth? So a passion, a powerful sentiment, while sometimes a hindrance, can in other instances be a driving force for right reasoning. It is its very presupposition.

How do we know that syllogisms produce right thinking? Well, we just feel it. And we feel it not only in small things, but also in great ones. Einstein said of his famous theory, before it was ever submitted to the crucible of experiment, that he felt it to be true. What is this feeling? It does not belong to reason. Neither does intuition. But they satisfy an Einstein.

Evidence is not only external. There exists also inward evidence which sometimes contradicts our senses. This inward conviction, faith, is itself one of the great facts of the universe. It must be respected and explained like any other fact of nature.

The reasoning of Einstein was based on presuppositions outside of reason.

Atheism also rests on a faith. It too has its presuppositions. It rests on the feeling that it is worthwhile to spend life denying the non-existent. Nietzsche, the great prophet of the anti-Christ, had the honesty to acknowledge this. He wrote "Even we, devotees of knowledge today, we, godless ones and anti-metaphysicians, still take our fire, too, from a flame, which a faith, thousands of years old, has kindled: that Christian faith, which was also the faith of Plato, that God is truth, that truth is divine." Nietzsche was sorry about it, but he considered himself "still pious."

If sentiments play such a big role in the convictions of believers and unbelievers alike, why should the Highest speak to you, proud reason, and not to these sentiments?

Lenin says in his ~Philosophical Copybooks~ that matter has the capacity for self-reflection. It reflects itself in thinking. In whose thinking? In that of a person. Now, if whatever we think is a reflection of reality and if all our thoughts are so very personal, the truth which they reflect must be a Person, whom we apprehend clearly or dimly, or in a distorted manner, or even without knowing whom we really apprehend. Jesus said that the Truth is a person, himself. Just try to express this in a syllogism. You will come to the conclusion that Jesus's assertion must be true, a mysterious truth.

If you do not have the sentiment of mystery, you cannot arrive at the truth.

Why do you believe what your mind tells you? You know that it is unreliable. You just arose from hours of sleep in which this same mind tricked you with an illusory world. It lies to you every night. It lies in your daydreams and in your fancies. Is it reasonable to rely blindly on your mind?

Millions of men, relying on their minds, cheered a Hitler and a Stalin as great geniuses. These same minds later indicted them as mass-murderers. You have often discovered your mind to be in error. It does not even pretend to tell you the truth. It is a whore, telling you rather what you would like to hear. It tells the atheist that there is no God; it tells the religionist that he can be comfortable; it tells the member of any political party that its programme is the best.

We have all made great mistakes. The whole history of mankind is a big cemetery of ideas for which men were ready to die. Are you sure that your ideas will not one day be considered as stupid as the idea that the earth is borne by Atlas?

Relying on their minds, ninety-nine per cent of men even of our century believe in the absolute validity of the law of causality. But Heisenberg is right, along with the very few who understand his assertion: "The resolution of the paradoxes of atomic physics can be accomplished only by renunciation of old and cherished ideas. Most important of these is the idea that natural phenomenal obey exact laws - the principle of causality." I Did you ever visit an asylum? Where is the barrier between an asylum and everyday life? It might lie in a microbe of syphilis lodging in the brain of a genius or in an unbearable emotion that caused a brilliant mind to disintegrate. Do the authors of ~The Atheist's Handbook~ know what spyrochete may have begun its destructive work in their brain? Khrushchev described Stalin's regime as a hell in which even Communist leaders had to tremble for their lives. Thus even the authors of ~The Atheist's Handbook~ must have endured terrible trauma. Can they be sure they are completely sane? Is any one of us? We belong to a race which, while living on a rich earth, finds no other solution to its problems than a general massacre every thirty years. There must be something wrong with our minds. Are atheists justified in relying on their minds?

What man could not be categorized at least in part as a maniac, a neuropath, an addict, a man obsessed, a schizophrenic, a megalomaniac, a pervert, a man with confused mind? Where is the perfect, normal mind?

Who are you, mind? Show your identity! Who is your ultimate authority, whom you can question about reality and ask to reveal to you its final secrets?

There arises on the surface of the ocean of reality a minuscule drop - my being. It arises within the ocean. It cannot leave the ocean even for one moment. My being is a part of it, ravaged by its tempests.

As soon as my self poses as a king and wishes to judge the reality, instead of humbly feeding on it, I am no more a reality, but a nonentity, an illusion.

There exists only one reality - God. He has created, but within himself. In him we have our being, life, and movement. He engulfs all that he creates. Just as billions of cells, every one with a complete organization and having all the functions of life, receive their existence from the body, live by it and in it, so we are a part of a higher reality. We live in God. When we oppose ourselves to him, our existence loses its meaning.

Wise men know how to take a joke, even if they are its subject. Without malice, we will tell our atheist friends a joke:

The Central Committee of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union discussed the problem of Khrushchev. Brezhnev and others said: "He is an idiot. Let us get rid of him." Podgornyi intervened: "But now it is possible to transplant organs. Let us transplant in him the brain of a genius." The others consented. A surgeon was called The operation was successfully completed. But it did not provide the expected result. They had forgotten about the phenomenon of rejection. The brain of the genius rejected Khrushchev.

Take it as a joke! But an enlightened mind, a mind enlightened by its Creator and in harmony with him rejects atheist doctrine.

THE DIFFICULTY OF BEING AN ATHEIST

We have set ourselves to go as far as possible towards an encounter with our atheist friends.

Atheism can be the passage from false religion to spiritual truth. Atheism in one age is generally the result of the superstitions of a hypocritical religion in the preceding one. But then it is a passage. Do not stop in the passage!

We also know that not all who call themselves atheists really are. Baron Holbach, one of the eighteenth century's renowned atheist philosophers, called God his personal enemy. For him, nothing other than nature existed. Nature, according to him, creates everything, being itself uncreated. But this is exactly what we believe about God! Nature is infinite and eternal. Again, what we believe about God. In nature, there are laws, order, purpose, spirit. The more you read what Holbach understands by nature, the more you have the impression that he has only substituted the word "nature" for "God," for whom he had an aversion. This is not real atheism.

page 31 My Answer to Moscow's Atheists

For many, atheism is only a screen for the frustration of an unsuccessful religious search. Their atheism is repressed religiosity, and it is our fault that we do not know how to communicate with them. Christians should unlearn "Christianese" when they deal with unbelievers. Doctors use an idiom of their own when they are among themselves, but the wise physician, when dealing with a patient, uses a language understood by him. Not all teachers of religion nor all Christians know how to make their faith intelligible to those who are not used to Biblical language. This keeps many away from religion.

Therefore, we must have understanding.

We also sympathize with the burdens of an atheist. To be an atheist is surely much more difficult than to be religious. Atheists have a very exacting belief. They reproach us for believing without proof. We will present the proofs of our faith in this book. But who will ever be able to prove the stupendous dogmas of atheism?

Its first dogma is: "From eternity there has existed matter in continual movement, which has created life."

How do atheists know this? The renowned astronomer Hoyle adduces proof to the contrary. In ~Nature of the Universe~ he writes:

> To avoid the issue of creation it would be necessary for all the material of the universe to be infinitely old. And this cannot be for a practical reason. For if this were so, there could be no hydrogen left in the universe. As I think I demonstrated when I spoke about the insides of the stars, hydrogen is steadily converted into helium throughout the universe, and this conversion is a one-way process, that is to say, hydrogen cannot be produced in any appreciable quantity through the breakdown of other elements. How is it then that the universe consists almost entirely of hydrogen? If matter were infinitely old, this would be > quite impossible. So we see that the universe being what it is, the creation issue simply cannot be dodged.

>
> We also know that according to the second law of thermodynamics, in all observable physical processes in the universe, some energy becomes less available. The universe is running down. Since it is far from run down, it must have had a beginning.

The Bible speaks science when it says: "The things which are seen are temporal."

What proofs do atheists have to the contrary? What makes them believe that matter has existed for ever? What proof that it has always been moving? Yet you have to believe it, and believing it is very hard. It is hard to believe that there is no God, no loving Father, no purpose in things, no hope for our life which soon runs out.

Is everything a chance gathering of elementary particles? The Communist writer Anatole France wrote "Chance is perhaps the pseudonym of God, when he did not wish to sign."

Therefore, men are not atheists in times of great crisis or danger, in moments of ecstasy from love or the contemplation of beauty. Rare are the atheists who remain godless on their deathbed. Some, it is true, continue to play their role to the last; they would not confess with their mouths, even in the last moments, the doubts by which they are assailed. But whenever a skilled religious personality is near the deathbed of such a man, he succeeds in bringing him to conversion.

A major crisis in life may also shake an atheist's convictions.

Lenin, when the Russian Revolution was in greatest danger, when Petersburg was surrounded by the troops of the anti-Communist general Kornilov, delivered a speech in which he exclaimed several times, "Dai Boje" - "May God grant that we escape." It might be objected that this is a common saying in the Russian Language.

But Lenin never used it except in this moment of deep crisis.

Three men led the war against the Nazis: Churchill, Roosevelt, and Stalin. The first two were Christians. Churchill has written six volumes of memoirs about this war. The name God never appears on the lips of the two believers. It is only Stalin who says, "May God give success to the operation 'Torch' (the invasion of North Africa)." "The past belongs to God," and so on.

Mao is a fierce atheist. But in 1936, when as a member of the Central Committee of the Communist Party he fell very sick, he demanded to be baptized and received baptism from the hand of a nun. When his wife was shot by the troops of Chiang Kai-shek, he composed a religious poem "The Immortals." In an interview with the English newspaper ~Snow~ in 1971, he said, "Soon I will have to appear before God."

Now, such incidents are very instructive. If you are an engineer who has built a bridge, the fact that a cat passes over the bridge is not proof that the bridge is good. A train must pass over it. We cannot consider atheistic doctrine profitable if it is only a fair-weather teaching.

Zinoviev, president of the Communist International, died at the hands of Stalin. His last words were: "Listen, Israel, our God is the only God." Iagoda, Soviet Minister of Interior Affairs, also killed by Stalin, said:

"There must be a God, because my sins have reached me." Iaroslavski, president of the League of the Godless in the USSR, asked Stalin from his deathbed: "Burn all my books! Look, he is here! He waited for me. Burn all my books!"

Sitting in Communist prisons with Communists jailed by their own comrades in party purges, I have been witness myself to similar scenes.

I would recommend that our atheist friends ponder these things.

page 34 My Answer to Moscow's Atheists

And now as I enter into a closer analysis of their handbook, let me first express our gratitude to the Communists of the Soviet Union for putting their thoughts so clearly in writing. We have learned from them that any member of a Communist Party is intended to be an enemy of the Christian faith. Under capitalist rule, elsewhere in the world, Communists may pose as friends of Christianity and may ask for dialogue with our Christian brethren. However, it is clear to us that this is a tactical move. The real attitude of Communism towards Christianity is shown in ~The Atheist's Handbook~. It is one of enmity.

THE DEFINITION OF RELIGION

~The Atheist's Handbook~ begins with an analysis of different definitions of the word "religion" given by philosophers. I

But neither Plato, who said that religion is right behaviour towards the gods, nor Plutarch, for whom religion is midway between atheism and superstition, is mentioned.

The book begins with later thinkers and, sorry to say, with falsehoods. Not one of the quotations is correct.

Carlyle wrote: "A lie should be trampled upon and extinguished wherever found. I am for fumigating the atmosphere, when I suspect that falsehood, like pestilence, breathes around me."

Plato had taught that authors of books should consider themselves as priests. The evil of using falsehood consists not only in the lie that passes for truth, but in the fact that men eventually lose faith in other books.

The story is told of a Bedouin who once travelled on a camel through the desert. A man stopped him asking: "Please, make a place for me on the back of the camel, as I have a long journey." The owner of the camel honoured the request, and the stranger mounted behind him. Suddenly, as they rode farther, the stranger with a skillful movement threw the owner from the camel and fled. The owner cried after him: "I am not angry because you have stolen my animal. I have many more camels. But I am sad that you have made it harder for anyone in the future to be helpful to a man he meets on the road."

~The Atheist's Handbook~ cares nothing about truth or trust.

In the Soviet Union, books of philosophers who are not in the school of dialectic materialism are on the index. The average reader cannot find them. (One of the charges against me, which brought me to prison, is that I obtained such books and spread them illegally.) Thus an author can misquote his authorities, and the misguided reader has no recourse to the truth.

My opponents quote Immanuel Kant as having written that religion is the understanding by man of moral duty. Following are the words of this philosopher, quoted directly:

"Religion is morals in reference to God as legislator. It is the recognition of our duties looked upon as divine commandments."

My opponents say that Ludwig Feuerbach defined religion as the connection between men. This again is false. In his book ~The Essence of Christianity~, he says: "Religion is the dream of the human mind."

Even the definitions given by atheist authors are falsified. Salomon Reinach is quoted as having taught that religion is a system of contradictions. We find the correct text in his book ~Orpheus~. "Religion is the sum of superstitious beliefs which hinder the legitimate working of man's faculties."

That they found it necessary to falsify the words of William James is understandable. They could not quote his opinion: "A man's religious faith (whatever more special terms of doctrine it may involve) means for me essentially his faith in the existence of an unseen order of some kind in which the riddles of the natural order may be found explained ... It is essential that God be conceived as the deepest power in the universe and that, secondly, he must be conceived under the form of a mental personality."

~The Atheist's Handbook~ is unjust also towards James Frazer. As quoted, he also appears to be irreligious, when his real words in his work ~The Belief in Immortality~ are: "The question whether our conscious personality survives after death has been answered by almost all races of man in the affirmative. At this point, sceptic or agnostic people are nearly, if not wholly, unknown."

Not even mentioned are the definitions of such men as Schleiermacher: "Religion is the feel of absolute dependence upon the unseen determiner of our destiny accompanied by the conscious desire to come into harmonious relations with it"; or Emerson: "Religion is communion with the Over-soul, the divinity within us reaching up to the Divinity above"; or Jacob Burckhardt: "Religions are the expressions of the eternal and indestructible metaphysical craving of human nature. Their grandeur is that they represent the whole super-sensual complement of man, all that he cannot himself provide. At the same time, they are the reflections upon a great and different plane of whole peoples and cultural epochs."

The authors of ~The Atheist's Handbook~ don't even try to get light about the word "religion" from its various etymologies which have been proposed. Cicero derived the word from ~relegare~ - "to consider." With Augustine it means the finding again of something lost. Lactantius sees in it a derivative of ~religare~ - "to tie" (to a higher power).

But the most curious thing is that the authors of ~The Atheist's Handbook~, while claiming to be Marxists, omit the saying of Karl Marx from the list of various definitions of religion, embarrassed, no doubt, because of the beauty of his definition and because of the compliment which he pays to religion.

Christians at odds with each other about being Orthodox, Catholic, or Protestant, would feel reluctant to remind their listeners about the words of Jesus: "A new commandment I give unto you, that ye love one another; as I have loved you, that ye also love one another. By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another" (JHN 13:34-35). So Marxists simply cannot quote Marx in matters of religion, because he wrote in ~Observations of a Young Man on the Choice of a Life Work~: "To men God gave a universal aim - to ennoble mankind and oneself." And much later in life, in ~Contributions to the Critique of Hegel's Philosophy of Right~ he wrote: "Religion is the sigh of the oppressed creature, the heart of a heartless world, just as it is the spirit of a spiritless society."

The importance of these words is increased when you realize what Marx had learned from Hegel. Heinrich Heine tells about the latter: "One beautiful starry evening, we two stood next to each other at a window and I talked of the stars with sentimental enthusiasm and called them the abode of the blessed. The master (Hegel) however grumbled to himself, 'The stars, hum, hum, the stars are only a gleamy leprosy in the sky.'"

To have for a teacher somebody with only this to say about the stars and then to give to religion such beautiful definitions is quite an achievement!

It is true that Marx adds, "Religion is the opiate of the people," but put in the context above, these words lose their anti-religious meaning. Opium soothes pain. There is nothing intrinsically evil in opium. Only the discovery of anaesthetics made possible the tremendous development of surgery.

Marx, generally, had a great weakness for religion. It was a favourite topic of his. In his monumental ~The Capital~, he simply says: "For such a society [he means a society based upon the production of commodities; every society produces them], Christianity with its cultus of abstract man, more especially in its bourgeois development, Protestantism, Deism, etc., is the most fitting form of religion."

Thus, every Protestant Christian can prove his case from Marx. He can tell his "Marxist" opponents that they abuse the name of their teacher. A true disciple of Marx must be Protestant, if he wishes to have a fit religion. To think how many Protestants have been jailed and killed by allegedly Marxist rulers!

Though an atheist, Marx had a bias towards religion. His was a split personality. Only later did the disciples of Marx make of his words "religion is the opiate of the people' a terrible charge against us.

People have used many things besides religion as opiates. One man, in order to escape family grief, chooses chemistry as his opiate. He passes all his time in the laboratory and discovers a useful medicine. Is the value of the medicine diminished because the research for it was an opiate to a distressed heart? If one who has met with great adversities in life takes refuge in the quiet of an astronomical observatory, his work is for him an opiate, but the stars which he observes are real. So religion may be an opiate for many, but the Godhead to whom they appeal can be true.

Atheism and revolutionary activities are often an opiate for children of broken homes, a substitute for rebellion against parental authority. Atheism can be an opiate to soothe one's conscience, which otherwise would give pain for the commission of gross sins. Atheism stifles the reproaches of conscience, just as an opiate alleviates physical pain.

Marx's "religion is an opiate for the people" is something entirely different from Lenin's "religion is a sort of spiritual gin," or the inept conclusions of Bakunin: "If God exists, man is a slave; but man can and should be free; therefore God does not exist." It is like saying:

page 39 My Answer to Moscow's Atheists

"Atheists claim there is no God. But faith in him gives me relief. So atheists do not exist."

It would have been nice if the authors of ~The Atheist's Handbook~, writing so much about and against the Bible, had mentioned the definition of religion given by an apostle of Christ: "Pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father is this, to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep himself unspotted from the world" (JMS 1:27). Are our opponents really against religion thus defined? I contend that no sensible man can be other than charmed by this definition. Perhaps what our atheist friends are fighting against is not even religion but a falsification parading as such. Who can be against caring for the needy and being unspotted from the great filth of the world?

THE ORIGIN OF RELIGION

"Religion is not inherent to man. It is not an inalienable quality of human nature." Our honoured opponents say that science has proved this. "The archaeological discoveries have shown that during hundreds of thousands of years, man did not have any religion."

I am not a member of an Academy of Science. In my ignorance, I have believed that archaeology could discover only things which existed in the past, not things which did not exist

Well, but there is no joking with academicians. They have a powerful argument. Caves have been discovered in which lived the Pithecanthropus and the Sinanthropus, the predecessors of modern man. There were plenty of stone-tools and bones of eaten animals. "But never have excavations from that time shown the least sign of some religious representation, even the most elementary, existing at that time."

This reminds me of a story. An Italian debated with a Jew: "You Jews are so proud. There is tremendous propaganda claiming that you are the most intelligent people in the world. Sheer nonsense! In Italy, excavations have been made, and in some strata of the earth at least 2,000 years old, wire has been found, which proves that our Roman ancestors at that time already had the telegraph." The Jew answered: "In Israel, excavations have been made in parts of the earth 4,000 years old and nothing has been found, which means that we had the wireless before you had the telegraph."

What if the absence of any religious relics in the shelters of the earliest men were an indication that they had a spiritual form of religion without outward signs of cult; a religion consisting of meditation, contemplation, and worship in the truth? Let us be honest, comrades, academicians!

But to continue the argument, my opponents have to explain how it happened that at a certain moment man became religious. They say that religion appeared in the time of Neanderthal man for two reasons. First, primitive man's fear of death, coupled with the fear that deceased members of the tribe would come out of their graves and harm the living. Second, primitive man's impotence in the face of the elements of nature.

Now, Pithecanthropus was more primitive than the Cro-Magnon and Neanderthal. He was more impotent than the latter two. So, logically, he should have been more religious.

I appeal to common sense. I

My opponents are academicians, some of them historians. What do they hold about the origin of the Russian people and state? Well, they orient themselves to the oldest written documents of our history.

Then this procedure must hold good also in the sphere of the origin of mankind. The oldest of documents mankind are the Maneva-Dharma-Sostra, the Gilgamesh epic, the Vedas, the Egyptian Book of the Dead, the books of Moses, and so on. They are unanimous in saying that we were created by a heavenly being, who disclosed to prophets of old the essential truths that different religions have in common. This would be the origin of religion.

If I am wrong in accepting the oldest written documents of mankind, Moscow's Academy is wrong in its history of Russia.

On no continent is there any cuneiform tablet, any inscription carved on tables, or any reminiscence that man originated from the ape. Men usually know something about their grandfathers. If men of old had sufficient fancy to invent a sophisticated religion, why did they not remember seeing their grandfathers swinging from trees by their tails?

Again, let us be serious, comrades, academicians! Religion comes from God. It is communion with God.

The most primitive man knows "I exist," and "the many objects around me exist." But if I and my fellow men and the things about us exist, there must exist one more thing: ~existence itself~. If I am and the world is, there is also the simple fact of "being." I get old, fellow men die, warning me that my turn will come, while my children grow up. All objects which surround me decay or wither away. But the simple fact of being never ceases. There exists a pure Being, independent of our coming and going. I have not always existed. The things around me have not always been. They are contingent. But the fact of being has always been. Primitive men could not put this in so many words. But they also knew about a Supreme, immortal Being, the One whose name will be revealed later as the God whose name is "I am." Belief in him and the desire to propitiate him have inspired every religion in its beginning. This is the basis of every religion even now.

If this is not true, why was your book written?

A Russian farmer was once asked by an atheistic lecturer if he believed in God. He answered affirmatively.

He was asked again: "Why should you believe in him? Did you see him?" - "No," was the reply. "But neither have I ever seen a Japanese. Notwithstanding I believe that Japanese exist. Our army fought against them in the last war. This is proof enough for me. If there were no God, why do you fight against him?"

Why do you write 700 pages against a non-existent person? ~The Atheist's Handbook~ also belongs to the category of "being" and presupposes an Eternal Being.

THE ORIGIN OF CHRISTIANITY

~The Atheist's Handbook~ begins by complimenting us Christians. It says:

> At least in the initial period of its existence, Christianity not only renounced the offering of sacrifices, but likewise also all kinds of ritual. F. Engels asserted that this was a revolutionary step. Differing from the other religions of antiquity, Christianity refused categorically all ethnic delimitations in matters of faith, its sermons having been addressed to all tribes and peoples. In problems of creed, Christianity has categorically refused also the social barriers. Those who propagated the teaching of Jesus spoke to all men, without difference of ethnic origin or social position.

It is not true that the first Christians renounced the offering of sacrifices. True, they abolished the animal sacrifices. But they gladly sacrificed themselves.

In any case, for once our opponents say good words about us. No national or racial discrimination within Christianity, and this already 2,000 years ago! In Poland and in the Soviet Union, there is discrimination against the Jews. In Russia all the Tatars, the Chechen, the Ingush, the Kalmiks, the Balkar, the Volga-German peoples were deported for no other guilt than belonging to a certain nationality. In Red China, the Tibetans are oppressed. In every Communist country, the first question you are asked is, "What is your social origin?" Woe to you if your father happened to possess a factory.

There were no social barriers in Christianity as Christ taught it.

~The Atheist's Handbook~ does not compliment us further.

It asserts: "The Greek, Roman, and Jewish authors of the first century give us absolutely no information about Christianity." Remark the nice word "absolutely." The denial is absolutely false.

ROMAN AUTHORS ABOUT CHRISTIANITY

The Roman historian Tacitus lived around the years A.D. 60-120.

Referring to the burning of Rome, which happened in A.D. 64, he writes (Annals XV, 24):

> All the endeavours of men, all the emperor's largesse and the propitiations of the gods, did not suffice to allay the scandal or banish the belief that the fire had been ordered. And so, to get rid of this rumour, Nero set up as the culprits and punished with the utmost refinement of cruelty a class hated for their abominations, who are commonly called Christians. Christus, from whom their name is derived, was executed at the hands of the procurator Pontius Pilate in the reign of Tiberius. Checked for the moment, this pernicious superstition again broke out, not only in Judaea, the source of the evil, but even in Rome, that receptacle for everything that is sordid and degrading from every quarter of the globe, which there finds a following. Accordingly, arrest was first made of those, who confessed (to being Christians); then, on their evidence, an immense multitude was convicted, not so much on the charge of arson as because of hatred of the human race. Besides being put to death, they were > made to serve as objects of amusement; they were clad in the hides of beasts and torn to death by dogs; others were crucified, others set on fire to serve to illuminate the night when daylight failed. Nero had thrown open his grounds for the display, and was putting on a show in the circus, where he mingled with the people in the dress of a charioteer or drove about in his chariot. All this gave rise to a feeling of pity, even towards men whose guilt merited the most exemplary punishment; for it was felt that they were being destroyed not for the public good but to gratify the cruelty of an individual.

So the "absolute" of ~The Atheist's Handbook~ is not absolute. We have one Roman historian of the first century witnessing to the existence of Christ.

We can serve our opponents with a second: Suetonius circa A.D. 75-160). He writes in ~Vita Claudii~ (XXV, 4):

"... Since the Jews were continually making disturbances at the instigation of Christus, he (Claudius) expelled them from Rome..."

So again the existence of Christ is ascertained, yea, more: under the emperor Claudius, this Christ already had a multitude of disciples in Rome. In the year A.D. 64, they were already fiercely persecuted, as the same author describes in ~Vita Neronis~ (XVI):

"In his (Nero's) reign many abuses were severely punished and repressed, and as many new laws instituted; ... punishment was inflicted on the Christians, a sect of men adhering to a novel and mischievous superstition."

There follows a third Roman historian, Pliny the Younger, A.D. 62-circa 113. He writes to the Emperor Trajan:

It is my rule, Sire, to refer to you in matters where I am uncertain. For who can better direct my hesitation or instruct my ignorance? I was never present at any trial of Christians; therefore I do not know what are the customary penalties or investigations, and what limits are observed. I have hesitated a great deal on the question whether there should be any distinction of ages; whether the weak should have the same treatment as the more robust; whether those who recant should be pardoned, or whether a man who has ever been a Christian should gain nothing by ceasing to be such; whether the name itself, even if innocent of crime, should be published, or only the crimes attaching to that name.

Meanwhile, this is the course that I have adopted in the case of those brought before me as Christians. I > ask them if they are Christians. If they admit it, I repeat the question a second and a third time, threatening capital punishment; if they persist, I sentence them to death.

We can serve our opponents with a fourth document. We possess the first letter of St. Clement, bishop of Rome, dating from immediately after the Neronian persecution or after that of Domitian. In any case it is from the first century. It also contains plenty of information about Christianity. From it we know the state of the church in Corinth at that time. It tells us that the apostle Peter died as a martyr, that Paul had been in prison seven times. We get the names of other martyrs, the Danaids and Dircae.

St. Clement, writing in the first century, knows Christ as a historical reality. He writes, "Christ is of those who are humble-minded and not of those who exalt themselves over his flock. Our Lord Jesus Christ, the sceptre of the majesty of God, did not come in the pomp of pride or arrogance, although he might have done so, but in a lowly condition, as the Holy Spirit had declared regarding him."

page 46 My Answer to Moscow's Atheists

A passage from Sulpicius Severus, a Christian writer of the fourth century, has also been critically examined and is judged to have been based upon an extract from a lost writing of Tacitus. It tells us about a council of war held by Titus after the capture of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. Titus is reported to have expressed the view that the temple of Jerusalem ought to be destroyed in order that the religion of the Jews and of the Christians might be more completely extirpated. The Christians had arisen from among the Jews, and when the root was torn up, the stem would easily be destroyed. (~Early Christianity and Paganism~, by Donald Spence, Dutton & Co., New York.)

In A.D. 125 the Christian philosopher Aristides presented to the emperor Hadrian a full codex of the moral principles of the church, which must have been old already in order to have so elaborate a system of thinking. I quote from it:

> Those who oppress them [the Christians] they exhort [with the Word] and make them their friends. They do good to their enemies. Their wives, O King, are pure as virgins, and their daughters are modest. Their men abstain from all unlawful sexual contact and from impurity, in the hope of recompense that is to come in another world.

As for their bondmen and bondwomen, and their children, if there are any, they persuade them to become Christians; and when they have done so, they call them brethren without distinction.

They refuse to worship strange gods; and they go their way in all humility and cheerfulness. Falsehood is not found among them. They love one another; the widow's needs are not ignored, and they rescue the orphan from the person who does him violence. He who has gives to him who has not, ungrudgingly and without boasting. When the Christians find a stranger, they bring him to their homes and rejoice over him. When a baby is born to one of them, they praise God, If it dies in infancy, they thank God the more, as for one who has passed through the world without sins. But if one of them died in his iniquity or in his sins, they grieve bitterly and sorrow as over one who is about to meet his doom.

Such, O King, is the commandment given to the Christians, and such is their conduct. As men who know God, they ask from him requests which are proper for him to give and for them to receive; and because they acknowledge the goodness of God towards them, lo! on their account there flows forth the beauty that is in the world. The good which they do, they do not shout in the ears of the multitude, that people may notice; but they conceal their giving as a man conceals a treasure. They strive to be righteous as those who expect to behold the face of their Messiah and to receive from him the promises.

Truly this people is a new people, and there is something divine mingled in the midst of them. Take their writings and read them; you will find that I have not put forth these things on my own authority. The things I have read in their writings I firmly believe, not only about the present but about things to come. There is no doubt in my mind that the earth stands today by reason of the intercession of Christians. Their teaching is the gateway of light.

Let those approach, then, who do not know God, and let them receive incorruptible words which are > from all time and eternity, that they may escape from the dread judgment which through Jesus the Messiah is to come upon the whole human race.

What has remained of the assertion that the first century gives us absolutely no information about Christianity?

page 48 My Answer to Moscow's Atheists

But I did not need to argue that it is not true that there are absolutely no documents about Christianity dating from the first century. The academicians, authors of ~The Atheist's Handbook~, contradict themselves on succeeding pages. They say that the book of Revelation is dated A.D. 68. So we are in the first century. A Jew wrote it. And he begins by telling about an already existing and organized Christianity, even in places far away from Palestine. The Revelation begins with seven letters to the churches of Asia Minor.

THE WITNESS OF THE GOSPELS

That the Gospels were not written in the first century is an axiom for the atheist's Bible. They were written by late, clever forgers. The Gospel according to St. John was allegedly written only at the end of the second century. I

But Ignatius quoted from it, although he was martyred before the year 116. Justin the philosopher quoted it. He died around 140. Even Loisy, the French critic of the Bible, admits that this Gospel was already received in Rome by the year 130.

A simple analysis of the contents of the Gospels shows that they could not be late forgeries. (In asserting this, my opponents put themselves in opposition even to Engels, who ridicules the idea that Christianity is the work of deceivers. See F. Engels, ~Bruno Bauer and Ancient Christianity.~)

At the end of the second century, when the Gospels were allegedly invented, the names of the apostles were highly respected in Christian circles. Why then should a forger, who wished his writing to be accredited God-inspired, tell the churches that Jesus called Peter "Satan" and also rebuked the other apostles? Such words would never have appeared in the Gospel if they had not really been said. The apostles were highly esteemed in the church. Deprecatory words about them would not have been invented by Christians.

At the end of the second century, Christ was worshipped as God in the whole church. Every forger foolish enough to attribute to him a narrow friendship with women or a weakness that made him cry on the cross, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" would never have had his book accepted as a holy book. The same applies to the description of Jesus's fear and anxiety in Gethsemane. Such incidents made the name of the Saviour open to attack.

Celsus, in a book dated A.D. 178, mocks Jesus because of his anguish on the cross, reminding us that his disciples endured suffering in brave silence. He must have known the facts about Jesus from the Gospels. The Evangelists did not write them down to accomplish their own self-serving purposes but simply because they had witnessed them; and they did not care if the sighs and tears, suffering and pain would degrade Jesus in the opinion of many. Such accounts are the proof of the genuineness and early age of the Gospels.

Late forgeries would have been full of adulation for Jesus. They would not tell us that he was considered by some of his contemporaries, by his own people, by people who knew him best, as a devil, that Jesus himself said to a young man, "Why callest thou me good?"

The Gospels and the Epistles retain some Aramaic words. Aramaic was the language spoken by the Jews in Palestine. If the Gospels were written at the end of the second century in the Greek-speaking world, why would the forgers have retained the Aramaic utterances? They made sense only in the first decades of Christian history, when the majority of Christians were Jews.

The Gospels contain big debates between Jesus and his adversaries about the right manner of keeping the Sabbath and about the value of Jewish ceremonies. For Jewish readers of the first century, these were important

Gentile Christians of the second century would not have understood or been concerned with what the discussions were about. A forger would have had to explain the meaning of phylacteries, tithe, the Jewish ablutions, and who the Pharisees and Sadducees, etc., were. But the authors of the Gospels take this knowledge for granted, because they wrote very early and recorded the episodes of the life of Jesus exactly as they happened.

Nowhere in the New Testament do we find the slightest trace of a church in a village. Christianity must have been primarily an urban phenomenon. Why then should forgers have put in the mouth of Jesus continual allusions to country life, to birds and flowers and farming?

We have known in this century masters in forgery. They painted the nimbus of a saint around a man whom they themselves afterwards denounced as a criminal. Forgers must be clever men. If the Evangelists had been forgers, they would not have made such terrible mistakes, nor would they have succeeded in having their books accepted as sacred Scriptures.

A detail of the Gospel narrative which proves its historical accuracy, as well as its old age, is found in JHN 19:34. We are told that when one of the soldiers pierced the side of our crucified Lord with a spear, "forthwith there came out blood and water." The reason is not given. But the Evangelist John had been an eye-witness, and he wrote what he had seen. Neither he nor anybody else at that time could explain what happened. Only after eighteen centuries did a Doctor Simpson, discoverer of chloroform, show that Jesus Christ died from what is called in scientific language extravasation of the blood, or in modern language, a broken heart. When one dies in this way, the arms are thrown out (of course, Jesus's arms were already stretched out on the cross); there is a loud cry, such as Jesus uttered; and "the blood escapes into the pericardium and prevents the heart from beating.

There the blood stands for a short time; it separates into serum (the water) and clots (the red corpuscles in the blood). When the soldier pierced the back (pericardium), the blood and water flowed out."

Is it conceivable that a writer would have made up an account of facts which never occurred, but for which a strictly scientific explanation, fitting precisely the facts, could be given only after nearly two thousand years?

The story about the Gospel being a late forgery is in itself a late forgery.

Is it conceivable that a non-existent, mythical personality was the Creator of the whole Christian civilization, the citizens of which outnumber those of any earthly empire?

No empire has existed for two thousand years as has the Christian empire, which has survived the persecution, hate, and privations of twenty centuries.

Christianity is the greatest fact in the world - and this greatest fact was produced by a non-existent personality? Sheer nonsense! Who can believe such a thing?

John Stuart Mill wrote: "It is no use to say that Christ, as exhibited in the gospels, is not historical. Who among his disciples, or among their proselytes, was capable of inventing the sayings ascribed to Jesus or imagining the life and character revealed in the gospels? Certainly not the fishermen of Galilee and certainly not St. Paul."

Who could have invented the personality of Jesus - not only his goodness and meekness, but his genius in dealing with people and problems, his insight and ability as an evangelist?

And then who would be the inventors of Jesus? Jews could not have invented him, because in the first century their monotheism was so stubbornly maintained that they would never have invented a man as representing the incarnation of their unseen God.

Jews despised other nations. They would not drink a cup of water from the hands of a Samaritan, so they certainly could not have invented Jesus, who made friends with foreigners. They believed in themselves as the chosen race: why should they have invented someone who obliterated all race distinctions and embraced all men?

Nor could the first Christians have invented him.

We see from the beginning that far from being able to invent a Jesus, they could only spoil his beautiful name.

St. Paul already writes that in his time the majority of those who preached did so out of greed, covetousness, a desire for fame, and selfish motives, and had distorted the word of God. Greedy and selfish preachers cannot invent a Jesus.

And even if men had succeeded in inventing an incarnate God, they would never have invented him as a Jew, a man belonging to a despised race, and a carpenter at that, a man without learning, who was born in a manger and died on a cross and who has not left one written sentence behind him.

Such things could not be invented.

Referring to the three questions spoken by the devil when he tempted Jesus in the wilderness "If thou be the Son of God command that these stones be made bread"; "If thou be the Son of God, cast thyself down [from the pinnacle of the temple]: for it is written, He shall give his angels charge concerning thee: and in their hands they shall bear thee up, lest at any time thou dash thy foot against a stone"; and "[All the kingdoms of the world and their glory], all these things will I give thee, if thou wilt fall down and worship me," Dostoievsky writes in ~The Brothers Karamazov~:

> If there has ever been on earth a real, stupendous miracle, it took place on the day of the three temptations. The statement of these three questions is itself the miracle. If it were possible to imagine simply for > the sake of argument that those three questions of the dread spirit had perished utterly from the books and that we had to restore them and to invent them anew and to do so had gathered together all the wise men of the earth - rulers, chief priests, learned men, philosophers, poets - and had set them the task to invent three questions, such as would only fit the occasion, but express in three words, three human phrases, the whole future history of the world and of humanity dost thou believe that all the wisdom of the earth united could have invented anything in depth and force equal to the three questions which were actually put to thee thence by the wise and mighty spirit in the wilderness? From those questions alone, from the miracle of their statement, we can see that we have here to do not with fleeting human intelligence, but with the absolute and eternal.

Ingersoll, well-known atheistic writer, said about Jesus:

> With Renan, I believe Christ was the one perfect man. "Do unto others what you would that they should do unto you" is the perfection of religion and morality. It is the summum bonum. It was loftier than the teachings of Socrates, Plato, Mohammed, Moses, or Confucius. It superseded the commandments that Moses claimed to have gotten from God, for with Christ's "do unto others" there could be no murder, lying, covetousness, or war.

The perfect man could not be invented by very imperfect apostles.

page 54 My Answer to Moscow's Atheists

ARGUMENTS AGAINST THE EARLY ORIGIN OF THE GOSPELS

Well, but let us not be unfair. We have brought so many arguments of our own as to forget the weighty arguments of the academicians against the early origin of the Gospels. They are three:

(1) The Gospels report the expelling of merchants from the temple. "But there has been no commerce in that temple." How the doctors in atheism know this, they do not say. But we will quote from the Talmud, which is surely an accepted reference on Jewish affairs and a higher authority in this matter than my opponents. In the treatise "Shabbat," page 15a, it says that forty years before the destruction of the temple, which means just within the lifetime of Jesus, there were shops in it.

(2) "The Bible writes about a flock of 2,000 pigs in the district of the Gadarenes in Palestine. But the breeding of pigs has been forbidden to the Jews from the time of the Old Testament. Therefore, in Palestine there could not exist flocks of pigs."

What opinion do you, dear reader, have about the conclusiveness of this argument? Be respectful! Academicians are speaking. There can be no criminality in our country because the law forbids it. There cannot be any quarrel between Chinese, Russian, and Yugoslavian Communists because proletarian Internationalism forbids it. Do these propositions sound plausible?

Besides, Moscow's Academy must have a geographical section, which should know that Gadara was in Peraea, east of the Jordan, a region which properly did not belong to Palestine and was not populated by Jews only.

(3) The authors of the Gospels could not be Jews because they do not mention animals native to Palestine at that time, such as wildcats, jackals, and panthers.

Another very convincing argument!

By the same token I might be led to believe that ~The

page 55 My Answer to Moscow's Atheists

Atheist's Handbook~ was not written in the Soviet Union because lice, bugs, and rats are not mentioned in it. But I know how much Christians suffered because of these in prison, in the earliest years of terror.

I have done justice to my opponents. I have considered their arguments about the Gospels, too, not just mine. It is for the reader to judge their comparative value.

THE MESSAGE OF THE NEW TESTAMENT

The criticisms brought against the New Testament as being a phantasmagoric. late forgery are unfounded.

But if so, why were they brought?

Suppose that the New Testament was a bad book: why then are 700 pages written to refute it? Every year there appear in the Soviet Union good and bad sometimes very bad - novels. Nobody leads a world-wide crusade lasting decades against a bad novel. Readers themselves discard it. The line of the Communist Party keeps changing. Books considered great are suddenly banned. Twenty years ago who would have dared to have a library without the great genius Stalin's books? But one day an order came. The books simply disappeared. Nobody refutes them. They are buried in silence, as if they had not been written. Then Khrushchev began to publish his more modest collection of articles and speeches, well edited, so as not to remind the reader that he had been one of Stalin's flatterers. These books also disappeared. No refutations. Nobody refutes the tens of volumes of Trotsky.

Why is it that such a fight is led to criticize, to tear to pieces the New Testament, while at the same time the Soviet population is forbidden to have a copy of it, from which they might be able to form their own opinion?

Beliefs must rest upon evidence open to examination. What science implies is not so much the importance of any particular truth as the right to seek truth and extend its usefulness unhampered by restrictions. Particular beliefs can survive only so long as they justify themselves against opposition.

Then why do you prevent people from having the New Testament?

It is because the Gospels and the New Testament as a whole contain a message of paramount importance for every man.

Can anyone imagine a good dinner without a cook? But nature is a banquet. There are in nature wheat and potatoes and milk and meat and fruits of many kinds. There are sunshine and rain, lovely flowers and the joyful chirping of birds. There are things useful and things beautiful, to satisfy your body and gladden your soul. Who is the cook at the banquet of nature? It is a wise Creator, God.

It is said that a scientist, coming home from his laboratory, was called to supper by his wife. A salad was set before him. Being an atheist, he said, "If leaves of lettuce, grains of salt, drops of vinegar and oil, and slices of eggs had been floating about in the air from all eternity, it might at last happen by chance that there would come a salad." "Yes," answered his wife, "but not so nice and well-dressed as mine." Atoms which have come together at random would not make such a beautiful universe.

The atom is mysterious. Life is mysterious. Scientists are far from having discovered their secrets. How much more then is God, the creator of matter and life, mysterious. The Gospel according to St. John says: "No one has seen God." When Moses once asked him: "Show me thy face that I may know thee," he received the categorical answer: "Thou canst not see my face, for man shall not see me and live."

No philosopher can comprehend him, but even the simplest man can apprehend him, just as no scientist comprehends yet the secrets of the atom, but every man can handle matter constituted of atoms.

The New Testament tells us about this God, as does nature, too.

I once spoke with a prison officer, a member of the Communist party. He told me in a moment of confidence: "I looked one autumn day through the window at a bare tree. I knew that next spring it would again be full of leaves and buds, with birds chirping in its branches. And I adored the 'I do not know who' or 'I do not know what,' which gives me trees and wheat and flowers. I throw black coals into the fire and the fire changes it into beautiful white flames. I adore the Power or the Person, I do not know who or what he is, which rewards our evil with good and sometimes changes ugly lives, lives of former bandits, into beautiful lives of martyrs of a holy cause. I have known such men among you Christians." This Communist officer did not comprehend God, but he had apprehended him.

It is easy for ~The Atheist's Handbook~ to ridicule primitive conceptions of God, the old man with a white beard sitting on a throne, as we see him on ikons.

When Christians are children, they are taught in a childlike way about God. Many of them, when they become older, fail to fulfill the Biblical injunction to put away childish things. They remain with these childlike conceptions, which are easily mocked by the atheists. But God is other than some immature conception of him.

These ikon images are surely not more ridiculous than the image of the atom drawn by the great physicist Niels Bohr. The atom is otherwise than we can draw it, and God is otherwise than what we think of him. But science could not do without its approximations. We Christians also use human words and human painting to express our feelings about God. But St. Thomas Aquinas, one of our great teachers, wrote: "God is not what you imagine or what you think you understand. If you understand, you have failed." Our mind is surely too small to encompass the Infinite Being, but – as I said – we can apprehend him.

A Christian once asked an atheist, with whom he took a walk through the meadows: "Who made all these beautiful flowers?" "Forget it!" was the answer. "Do not come again with your stupid talk about God. The flowers exist by themselves." The Christian did not persist. After a few days, he was visited by this same atheist friend in his home. He had in his sitting room a beautiful picture representing flowers. The atheist asked him: "Who painted this?" The Christian said: "Do not begin with religious rubbish! Nobody painted these flowers. They came into the painting by themselves. Nature made the carved frame. Then by itself the picture jumped upon the wall, on to a nail which just happened to be there, driven by nobody. And that is all." The atheist took the joke badly. But then the Christian asked: "Is it logical to believe that these three flowers in the picture which have no fragrance and no life, must have been created by somebody, while believing that the millions of living flowers with their heady perfume in the valleys and on the hills have no Creator?"

God is a mystery. Jesus teaches us to say: "Our Father, who art in heaven," not "Our Father, who walks on the streets and can be met by everybody on any corner." He is in the world incognito.

Pin a butterfly to a board and you have killed it. It is no more a butterfly, but its corpse. So we cannot pin down God in any definition. We use names for him, knowing that they are inadequate. The utmost that we can say about him is that he is the one beyond whom nothing greater can be conceived.

But God has revealed himself in the person of Jesus Christ, the Son of God, who once came to this earth. About him the New Testament speaks. Millions have had their lives changed by him.

False is the assertion of ~The Atheist's Handbook~ that

page 59 My Answer to Moscow's Atheists

Christ's teachings destroy the joy of life. To renounce joy is un-Christian. Rejection of joy is a rejection of what we Christians consider the creation of God. Why should we refuse what a good Father has given us? The Old Testament provided that a man might vow to renounce for a short season all earthly pleasures. When this season was over, he had to bring a sacrifice to God as atonement for the sin of having disdained God's marvelous gift: pleasure. Christianity deprives nobody of joy. On the contrary, Christianity adds to pure earthly joys heavenly ones. What greater pleasure is there than to love?

Do not accept all these unproved falsehoods imputed to us, especially when Christian authors are not allowed to reply. The simple fact that atheists keep us gagged while they write shows that they are unfair and therefore not trustworthy.

Put your faith in God!

This God suffers with us. He shares all our sorrows. He sacrifices himself for us. He desires us.

Marx and historical materialism have deprived reality of its very soul, God, and have thus devastated it.

The knowledge of God is the key for knowing the world profoundly. We do not have reality plus God, but reality clothed in the beauty of God. Similarly, in a painting we don't have scenery plus a sunset; rather, all the hills and valleys and trees are bathed in its colours.

In some caves of Thailand were discovered prehistoric drawings showing men and fish in what one might call "X-ray style." The artist of not less than 3,000 years ago shows the details which he could not see, but about the existence of which he knew. Drawing a man or an animal, he included the skeleton and his organs as the stomach, the lungs, etc. Such drawings were found earlier among the aborigines of Australia.

We consider such art primitive. It might not be as beautiful as our art, but it is nearer to reality. In a gallery of portraits what we see portrayed is not primarily the subjects themselves but rather the clothes made by their tailors. Of a subject we see only the face and the hands. If nudes are exposed, we see the skin. We are content with very little. The primitive artist wished more of reality, because in a sense he was closer to reality than we sophisticated, modern men.

page 60 My Answer to Moscow's Atheists

The New Testament speaks about the universe and history in the same "X-ray" manner. The materialists see only the outside of things. The believers see all the outside things, plus what animates the universe and history, the inside, God working in his creation and manifesting himself as love in action.
God sent his own Son, Jesus Christ, on our behalf. As a baker takes upon himself your care for bread and the farmer your care for vegetables, as the shoemaker gives you his product, as a professor takes away your ignorance and gives you knowledge accumulated over the centuries, so Jesus, the Son of God, the only one who never committed any sin, has taken it upon himself to care for you. He gives you his righteousness. You become like a new-born babe, like a man who has never sinned. Life begins anew in union with God. As for your sinfulness, he has taken it upon himself.
You feel, somehow, that your sins have been very grave. They have produced suffering in others. Perhaps tears and blood have been shed, and you are guilty. Well, he bore not only your sins, but also the punishment for your sins. He bore it, dying on the cross on a mount called Golgotha near Jerusalem. Through his wounds we are healed.
The New Testament says: "God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life" (John 3 16). Remark the word "whosoever" even the author of an Atheist's Handbook, anyone; even men who have committed the worst of crimes.
The New Testament teaches us that Jesus is standing

page 61 My Answer to Moscow's Atheists

at the door of our heart and constantly knocking. If anyone hears him and opens the door, he comes in and talks with him heart to heart.

Life does not consist only in working for the state or in eating, drinking, and enjoying sex. Christ is a spiritual being. He desires to enable you to overcome sin and death and hell and only waits for your decision. And he promises not only a future heaven, but a heavenly life right now in your soul.

The New Testament tells us that Christ, the Son of God, loved men so much that he prayed for his murderers even while enduring the pains of the cross. You may have been a thief. Christ died among thieves and, while hanging on the cross, saved one of them, who repented, for paradise. He did not shun scoundrels or harlots. It was his greatest joy to forgive great crimes.

The New Testament is deprecated by atheists, because it proclaims love as the guiding principle of life and makes one's heart a corner of heaven. The mind begins to think truthfully, because errors in life are often nothing less than a lack of love. After you have once looked earnestly into the mirror of truth, which is Christ, great compassion towards all mankind will fill your soul and you will be wonderfully free.

The Soviet population is not permitted to know the message of the New Testament, because it would unite them with God. Therefore, the fierce but unfounded attacks upon it. But it is easy for us Christians, who have this deep insight into the great realities of sin and atonement, to understand why our atheist friends shudder before the cross and even write a book 700 pages long against it. With unwelcome intuition the atheists feel that the Bible contains the final truth.

Stalin is dead, but never will any Communist sing, "Stalin, lover of my soul"; nor is he apt to sing, "Khrushchev, my most beloved"; nor will his descendants a century from now sing to Brezhnev, "I need thee every hour."

Yet these are sung about Jesus all over the world almost two thousand years after his crucifixion.

And try as they might, the Communists will never be able to silence these songs in holy Mother Russia!

About them no songs will be sung.

Already, jokes told about them today show what fame they will have in the future.

There is much sadness in the world. It needs laughter. I like it so much when people are joyful that I don't mind if they laugh at my expense. I hope that my opponents have the same feelings and that they will not take it amiss if I tell them two jokes which circulate in Russia.

The first: A high school pupil was asked in history class, "Who was Stalin?" He answered, "A man who, loving the cult of his own personality, became a murderer. He killed even his nearest comrades. This is the teaching about him of the Twentieth Congress of our Party."

"Bravo," says the professor. "Now, answer, please, who was Khrushchev?"

Promptly, the boy replied, "Khrushchev was an idiot, righteously removed from leadership by the vote of the Central Committee."

"Also very well. Now for the last question - Who is Brezhnev?"

"He is another idiot," came the answer.

The professor stopped him: "This will probably be true in a year or two, when a corresponding resolution is taken. For the time being, he is a genial leader, and I have to give you a bad mark."

And a second joke: In a school the teacher tells the children, "The Party is our father, and the Red Army is our mother." Then he asks one of the children, "What would you like to become?" The child answers, "An orphan."

Men have loved Jesus. Others have hated him. Most have been indifferent to his message. But nobody has ever dared to make malicious jokes about him.

IRREVERENT ATTACKS AGAINST THE BIBLE

From criticism of the New Testament, ~The Atheist's Handbook~ passes to criticism of the whole Bible.

We are sorry that here also the attacks are vulgar, shallow. We could have expected otherwise. There is such a thing as an elegant, generous form of disbelief.

Such, for example, is the atheism of Ludwig Feuerbach. He did not believe in God but wanted to keep religion, which makes man noble, loving, and righteous. Feuerbach (The Essence of Christianity, vol. II) called religion "holy" because it is "the tradition of the first consciousness," which to him meant childhood. Is it not beautiful to keep the memories of the childish period of mankind, he asks?

Jesus would not have objected to calling religion childish. He taught us to become like little children. We all value the remembrances of childhood. Why throw them out as brutally as the Communists do? Is it because they are reminded of a time when their souls were more beautiful than they are now?

We would recommend that our opponents read ~The Atheist's Mass~, by Honor, de Balzac. The chief character is an atheistic surgeon, Desplein. When he was a very poor and hungry student, a water-carrier named Bourgeat, animated by Christian love, had helped him, through hard work and personal sacrifice, to finish his studies, after which the latter became a renowned doctor.

Now Desplein was an infidel. But when Bourgeat, from his deathbed, requested him to say masses for the repose of his soul, the atheist professor, impelled by gratitude, agreed to comply. Thereafter, he regularly said the required prayers for the deceased Catholic who had done him good.

We have attempted to show understanding for atheists, but we feel we have a right to expect cultured atheists to recognize the extent to which their culture depends on the Bible and to be at least decent in their attacks.

Friedrich Nietzsche was the first to declare that "God is dead." He was Hitler's favourite philosopher. Hitler drew the right conclusions. If God were dead, he, Hitler, need have no scruples about killing millions of innocent men and even children. But Nietzsche was far removed from his future disciple. Nietzsche spoke about the death of God with holy awe. His madman, after proclaiming the death of God, goes to different churches and sings a "~Requiem aeternam Deo~," a hymn of mourning for the dead God. To Nietzsche, God was dead. For him, this conclusion was a source of high drama. But one can sense that he was genuinely sorry that his god was no longer alive.

With the authors of ~The Atheist's Handbook~, it is just the opposite. They revel in the death of God. Now they no longer have to worry about conscience, truthfulness, and love. They can do what they like.

This atheism is indecent.

R. Garaudy, one-time member of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of France, wrote: "We cannot disregard the essential contribution of Christianity without getting poorer" (From ~Anathema to Dialogue~).

Lunacharsky, once a minister of education in the Soviet Government, wrote: "The notion of God always contains something eternally beautiful ... Sorrow always dwells in men. He who does not know how to conceive the world religiously is condemned to pessimism ..."

Communist atheists begin the history of right thought with themselves, with catastrophic results. They end up ignoring or seeking to obliterate truth acquired by mankind during millenniums of development.

Consequent]y, they make a caricature of religion. We regret this. Caricatures are always dangerous for those who draw them.

A young woman once had a discussion with the great satirist Hogarth while he was at the drawing board. She expressed a wish to learn to draw caricatures, to which Hogarth replied: "Alas, young lady, it is not a faculty to be envied. Take my advice and never draw caricatures. By the long practice of it, I have lost the enjoyment of beauty. I never see a face but what it is distorted. I never have the satisfaction of beholding the human face divine."

Those who caricature true religion are in the same situation. In the distorting mirror of their warped minds, even angels seem to have the devil's features.

They do not realize that if the Bible were set aside as a valueless book, all the famous literature of the world would perish with it. What would remain of Dostoievsky, Tolstoy, Milton, John Bunyan, Walter Scott, and Anatole France? Tennyson said that the book of Job was the finest poem he had ever read. There are three hundred quotations from the Bible in his works. Shakespeare used over five hundred ideas and phrases taken from it. Byron's poem "Darkness" was inspired by the Book of Jeremiah.

Even ~The Capital~ of Marx would have to be changed, along with his other writings and those of Engels, because they are saturated with references to the Bible.

If the Bible were taken away, the works of Michelangelo, Raphael, Leonardo da Vinci, Rembrandt, and any other great painters of the world would be unintelligible to us, as would many of the great pieces of music of Bach, Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, Brahms, and others.

Listen to the testimony of renowned men.

page 66 My Answer to Moscow's Atheists

William Gladstone, four times premier of Great Britain, said: "If asked what is the remedy for the deeper sorrows of the human heart, what a man should chiefly look to in his progress as the power that is to sustain him under trials and enable him to confront his inevitable afflictions, I must point him to something which in a well-known hymn is called 'The Old, Old Story' told in an old book, which is the greatest and best gift ever given to mankind." He referred to the Bible.

Jean Jacques Rousseau writes: "How mean, how contemptible are the words of our philosophers with all their contradictions, compared with the Scriptures. Is it possible that a book at once so simple and so sublime should be merely the words of man?"

Goethe writes: "The Bible becomes ever more beautiful, the more it is understood."

Heinrich Heine, who was very far from being a religious enthusiast, writes: "... The depth of creation written into the blue mysteries of heaven; sunrise and sunset; promise and fulfillment; birth and death; the whole human drama everything is in this book. It is a book of books, the Bible."

The English and German languages in a particular way would not be what they are if they had not been transformed by the Bible. It is the one book which has provided the impetus for giving hundreds of peoples and tribes their first alphabet. Through the labours of dedicated men and women, it is the first book they learn to read.

Garibaldi, the Italian patriot who politically liberated and unified his fatherland (finishing this work in 1870) said of the Bible: "This is the cannon that will make Italy free."

Below is the testimony of some of America's most renowned presidents:

Washington: "Above all, the pure and unbending light of Revelation has had illuminating influence on

page 67 My Answer to Moscow's Atheists

mankind and increased the blessings of society."

Lincoln: "I have always taken counsel of God and referred to him my plans and have never adopted a course of proceeding without being assured as far as I could be of his approval. I should be the most presumptuous blockhead upon this footstone, if I for one day thought that I could discharge the duties which have come upon me since I came into this place, without the aid and enlightenment of one who is wiser and stronger than others."

Grant: "Hold fast to the Bible as the anchor of your liberties. Write its precepts in your hearts and practise them in your lives. To the influence of this book, we are indebted for all the progress made in true civilization, and to this we must look as our guide in the future."

Garfield: "Choose the undying Jesus as your everlasting friend and helper. Follow him, not simply as a Nazarene, the man of Galilee, but as an ever-living spiritual person, full of love and compassion, who will stand by you in life and death and eternity. The hopes of the world are false, but as the vine lives in the branches, so Christ lives in the Christian, and he shall never die."

McKinley: "We must be doers, not hearers only. To be doers of the word it is necessary that we must first be hearers of the word; yet attendance at church is not enough. We must study the Bible, but let it not rest there. We must apply it in active life."

Wilson: "If every man in the United States would read a chapter of the Bible every day, most of our national problems would disappear."

Franklin D. Roosevelt said: "I reiterate the statement which I have made times before - that a revival of religion is what this country most needs; that in such a revival we would find a solution of all our problems, whether political, economic, or social."

But what about the Communists themselves?

Marx wrote: "Luther, by giving the Bible to the people in the vernacular language, put into their hands a powerful weapon against the nobility, the landlords, and the clergy."

Stalin and Mikoyan were both seminarians. The latter even has a degree in theology. It was the Bible which formed the beginning of their culture. Khrushchev confessed publicly that he learned to read from the Bible.

The essential idea of every socialist constitution - "If any would not work, neither should he eat" - is copied textually from the Bible (2TH 3:10).

The whole idea of Communism is taken from the Bible, in which we are told:

> "The multitude of them that believed [in Jesus] were of one heart and of one soul: neither said any of them that aught of the things which he possessed was his own; but they had all things common ... Neither was there any among them that lacked: for as many as were possessors of lands or houses sold them, and brought the prices of the things that were sold, and laid them down at the apostles' feet: and distribution was made unto every man according as he had need" (Acts 4:32-35).

The first disciples of Jesus lived under communism, but a communism based on love and free will. Nobody was pressured, nor was anything expropriated. Love prompted everyone to share with his brother. In spite of dissimilarities, today's Communism is also of Biblical origin.

I can accept the fact that a person might not believe in the Bible, but that should not prevent him from respecting his heritage. Does it count for nothing that the Bible was the first book printed in Europe? Does it count for nothing that Christian missionaries taught the natives of Africa to give up cannibalism, to read, to behave as civilized men?

page 69 My Answer to Moscow's Atheists

A former cannibal once said to a Communist propagandist, "What? This book not true? I take it in my house and sit down and read it, and it makes my heart burst with joy. How can this be a lie? I was an eater of men, a drunkard, thief, and liar, and the book spoke to me and made of me a new man. No, this book is not a lie."

The Communist propagandists would have been eaten by the natives in many parts of the world if the missionaries had not taught them first the Christian religion. While spreading atheism, these propagandists should be thankful to Christianity for creating civilization and providing the freedom for them to operate.

An honourable atheist is one who bows before the church in gratitude for what mankind owes to Christianity. But to spit in the well from which you and the whole civilized world have drunk is terribly wrong.

In the seventeenth century, when atheism was rare among Jews, a Jew told a rabbi, "I don't believe in God." The rabbi embraced the man and said, "How I envy you, brother. You are in a much better spiritual state than I. When I see a man suffering, I say to myself, God will help him,' and don't give him assistance. You don't believe in the existence of God, so you have to help him. You have to do the deeds which God would do if he were to exist. Just go on like this: feed the hungry, comfort the distressed, give truth and joy to those in need, embrace everybody in love, and in general behave as God would behave if he existed. And then come back in a year and tell me if there is a God or not."

The rabbi could afford to take an elegant attitude towards the atheist, in order to encourage him to squeeze the best out of his atheism. You, my Communist opponents, do not behave like this towards a believer.

You live on a lower level and your whole stand is untenable.

~The Atheist's Handbook~ appeals to our reason, trying with arguments to prove its points. Now, if the authors admit that we can reason, why is it impossible to find a Bible in any bookshop in the Soviet Union? The population should be able to read it for themselves, compare it with what its opponents have to say, and then draw their own conclusions. Why is the Bible banned? Do you not believe in man's power to reason "rightly"? Then why go to the trouble to adduce arguments? Just give the order "Disbelieve!" and be done with it.

DID THE CHARACTERS IN THE BIBLE REALLY EXIST?

Criticism of the Bible text is a legitimate concern of the human mind Christian theologians did not need to wait for the advice of ~The Atheist's Handbook~ to verify Biblical history, reconciling Biblical and secular chronologies and investigating archaeological data. The fact that we believe in the divine inspiration and the infallibility of Scriptures has never prevented us from examining minutely its text and its content, to be very sure we have the words as God inspired them, unmarred by later copyists or translators.

But Bible criticism as practised by our atheist opponents is of an entirely different type. They deny the most important events of Bible narrative and relegate the principal Biblical personalities to the realm of myth.

Christians do not believe that the Bible is a scientific book. It is an oriental work thousands of years old, containing much poetry and symbolism, and it cannot be used as a modern textbook of science.

But the facts of the Bible remain, and science cannot confute them. It is a fact that the archaeologist's shovel always substantiates, never disproves, the Biblical narrative.

For the authors of ~The Atheist's Handbook~ Adam and Eve are personalities of a myth.

There is no valid reason to deny the Biblical record that Adam and Eve really lived on earth in the garden of Eden and were expelled from it, just as we do not uncritically discard other historical records kept by mankind.

But our opponents render us a service by calling the story a myth. A myth is not something unreal, but is, rather, highest reality expressed in images and symbols arising from, and appealing to, the depths of the human soul.

The story of Adam and Eve is more than history. It is history and myth at the same time.

Your own lives, my dear opponents, are a reproduction of what happened to Adam and Eve. There has been the innocence of childhood in a world untrammelled with worries and fretting about big problems. Perhaps you remember when sin, trespassing against the moral law you lived by, first invaded your life and made you hide from God. Later it may have taken the form of hiding some of your autobiography from the Party. We should not reproach our first forefathers. If Adam and Eve had not sinned, ~we~ would have eaten the forbidden fruit.

Adam and Eve are archetypes of general human experience, of what happens with every soul. Myths cannot be opposed to reality. They are very often a deepening of the sense of some isolated fact, showing it to be typical for the whole of mankind. You cannot disregard the value of the Mona Lisa by saying that it is only a portrait. It is the portrait of a living being. A portrait is as much a reality as the human being it shows. The Mona Lisa is, in a certain sense, even more real than the person it portrays. It is more beautiful, more permanent; it sums up her best features. It corrects nature. The portrait does not contradict the person. The spiritual sense of Adam and Eve's story does not contradict their being historical beings.

What I said about Adam and Eve applies also to the

page 72 My Answer to Moscow's Atheists

remedy for sin, to the sacrifice of Christ. Every man who has done something wrong seeks a scapegoat, someone he can charge with his own offence. Knowing this psychological law embedded in the sinner, Christ offered himself as the scapegoat. He, being the Son of God, takes the whole responsibility for our entire life, good and evil. He has identified himself with us out of love and has borne our punishment. What he endured in crucifixion on Golgotha avails us as if we ourselves had passed through all his torments. We are free from our sins and guilt because Christ shed his blood for us. Then he rose from the dead, showing us that we who believe in him will also be resurrected to be with him in Paradise.

His death and resurrection are historic reality. But the myth about a god who dies as a sacrifice for sin and rises again goes back before Christ. ~The Atheist's Handbook~ is correct in reminding us that approximately the same things were believed about the god Horus of the Egyptians, of the god Mithra, and others. Unlike Christ, these gods were not historic, but archetypal realities. All these "gods" were counterfeits of the genuine Redeemer who had been promised to mankind and in that sense foreshadowed the coming of Christ. Horus and Mithra and Dionysus were names given to the Saviour from sins after whom mankind longed. And Kun-Yin and Isis and Diana, the goddesses, were foreshadowings of the mother of the Lord, expressions of the longing after a perfect ideal of purity, tenderness, self-sacrifice, and all the feminine virtues.

We will not worry, then, if our opponents call Adam and Eve and the Redeemer promised to them after the fall in Paradise myths.

A flood in Noah's time which destroyed the whole earth? Another legend, my opponents say.

But the Biblical narrative is corroborated by the Chinese, Greek, British, and Mexican stories of a deluge. Cuneiform tablets unearthed in Babylonia in 1870 also bore an account of the flood, striking because of its resemblance to the Bible record. Believed to date from 3000 B.C., these tablets must have been written when people vividly recalled the deluge.

page 73 My Answer to Moscow's Atheists

Called the Gilgamesh epic, this narrative tells how the hero of the flood, Utnapishtim, escaped the general destruction of mankind. The great gods of the ancient city of Shuruppak (modern Fara) resolved to destroy the race by a flood. The god Ea disclosed the divine decree to Utnapishtim and saved him and his family.

Another story of the flood has been found written in Sumerian, a language which antedates both Assyrian and Babylonian.

The renowned anthropologist Sir James Frazer collected traditions about the flood from the most varied and remote places, such as the Leeward Islands, Bengal, China, and Malaysia. Everywhere peoples and backward tribes keep the memory of this tremendous event. They agree in the main that the flood was a punishment for grave sins and that only a few righteous people were saved.

Josephus Flavius is generally considered one of the most reliable historians of antiquity. He writes in ~Antiquities of the Jews~: "The Armenians call this place (where Noah and his family came out of the ark) ~Apobaterion~, the place of descent."

In the story of the flood, facts and myth merge again. Engraved in the deepest reaches of our mind is the truth that generalized grave sin will result in catastrophe. We know also that there have been many cases when the righteousness of a few has miraculously saved them from general destruction. The historical account of the flood was overlaid in the memories of many peoples with legends which express this truth. These legends are as real as the flood itself.

The flood in Noah's time was not a unique event. Jesus says, "As the days of Noe were, so shall also the coming of the Son of man be. For as in the days that were before the flood they were eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage, until the day that Noe entered into the ark, and knew not until the flood came and took them all away; so shall also the coming of the Son of man be" (MTT 24:37-39).

The world is now on the brink of a new catastrophe for sinners. The Bible says that this time it will be destroyed by fire. ("The elements shall melt with fervent heat." These words were written two thousand years ago by Peter the fisherman long before anyone knew about chemical elements, the destructive power and annihilating capacity of atomic fission and its fervent heat.) As Noah had a warning from God, so the church has a warning today. The world in Noah's time was destroyed although its wickedness was not sufficient to forbid Noah's preaching. What judgment can today's world expect when it puts an interdiction upon the warnings! Mankind should not be aware of the dangers facing the world of today; therefore - in ~The Atheist's Handbook~ the denial of the flood of old – even at the price of denying historical evidence.

There is no proof for the existence of Abraham and his descendants, say our opponents further.

Has any historical excavation proved the existence of Spartacus, the leader of a revolt of slaves, a man who figures in all histories of Socialism? Surely not. It is taken for granted that Spartacus really existed because Roman historian wrote about him. Then why do the historians of socialism not apply the same yardstick to Biblical personalities, even if historical excavations should not prove anything about their existence? Why should they have spoken about Abraham who lived most of his life as a nomad? We believe in his historical existence, as we believe in the historical reality of Spartacus, because historians, the writers of the Bible, speak about his life and the lives of the other personalities of the Old Testament.

Further, all the Jews of all times have known themselves to be the descendants of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. All the Arabs from time immemorial have known that Abraham was their father. All the Christians and all the Moslems of the world have always venerated Abraham as the ancestor of their faith in one single God.

Should all this count for nothing?

Abraham bought the cave of Machpelah for the burial of Sarah. Afterwards, this cave became a family tomb. There were buried Isaac, Rebekah, Leah, and Jacob. A mosque and a synagogue now stand above this cave, and it is one of the holiest places of pilgrimage for the Moslems.

Imagine that after a few hundred or thousand years someone seeing the mausoleum of Lenin should say that Lenin was not a historical personality but a myth. The corpse of Lenin, it would be said, is only a wax figure. Suppose that after two thousand years archaeologists who had heard about Stalin should find nothing relating to him, not a corpse nor even so much as a wax figure. Surely they would deny his existence.

"How foolish," you say. But then the denial of Abraham's existence is also foolish.

A site in Israel indicates the historicity of Abraham's grandson: The well of Jacob, where Jesus spoke with the Samaritan woman, still exists in Palestine and is covered by a little Greek church. The well itself is immediately below the high altar.

But Jacob and his descendants are also not historical personages, we are told by our opponents.

Either the authors of ~The Atheist's Handbook~ are ignorant, which is not permissible for men who write a book of such responsibility, or else they are deliberately hiding the truth.

In Tell Hariri in 1933 excavations were made by the well-known archaeologist, Professor Parrot. Tell Hariri is between Damascus and Mosul in the very place from which the family of Abraham is reported to have come to Canaan. Now the Mari civilization has been discovered there, and the Assyriologists were able to decipher a clay tablet. It was a report of Bannum, an officer of the desert police, which is dated around the seventeenth century B.C. The report has the following wording: "Say to my Lord this from Bannum, thy servant: Yesterday I left Mari and spent the night at Zuruban. All the ~Benjamites~ were sending fire signals. From Samanum to Ilum-Muluk, from Ilum-Muluk to Mishlam all the ~Benjamite~ villages in the Terqua district replied with fire signals; I am not yet certain what these signals meant."

In addition, the chronological tables discovered in that place thrice mention the Benjamites. "The year in which Iahdulim went to Hen and laid hands upon the territory of the Benjamites" is an inscription from the reign of King Iahdulim. From the reign of the last monarch of Mari, we have two inscriptions. The first one: "The year that Zimri-lim killed the Dawidum of the Benjamites." The second: "The year after Zimri-lim killed the Dawidum of the Benjamites."

Benjamin is, according to the Bible, Jacob's youngest son. How then can the authors of ~The Atheist's Handbook~ say that the sons of Jacob are not historical personages?

The first time that the name Israel occurs in non-Biblical documents is on an inscription, now in the Cairo museum, from a mortuary temple near Thebes, on which the victory of Pharaoh Mezemptah over the Libyans is commemorated. In order to augment his triumph, other notable victories which this ruler is said to have achieved are also mentioned. The end of the hymn of praise is as follows: "Canaan is despoiled and all its evil with it. Askelon is taken captive. Gezer is conquered. Yanoam is blotted out. The people of Israel are desolate; Israel has no offspring. Palestine has become a widow for Egypt."

page 77 My Answer to Moscow's Atheists

So the name of Israel is already historical by the year 1229 B.C.

The ruler of that time boasted of destroying the Jews, just as his follower Nasser boasted, before he was defeated by Israel, which will never be utterly destroyed.

It surely seems to be a very ridiculous thing to write a book of 700 pages to prove that over 4,000 years ago a man with the name of Abraham did not exist, that he had no descendants with the names of Isaac, Jacob, and Benjamin, and that the whole Biblical story about the people of Israel is untrue. Why should this be taught in all Communist schools, yes, even in factories and on collective farms? Russians are not interested in their own ancestors of 4,500 years ago. Why should they be interested in denying specifically that the Jews have a history dating from a man called Abraham?

The denial has a deep sense. It will best be explained by a joke, which must be Jewish, since we are discussing the Jews:

Goldstein was riding in a train. Opposite him was another Jew, Hershcovici. They did not know each other. Goldstein wanted to enter into a conversation, so he asked Hershcovici: "Comrade, tell me, please, what time it is." Hershcovici did not answer. The question was repeated several times, every time in a louder voice. It did not help. In the end, Goldstein asked: "But, comrade, I see that you have a watch on your wrist. Why don't you tell me the time?"

Goldstein replied: "Comrade, you are not interested in this. I surmise that you would like to chat a little bit. If I had told you that it was 9 o'clock, you would have asked: 'What brand of watch do you have?' I would have replied: 'It is a Swiss gold watch.' You would have answered: 'Then you must have a high position. You could not afford such a watch otherwise.' I would have replied: 'Yes, I am a director in the Ministry of External Commerce.' Then you would have asked me where I stay in Moscow. I would answer: 'On Street Artileriinaia.' You would have asked if I have a family. I would have told you that I have a wife and three daughters. You would have asked if by chance I had their picture with me. I would have said yes and would have shown you the picture. You would have liked my beautiful elder daughter Esther and would have asked me if I would allow you to visit me once. Politeness would have obliged me to answer yes. You would have fallen in love with Esther and would have asked her hand in marriage. And why should I give my daughter in marriage to a man who does not even possess a watch?"

The existence of Abraham and his descendants has to be denied, because if my opponents were to admit that Abraham existed, according to the Biblical record and all the traditions of hundreds of millions of Jews, Christians, and Moslems, we would have asked why Abraham was so conspicuous that his name should remain alive in history after four millennia. The only reply could be that he is famous because he believed God, followed his commands, and was ready to sacrifice even his dearest son for him. To which we would have put the question whether Abraham ever met God. The answer is that he often heard the voice of God speaking to him clearly. We would be interested to know what God told him. The answer would be that among other things God told him that he wanted to make a covenant with him. In his seed, that is, through one of his offspring, all nations would be blessed. Now, since everyone wishes to have a blessed lives we would have asked the name of this descendant of Abraham who was to impart happiness. The reply is simple: The New Testament begins by telling us that Jesus is this descendant of Abraham. We would have asked how anybody can receive blessings from him. And we would hear the message of the Gospel: Jesus died on the cross for us sinners. He bore the punishment for our offences. Whosoever believes in him is cleansed from all his sins and has eternal life now and in Paradise.

The authors of ~The Atheist's Handbook~ therefore proceed carefully, as did comrade Goldstein in the joke. They cut the discussion short. The Biblical personalities never existed. They have the watch on the wrist but will not say what time it is.

This is their purpose also in their other denials of Biblical truth. This is their purpose in finding fault with the Bible and seeking contradictions in it.

THE DELIVERY OF THE JEWS FROM EGYPTIAN SLAVERY

The Bible says that the Jews were slaves in Egypt, but that God delivered them from bondage with a mighty hand, doing miracles for them. The Egyptians who pursued them were drowned in the Red Sea. This Biblical story is surely dangerous for slave-holders. It might suggest to slaves, to men who live under a dictatorship, that God is in favour of the emancipation of slaves.

Therefore, this page of history has to be wiped out, too. The authors of ~The Atheist's Handbook~ graciously assure us that all this is sheer fiction. They write:

"For a century and a half, there have been archaeological excavations in Egypt which were made with great thoroughness, but in a good number of monuments which were discovered, in the multitude of inscriptions which have been deciphered, in pictorial images and those of other nature, there is nothing found to confirm the Biblical legend about the Egyptian slavery."

Is it right for Communists to make such a criticism of the Bible?

The exodus from Egypt happened over thirty centuries ago. The Russian Revolution happened only sixty years ago. Now try to travel through the Soviet Union, go from bookshop to bookshop and find one single book in which Trotsky is portrayed as having played any role in the bringing to power of the Bolsheviks. We of the older generation know that at that time Trotsky was the president of the Soviet of Petrograd and was the closest collaborator of Lenin; in truth it must be said that Lenin and Trotsky made the Revolution. But later, Stalin got angry at Trotsky and simply erased his name from history. Later on it was said that the Revolution was in reality the work of Lenin, with Stalin as his most intimate collaborator. The role of Stalin was portrayed as the most important one - until some twenty years ago. Now try to find in any bookshop of Russia today a book in which Stalin has any valuable role in this Revolution and you will not find anything, because Khrushchev, turning against Stalin, has erased his name, too. More recently, the name of Khrushchev has been erased. Now, if political enmity can erase all written proofs of the role of men in the major historical events of today's world, with all the advantages of printing and photography and the tools of mass communication, it is not difficult to accept the gaps in Egyptian history.

But not all proofs could be wiped out.

My honourable opponents again show a lack of archaeological knowledge.

They do not know about the stele of the time of Ramses II, found at Beisan in 1923, stating that he employed captive Semites (in the Tell-el-Amarna tablets the Hebrews appear under the name "Khabiri") to build a city called after his name.

The sun-dried bricks of the store cities, which can be seen in the Cairo museum, are stamped with the words "Ramses." You can see that some of them are bound with straw, others only with stubble, and finally, some of them are made without any straw or other binding substance. All this corroborates the decree of Pharaoh as recorded in the Biblical book Exodus, giving the command that the Israelites should no longer be supplied with straw.

The Bible says that ten plagues were sent by God upon the Egyptians to induce them to let the Jewish slaves go. The last plague was the death of all first-born, beginning with the first-born of Pharaoh, who sat on his throne.

If the assertion of the Bible is correct, the son of Amenhotep the Second, the Pharaoh of the Exodus, must have died in that judgment. Amenhotep the Second himself died in 1423 B.C., and he was followed by Thotmes the Fourth. On a large red granite block which is placed between the feet of the sphinx of Ghizeh is carved what is called the dream inscription of Thotmes the Fourth. In this, we are told that this future Pharaoh when young fell asleep and dreamed that a sphinx came to him and startled him with the prophecy that he would one day become King of Egypt.

Since the law of primogeniture held good in Egypt, he could not have been Amenhotep's eldest son, or the hopes of his accession would not have been so remote that he would be amazed by the promise of the sphinx. So the first-born of Pharaoh must have died in the tenth plague.

Is this not a strange confirmation of the Biblical account?

Ancient Egyptian history is quite well known. There are many records. But not a one speaks about the disappearance of the Egyptian army and its king in the sea, our opponents point out.

I would like to know which nation has ever been keen about registering its defeats. When the Soviet army retreated from the borders to Stalingrad, Stalin did not publicize the defeats. Neither did the Germans publicize theirs when the tide turned. The Egyptian historians cared as little about objective truth as their modern counterparts.

In this matter we do not have the Egyptian side of the story. That is all. But we have the Bible, which tells not only the Jewish side, but God's words and God's wonders. There is no reason to disbelieve the wonderful deliverance of the slaves, though it may be unpleasant for slaveholders and their flatterers.

~The Atheist's Handbook~ says also that six hundred thousand adult Jews could not have come out of Egypt as the Bible asserts, because this would have made a total Jewish population of at least three million. Now, it is certain that three million men could not pass through the Red Sea in one night; neither could they have lived on the little peninsula of Sinai.

Here is a problem of the Hebrew language, in which the oldest part of the Bible is written. The word "alfot" which means "thousands" also means "houses." We are not sure if the Hebrew original of the Bible means that six hundred thousand Jews left Egypt or if it was only six hundred houses, six hundred big families. Language is subject to evolution. Words may not have had the same sense three or four thousand years ago which they have today. Generally, when the Bible uses hyperbolic language, such parts of Scripture may not be as easily understood by us as they were when written. But surely if it had contained enormous lies, the scriptures could not have been accepted at that time as a holy book, any more than an official history of the Soviet Union which would claim that the Red army during the Second World War consisted of 20 billion men. The words must have had at that time another sense from that which they have today.

In the imperial palace in Tokyo are kept the three signs of the Japanese empire a very old sword, a diamond, and a mirror of the great king. On the back of this mirror are inscribed some letters which have only recently been deciphered in Japan. After the Second World War, a brother of the emperor, the Prince Takahito Mikasa, began to enquire into Judaism. When the emperor was visited by Rabbi Goldmann of the Beth-Israel temple in Hertford, who was the executive chairman of the National Jewish Welfare Commission, the prince took care that the Rabbi should see this mirror of the great emperor. Without any difficulty the Rabbi was able to identify the letters as the Hebrew words ~Ehjeh Asher Ehjeh~ - I AM WHO I AM. The very words of the Bible, as found in EXO 3:14!

Immediately the prince and the rabbi began to speculate as to how these Jewish words recorded by Moses in the Bible came to be found on an ancient sacred object of the Japanese, and it was supposed that in times of old, during the Babylonian captivity of the Jews, members of the ten tribes of Israel had brought this mirror as a present to the ruling emperor.

In the year 1941, the Japanese bishop Jujai Nakada published a book called ~Japan in the Bible~. Relying on documents of ancient times, he says that in the year A.D. 216,100,000 men came from the Middle East to Japan. They are called in Japanese history the Hata tribe, and they won a very great influence over the economy and culture of Japan. The Hata called themselves Israj, which is much akin to Israel, and they spoke about a great leader, whom they called prince Hata Kawa Katsu, who as a babe was rescued from the water, was then brought up in the palace of the king, and eventually freed from the bondage of slavery. In this form the Biblical story of Moses came to Japan.

The extra-Biblical proofs of history as recorded by Holy Scriptures are too numerous to be mentioned. They certainly cannot be discarded.

CONTRADICTIONS IN THE BIBLE

~The Atheist's Handbook~ mentions contradictions in the Bible.

In 2SM 8:4 it is written that David, in a fight with Hadadezer, took from him seven hundred horsemen, whereas in 1CH 18:4 it says that David took captive 7,000 horsemen. Our honoured adversaries cannot reconcile these two different statements.

What would they say if they found a history of the Second World War in which it was claimed that in the battle for Kiev a hundred thousand Russian prisoners were taken, whereas fifty pages later it was asserted that in the battle at Kiev only ten thousand Russians fell prisoner?

The explanation is simple. During the last great war there were three battles for Kiev. The number of prisoners differed in these battles. Why must we presume, then, that in these two different books of the Bible the same battle against Hadadezer is described?

Another criticism of the Bible: It declares that what King David did "was right in the eyes of the Lord, and he did not turn aside from anything that he commanded him, all the days of his life." ~The Atheist's Handbook~ asks: "But did he not sin?" The Bible itself records elsewhere what grave crimes he committed.

He surely did sin, but these sins were forgiven and atoned for, and therefore they did not count any longer before God. They were forgotten. The marvel is that a sinner who has repented is righteous before God, and therefore it is within the context of God's loving-kindness that the Scriptures record such beautiful words about David. The forgiven sinner is, in the sight of God, whiter than snow.

Let our atheist friends repent, and they too will be forgiven!

The authors of ~The Atheist's Handbook~ are very happy at having made the discovery that the apostle called Thaddeus in the Gospel according to Matthew is called Judas the son of James in the book of Luke. What a grave error! But let us turn the tables on them. How do they reconcile the fact that a certain Ulianov is generally referred to as Lenin, and that the Djugashvili of one biographer is the Stalin of another?

Our opponents discover in the Bible a multitude of such "contradictions." They are not worth being considered.

Thus, for example, they point out that Jesus once told his disciples to sell even their clothes in order to buy themselves swords. On the other hand, when Peter tried to defend Jesus with his sword, he said to him: "Put your sword back in its sheath."

Now the words "sell your clothes and buy swords" were said by Jesus after the last supper when he was on his way to Gethsemane, knowing he would be arrested. Since it was late in the evening and the disciples had no opportunity to buy anything, he obviously was not telling them to purchase swords for immediate use. Instead, he is warning his disciples that for many centuries they will have great dangers to face and that they should be prepared to defend themselves and the cause of righteousness.

He who is not prepared to defend a righteous cause does not love it. Every mother who loves her child will fight tooth and nail to protect him against an intruder who plans to kidnap or kill him.

When one of the disciples seeks to reassure Jesus with the words, "We have two swords," Jesus replies with a touch of irony, "That is enough." The time will come for his disciples to understand him better.

"Put your sword back in its sheath" was a commandment given for a unique situation. Jesus did not wish to be defended. His desire was to die for the sins of the world.

The authors of ~The Atheist's Handbook~ have found another contradiction in the gospel according to St. Luke: It appears they note that since the people were on the side of Jesus, the chief priests had to think of ways to kill him secretly so that his sympathizers could not rally to his defence, whereas a few days later, the mob cries: "Crucify him! Crucify him!" Our opponents say that such a radical change in the temper of the local populace virtually overnight was not possible; therefore, the story told by the evangelist Luke cannot be true.

What a pity that the members of an Academy of Science have learned nothing from the tragedy of their own people.

There was a morning in Moscow when all the radio stations began their programmes with the singing of hymns of praise to Stalin, just as they had done for twenty years. The newspapers on that morning were also full of the same praises. It was the day when the twentieth congress of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union began. During that day, Khrushchev delivered a speech saying that Stalin, whom the whole nation and he himself had flattered for decades as the greatest genius, was in reality a mass murderer and torturer, not only of his adversaries, but even of his own comrades. In no time, the whole Russian people turned against the erstwhile providential leader and, instead of singing his praises, found ways to ridicule him. Soon even his corpse was removed from the tomb.

Is this a story the authors of ~The Atheist's Handbook~ can believe? Or would they claim this is a legend?

The state of mind of the populace changes very quickly. So it was in the case of one of mankind's most degraded leaders, Joseph Stalin, and so it was in the case of the most beautiful exemplar of mankind, Jesus of Nazareth.

Do not the members of the Academy of Science remember that they themselves once sang praises to Stalin, and that they too have changed their tune?

Have they so soon forgotten how they demonstrated on the streets with slogans about the eternal solidarity of the Communist peoples, about eternal fraternity with the Chinese and Romanian and Yugoslavian Communists?

Do they realize how readily "eternal solidarity" has degenerated into petty quarrelling? Why are they unable to supply their own bitter experience to the events of two thousand years ago and recognize that human nature is the same in all ages, that the alleged contradictions exist not in the Gospels but in the minds and hearts of man?

The contention that Judas did not need to give the soldiers who had come to arrest Jesus a sign of recognition is ridiculous, even childish. Because Palestine is a very small country and Jesus had travelled widely throughout Galilee and Judaea, that is no reason to believe that his face was widely recognized. Today's major personalities are known because their pictures are published in the newspapers and they appear on television, but in those days no such mass media existed. So there must have been thousands of men who, while they had heard of Jesus, had never seen him face to face. The Roman soldiers and the servants of Caiaphas the high priest had probably never been very keen to listen to Jesus's sermons any more than the officers of the Communist secret police would be anxious to hear today's preachers in Communist countries, except for sinister purposes. So it was only natural that someone should provide a sure sign of recognition of the person to be arrested. Furthermore, the encounter was in the dark of night, with only flickering torches to light the faces of a dozen weary, undistinguished men, and positive identification was required.

The authors of ~The Atheist's Handbook~ - "heroes" all Stalin's time who opposed his cruelties but who had the exceptional good fortune to escape prison (either they did ~not~ oppose Stalin, or they were mercifully protected by a God in whom they do not believe) - these very authors despise Jesus for exhibiting fear in the garden of Gethsemane, where he was arrested, and despairing on the cross!

To possess great virtues is surely very beautiful. To hide these virtues as trees hide their fruit beneath the leaves is much more commendable. The aim of Christ was to open a way towards heaven for the weakest ones, to show that even they are acceptable to God. In order to build such a bridge, he must not play the hero. If his actions had appeared heroic and unattainable in all circumstances, we average and below-average men could never have taken him as a pattern of life. Therefore, he descended to the level of our human weakness, praying in Gethsemane, "God, take this cup from me," and crying on the cross, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?," in order that we, who often sink in despair and wish that the cup of bitter fate would be taken away from us, should find in him a trustworthy friend. That was the aim of Christ's behaviour. To call it cowardice is not right.

~The Atheist's Handbook~ speaks about some contradictions between the Old and the New Testaments.

Thus it points out that in the Gospel according to St. John, it is written that nobody has ever seen God, whereas in the Old Testament the patriarch Jacob says: "I have seen God face to face." (GEN 32:30).

The explanation is very simple.

The Hebrew language in Biblical times was very poor and therefore contained many homonyms. One and the same word had many senses. The word God in that time meant first of all the Creator of Heaven and Earth. The word was used also for Christ. Angelic beings are several times called gods in the Old Testament, as are even men. The Creator says to Moses: "I will set thee as god over Pharaoh" and in one of the Psalms, the Jews, as members of a chosen people, are told: "Ye are gods." So when Jacob said, "I have seen God face to face," he meant an angelic being, whereas St. John speaks about God in the highest sense of the word, the last reality, the Creator of Heaven and Earth.

But enough!

page 89 My Answer to Moscow's Atheists

~The Atheist's Handbook~ looks at the Bible from below, from a human standpoint. From this angle, it is really a puzzle. Take some beautiful embroidery made by a woman, look at it on the wrong side, and it is a senseless zigzag of threads. You must look on the other side to find its beauty. So the Scriptures are not to be looked at from below, from the standpoint of man, who has rebelled against God.

Through the spirit Christians have direct communion with the unseen world. They look at the Scriptures from this perspective and are therefore enabled to catch its whole harmony and deep significance. They also understand the limitations of the Bible, in that it is the revelation of God within the framework of human language.

The story is told that when Robert Moffat, missionary South Africa, wanted to describe an English train to the local tribesmen, he laid down two iron tracks on the ground, then lined up several ox wagons one after another, and finally hung a large steam kettle around the head of the ox in front. No doubt, when Africans later went to Europe and saw a real train, they must have found Moffat's description ridiculous. But the language of the Africans did not allow him to tell them what a train really was. Similarly, God has to use a vocabulary drawn from earthly experiences in dealing with heavenly and spiritual things, for which there are no adequate words in the human language.

But still, how inspiring and uplifting is this book!

Voltaire wrote that in a hundred years' time the Bible would be an outmoded and forgotten book, to be found only in museums. But a hundred years after he wrote this, his own house was being used by the Bible Society.

The Bible has been translated into 1,300 languages, and millions of copies are sold every year - but who bothers to read Voltaire any more?

There can be no doubt, as far as natural abilities are concerned, that Plato is far above St. John, a humble fisherman, or that Marcus Aurelius is far above Peter as thinker. But today hardly anyone reads Marcus Aurelius or Plato, whereas after two thousand years the writings of St. John and St. Peter are words of life to men all over the world.

Scientists are frequently at variance in their application of known data.

Facts about nature can also be misinterpreted. So too can this holy book be misconstrued or misapplied, but that does not diminish its intrinsic value.

My opponents have written hundreds of pages to refute the Bible, a book virtually unknown to them.

If I make the acquaintance of a man, I don't know the man. I see only his clothes and shoes. Of his body, only the head and hands are visible. If I see him naked, I still don't know him, because his soul remains a mystery. The literal text of the Bible is only an outward vestment. Its allegories are its body, its spiritual truths its soul. The beauty of its mysteries are revealed only to the lovers of God, who are willing to open their eyes and hearts to His divine Spirit. A beautiful landscape is perceived by the anatomical eye and interpreted by the brain. Just so, spiritual things, says St. Paul, are spiritually discerned and are mediated by the Spirit of God.

DOES CHRISTIANITY TEACH SERVILITY TOWARDS TYRANNICAL AUTHORITIES?

The words of Jesus "Render to Caesar what is Caesar's" are proof enough for the authors of ~The Atheist's Handbook~ that he taught servility towards what we would call today a colonial ruler.

Now, first of all, Jesus never said these words to his disciples. He said them to his worst adversaries, the Pharisees. Their whole lives were a mockery of religion. So he told them, "Give to Caesar what is Caesar's and to God what is God's." He was sure that by striving to do so, his opponents would soon find out that if they were complacent towards mad rulers (many Roman Caesars were mad), there would be nothing left to give to God.

The disciples of Jesus must have understood well what he meant by these words, which have been so often misused.

If somebody has been dishonest and wishes to make things right with those he has defrauded, he first has to establish as best he can what he owes and then pay it back. Now, what did a Jew owe to Caesar? What does a Czech owe to Kosygin? Nothing.

Even in Rome, nothing belonged rightfully to Caesar. Julius Caesar, a victorious Roman general, upon his return from a campaign in Gallia overthrew the Republic by military force. He was thus not a legitimate ruler. He was succeeded by tyrants, most of them more fit for an asylum than a throne. These tyrants robbed the population of the Roman Empire of its freedom. They gave nothing to it.

Even less did anything in Palestine belong to Caesar. Profiting from a division between Jewish factions, Guaeus Pompeius occupied by force this small country and imposed upon it a regime of terror and corruption.

Caesar never constructed a road in Palestine. The Jews did the work. He did not build a house. He did not plant a tree. "Render to Caesar what is Caesar's" is a revolutionary, patriotic sentence, which in essence denies any right to the usurper.

If any honest-thinking citizen in the Soviet Union had been told during the Nazi invasion, "Give to Hitler what is Hitler's and to God what is God's," he would have understood those words as meaning, "Give Hitler the boot and throw his troops out, because nothing belongs to him in the Soviet Union. He has no right even to be here." The same would apply to the Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia.

The Roman authorities, and the Jewish high priests who were their stooges, evidently gave to the words of Jesus my interpretation. The proof is that they did not consider him a loyal citizen of the Empire but a rebel, and they crucified him.

~The Atheist's Handbook~ simply misrepresents the truth when it portrays the authors of the New Testament as flatterers of the Roman authorities.

"It contains no accusation against the Roman governor," they say. "All the guilt of the crucifixion is attributed to the Jews, while Pilate is described as a passive observer."

It is easy to make such assertions in a country where Bibles are scarce. In Acts of the Apostles, ACT 4:27, we read: "For of a truth against thy holy child Jesus, whom thou hast anointed, both Herod, and Pontius Pilate, with the Gentiles, and the people of Israel, were gathered together." A Jewish mob, incited by priests, had asked for the crucifixion of Jesus. But Pilate on his own initiative added cruelty to cruelty. We know it from the words, "Then ~Pilate~ therefore took Jesus, and scourged him." (JHN 19:1) The text implies the utter debasement of a Roman governor who finds pleasure in personally whipping a prisoner about whose innocence he is obviously convinced. Then the Gospel says very clearly that Pilate delivered him to be crucified.

By what right do the Communists claim that the first Christians, servile towards the Roman authorities, described Pilate as only a passive observer? Well, by the "right" of usurpers with a monopoly on publishing books and a proscription against Christians and the freedom of reply.

St. John is not the only one to accuse the Roman governor. All the Evangelists reveal him as a henchman. St. Matthew writes, "When Pilate had scourged Jesus, he delivered him to be crucified" (MTT 27:26). St. Mark writes: "Pilate delivered Jesus, when he had scourged him, to be crucified" (MRK 15:15). St. Luke quotes Pilate explicitly as saying, "I ... have found no fault in this man ... I will therefore chastise him" (LUK 23:14,16).

The authors of the New Testament never whitewashed the Romans for their part in the crucifixion of Jesus. They share in the guilt. Later church historians reported with fidelity how Roman authorities threw Christians to the wild beasts and subjected them to all kinds of atrocities.

Far from being servile, as accused, true Christians in all ages have never recognized tyrants as their legitimate rulers. Neither did they consider it a duty to be submissive to them. The first book against Christianity of which we have any knowledge is ~The True Word~, by Celsus. Its date is around A.D. 175. It reproaches Christians for not defending the Emperor, fighting for him, participating in his military expeditions, or working. Christians of the Soviet Union look upon Communist leaders as oppressors. They will get no flattery from the disciples of Christ.

~The Atheist's Handbook~ quotes another Scripture to show that Christianity teaches blind submission to unjust rulers and is, therefore, a hindrance to the progress of humanity. The text is ROM 13:1-3: "Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers. For there is no power but of God: the powers that be are ordained of God. Whosoever therefore resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God: and they that resist shall receive to themselves damnation."

But this same chapter defines what a Christian means by the "higher power" to whom he owes obedience. Only he deserves this name who, as the minister of God, gives praise to them that do good and executes wrath to him that does evil (ROM 13:3,4). If a ruler does the contrary, if he punishes good and rewards evil, we can no longer recognize his power as being from God.

Bible verses such as the foregoing made Christians resist tyranny.

In the Middle Ages, Savonarola was burnt at the stake because he had said: "Nothing is more abhorrent to a tyrant than service to Christ and a virtuous Christian life. For these are diametrically opposed to his own habits."

I quote from a discussion between Mary Queen of Scots and the Protestant Reformer John Knox:

Mary: "Ye have taught the people to receive another religion than their princes can allow. And how can that doctrine be of God, seeing that God commands subjects to obey their princes?"

Knox: "Madame, as right religion neither took original strength nor authority from worldly princes, but from the Eternal God alone, so are not subjects bound to frame their religion according to the appetites of their princes ... If all the seed of Abraham should have been of the religion of Pharaoh ... what religion would have been in the world? Or if all the men in the days of the apostles should have been of the religion of the Roman emperors, what religion could there have been on the face of the earth?"

Mary: "Yes, but none of these men raised the sword against their princes."

Knox: "Yet, Madame, ye cannot deny, but that they resisted. For these that obey not ... in some sort resist."

Mary: "But yet they resisted not by the sword."

Knox: "God, Madame, had not given them the power and the means."

Mary: "Think ye that subjects having power may resist their princes?"
Knox: "If their princes exceed their bounds, Madame .. it is no doubt but they may be resisted, even by power. For what if a father should go mad and try to kill his own children? Should they not seize him and take the sword or weapons from him by force? It is even so, Madame, with princes that would murder the children of God that are subject unto them. Their blind zeal is nothing but a very mad frenzy ... and therefore to take the sword from them, to bind their hands and cast them in prison till that they be brought to a more sober mind is no disobedience against princes, but just obedience, because that it agreeth with the will of God."

What Communist dared to speak like this to Stalin?
The Bible inspired Lincoln and Wilberforce to fight for the abolition of slavery. Marx in his ~Capital~ acknowledges the role of the Christian Shaftesbury in introducing laws protecting labour in the United Kingdom. It was a Russian Christian, Count Leo Tolstoy, who denied any authority to the czar. Thomas Jefferson, president of the United States, wrote: "I have sworn upon the altar of God eternal hostility against every tyranny over the mind of men"; and "Rebellion against tyrants is obedience towards God."
Lincoln wrote: "If slavery is not wrong, nothing is wrong."
Emerson wrote: "If you put a chain around the neck of a slave, the other fastens itself around your own."
The words of Emerson have proved to be prophetic. The Soviet Communist party has put a chain around the neck of its political adversaries: first, of the monarchy, then of the landlords, of the capitalists, of oppositionist socialists, of nationalist leaders belonging to the Russian nation, and of the nations oppressed, the Ukrainians, Bielorussians, and Gruzins. But then the other end of the chain fastened around the necks of the Communists, too. Comrade Khrushchev said as much in his speech at the Twentieth Congress of the Party. He pointed out that Stalin liquidated nearly all of the Central Committee in his infamous purges.
Christianity is not on the side of slavery, but Communism is.
Lincoln said in his message to the Congress on December 1, 1862: "In giving freedom to the slaves, we give freedom to the free."

page 96 My Answer to Moscow's Atheists

Since the Second World War, Christian nations have freed all their colonies. On the other hand, the Soviet government has enslaved the Baltic peoples, Hungarians, and Czechs. The Chinese Communists have enslaved Tibet.

I would recommend that my atheist friends heed the old saying: "Do not speak about a rope in the house of one who hanged himself." It would be better for Communists not to mention slavery. I have myself been a slave in a Communist camp.

But all these arguments are not really necessary because, as usual, ~The Atheist's Handbook~ contradicts itself. In order to explain the miraculous growth and victory of Christianity, the atheists, who cannot admit that God was working in the church, claim that it proselyted mostly slaves "because slaves gained in Christian circles a position which they could not enjoy with others."

In the Epistle to Philemon, St. Paul urges a slave-owner to receive back one of his servants who had fled, not only without punishment but "as a brother beloved." This was the spirit of primitive Christianity.

Why then did the first Christians not abolish slavery? They were persecuted. They had no power in the state. The majority of them were slaves themselves. Only a short time before, the great revolt of slaves led by Spartacus had been bloodily suppressed and many tens of thousands of slaves crucified. Only fools rebel when the sure outcome of rebellion is defeat.

God has appeared only once on Mount Sinai, giving the Ten Commandments. The preamble to them is: "I am the Lord thy God, which have brought thee out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage." In introducing himself to his people he chooses to characterize himself as the liberator of slaves, rather than the creator of heaven and earth. This is our God.

It amuses us to read in ~The Atheist's Handbook~ that

page 97 My Answer to Moscow's Atheists

the Christian religions "served and serve the dominant classes, they support and consolidate the social and political order based on exploitation and oppression, etc., etc."

We know that we don't have to worry about such accusations, because we know we are dealing with academicians. With characteristic myopia, they don't know how to write coherently. So we just read on, and we are not misled in our expectations. Listen to what the same authors have to say in another part of their book: "The leaders of the Reformation have translated the Holy Scriptures into the languages of different peoples, the Bible becoming for the first time accessible to large popular masses, which without delay discovered in some of its theses a justification of their fight for social equality."

There you have it. "The Bible justifies the fight for social equality." "The Bible teaches slavery and submission to tyrants." Two allegations made by the same group of authors within one and the same book!

The academicians who wrote ~The Atheist's Handbook~ may think what they like. Their superiors know better. They know that Christians are not servile to dictators. They have proved this by killing millions of our brethren and sisters in faith and by still keeping in jail tens of thousands of our fellow-believers.

Atheists had better be careful not to mention bowing before cruel rulers. Did they not deify Stalin, whom they now denounce as the greatest mass-murderer of history? Members of the Academy of Science cannot be very young. Therefore, they must have been among the adulators of Stalin yesterday, or they would not be alive today to denounce him!

I was in jail under Stalin and under his successors. Would the underground church of Russia not have more right than the atheists to speak about opposing tyranny?

What about the current deification of another murderer, Mao Tse-Tung of Red China? Chinese Communists, atheists all, bow to him. Over one million Chinese Christians have been murdered, but they preferred to die than to bow.

True Christians have been and are fighters for freedom. In this matter we have nothing to learn from our atheist friends. The United States, Great Britain, and Australia have no slave labour camps. The Soviet Union and Red China have.

To describe Christians as a bunch of sycophants to tyrants is only to caricature them. What atheists reject therefore is not Christianity, but a travesty of it.

HEAVENLY OR AN EARTHLY PARADISE

~The Atheist's Handbook~ quotes Friedrich Engels as saying that Christianity's hope is in heaven, in eternal life after death. According to him, Christianity does not have the will to carry out a social transformation in this world.

By way of contrast, the Communist movement is aimed at the liberation of all working men on earth.

This is pure fiction.

It is not true that Christianity has only a heavenly goal. Jesus taught us to pray, "Thy will be done on earth, as it is in heaven." In JHN 3:12 he reminds us, "I have told you earthly things..."

In the very beginning of the Gospel according to St. Luke, we are told that when people asked John the Baptist what to do, he did not answer, "Strive for eternal life." The Baptist's answers were very earthly: "He that hath two coats, let him impart to him that has none; and he that has meat, let him do likewise." To publicans he said: "Exact no more than that which is appointed you." And to soldiers he did not say, "Seek heaven," but rather, "Do violence to no man, neither accuse any falsely; and be content with your wages," which were higher than those of the average population (LUK 3:11-14).

Jesus drove merchants out of the temple with a whip. He publicly accused scribes and Pharisees of devouring widows' houses. To a rich young man, he said: "If thou wilt be perfect, go and sell that thou hast, and give to the poor" (MTT 19:21).

Christianity has in its programme a social transformation in this world, too. It is a curious fact that members of the Soviet government themselves say that we have to attain and surpass the economic level of countries with a Christian heritage, such as the United States of America. So they probably lead a much more opulent life in this world under the shadow of Christianity than Soviet citizens do.

In America and other Western countries, workers can drive their own cars to church, or to picket lines for higher wages. In the Soviets, workers do not have even bicycles with which to attend the Communist meetings from which no one is allowed to be absent.

The opulence and freedom of the West have not been obtained without a struggle. However, if the reproaches brought by Engels against Christianity were just, this struggle would not have taken place. Engels wrote:

> The social doctrines of the Gospels represent a passive religious resistance against injustice, a revolt on the knees, which means in fact the justification of oppression and, in the first place, the justification of the principal social evil of antiquity, slavery. Christianity has not been the ideology of oppressed men who go to a revolutionary fight, but the ideology of oppressed men who have lost any hope in fight and seek an outlet in prayer in the hope of a miraculous salvation.

This is misleading.

The main teaching of the Gospel is that a Christian must follow the example of Christ. Was Christ himself passive towards injustice? How did the merchants driven out with a whip feel about his attitude? Was it passive resistance when he confronted the priests and Pharisees in their own temple, calling them vipers and hypocrites?

Is the "Magnificat," the blessed Virgin Mary's song, song of resignation? She says that her Son will pull down the mighty from their seats and exalt them of low degree. He shall fill the hungry with good things and send the rich away empty. This does not sound like meek submission to exploiters.

Wisdom taught the disciples of Christ to be passive and meek where there was no hope of overthrowing a tyranny, but whenever the conditions for such an overthrow were ripe, Christians have always fought.

When the peasants rebelled against the landlords in the time of the Reformation, the principal arguments in favour of their cause were religious. Their revolutionary hymns were:

> When Adam delved and Eve span,
> Who was then the gentleman?

And

> A mighty fortress is our God,

A bulwark never failing.

When the movement of the industrial proletariat started in Britain, the song of the Chartists was:

Britannia's sons, though slaves you be,
God your Creator made you free;
To all he life and freedom gave,
But never, never, made a slave.

The first to organize the demonstration which led to the revolution of 1905 in Russia were not our Communist friends, but Christian workers under the leadership of a priest, Gapon. The Communists profited from it and later hanged the priest.

Christianity is as revolutionary as Communism, but our revolutions differ.

Communist revolutions begin with the shedding of blood of its adversaries, innocent or otherwise. Then blood-letting becomes a habit, yes, even a pleasure, and in the end we have a tyranny worse than the one which has been overthrown.

Lenin once wrote, "Terror and the Tcheka are absolutely necessary." Czar Nicholas II would never have counted terror among the absolutes of politics.

How many people did he murder? How many did Kerensky murder? Then ask yourself, how many did Stalin murder?

It is highly probable that he himself poisoned Lenin, who had taught him the technique of terror. Then he killed nearly all the intimate friends of Lenin.

Even today, innumerable Soviet citizens die from starvation and overwork in the concentration camps of Russia. Communism kills millions of men in Red China. The terror there is acknowledged even by the Soviet newspapers. In Poland, Gomulka, exercising the dictatorship of the proletariat, shot proletarians. Communist revolutions are always negative and destructive.

We Christians are revolutionary in an entirely different sense. Christians use first and foremost the sword of the Spirit, which can kill sin without killing the sinner.

By the sword of the Spirit, Christians have corrected many abuses. Where Christian civilization reigns, men are free, free even to be atheists. I defy my honoured opponents to give me the name of a single man who is in prison in the United States, Great Britain, or West Germany for being an atheist. But in Communist countries millions of my brethren and sisters in faith have passed through jails or have been killed. Who has fought for freedom and obtained it - atheists or Christians?

Christians do not exclude the necessity of rebellion against tyranny. But when oppressors by their excesses force them to rebel and the circumstances are favourable, their aim is always to replace tyranny with a regime favouring peace and justice, whereas Marx advocated "permanent revolution," an expression he created. Permanent revolution for what? Revolution for revolution's sake? Never a goal to be reached? Never even a Utopia to aim for? This is sheer sadism.

Christians never forget that the first rebel was the devil. They do not resort to rebellion easily, not even to rebellion against the Communist regime.

But they are interested in earthly destinies, only that they have more than earthly aims. Men are like frogs living at the bottom of some dark well, from which they can see nothing of the outside world. Believers are men who, while living in such conditions, have heard the singing of a skylark. And miracle of miracles - they have understood the song! It speaks about sun and moon and stars and tree-covered mountains and hills and a wonderful sea. They have faith in this song. They have the assurance that there exists a heavenly paradise. Without neglecting their earthly duties, they strive towards it and call others to join them.

If there is anyone who believes in the possibilities of evolution even more than Darwin, it is the Christian. He believes in a new birth. He believes that a frog can become a lark, that a human being can become a partaker of the divine nature, and this not by a long process, but instantly by faith in Jesus Christ.

Believing all this, Christians fight for justice in this world while striving after the heavenly paradise.

IS THERE A GOD?

Until now I have followed in the present book the precept of Jesus: "Whosoever shall compel thee to go a mile, go with him twain."

My opponents wanted to pursue a certain course of arguments. I have walked along with them. I have discussed their arguments even when the issues were not at all important.

But now I would rather concentrate on the principal question at issue between atheists and Christians: Is there a God to worship, to rely upon, to be protected by, to be comforted with, or not?

According to the French Communist theoretician R. Garaudy, totality and absoluteness is not God, but "the name man." There is nothing superior to man. Christians believe in God, his promises to assist them in this life and to provide life eternal. Garaudy writes: "To us atheists, nothing is promised and nobody waits for us." Sad words indeed! To atheists, not even the loyal friendship of their own comrades is promised. Garaudy, after having served the Communist party all his life, was expelled from it. Nobody waited to extend him a helping hand or a friendly gesture when he was in distress. He found himself alone.

A young composer was poor and had to live in a rented room. A friend encouraged him: "When you die, there will be an inscription on the wall of this house." The composer was enthusiastic: "You really mean it?" "Surely," was the reply. "There will be an inscription ROOM TO RENT." No more than this can Garaudy wait for after death. And even in this life, his expulsion from the Party only leaves a place for someone else to be duped as he was.

Man is God. The whole Communist creed breathes this belief.

Having in view this delusion one of the Soviet underground poets, I. Gabai, was moved to write the following verses:

LATE CREDO OF JOB

I'm my own god. But what a weak, erratic god,
Irrational, insane, and feeble.
May God forbid that one love such a god
And be like him - may God protect you from it!

A god? - perhaps. A vicious, wretched god.
But if indeed I am the "Guileless Face,"

May God help you to be a peaceful atheist;
To be a god - from that may God protect you.

A god I am - but pow'rless in the tumult.
And by the logic of perverted borders,
Museums are now dwelling in the temples,
And gods are living in the midst of milling crowds.

Forgive me for my mania of grandeur,
But there is no God's greatness in my fate
Myself to punish and forgive myself my sins.
Forgive my mania of grandeur!

God's greatness - to chastise -
I would not wish to any of my neighbours,
I do not dare to wish him such command.
May God forbid that you should stoop to godhead,
To exculpate yourself or to absolve yourself from sin.

I'm what I am. God - only He is God.
What an enormous pride, what sorrow;
May God forbid that you should trust your conscience
And live defying it. May God forbid!

Is there a Being superior to man? Is there a God, in the usual sense given to this word, the Creator of heaven and earth, the One whom Jesus taught us to call our Father?

In the temple of Jerusalem (as well as in many Egyptian and Mithraist temples), there was a most holy place in which only the high priest was allowed to enter once a year, in the framework of an impressive religious ceremony.

In the time of Jesus, this most holy place was empty. The so-called ark of the covenant, a gilded case containing tables of stone with the Commandments of God, had been carried away and hidden centuries before by Jeremiah at the time of the Babylonian captivity. (II Maccabees 2:1-7). When the temple was reconstructed after the release of the Jews from captivity, the sacred ark could not be found. There was absolutely nothing in the most holy place.

This emptiness had a symbolic significance.

The Kabbala, a holy book of the Jews which contains their ancient religious traditions, calls God "Ein" - the non-existent. It might seem strange to find in a deeply religious book a name of God with which atheists would agree. But the sense is clear for those who know God.

"God is not" in the sense that "he is not what we consider him to be." His thoughts are not our thoughts, and his ways are not our ways.

Feuerbach was right when he said that men have created gods according to their own image. But Feuerbach was not original. He said this in order to deprecate God. Luther, one of the profoundest religious thinkers of history, had said three centuries before, "Fides est creatrix Dei" (Faith is the creator of God).

Man thinks about the causes and purposes of things, about the mysteries of nature and of life, and his mind gives birth to the notion of God. God is his son, the beloved child of his thought. But once he comes to this point, he immediately concludes that this God born in his mind is the creator of all things and also of his own person, that he has an objective existence outside his own consciousness, that man owes him everything. So from God the Son, he arrives at the notion of God the Father. These two notions, we learn from the Bible, are united with each other in an ineffable, unspeakable love, the Holy Spirit. God created the man who has faith. Faith creates the notion "God."

Thus far we understand our notion of God.

But the God who created us far surpasses our understanding. He is not what our reason can conceive.

Theology has given many arguments that God exists. To this, adversaries of religion have brought counter-arguments.

I will not argue. Woe to a God who needs somebody to defend him. A God can reveal himself. You need bring no proof for the existence of the sun - how much less then for its Creator. There are moments when the sun is veiled by clouds. Then those who wish to see it have to wait. If God wishes to hide himself so as to be discovered only by those who seek him zealously, I have to respect his will.

God uses light to give life to every being, but both God and light are unseen. Who has ever seen light? In a tube completely empty of air, a ray of light remains invisible. What we call seeing light is seeing the objects, the air illuminated by light. Light as such is invisible.

So one has to override the senses and reason in order to know God, though reason may point towards him.

You observe purposes in nature. The seed sown in the earth extracts from its surroundings just as much nitrogen, air, and water as it needs in order to become a flower. You can see a finality in its growth. It has a purpose to attain. The impregnated ovary takes from the womb of the mother just the food it needs to become a baby. Again the reaching towards a goal. But neither the seed nor the ovary can pursue aims. These must come from a wise Being, who imposes them upon his creations.

page 107 My Answer to Moscow's Atheists

Furthermore, we see man attuned to his environment, or he could not have survived so many thousands of years. That is, in spite of man's abuses, we live in a reality which, sometimes with and sometimes without our effort, gives us what is necessary for our existence. We are born as babes able to consume nothing but milk, and a short time before our birth, milk accumulates in our mother's breasts. As we grow, we need thicker and thicker milk, whereupon the milk in mother's breast changes according to our needs.
We are born with lungs and we find air. We need water and it is provided. After several months we need the nutrients found in vegetables and meat and the world contains these.
We are susceptible to sickness. But we know now that someone has prepared medicines for innumerable kinds of sickness from herbs, mushrooms, or crystals in the earth.
For every human need there is a corresponding reality to supply that need.
What arrogance or ignorance makes us suppose that for a very fundamental need, for the thirst of our soul after a God – a thirst which has created so many mythologies and religions – there should be no fulfilling reality?
One autumn day a crow spoke with a young swallow in its first year of life. The crow said to the swallow, "I see you preparing for a long journey. Where are you flying?" The swallow answered, "It is growing colder and colder here. I might freeze. I fly towards a warmer country." The wise crow mocked: "But remember well your birth. You were born here only a couple of months ago. How do you know that there is a warmer country to shelter you while it is cold here?" The swallow answered, "The One who has put in my heart the desire for a warm climate cannot have cheated me. I believe him and depart." And the swallow found what it sought.

page 108 My Answer to Moscow's Atheists

That is how every faithful soul proceeds.

The human soul becomes an icicle in a world without God. You remember Homunculus - the artificial man created in a tube in the second part of ~Faust~. He always felt cold. You freeze when you think of yourself as only a complicated product of chemical reactions. We aspire towards a Father, source of warmth, love, light. As all fundamental human needs are fulfilled in reality, so also is this need of the soul. We can find God. We can know him.

However, no field of knowledge can be investigated without proper tools. You cannot see stars through the microscope or microbes through the telescope. Men who cannot think rightly come to the conclusion that God does not exist because they cannot find him through the senses, which are functions of life in the realm of matter. Senses are not the right means to see God.

As microbiology has its particular instrument and astronomy another, faith also possesses one by which it can see the Creator. Jesus said, "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." Have such a heart, and you will see!

The reader will surely understand that the word "to see" has many meanings. I see a material object because the photons reflected by it hit my eye. I see the righteousness of a cause by weighing arguments in my mind. I see the love of a person towards me by his behaviour. I close my eyes and can evoke the image of someone dear. He is far away. No photons from him reach my eye. But I see. I can tell my dream, my daydream, my fancies. Half of our lives, we see in this manner.

How do we see God?

In our imagination are stored images, and we can pick up the image we need as if from an album. But it is not only images from the material world that we have in this safe. My existence does not start on the day of my birth, nor on the day of my conception. I have existed for ever

page 109 My Answer to Moscow's Atheists

in the mind and plan of God. I have come on this earth for a short time as a pilgrim and foreigner.

I have lived through a stage as a suckling. I have in me the images accumulated in that time, just as I have the later ones, except that I cannot evoke those of my life as a baby at will. But psychoanalysis or hypnosis can prove that they are there. They can be re-actualised.

So every cognition of God is only a re-cognition. The heart which has been cleansed of sins, passions, errors, fears, worries, and hatreds can see God again, from whom it comes.

But we have to qualify the words "to see" and "image" in this connection, because you see a reality for which there are no words in human language.

When Marco Polo, the first European ever to be in China, returned and told his fellows that he had met yellow men with slanted eyes and with hair tressed in tails, he was called "Marco Polo, the liar." What means did he have to prove his assertions? He could only say to men, "Go where I have been, face the dangers I faced, bear with the fatigues through which I passed, and you will know."

I cannot convince a sceptic that viruses exist. He himself has to look in a microscope.

Blessed are the pure in heart, because they will see God. The problem of knowing God is one of purity of character. The ultimate truth is the exclusive monopoly of the clean. Whenever somebody speaks to me about God, for or against, I ask him: "How pure are you that you may be considered reliable? Only those can know this subject who are whiter than snow."

WHO IS GOD?

Since atheists do not accept the sacrifice of Christ on the cross which cleanses us from sin, they cannot see God. But they are in the right to ask us: "You assert that you see God. Tell us who he is!"

A very important question! It exists for both sides. Atheists must be able to say, "Who is the one whose existence we deny?," just as Christians must give an answer to the question, "Who is the one in whom we believe?"

Who is God?

De Broglie, the greatest contemporary theoretician in problems of light, wrote: "How much we would know if we knew what a ray of light is." The great biologist Jacob von Uexkll wrote: "No one of us knows what life is." And we are asked to answer who the Giver of life and light is!

Where is the difficulty in answering? When you ask, "What is light or life?" or "Who is God?" the difficulty lies not in the words "What," "Who," "life," "light" or "God." Somehow we can say what we mean by these words. What spoils the intelligibility is the smallest word in the questioning proposition, the word "is." What does the word "is" mean? If we do not understand this, all the rest remains enigmatic.

A great division passes through Christianity. It centres around the word "is." According to the New Testament, which was actually written in Greek, at his last supper with the disciples before the crucifixion, Jesus had given them bread, saying, "This is my body," and a cup of wine, saying, "This is my blood." Orthodox and Catholic Christians believe that the word "is" in this context can mean only one thing: that Christians eat and drink at Holy Communion the real body and blood of Jesus. When the priests repeat the words of Jesus during the liturgy, a change takes place in the elements. Outwardly, they remain bread and wine. But the essence has been transformed. What were bread and wine have become the body of Christ. Protestants read the same Bible and interpret the word "is" otherwise. It means for them that the bread at Holy Communion symbolizes the body of Christ, that whereas it is still only bread, it has another value, just as a ring has increased value for the receiver when it comes from the beloved.

The fact that thousands of books have been written on this subject and great institutions split apart shows that the word "is" is not as simple as it looks. You who wish to know "Who is God?" or "What is light?," tell me first what you understand by "is"

Christianity was not negative towards previous cultures. As we have said already, it incorporated in its thinking Greek philosophy, predominantly from Aristotle. Christianity took the concept of a God who, himself unmovable, produces all the movement in the world. He sits quietly on an unshaken throne and rules all things and men in their unceasing motion. Aristotle would have said that God "is" in the very strict sense of the word.

But an unmoved mover is inconceivable. What is static cannot be active. A motor which moves a machine has its own movements. To a motor another notion applies beyond mere being - it moves.

Reality does not know a being. Kant wrote in ~Critic of Pure Reason~, "~To be~ is no real predicate ... In logical usage it is only the copula or link of a judgment." To say that God is good or righteous makes sense. To say that God or any other subject simply is, means to remain in the realm of vain words.

When we ask ourselves what Being means, the answer is that being exists only as a becoming, an evolving, a moving, a being changed. Heraclitus said: "~Panta rhei~" - "Everything flows." "You cannot bathe twice in the same stream." "You" cannot bathe in it even "once," because in this one period while you bathe, your body is changing, and the river too.

The elementary particles of which the world is composed, the chemical elements, as well as the spiritual realities, are not existences, but events, happenings. While I pronounce the word "iron," the electrons in the atoms of iron will have revolved many thousands of billions of times around the nucleus. When I come to the last letter "n," the iron is no longer in the same state as it was when I pronounced the first letter "i." Descend into the realm of microphysics and you will see the importance of apprehending this. No elementary particle in its continual motion has patience enough to stay in its place at least long enough to give me time to say about it that "it is." While I say "The atom is," it has lived a history so rich that in comparison to it the whole history of mankind appears as a little thing. Sir James Jeans said: "Matter is not something which is, but which happens." Matter is not existence, but flowing. Everything - and especially living beings - is continually changing and being renewed.

How can the One who moves all be unmoved? If images of God were allowed and could convey reality, the most faithful image of God would be that painted by Michelangelo on the ceiling of the Capella Sistina, which shows God flying in the tempest. In the Biblical book of Ruth, we read about the wings of God.

My opponents say that God is not. They don't know that high-ranking Christian teachers said it long before, though they gave this negation the right meaning. The scholastic philosopher John Scotus Erigena wrote, "Literally, God is not, because he transcends being." St. Thomas Aquinas says, "The divine 'being,' which is his substance, is not the common 'to be.' It is a be-ing distinct from any other being. The divine 'Esse' (Latin: to be) is not the common 'esse.'"

The word "being" is not only a noun, but also a verb. No created being is something which could be expressed only by a noun, because it evolves, it moves, it lives a history. You cannot apply the category "is" in the limited sense of having a fixed state to the creation, even less to the Creator. When you say "God is," you have said much too little about him. God happens.

There exists an event, "Godhead." He is a huge coming and becoming. His name in Hebrew is "El," which expresses a relation: "El" means "towards," the movement from Alpha towards Omega.
The literal translation of his Hebrew name which he disclosed to Moses "~Ehjeh asher ehjeh~" is "I will be what I will be."

David the Psalmist asked himself who God was and answered: "He rode upon a cherub (an angelic being) and did fly; yea, he did fly upon the wings of the wind." The Bible tells us that God rides on winged beings, or rather on winged events, because the angels also "are" not, but happen. In another psalm we read: "He makes the clouds his chariot. He walketh upon the wings of the wind."

Compare this oriental imagery, which is a genial anticipation of the modern scientific conception of the world, with the idea of an immobile motor of the universe and you will discover how right the Bible is. In God there is no variableness, neither shadow of turning, as regards his fixed character of love. But the manifestations of this love are new every moment.

This creates the difficulty in answering the question, "Who is God?," because he sheds his goodness upon mankind in ever new forms. The flames of his love are changing continually, as do flames of fire. You cannot really make a portrait of a person. Every person is a succession of many facial expressions. You cannot really say a truth. Truth is always a whole chain of assertions about a changing object or person.

Therefore Hebrew, the language in which God first gave his revelation, does not have the word "face," but only "faces" - "~panim~." Every man and every object changes its aspect continually. About God himself the Bible also uses this plural, "~panim~." He also changes constantly his expressions of love and righteousness.

When you ask yourself "Who is God?," thousands of images pass like in a kaleidoscope before your eyes, each more beautiful than the other. Therefore it was forbidden to the Jews to make to themselves graven images.

The Hebrew language avoids the expression "is." Jesus, speaking Hebrew or its Aramaic dialect, never said: "This is my body" but simply: "This-my body." (Russians, as well as the Chinese, also omit the verb "to be.") If theologians had known the Biblical languages better, there would have been one quarrel less about what Jesus never said.

We know what God is, the Alpha, the Creator of heaven and earth. We know what he will be: The "all in all." What is he now? He is not an "is." God flies from one pole to the other.

The atheists have a point. We cannot say who God is, nor can they say what atheism is. This also is in continual evolution. The atheism of the fools of old who simply denied God, has passed through many stages to become the militant and scientifically substructured atheism ruling in Communist countries today.

But the fact that we cannot say who God is does not exhaust our thinking.

The apostle Paul wrote: "The invisible things of him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even his eternal power and Godhead" (ROM 1:20).

Giordano Bruno is the author of the play on words that "intelectio" (the intellect) is "~interna lectio~" (the internal lesson) which nature gives us.

The more I know of a machine, the more I admire the engineer who conceived it. The more beautiful a palace, the more respect I have for the architect.

The list of atheist scientists given by my opponents is spurious.

Our universe bears the name of Einstein. He must know something about it. He writes in ~The World As See It~:

> If one purges the Judaism of the prophets, and Christianity as Jesus Christ has taught it, of all subsequent additions, specially of priestcraft, one is left with a teaching which is capable of curing all the social evils of humanity. It is the duty of every man of good will to strive steadfastly in his own little world to make this really human teaching a living force, as far as he can. If he makes an honest effort in this direction, without being crushed and trampled under feet by his contemporaries, he may consider himself and the community to which he belongs lucky.

In a preface to his biography by Bernett, he says: "The cosmic living of religion is the most powerful and noble motive for the scientific research of nature."

Milner opens his book ~Relativity and the Structure of Stars~ with the words: "In the beginning God created heaven and earth."

The biologist Hans Speman writes: "I acknowledge that in my experimental works I had often the sentiment of a dialogue, in which my partner seemed to me to be the more intelligent."

Immanuel Kant wrote: "As a face is beautiful because it unveils a soul; the world is beautiful because you see through it a God."

Hegel, the founder of modern dialectic and the teacher of Karl Marx, asked philosophy to save religion.

Francis Bacon said: "Philosophy studied superficially estranges from God: studied in depth it brings you back to God."

There are many things which make believers of many scientists. They wonder about the concordance between the laws of nature and our possibilities of apprehension through the senses, reason, intuition, and faith.

Unbelievers, if they wish to be logical, should not be atheists but agnostics. Is there no Creator? Well, then, the universe is the random agglomeration, unguided by any wisdom, of ions, electrons, photons, and protons. My brain is also the result of such random evolution, according to laws established by no law-giver. How is it, then, that my brain, which is not a willed organ, intelligently constructed, can rightly understand so many things in the universe? Stalin said that not all things are known, but all things can be known. How is it that I have a brain which can know everything? Would lamps, batteries, and wires thrown together without a preconceived design be able to catch radio transmissions? Would wheels, screws, levers, and brakes come together to make a car in which one can drive?

The biologist Max Hartmann speaks about "the miracle of the harmony between the universe and our thinking." De Broglie says that there is more mystery than we believe in the simple fact that science is possible. Einstein wrote: "What is eternally unintelligible in the universe is that it can be understood."

Even Voltaire, whom the atheists wrongly consider to be one of their number, said these words: "The world is made with intelligence. Therefore it has been made by an intelligence ... The intelligence of a Newton comes from another intelligence."

Who can believe that there are watches but no watchmaker? Our watches tell time according to the movements of the earth. Who made this chronometer?

The second thing which strikes everyone who looks attentively at creation is the stern order in nature, which also cannot be the result of chance.

Uexkll says: "We read in nature a whole musical score." The geologist Cloos writes: "We hear the music of the earth."

Kant, who is very critical of many reasonable proofs brought by theology for belief in the existence of God, admits the validity of the so-called cosmological proof.

The order in nature points to a Creator.

Charles Darwin, victim of the mercantilist and utilitarian style of life in Great Britain of his time, thought nature also worked according to the utilitarian principle. But this is not so. In nature a great artist and architect with imagination is at work.

The exquisite beauty of the peacock's feathers cannot be explained as having evolved by the accumulation of small variations, because they provided the advantage of more easily attracting mates. A female crow also finds a mate, and wayside weeds as well as gorgeous lilies attract bees and wasps for fertilization.

Why are some tiny fish so uselessly beautiful? Well, it is art for art's sake. Why does the parrot have the capacity to speak? Why do bell-birds exist, whose chirping is like the ringing of little bells? It is just the fancy of an artist. How about the horns of the deer? Why does the zebra have such regular stripes? Why does each flower have a different colour?

Nietzsche said: "In every one of us there is a child who wishes to play." Is there not something childlike in God which made him create all these things? Does it not belong to the very essence of Godhead that it must be expressed also in a babe born in a stable and in a little boy who plays with others on the streets of Nazareth?

Whence the precise angles and the symmetry and beauty of forms in crystals?

How is it that in the Far East there exists the tailorbird, which sows its nest of leaves with threads of cotton spun by itself?

How is it that the spiderweb surpasses the technical capacities of men? On astronomical lenses the thread of the spiderweb is used for measure. Men could not produce anything better or finer, which would last longer and not be altered by changes of temperature.

Men have invented radar. But they learned it from the bats. We have wonderful optical instruments today, but which one surpasses the human eye?

I know about a Communist who became a Christian from looking at the delicate convolutions of his baby's ears. They were surely created by design. They could not have been created by any chance coming together of atoms.

How can you not believe in a wise Creator when you investigate further the human ear, in which 24,000 nerve ends are united and strung in order to bring messages to the brain?

Look carefully at a stalk of wheat: its height would be something like four and a half feet and the diameter would be a mere sixteenth of an inch. For comparison let us imagine a building 1,250 feet high. (It would be a building of something like 100 storeys.) And this on a surface of only one square yard. Now, just at the top of the stalk is the heavy fruit. It is moved by winds but does not break. The stalk contains a splendidly conceived mechanical system. It is still a mystery to men how the water ascends to the very top. We need pumps to provide water for the upper floors of our high buildings. We could not make something as marvelous as the stalk.

The physicist Urey, the discoverer of heavy water, wrote: "Not one of the existing theories about the origin of the world does work without the presupposition of a miracle."

And because we spoke about water - let us stop to look at its wonders. All physical objects expand with heat and contract with cold; only water increases its volume when it cools down and forms ice. The ice, being lighter than water, remains on top. It forms a crust, which saves the fish from the cold of winter. Without this peculiarity of water, life in the rivers would be impossible, and primitive men who lived on fish would not have survived.
Whence this exception? Is it just an accident, or is it something ordered by a wise Creator?

Let us allow a renowned technician, Werner Siemens, to speak:

> The more we penetrate in the sphere of the harmonic forces of nature, which are regulated by eternal, immovable laws, hidden from our full understanding by a thick veil, the more we are pushed towards humility, the more our knowledge appears small, the more our desire to drink from this unquenchable source of science and knowledge increases. And in the same measure also grows our admiration towards the infinite ordering wisdom, which is interpenetrating the whole creation.

it is true that we cannot say, "Who is God?" but his unseen power we can see if we look carefully at the things created by him. They speak about God as about a mighty ruler and a great artist. From them we know that God is a God of order.
Jesus, asked once by his disciples to show them the Father, answered: "Have I been so long time with you, and yet hast thou not known me, Philip? He that hath seen me hath seen the Father; and how sayest thou then, Show us the Father? Believest thou not that I am in the Father, and the Father in me? ... the Father that dwelleth in me, he doeth the works" (JHN 14:9,10).
By these words, Jesus teaches us how we should think about His person, but he also teaches us how we should think about ourselves.
While maintaining a sense of proportion, let us note that whoever sees me or whoever sees you, even if you are the author of an atheistic book, sees the Father, because we were all created in his image and after his likeness.
St. Gregory of Nyssa wrote, "Man is the human face of God." St. Macarius wrote, "Between God and man there exists the closest familial relationship." St. Basil noted, "Man is a being who has received the

page 120 My Answer to Moscow's Atheists

commandment to become god."

Man, every man, any man – an atheist, a criminal, a saint – is wonderful first of all because of his bodily structure. Even the worst and most despicable of men has a heart, which is a pump such as engineers are not able to construct – a pump which circulates the blood 600 times a day throughout the body. In a span of fifty years, this happens 1,840,000,000 times, and this without a single minute of interruption.

Secondly, man is a wonderful creature by virtue of his soul, another surprising entity, almost indefinable. It is so perfect that, in a certain sense, it can dispense with the body. It shows its independence in the Ninth Symphony of the deaf Beethoven; or in the dedicated life of Helen Keller, who, though deaf, dumb, and blind, became an author and a great philanthropist; or in the fact that Pascal at the age of nine rediscovered the axioms of Euclidian geometry; or in the life of Mozart, who began composing music at the age of five.

It also shows its independence from the senses in the experiences of clairvoyance, telepathy, and precognition, and also of hypnotism.

In the hypnotic state the beating of the heart becomes so slight that it is almost like fibrillation. The man scarcely breathes at all. The blood barely moves through the vessels of the brain. It might not reach the capillary vessels. Without proper oxygenation, it is clogged with the products of decomposition. The brain engages in a minimum of activity, but the mind of the hypnotized person becomes hyperactive. It is enough to read a long poem to him once. He will repeat it without a mistake. Read to him a page of the Hebrew Bible. He may not know the language, but he will echo it with exactitude. He will recall insignificant incidents from childhood.

So much lies within the province of the soul.

But man contains a third wonderful structure. If by his body he is akin to the animal world (this is nothing to be ashamed of, even if one is scientifically opposed to the theory of evolution. Saint Francis of Assisi spoke about "brother wolf" and would gladly have said "brother monkey"), he has also a spirit, by which he is akin to God.

page 121 My Answer to Moscow's Atheists

My adversaries would not even acknowledge its existence, because it cannot be verified by the senses. How can it when it is the verifier? The eye does not see itself, the nose does not smell itself. The spirit does not belong to the spectacle acted upon by the senses. It is the spectator and reacts according to its own taste to what comes within its purview.

Aristotle said: "If you recognize in man only the human, you betray man and wish him mischief, because by everything which is essential in his being - the spirit - man is called to something higher than just human life." It is inhuman to be only human. It is unworthy of a caterpillar to be considered only a caterpillar: he is also a butterfly in process. So we are not allowed to degrade man, to whom Jesus said, "You are gods" (JHN 10:34). In a seed there is more than the seed: it contains the potential flower.

Man is a being who bears the image of God. I cannot tell you what God looks like, but look to man, look at the best exemplars of mankind, and you will see something of Godhead: you will see the joy of living, of creative enthusiasm, the depths of knowledge, the taste for beauty, the exuberance of life, and the sheer ability to discern possibilities and choose to reach ever higher.

What a great being man is! He is in the likeness and image of God, because he is also the creator of a universe: of his own inner universe. Nature outside of me is a seething maelstrom of energy, a multitude of waves, radiations, and vibrations of electrons, protons, and elementary particles; but the wave which is dumb becomes audible in an ear, the unapprehended radiation becomes visible in an eye, and the unintelligible universe becomes intelligible in the mind of a man.

Outside of me, there exists a reality. ~I~ order it in quantity, quality, causality, finality, modality. I catch this seemingly chaotic reality in a net, which has been woven by ~me~, and make out of it an ordered universe. It is in ~me~ that nature realizes its own beauty. When l look upon a rose, it comes to life in crimson splendour and yields its fragrance. If man did not exist, the rose would have no value and would be a mere congregation of atoms.

The only object in nature which I know intimately from the inside is myself. And in myself there is something, the capacity to put order in chaos, to create my own universe, whether benevolent, to give me joy, or gloomy, to drive me and others to despair. In all spheres of knowledge we live by extrapolation. We proceed from the known to the unknown. If I myself am more than any outside observer can see, is it not possible that there is more to the world around me than what appears on the surface?

Lenin compliments Bishop Berkeley, the founder of Solipsist philosophy, by calling him the ideal philosopher most difficult to defeat, all because Berkeley provided a reasonable argument for faith in God, an argument which seems very powerful to me. He says that the universe can exist only in a mind; outside the mind reality is chaotic. It is a ~tohu va bohu~. It is the mind which organizes from it a universe, dictating its laws, putting it in the frame of order, and categorizing it. A universe can exist only in a mind; but men have not existed for ever, nor has the human mind. Therefore, before the appearance of man, there must have been another mind in which the universe existed. Man conceives of himself as part of an organized universe. The mind in which the universe always existed is called God.

I am also a creator of a universe, of an inner universe - but I ~am~ a creator! Therefore, whosoever sees me, sees the Father.

page 123 My Answer to Moscow's Atheists

I cannot tell you who God is, but you can understand something about Godhead by looking at man.

LOOK TO JESUS OF NAZARETH

Look to the highest and best exemplar of mankind that you know, to the most beloved being, and you will see in him, however dimly, something of the Father!

But there is a Son of man in whom you can see God in a special way. It is Jesus of Nazareth - because he was not only the Son of man, he was God incarnate.

God knows everything, but there are some things which he knew only from outside. A judge can know the whole penal code, the whole science of penitentiaries, and still not be able to judge righteously, because he has never lived the life of a prisoner. Five years of prison, lived day by day in a jail, are something entirely different from five years of prison prescribed for an offence in the penal code and pronounced in a sentence.

God cannot lie, nor does he know by experience any other infractions of the moral code, whereas these sins are the very elements of life with which you are surrounded every day. Neither God nor holy angels can die. Death is for them only a spectacle, on which they look from outside.

Therefore Christ, the Son of God, became man with all the attributes and limitations of the human family. A male being, he knew the temptation of woman; a poor carpenter in an oppressed nation, he knew the temptation of rebellion or of dishonesty. A prisoner who was whipped and afterwards crucified, he knew the temptation of despair and of resentment. He knew, without committing sin, such depths of evil that the evangelists considered it wise not to record what happened in his life between the ages of twelve and thirty. But they did record that, during his three and a half years of public ministry, his enemies were frequently offended by his friendship with scoundrels and with loose women.

Jesus, the Son of God, chose to partake of human nature with all its liabilities and to taste of death, thus enabling himself to be not only the righteous judge of man, but also his defender and Saviour. The life of Jesus and his death on Golgotha's cross - apart from its efficacy in the salvation of man - was God's way of obtaining a personal, intimate knowledge of human problems. Before the experience of Golgotha, God knew less than he knew afterwards. And now, having identified with us in the flesh, he understands us better and can forgive us better. The Kingdom of Heaven has come closer to us.

To what could we compare this great condescension of the Son of God?

We could liken it to the attempt on the part of Osborn to better the harsh conditions in U.S. prisons by having himself jailed and living for many years the tortured life of a prisoner - all to prepare himself for his valiant crusade afterwards.

We could liken it to the deeds of some doctors who have injected themselves with virulent microbes in order to help their fellowmen through the experiences thus gained.

But no! These likenesses do not tell us anything, because in these cases one man risked his life for other men, his fellow creatures, whereas for Jesus Christ it was entirely different.

Christ is God, and in his sight our world is microscopic. All the nations are before him as a drop of water in a bucket and as a bit of dust on a scale. His great deed can be likened, rather, to the absurdity of love which a man should have for ill-smelling, blood-sucking insects. They tremble between the fingers of the man who wishes to kill them. But he would become a bug, live the life of a bug with its propensity to harm men, and die the death of a bug, in order that, having regained his former estate, in the end he might be a just judge of insects, might protect them from their ruthless exterminators, might defend them with authority, and might make of them harmless benefactors.

I know that this example will offend many, but it must have seemed incomprehensible to angels that Christ should choose to be incarnate in an ugly, loathsome and sinful species.

Christ descended not merely to the level of man. In the body of the young virgin Mary, through a process of fertilization which remains ever a mystery, he was reduced to a mere embryo, received nourishment from inorganic as well as organic matter, and passed nine months ~in utero~ to become a babe, then a youth, then a man. And what kind of Man! He was incarnate not in a hero like Bar Kochbah, not in a great initiate like Appollonius of Tyana, not in a philosopher like Plato. In order to save man, every man, Christ had to be immersed in matter as deeply as mankind is drowned. Therefore, after subjecting himself to the normal processes of human development, he became a Jewish carpenter, member of a social class without culture. He had a poor language; he sometimes had to engage in discussions on a humiliating level, because this was the level of the men with whom he debated. He knew weakness, anger, hurt, fear, and he was put in a class with criminals.

Those things in Jesus Christ which are offensive to men become, to those who understand, added incentives to adore his magnificent humility and unfathomable love.

And if you ask Christ why he brought this sacrifice, he answers with majestic simplicity that God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believes in him should not perish, but have everlasting life. ~He~ says that the Father sent him.

We cannot say what God is, but looking to Christ, we understand something of his character. We see that what expresses God best is love, righteousness, and loving-kindness towards mankind. We perceive that he has such love and that this love made him give his Son to die for us.

THE CREATION

But why this detour? Why must we see God in nature, in man, in Christ Jesus? Why can we not see him face to face?

In the Babylonian Talmud it is said that a heathen emperor asked a rabbi: "Show me God!" The rabbi answered: "You will see him with your eyes on one condition. First, you must look five minutes into the sun." The emperor looked at the sun but immediately had to lower his eyes. Then the rabbi told him: "You cannot look for one minute at the sun, which is an insignificant creation of God - and yet you wish to see the One who gives the stars their brilliance!"

Evidently, for a modern intellectual, faith has its difficulties.

He sees that in the world everything happens according to natural laws. From one thing, another develops according to precise laws, as the things which exist are the result of a former development. Mountains and valleys and rivers and living beings are not creations in the sense which is usually given to this word, as stars are not creations but developments from some former state. Some stars are old, ready to be extinguished, others are in full maturity, others are baby-stars. Stars of all ages coexist in the universe. Then - when did the creation take place? The number of species which have disappeared is estimated at half a million. The species which exist now may not always have existed. It is known that there can be evolution ~within~ the species. In this context, not every living being is a direct creation of God.

The difficulty disappears when we consider God not simply as a Being who ~has~ created a world. He is a ~living and a life-giving~ God. He moves everything continually according to physical laws, which are expressions of his fixed character. Therefore, it is so difficult to apprehend him.

Heraclitus said: "It pleases nature to hide itself." This is even truer about God, of whom Solomon says: "The Lord said that he would dwell in the thick darkness" (I Kings 8 :12).

The finer a being is, the more it sheds blessings, itself remaining in the shadow. So is God, and therefore he remains unobserved. We have to seek the source of our blessings. Luther says: "Nothing is small without God, being even smaller, nothing is big without God being even bigger, nothing is short without God being even shorter, nothing is long without God having even longer, nothing is wide without God being even wider, nothing is narrow without God being even narrower." Elsewhere in his writings he adds: "Nothing can be more present a Being and more central than God and his might."

And we do not observe God except when his Spirit moves, as we do not observe the air except when the wind blows.

It is only through meditation and spiritual exercises, through the purity which faith in the sacrifice of Jesus Christ gives you, that in you are awakened the atrophied senses of the spirit, and you feel the presence of the Lord. "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God," says Jesus.

You see, you do know God, though you cannot say to those who are not pure how he is, because you yourself ~are~ no more, but ~become~. You are changed from glory to glory, into his likeness.

GOD IS

I have seen Christians dying in jail whose last words were, "God is." Were these wrong? Surely not. I would also like to die with this last assertion on my lips

We live lives on different levels. A scientist knows that all material objects are whirlwinds of elementary particles, as distant from each other, proportionately, as the earth is from the sun. But he has no hesitation in sitting down on a chair, knowing that it is a very solid object. In one sense, every wall is a huge void within which electrons whirl in vast orbits. But considered on another level, a wall is anything but a void. You have to be careful about this inoffensive wall. You may bump your head very badly if you walk towards it with the atomic theory in your mind.

The same is true of religion. There exists a high, philosophic level where, as we explained, you cannot apply to God the words "to exist" or "to be," because these are too simple. He is more than existing. We Christians have room in our minds to consider the atheistic denial of God. But atheists know reality only as it appears on one level, and therefore they know it falsely, thereby placing themselves in deadly danger. There is another plane on which God simply exists and is.

A partial truth is a dangerous thing. It is not without reason that we value "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth."

Every cultured man knows that we live simultaneously in the Newtonian and in the Einsteinian universe, each with its own laws. Those who know only the Newtonian universe would not be able to fly to the moon nor have atomic energy. We live simultaneously in a world in which we may not meet God and in a second world, which atheists do not know, in which God simply exists, is, and allows us to hold communion with him.

It is the world of the spirit, of practical religion.

Chairs and walls and bread exist and are used as such in spite of molecular and atomic theories. Likewise, God simply exists.

On occasion, his presence breaks through self-conscious barriers, especially in moments of crisis.

There are instances known from history, and I have personally known many such cases, of atheists – yes, of Communist leaders – who died in Communist prisons, victims of Party purges, and who in their last moment cried, "God, God! " or "Jesus!"

It would be profitable to ask from whence comes this belief in God in the minds of millions of men all throughout history? The atheists who deny God deny a notion that exists in their own mind. The English philosopher Locke has predicated the idea that there is nothing in our intellect except what has passed through our senses. A wild man in the jungle of New Guinea would not have in his mind the notion "television," because the respective object does not exist in his world. If mankind had never had any experience of God, how did such a notion appear in its mind?

Engels in his day was ready with answer to this question, saying that our concept of God is a fantastic reflection in our mind of social realities. Christians then tried hard to prove that Engels was wrong, that God is not a fantastic reflection, but that the notion about him is an exact mirroring of divine reality. The time has come for another line of approach.

I admit that belief in God is a fantastic reflection, and I add that only the fantastic is real. All the "realism" that denied that men would ever be able to fly to the moon, or pilot a submarine under the ice of the North Pole, or annihilate distances by flying planes around the earth in a short time, or split the atom, or build houses with natural gases - all such "realism" has been proved wrong. Likewise, the "realism" of those who live in God's world and honestly assert that he does not exist is just as wrong. On the other hand, the fancies of Leonardo da Vinci and Jules Verne and others like them have become reality. And the dreamers of dreams who walk with a God you cannot see or touch, unless you develop the faculty of faith, perceive the reality which pervades all creation.

Only the fantastic is the real in modern science. Niels Bohr asks, "Is anybody mad enough to have the truth?"

What is science? It is a discipline which makes the fantastic come true.

It has discovered that within the nucleus of a cell, in the DNA, is contained a code in which all former generations have transmitted to the new being their experience and their constitutional features. Now this knowledge had to pass outside the nucleus to where the proteins are built. So there is in the nucleus a kind of Xerox machine, which makes a photocopy of the DNA. And there is "somebody" who handles the Xerox machine. The copy is not absolutely faithful. The "one" who handles the machine is like a man who, while making a photocopy, covers part of the document or adds special data. And the RNA conveys this knowledge outside the cell.

A fantastic story! No novelist could have invented a better one. This fantasy is the truth about our organism.

Might religion also be a fantastic reflection? Then it is the right reflection of a fantastic reality and of its fantastic Creator.

Man's mind has a dualistic nature. It comprehends facts and it fancies. If it had not fancied, humanity would not have developed. Civilization is the fulfillment of what were formerly dreams. I would refuse a religion that consisted only of facts. It would not satisfy my dualistic nature. It must fulfill my desire after fancy, after myth.

Marx and Engels described facts, the terrible exploitation that existed under early capitalism. But they did not stop at this, because they were men. After the analysis of facts, fancy began to work: the dream of a new society without exploitation or wars, and with social justice. The fantasies of science have been fulfilled. A holy life, which is sheer fantasy for one who starts a life of faith, is achieved by many. But the Marxian society is still a Utopia. So Engels had no right to cast reproach on Christianity as belonging to fantasy - though we take this as a compliment.

You might reply that it is possible to imagine things that are beyond the realm of possibility. Thus you can fancy an island a mile square all made of diamonds in the midst of the ocean, yet such an island does not exist. But, everything you have "imagined" is real. In nature there are islands, there is the ocean, there are diamonds, and there exists the dimension of one mile square. Now, you have pieced together realities improperly, but it is only realities you could imagine. So in our mind the notion of God which we have can be associated with wrong ideas. I can believe in an evil God, a God in human form, a tribal or national God, and so on, but all the time I deal with realities, whether rightly or wrongly. God himself exists and is what he is, not what we consider him to be.

Engels did not have to tell us that our faith is absurd.

If God could fit within the frame of my reason, he would not be a God but a low being like myself. A philosopher whose philosophy could be understood by his five-year-old son would not be a philosopher. God to be God must transcend our reason by his deeds and his being. The atmosphere we breathe is a combination of nitrogen and oxygen perfectly suited to our lungs. The distance of the earth from the sun and the moon is just what is necessary for the maintenance of life, health, and happiness. The perpetual cycles of rain and snow make the earth fertile. The tides of the sea keep the shores clean and fresh. Vitamins necessary for bodily existence are provided in abundance. Laws and forces of nature stand ready to be harnessed for man's use. God has filled the earth with beauty and charm. There are majestic mountains and fertile valleys, tall trees and carpets of grass, the moonlight, the stillness of the desert, the thrill of songbirds - all of which witness to the fact that God made the earth for our pleasure.

If a young man loved a girl and presented her with a beautiful house surrounded by a splendid garden and told her, "This I have provided for you," the girl would have no doubt of the boy's love for her. This is just what has happened between God and us. He has made food to grow for us, and beneath the soil there are minerals and oil for tools and fuel. These are all evidences of God's provision for our needs and therefore of the actual existence of God.

Consider the bees, which organize a city with 10,000 cells for honey, 12,000 cells for larvae, filled with honey, and a place for the mother queen. When the bees observe that the heat is increasing and the wax may melt and the honey be lost, they organize the swarm into squads, put sentinels at the entrances, glue the feet down, and then with flying wings create a system of ventilation to cool the honey - something like an electric fan. Bees collect honey from an area of twenty square miles. Now, how can the tiny brain of a bee perform such wonders if behind it there is not a higher mind - the mind of God?

A group of scientists in Chicago did an experiment. A female moth of a rare species was placed in a room. Four miles away a male moth of the same species was released. In spite of the smoke of the city, in spite of the distance, and in spite of the fact that the female was in a closed room, within a few hours the male moth was found beating its wings against the window of the room in which the female was confined. Explain such a thing without an intelligent being - a God - who has created these things.

Fish lay their eggs in the fjords of Norway and from these eggs come a new generation of fish that somehow find their way across the ocean to the Caribbean Sea. When the time comes for them to spawn in their turn, they return to exactly the same fjords they had previously left. A man has to spend twenty years learning to become captain of a ship and to travel across the Atlantic Ocean. Who taught these fish to travel?

When we were in prison, the swallows made their nests in our cells, and every autumn they left our country. Yet these same swallows came back from as far as Mozambique to our prison in Romania, exactly to cell number twelve which they had left half a year before.

For those who have their eyes open, the wisdom and power of God are revealed in a million ways.

Does God exist? The question should not even be asked.

In every true rendering of the subject-predicate form, the predicate is contained in the subject. God is the ideal being, the sum of all the highest qualities, such as love, goodness, righteousness, omnipotence, and so on. If he has all the perfections (which he must, or he would not be God), he must have existence, too. A non-existent God would not have the sum of perfections. To ask, "Is there a God?" is tantamount to asking, "Is the existent existing?"

God is. With this conviction I live, and with this assertion I hope to die. I use the expression that God is, only because I am dealing with atheists. Otherwise it is senseless, a tautology, like "All bachelors are male." When you have said "bachelor," you have already said "male." And when you have said "God," his existence is implicit.

Prayer simply exists. How did mankind come by it? Where did this phenomenon originate? Nowhere. Men have always philosophized about God and have always sought communion with him. Both philosophy and practical religion have been sometimes primitive, sometimes terribly false, but they were there.

An Indian tribe in North America prayed:

> O our mother earth, O our father heaven,
> we are your children.
> The sacrifices you ask for we offer > with bent backs.
> Weave us a garment of radiant sunlight
> the white dawn the warp, > the red evening the woof.

> Let the murmuring rain be the fringe > and the rainbow the hem.
> Weave us a garment of radiant sunlight,
> we want to walk where the birds sing.
> We want to walk through the green grass,
> O our mother earth, O our father heaven.

St. Augustine describes his experiences of praying as a young child:

> I was sent to school to learn how to read a write, things the usefulness of which I had no idea. All the same, every time that I was slow to learn, I was beaten. God, my God, what misery I suffered there and how deceived I was!
>
> We did, however, come into contact, Lord, with people who prayed to you. From them we learned - while we were, to the best of our ability, forming an impression of you - that you were someone great and powerful, able to hear us and to come to our help, even without revealing yourself to our senses. And it is true that, even as a small boy, I began to pray to you, my refuge and my help, and, calling on you, I lost all control of my tongue and, although I was a little person, I asked you with no little fervour that I might not be beaten any more at school.

Soviet soldiers, brought up in atheistic schools, prayed on the battle-front. Not knowing anything better, many of them prayed: "God and mother's spirit, help!" Old-time members of the Communist Party, who fell victim to the purges in Stalin's time, shared prison cells with us and told us that in difficult moments they prayed.

This prayer is a far cry from such lofty prayers as that of St. Gertrude: "Jesus, I am you; you are I. I am not you; you are not I. We both are together an entirely new being."

page 135 My Answer to Moscow's Atheists

But men pray. I have known an atheistic lecturer who prayed to God for the success of his godless speeches, which were his means of earning a livelihood.

Dimly or consciously men seek communion with God who exists, who is, who can be met. And if they persist, they meet him.

PROPHECY

The authors of ~The Atheist's Handbook~ deny that any prophecy is possible. They dismiss prophecies "in the name of science." How is it then that Sir Isaac Newton, a scientist if ever there was one, the man who has been called "the father of reason," wrote a book called ~Observations of Prophecies~? He is the one who provided the first really scientific chronology of a history of Jesus.

But instead of arguing whether prophecy is possible, let us analyze the facts. Facts if proven speak for themselves. Are there facts indicating that prophecies have been fulfilled?

Even a superficial knowledge of the Bible reveals hundreds of prophecies which have been fulfilled and others which are being fulfilled under our eyes.

First of all, there are the prophecies concerning Jesus Christ, who is the great subject of the Bible.

In the Bible, it was prophesied that Christ would be descended from Abraham and would belong to the tribe of Judah. The prophet Micah predicted seven centuries before the actual event that Christ would be born in the town of Bethlehem. Around the same time Isaiah told about his ministry of service and suffering and gave an outline of his life's story. The prophet Zechariah predicted that Jesus would enter Jerusalem humbly, riding upon an ass. Psalm 41 predicted his betrayal by one of his disciples. Zechariah told how much this traitor would get for his betrayal and what would happen with the money. The fact that Jesus would be whipped and spat upon was also predicted.

Some five centuries before Christ the prophet Zechariah wrote that people would gaze on him whom they had just pierced. David indicated that both his hands and his feet would be pierced. The resurrection of Jesus was predicted as well.

Granted that some of these prophecies can be ridiculed and written off by saying that their "fulfillment" was simply arranged by Jesus and his followers - such as his riding into Jerusalem on an ass, or his cry on the cross, "I thirst!" But did the Roman soldiers deliberately set out to fulfill the prophecy contained in a psalm: "They part my garments among them, and cast lots upon my vesture"? What did a Roman soldier know or care about Jewish prophecies? Yet each chronicler of the crucifixion meticulously recorded the detail about the soldiers casting lots for his garments, John adding the detail that the seamless robe was too valuable to be torn in pieces and divided among the four soldiers.

But how about the greatest event of all, Jesus's resurrection from the dead? Could he have staged that?

Even if he had been a great deceiver, as atheists like to allege, could he, under the watchful eyes of Jews and Romans alike, have arranged not to die on the cross, not to have his bones broken along with the thieves (in fulfillment of another explicit prophecy), not to succumb in the sealed, guarded tomb? And if he had managed thus far, could he have depended on his terrified, cowardly disciples to break through a band of soldiers, roll away the sealed stone, and release him without hindrance? It is unthinkable.

Mommsen, the renowned historian of the Roman empire, calls the resurrection of the Saviour the best established fact of Roman history. It could hardly have been staged by men. It was the fulfilling of a prophecy.

page 137 My Answer to Moscow's Atheists

PROPHECIES ABOUT THE JEWISH PEOPLE

"No prophecy," they say. Those whom we call prophets were just intelligent men and so were able to predict events.

According to ~The Atheist's Handbook~, the most intelligent geniuses of mankind were Marx, Engels, Lenin, and others like them. They had in their minds what ~The Atheist's Handbook~ considers the most powerful means of understanding political and social events – that is, historic materialism.

Marx wrote a book called ~The Jewish Question~. He obviously had the potential with which historic materialism endows a thinker. How is it that he, living in the second half of the nineteenth century, had no idea that the Jews, scattered as they were among the nations, would return to their land and have a country of their own? Lenin lived in the twentieth century. The Zionist movement was already in existence and was becoming stronger and stronger. He (the great genius of mankind) did not consider it likely at all that the Jews would be gathered together in their own land, nor did he, keen observer of everything in political life, armed with the powerful weapon of historical materialism, even mention the Zionists. He neither took note of this movement nor expected it to triumph.

Stalin wrote a book entitled ~The National Question~. In this book, which was written before the First World War, he who was once proclaimed by the atheists as the greatest genius mankind has ever had and will ever have, did not even acknowledge the Jews as a nation, because the Jewish people did not enter into his definition of what a nation is.

But the Jewish nation in its development disregarded both the anti-Semitism of the book of Marx and the fact that they were ignored in the book by Stalin. The Jews created a state, fulfilling what was predicted in quite

page 138 My Answer to Moscow's Atheists

another book - the one book which atheists despise above all others - the Bible.

Frederick the Great, King of Prussia, once asked his chaplain: "Give me a sure proof of the inspiration of the Holy Scriptures." The chaplain answered: "It is the Jew, Your Majesty." The Jews and their miraculous history are another proof of the truth of Biblical prophecy.

Strangely enough, several of the authors of ~The Atheist's Handbook~ are Jews, fulfilling by this a Biblical prophecy that some Jews would be a curse for all peoples. But there are also Jews who fight atheism and spread abroad the knowledge of God, thus fulfilling another prophecy in the same Bible which says that a remnant in Israel will in the last days turn to their Saviour Jesus Christ and be a great blessing.

The prophecies about the Jews begin with a promise made to Abraham, the first Jew, some 4,500 years ago. Listen to it: "I will make of thee a great nation."

The Christian world bears the name of a Jew, Jesus Christ. The Communist camp bears the name of another Jew, Marx. The universe as a whole bears the name of yet another Jew, Einstein. Over sixty per cent of the Nobel Prize winners are Jewish, among them the lamented Soviet writer, Boris Pasternak. Jews played a tremendous role in the Communist revolution - men like Trotsky, Zinoviev, Kamenev. Lenin was half-Jewish. Jews today play a big role in the anti-government fight within the Soviet Union. Litvinov, the writer Daniel, Krasnov-Levitin, and other freedom fighters who have suffered imprisonment, are Jewish. Jews are active in the economic and political life of the United States and many other countries. They hold government positions in many Western nations. The Jew Teller is called "the father of the nuclear bomb."

Dr. Sale Harrison in his book ~The Remarkable Jew~ writes: "No one will doubt that the Jews of today hold

page 139 My Answer to Moscow's Atheists

the money chests of the world. Wherever they have gone, they have become the wizards of finance."

Basil Mowll says in his book ~Bible Light in Present Events~: "A careful computation of the university professors of Western Europe, apart from Great Britain before the First World War, showed that about seventy per cent were of Jewish birth and persuasion."

For the first time in history, a woman has been employed by the Roman Curia. She is a Christian of Jewish origin.

Simone Weil, a Jewess, is one of the most profound theologians of Catholicism today.

The Hebrew language is the only old language that has been revived and is now spoken currently in Israel. This has not happened with Latin, old Greek, Slavonic, Irish, Welsh, or any other old language.

Thus, the prophecy has been fulfilled. A small Bedouin tribe has become a great nation - great in all aspects, for good or for ill. Even Iaroslavski, founder of the International Association of the Godless and the great leader of this movement, was Jewish.

The prophecy continues: "Thou shalt be a blessing." Whoever feels blessed by Communism owes it to the Jew Marx. Whoever feels blessed by capitalism owes it to the Jews who were instrumental in creating this system. Whoever is blessed by Christianity owes it to a Jew, Jesus.

The Word of God says also in the same chapter: "I will bless them that bless thee and curse him that curseth thee" (GEN 12:3). It is a simple fact that history has favoured the friends of the Jews. When Spain expelled the Jews, the sun set on its empire. Czarist Russia persecuted the Jews and has had its reward. So did Nazi Germany. Countries where the Jews are free enjoy freedom themselves.

Long after Abraham's day there were predictions that the Jews would be scattered among the nations. Today, there are three scattered races, the gypsies, the Armenians, and the Jews, but it is the Jews who are the most widely scattered. There are few countries without Jews.

Jesus predicted the destruction of Jerusalem, which took place in the year A.D. 70. The prophet Hosea (HOS 9:17) predicted: "My God will cast them away, because they did not hearken unto him: and they shall be wanderers among the nations"; and so they have become. In DEU 28:37 it was written: "Thou shalt become an astonishment, a proverb, and a byword, among all nations whither the Lord shall lead thee"; and so they have become. It is a common form of mockery to say "Dirty Jews."

But the return of the Jews to Palestine was also predicted, and this has happened before our eyes. The tribe of the Book, of the wandering foot and the weary breast, again has its fatherland.

The Bible says repeatedly that the Jews are intended by God to remain a unique people and this they really are.

The origins of other peoples are wrapped in legends and myth. Can anyone tell who was the first Russian? Or who was the first German or Turk? Ask any Jew who was the first Jew, and he will unhesitatingly reply, "Abraham."

The Jews are unique as a witness to the reliability of the Biblical records. Unique is their dispersion among all the nations; equally unique is their development. The Jews are only one-half per cent of the population of the world, yet how disproportionate is their suffering, but also their deliverance, their return to their own country; they are unique by the fact that their whole history has been foretold. God said through Moses: "I will scatter you among the heathen, and will draw out a sword after you: and your land shall be desolate, and your cities waste": (LEV 26:33). "And the Lord shall scatter you among the nations, and ye shall be left few in number among the heathen, whither the Lord shall lead you" (DEU 4:27).

Later, another prophecy foretells the gathering of the scattered people of Israel: "For I will take you from among the heathen, and gather you out of all countries, and will bring you into your own land" (EZE 36:24).

The Jews are unique in that they have remained apart, while scattered throughout the whole world. Wherever the Jew is found, he is a Jew. He is not a Jewish Russian, but a Russian Jew. The Jews remain Jews, although they have no concentrating force and no world-wide government.

They are the only people who could not be destroyed through unique sufferings. Egyptian pharaohs, Assyrian kings, Roman emperors, the Crusaders, the Inquisitors, and the Nazis have used against them expatriation, exile, captivity, confiscation, torture, the massacre of millions - all of which would have broken the heart of any other people - but the Jews remain.

God promised that he would assemble the outcasts of Israel and gather the dispersed of Judah from the four corners of the earth. This was said by Isaiah, who lived some 700 years before Christ and some 800 years before the dispersion of the Jews after the destruction of Jerusalem. How could he have known that the Jews would be dispersed and then gathered from all the continents?

Very few of the Jews who have returned to Israel are religious. Most of them do not know the Scriptures and the prophecies, and of those who know them, a very limited number have faith in them. Yet they are brought back - you may call it by blind impulse, just as the birds are drawn to the south for the winter - or, to put it in other words, the power of God is driving them in order that his word may be fulfilled.

In another important prophecy in which the return of the Jews to Palestine is mentioned, it is said that they will come by two methods (JER 16:14-16).

God will send "fishers" who will "fish" them, and the Zionist movement "fished" many thousands of Jews with the bait of a national home of their own.

The same verse also says that God will send many "hunters" who will "hunt" the Jews. The anti-Semitism in the whole world, especially under Hitler, has "hunted" the Jews, driving them towards Palestine.

Another startling prophecy about the Jews concerns their turning back to Christ in the end-time of the remnant of the people of Israel. This also is in the course of being fulfilled.

I have already quoted the Jew Einstein as an admirer of the Nazarene.

Franz Werfel, the famous Jewish poet, has written a renowned Christian book, ~The Song of Bernadette~. Sholom Asch, the great Jewish novelist, became a Christian and wrote the well-known book ~Jesus of Nazareth~. Martin Buber, the great Jewish philosopher, called Jesus "my great brother." Henri Bergson has proclaimed his Christian faith. Niels Bohr, the great physicist, was a Hebrew-Christian. So was Auguste Piccard, the man who first went into the stratosphere.

Let us pause to observe that the Communists have made prophecies, but these have not been fulfilled. Engels prophesied in a letter to Sorge of September 10, 1888, that in ten years' time Canada would be annexed by the United States. A century has passed, but there is no sign of such an eventuality.

Comrade Khrushchev prophesied in 1958 that in five years' time Russia would reach and surpass the material level of the United States. Now, here we are in 1975, and the Soviet Union still imports wheat from America! Men not specially endowed by God cannot foretell the future.

Our atheist friends had prophesied the eternal solidarity between the Communist nations, and now we have the quarrel with Red China, Yugoslavia, and Romania. Reliable prophecy is the exclusive privilege of the Spirit of God, authenticated in the Word of God.

PROPHECIES ABOUT THE LATTER DAYS

~The Atheist's Handbook~ dismisses prophecy with these words: "Numerous Biblical prophecies have been made only after the predicted events have happened. The respective texts have been included in the Bible post factum - that is, after the consummation of the respective events."

Now, do our atheist friends really expect us to believe that the victory of Israel in history, the waving of the Zionist flag on Hitler's Brown House in Nuremberg, and the restoration of the Jewish state - all events of the twentieth century - have only recently been included in the Bible? Do not the Dead Sea Scrolls, dating from the century before Christ, testify to the great age of the prophecies? Do not New Testament manuscripts contain the prediction of the fisherman Peter that the elements will melt with great heat, thus foreshadowing nuclear destruction?

World wars were not possible 3,000 years ago, since communication among continents was non-existent, except perhaps on a very primitive scale.

But the prophet Jeremiah, who lived some six hundred years before Christ, predicted world wars. He did not know that America or Australia or Japan existed, but he wrote about "a sword upon all the inhabitants of the earth ... evil shall go forth from nation to nation ... the slain ... shall be ... from one end of the world even unto the other end of the earth" (JER 25:27-33).

The prediction was fulfilled after twenty-six centuries. Thousands upon thousands of people were slain in a war which extended from Japan to Russia to France, a war in which such people as Americans and Chinese and Germans and Jews all died. And these things are the forebodings of the next world conflagration.

Jesus said about the last days: "Then shall be great tribulation, such as was not since the beginning of the world to this time, no, nor ever shall be" (MTT 24:21). And so it is. Never in the history of mankind have there been such tribulations as those created by the ovens and gas chambers of the Nazis and the mass-slaughter of Stalin or Mao Tse-Tung.

When Christ said, "Except those days should be shortened, there should no flesh be saved," there did not exist any means of destruction which could endanger all flesh. Men had arrows and spears. Nobody could endanger the existence of all mankind. Now the instruments of general destruction are available.

But why go so far? Communism itself is a fulfillment of prophecy. It is like the great Antichrist predicted in the Scriptures: "It was given to him to make war with the saints and to overcome them; and authority was given him over all kindreds and tongues and nations."

Another prophet has described powers like that of Communism. He says that they enlarge their desire as hell, and are as death, and cannot be satisfied till they gather unto themselves all nations and heap unto themselves all people.

We Christians find this ambition unreasonable. Was Stalin a happy man when he imposed his will on one billion men and was cheered as the greatest genius? His wife committed suicide. He jailed members of his own family. He had no confidence in anyone, not even in his nearest comrades, and this with good cause. His closest henchmen waited for his death to denounce him as a criminal. Khrushchev says that Stalin once exclaimed, "I don't have confidence even in myself!"

There is a story about a rich man who was very sick. He was told that he would recover only if he wore the shirt of a happy man. So he sent his servants to find a happy man and buy his shirt at any price. But the servants could find no happy man. Everyone was envious of somebody else's happiness, or coveted more than he had, or was consumed with unattainable ambitions. After much searching they at last found a woodcutter, naked to the belt, who cheerfully did his hard work, singing the while. They asked him, "Are you happy?" His answer was, "Perfectly." Then he was offered much money for his shirt. Unfortunately, he had none.

Happiness does not consist in dominating the world, but in uniting with God. Our Communist friends do not know this secret. Therefore they have vast ambitions, but are never satisfied and are ever further from the Utopia they claim to be creating.

Our atheist friends often complain about the slow progress of their cause in the Soviet Union. We can assure them: they will succeed! The Antichrist for whom they prepare the way will possess world-wide rule. Communism will triumph for what is, in history, a little while.

But in the end Jesus will return. His feet will stand on the Mount of Olives in Israel. The Bible writes: "Every eye shall see him." This again must have appeared incomprehensible when John the Evangelist wrote it. How could somebody in Spain or in Northern Africa have seen Jesus ascending from the Mount of Olives and how will they be able to see him descend again in like manner?

Well, television proves the prophecy of the Bible to be true. The whole world witnessed the Olympic games as they took place. The whole world will witness the return of Jesus.

And then, at the name of Jesus, every knee shall bow, of things in heaven and things on earth and things under the earth, and every tongue shall confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father.

page 146 My Answer to Moscow's Atheists

The blessed day will come when all authority will reside in the hands of Jesus Christ, after his return to the earth, and under his total rule our poor planet will be rid of its sins and of its sorrows.

Before that time, we first have to past through terrible catastrophes. Among the signs of approaching calamity are the many peace conferences and talks about arms limitations, which are also predicted in the Bible: "When they shall say, Peace and safety: then sudden destruction cometh upon them, as travail upon a woman with child; and they shall not escape" (1TH 5:3).

When the apostle Paul wrote this prophecy, men had no means to bring sudden destruction upon the earth. It could not be accomplished with swords or spears. Now nations possess nuclear weapons.

Prophecy becomes exceptionally important in these days. Jesus had predicted that the Gentiles will dominate Jerusalem "until the times of the Gentiles have been fulfilled." The fact that the Jews got in 1967 full sovereignty over all of Jerusalem and Palestine might be a first sign that the time of the Gentiles - that is, the time when the Gentiles (the non-Jews) can join the church of Christ and thus be saved for eternity - is near its end. It is most urgent that people should believe in Christ and should come to him while there is time. It is a satanic device that just in this epoch ~The Atheist's Handbook~ should spread doubt as to the validity and existence of prophecy.

In its attempt, this book is itself a tragic fulfillment of a Biblical prophecy: "The preaching of the cross is to them that perish foolishness..." (1CO 1:18).

Our atheist opponents often visit Orthodox churches in order to know their subject. Sometimes while there they utter a silent prayer, finding themselves overwhelmed by the sanctity of the place.

There they hear the old songs of the Russian people, songs of praise to Virgin Mary; "Hail, Mary, full of grace; God be with you." If they knew Bible prophecies, they would find that the evangelist Luke recorded, in the song of Mary when she conceived Jesus, these words: "All generations shall call me blessed" (LUK 1:48).

Christians never doubt the prophecies because they find that many apply to themselves and their lives. When we become Christians, we find that this was prophesied long ago. We read in the Bible that God chose us before the foundation of the world to belong to Christ Jesus. How far into the past this prophecy reaches!

Then we find our future prophesied: "That in the ages to come God might show the exceeding riches of his grace in his kindness towards us through Christ Jesus" (EPH 2:7). So we know what the meaning of our life is and that God's goodness is in store for us.

WHO MADE GOD?

There is a God. We can have communion with him. He has revealed himself through his prophets and his Son, Jesus Christ.

Nature is like a banquet. There are bananas and melons and tomatoes and wheat. But there can be no banquet without a cook. Nor can there be a world without a Creator. This is the best argument for the existence of God.

But our opponents have the right to answer with another question. If everything must have a cause and you call the cause God, God must also have a cause. Who created him? It would be a subterfuge to evade the answer by saying that the question blasphemous. I find it most legitimate. I myself have as it as a child.

All mass or matter is continually in movement. It is not now exactly the same as it was second ago. There is always a cause which has produced the change. The movement of matter is measured by time. In time, some states of matter produce effects which, in their turn, become causes of new changes. Matter is inconceivable without a first cause.

But existence in time is not the only form of existence. There exists also timelessness, in which there is no before and no after; no cause and no effect. This is the realm of God. He has created everything. He belongs to a sphere of self-existence. Nobody created him.

Which came first, the chicken or the egg? This is the classic question. If the egg, who laid it? If the hen, whence did it come? You can discuss the dilemma for thousands of years without coming to any conclusion if you do not realize that the original question has three presuppositions:

(1) there is a hen;
(2) there is an egg;
(3) there is a "first" and an "after."

"First" and "after" are categories of our thinking, forms for our sensitivity, manners in which we apprehend the successive stages of matter in continual movement. But time is nothing apart from the movements it serves to measure. Time has no objective existence, independent of bodies and phenomena; this is the ABC of Einstein's theory of relativity. Kinetic energy produces movement and gives birth to the notion of time. What about the huge realm of potential energy? It lies dormant. Imagine a world with only potential energy. There would not be the slightest movement, there would be nothing to measure. It would be a universe without time. Timeless is also the sphere of spirit, the realm of God. We call him eternal. Eternity is not endless time, but timelessness.

Let us try to exemplify the meaning of the above.

Suppose that on a planet some 2,000 light-years away, there were beings of a much higher order than ourselves with telescopes that could enable them to see not only our earth, but also its inhabitants.

Suppose these super-beings should look today at Bethlehem. What would they see? The birth of Jesus Christ. They would see the shepherds, the Magi, Mary, Joseph, the Babe - this because it would take the light from these persons two thousand years to arrive at the distant planet. For us, the birth of Christ is a past event. For them, it would happen today.

Imagine such super-beings on a star 3,500 light-years away! They would see the children of Israel, under the leadership of Moses, approaching the borders of Palestine. They would see them rejoicing at the announcement that a Saviour would be born. For them, the birth of Jesus would be a future event.

One and the same event is past from the point of view of earth, present for one planet, and future for another. How is it for the spirit which can apprehend simultaneously what is happening on all three planets and read the minds of all? There is no past, present, and future.

The question "which came first, the chicken or the egg?" is solved. There is no first and no later. The problem has no sense in a realm where there is no past or future, cause or effect. The problem "Who was before God to create him?" cannot be posed. There is no before.

Our "now" has no value for cosmic phenomena, as it has no value for what happens within the atom. What we capture at this moment as stellar images in observatories, are rays of light from stars which might have disappeared ages ago. And the antiparticle omega-minus baron lives only 15 billionths of a second. We observe its trace only long after it has disappeared.

Einstein writes: "Each frame of time or system of coordinates has its own time." And "Unless the body to which a statement of time refers is specified, there is no significance in the statement of the time of an event." For the eternal spirit, there is no time. Here everything is interrelated and forms a unity. God is one. The whole of reality created by him is one single gravitational field. When we arrive at the point Omega, the continual agitation measured by time is changed into blessed contemplation, into the ecstasy and rapture of adoration.

There is a story about a monk who was sent by his abbot on an errand in the forest. There for a few seconds he heard a bird from Paradise. When he returned to the monastery, the doorkeeper did not recognize him. The abbot and the other monks were all foreigners to him. Nobody knew him. Finally, someone remembered that the monastery possessed an ancient record telling about a monk who had gone into the woods many centuries before and had never returned. For him only a few seconds had passed; he had caught something of the beauty of the music of Paradise. For the others, in the meantime, centuries had elapsed.

This medieval legend has become today strict scientific fact in the so-called paradox of Langevin.

It is obvious that the time which elapses during the passage of a train between two stakes is less for an observer who travels in the train than for an observer at rest alongside the track. For the former, time is shorter. The time is shorter not only for him, but for everything which is in the train, including his watch, which slows down.

Imagine now a rocket travelling at a speed near the speed of light. Earth dwellers recording the beating of the astronaut's heart would find that it had slowed down. The same would happen with the movements within the body of the astronaut, though for the astronaut himself, they would have remained the same.

According to Langevin's unchallengeable calculation, a man leaving the earth at a speed inferior to that of light by a twenty thousandth, travelling for a year of his own time and returning at the same speed to land on the globe (i.e., two years after his departure measured by his own clock), would return two centuries later according to our calendar. The great-grandson of his daughter, born on the day of departure when the astronaut was thirty years old, would be one hundred years old, whereas he himself would be thirty-two.

Such a rocket is not pure fancy. There exists one for which even the speed of light is child's play. It is the rocket of the spirit. In mere seconds, my thought passes from galaxies far away to my old mother, from there to Paradise, from Paradise to a cell nearby on the same prison-corridor, from there back to remote stars. Then I pass to communion with Adam and Abel, but I can leave them at once and pass my time in future millenniums, to return to my cell and eat the dinner which has just been served. The spirit is not bound by space or time. Death happens in time. In time events succeed one another. I have been born, I have developed, I will die, I will be resurrected. In the sphere of timelessness, things do not happen successively. There is no place left for a passing away of my personality.

If I travel in a train with uniform speed in a given direction, I have the impression that towns and villages pass near me. I can see them through the window as an endless stream of localities. But as a matter of fact, the localities coexist simultaneously. Only to me do they appear in succession. In the cinema, I see the lives of several persons developing from birth to death, with all their complications. But in the cabin of the operator, on a reel, these events coexist all together. Only for me do they happen successively in time.

We are used to the limitations of weight. It was quite a discovery when the first astronauts realized that they could also live in a state of weightlessness. We live in time, in which things appear and disappear. Therefore we believe in death and dissolution. But there exists the sphere of timelessness as well, the sphere of God. He is the uncreated author of all creation. In him, we have from eternity to eternity our life, existence, and movement. While we are in time, we live reality as if it were composed of successive events. But to apply our notion of time to spirit is as foolish as to apply it to nuclear physics.

According to the theory of relativity, at the speed of light every clock stops, mass presenting an infinite inertia to every effort to accelerate it. Is it not therefore reasonable that in the Bible God is called "light" and Christians are called "the light of the world"?

Now, everyone simply bows when he hears the name of Einstein, but my opponents would do well to remember that Lenin assailed the principle of relativity, that Mach who inspired the works of Einstein had been denounced by Lenin as the Judas of science, and that for a long time Soviet philosophers discarded Einstein and the whole realm of cybernetics.

LIFE AFTER DEATH

Marxists don't know what life is. The Russian academician Oparin says, "Life is one of the forms of movement of matter." What should a young man do with such a definition? He asks his Marxist father, "How should I believe in life? How can I best use my life?" But his father cannot possibly give him an answer, because he has really asked how one of the forms of movement of matter with its intrinsic, unalterable laws should behave. How much more powerful is the Christian's answer: "Life is a person, Jesus Christ, whose friendship you can accept and whose example you can follow, Life is an eternal boon. Its earthly span is to be used unsparingly for others, and its eternal aftermath in Paradise - to which earth is the anteroom - for one's enjoyment of his Creator and his glory."

Not knowing what life is, Marxists don't know what death is. Therefore death is a terror, devoid of the comforts and hopes of religion. It is cold comfort to say to the bereaved, "Well, one dies and disappears for ever. But Socialism is moving ahead, and soon we will walk on the moon."

In his own bereavement, Marx wrote in a letter to Lassalee: "The death of my son has shaken me deeply, and I feel the loss as keenly as though it were only yesterday, and my poor wife has completely broken down under the blow."

We sympathize with his feelings. He did not know the Christian's triumph over death.

The Soviet Christian Talantov died in prison for his faith. His oldest son continued the Christian fight. He also died in prison. The younger son took up the fight. Now he too has died in jail. These did not fear death.

Skripnikov was shot in the Soviet Union for his Christian fight. His daughter Aida, undaunted by the fate of her father, made his cause hers. She is still young. She has been in prison four times already because she confesses her faith in Christ.

For atheists death is like the sword of Damocles hanging over their heads, reminding them that soon all their joys - or sorrows! - will be gone.

Death holds no fear for those who know.

Jesus asserted: "Whosoever lives and believes in me shall never die" (JHN 11:26). He said it near the grave of one who had believed in him. Jesus proved right. Birth and death are our manner of apprehending the reality of life from the perspective of time. Christians do not have to fear death.

During the Russian Revolution in the great terror under the Tcheka, a group of Christians were ordered to be drowned. One of them exclaimed: "We go to God! What difference if we go by land or sea?" They did not fear.

~The Atheist's Handbook~ denounces belief in life beyond the grave as "the basis of the religious theory" and "extremely dangerous."

But what is life if nothing follows after death?

Let us suppose that the Communist ideal is accomplished. We will have a perfect society, without the distinction between rich and poor, without wars and revolutions, with wealth, culture, and happiness for everybody. But men will still have to die. Poor men die easily. There is not much to lose. For happy men death is a catastrophe. Kirov, general secretary of the Communist party of the Leningrad district, assassinated by Stalin, had a position of power. He enjoyed life. His last words were: "I wish to live and to live and to live." If Stalin had not killed him, he would have died a natural death a few years later and his last tragic words would have been the same.

We all have to die. The decision does not depend on us. If nothing follows, the most beautiful life is nothing more than a banquet offered to a condemned man before his execution. He gets dainties and then he is hanged. He may live in an ideal society, but eventually he will rot, forgotten for ever by everybody.

Go, comfort somebody who is dying in a cancer ward, or his family with these words: "We are building a happy Communist society"; or "Science achieves great things. We have been to the moon and soon we will be on Venus." There is not much consolation in this. But tell the dying and the bereaved about the heavenly Father and the Christian's hope of living eternally with him, and you will see the difference.

If the atheists are right and there is no life hereafter, "All our yesterdays have lighted fools the way to dusty death," and "life is but a poor player that struts and frets his hour upon the stage and then is heard no more. It is a tale told by an idiot, full of sound and fury, signifying nothing" (Shakespeare).

But life continues after death. The thought of eternity and reward for good and evil is deeply inscribed in the human heart.

Christians sacrifice themselves because they believe in eternal life. But why do Communists sacrifice their lives? Communists died for their Marxist faith in czarist prisons. Nobody in the Party remembers them. The young generation of Communists do not even know their names. They are forgotten. Communists also die in prisons today in some non-Communist countries. Why do they give their lives? Christians believe in an eternal recompense. But what sense does it make for an atheist to give up this life, the only one he knows he has, for an ideal whose fulfillment he cannot check on, and whose beauties he will not enjoy? Under communism life will end exactly as under capitalism, in death and, in "a convocation of worms" (Shakespeare). Communists would never sacrifice their lives if, in the depths of their soul to which reason has no access, they did not know that the grave is not the end and that those who have spent their all for some great good will be rewarded.

All modern science is based on the law of conservation of energy, as expounded by Lavoisier. Nothing is lost, nothing is added, everything is conserved. (This law ceases to apply strictly only within the atom.)

Man is a bundle of energy in different forms: energy condensed in matter, heat, electricity, and spiritual energy. What happens to these different forms of energy at death? The energy condensed in atoms is not lost. The body decays and its atoms enter into new combinations. The heat of the body is not lost. When the oven waxes cold, its heat has been communicated to surrounding atmosphere. By a minimal, immeasurable fraction of a degree, the temperature of the atmosphere around us increases when our bodies become cold corpses. The electricity emanating from the body re-enters into the general budget of electrical energy in nature. What happens to spiritual energy at death, to the power to will, the capacity to think and to feel? Does this energy change at death, transformed into a lower form of energy, say, the mechanical? If so, we would be able after death to jump twice as high as we did before, which is ridiculous. No! Spiritual energy remains after death. Otherwise, the law of Lavoisier collapses. My spirit re-enters the general budget of spiritual energy; it returns to the eternal spirit, to God.

If our spirit is prepared for this event, if it has cultivated the things of value in that realm – love, truth, faith, hope, peace, gentleness, meekness (GAL 5:22-23) – it will be in its own element. The future life will be a paradise of enjoyment of things hoped for. If our spirit enters that realm completely unprepared, full of sins and a craving for lustful satisfactions which cannot be fulfilled, its life will be deeply unhappy. This will be hell.

As imperceptibly as vapour mounts in the air, the life expires. But the vapour does not cease to exist; neither does the spirit. The apostle James writes: "What is your life? It is even a vapour that appears for a little time and then vanishes away." But it does not go off into nothing. Steam turns into water. Nothing is ever lost. Earthly life passes away, but it does not become nothing. A caterpillar becomes a cocoon, a cocoon a butterfly. Dead men have passed out of our sight. It does not mean that they do not exist any more.

Suppose we could speak with an embryo and tell it that the life it leads in its mother's womb is only a preparatory one. The real life follows in another world unknown to the embryo, in conditions unimaginable to him. The embryo would answer like ~The Atheist's Handbook~, if it had the intelligence of an academician:
"Don't bother me with these religious superstitions! The life in the womb is the only one I know, and there is no other. Sheer inventions of greedy clergymen!"

But suppose this embryo could think with greater discernment than our academicians. It would say to itself:

"Eyes develop in my head. To what purpose? There is nothing to see. Legs grow. I do not even have room to stretch them. Why should they grow? And why do arms and hands grow? I have to keep them folded over my breast. They embarrass me and my mother. My whole development in the womb is senseless unless there follows a life with light and colour and many objects for my eyes to see. The place in which I'll spend this other life must be large and varied. I will have to run in it. Therefore my legs grow. It will be a life of work and struggle. Therefore I grow arms and fists, which are of no use here." Reflections on his own development would lead an embryo to the knowledge of another life, though he had no experience of it.

This is exactly our situation, too. The church of Christ teaches us that life in this world also has an embryonic character and is only a preparation for the real life which follows. How do we know that? If God (or nature, for the sake of argument) had created us only for this life, we would have been given first the wisdom and experience of old age and then the vigour of youth. We would have known how to live. But the fact is that while we are vigorous young men and women, we lack wisdom and more often than not throw away our years on nothing. When we have accumulated wisdom and experience, the funeral hearse is waiting outside our door. Then why do we accumulate wisdom? Well, why do eyes and legs and hands grow on the embryo? Only for what follows. Our development in this life points to a future one.

Body and spirits have not only separate but contradictory developments. As we grow in age, our body decays and our spirit is enriched. Spirit and body are like two travellers, one ascending a mountain, the other descending it. They travel in opposite directions. Which logic will make me believe that when the body has arrived at the bottom of the mountain, at the final decay, the spirit will decay with it? Is it not much more likely that, after a steep ascension, it will soar to the heaven of heavens, as Mao Tse-Tung says that the spirit of his wife did at death (see his poem "The Immortals")?

I passed many years in solitary confinement, without books. I passed my time imagining all kinds of situations, that I was the president of the Soviet Republics, the King of England, the pope, a millionaire, a beggar. I could imagine all such situations. They are imaginable because they are possibilities of life. Life is rich. It could make out of a corporal a French emperor and of this emperor a prisoner on an island. Poor men have become millionaires. Rich men have become paupers. Stalin, son of a heavy-drinking shoemaker, a Georgian and former seminarian, became dictator not only of the Soviet Union, but also of the whole Communist bloc. Shortly after his death, his name was erased from history. All such things are possible in life and therefore can also be imagined. But I tried to imagine that I was dead, and I never succeeded because death is not one of the possibilities of life.

If you try very hard to fancy yourself dead, the last thing you imagine is that you see yourself stretched out immobile in a coffin in a funeral chapel. The fact that you see yourself in the coffin shows that you are not dead. A dead man does not see himself. The unimaginability of death is no slight argument in favour of the eternity of human life.

The important thing is not to confound eternity with endless time, which is a contradiction in terms. Endless time does not exist! Eternity is timelessness.

We can have a glimpse of this in the possibilities of dream life, in which mental operations are sometimes performed with extreme rapidity. A series of acts which normally would occupy a great length of time pass through our minds in an instant during a dream. The relationships of space are also abolished. We can traverse huge distances in a second. We are not bound by space and time in a dream and, pondering on the dream life, we realize that the walls of space and time which imprison us while we are awake, hide from us another quality of life beyond the limited sphere which we are wont to call "reality."

The human body to be fully satisfied needs very few things: food, clothing, shelter, rest, and at a certain age, a partner of the other sex. How is it then that capitalists or the Soviet upper class who have plenty of all of these are sometimes melancholy and dissatisfied? How is it that people imprisoned for their beliefs, hungry, shivering with the cold, in chains, separated for years from their beloved ones, can exult for joy? What is the mysterious entity which can be depressed while the body has all good things and can rejoice while the body passes through sufferings? It is something other than the body. This is the soul.

It shows its interdependence on, but also its independence from, the body during our earthly life. It is so independent from the body that it can decide on suicide. The soul can decide to kill its own body for psychological reasons. There is no reason to believe that the death of the body must also imply the death of this strong-willed, independent entity.

In the Second Book of Kings (2KI 25:16) in the Bible, there is a curious expression. There are enumerated different objects which King Solomon had constructed for the temple. The enumeration ends with the words: "The brass of all these vessels was without weight."

Is there brass without weight? Even a feather has its weight. Only when we think about specific objects, we consider weight. That is, a specific piece of brass, a certain feather, each has weight. Brass as a generalization has no weight.

Scholastic philosophy was correct in distinguishing between the essence of an object and its accidents. The essence of bread is that it is an object made of dough which serves for food. This essence has no weight. Bread can have different accidents. It can be barley bread, wheat bread, fresh or old bread, a small or a big loaf of bread. The weights will vary accordingly. The weight, the colour, the size are ascertained by the accidents. Essence has none of these. Bread is a notion in my spirit. There it is weightless, until it has taken a specific form. So is brass, if it does not have a certain size and shape.

Even then, objects have weight only under the pull of gravity. In a spacecraft, in a state of weightlessness, objects float around. Unaffected by gravity, they have no weight.

King Solomon had constructed a spiritual temple. No Babylonian soldier could carry away what he had constructed in his mind to the honour of the Lord.

In the Soviet Union, on September 1, 1968, a law was enacted according to which children can be taken away from parents and placed in atheistic boarding schools if they are taught the Christian faith. Christian parents endure this pressure. From the Sloboda family three children have been taken away; from the Malozemlov family seven. Who can separate a man with spiritual thinking from his child?

There is the essence "child" and there are the accidents. The latter vary. My child has been an embryo, in the beginning much like that of an animal; then a baby; then a little girl who played with dolls. Now she is in school. I can hold a child in my arms. It can be far away. It can be an obedient child or a child who has gone astray. The accidents can change. The fact that it is my child never changes. The relationship of mother/child belongs to the realm of essence. We are not afraid of what the Communists do to the children, in the world of accidents. The relationship mother/child never changes.

The same applies to life. Which life can perish at death?

I have had a rich life and a poor one, a joyous life and a sad one, the life of a free man and that of a prisoner, the life of a healthy man and that of a sick man. If I identify myself with one of the forms of life, my life ceases when that particular form of life ceases. For some men, life loses its value when they have no more luxury. But we Christians live in the essential.

Jesus says - "I am the Way, the Truth, and the Life" (JHN 14:6). The word "am" is not used in Hebrew, the language which Jesus spoke, as it is not used in Russian. He said: "I - the Way, the Truth, and the Life." He identifies himself with abstract notions.

Nature knows only oaks and pines and apple trees. "Tree" is an abstraction formed in my mind. You can destroy all the trees of the world. The notion "tree" will not be touched by this catastrophe.

In nature, there are only real men, Grigoriev and Ivanov and Gherasimov, a Russian, a Ukrainian, an American, a poor man, a rich man, a female, a male. There are real lives spent selfishly or sacrificially. There can be active or contemplative lives.

Jesus does not identify himself with one certain kind of life, but with the abstract notion "life," with life containing all possibilities. He teaches us to do the same. I do not identify my life with Wurmbrand, born some sixty-five years ago and subject to death. I am the life, which has always existed in God, which has taken the form of human life with Adam and Eve, the life which will never end. My life, as a child of God, is indestructible. The body is not my "I." In a sense, I have had many bodies, that of an embryo, that of a babe, that of a child, that of a young man. St. Peter writes: "I am in this tabernacle." He refers to his body at a certain stage. I have lived in several tabernacles, but there is a clear-cut distinction between me and the habitation in which I live for a time.

Jesus says in the Garden of Gethsemane: "My soul is exceedingly sorrowful" (MRK 14:34). Pay attention to his expression! Everyone else could use it. He speaks about a soul and about a possessor of the soul who observes the soul and establishes that it is sorrowful. But I am not identical with a certain state of my soul either, as I am not identical with a certain state of my body.

I suffer in my body or in my soul. I know that I suffer. I know enough to know that I suffer. What is the last reality in me that observes everything that happens to what I consider "the real me"? He knows, "I am healthy now," or "I die now." Who is the one who knows and observes all these changes? He himself is unchanged. He is not a life, but the life, the Son of God within, the One who cannot die.

Jesus said: "I am the truth." How can a truth ever disappear? If I identify myself like him with truth, with all truth, the whole truth, who will be able to destroy me? It is axiomatic that 2 + 2 =4 whether I am in prison or at liberty, alive or dead. I become one with the truth, which is independent of external events.

If I unite with Christ, if I take for myself the words, "I am the Way, the Truth, and the Life" (JHN 14:6), I will live eternally.

The lowest organisms in the ladder of life are the uni-cellular beings. They multiply by division. One becomes two, two become four, and so on. There are now myriads of amoebas. But did the first amoeba ever die? It has changed its form of existence. Instead of being within one membrane, it has multiplied infinitely. Every day, millions of amoebas die, but they all are only parts of the first amoeba. The first amoeba thus lives on in them. Deathlessness appears already on the first step of the ladder of organism. And should the highest being we know on earth simply pass away?

We treasure with great care a painting by Leonardo da Vinci and a sculpture by Michelangelo. And should the Creator not keep with at least the same care the artists who produced these works?

There is an eternal life, and as an unrepenting Hitler cannot very well pass it in the same place as the innocent children he killed, there must be a heaven for the just and a hell for the unjust.

Atheists do wrong to live as if they will never die. How do they know that at the last minute they will not regret having led astray millions of men by their godless teachings?

Let them learn from the dying words of great adversaries of the Christian religion. Talleyrand: "I am suffering the pangs of the damned." Mirabeau: "Give me laudanum that I may not think of eternity." Voltaire: "I am abandoned by God and man. I shall go to hell. Oh, Christ, oh, Jesus Christ!" Charles IX, King of France: "What blood, what murders, what evil counsels have I followed. I am lost, I see it well." Tom Paine: "I would give worlds, if I had them, if ~The Age of Reason~ (an anti-Christian book) had never been published. Oh, Lord, help me. Christ, help me. Stay with me. It is hell to be left alone."

I hope to have proved at least that belief in eternal life is not as ridiculous as the authors of ~The Atheist's Handbook~ wished to indicate. They felt at liberty to do so because they have a monopoly of publishing.

There was an international symposium of doctors that discussed which operation is the most difficult. A German said that it was brain-surgery, a Frenchman heart-surgery. Our Soviet delegate said that the most difficult operation was a tonsillectomy. All laughed, but he said: "You consider my assertion stupid. You forget that since the Revolution, we have to extract tonsils through the brain, after trepanation of the skull, because we are forbidden to open the mouth."

I have opened the mouth without the permission of a Communist government. Once Christians speak out, it is seen that they are right.

page 164 My Answer to Moscow's Atheists

SCIENCE AND RELIGION

The Communist Secret Police are renowned for their ability to squeeze out confessions of imaginary crimes from innocent persons. Thousands of such "criminals" have been rehabilitated under Khrushchev. But the methods have not changed. Many Christians are in prison in the Soviets for confessing to ritual murder. Russia has the privilege of being the only one where Christians are charged with such a stupid accusation and plead guilty.

Among the prisoners tortured by the Russian Secret Police is a certain comrade Science. Beaten, burned with red-hot iron pokers, or mistreated in some other manner, this prisoner with the name of Science has made sensational confessions, reproduced in The Atheist's Handbook. No real scientist would give a dime for them. Just listen to a few:

"Science has demonstrated in an unchallengeable manner that supernatural forces do not exist." (We poor, ignorant clods believed that science can demonstrate only existing things.) "Science demonstrates that life is largely spread in the universe ... The number of planets on which beings endowed with reason live is infinitely large. ... The scientific thesis about the multitude of inhabited worlds gives a mortal blow to the dogma of atonement, which is the essence of Christianity ... The non-existence of miracles has been fully demonstrated," and so on. We have to discard this whole section as rubbish. Let us pass to other assertions. It is an axiom for ~The Atheist's Handbook~ that between science and religion there is an irreconcilable conflict. Between which science and which religion? Both are entities in continuous development. Religion is no longer what it was five centuries or even one century ago. In the beginning, the Christians were convinced that Jesus would return in their generation. They believed that the world is flat, that the earth is the center of the universe, with God sitting above, not very far away, having the events of the earth as his principal occupation. Christians don't think so any more.

What God has revealed is eternal. What men have thought about this revelation is transitory.

But science also changes. A secondary school boy today no longer accepts as definitive the science of Euclid, of Galileo, or of Newton.

Our opponents resort to an old trick: they compare modern science with primitive religion, science of the twentieth century after Christ with religious notions of the Jews of 3,500 years ago, when they had just escaped from centuries of slavery, were illiterate and lived on a much lower cultural level than the gypsies of today. But this is dishonest. It is like comparing the Soviet Union of today with America in pre-Colonial days, when only the Indians inhabited the land, in order to show the economic superiority of the Soviet Union.

Science of today has to be compared with the highest religious thought of today, and then we will see coincidence rather than conflict.

And that is as it should be. We will again quote Einstein: "Most people say that it is the intellect which makes a great scientist. They are wrong; it is the character." Now, character is not a scientific but a religious and moral value. Nobody can be a real scientist without having a character based on honesty and integrity. These are the values which Christianity teaches.

A man who has only science is not reliable as a scientist. He must have sincerity; he must believe in what he discovers in his laboratory. He must have hope, because without this he would never devote his time to research. He must have enthusiasm, otherwise he would not spend countless hours in the laboratory. He must have the humility simply to accept the order of things.

page 166 My Answer to Moscow's Atheists

There must be singleness of purpose, because if he were to scatter his interests, he would discover nothing. A scientist must be able to co-operate with his fellow-scientists in the same laboratory. Patience is needed, like that of Mme Curie, who purified eight tons of pitch-blende to extract a few milligrams of radium. There must be judgment, right judgment. He must tell the world exactly what he has found without a bit of exaggeration. He must also be wise and self-sacrificing, hiding what is detrimental for mankind. A man who is only a scientist is not a scientist. He must first of all accept the ethical values which not atheism but religion has given to mankind.

Stalin proclaimed: "Science is the saviour of humanity." This he said just at the dawn of the atomic age, when science provided the tools for destroying in a moment whole cities, and the weapons by which humanity can be entirely blotted out. This, all because some of the scientists did not respect the values on which the whole edifice of science is built. Science must remain closely connected to religion, otherwise it will be impotent to help us achieve happiness. Because there has not always been this intimate collaboration between science and religion, humanity lives with less confidence in peace today than before the great discoveries of this modern age.

Even atheism is not possible without the ethical values of Christianity, as curious as this assertion may sound.

~The Atheist's Handbook~ writes: "The materialist conception says that in the world there exists nothing except eternal and infinite matter in movement." If there exists nothing but matter, then the materialistic philosophy, which says that everything is matter, must also be matter. "Nothing exists except matter." Then the atheistic convictions are matter, too. My opponents love atheism and hate religion. Are their love and their hatred matter? They fight for an ideal, they write for an ideal, even while denying the existence of spiritual values. They themselves live on such values, even if they pervert them.

They write further: "The truth of dialectic materialism is confirmed by all the data of science and practice, whereas the justice of philosophic idealism and religion cannot be demonstrated by anybody."

So all the data of science and practice confirm that we are only matter! The authors of the book which I refute are also only matter. Does matter take the trouble to convince another quantity of matter? My opponents are a heap of matter; so am I. Why do they spend time and energy to change my opinions?

According to them, matter is in eternal movement, according to its own intrinsic laws. You cannot convince an atom to move other than its nature intends, as you cannot change the movements of a planet. Why do they then sit down to convince me?

Atheists are very often much better than their theories. Atheist soldiers died during the war to save the lives of their comrades. What idiot would die for the good of a wooden desk? Who would renounce any joy in order to make a piece of paper happy? Atheists, who give their lives for their comrades or who sacrifice their evenings to free others from religious superstition, do not themselves believe in the depths of their heart, that they and their comrades are only matter. Just as science cannot function without religion, so atheism and atheists cannot exist without respecting some of its basic values.

It is true that some scientists are in conflict with religion, but who knows how science will develop? It is also difficult to foresee the evolution of religion.

There is no reason to believe that the conflict even between certain scientists and religion is irreconcilable.

And supposing it were, science and religion may seemingly disagree and yet both be true, as is the case with the two theories of light, one maintaining that light is a particle, the other that light is a wave. Both theories prove right in experiments. The idea that all truth must be synthesized in our mind is fallacious, since we are finite and can only know partial truths.

There is nothing threatening in the fact that two scientists, measuring accurately, arrive at different conclusions. Why then should it be distressing if a scientist on the one hand and a man of religion on the other hand, beginning with entirely different presuppositions, arrive at different results?

The case of Lord Rayleigh and Sir William Ramsay is known. They both found nitrogen by different methods, but there was always a slight difference between the atomic weights. They maintained their discordant results. They did not try to harmonize them; they saw no catastrophe in the disagreement. In the end, the conflict between the two results proved profitable for science. In the nitrogen of the one, Argon, an element unknown till then, was discovered.

We should not fear a conflict between religion and science as a whole. We have room in our hearts for all of reality. We would apply to this conflict the words of Jesus: "Let both grow together until the harvest" (MTT 13:30). We would grant freedom to two conflicting opinions.

All this is hypothetical, because there must be something wrong with the discovery by my opponents of the terrible conflict between science and religion. Most scientists know nothing about the conflict.

With all due regard for the academic degrees of my adversaries, they will have to admit that Einstein knew at least a little bit more science than they. The proof is that our universe bears the name of Einstein and not the name of the authors of ~The Atheist's Handbook. Einstein speaks about a higher intelligence which reveals itself through nature.

Perhaps you would like to know what the great physicist

Max Planck says in his scientific autobiography. We quote his words:

> Religion and natural science are fighting a joint battle in an incessant, never relaxing crusade against scepticism and against dogmatism, against disbelief and against superstition, and the rallying cry in this crusade has always been and always will be "Unto God."

The authors of ~The Atheist's Handbook~ are men of science. Then let them give a scientific explanation of the fact that such great scientists knew nothing about a conflict between science and religion! Max Planck even calls the contradiction between science and religion "a phantom problem."

~The Atheist's Handbook~ makes this sweeping assertion: "Between science and religion there has always been an unceasing and implacable fight." They will never be able to substantiate this.

I quoted Einstein and Planck. What about other scientists? Did they know something about the conflict?

Sir Isaac Newton belongs to another century, but for all practical purposes we still live in the Newtonian universe. To mock his infidel friends, he made in his laboratory a solar system in miniature. An unbeliever asked him: "Who made it?" Newton answered: "Nobody." "Lies, stupidities!" the infidel answered. "Tell me the truth: who made it?" Then Newton replied: "It is nothing but a puny imitation of a much grander system, and I am not able to convince you that this mere toy is without a designer and maker! Did you profess to believe that the great original, from which the design is taken, has come into being without a maker? Tell me, by what sort of reasoning do you reach such an incongruous solution?"

The atheist professors acknowledge that Newton finishes his fundamental scientific work ~The Mathematical Principles of Natural Philosophy~ with words about "the ruling of a powerful and wise Being" and with expression of belief in an initial impulse, that is, a creation. They explain it by the fact that Newton lived in the beginning of the eighteenth century, when men were ignorant of many of the atomic and chemical and biological processes known today, when science was still tied up with theology. They also claim that the fact that Newton was religious was a hindrance to his science. But then remains the riddle that in the twentieth century the Newtonian universe has become the Einsteinian universe; Einstein knew at least something about the atomic processes, about the most recent developments of science, and he who had begun as an atheist in his youth was brought to faith by the fact that he arrived at the pinnacle of science.

But let us hasten to note that Einstein does not worry my opponents. They profit from the fact that his books are forbidden in the Communist-ruled part of the Einsteinian universe. You can find them in no book shop. Even in academies, they are kept in the secret section of libraries. Nobody can check up on the authors of ~The Atheist's Handbook~, and so they can say that Einstein underlined consistently "the incompatibility between science and faith." I have already quoted his words to the contrary.

My opponents mention with satisfaction Laplace, who said that he had no need of "the hypothesis" God. First of all, God has been vindicated by the fact that the great Soviet astronomer Tihov begins his book of astronomy with the assertion that we have no more need of the hypothesis Laplace. But all apart from this, Laplace was a professing Christian.

The authors of ~The Atheist's Handbook~ are wrong in quoting Descartes in support of their doctrines. Descartes was also a professing Christian. They distort the meaning of his words, giving them a materialistic sense. He wrote: "Give me matter and motion, and I will construct the universe! " The words are clear. The existence of the universe requires matter, motion, and an intelligent being to construct it. The words of Descartes are: "Give me matter and motion." Without this "me," matter and motion alone would not make a universe. It is only this "me," which comes from God, who can accomplish great deeds, because we have been created as creators.

One often wonders about the liberties academicians take in attributing to renowned authors ideas they never intended.

But let us leave these men of old and return to our own century.

Heisenberg, the great atomic scientist, could not have read ~The Atheist's Handbook~, because he launched an appeal for a union between science and religion! Sir James Jeans, the renowned astronomer, writes in his book ~The Mysterious Universe~:

> The universe begins to look more like a great thought than like a great machine. Mind no longer appears as an accidental intruder in the realm of matter. We are beginning to suspect, that we ought rather to hail it as the creator and governor of the realm of matter, not, of course, our individual minds, but the Mind in which the atoms out of which our individual minds have grown existed as thoughts ... We discover that the universe shows evidence of a designing or controlling power, that has something in common with our individual minds ... We are not so much strangers or intruders in the universe, as we first thought.

Newton had the disadvantage of belonging to a backward century. That is how ~The Atheist's Handbook~ explains his religiosity; it was only because of the pressure, of his backward milieu that he wrote in his book ~Optics~: "Does it not appear from phenomena that there is a Being, incorporeal, living, intelligent, omnipresent, with infinite space, which sees things intimately and thoroughly perceives them and comprehends them wholly by their immediate presence to himself?" But James Jeans belongs to our advanced scientific century, as does Heisenberg.

Let us listen to the great psychologist, Professor Jung, who also belongs to our century:

> During the past thirty years, people from all civilized countries of the earth have consulted me ... Among all my patients in their second half of life, that is to say over thirty-five years, there has not been one whose problem in the last resort was not that of finding a religious outlook on life. It is safe to say that everyone of them fell ill, because he had lost that which the living religions of every age have given to their followers, and none of them has been really healed who did not regain his religious outlook."

It is not the mentality of a century - it is science which makes men religious, science in all its spheres. Therefore, Kepler wrote centuries ago: "We are thinking God's thoughts after him." And Sir Allister Hardy, until recently head of Oxford University's zoology department, wrote: "Some power we call God is involved in the process of life"; and "I believe the living world is as closely linked with theology as it is with physics and chemistry, that the divine element is part of the natural process, not strictly supernatural but paraphysical." He said something else that is very interesting: "Just as knowledge of the biology of sex does not destroy the lover, so a religion linked with science and natural theology need not destroy the rapture of communion with God. Let us go forward to reclaim the ground that has been lost in the world."

page 173 My Answer to Moscow's Atheists

I do not know how it happened that ~The Atheist's Handbook~ refers to Bertrand Russell as a scientist. We know no scientific discovery of his. He is an authority for our opponents because he subscribed to leftist policies. But because his name has been mentioned, I think we should tell what he wrote about Christianity:

> There are certain things that our age needs, and certain things it should avoid. It needs compassion ... It needs above all courageous hope and the impulse to create it ... The root of the matter is a very simple and old-fashioned thing, a thing so simple that I am almost ashamed to mention it for fear of a derisive smile, with which wise cynics will greet my words. The thing I mean - please forgive me for mentioning it - is love. Christian love or compassion. If you feel this, you have a motive for existence, a guide for action, a reason for courage, an imperative necessity for an intellectual honesty.

Now let us come back to genuine scientists. C. Chant, professor of astro-physics at Toronto University, says: "I have no hesitation in asserting that at least ninety per cent of astronomers have reached the conclusion that the universe is not the result of any blind law but is regulated by a great intelligence." As for the other ten per cent, many of them are our Soviet astronomers, and they are not free to say what they think.

We repeat that if there is an irreconcilable conflict between science and religion, as ~The Atheist's Handbook~ asserts, most of the scientists themselves know nothing about it.

~The Atheist's Handbook~ uses as an anti-religious argument the new science of cybernetics, by which they prove that all the workings of our mind are like the functioning of a machine; no spirit is implied in either.

It is truly marvelous that these cybernetics installations

page 174 My Answer to Moscow's Atheists can reproduce or imitate nervous phenomena, that they translate, play chess, and solve problems of thought much more quickly than man can.

But - and this is the point so easily ignored - the cybernetics machine is produced by a mind. In the end, it is simply a reflection of the thought-processes of that mind and not something uniquely new.

Men can run, let us say, ten miles an hour. But they have invented jets and missiles which travel thousands of miles per hour. Men have eyes which perceive at a certain distance, but they have invented the microscope and the telescope to enable them to see what was hidden from the unaided eye. Men were created with the ability to make tools to extend their capabilities and enlarge their senses. The cybernetics machine belongs to this category, but behind every machine there is the mind which constructed it.

Who constructed the machine called "atheist author"? Let my opponents pause a bit and ponder the fact that every one of them has at his disposal around ten billion brain cells. What kind of Creator must he be who grants such a profusion of neurons to the one who wishes to mock him! Any brain cell can be in contact with 25,000 others. The number of possible associations is of the order of ten billion to the twenty-five-thousandth power, a quantity larger than the probable number of atoms in the universe known to us.

Think further: each atheist has a thousand miles of blood vessels in his body to supply his brain and organs. To defeat old and proven religion is not an easy task; our opponents sweat at it. Each atheist author has one and a half million sweat glands on his body's surface. He breathes as he writes against religion. He can breathe because he has lungs composed of seven hundred million cells. While he writes against the Creator, his heart beats steadily; it beats many billions of times during his life. In fact, during an average lifetime it pumps the weight of some six hundred thousand tons of blood. Could my opponents believe that a crane which lifts such massive tonnage exists by itself without any involvement with an intelligent being?

The authors of the atheistic masterpiece have spent a tremendous amount of nervous energy on it. Now, the nervous system of every one of the authors has three trillion nerve cells, of which nine billion are in the cortex.

Furthermore, they could not have written the book if they had not been healthy. Their health was insured by the thirty million white corpuscles in their veins. They also have 130 quadrillion red corpuscles.

Doubtless they sometimes took a walk to stimulate their thinking before writing further. It rained; yet no drop of water fell into their nostrils, because the opening of the nostrils is downward, not upward. Who arranged for this small detail?

Oh, if these academicians only had the wisdom of the fisherman known as John the Evangelist! He wondered about the mystery of his heart, which was beating regularly, assuring the continuation of life. He lay down on the breast of his best friend, Jesus, heard the regular beatings of his heart, and so was reassured that there exists a God, just as the one who hears the regular ticking of a watch knows that there exists a watchmaker.

I hope with every fibre of my being that my opponents will also come to know this and to know it ~now~ - not in hell where the truth about God and his universe is finally realized, but too late!

From thinking about their own bodily machine, which is much more wonderful than the cybernetics one, let my opponents now turn to admire a long suspension bridge. Yet a spiderweb, strung across a garden path, suggested the first suspension bridge. But who gave the spider the intelligence which we admire in the engineer? And who provided it with a web of such remarkable tensile strength? Those who made the first aeroplanes from Leonardo da Vinci to the Wright brothers, learned from the birds.

But my opponents may be sure that I understand them. They speak in the name of science, which is based on truth, and yet they themselves miss the one great condition of truth, which is free and fair discussion.

Suppose that several of the Soviet academicians had arrived at religious conclusions, as Einstein and Planck have done. Could they have published a work expressing their convictions? Surely they could have - but only secretly and at the risk of going to prison. We cannot demand much from authors who write under such conditions. Not every man is a hero or a potential martyr.

The rulers of the Communist countries are more in love with their own doctrine than with objective truth and therefore do not submit it to the only valid test, that of free discussion; thus, they exclude their academicians from the right to speak in the name of science.

How can someone speak in the name of science when he abuses the monopoly of publication which the atheists maintain and attributes to religion what it has never asserted?

We will give below just a few examples, taken at random from ~The Atheist's Handbook~. I quote:

"According to the Bible, God has created all the stars, the sun, and the moon in the fourth day of creation." Here, my opponents have simply added the word "all." This one word does not exist in the respective verse of the Bible. The Bible teaches only this, that the stars were created by God; it does not exclude, as ~The Atheist's Handbook~ says, the appearance of new stars. God has created this universe according to laws established by him, laws which allow for the possible appearance of new stars, as in other spheres there appear new men, new plans, and new ideas.

Another quotation from ~The Atheist's Handbook~: "The preachers of religion declare that life has been created by God only on our planet, but science has demonstrated that life is very largely spread throughout the universe."

When did the preachers of religion declare that life exists only on our planet? When did science demonstrate the second proposition?

Another quotation: "The transformation of nature by men shows obviously that the dogma, according to which the world created by God is invariable, has no foundation." The dogma of ~which~ religion ever asserted that the world created by God is invariable, or that men will not be able to transform nature? The Bible begins with the story that God put Adam in the garden of Eden to tend the garden, to work in it, which is to transform nature. Abel was already a shepherd who bred animals, and Cain was a farmer. Men were meant to influence nature and to change it.

In the part of their book with the sub-title "The bankruptcy of the dogma of atonement" these atheists write: "Clergymen try to convince us that as God is omnipresent, the word of God has been incarnated simultaneously as at an order, and in every one of the worlds inhabited by living beings. So Christ had to be born, to suffer and to die simultaneously on an infinite number of planets." I defy my opponents to give the name of one single clergyman who has ever endorsed such foolishness. First of all, science has never established that there exist intelligent beings on millions and millions of planets; secondly, no church has ever said that Christ died on many planets.

But we do not need to insist on this, because a few pages later the atheist authors say just the opposite of what they invented before. Now, they put in the mouth of theologians (nobody knows which) the assertion that the earth is the only place in which mankind has committed sin, which required atonement, whereas other races on other planets have remained faithful. Invention after invention! Never have theologians dogmatized about these questions!

With a smile, I give another quotation from ~The Atheist's Handbook~: "Religion admits only the natural modification of the geography of our planet, because it comes from God, but the creative intervention of man in the geographic process is completely excluded." They mean by this that religion does not allow the creation of canals for irrigation. That the very religious people of old, the Babylonians and the Egyptians, had a vast network of irrigation canals does not count for them. When has religion pronounced itself against canals? What religion?

Well, this time my opponents have proof. They quote prince Golifsin, governor of the province of Astrakhan of some 200 years ago, who opposed a canal uniting two rivers. But I for one have never known governors of a province to be representatives of religion.

Another quotation: "The clergymen have preached for thousands of years the idea that the flying of men towards heaven without the permission of God is inadmissible, profane, and have persecuted with cruelty and have exterminated the courageous men who have tried to fulfill such flights, not to speak about the cosmic travels of men; and in the present, all these religious principles have been destroyed."

I try to be polite, but I cannot say otherwise than that this is a patent lie. Nobody can give the name of one single man who has tried to fly and who has been exterminated because of this. Are astronauts exterminated in America? The first American astronaut asserted his faith in God, and the astronauts that followed read the Bible while in orbit around the moon. They came back, they were feasted. Not one of them was killed. How can academicians write such lies?

I continue with these curious quotations from a book published by the Moscow Academy of Science: "Some preachers of religion say that the Most High has moved his inhabitants in the depths of the universe and that therefore the cosmic rockets and satellites do not reach as far as the kingdom of heaven. Why did God need to move into another apartment?" When did any preacher of religion ever propound such stupidity?

page 179 My Answer to Moscow's Atheists

But the atheist authors very soon forget what they have said and fight against us with another argument: "The clergymen underline especially that men cannot find God or his supernatural servants, because these are immaterial, without a body, and belong to the spiritual world, not to the material world." This already sounds better, but they do not accept the fact that God, being spirit, is not meant to be seen by an astronaut who has gone only as far as the moon. They write: "The immaterial is also accessible to man." Poor materialists, who said only a few pages earlier that nothing exists except matter and movement! Now they acknowledge that the immaterial exists and is accessible to the human mind - which is true, if only they would use their minds to discover the Eternal Spirit and their own spirit.

Another gratuitous assertion of ~The Atheist's Handbook~ is that religion justifies ignorance. Who created the first universities in Europe? Was it not the Christians? Were not the monasteries the first centres of culture? Who would deny that the German and English languages - and many others - were formed by the Bible?

Well, my atheist friends can assert anything! They represent a dictator, and their opponents are muzzled.

Another assertion of ~The Atheist's Handbook~: "Religion condemns men to indifference towards events." The Communist Secret Police is not at all of the same opinion. Its agents know very well that Christians are not passive, and they put us in prison for our religious activities.

I think that the quotations given above are sufficient. They will make some readers so disgusted that they will

page 180 My Answer to Moscow's Atheists

ask themselves if it is worthwhile to answer a book written on such a low level. But it has to be answered, because the book is distributed by the millions in innumerable translations. It is inculcated in the minds of youth; it dominates by the power of the whip.

No, science cannot be opposed to religion. Science ~can~ be opposed only to a certain kind of backward religion.

If I pronounce the word "ship," this can awaken in your mind different images. You can have before you the ark of Noah, the primitive ship on which the Polynesians traversed the oceans, the ships of the Vikings when they first arrived in America, a steamer of a hundred years ago, or a modem trans-Atlantic luxury liner.

When I say "religion" or "God," again this awakens in the mind different images. Different men at different times, according to their powers of understanding, feeling and spiritual insight, have understood God differently. They interpreted his revelation differently also.

Some concepts of God are backward and undoubtedly contradict science. But this does not apply to all religion; nor does religion have to accept all science, because there exist many backward things in science too.

Science and religion belong to two different spheres. Science tells us only what the material aspects of things are. If a scientist were asked what a kiss is, he would say: "It is the approaching of two pairs of lips with a reciprocal transmission of microbes and carbon dioxide." But there is a "more" to the kiss. From the scientific point of view, any flower is the balance of a biochemical mechanism requiring potash, phosphates, nitrogen, and water in definite proportions; but every lover of flowers will contest that the scientist has said everything about a flower. Science goes only half-way. Part of the way is gone by art, part by philosophy, and the last mile by religion.

You know very little about life if you think of it only as a protoplasmic organism, forgetting what you have learned about it from Shakespeare, from Dickens, from Michelangelo, from Raphael, from the great religious personalities of the world, and from the incarnation of God, Jesus Christ.

Would it be right to speak of a lover's embrace in terms of an accelerated release of adrenalin into the blood and say that this is an adequate explanation of everything that happens at that moment?

It is unscientific and therefore untrue to reduce life to science.

The authors of ~The Atheist's Handbook~ pass from theoretical considerations about the relationship between science and religion to the practical side of things. Luther allegedly asked for "fierce repressions against the heresy of Copernicus." It remains a mystery when Luther ever asked for these repressions. You would seek in vain for any such words in the works of Luther.

"But did Calvin not burn Servetus, the great scientist?" our opponents ask. Yes, he had him burned, unhappily. But the assertion of ~The Atheist's Handbook~ that he burnt him on the stake for his scientific discoveries is simply not true. He was sentenced to death for teaching a false religious doctrine. This was some five hundred years ago. and it is very regrettable, but it is not for our opponents to say a word about this. Not one Servetus, but tens of millions of men have been sentenced to death or killed slowly in Communist concentration camps for having dared to nurture a political doctrine other than that of a dictator later disowned by his own comrades.

Neither is another assertion of my opponents true, that the library of Alexandria was destroyed by Christian fanatics at the end of the fourth century. If they had done so, the Moslems would not have been able to destroy it, as they did in the seventh century.

Another ludicrous lie: ~The Atheist's Handbook~ says that in the United States, England, the Netherlands, and other such countries, epidemics of smallpox erupt because the priesthood and the clergy are against vaccination on religious grounds. When did any of these countries have the last epidemic of smallpox? As a matter of fact, vaccination has been discontinued in the United States because the disease has been virtually wiped out.

Ah, yes, there is still a question: the index of the Catholic Church, which forbids the reading of certain books! The Catholic Church abolished the index at the Second Vatican Council. We still await the abolishing of the index in Communist countries. How they would like to read the books of Pasternak and Solzhenitsyn freely - or at least Plato, Newton, Bergson, not to mention the Bible and its commentaries! Even the books of Stalin are on the index; they cannot be found in any bookshop.

Neither what the authors of ~The Atheist's Handbook~ say theoretically about science and religion, nor what they say on the practical side of the matter, can stand investigation.

It is now an axiom of biology that function creates the organ. We have eyes to see light and colour. We have ears because there are sounds for us to hear, and hands because there are material things to handle. We are given a brain because there are things to think about. How is it that we have the curious capacity to believe, to have faith? Even a child has this capacity. So there must be a corresponding reality. Would it be logical in this world, where everything in us correspond to an external reality, for just this capacity of faith to be in us without something "out there" to be apprehended by faith? We have the capacity for belief because there is a God to believe in. There exists not only matter, but also a reality which cannot be explained in physical or chemical terms without exposing oneself to ridicule.

Science pleads for religion.

The earth is exactly at the right distance from the sun and has the right orbital velocity to make life possible on it. If we had been a little bit nearer the sun, we would have been burnt by its fire. If we had been farther away, the earth would have been too cold for anything to grow. If the earth did not revolve around the sun, there would not be seasonal changes.

Proteins are a combination of five major elements: carbon, hydrogen, nitrogen, sulphur, and oxygen. Within, every molecule of protein, there are probably something like forty to fifty thousand atoms. From roughly a hundred chemical elements which are distributed at random on our earth, only these five, and then only in fixed proportions, can form molecules of protein. Could this have happened by chance? The quantity of matter that would have had to be shaken up and the length of time required to finish this task in order to obtain proteins by chance, can be calculated according to the laws of probability. The Swiss mathematician Charles Cuye has made this calculation. He says: "The probability against such an occurrence by chance is 1:10 with 160 zeros following." It means that there is one chance in ten-with-160-zeros-following that out of a random shaking together of matter, one single molecule of protein would be produced. The matter to be shaken would have to be greater than that of the whole known universe. The time needed for this would be 10-followed-by-243-zeros billions of years!

Professor J. Leathes has calculated that the links of a chain in a very simple protein are combined in 10-with-48-zeros-following millions of ways. Chance cannot build such a molecule. Chance has never built the frame of a house or a piano, which are both very simple things compared to one molecule of protein.

When I was in prison, I heard quarrels between thieves. They played with dice. If a dice happened to turn up a six too often, the other thieves immediately suspected that the dice was loaded and that chance was not operating. It could not just happen that sixes should turn up again and again. Neither could simple chance have given us the ordered universe that we have. A philosopher, even an atheist philosopher, cannot be the result of the development of matter at random. Simple chance would never result in an atheist thinker.

I quoted a mathematician to the effect that the chance for creating one protein molecule would be 1 to 10-with-160-zeros-following. Would any of my atheist opponents put a ruble in a lottery in which the chance for gain would be 1 to 10-with-160-zeros-following? It would be a stupid risk. It would mean throwing a ruble away. But they risk their mental sanity, they risk the eternal jewel of their soul, they risk the truth on a theory that has as many chances to be exact as the chance to win in our hypothetical lottery. Professor Edwyn Conklin, a well-known biologist at Princeton University, has said: "The probability of life originating from an accident is comparable to the probability of the unabridged dictionary resulting from an explosion in a printing shop."

But all our arguments are of no avail for confirmed atheists. They know about the skull of the Neanderthal and others like him to prove that Adam, who lived in Paradise in fellowship with God, could not have existed. The Bible begins with something unscientific; our predecessors were very primitive men, evolved from the animal world. There can be no question of any concordance between the Bible and science, they say.

Suppose that excavations will be made on our earth 5,000 years from now and archaeologists will find two or three skulls of Australian aborigines, or of men still living in the stone age in New Guinea. The anthropologists of that day will say that in our time, there lived no civilized men. But men who launch rockets to the moon coexist with the pygmies. Why should not some of Adam's mentally developed descendants have coexisted with cave men?

I think I have said enough about this subject of science

page 185 My Answer to Moscow's Atheists

and religion.

What keeps these atheistic authors from claiming the right to speak in the name of truth is the complete lack of doubt in their book.

The authors of the Bible, though deeply religious people, never abstained from expressing their doubts. You find them in the Psalms and in the book of Job. Even St. John the Baptist had doubts when in prison about Jesus being the Messiah. Jesus himself cried on the cross: "My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?"

The authors of the guide for atheists express a cocksureness about everything. They are not permitted to doubt; they have to fulfill the assignment given to them by the Communist Party to write against religion.

No man is entirely religious. Religious men have their doubts. Likewise no man is always an atheist. Atheists have their moments of faith, but whereas authors of the Bible, David and Job, for example, sometimes have thoughts that almost seem blasphemous, our atheist opponents are always very predictable. They are all of a piece: atheists, and only atheists! This is not natural. They do not express all that they think.

It is as if they had never even heard about Heisenberg's famous uncertainty principle!

On your side, my atheist friends, lies political power. But scientific truth is on our side. Jesus can be considered the founder of scientific thought. He said: "Go your way and tell John what things you have seen and heard"; "We speak that which we do know and testify that which we have seen"; and "Behold, the fowls of the air ... consider the lilies of the field, how they grow." He teaches exact observation! Christians are taught to speak what they know, what they have heard and seen. Science is based on these same principles.

page 186 My Answer to Moscow's Atheists

ATONEMENT

~The Atheist's Handbook~ speaks about many other things, but I have to guard the length of this manuscript. It will have to be smuggled into Communist countries in printed form, and therefore it should not be too long.

But I owe my opponents something. Christ taught us to reward evil with good. They have slandered our religion; I must show them the way of salvation. Authors of an atheistic book of propaganda can be saved just as surely as those who have committed other sins.

We live with this terrible reality of sin. I have my sins; my opponents have theirs. Neither humanistic nor atheistic nor religious philosophy, nor speculations of clergymen or of their godless foes can do anything towards freeing a man from his sin. For this, God has done a mighty, efficacious work. I have sought to prove the reliability of Scriptures. My opponents can learn from Scriptures how to be cleansed from their sins, to become children of God and heirs of eternal life.

St. Paul writes: "Christ died for our sins according to the scriptures ... he was buried, and ... he rose again the third day according to the scriptures" (1CO 15:3,4).

Nobody can understand fully what the death of Christ in Palestine two thousand years ago has to do with ~my~ sins, and how ~my~ sins can be removed by a sacrifice which ~he~ made at that time. But neither can we give a full explanation of the nature of electricity, or of gravity, or of our own physiological and psychological processes. We do not need a full explanation of the atonement in order to profit from it. It is enough to believe that Christ died for our sins, that he bore our punishment, and that our sins are no more imputed to us.

Christ is God incarnate. Yet he humbled himself and took upon himself the penalty of our sins in his own suffering. St. Peter puts it in these words: "Ye were not redeemed with corruptible things, as silver or gold, from your vain conversation received by tradition from your fathers; but with the precious blood of Christ, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot" (1PE 1:18). And in heaven a song is sung to the praise of Christ: "Thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us to God by thy blood out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation; and hast made us unto our God kings and priests: and we shall reign on the earth"

(REV 5:9, 10).

When Christ purchased by his blood men of every nation, he purchased also the Communists and the atheist.

As I have said: We cannot fully understand the atonement, but we can understand something of it. When we bear in mind that Christ is God and, as such, a person of infinite value and dignity, then (I know the assertion will shock, but still I do not hesitate to make it) the killing of Christ was a worse crime than that which would have been committed if the entire human race had been crucified. You will understand this better if you will meditate on the words of Isaiah: "The nations are as a drop of a bucket, and are counted as the small dust of the balance" (ISA 40:15) before God.

A very simple illustration will show what we think. I am sick with tuberculosis, and I have killed millions of tuberculin microbes with medicines. I have also killed many other microbes and all kinds of insects; many animals have been killed for my food; I suffer no remorse for these. But my conscience accuses me of every wrong I have done to man, because man is so much higher than the insects - he bears the image of God. In the same way, Christ, who is God incarnate, is of infinitely higher value than the billions of beings who are only men, and therefore his crucifixion was fully sufficient to redeem the whole human race from all its sins - this on condition of faith in what he has done for us. In his person, God suffered, God died for his people, appropriating to himself first a human body in which he should be able to die, because Godhead is immortal.

Therefore, Peter writes again: "Christ also has once suffered for sins, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God"(1PE 3:18). And St. John writes: "The blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanses us from all sin" (1JN 1:7). St. John the Baptist said, pointing to Jesus, "Behold the Lamb of God, which takes away the sin of the world" (JHN 1:29). St. Paul writes: "Being justified by his blood, we shall be saved from the wrath [of God] through him" (ROM 5:9). What wrath such a blasphemous work as ~The Atheist's Handbook~ must have provoked in God! But we can be saved from this wrath, because "in [Jesus Christ] we have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of sins, according to the riches of his grace" (EPH 1:7).

The atonement has been the object of meditation on the part of Christians for two thousand years. It has been explained in diverse manners. There are many doctrines of the atonement.

Which of them should we choose?

St. Therese of Lisieux, when asked which Christian virtue she would like to practise most, answered: "All of them!" I would say the same thing about the doctrines of the atonement. They are all the result of deep meditation of believing and loving souls; there is no reason to put any of them aside.

True is the vicarious doctrine, that Jesus died as our substitute for our sins. True also is the moral influence doctrine, that Christ died in order that through the beauty of his gesture and of his sacrifice, he might influence us to adopt a new and godly manner of life. True is the governmental theory, according to which God freely forgives sinners but made Christ suffer in order to show us that every transgression incurs punishment, and that we, looking at the great suffering of Christ, might see what we deserved for our sins. True is the mystical theory, according to which Christ and the believing soul are one, united by a love which makes them indissoluble. As a mother suffers with her sick child and as a loving bride suffers with her bridegroom who passes through pain, we have suffered together with our beloved Christ on Golgotha, and we ourselves have received in his body, wherewith we are one, punishment for our sins.

But I think that the most plausible explanation for a twentieth century man is the doctrine of transfer. We all have in our psychology the mechanism of transfer. When we cannot find something and we are upset about it, it is enough for us to blame someone else, our wife or our child, for misplacing the respective object. We have found a scapegoat on whom to put the guilt. If a child has banged himself against a stool, it is enough for the mother to "spank" the stool for the hurt it caused, and the child is immediately mollified. The mechanism of transfer is deeply rooted in us. Our heart finds peace if we can charge somebody else with our troubles: the monarchy, the bourgeoisie, the landlords, the Americans, the imperialists, the Communists, the Trotskyites, Stalin, the Jews, the Black, the Whites, anybody but myself.

Jesus consciously used this mechanism of transfer; therefore he came to mankind, presenting himself as the Son of God. It was as if he said: "Now, if you have this tendency to transfer your sins to somebody else, the most normal thing is to transfer them to my shoulders; I bear the responsibility, because the whole creation was made through me. I am ready to take upon myself all the guilt and all the sin. You feel that your sins deserve a punishment. Kant said: 'The criminal has a right to punishment.' I will bear the punishment which you deserve, and you will be free."

I recommend to my atheist opponents, since they have done harm to so many millions of souls by writing slanderous lies against religion, that they put this crime on the shoulders of Christ, whom they have attacked. Christ is the Lamb of God who takes away the sin of the whole world; therefore, he takes away also the sins of the authors of ~The Atheist's Handbook~. Believe in Christ, and you will be saved!

You have tried to oppose religion with atheistic theories. This is childish. Critical analysis is impotent before interior anguish. Atheistic theories do not help a dying man or his bereaved family. Your own doctrines are of no value to you when you pass through the anguish of doubt and ask yourself if you have not committed a terrible offence by writing this book. You may not think about it today, but there will come a day when you will have to think, the day of your death.

Moscow, Peking, and Washington are competing to see which will be the city of greatest influence in the world. None of them will! The city with the mightiest population, the city where kings and republicans, capitalists and Communists, Stalinists and Trotskyites, atheists and religious people, clergymen and their enemies meet, is the city of the grave. And for the unbeliever beyond the grave lies only remorse.

Even at the moment before death, it will not be late. In that moment, you can say the prayer: "Lord Jesus, Son of God, pity me, the sinner!" Believe in the blood shed for you by Jesus Christ, and you will be saved.

My dear atheist friends, we have passed a few hours together. Now we part.

In the Bible the story is recounted that while the Jews were slaves in Egypt, for three days there was a spell of darkness. While the darkness surrounding the Egyptians was so dense they could not see one another, all the children of Israel enjoyed light.

  This light is the Word of God. The people of God had this light, and it shone into their hearts.

page 191 My Answer to Moscow's Atheists

  It is told that when Palestine was under Turkish rule, a cruel pasha forbade the Jews to kindle lights at night. The cities were completely shrouded in darkness.
  But in Safed, the windows of the rabbi Joseph Caro glowed at night. The rabbi read the Scriptures. The guards reported to the pasha what was happening. He immediately rode to the rabbi's house and saw him ... leaning over the Bible, while the entire room was aglow with a luminescence coming from the walls, although no lamp was burning in the room. The walls were covered with fireflies. They gave him light.
  The rabbi explained to the pasha: "The law of God illuminates not only the lives of those who study it, but also the fireflies who listen."
  Some of you, my atheistic opponents, and those who have believed you will read these lines. I am sure that they will be illumined, though their minds have been darkened by your slanders against the Word of God, and that bright light, the light of Christ, will shed its warmth and beauty throughout the Communist lands.

A LAST WORD

We understand the poor atheists who have to speak as commanded. But if an innkeeper gives bad wine, he can ease his conscience by giving it in short measure.
  Seven hundred pages of denial after denial, denial of God, the Bible, eternal life, and humanity shows an excess of zeal.
  You have written a boring book. It is not your fault. You could not have done better. Every man has a God-shaped vacuum in his heart. Instead of filling the vacuum with God, you wrote a book about the structure and beauties of a vacuum.
  You had to write it. Atheist books are the only books about atheism, whereas Luther said: "Our Lord has written the promise of the resurrection not in books alone, but in every leaf of springtime."

page 192 My Answer to Moscow's Atheists

Your book is boring, yes. But it is also poisonous for minds which don't have the liberty to read religious books and thus come to a knowledge of the truth. You are like someone who leads caterpillars astray by telling them that all their endeavours are in vain; they will never become beautiful butterflies. You tell buds that they will never become flowers. You kill the souls of men, telling them that they are not destined to be Christ-like in this life and in Paradise for all eternity.

I don't wish to insult you. I wish to help you realize your terribly dangerous state of heart. You are worse than murderers. They kill only bodies. You slay souls, incapacitating them for enjoying God.

Therefore I give you the advice which Sonya gave to the murderer Raskolnikov: "Get up. Go at once, this very minute, and stand at the crossroads; then bow down and kiss first the earth which you have defiled, and then bow to the whole world, to all four points of the compass, and say to them all aloud, 'I have killed.' Then God will send you life again. Will you go? Will you go?"

I myself bow before you, because I also have killed souls in the past.

Like you, I was an atheist, until the day I came to myself and did literally what Sonya advised. Now I shudder at the life of violence and suffering that awaits you if you continue in your atheism. I have been found by Christ and have been saved from atheism, from crime. This way is open for you, too.

Will you go? Will you go?

End Of Book

[The following is from the "jacket" of the Arlington House Publishers edition (1975) of the book.]

IS THERE A GOD?
Richard Wurmbrand erases any doubts.

ð "In the Babylonian Talmud it is said that a heathen emperor asked a rabbi: 'Show me God!' The rabbi answered: 'You will see him with your eyes on one condition. First, you must look five minutes into the sun.' The emperor looked at the sun but immediately had to lower his eyes. Then the rabbi told him: 'You cannot look for one minute at the sun, which is an insignificant creation of God - and yet you wish to see the One who gives the stars their brilliance!'" ð "Nobody can be eloquent for atheism. Atheism is a denial. Who can write enthusiastically about a negation? Who can address a sonnet to a negation, or dedicate a concerto to a negation, or sculpture a negation? Religion has inspired symphonies, paintings, statues, poetry. Atheism, by its very nature, could never have this impact. Atheism has no wings."

ð "Go, comfort somebody who is dying in a cancer ward, or his family, with these words: 'We are building a happy Communist society'; or 'Science achieves great things. We have been to the moon and soon we will be on Venus.' There is not much consolation in this. But tell the dying and the bereaved about the heavenly Father and the Christian's hope of living eternally with Him, and you will see the difference."

ð "There ~is~ an eternal life, and as an unrepenting Hitler cannot very well pass it in the same place as the innocent children he killed, there must be a heaven for the just and a hell for the unjust."

Richard Wurmbrand languished for fourteen years in Communist prisons. Though beaten and starved, he never broke. Having passed through hell on earth, this courageous Romanian pastor emerged with a burning love for God and his fellow man.

Today, a decade after his release, Rev. Wurmbrand is seeking to win his former persecutors to Christ. In this remarkable book, conceived while he was in solitary confinement, Wurmbrand demolishes the arguments for atheism as presented by the Soviet Academy of Science in its ~Atheist's Handbook~.

Throughout the Communist world, people who want to get ahead must master ~The Atheist's Handbook~. Its teachings are drilled into children at school. But Richard Wurmbrand demonstrates that the atheist creed leaves more questions unanswered than it professes to settle. On the positive side, he marshals the testimony of artists, musicians, writers, philosophers, scientists, statesmen, and saints - all of whom bear eloquent witness to the reality of God. Richard Wurmbrand is not an academic. He steers away from theological wrangling. With the sparkling sense of humor that helped sustain him through unspeakable sufferings, he tells the story of God's love for us in language anyone can understand. Is there a God? Does He care about man? Can we trust what the Scriptures tell us about Him?

Yes, says Rev. Richard Wurmbrand, in a ringing affirmation of faith that comes from the heart - ~and~ from the head.

The Case for God

ú Did the universe just "happen"?

ú Scientific findings that point to creation

ú Miracles: nature performs them every day

ú Why the Gospel narratives ring true ú Does the Bible contradict itself?

ú The Fall, the Flood, and the Exodus: history or fancy?

ú Bible prophecies that came true - to the letter

ú Did cavemen have religion?

ú Does Christianity teach submission to tyrants?

ú Why Christians behind the Iron Curtain willingly risk torture for their faith

ú Communism: a perversion of Biblical teaching?

ú Atheism: enemy of art and culture

ú Life after death: the atheist's darkest fear

Richard Wurmbrand, world-renowned spokesman for Christians suffering under Communist persecution, was born in Romania in 1909. When the Communists seized his native land in 1945, he became a leader in the underground church.

Arrested in 1948 along with his wife Sabina, he served fourteen years in Red prisons, including three years in solitary confinement where he saw no one except his tormentors. Christian friends in Norway purchased his freedom for $10,000 in 1964. He then settled in the United States.

Two years later, in sensational appearance before the Senate Internal Security Subcommittee, Wurmbrand stripped to the waist, revealing eighteen ugly torture wounds inflicted by his brutal captors.

The End of "My Answer to the Moscow Atheists"

My Correspondence With Jesus

Richard Wurmbrand
Copyright 1990

ISBN 1-85424-112-5
Monarch Publications Ltd.
1 St Anne's Road, Eastbourne, E Sussex BN21 3UN
Middlebury, IN 46540
U.S.A.

Front Cover:

In the pain and loneliness of solitary confinement only one thing kept him sane.

By the author of "TORTURED FOR CHRIST"

Back Cover:

'One does not put questions to God. We are not to write him letters or trouble him, but only to kneel quietly in adoration. However, I am far from perfect...'

For fourteen years Richard Wurmbrand, a Rumanian pastor, was imprisoned for his faith. He was tortured physically and psychologically. Only his relationship with Jesus kept him sane. In "My Correspondence with Jesus" he lays before Christ the anguish in his heart: above all, the thought that each falling away might crucify the Son of God afresh.

This is the work of a man on the borders of sanity. 'The moment I am alone, I am in prison. Every day, every night, I relive bodily and spiritual tortures. I hear the cries, the coarse words. I see the ashen faces of the sufferers.

In many respects this book is reminiscent of the Book of Job. Like Job, Richard Wurmbrand questions God bitterly. Like Job, he is stripped bare. Like Job, he finds profound comfort - in the costly love of Christ.

A book of great power.

Contents

Foreword		7
My First	Letter to Jesus	15
My Second	Letter to Jesus	24
My Third	Letter to Jesus	32
My Fourth	Letter to Jesus	42
My Fifth	Letter to Jesus	50
My Sixth	Letter to Jesus	59
My Seventh	Letter to Jesus	66
My Eighth	Letter to Jesus	72
My Ninth	Letter to Jesus	79
My Tenth	Letter to Jesus	84
My Eleventh	Letter to Jesus	89
My Twelfth	Letter to Jesus	94
My First	Letter to Christians	99
My Second	Letter to Christians	104
My Third	Letter to Christians	110
My Fourth	Letter to Christians	116
My Fifth	Letter to Christians	122
My Thirteenth	Letter to Jesus	128
My Fourteenth	Letter to Jesus	133
My Fifteenth	Letter to Jesus	138
My Sixteenth	Letter to Jesus	144
My First	Letter from Jesus	151
My Second	Letter from Jesus	157
My Third	Letter from Jesus	164
My Fourth	Letter from Jesus	168
My Fifth	Letter from Jesus	176
My Sixth	Letter from Jesus	184

p006

It is impossible for those who were once enlightened, and have tasted of the heavenly gift ... if they shall fall away, to renew them again unto repentance; seeing they crucify to themselves the Son of God afresh, and put him to an open shame (HEB 6:4-6).

p007 ..... F O R E W O R D

Around the beginning of the nineteenth century, the American Methodist Church had a highly gifted preacher: one Lorenzo Dow.

A person who had been robbed came to him one day requesting that he find out who the thief was. Dow gathered all the suspected persons into a certain room. On the table was a black pot under which he put a rooster. After darkening the room, he made very person touch the pot with his fingers, explaining that the rooster would crow as soon as the guilty person did so. When the light was restored, it was seen that one person present had no soot on his fingers. He had been afraid to touch the pot. The guilty stood condemned.

We believers can speak freely about the events of Jesus' crucifixion 2,000 years ago. We were not there. But when we are reminded of his being crucified afresh today (Heb. 6:6), we prefer not to touch the subject. We are all too conscious of having fallen away from the light we have received, and the thought of crucifying Christ afresh makes us more than a little uncomfortable.

I can easily understand why no importance has been attached to this unsettling text of Scripture.

One can hear thousands of sermons and read innumerable books about the crucifixion on Golgotha; one can be

p008 ..... My Correspondence With Jesus

a Christian all one's life and never hear about the many crucifixions that have followed because saints have not remained true to the light they had.

While in prison, I became oppressed by the thought of this possibility, especially when I saw Christians fall away (not everyone could bear the torture and suffering) and contemplated my own weaknesses. The pain of knowing that my Lord suffers repeatedly in heaven has filled me with a chronic sadness all these years, till I finally felt constrained to set my thoughts in writing.

Prisoners under Communism were forbidden either to write or to receive letters. In fact, it was strictly forbidden to possess writing materials of any kind. It was next to impossible to obtain even a bit of paper or a pencil. I had none during my fourteen years in jail.

Notwithstanding, some of us wrote. We smeared soap on the sole of a shoe and wrote on it with a piece of wood. I possess 350 Romanian poems written like this that I learned by heart and later transcribed. Other prisoners learned from one another such things as foreign languages, mathematics and chemistry by writing their lessons like this. If caught doing so, they were harshly punished.

It did not matter. We needed some diversion in our monotonous lives. Even an earthquake would have been preferable to the dull greyness of our confined existence.

To understand what follows, the reader must also know that men practically never saw a woman, nor women a man, except for brutal guards with whom there was no communication on a human level.

In her book ~The Pastor's Wife~ my wife (who was also in jail) tells the story of an imprisoned teenager who would write passionate love letters to a boy she imagined to exist. Then she would write a letter as if from him reciprocating her love. The exchange of love letters became more and more burning. She would weep on receiving his letter, which she had written, and would cherish and kiss it. Once, he wrote that he had found another girl, whereupon she wept bitterly. Then she entreated her imaginary but more-than-real lover to come back to her. His 'no' was definite, and the poor girl lost her mind.

In different ways many of us carried on such imaginary discussions. We came to believe in these creatures of our mind and did not doubt that the replies came from them rather than our own imagination. The voices we heard were from without, not within.

Psychiatrists would have concluded that we had become schizophrenic. Little wonder, for prisoners were sometimes kept alone in a subterranean cell for years on end, hungry, beaten, tortured, never hearing a human voice, not even a whisper. Or at other times crammed together like sardines, a hundred in a room that might accommodate thirty, with people fainting for lack of air.

Perhaps it was sheer schizophrenia. I do not know. But I remembered at that time a biblical text, which I visualized in Hebrew script as contained in the holy scrolls. In it God called, 'Abraham, Abraham' (GEN 22:11). These two words occur in our translations. But in Hebrew there is one thing more: a disjunctive sign between the two Abrahams. This also appears in the Hebrew when the Lord called, 'Samuel, Samuel' (1SM 3:10). It did not have to be so. When we read, 'Moses, Moses' (EXO 3:4), the disjunctive line is not there.

The two 'Abrahams' with the disjunctive line between them should really be translated, 'You, the two different Abrahams co-existing in one person.' Like us, he also had the outward and the inner man, the manifest man and the hidden man of the heart, the id, with its impulses, instincts and low desires, and the ego, the super-conscious with high longings.

Psychologists speak about neuroses, psychoses and complexes. The Bible speaks about a hidden man - a whole man, with his own desires, thoughts, emotions, will and love - who lives in the heart of the outer man, just as there are toy eggs that contain a smaller egg. This inner man is so hidden that men often live a lifetime without discovering him.

But when he is discovered - in my case, the Richard known only to me, distinct from the ordinary Richard known to others - real dialogue (or in prison circumstances, correspondence) between the two can arise.

Friedrich von Schiller once wrote, 'Two souls live within my breast.' They should be able to communicate. Gestalt psychology recommends that we arrange for dialogue between the two. They should at least know each other. 'Can two walk together unless they are agreed?' (AMO 3:3).

Usually the two 'Richards' are at loggerheads with one another. Therefore God speaks to them as with two different beings. In the case of Moses, a harmony had been established. Thus there is no disjunctive sign when God says, 'Moses, Moses.'

Men are commanded to love one another, which means that the different Richards in me should also love one another. The holy Richard should love the Richard who is still sinful in me, the Richard with worldly thoughts and inclinations to sin. (An analysis will show that the worldly Richard is softer towards the holy Richard than the holy Richard is towards the sinful one.)

Then there exists a third Richard who judges both with haughtiness.

It is desirable that we understand each other and love God with all our heart, which, the Kabbalah says, means to love him with both sides of our nature, good and evil. The Richard of only one aspect is nothing but a mask.

The different Richards in me must love one another. The good Richard must allow the bad Richard at least the right to self-defence. He must sometimes give him the benefit of the doubt. The good Richard must fight the bad Richard, but only with kindness and understanding.

p011 ..... F O R E W O R D

It becomes apparent that there is amply opportunity for rich discussion or correspondence between these different men in myself.

Thus arose the idea for this present book. Eventually I decided that I might better correspond with the One who bears the responsibility for the existence of all the Richards within. Hence I wrote to Jesus and 'received' replies.

When Theodor Herzl, founder of modern Zionism, wrote in one night his first book, "The Jewish State," he seemed to hear the fluttering of angel wings in the room. Uneasy about his sensations, he went with the manuscript to his friend Dr Max Nordau, a psychiatrist, and said to him, 'Judge if this is the work of a madman or the truth.'

There is no doubt in my mind that this book was conceived when I was at least on the verge of madness. But should not a Christian's thinking under such abnormal circumstances be made known?

The Bible speaks about the 'foolishness of God'

(1CO 1:25). St Laurence Justinian says, 'Wisdom has become infatuated by love,' by a completely unreasonable love for sinners. Hosea observes that 'the spiritual man is mad' (HOS 9:7). It is normal that he be abnormal. He bears the pain of the great iniquities and enmities in the world.

Whenever wrong is done to a little one anywhere in the world, it hurts me. The prophet says that whoever touches God's holy people touches the light of his eye. Somehow it touches mine too. I felt the pain of the world most intensely when in prison. It was a quasi-physical pain. I have known saints in prison who grieved unbearably over the sins of the world, as every member of the body of Christ should. If this is madness, so be it.

Perhaps the believer who is too intellectual to feel the pain of the foot or the hand is himself unbalanced. We are all part of the same body of Christ.

In fact, Christian books are usually too reasonable, too logical, too concerned with being clear and intelligible. Therefore their influence is minimal. Life is not like this. It is tempestuous, as is the human mind. Lie down on a couch to daydream, observe the thoughts that pass through your mind, and see if they are reasonable and moral.

Formulated thoughts bow to standards and social conventions. Only the unbidden, the vague, the unformulated nuance reflects the real self.

Why should not the unreasonable in our relationship with God also have a voice? Job, David and Jeremiah, for example, expressed displeasure with God, some of which bordered on blasphemy. Yet God allowed these thoughts to be canonised in Scripture. He even complimented Job for speaking 'what is right' (JOB 42:7,8).

Everything should be committed to God. It is written, 'Love God with all your heart.' The Kabbalah asks, 'How can this be done? We have within the heart both good and evil.' The reply is: 'Love him also with your bad inclinations.'

This is what Job and David did. At one point Job says,

'What have I done to you, O watcher of men: Why have you set me as your target?' (JOB 7:20,21). Later he complains, 'He multiplies my wounds without cause; he will not allow me to catch my breath' (JOB 9:17,18). David says, 'God gave his people over to the sword' (PSA 80:5). Jeremiah is even less charitable: 'Standing like an enemy, God has bent his bow; with his right hand, like an adversary, he has slain all who were pleasing to his eye. He has poured out his fury like a fire' (LAM 2:4).

Moses, at a certain moment, had no doubt that God does evil, and he says as much, asking, 'Lord, wherefore hast thou so evil entreated this people?' (EXO 5:22). Elijah asked God, 'Hast thou brought evil upon the widow with whom I sojourn?' (1KI 17:20).

p013 ..... F O R E W O R D

Pastors may find occasion to comment on such verses in their pulpits and to explain them away. One can also publish books excusing them, but who among us dares to speak to God like this today? Who expresses to God any discontent over his ways? What publisher would print a Christian book with similar accusations against God?

Jeremiah aired his complaints and lamentations when the Jews were deported to Babylon. The Jews under Hitler and Christians under Communism have suffered more than the ancient Israelites. Should not their words of madness be known too?

This book can be understood only if, in imagination, you join your suffering brethren in prison and enter their tortured minds. We are enjoined to feel their chains 'as if chained with them' (HEB 13:2). We should feel not only their physical chains, but also their doubts, their moments of despair, their mental anguish, the tempests that pass through their souls.

This is the concern of the present book.

I had no Bible in prison. I lived only on what I remembered of it, which was much in the beginning, but very little afterward, when hunger and doping had taken their toll.

One verse of Scripture obsessed me all during those years. I saw some Christians, even some renowned ones, falling away and passing to the Communists because they were not able to bear the torture. Some even became Judases.

Day and night I thought about the words in HEB 6:4-6:

"It is impossible for those who were once enlightened, and have tasted of the heavenly gift, and were made partakers of the Holy Ghost, and have tasted the good word of God, and the powers of the world to come, if they shall fall away, to renew them again unto repentance, seeing they crucify to themselves the Son of God afresh, and put him to an open shame."

Those who fell away had once been my friends. Now they assumed terrible roles, which they tried to play with bravado, justifying themselves by serving their new cause enthusiastically.

But the pain I felt most intensely was the pain of Jesus. ~Jesus crucified afresh~ was too much for me. This thought was the greatest single suffering that I endured.

It is the subject of my correspondence with Jesus.

It has been easy for me to reproduce the correspondence. I wrote the present pages without having notes before me or even a plan.

I acknowledge that I lead two different lives: one that is the usual life of a sinner who loves Jesus and strives in much weakness to serve him, and another that is hidden.

The moment I am alone, I am in prison. Every day, every night, I relive bodily and spiritual tortures. I hear the cries, the coarse words. I see the ashen faces of the sufferers. My dreams too are usually about prison. Therefore my books and my sermons are out of the ordinary.

I know of only two individuals with similar experiences: Dostoievsky, who all his life carried this same burden; and Erasmus of Rotterdam, who wrote the book "The Praise of Folly."

And so I did not have to remember what I thought and felt in prison. I relive the experience every day.

And now, the correspondence.

p015

My First Letter to Jesus

Dear Jesus,

God could have used any number of ways to communicate with mankind. I can very well imagine communication by means of alternating colours, or painting, or music, or variations in fragrance or even taste. Sex, of course, is a means of communication, wherefore it is written, 'Adam knew Eve his wife' (GEN 4:1).

Gestures, facial expressions, what we today call body language, are all splendid vehicles of communication. In fact, while watching church services on TV, I sometimes turn off the sound so as to concentrate on the physiognomy of the preacher and members of the congregation. When in church I am also very attentive to these changes.

It is almost as if the different words of God and of prayer take shape in the expression of the eyes and in the whole musculature of the face. When the congregation is made up of true believers, the changes are simultaneous, like the music of an orchestra.

If the words 'Blessed be ye poor' are read or chanted, one can see a hush of blessedness on the faces of the poor, who may have felt outclassed by the better-dressed believers. At the words 'Blessed are ye that weep,' tears come to the eyes of the sorrowful. Why lose this blessedness? 'Rejoice ye in that day.' Smiles blossom as the meaning is communicated.

p016 ..... My Correspondence with Jesus

In a religious service, God intends to shine his face upon us, that we might see how he looks upon us. His expressions vary, too. He does not stare at us without sentiment or emotion. In fact, his expressions might range from wrath and disgust to passionate love and a longing to identify with us.

Well, Jesus, though you had the choice of so many means of communication, you elected to reveal yourself to us through the written word.

The written word! You even asked John to write to angels. You could have spoken to them directly, but you preferred to have John write letters to the angels of the seven churches (Rev 2 and 3). Perhaps you liked his manner of writing (though I don't know why, because his Greek is awful) and therefore assigned him this work. Perhaps his calligraphy pleased you. It is hard to say.

In my thoughts, Jesus, I have looked to you often. My eyes, my whole face, my bodily positions have all tried to communicate with you. I have spoken to you in words and in songs. Now I have decided to write to you, because this is the most exquisite manner in which you addressed yourself to me. Perhaps in this way you will understand me better.

I write to you on the presumption that you are alive and can read, as well as answer, my letters.

Please don't be offended. You would expect me to say that I "know" you are alive, not simply that I presume it.

You were once a reader, that I know. You read the book of Isaiah and praised it. Perhaps for variety you have spent some time on a Wurmbrand book, too. If so, you might have read my book ~Christ on the Jewish Road~, in which I prove your resurrection. So you see, I do not doubt it.

But ... there are a few 'buts.' I will mention just two of them.

p017 ..... My 1st Letter to Jesus

There is sufficient proof of the fact that you were resurrected after the crucifixion on Golgotha. But since that time you have been crucified many times afresh (HEB 6:4-6). This happens every time a man illuminated by the Spirit falls away, which means many times a day. The Bible does not tell us, but I imagine that you are also resurrected every time afresh.

How long will this go on? Can you bear an unlimited number of crucifixions, with attendant resurrections, and still be capable of reading and answering letters? We all have a breaking point in suffering. Have you none at all? Are you still alive in the plain sense of the word?

The prophet says, 'Ye have wearied the Lord' (MAL 2:17). If God can weary of sins, can he not also get tired of crucifixions? Jesus, you sat by a well in Samaria, weary and thirsty. A peaceful journey from Judea had worn you out. Won't an endless crucifixion have an even worse effect?

A second 'but.' You are the living Son of a living God. How are we supposed to understand your being alive? We are confronted with the same problem we have with beauty. Plato believed that beauty is an inherent quality of persons or things. Hume objected. 'Beauty is in the eye of the beholder,' he claimed. 'Nothing is always beautiful and nothing is beautiful for all.'

Is being alive an objective notion?

You characterize certain men, whom everyone would consider very much alive, as being dead in trespasses and sins. You write to the angel of a certain church, 'You have a reputation of being alive, but you are dead' (REV 3:1). Apparently what is considered life for some is death for others who see life differently or give it another meaning.

If you consider certain living men to be dead, surely you are not angry that Nietzsche and some modern theologians said, 'God is dead.' Perhaps they used the word 'dead' in a relative sense, as you do.

p018 ..... My Correspondence with Jesus

I don't know what it's like to be a glorified Saviour, to sit with the Father on the throne from which universes are created and ruled, and then to be dragged away and crucified in heaven. On earth you were crucified near a garden, which must have heightened the pain.

Who can imagine the pain of being crucified in Paradise? Does your holy mother stand there, too, weeping near the foot of the cross, along with Magdalene and John and the others?

I don't know the answers. Therefore, I will presume that you are alive in the sense in which I am alive and can write and read.

I believe that there exists objective, real truth, that there are things intrinsically beautiful, and that you truly exist, a fact only madmen and nihilists can deny. I also believe that you are constantly resurrected, because goodness ultimately conquers, not only evil but also physical laws. Death cannot hold you.

Therefore, since you are and I am, we will now correspond.

In the USA, there is a tombstone with the following inscription: The body of Benjamin Franklin, printer [like the cover of an old book, its contents torn out and stripped of its lettering and gilding], lies here food for worms. Yet the work itself shall not be lost. For it will [as he believes] appear once more in a new and beautiful edition corrected and amended by the author.' If the work 'Benjamin Franklin' can appear in a new edition in heaven – whatever worms will have done to him – I certainly believe that you too appear again and again, whatever evil men do to you and however often they do it.

You can take cognisance of this letter.

The first thing I wish to tell you may sound banal, but it is the simple truth: I love you.

I love pudding, I love a dog, I love men, I love you. I have to use the same word because of the poverty of language. There is simply no adequate expression for the sentiment I have for you. So let us conclude with this: you are my love.

I also trust in your immense power.

When the Wright brothers made their first flight, the engineer Octave Chanute wrote an article in ~Popular Science Monthly~ in which he said: 'This machine can even transport mail in certain cases, but also in limited quantity. It can become faster and then could be used for sport, but it is unimaginable that it will serve for commercial transport.' Eleven years later, in 1911, the regular air transport of passengers started. A short time before World War I, the astronomer William Pickering wrote, 'Popular imagination fancies gigantic planes flying over the oceans and transporting crowds of passengers. It is scarcely necessary to say that these are only phantasmagoric visions. Even if we could suppose that such a machine could make the traverse with one or two passengers, the price would be such that only a millionaire could afford it, as he could afford his own yacht.' Today, even the speed of sound at high altitudes has been surpassed.

If men underestimated their own potential, no wonder they underestimate yours. You can do anything because you are God. In addition, nothing is impossible for you because, as man, you believed wholeheartedly in the Father.

Then why don't you do the many things we expect of you, that are the subject of our prayers - not to mention those you have promised expressly in your word?

Pascal would have an explanation for your negligence: 'Jesus will be in agony until the end of the world.' An agonising being might be a giant, but he is still helpless. When you had died on Golgotha, even the centurion said you were the Son of God, but then you were a dead Son of God. You could feed no hungry, wipe away no tears, caress no children.

p020 ..... My Correspondence with Jesus

Considering the many defections of believers over the centuries, Pascal, like me, would have meditated on the many crucifixions you have endured since Calvary. I believe that the respite between one crucifixion and another must be minimal. How aware are you between them? Certainly you are an agonising almighty Being.

If that is the case, then most of our prayers to you seem wrong, foolish. The Virgin Mary, John, and the woman who served you did not pray to you while you hung on the cross.

I wonder if it ever occurred to them to try to alleviate your thirst (even a Roman soldier did what he could), or bathe your bloody feet, or at the very least whisk away the flies from your wounds. I don't know why they did not try, even if the soldiers objected. However, the gospel records tell us nothing, one way or the other.

Your life as a servant ended with a painful, saving death. You had desperately needed their services.

Since you are still in agony, our prayers should not make demands, not even claim the fulfillment of your promises. Rather, we should stand in mute adoration before the grandeur of your sacrifice and, if possible, help you.

If Pascal was right that you are in perpetual agony, and if you are crucified afresh daily, there is little chance you will be able to read the present letter. (How should men in agony, even if they are sons of God, too, read and understand?) I come back then to what I said in the beginning. I write to you on the presumption that you are alive, in a normal state, and that we can correspond like this.

These two ideas, one from the Bible that you are crucified again and again, the other from Pascal that for thousands of years you have been in agony, torment me.

When I look up to heaven I see you. Stephen saw you, too. What expression did he see on your face? Was it one of triumph or of atrocious suffering?

p021 ..... My 1st Letter to Jesus

At the end of a religious service I often hear the words, 'May God make his face to shine upon you.' I do not leave the church until I see a face. Usually, I see the face you had when you bowed your head in death on Golgotha, as painted by Fra Angelico. I know that the resurrection followed, but it was only to occasion your offering yourself in new crucifixions.

More than one-third of the earth's population lives below the poverty line; 570 million are undernourished, 800 million children are not enrolled in school, 1.5 billion have no access to effective medical care. Millions of innocents have been slaughtered in Nazi Germany, Russia, Red China, Cambodia, Lebanon. So many suffer in prisons and labour camps. You, an almighty Being, love them all, but you endure terrible suffering yourself. The reality of a suffering God is probably the best answer to the questions of why a good God allows such tragedy to befall his creatures.

I suppose that the heavenly Father shares your suffering. You and the Father are one, which means you are of the same essence, though you do not always share the identical suffering.

When you sweated blood in Gethsemane and begged the Father to spare you the bitter cup, 'it pleased the Lord to bruise [you]' (ISA 53:10). Strange thought!

Th,rŠse of Lisieux describes her joy when at the age of only twenty-three she first spat blood (she had tuberculosis), an experience she looked upon as one step nearer to heaven.

God can go beyond Th,rŠse. He can find pleasure in the painful death of his Son, knowing it was one step nearer to your own glorification and a giant step toward the salvation of mankind. But does he enjoy all your crucifixions? Do you suffer all the pain while he does all the rejoicing? It is difficult to accept. The Father must also feel intense sadness. Such tragedy incapacitates the whole of Godhead to relieve the groanings of unhappy mankind.

p022 ..... My Correspondence with Jesus

I have entered a risky path. Cardinal Newman once said, 'To write theology is like dancing on the tight-rope, some hundred feet above the ground. It is hard to keep from falling, and the fall is great. The questions are so subtle; the distinction so fine, and the critical, jealous eyes so many.' The last danger does not exist in my case. This letter is addressed to you. If you read it, it will not be with a critical eye.

I will leave all these considerations. I will simply tell you what I consider my main task in life: it is to decrucify you.

Surely, this task is not given by you. You called Peter 'Satan' when he advised you not to suffer. You willed the crucifixion. I imagine you will these new crucifixions, too. They must also play a saving - or at least a useful - role.

I suspect there is a deep, perhaps hidden, meaning to your new sufferings.

Much of Beethoven's beautiful music would not have been written if he had not gone deaf. John Milton wrote ~Paradise Lost~ as a blind man. With sight, he might have been distracted and even lost sight of Paradise himself. Louis Pasteur made great discoveries after suffering a stroke.

Many of the most beautiful songs in our hymnals were written by William Cowper between spells of insanity. Some of the greatest books - like Bunyan's ~Pilgrim's Progress~ - were written or conceived in prison.

We can see a connection between suffering and greatness, much as we recoil from the idea.

Well, in the end, Peter understood you, more or less. Please understand us too. You are God and your capacity for suffering might be unlimited, whereas our capacity for looking at it without intervening is limited.

David commented, 'I have been young, and now am old; yet have I not seen the righteous man forsaken' (PSA 37:25). It was because he had not see "the" Righteous.

p023 ..... My 1st Letter to Jesus

You were forsaken when you hung on the cross. Are you forsaken on your new crosses? Do you cry out again in agony and despair?

Sometimes I feel the temptation to give you complete peace and to discuss all matters with the holy mother or with saints, as Catholics do, except that I feel sure Mary stands weeping at the foot of heavenly crosses too. As for the saints, Rachel wept when a few children were killed in Bethlehem. Do the saints not weep for the many killed in world wars, revolutions, Auschwitz, Gulags and countries ravaged by famine and disasters of all kinds?

There was a time when I considered heaven a place of supreme joy. When I contemplate your repeated crucifixions there, I realize it is a place of supreme sadness. In the end, these two notions fuse in my mind and heaven remains only a place of supremeness in all things. And you are the most supreme among supremes.

I have to come back to you.

I desire one thing: to decrucify you. How? Well, I am very tired from writing such a letter. If you have read it, you must be very tired, too. I will write to you again.

p024

My Second Letter to Jesus

Dear Jesus,

I stumble at certain verses like 'Rejoice evermore' and 'In all things give thanks.' Did St Paul really mean 'always'? How much did the Virgin Mary and Magdalene and John rejoice standing at the foot of the cross? How many Hallelujahs of thankfulness did they shout when the nails were being driven into your hands and feet? Hearing you cry, could they rejoice?

With a stretch of the imagination, I might suppose that these heroes of the faith were able to sing praises on Golgotha - assuming they understood the necessity of your redeeming sacrifice and wanted to encourage you by their expressions of joy, even if partly feigned.

In Nazi and Communist prisons I have seen Christians acting. Though deeply troubled and even doubting their own faith, they encouraged fellow-believers who passed through torture by singing to them and quoting words of promise from Scripture. But I can see it would be much harder to do this when a God-man, a completely innocent person, dies an atrocious death on a cross.

Your pain on Golgotha had been predicted; it had meaning. For this you had come into the world. You yourself decided to lay down your life for the sheep. The blood shed on the cross saved mankind.

p025 ..... My 2nd Letter to Jesus

But with your crucifixions in heaven things are different. To my knowledge there has never been a prophecy that you will have to endure endlessly. What purpose do these new Calvaries serve? Could we not get to heaven without them? Can the saved enjoy heaven when, on inquiry, an angel informs them that you do not rule, you do not sit on a throne, but you are crucified afresh, age upon age?

Will those arrayed in white robes, with palm branches in their hands, who themselves come out of great tribulation, hear the news that you are entombed awaiting your resurrection, but that meanwhile the news of the falling away of another saint means you will be crucified again ... and again ... and again?

What are the nails made of in heaven? Perhaps there is iron there. The heavenly Jerusalem has an abundance of gold. Are the nails golden?

In Hebrews chapter 6 we are only told the cause of your new crucifixion, not the purpose, as in the case of your earthly Calvary.

A Chinese student suffering for his faith in a Communist prison composed a poem:

Lord, I am afraid of my fear,
I am afraid of deserting Thee,
Lord, I am afraid of my fear -
I am afraid of not holding out clear to the end.

I have held out in prison, but I wonder if I can stand the terrible suffering of your repeated crucifixions, especially since I myself, while enlightened, have yet fallen away several times. Your death on Golgotha is a fact of ancient history, but now I am a participant.

Cosmic rays from outer space can affect us here on earth. Likewise, what happens on earth can influence heaven. We are told that the conversion of a sinner gladdens the angels, and the spiritual decay of a sinner sets in motion events in other spheres that can crucify you anew.

p026 ..... My Correspondence with Jesus

When I was in solitary confinement, in great suffering I could dance, despising the things through which I had passed. After I was freed, I danced, though I was aware that other brethren and sisters were still enduring terrible tortures. But I comforted myself with the thought that they would soon be in heaven. I had been taught to think about heaven only as a place of comfort and gladness, except for the thought expressed in Hebrews that there you are crucified afresh over and over again. This image haunts me.

How does this crucifixion take place? Does it also start with someone selling you? On earth you were granted a trial by both Caiaphas and Pilate. Does my sin simply crucify you without any sentence being passed upon you, without a court establishing first the reality of my guilt and accepting you as sin-bearer?

The Romans always flogged those who were to be crucified. Are the crucifixions in heaven preceded by floggings? I hope at least you are spared this indignity.

Do you hang on the cross alone or do some saints renounce the pleasures of heaven and share your sorrow? Do you endure only physical pain or do you again feel rejected even by the Father?

Do you utter the words, 'Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do'? If so, there exists the possibility of return even for those fallen after illumination, in spite of what the apostle says to the Hebrews. Do you cry out, 'My God, my God, why have you forsaken me'? And do you say the words again in the Aramaic language, in which ~sabachthani~, a homonym, has a double meaning and can also be translated, 'How much have you glorified me'?

Today some people talk in terms of a new black theology. (No wonder, the majority of Christians today are coloured; in fact, 40% of Anglicans are black.) Others embrace a theology of liberation. For myself, I am against anything new in theology. In Christianity, everything that needed to be said has been said already. No new revelation has intervened, and I am not open to human speculations.

But I do believe that a new dimension must be added to our theological thinking: the fact of your crucifixions in heaven. This has been revealed to us in the Bible, but has passed unmentioned. It is of the utmost importance.

Goethe said to his friend Eckermann on 4th February 1829, 'If I work indefatigably until my end, then nature is obligated to offer me another form of existence when the present one can no longer endure my spirit.' I also believe in life after death. But I shudder when I read in the Bible such expressions as 'crucified with Christ,' 'sharing the passion of Christ,' 'being buried with him.' If the Bible is literally true, can it be that these events, which have obviously not taken place during our earthly existence, will be relegated to the hereafter?

Once I baptized a Jew who was ninety-one years old. He told me he had a dream in which he saw heaven. Out of curiosity he asked an angel, 'Which is Wurmbrand's place?' But before receiving an answer, he awoke. Was the answer withheld because in heaven mine is the place of crucifixion? If so, do I strive for this, do I run to embrace it? I have fourteen years of Communist imprisonment behind me. How much more suffering will I have to bear?

Every one of us has passed through the prison of childhood, when our frame is small and weak, our powers of comprehension minimal, and all we say is treated lightly. Then comes the bondage of self imprisoned by wrong desires and stubbornness; sometimes there is the prison of bondage to evil spirits. Finally, there is the hardest prison of all - bondage to Christ. In this prison, we all undergo the torture of waiting to be holy and Christlike, while suffering the pain of frustration and failure.

In addition to the foregoing, I endured Nazi and Communist prisons. For decades, I had thought about heaven as a place of release from all these things, but now I have discovered instead that heaven is a place of suffering, too. As it is on earth, so also in heaven: a servant cannot be above his master. If you must endure suffering, so also must we.

It is written in 1 John 3:2 [1JN 3:2] that when you appear, we will be like you. Does this mean crucified in heaven like you?

I am approaching death. Bede, the first translator of the New Testament into English, when almost blind asked his amanuensis to re-read to him carefully what he had translated. He said, 'I will not have my scholars read a lie after my death.'

Neither can I allow the many who have listened to my sermons and have read my books, which have been translated into more than fifty languages, remain with the impression I have called them to a paradise that is all joy and happiness, as Mohammed describes it in the Koran.

The Bible says it is the dwelling place of a God who knows sadness, of saints like Rachel weeping about greater tragedies than she had known on earth (MTT 2:18); it is the setting of a terrible war going on for ages (the sword is not a human invention; Eden was guarded by angels with a flaming sword (GEN 3:24). Now I learn that it also has a place of crucifixion, where you suffer anew.

The thought might not be pleasant, but it is true. The injunction 'Take up the cross and follow me' refers to a very long period, much longer than our earthly life.

I try to repress a question that arises in my heart again and again, but my efforts do not succeed. I am told that even in my dreams I shout loudly, ~Maduah~ ('Why?' in Hebrew).

An American newspaper published an article entitled, 'Conversion to Hindu Faith is Torturous.' It gave the following details: 'A West German businessman has completed his conversion to the Hindu faith by piercing himself through the cheeks with a quarter-inch-thick, four-foot-long steel rod and pulling a chariot for two miles by ropes attached to his back and chest by steel hooks. ... Others walk through 20-foot-long pits of fire, don shoes with soles made of nails, or hang in the air spread-eagle from hooks embedded in their backs.'

We Christians would have told this German that all this suffering is not necessary. Salvation is easy, through faith alone. Some would have added that a few commandments have to be kept. But all the tortures are certainly senseless.

You are a Being apart. You had to endure suffering for us all. But is it really necessary for you to endure crucifixions endlessly? If we take up our cross, will we share them with you in the world to come? Then the Hindu way of salvation, so horrible to our minds, is still easier than ours.

One day, Bede's disciples read him the translation, 'It is finished.' He commented, 'Yes, it is finished,' and chanting 'Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost,' he died. I wish to finish these letters before I die. It is good for us both to have come to a mutual understanding through correspondence before actually meeting in circumstances I presume will be dramatic.

God buries his workmen but carries on his work. Therefore, I do not have to worry about what will happen after my death to the specific work of Christ that you have entrusted to me - the Christian mission to the Communist world. Neither do I have to worry about my name after I die. Whose name does not enter into oblivion sooner or later?

As for my corpse, what of it? Wycliffe's bones were dug up and burned into ashes forty-four years after his death. Then the ashes were thrown into the River Swift, whose waters carried them into the Avon, which feeds into the Severn, which empties into the ocean, which circles the globe.

My corpse will not have even this honour.

But it is about the future that I am really concerned. What kind of heaven awaits me? What kind of heaven awaits those converted under my ministry?

Since gaining my freedom, I have had many occasions to speak in churches. Once, after describing the humiliation and torture Christians are subjected to in Communist prisons, I spoke about heaven and asked, 'Would you come with me to paradise?' A lady answered loudly, 'No - in any case not your way, because it implies too much suffering.'

The renowned Swiss Protestant theologian Karl Barth said in a lecture, 'When the angels sing for God, they sing Bach; when they sing for pleasure, they sing Mozart, and God eavesdrops.' Mozart wrote an unfinished Requiem, the story of which may have a deeper significance than appears on the surface. Perhaps this Requiem is unfinished because it is for an infinite Being whose death never ends.

Experience is the one perch no one can be knocked off. Perhaps some of the information God obtains about our ordeal is distorted. Perhaps he sometimes descends to earth himself, as in the case of Sodom and Gomorrah (GEN 18:21), to ensure that what is reported to him is correct. The rumours about their wickedness might have seemed exaggerated.

Reports and theories constructed on them often crack, like plastic wrapping; experience has the resonance of solid oak. Knowing this, you might have chosen to suffer with us all the way, for as long as we suffer. The best throne on which to rule over a crucified race is a cross. Then you appreciate all the sufferings mankind endures.

p031 ..... My 2nd Letter to Jesus

Perhaps you believe in our free will, though Luther, Spinoza and Einstein did not. But you are not a Lutheran. You consider us responsible for our sins. Bernard de Clairvaux said, 'Remove free will and there will be nothing to save; remove grace and there will be nothing to save with.' You believe that we often sin wilfully, that even our ignorance is wilful (2PE 3:5), and therefore punishable.

After the crucifixion on Calvary, many continued in rebellion. Some were enlightened, but even these sometimes fell away. Then you took upon yourself new crucifixions and the indignity of being put to shame again.

The best explanation for a man's action is found in the atmosphere in which he lives. In heaven, a place of supreme love, your reaction to an offence against you is to take upon yourself suffering for the offender. Do you hope that these new crucifixions will do what you yourself declare to be impossible - bring the once-enlightened but lapsed Christian to repentance?

I dreamt one night I was in an Orthodox church, where the priest had prostrated himself according to their ritual. I prostrated myself to the earth, too, and felt the sins of the whole congregation burdening me.

I imagine it is not easy for you to read such a letter in the state in which you are. Neither is it easy for me to write it. So I leave you for now. I will write again.

p032

My Third Letter to Jesus

Dear Jesus,

Only now do I realize that I have written to you twice without first introducing myself.

You might say it is not necessary to do so when you address a God. He knows everything.

I am not convinced that it is superfluous to introduce oneself to you. The Bible is surely true, and it says in various places that you forget some things, remember others and appreciate it when you are reminded of still others.

Unlikely as it may seem, there are some men, among them even individuals who have been very active in church life, whom you, though omniscient, have never known.

You once taught that on the Day of Judgement many will say to you, 'Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy name, and in thy name cast out devils, and in thy name done many wonderful works?' And then you will profess unto them, 'I never knew you; depart from me, ye that work iniquity' (MTT 7:22,23). So you are a God who does not know and has never known many of his creatures.

I do not wonder about it. If we are created after God's image and in your likeness, he must have a subconscious as well as a conscious. Therefore, you sometimes called the Father a power (MTT 26:64), like instinct and the unconscious complexes, and at other times a person, the heavenly Father. You called the Holy Spirit a power, but also described him as a person. If God has neither instincts nor a subconscious but only reason, then we were not created after his image.

God knows those he created and has led consciously but might not know what emanates from his subconscious, just as we do not know the persons of the unremembered dream life.

And so my name is Richard Wurmbrand, and I was born on 24th March 1909, in Bucharest, Romania. Now you will not be able to tell me on the last judgment that you had not known me. I have introduced myself to you.

I will not tell you the many works I did for you. This was the mistake of those you rejected. I am simply a grievous sinner who has believed in your grace. I also believed that, having been washed in your blood, I would enjoy heaven with you for all eternity. But now I have grave doubts. I am deeply troubled because I have stumbled on a Bible verse that says you suffer many crucifixions in heaven, which makes me think that heaven is not at all a place of enjoyment (HEB 6:4-6).

Probably the best thing for me to do is to fulfill the most mystical exhortation every written: 'Be still, and know that I am God' (PSA 46:10). One does not put questions to God. We are not to write him letters or trouble him, but only to kneel quietly in adoration. However, I am far from perfect. Please do not expect me to have perfect attitudes.

I am a pastor. Close association with the clergy causes many people to become anti-clerical. I have been acquainted with pastors more than most; I am very well acquainted with one pastor - myself.

I believe that pastors, even the best ones, are less qualified than one might think for a life of perfection.

p034 ..... My Correspondence with Jesus

Wesley delivered some 40,000 sermons and travelled 250,000 miles on horseback to accomplish this. The end result today is empty Methodist churches. Luther and Calvin tried to reform Christendom. Later, others tried to reform the new institutions that had arisen, until today we find ourselves in a chaos of sectarian confusion. Vatican Council II will succeed as little as King Josiah of Judah's thorough purge of all religious practices.

Josiah destroyed all idolatrous altars and the renegade priests, but 'the Lord turned not from the fierceness of his great wrath wherewith his anger was kindled against Judah' 2KI 23:26). It was because the changes were only external. Under Josiah's successor, three months were sufficient for the complete return of heathendom.

If only Wesley had ridden less and Luther preached less!

If they had been still and silent, the work of the Lord would have prospered. I know it to be so, but I am like them. I can restrain myself from outward activity only with great difficulty. Much of my outward activity may serve to suppress my Jewishness, which is a difficult burden to bear. Please bear with me, listen and reply.

What is heaven like? I know it is a storehouse of blessings, but Augustine said, 'God asks our leave to bless us.' Not many give him permission, but those who do bring him much fruit. They have what the Catholics call supererogatory works, that is, they have done many more holy works than would normally be expected even of a saint. God might have the problem of the rich man of your parable: 'I have no room in which to put my fruit' (LUK 12:17). Your Father might wish to apply the merits of the saints to others, but those keen to have them are rare. An overabundance of blessings in heaven is not desirable. It might produce a crisis like the overabundance of riches in America.

I have followed the advice of a sculptor who carved your likeness in a great statue. People admired it from different angles, but the artist said, 'If you want to see it in its right proportion, you should kneel.' I knelt in the hope I would see a serene heaven. After years spent in a prayerful posture, I still see a heaven full of complicated problems.

Among them, the greatest concerns the crosses on which you are crucified again and again. The New Testament never uses the noun 'resurrection' about anyone but you. Jairus' daughter, the young man in Nain and Lazarus were all brought back to life and had to die again. You, on the contrary, were resurrected and ascended to heaven.

Your resurrection was an event apart, for time and eternity - but what about this crucifixion in heaven? Or do you not die on your heavenly cross? Do you just suffer on it endlessly, with every sin committed by an enlightened Christian being an additional wound? Or was this being 'crucified afresh' about which the author of the epistles to the Hebrews writes just a psychological experience, a figure of speech, not a physical reality in your glorified body?

I am confused. Every question is a hindrance to obtaining an answer.

There is an old Muslim legend about a man who was stripped to the bone by robbers. He was asked, 'Why did you not defend yourself?' He replied, 'I could not because I had a dagger in one hand and a pistol in the other.'

There is a deep sense to this story that does not appear mystical on the surface. We have too many questions and therefore cannot receive light in our minds. We have so many arguments that we cannot be right. We cannot have happiness because the search for it is too intense. America could not defeat Vietnam because the USA had too many weapons, including the ultimate. Our reason is too well armed and therefore cannot fathom your depths.

If I allow the dagger and the pistol to fall from my hands, if I abandon reasoning and follow the invitation given by Isaiah, 'Look unto me, and be ye saved' (ISA 45:22), I begin to see that heaven could not be without a crucifixion.

The French writer Rabelais said, 'I am prepared to stand for my conviction up to but excluding death.'

In heaven you represent eternal truth, not only on the basis of your passion on Golgotha, but also your readiness to be involved in new sufferings. On this earth, sufferers for your name have repeatedly exposed their lives for you in prisons and under persecution. In heaven, you must sustain truth even if it means being crucified afresh. Your new crucifixions are the guarantee that you hold eternal truth.

Therefore, St Paul hinted that something was lacking in the earthly afflictions of Christ on the cross (COL 1:24). It is only in heaven that you represent the real sacrifice. On Golgotha you yielded up the vile body of a Man of Sorrows who took upon himself the sin and sickness of mankind. Some of the church fathers say that you were very ugly, yes, even a leper. No wonder! You were the Messiah 'wounded for our transgressions and bruised for our iniquities' (ISA 53:5). But in heaven you yield to crucifixion the glorified body of the Son who was intended to sit on his Father's throne.

How could such a sacrifice not be efficacious? How should truth supported by such a sacrifice not persuade and convict?

I begin to realize that this being crucified afresh is absolutely necessary, just like the sacrifice on Golgotha, and that we have to resign ourselves to it as the Virgin Mary and Magdalene and John resigned themselves to what happened on Good Friday. They had a Saviour but one who could not be of any immediate help.

He could not caress children, not wipe away tears; he could not heal, nor feed the hungry. His hands and feet were immobilised by the nails that pierced them. He could bring a thief into the kingdom, but no more. He had no power for lengthy and convincing sermons. He died and then became a corpse which others had to handle, wash, wrap and bury.

It seems that Bonhoeffer was right when he said in one of his prison poems that we are involved not so much with a Saviour to whom we can appeal in our needs, but one whose sufferings we have to share.

Five billion men live in the world today. After thirty years it will be 7 billion, unless nuclear weapons, which are already sufficient in number to kill every living man twelve times over, are put to use. Every day there are 180,000 more individuals to be fed, educated, instructed in spiritual matters, healed. Proportionally, the number of those who can meet such needs daily become less. Hundreds of millions go hungry, and their number will only increase. The rulers of mankind cannot solve this problem. To put a man on the moon or to construct bigger and better bombs has priority over famine.

They have not known the poverty of your childhood, nor the hunger and thirst and oppression of your adulthood.

It might just be chance, but I have never met a church leader deeply concerned about the fact that every day there are 180,000 more souls to be saved, that Communist tyranny closes churches in Communist countries, and that even more churches are closed in Britain by Christian apathy.

Your Father has given us a beautiful world with a natural abundance that we could have subdued and utilised to provide for all our needs. But in nature there is not one animal species that preys on its own. Man is the only exception.

Since Cain killed Abel, the envy, greed, exploitation and murder have continued. In the words of Shakespeare, > (man's) ... offence is rank, it smells to heaven;

> It hath the primal eldest curse upon 't,
> A brother's murder. (~Hamlet~)

Einstein once remarked, 'I do not know with what weapons World War III will be fought, but World War IV will be fought with clubs and stones.' We desperately need an active Saviour, a Prince of Peace who will really rule.

We cannot afford the luxury of having a Saviour crucified even in heaven. Our most urgent task is to decrucify you, however important your cross might be.

I suppose if I had lived in Palestine 2,000 years ago I would have done what the prince of Saxony did to Martin Luther. Since Luther had boldly challenged the powers of the Inquisition, the prince had him kidnapped and kept forcibly in the Wartburg castle to save him from death. I too would have organized a group to take you in spite of yourself to a place where you would have been safe. Such a friend must not risk death, even if Isaiah did foretell it and he himself desires to sacrifice his life.

The secret Orthodox magazine "Nadezhda," which had been published in the USSR by Zoia Krahmalnikova (afterwards jailed for this 'crime'), tells the story of the conversion to Christianity of the Koriaks, a primitive tribe on the Kamtchatka peninsula in Siberia.

The priest Nestor opened the first church. The queen of the Koriaks, who had opposed the new faith violently, attended the inauguration. Among the Russians attending, Father Nestor was the only man who knew the Koriak language.

During the liturgy, as he walked through the church with the censer filling it with the smoke of incense, the queen began to shout. With clenched fists, she threw herself toward the ikon of the Crucified, before whom stood the Virgin and St John. Suddenly aware of what was taking place, the priest interrupted the service

p039 ..... My 3rd Letter to Jesus to quiet the congregation, in which there were many Russian sailors.

'Silence!' he commanded. 'Here a work of God is going on. I will explain later.'

The Koriak queen continued to shout, 'What have you done? Why do you torture him? Take him down immediately.' She had seen him living.

Father Nestor had to explain that these two, his mother and a beloved disciple, were not at all guilty but sympathized with him.

The queen had had a natural reaction. She had not wanted him to suffer.

Peter once had a similar reaction and you called him 'Satan.' Later he tried to defend you against arrest with his sword. Again you chided him. You wanted to die, and you took pains to assure the disciples that after death a glorious resurrection would follow.

But did you know then that you would be crucified again after your resurrection? Would you have objected to Peter's attitude if you had known?

It is not simply that I love you. Your lover could allow you to be martyred if he realized that this is your strongest desire. But I repeat, mankind cannot afford this luxury anymore. Wars and famines in times past were trifles compared with modern holocausts. And though men might have had false religions, at least they believed in a Creator, which is less and less the case in the most civilized countries today. We need not only a living but a fulltime Saviour.

The Jews of 2,000 years ago could not accept the idea of a crucified Messiah. Only a short time was needed to prove how wrong they were. This Messiah was resurrected, and millions all over the world have believed in God and have found peace of mind because of your death.

But must we rely on a Saviour who is crucified again and again? Which Bible verse compels us to do this? And do you not believe that even the prolonged suffering of the greatest saints has a limit?

We can rationalise the terrible drama in heaven. I fear that by the end of this book I will find some rationalisation myself, but I know that man's reason – the 'beast' as Luther called it – is little more than the servant of his desire. We all want to escape nagging problems, so we find reasons for the most unreasonable things.

You are the only one who can save mankind. Since you cannot do so while eternally nailed to a cross, you must be decrucified. I have decided to undertake the task, with or without your consent.

When I had a heart attack, my son said, 'We must get him to the hospital right away.'

I said, 'No.'

He rejoined, 'You are not in any condition to make any decisions.'

I was transported to the hospital.

I do not believe that even a Saviour crucified again and again by human sin for 2,000 years can be allowed to make decisions independently. Your love and compassion are so great that you would continue to suffer endlessly in the hope that sinners might obtain eternal life in the hereafter.

They need a new kind of life now, materially and spiritually. A kingdom now – this is what the Jews expected from the Messiah two millennia ago. I do not agree with them. I understand why you desired to suffer and die, but enough is enough.

The bride says not only 'I am his' but also 'He is mine' (SOS 2:16). I have to say something, too. Not only do you possess me; I possess you, as well.

Christians are usually satisfied with knowing you, the one. Eddington observed, 'We often think that when we have completed our study of "one" we know all about "two," because "two" is "one and one." It is not so. Two being "one and one," the knowledge of the "one" is not sufficient to understand it; we also have to understand the word "and."'

p041 ..... My 3rd Letter to Jesus

We know you in some measure; likewise, we know ourselves. The 'and,' the connection between us two, remains to be investigated. We give you all honour and praise for your readiness to suffer without limit. You will probably say, 'All honour and praise to those who wish to decrucify me.' We will have to find the missing link between these two attitudes.

I will write about this next time. I know there is little time. But a decrucifixion, to be successful, presupposes planning. I will take only the shortest possible time for reflection. You will hear from me soon.

p042 ..... My Correspondence With Jesus

Dear Jesus,

Dostoievsky wrote, 'Man needs the unfathomable and the infinite just as much as he needs the small planet which he inhabits.' I can prove this. I have plenty of trouble on earth, but I cannot remain quiet knowing that somewhere else very far away, the Son of God is crucified afresh.

I need not only daily bread and health; I also need your decrucifixion.

This task is not comprehended in the covenant you established with us through your blood. But if I limited myself to what I owe you according to the Bible, I would judge like Portia, who told Shylock when he asked for the pound of flesh owed by his creditor:

> Tarry a little, there is one thing more -
> This bond does not give thee one jot of blood,
> The words expressly are 'a pound of flesh':
> Take then thy bond, take thou thy pound of flesh,
> But if in the cutting it, thou dost shed
> One drop of Christian blood, thy lands and goods
> Are (by the laws of Venice) confiscated > Unto the state of Venice.

I owe you more than you ever asked or expected of me. I owe you more than what I understood at my conversion. But I have not sought an object of love in vain; I found in you my heart's desire. Wherever I look, I see you, and I see you crucified and in pain.

As light belongs to the flame, so you belong to me. Between us there can be no bargaining about obligations. Your happiness is my only happiness. I am sure you would be much happier reigning steadfastly over mankind than suffering again and again on a cross.

I should think heaven would be the one place whose air is too pure for any sufferer to breathe. In heaven there should be no death penalty nor even vicarious death. Heaven is your dwelling place. It is imperative that your suffering cease.

The event on Golgotha, a hill where the innocent Son of God died after crying out, 'My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?' was already stranger than any man of any religion could ever imagine. But a Son of God crucified in heaven is stranger by far. That goes beyond the limit. Here faith comes to the end of its tether.

The farthest the telescope can reach out into the universe is ten billion light years. Your place of fresh crucifixions might be further still, but the cry from there has reached me and pierced my heart. It is too much.

For thirty-four years you were a man of sorrows on this earth. I say thirty-four, not thirty-three. The Chinese calculate the age of man from the moment of his begetting. This is what the Bible teaches, too. Therefore your genealogy in Matthew says: 'Abraham begat Isaac, and Isaac begat Jacob,' instead of 'Sarah gave birth to Isaac, and Rebekkah to Jacob.' The child exists from the moment of procreation.

If John the Baptist leaped for joy in his mother's womb, you probably felt the pain of sinners from the time you were an embryo.

I have suffered since before I was born. My father was far off in another country when I first saw the light of day. My mother told me that as a baby I cried the whole time. So I did during my whole childhood, with or without a cause.

About St Sergius, called 'the Protector of Russia,' it is said that he cried so loudly while in his mother's womb during a church service that everyone heard.

Catherine of Siena said, 'There are moments when silence could accomplish anything.' Unfortunately, no one taught me this. How much energy for good I would have gathered as a child and a young person if I had not cried and later expressed rebellious thoughts! If only I had been silent!

You kept silent, but you suffered for thirty-four years. You had an exemplary mother, whose custom was to say to God, 'Be it unto me according to ~thy~ word,' when all around her lived by the motto, 'But it unto me according to "my" word.' How much your mother must have suffered because she was different from others.

People said about St Luitgard of Wittichen, 'She has the devil in her. She is a deceiver and a heretic.' They said the same things about St Joan of Arc and many others. Perhaps Mary was often mocked, too. But she would not have trembled; she would have kept her peace, and her joy.

She knew she had an assignment from God and did not allow herself to be disturbed by what others said. Archimedes, the Greek mathematician, would not allow himself to be upset, not even when the Romans entered Syracuse. His only concern was, '~Noli turbare circulos meos~ - Do not touch my circles.'

Mary had been given the assignment from God to spread in this world the fragrance of heavenly roses and the beauty of heavenly violets. She remained quiet.

But your heart must have gone out to her, as you suffered for all sufferers.

In your childhood you surely knew about Herod and the children he had killed. When you visualized him in your imagination, you saw the shadow of death at his side and his blood-stained hands. He needed your crucifixion in order to be saved.

p045 ..... My 4th Letter to Jesus

You grew in stature and wisdom. You knew many sinners for whose trespasses you would have to atone. You would also have to atone for the goodness of saints.

Israel must have had many saints from whom no one ever heard an angry word, who were always patient, whatever evil befell them, who developed cheerfulness and equanimity under all circumstances. But goodness extended even to tyrants and religious charlatans usually results in cruelty to their victims. Such passivity makes crime and exploitation possible. And so saints need redemption as much as despots.

You were always humble. You asked John the Baptist to baptize you, and you washed the feet of the apostles, including Judas Iscariot. You maintained your purity though doubtless many girls loved you passionately because of your love and kindness. Perhaps you loved one, too.

Then came Golgotha. My beloved, you have suffered so much. Was all this not enough? You said about your crucifixion on earth, 'It must be so.' Is there a 'must' attached also to your heavenly sorrow? Is there no other option?

On earth there was not only a flogged and crucified man; there were also floggers and crucifiers, the henchmen. Without their complicity the whole event could not have taken place. If as a result of our sins you are crucified afresh now that you are in heaven, paradise must contain not only noble martyrs but also cruel torturers, just like the garden of Eden, which was inhabited not only by the innocent pair but also by the evil serpent.

But how can there be crucifiers in heaven? Nazism, Communism and other similar regimes in the past have proved that it is enough to create hell; there will be no lack of devils to people it. Create a totalitarian regime, and it will have its butchers. But how can heaven produce them? Do they appear whatever the external environment?

I know I have put questions that no one has asked you before. Long before I wrote them down, I had them in my mind. They have troubled me for many years in solitary confinement. But I understand why you do not answer.

I write, as I already said in my first letter, with the supposition that you do read. Even if this is true, the fact that I receive no answer is understandable.

A Swiss professor held a seminar in Japan and, as is customary, put questions to the students. No one answered. Taken aback, he asked why and was told that Japanese students take every question as a subject of prolonged meditation. A question that can be answered immediately is considered less than serious; so is the questioner.

Your own nature and your life is so deep that perhaps you yourself cannot fathom it. Therefore you said, 'No man knows the Son, save the Father' (MTT 11:27). It may take an eternity for an infinite Being to know himself fully. Perhaps you meditate on my questions.

The Dakota Indians consider it impolite to answer a question because by doing so they would show themselves superior in knowledge to the questioner. Since you are humble, it may be that you do not wish to assert any superiority over me. Perhaps this is the reason for your silence.

But we do not dwell in the sphere of philosophy, and it is difficult to wait for answers.

Your pain must be terrible, but it is far away from our experience. I know what ours is.

I have just read the account of a Lithuanian lady who was deported to Siberia with her three children, ages three, five and seven, only because she is Lithuanian and the Soviets want to Russify her country. Unable to bear the hunger any longer, she threw herself and her children into a river. Meanwhile, in Britain charitable organizations like Oxfam and Christian Aid contributed about 64p per person a year compared with œ24 per person spent on tobacco.

p047 ..... My 4th Letter to Jesus

We need an immediate Saviour. You must be decrucified. There is no alternative.

You are God, but you yourself taught that God is not the only reality. You said there is also an enemy who sows tares among the wheat. It is perhaps not at all the will of your Father that you should be crucified afresh for the sins of the enlightened. Perhaps the Father has established a paradise only with good things in it and that your new crucifixions are from the devil, unlike the crucifixion on Golgotha, which was in God's plan.

Peter was called 'Satan' because he opposed your death as ordained by the Father. I am not at all in the same situation. I am against these new pains of yours because they are provoked by the devil.

The circumstances of my life are maddening. Perhaps all my reasoning is mad. Perhaps I have misunderstood everything.

It is written that you spoke with many parables, and you never spoke without a parable (MRK 4:33,34). Paul might have learned this manner of speech from you. He might have abhorred cool, academic objective speaking about matters that involve suffering. Loving the sufferer, one might fantasise his pain in extreme magnitude in order to communicate it to others and evoke their sympathy and love.

Can it be that in Hebrews chapter 6 Paul only desired to show the great disturbance produced by the sins of those once enlightened regarding the moral order of the universe and how great a crime they are against love and righteousness?

Since you, the Son of God, stand for everything that is good, beautiful, and lovable in the world, then every trespass against the light is like crucifying you afresh. Perhaps, after all, these words do not have a literal sense.

The words might have an altogether different meaning.

I was in the same prison cell with Christian Florea. Paralysed because of the many beatings he had received, he could move only his neck. We had no water to wash him, no sheets to change his bed (a slatted bunk with a dirty pallet). He lay in his dirt, immobilised, and shone for joy in the Lord. When we took Holy Communion in the cell, we found his breast to be the most suitable altar on which to place the bread we had saved and the wine a sympathetic guard had smuggled in. After Communion, we asked him to say a word.

He had had no theological training. In fact, he must not have had more than a few primary classes. But he shared with us these profound sentiments: 'At every Communion we pronounce the words "This is my body." What body of Christ do we mean? Jesus is a being apart: one person with two natures, perfect God and perfect man. He is also the only being with two bodies: that of a Jewish carpenter of 2,000 years ago, who was crucified, resurrected, and now sits on God's throne; and another body, his church. We are as much his body as the one that walked through the villages of Palestine. We are flesh of his flesh and bone of his bone.

'Now, when we say, "This is my body broken for you," which body do we mean? Surely the body broken on Golgotha, but also his church which in every generation has given thousands of martyrs. Their bodies broken and their blood shed are also the body and blood of Christ. He is bodily in prison wherever a Christian is in prison.'

What Florea said was certainly true, but the conclusion is that when the sin of a brother hurts me, like the piercing of the heart with a dagger, it is - poetically speaking - permissible to say that your body suffers again the pain of crucifixion on Golgotha.

I don't believe we can really differentiate between you and us, your church. We are one. When Paul writes that sinners crucify to themselves the Son of God afresh, he probably means the crucifixion of your martyrs and of all those who suffer the pangs of death when they see or hear something evil. Not only the historical Jesus but also the saints are the Son of God since they are the body of Christ.

p049 ..... My 4th Letter to Jesus

So it is ourselves that we have to decrucify, which means we have to free the church from a despised, rejected situation and make it triumphant. We have to hasten your coming, when the church will be victorious.

There are laboratories that contain the cultures of micro-organisms for the purpose of experimentations. We in our turn belong to a micro-world for angels. They both learn from us and teach us. For them we are a laboratory. All my contradictory thoughts, which I have shared with you, have brought me to this conclusion.

It is written that the 'acts of Ahaziah which he did, are they not written in the book of the chronicles of the kings of Israel?' (2KI 1:18). Why is this simple statement put in the form of a question? It is to make us realize a dilemma is before us. The life of Ahaziah exists, and the chronicle that recounts it exists. Which came first? The whole Bible is witness to the belief that all our thoughts and deeds, yes, our whole lives were written before. 'In thy book all my members were written, which in continuance were fashioned, when as yet there was none of them' (PSA 139:16). 'Whom he did foreknow, he also did predestinate' (ROM 8:29).

For reasons known only to you, in my heart you raised a tempest, you brought me near to agony thinking about your being crucified in heaven, until you calmed me: you are glorious in paradise. It is your church which is crucified afresh in every century. Saints 'fill up that which is behind' of your afflictions in their flesh for your 'body's sake, which is the church' (COL 1:24).

So my next letter will be about how to decrucify your church.

Until then, good morning, my Beloved.

p050

My Fifth Letter to Jesus

Dear Jesus,

Some time has passed since I last wrote to you. The time was first spent in thinking about how to decrucify your church, which is the prolongation of your incarnation and in which you suffer crucifixion again. This is what I have learned about the church from Scripture.

But then I looked around, and somehow I could not find much of a church to be decrucified.

In the free world, there are millions of Christians who enjoy Christianity as people enjoy the other amenities of life. Some churches have evening dances, potluck dinners, social parties. They discuss whether women should be ordained, as if you never said long ago that we are a people of kings and priests, which means that every female believer is already a priestess and needs nobody's ordination. They debate the theology of liberation, the literal or general inspiration of the Bible, the rights of homosexuals, the permissibility of providing terrorists with church funds. All of these are discussions that crucified men cannot engage in.

What offends me most in these debates is the clarity of the arguments adduced by both sides. But purity of heart is not bought with the coin of clarity in philosophical and theological systems.

p051 ..... My 5th Letter to Jesus

The pure in heart live on earth for heaven. The brides prepare themselves for the encounter with the Bridegroom. His last judgement will not be an examination in dogma, but only a question about love, which does not think systematically.

I once spoke to a pastor of the Soviet underground church, who had suffered much. He had never studied theology. I was with him for only two days, during which time I had to teach him everything I could. Among other things, I shared with him the tenets of systematic theology. He listened without understanding and finally asked, 'Did those who constructed the system ever bear heavy crosses, as Jesus commanded us? No one carrying a heavy burden with the prospect of imminent death nor anyone nailed to a cross can think systematically. Even Jesus thought unsystematically on the cross. In his seven words on Golgotha, he jumped from one subject to another. Systematic theology is the product of men who are not cross-bearers and therefore it is valueless.' I could not make him listen further.

His observation could apply to much of what is preached and debated in churches of the free world today.

There are some in these churches who sincerely confess their shame and failure. They regret the fact that they have hurt and disappointed and failed people who had hoped in them. The words are prescribed in the missal and the ~Book of Common Prayer~. But they confess their sins in such a nice, orderly manner, without even creasing their face muscles. They may suffer for their sins, but the suffering does not amount to a crucifixion. Therefore they do not need a decrucifixion.

Then there are other Christians, those persecuted in Muslim, Communist and animist parts of the world, who can be classified in two groups.

In some lands, but especially in European Communist countries, the fashion has arisen among Christians, as among political dissidents, to grumble and protest publicly about any perceived injustice, great or small. Through my hands have passed thousands of pages of petitions to their own governments, to the United Nations, to the World Council of Churches - and the list could go on - about such grievances as house searches, confiscation of religious books and fines they are forced to pay. True, they also complain about the killing of believers, but their main concerns are personal. There are many such Christians.

I am reminded of the story of two men who were walking home together in bad weather. They had a long way to go, and the blizzard was fierce, blowing snow and sleet in their faces and chilling them to the bone. One mumbled continually, 'It is terrible! I cannot bear it any more. Nobody could imagine anything worse than this.' His companion replied, 'I can. Just fancy walking in such weather with a complaining friend.'

Then there are other Christians who are crucified indeed. They suffer intensely, even unto death, for their beliefs. They take up their cross willingly, understanding its meaning. They bear their sorrows with serenity and patience. There are some who bear the pangs of crucifixion, but while the body may ache, the spirit seemingly feels nothing. As a mother ignores her own pain if her child is suffering, so these transcend their own horrible suffering in the fellowship of your passion. Their speech is not about the wounds they have, but about yours.

The Orthodox make the sign of the cross with three fingers. I saw them when they were subjected to atrocities in Communist prisons; some of them passed spontaneously to signing themselves with all five fingers, as the Catholics do, in remembrance of the five wounds you had when crucified, one at each hand and foot and one in the breast.

And it is not simply that these believers are crucified. Such a fate can befall a criminal too. But they are kind and forgiving to their torturers, praying for them as you have done. They are blind to their faults, as you have been.

You knew long before Calvary the ugly role Pilate and Caiaphas would play in your death; you knew the Roman soldiers would drive nails into your body. Now, everyone in Palestine criticized them all for their exploitation and oppression, but you were the only one who never had a bad word to say about them.

Such modern saints have to be decrucified. Many have died already, and for them it is too late. But all your true followers under Islam, Communism and animism are in grave danger. The task is monumental.

The first difficulty is one you already mentioned 2,000 years ago: the job is formidable, but the labourers are few. Most of those we count on are greedy for the things of this world. They never have enough.

A girl was reproached by her mother: 'I left two cakes in the cupboard yesterday. Now I find only one. How come?'

The child replied, 'I must have overlooked it in the dark. Otherwise I would have eaten it, too.'

Even Christians rarely refuse some pleasure that offers itself.

Rare are the believers who, like a seismograph, register the slightest quaking of another's soul and are ready to jump to his aid. They are so insensitive they would not register even the pain of the Son of God.

But enough about others. Cato said wryly, 'I can pardon everybody's mistakes except my own.' If there are not many labourers, the work has to be done by a few. And if I am the only one who thinks in terms of decrucifying the saints, I must not worry about others' neglect of duty while I fail to reproach myself for not doing ~my~ best.

'Well,' - I say to myself - 'I can't perform miracles. I can't turn the world upside down all by myself.' But then

I think 'How is it I can't do wonders? The first disciples could. I have the same Spirit they had. The Lord has promised he will be with us always and will enable us to do even greater works than he himself has done.' I have no excuse. I must decrucify your church, your body, through which you continue to bear crucifixion, though you are already in heaven.

I hear the voice of the Tempter: 'It is good that you demand great tasks. There is no greater one than to be a saint. So be one - cheerful like Francis when it is hard to be cheery, patient when it is hard to be patient, aggressive when you want to be still, silent when you want to talk, pleasant when you feel disagreeable, optimistic when you are down. The kingdom of heaven is within you. Don't look at what is happening to others. In this world, you are pilgrims and strangers. Those who pass through tribulation here will be comforted in heaven.'

'Get thee behind me, Satan,' I haste to reply. 'I refuse this consolation. If I prefer Rachel among the mothers of Israel, it is because, when she saw the slaughter of children in Bethlehem, "she would not be comforted" (MTT 2:18). Comfort is the worst enemy when one is passing through a catastrophic experience. Rachel wanted the innocents restored to life. We also should never be content just to say nice words to those who mourn. The cause of the weeping should be eliminated. Jesus might have said that we must bear our cross daily and accept sorrow as our lot. And this is all right, as far as I am concerned. But the church has suffered enough. I have to decrucify her.'

In the other world I will live eternally. Through this world I pass but once. If I am to accomplish anything, it must be now. And the maximum of kindness is not to sympathize with sufferers, but to stop the suffering. If I cannot do this, life for me is not worth living.

Pessimists always see the worst in life; cynics find disappointment on every hand. Those who live on the edge of a cliff, like me, are chronically tense. Jesus, I do not ask you for relief from tension, but rather its exacerbation until I achieve my goal.

A pastor was asked, 'Is it lawful for a Christian to smoke?'

He answered, 'It is altogether wrong for a Christian to smoke; he must be on fire.'

Lord, it is my desire to be, not simply a burning log in the fireplace, however warm and pleasant, but a flaming torch in your hand.

You once said, 'I have come to send a fire on earth, and how I wish it would burn (LUK 12:49). You meant a fire brought from other realms where even our suns are looked upon as dwarfs. All the evil should be burned; it has reigned enough. If am counted among the evil, I will burn too. But your bride, the elect saints, should be set free, should be decrucified.

Jesus, you have given me a mind and a will to think about nothing less than this. But you have not yet shown me the way to reach this goal of mine. Is it sufficient for me to repeat endlessly, 'Thy kingdom come,' without making it come? When I add, 'Give us ~this day~ our daily bread,' you might answer, 'Why "this day" for your demands, and why do you show so much patience regarding the advent of my kingdom?'

I write to you in despair of my cause. Before addressing you, I tried to speak to many others but had only disappointments, bitter ones.

I once heard about a postman who, while delivering letters to everyone else, never received one himself. His great longing was for someone to write to him. After many years, he received a letter. It informed him that he was being made redundant.

An actor who suffered great heaviness of heart went to share it with pastors, with psychiatrists, with acquaintances. On meeting him, they all congratulated him for his roles and asked for free tickets to the theatre. He could speak to no one. I can never speak to anyone about what torments me. Instead, people have the idea, for some reason, that I can give them advice. This is why I am writing to you.

How can I accomplish my task all by myself? You said that where two or three are gathered together, you are among them. But I was kept for years in solitary confinement. I was absolutely alone, without another for communion or fellowship. So you could not be with me if your minimum is two. I imagined your presence, I even experienced it, but it was all subjective. I knew the whole time that you do not share your fellowship with the solitary. I do not understand why some Christians of past eras chose to become hermits.

Now, while I embark on this enterprise, I will again be alone – alone in the absolute sense of the word. You are crucified one way or the other, either in your own person in heaven where you sojourn, or in the church whose suffering you share and whom therefore you are unable to succour properly.

But since you have given me relief in so many other things, you will give it to me again. You will help me live without anyone else, without the church, and without you, panting for you, burning for you, loving your church, and having one desire only – to decrucify you.

When you went to Calvary, the apostles forsook you and fled. When you died on Golgotha, you were almost alone. Yet Joseph of Arimathea, who till that time had managed without you, took you down from the cross and cared for your poor body, without any assistance from God, angels, or the church. So it will happen again.

I have not the slightest idea how to start so great a work. I am already on my fifth letter. The previous ones have remained without reply. There is no one to counsel me. The only thing I know is that doing little things well is a step towards doing big things.

So I have decided to begin with decrucifying little beings who suffer. Perhaps this will eventually give me some idea of how to get to the point of decrucifying you.

There are so many unhappy beings around me. It is not that they are unhappy only on occasion. There are some who have never known a sunbeam. The Orthodox monk Michael Ershov was in Soviet prisons for forty years. I have known Indians and Africans who as children never had a toy or a piece of candy; they received no schooling and never had enough to eat all their lives. I have known men who were never loved, not even by their own mothers. They find no solace in their religion, for even that is only sadness. They bow before a statue of the goddess Kali, garlanded with the skulls of men. She speaks no word of comfort to their longing hearts.

And so I will practise decrucifixion on these to prepare myself for the great adventure of decrucifying you.

I shudder because of the terrible decision I have made. It is as if someone tried to help you by removing a nail from one of your hands while you hung on the cross. While relieving the pain of one hand, he would have made your situation worse, because your weight would now be suspended from a single nail. I do not believe in partial decrucifixions.

But it seems I have to pay my dues to what remains in me of human nature. As Christians we are partakers of the Divine nature. But still, the words spoken by Diogenes to Plato apply to us: 'I see the lion, but not the lion's characteristics.'

Without these, I can decrucify you only partially.

Perhaps your decrucifixion, the one noble task for which life is worth living, is a problem without a solution, like the squaring of a circle or perpetual motion. All that has been written about Christianity in the past fails to satisfy me. We seem to share the problem of youth down through the ages. We turn our back on the past and start from scratch, unwilling to build on the learned wisdom of previous generations.

p058 ..... My Correspondence With Jesus

Unlike Olympian runners, who pass on the flaming torch from one to another till the targeted site is reached, we begin our marathons alone and stumble along, learning as we go, falling and rising again, till finally we collapse, always short of the goal. Our children will do the same, in spite of our cautions. They too will start from square one.

And so we turn our back on theologians and philosophers. None has the answer, and your body remains crucified.

Should I begin with little tasks? What else can I do?

This is my fifth letter. Perhaps I will get an answer.

p059

My Sixth Letter to Jesus

Dear Jesus,

God has many sons and loves them all. About you he said, 'This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased' (MTT 3:17). He is not always pleased with the others. He uttered those words just after you had spoken on the Mount of Transfiguration with Moses and Elijah about your death. Did you discuss with them all the details of this death? Was the Father pleased also with the despair you manifested on the cross? Does he continue to be pleased with your actual crucifixion?

To be pleased seems to be a characteristic of Deity. You yourself, eager to create a worldwide church and to find a multitude of St Pauls and great teachers, nevertheless said, 'I thank thee, Father, Lord of heaven and earth, that thou has hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes (LUK 10:21). Whatever God decides, you accept as good, just because he has decided it, even if it crosses your desires.

And if God, who decides all and without whose will not even a sparrow falls to the ground, has willed your crucifixion and that of the church, which has lasted almost 2,000 years, I too should express thanks and find my pleasure in them.

p060 ..... My Correspondence With Jesus

A concert pianist who was asked how much time it had taken him to become a virtuoso replied, 'Eight hours a day for twenty years.'

You have to be God for all eternity. And you have promised, 'To him that overcomes will I grant to sit with me on my throne.' For all eternity we too will be on the throne from which universes are created and ruled; we will be virtuosos in being good.

To have been crucified for only three hours is not preparation enough for such a tremendous task. Perhaps this is why you had to be crucified again, symbolically in your new body, the church.

The Zohar, main book of the Kabbalah, which contains the mystic tradition of the Jews, asks why God led the chosen people for forty years through a terrible wilderness 'wherein were fiery serpents and scorpions' (DEU 8:15).

The explanation is that such wildernesses are the very realm of the devil. The Jews have to pass through it in order 'that the evil power might be broken and the ruler of the regions of darkness be crushed, that it might rear its head no more.'

Without Golgotha evil cannot be conquered. What really defeated Nazism once and for all were not the Allied armies, but the innocents who were gassed or burned in Auschwitz and Dachau and who there sanctified the name of God.

The Zohar adds these deep words: 'There can be no true worship except it issue forth from darkness and no true good except it proceed from evil.'

St Paul would not have been the zealous apostle without his fervid, murderous past; St Mary Magdalene would not have stood faithfully at the foot of the cross without her sinful, adulterous youth. The ultimate triumph of good can come only from prolonged and repeated crucifixions.

If everything is predestined, then my desire to decrucify you is also predestined. I have to go ahead with it; but since you are well pleased with all things, this must please you too. If only I knew how to start the decrucifixion.

As you were aware, John the Baptist lost his head because he spoke out against the king's sin. You knew that if you spoke against the sins of men, you too would be killed. But since you "are" the truth, how could you not have spoken? For you to try not to speak is like a man trying not to breathe. All your disciples are in the same predicament. They have to utter the truth, and therefore they have to suffer. The situation gets worse and worse instead of better.

But did John the Baptist do the right thing?

Historians tell us that Herod Antipas was guilty of terrible crimes. He killed and exploited savagely. His whole life was dissolute. It is strange that when John pointed out to the king his sinfulness and the means of salvation, he stressed only the one particular sin to which Herod was most attached: his illegitimate liaison with his brother's wife. Would it not have been wiser and more efficacious if John had chosen to expose the whole complex of Herod's sinfulness instead of hammering specifically on one area alone? John's insistence on this point might reflect the area of his own greatest temptation, since unlike Herod he lived the life of an ascetic. Listen to what a preacher criticizes most in others and you will know the preacher's most besetting sin.

Why did you say that, though John the Baptist is the greatest among those born of women, the smallest in the kingdom of God is greater than he? Is it because heirs of the kingdom refuse to become ensnared in details but maintain a vision of the whole?

You attacked evil on a variety of fronts, showing that ultimately the heart - the character - is the source of individual sins. You went beyond the Baptist, but I have to question you, too. I suppose that if you had been low-key in condemning the hypocrisy and profit-seeking of the religious rulers, they might not have crucified you.

The Reformers would also have fared better if they had not pointed to the fat bellies and moneybags of the monks. So said Erasmus of Rotterdam.

Even without hitting where it hurts the most, the witnesses for truth have to suffer. The story is told of a rabbi who sought to retain his position in the synagogue after boasting that he had already served twenty-five years in that capacity. He was refused with the words, 'You look too healthy. Our tradition says that a true teacher of Scripture who works devotedly soon begins to suffer from heart disease, gall bladder trouble, ulcers and consumption.'

Perhaps the solution is to deal with generalities, to avoid what gives offence, to respect people's sensitivities, to be tactful, to remain silent about a few things that are touchy in order to be able to speak about all other things. So many Christians fare well in society, much better than you fared. Perhaps they know how to behave better than you did. Let us imitate them and there will be no more Golgothas.

As for pure truth, much of it would remain unsaid.

With whom should we share it? In New Guinea, there are men who worship in the 'cargo cult.' During World War II American battleships that landed there used the natives for unloading cargo. They memorised this word, which meant to them a multitude of dainties. When the Americans finally left, they continued to worship the cargo-god who came from afar. They expect him to come again.

Even some Christians have given up their beliefs and joined the down-to-earth cargo cult.

Many people in the civilized world also have a cargo religion. They love you for what you promised them: forgiveness of sins, peace of mind, eternal life and material blessings as well. Suppose you had been only the good teacher from Galilee with no paradise to grant, they would not have been your disciples.

Is it good to be crucified as punishment for having thrown pearls to swine?

You were happy when you found some young fishermen mending their nets, and you called them to be your disciples (MRK 1:16-20). Perhaps we also have to mend our nets. A breed of fishermen who for twenty centuries have been eaten by sharks instead of bringing home much fish are not only entitled to our compassion but must also be told they need to learn their trade.

Have we been so much concerned with logic, consistency, purity of doctrine and absolute truth that we fail to observe that they tear the nets and enlarge the holes?

Those who fight for principles will never be content to give up this 'holy' crusade. I myself prefer those who live according to principles rather than those who fight for them.

Herod did not object to John's living an ascetic life without women; the Pope did not object to Francis of Assisi's becoming a reformed man. The problem arose when John stepped on Herod's toes and when Francis tried to reform the church. Those who fight for principles without being thoroughly reformed themselves are often prone to crucifixion.

My conclusion is that we should make certain we have truth fixed as the multiplication tables and the axioms of geometry, along with ardent love, strong faith, gentility, the right intuition; then let us speak with great circumspection.

'A living dog is better than a dead lion,' said the Preacher (ECC 9:4). The rabbis maintain that almost anything is permitted when in danger of death; then why not silence?

This seems reasonable, but it is not reason that decides our attitudes. Bacteria lodging in my lungs are not aware that they belong to the inner world of a man who can decide to kill them with some drug. We belong to your inner world, and it appears that you predestine some, the most beloved, to oppose evil openly and become crucified.

This opposition to evil is not a mere verbal battle. You did not preach against demons; you banished them, which is a terrible pain for demons, somewhat like that of a violinist who loses his Stradivarius. In centuries past, there were pastors who spoke out against slavery; there were others who worked to free the slaves. It is natural that slave-holders would resent the latter and seek revenge.

Buddha explained to lepers that their condition was the result of guilt in former incarnations and that contentment in present life would prepare them for nirvana. By way of contrast, you healed the lepers. It was the money-changers and merchants in the temple you took action against, overturning their tables and chasing them with a whip.

You and your followers are adamant about what you consider just, and you act accordingly. Crucifixion is the result. So my advice - how strange it is to give advice to you whom Isaiah called 'wonderful Counsellor' (ISA 9:6) - is for you to slow down.

It is all so tragic. When I was in jail, we were not allowed to correspond with our families. We also had no writing material. In quiet desperation we could scratch a love-letter to a sweetheart on a piece of soap and weep over its touching content. Then the futile message would be erased. No one but the author ever read it.

Is this true of our correspondence as well? Even if you do not reply, can you not give at least some little sign that you are aware of it, that I do not write in vain?

Perhaps the Sufite poet Gilt al-Halladah (surely you know him) was right:

> I saw my Lord with the eyes of my heart
> And said, 'Who are you?' He answered, 'You.'
> ...

p065 ..... My 6th Letter to Jesus

I am the one whom I desire lovingly,
And the One whom I desire lovingly is I.
We are two spirits inhabiting one body.
Who sees me, sees him.
Who sees him, sees us.
Your spirit has mixed with my spirit,
As the wine mixes with the clear water.
Whatever touches you, touches me.
You are me, in every situation.

Could it be that these are not even my letters to you, but letters that you write to yourself on the tablet of my mind? If so, then you are the one who will never have a reply. Perhaps there is no 'you and I.'

A chasm opens before me - or is it before you? My thoughts blur. It is enough for today. Goodbye until next time.

p066

My Seventh Letter to Jesus

Beloved Jesus,

I can admire the Sufite poet. But I wonder if he really meant what he wrote. If the oneness between himself and his Lord were truly perfect, why did he write his poetry.

When you asked your first disciples what men said about you, they disinformed you out of politeness. It was not true that their contemporaries considered you a prophet, John the Baptist or Jeremiah. Those who might have thought so were certainly an insignificant minority.

Even today, there are some for whom you do not exist, or to whom you are remote, like the China Sea, and therefore of no significance. To others you are a great man, an initiate, a revolutionist, a madman, a false prophet. To many you are the umbrella under which they propagate their own ideas. To Judas you were a source of income. To a few you are the Beloved, their own true "I."

For some there exists only god. A Russian Orthodox priest asked that his tombstone bear the inscription 'Father Alexei is no more.'

It is not that he did not believe in eternal life, but he had learned the secret contained in the Hebrew of Solomon's Song: 'My beloved is mine, and I am his.' The words in Hebrew are ~Dodi li veani lo~. The last word,

p067 ..... My 7th Letter to Jesus

~lo~, has two meanings in the spoken language: 'not' and 'his.' The phrase could just as well be translated, 'My beloved is mine, and I am not.'

His love for his Saviour caused Father Alexei to be no more. For him there was only Jesus, only he.

For some there exists both God and the 'I.'

There is a sense in which I may speak about you as about another person, though you live in me. In cases of inner conflict between two powerful tendencies within a person, Gestalt psychology recommends an open discussion between them. Set an armchair before you, imagine your other personality sitting before you, and talk things over.

This is particularly wholesome when God and a human being co-exist in one person. I imagine you communed with yourself many times in this manner.

'You in me' does not comport with 'me in me.' You did not come to be ministered unto - not even with a decrucifixion - but to minister.

Caesar Augustus was the richest man of his time, while you did not own so much as a coin. But you told clergymen accustomed to taking from God and from Caesar, 'Give to both.' Your live consisted of giving, and you gave all.

But if you delight only in giving, should I then become only a taker, or should I learn from you to be, like you, only a giver?

Or should we both forget about giving and taking, about the practical aspects of life, where crucifixion can be elaborated?

A peasant dug in his field and discovered a jar containing what he believed to be peas. He tried to cook them, but they remained hard. Being a practical man, he went to a neighbour and exchanged his find for peas that were edible. As for the neighbour, he had recognized that the supposed 'peas' were pearls.

On a practical level, we must seek the most edible peas, the most comfortable situation. Thus decrucifixion becomes the main order of business.

But what if I were to deprive you of jewels by decrucifying you? St Ignatius begged the early disciples to do nothing to keep him from being thrown to the lions, because he did not want to lose the martyr's crown. You yourself told Peter to put his sword back in the sheath when he tried to defend you.

The best do not seek liberation.

I will remind you about one of your most beloved saints, Mina, the only girl who was a 'male' saint.

A Christian, whose wife had died, decided to become a monk. His only daughter, unable to bear the thought of abandoning him in his old age, obtained his permission to enter the order with him, disguised as a young man. She served all monks, washed and cooked for them, and soon became the favourite of the monastery. Who else sang like her? Before long she had won the confidence of the abbot.

One day, he sent Mina, together with two other monks, to make some purchases for the monastery. En route, the three rested in an inn. It so happened that the innkeeper's daughter, in an affair with a soldier, had become pregnant. To protect him from her father's wrath, she accused Mina, 'the handsome young monk,' of rape.

The innkeeper complained to the abbot, who confronted

Mina. Thinking that perhaps one of the other monks might have been guilty, Mina made no defence. If she asserted her innocence, the suspicion would fall on another, who would be expelled from the monastery. If he could not control his impulses while a monk, how would he resist the temptation of the world? 'It is better if I am expelled,' said Mina to herself.

For years she stood at the gate of the monastery and begged forgiveness from the abbot as often as she saw him. In the end, she was received back into the order, but the lowliest jobs were given to her, and she was despised by all.

Mina lived like this to the end of her life. When she died, the monks who washed her corpse saw that she was a girl saint who had borne innocent reproach without ever saying one word in her own defence.

Mina would have objected to a decrucifixion. She preferred to be despised and stand begging at the gate in order to protect the guilty.

Should I decrucify such persons by using force? Luther defied danger. When he went to the Diet of Worms, a prince kidnapped him to save him from his foes and kept him locked in his castle. Should we do such things? To please whom? To serve whom?

Stephen, the first martyr for your name, did not defend himself at all when threatened with stoning. Perhaps he could have saved his life by denying the accusations brought against him. But he delivered a speech in which the personal element is completely absent. He had nothing to say about the slander that victimised him. Rather, he lost himself in the vision of the Father and you.

Since you were born a Jew, you will have no difficulty in understanding what I meant when I said Solomon's words: 'My beloved is mine, and I am his,' also translated, 'My beloved is mine, and I am not.'

It is true that "lo" in one sense is written with the letter ~ayin~, whereas in the other case it is written with ~aleph~. But was not the spoken language, in which these distinctions could not be made, much earlier than the written language?

Then the ideal is that you should be mine and I should no longer be, just as Stephen ceased to be. His instinct for self-preservation had disappeared. He had fulfilled your first command: 'Whoever wishes to come after me should deny himself.'

If I should do this, all my worries, even the worry of decrucifying you and yours, would disappear. I would pass away beneath your ardent kiss. Tradition tells us that Moses died by a kiss of God.

If only I knew! But why do I keep the 'I' that wants to know? Well, though Moses died on Mount Pisgah, centuries later he appeared to you on Mount Tabor at the transfiguration, and spoke with you about your departure from life.

What did he say to you? I imagine he reminded you that when he arrived at the borders of Canaan, he had asked to be allowed to enter the Promised Land, if only briefly. God replied with an unequivocal 'No.' Moses believed that even such a categorical denial of his request could be overruled. Prayer is a mighty weapon. But Moses died with only a view of the Promised Land.

Fifteen centuries passed. Now he was with you on Mount Tabor, which was in the land of Canaan. He had entered the land in spite of God's absolute 'No.'

You were human at that time. No doubt he said to you, 'Do not fear crucifixion. If you die with the words, "Father, into thy hands I surrender my spirit," you will be resurrected gloriously.'

This is probably true also of your crucifixions in heaven and the crucifixions of all who are yours. The end will surely be good. Therefore, plans to decrucify you may seem strange.

If through some means I might have arranged that Moses be be spared the pain of dying without having entered the Promised Land, his triumph centuries later might have been less beautiful.

Triumph in spite of unconquerable difficulties is surely more admirable than triumph in the midst of favourable circumstances.

I conclude, then, that you do not want decrucifixion, for either yourself or those who love you.

What if they die? The greater part of a man is invisible; at death the remaining part becomes invisible, too, joining what has always been invisible. That is all.

Moses defended an innocent man who was being beaten, and for this lost for forty years the possibility of helping a whole nation of slaves. As a prince he could have done much. Morality in small things is sometimes the enemy of morality in great things.

When Joseph was sold by his brothers as a slave, a man with my turn of mind could have fought and saved him. Then Joseph would have been spared years of prison in Egypt, but he would have been denied the opportunity to become Egypt's prime minister and to save a whole nation, plus his own family, from famine. In this he prefigured you in type.

If Peter had been able to save you from crucifixion on Golgotha, he would have deprived mankind of the possibility of being saved. Can it be that your new crucifixions in heaven might also serve some great purpose? As for the sufferings of your church on earth, Tertullian once observed, 'The blood of the martyrs is the seed of the church.'

Maybe this whole idea of decrucifying you, which sounds so beautiful, might be wrong.

And if this is wrong, then much of my thinking in other religious matters might also be wrong. Is this possible? Can a child of God go astray easily even in matters of faith? Do we not have the promise that the Holy Spirit will guide us into all truth? Have I not been instructed by your holy church to whom you have entrusted the whole truth in your word?

How do I know that the road I travel in the future is the correct one?

I await your reply.

p072

My Eight Letter to Jesus

Dear Jesus, my love,

You remain silent, as ever. And I have no criterion for truth.

Should I say the Scripture is this criterion? Is it the original manuscript, which no contemporary has ever seen? Among those we have, which version is correct? There are hundreds of manuscripts that differ from each other.

The simple fact that there are so many interpretations of the Bible shows that it is not easy to put the mind at rest by saying, 'I follow the Bible.' Two individuals equally sincere and assiduous in their studies come to entirely different conclusions.

Is the church the proper guide? Then which church?

You would have done well to forbid Christians to study church history, except for the biographies of saints and martyrs.

The first to call the Pope of Rome ~Pontifex maximus~ (the chief of priests) was Tertullian in the beginning of the third century, but he did so with bitter irony, comparing him to his pagan counterpart of the same name.

Pope Callistus I (217-222) set up a bank and induced church members to deposit their money with him. He failed and then fled.

p073 ..... My 8th Letter to Jesus

When Stephen I (254-257) claimed for the first time in recorded history to be Peter's successor, St Firmilian of Caesarea compared him to Judas Iscariot and censured his insolence. St Cyprian called him a 'deceitful worker, false apostle, false Christ.'

Pope Marcellinus (269-304) was charged by the church with being a traitor, since, it was said, he delivered Bibles to the heathen government to be burned, and he himself burned incense to the gods.

And so on and on. Are these your vicars from whom I should learn?

You must have abhorred the Catholic Inquisition as much as I do, as well as the subsequent killing of Catholics by Protestants.

Should I seek the truth from the Reformers? In some ways they were Deformers, committing acts that Protestants should repent of in sackcloth and ashes.

When the peasants revolted during the Reformation, thousands were killed, many of them under torture. Luther wrote, 'I, Martin Luther, slew all the peasants in the rebellion, for I said that they should be slain; all their blood is upon my head.'

With his accustomed hyperbole, he also wrote these blasphemous words: 'We must put the whole Decalogue entirely out of sight and out of our hearts. If Moses harasses you with his stupid Ten Commandments, say to him at once: "Take yourself off to your Jews. To the gallows with Moses!"' In addition, Luther was a determined anti-Semite.

To cap his highhandedness, he wrote: 'Whoever teaches otherwise than I teach, condemns God and must remain a child of hell. I can bear and endure nothing which is against "my" teaching.'

So I can learn neither from the Popes nor from their opponents in the Reformation.

I will tell you a Christian's vision. He saw himself ascending the steps toward heaven. He saw many men, one more shining than another. Then he saw angels and bowed before one. The angel forbade him and pointing upward said,

'The one to be worshipped is higher.' The man then saw a much more beautiful angel, who also would not accept worship, but smiled and also pointed higher. Finally the man saw God himself, before whom all knelt. When he was about to join them, God pointed downward and said, 'Worship there.'

Looking down, the Christian saw the most wretched man hanging on a cross. He wanted to bow before him but was told, 'There exists something ever more precious. I am the eternal, sinless Son of God. Since I am love incarnate, it is no wonder that I love and sacrifice myself. Descend lower.'

Then, descending to the depths, the man saw in subterranean prisons simple people, sinners, and even former criminals, all of whom had become Christians and who now endured torture for the truth and long years in jail, and he worshipped the Godhead residing in them.

Long ago I decided to learn from the chain on martyrs and saints.

For many years I was with them in jail. And to my sorrow I discovered that they were divided. Everyone is convinced he has the whole truth and does not accept peace at the expense of it.

One of these fellow-sufferers said: 'The word "toleration" must be cut out of the church's vocabulary. It cannot be found in the Bible. It is not a nice word. Under its cloak have been hatched conspiracy, treason and heresy.'

Though hundreds of Christians were together in the same prison cell, they would not take Communion or even say an 'Our Father' together. 'How can we?' they asked. Some believed in transubstantiation, others in symbolism. Is it a matter of indifference (went the argument) if a loving soul

p075 ..... My 8th Letter to Jesus

offers truth or an error that can destroy the soul for eternity?

From whom should I learn? In despair I said I would learn from the dying saints. In their last moments they would give up their vanities.

Paul had had many debates. His swan song was 'I have fought the good fight ...' Mozart wrote to his father, 'Death is the end of our lives. I have become acquainted over a period of years with this true, this best friend of men, so that its image is no longer a matter of dread for me, but of touching comfort. I thank God that he has given me the happiness to discover in death the key to our true blessedness.'

Some day I too will die. You who have been silent so long, grant me in my last moments serenity. No river has ever despaired of emptying into the sea. I have my sure course, which leads to a sea of light. 'More light!' said Goethe, when dying. Though I am confident of reaching the true light, my sin is my impatience. It is my desire to have the truth "now," perhaps before I am ready to receive it.

True is not given all at once because we might squander it.

I think I understand why you cannot write to us. You would have to put thoughts into words, as you did when you wrote to the angels of the Asian churches. Words not only convey thoughts but also limit and distort them. If we cannot say tunes or landscapes in words, how can Deity express itself adequately in such flimsy vehicles of thought?

In English you yourself are called the Word, but this is not so in your own language. In Hebrew you are ~Davar~. The Hebrews have no word for 'word,' though the Word of God was entrusted to them. ~Davar~ means 'the real thing.' Therefore, you the Word - 'the real thing' - were in the beginning.

Goethe's ~Faust~ was really not criticising the Bible but rather its German translation when he said, 'I cannot value the simple word so much' as to say with John that 'in the beginning was the Word.' Then he inclines toward 'In the beginning was the sense' - exactly what the Greek name ~Logos~ means - arriving in the end to 'In the beginning was the power,' and lastly, 'In the beginning was the deed.' He felt that you are not only 'the Word,' but the real thing.

Your seven short letters in the Book of Revelation have drowned in a multitude of religious words. Real things cannot be reduced simply to words alone. Therefore you caused the Hebrew Bible to contain musical notes as well. You prescribed a certain architecture for a place of worship and ornaments for the temple walls. You gave directions for the making of a brazen serpent and the embellishment of beautiful multi-color garments for the priesthood. The eyes as well as the mind should read your will.

You have not left me without reply. It was much more ample than an answer in a letter. The whole of reality is your reply. Scripture says of you, 'Jesus answered and said' when no one addressed you in words. You were replying to the reality of men and events confronting you.

You replied, ~Hallelujah~. You showed me where to find truth: it is in facts. There is no reason to believe that the whole truth is contained only in an old book, even if inspired by you. It lies in the totality of facts. I know now where to seek solutions to what torments me.

Hegel said, 'Everything that exists is reasonable,' which is obvious because there is nothing reasonable except facts, and the totality of facts.

Now I understand your saying, 'All must come to pass' (MTT 24:6). Anything that does not happen does not belong to the all. I think of it as a reel of film entitled 'The all' or 'The everything, material and spiritual, of all times.' If only part of the film appeared on the screen, it would be mutilated. This film is the only truth.

Until the time of Luther a clear-cut distinction was made between religious and secular life. To be in church or to be a monk meant to serve God. All other things were worldly.

Luther tore down this barrier.

A story is told of a pastor who, in explaining some difficult parts of Scripture to a cobbler, used without thinking some rare theological terms. To his surprise, the cobbler was familiar with them. The pastor said, 'With such a mind and such knowledge you should be in God's work.'

The cobbler replied, 'I am in God's work. I repair the shoes of poor people who have no means of transport. They walk miles to their place of work. I fear their feet might become wet and they might fall sick. Who will then care for their families? I pray therefore for God's grace before taking a pair of shoes in my hands, just as you pray before you start preparing your sermon.

'My desire is the same as yours: that, on the day of his judgement, God might look at the shoes I have repaired and say what he will say about your sermons, "Well done, good and faithful servant." My profession is not secular.'

Jesus, now you have thrown the ball into my court.

Everything is your reply: what preachers say, the work that plumbers do, their spiritual or material tools, the smile of indifference with which their wives receive them when they come home, the sunshine they enjoy, the tempests they encounter, the cosmic rays that alter their moods, the play of children in school and the interplay of elementary particles, things in this life and the next, what happens in the stars and in the space between them, angels, animals, micro-organisms. Everything is your revelation, your reply to our questions.

Twenty-four centuries ago, the Greek philosopher

Metrodotus of Chios suggested that intelligent life existed on worlds far from earth. He wrote, 'It goes against nature to find in a large field only one shaft of wheat and in an infinite universe only one living world.' Everything that happens in field or universe is part of your reply.

Even the questions we ask belong to your answer. There exists nothing apart from your replies, freely given. You once said, 'Before they call, I will answer' (ISA 65:24).

Rabbi Menahem Mendel of Vitebsk observed, 'Man is the language of God.' Not only man, but the whole of reality is his language. Everything is your reply.

Now that you have provided me with this insight, I feel I must formulate your reply in words. I might try. I'll write to you again.

p079

My Ninth Letter to Jesus

Dear Jesus,

For years I have had no response and now all at once I read your reply as if it were posted on every wall and every tree. No other voice is heard, no other writing is to be read. The whole world, its whole history, all its events and all its thoughts, great and small, are your answer to questions I have already asked and those I have not even thought to ask.

You speak to me in the language of quality, so little known.

I showed many people a picture of a cow and asked them what they saw. Almost all replied, 'I see a cow,' which was a wrong reply. Rarely did one state the simple fact, 'I see a picture of a cow,' not a cow.

At the initiation into Zen religion, disciples spend months meditating on the question put to them by the master: 'What is the sound of clapping with only one hand?' Rare are those who find the only correct answer, though it is obvious. The obvious is the Cinderella abandoned in the scullery of our thoughts. The sound of clapping with only one hand is the sound of clapping with only one hand.

Prophets as well as ordinary men have said about God that he is love, he is revenge, and so on. He himself when asked gives the only complete reply: 'I am what I am.' St Paul introduces himself with exactly the same words.

p080 ..... My Correspondence With Jesus

The reply to any question can only be the reply to any question. The reply to a specific question is the reply to a specific question. You insist, 'Which is the reply?' It is, 'Which is the reply?' Life is an echo. He who puts questions will always remain with questions as his reply.

So the person who wants replies must not ask questions but give replies. It is written about you, 'He answered and said,' though no one had questioned you. It is because only by answering does one obtain answers. Raising problems raises problems. Only finding solutions finds solutions. In all matters, you know what to do when you start doing.

Every leaf of a tree, every flower and sunbeam, the pretty face of an American baby and the swollen belly of a starving baby in Africa, all reality tells me you are the life.

There is sense in life because if we investigate its origins, we see that at its beginning was a Mind.

How foolish I have been to wait for a written reply from you! I had no writing material in jail; I composed letters in my mind. Who knows if you can get paper and ink in heaven?

But whence come pebbles and jewels, thistles and roses, sun and moon, every man and every animal? Is it not from you who are the Word? Children of the Word are words. You were the Word who had become flesh in a special manner, but everything is a witness to you. Your speaking to men was implied in the plan of creation.

We have unanswered questions only because we are deaf, and even our deafness is a reply. Things and events carry your word; even more, it is carried by the connection between them.

It is written about you that you came full of grace and truth. Which of the two is more important? It is the 'and' that connects them. In the original Hebrew, the books of Judges, Samuel, Ezekiel and Jonah begin with the word 'And,' written in Hebrew simply with the letter 'v' - vav. Therefore the Kabbalah says the universe was created by the letter "vav," by the 'and.' One event or one thing might not be clear. But when we listen to what connects them we will know.

Now I understand the words of the Greek philosopher Heraclitus: 'The Logos is day and night, winter and fire, war and peace, abundance and hunger. Like the fire, he is in continual transformation.' The ancient Indians had said, 'The Himalaya is the god Vishnu in a very solid form.' The Bible says, 'In God we have our life, being and movement.'

The beautiful flower comes from a seed without beauty. This is possible because the unattractive seed comes from a beautiful flower. We individuals with our unreasonable thoughts come from you, the Word, the supreme reason. Therefore I found you, the supreme reason.

How great you are! All things were made by you. How many they are. Someone estimated that it would take a person 80,000 years to count every living creature in a cubic kilometre of water. And God knows each of them.

Goethe wrote, 'Believe in life; it is the best of books.' It is as much your book as the Bible.

The Archangel Gabriel told the prophet Daniel what is written in 'the scripture of truth' (Dan 10:21). He could not have meant the Bible as we know it, since it did not exist at that time. Neither were the things the angel revealed written in any book, as with ink on parchment. But there exists the great book of life. Indians called it 'Chronicle Akashah,' which is simply the all of all times and everywhere, all events and beings connected by the holy word 'and.'

I am beginning to read everything that happens as pages of this holy book, inspired by you as really as the Scriptures are inspired.

An Indian once said to a missionary, 'I always knew him [God]; you told me his name.' Likewise, I can say I have always had all your answers. But I had not known that quality is your answer. The Hindus had the sacred formula: ~Ta tyam asi~ - 'This also is you.'

The Jewish Hassidim have a Sabbath evening song:

p082 ..... My Correspondence With Jesus

You, you, only you,
You, you, you, nothing else than you.
You, you, you, again you,

You, you, you.

They sing this for hours. Everything is your reply. I had not known it.

A beautiful legend is written in ~Sefer Ierahmeel~: When a child is to be conceived, God gives a sign to the angel over the spirits and tells him, 'Bring me a certain soul hidden in the garden of Eden, whose name is so-and-so and who looks thus-and-so.' When the world was created, all souls were prepared for men, as it is written, 'There is nothing new under the sun.'

The angel brings that spirit, which prostrates itself before God. God then says, 'Enter this seed.' The spirit replies, 'Lord of the universe, I am satisfied with the world in which I have lived since you created me. Please do not make me enter this impure being, because I am holy and clean.' God replies, 'The world which I make you enter is better than the world in which you have lived since I formed you. I created you only for this purpose.'

Two angels are put to guard the embryo during pregnancy. Every morning the child is taken into Eden and is shown the righteous who sit in glory with crowns on their heads. The angel asks the soul, 'Do you know who these are?'

'No.'

'These are men formed like you in a mother's womb. They went into the world and kept God's commandments. Therefore they have part in this blessing. You also, at the end of your days, will leave the world. If you fulfill all the commandments, you too will sit in these places.'

Every evening the child is taken to Gehenna. He sees sinners whom evil angels beat with red-hot sticks. They cry but no pity is shown them. The angel asks, 'Do you know who these are who burn?'

'No.'

'They had the same origin as you. They did not obey

God's statutes. Therefore they came to this place of punishment. You too, my child, will one day have to forsake the world. Remember!'

The angel also shows him all the places through which he will walk and finally his tomb. When the child is born, he forgets what he has seen. So ends the legend.

Another Jewish tradition tells us that the indentation between the nose and the lips is from the angel putting his finger on our mouth as a sign we have to keep silent about what we have seen.

There is nothing new under the sun. In every event of life I seem to see again the places through which I walked with angels and I seem to hear again words previously spoken for which I had had a luminous explanation by angels. Heaven is a goal and yet a place where I seem to have been before.

Things are clear. There are no questions to ask. How foolish I was to yearn for your replies. You speak through everything, or we could as well say you are mute, having nothing more to say.

God had long since given fragments of truth through the prophets. Questions remained open. But then you came. You are the whole truth. Henceforth it is an offence to seek visions and revelations. Any new revelation would be false. Every novelty would be wrong. You are God's only Word in which everything has been said once for ever.

Thank you, thank you.

I would like to tell you more, but I remember the poor tailor, St Gerard, probably the only canonised tailor. He did not make many suits because he loved prayer too much. He was overheard crying out, 'Lord, let me go, I pray you. I must make some trousers too.' Others take some time from their work for conversation with you. He took some time from prayer for work. I too am sorry I cannot spend my whole time with you, questioning or shouting Hallelujah about having found the answer.

Goodbye, for the time being.

p084

My Tenth Letter to Jesus

Dear Jesus,

'~Ti emoi kai soi?~' You have taught me not to question any more; though when you were a man, reduced to our level of weakness, you asked questions.

'~Ti emoi kai soi?~' – 'What is between me and you?' you had asked your mother. You wondered what fluid circulated between you and her. The narrator does not even give her name, as would have been natural, but only calls her your mother. The only thing which counted was this mysterious fluid, this full coincidence between your intentions and hers.

You were united by a spiritual umbilical tie with your earthly mother, as she was tied to you, her Master and Lord. She had given you a human body; you had made her full of diving grace.

There is also something ~emoi kai soi~, between me, Richard and you, Jesus. There was first the wilful sinning against you, then my intemperate questioning. But I must say you were no better. You questioned me, too, even about sensitive things that gentlemen never bring into discussion. Now there is the calm.

The wedding in Cana was on the third day.

In ancient initiations into mystery religions, the first day one relived his past and the past of mankind; the second day one saw his actual duties and the present of mankind; the third day was that of the mystical marriage.

p085 ..... My 10th Letter to Jesus

The bride is quiet in the bridegroom's embrace. She receives his holy kiss. How wonderful it is to have a God untroubled by wrath or weariness, but rather a God who rejoices at weddings.

Bernard said rightly, 'A quiet God quiets all things; to see him rested means to be rested. A joyful God gladdens one.'

Such a God are you to me now, and I guess such a disciple am I to you.

I know that what I experience now is a sentiment and sentiments fluctuate. I have known many moments of deep joy with you, as well as repeated doubts, times when we were not even on speaking terms, and moments of utter despair about our relationship. Now I know calm. I could not call it perfect calm, because I know that, like everything human, it is transitory.

I enjoy reading the lives of the greatest saints. None of them was constant and stable in sainthood.

Perhaps tomorrow all the questions will torment me again. But why should I heed tomorrow? Tomorrow will take care of itself.

Lincoln said, 'Most folks are about as happy as they make up their minds to be.' On earth, no one can set far-reaching goals of happiness. But instead of brooding about the unhappiness that might overcome me tomorrow, I wish to obtain the fullness of joy with you which this day can give. I made up my mind to be happy today.

I possess the most precious but much despised jewel: today. People squander it on regrets about the past and utopian dreams about the future. God says, 'Today have I begotten thee.' God does not miss the todays, or he might have missed begetting you.

A Chinese story tells of Pineiho, who found a piece of uncut jade and presented it to Emperor Wu. He in turn asked a jeweller to assess it. 'Just an ordinary stone,' said the jeweller. In a rage, the emperor cut off Pineiho's foot.

p086 ..... My Correspondence With Jesus

When the emperor died, Pineiho presented the jade to his successor, Wen, who also took it to a jeweller. His opinion too was that it was just a stone. Pineiho lost his other foot. Weeping bitterly, he said, 'I am not grieving about the loss of my feet, but because a jewel has been called an ordinary stone.'

Under a third emperor the jade was polished and found to be very precious.

Dreamers, including religious dreamers, fancying a kingdom of God far away, cut off the feet of those who offer them the jewel 'today,' with the best it can bring and the best opportunities it offers.

When you took on humanity with all its human features, you might also have taken this disregard for today. The bride had invited you with words not many brides use: 'Our bed is green. The beams of our house are cedar, and our rafters of fir' (SOS 1:10,11).

You renounced the delights of love today in order to die on a cross to save in all the tomorrows many who will never care about you. You left those who loved you in order to prepare mansions in heaven. What kind of mansions are these that take two thousand years to prepare? Our modern architects build great cities in no time.

The delay might not be because of technical difficulties, or because it takes so much time to build these habitations, but rather because you might wring your hands after laying each brick and ask yourself in tears, 'When the Son of Man comes, will he find faith on the earth? Will he find inhabitants for these heavenly palaces?'

Peter had said to you, 'Don't think about tomorrow. You have here today those who love you. Do not die. Stay with those who are yours.' You wounded his heart for ever by calling him Satan. Perhaps without this one bitter experience, he would not have wavered in Gethsemane. I have seen many faltering or even falling away in prison. It was not simply cowardice. Could it be that you neglected them on some today while you were in search of that glorious tomorrow for all?

p087 ..... My 10th Letter to Jesus

Away, away, questions! Now you have come again. No, Bridegroom, I have turned them away. Make me forget everything with a kiss of your mouth.

Please do a miracle for me. In Bible times, you caused prophets to see into the distant future. You restored to Hezekiah ten hours of his past. For me, make past and future melt in the one today of your embrace.

You can do so. When life first appeared in a purely mechanical universe, something new arose with new laws. Plants that grow and animals that move are wonders to inanimate nature. Likewise, man is a miracle to animals and you to man.

Come, put your left hand under my head and with your right hand embrace me (SOS 2:6). You showed in your everyday life here on earth that you can be both delicate and forceful. So I wish you to be as I relax in your arms.

I cannot overcome fully the thought of tomorrow. Perhaps you will leave me when I fall asleep exhausted.

As a bottle of perfume retains its fragrance even months after it has been emptied, so your mother kept the fragrance of your presence within her long after you were born. Saints who have known you ~in extasis~ keep the afterglow of your brightness long after they descend from the heights. Ellen White says that the devil is not ugly, as he is usually depicted in paintings, but retains some of the grandeur he once knew in heaven.

In the warmth of your embrace, I believe there will be no tomorrow. But if there is, it will be suffused with the loveliness of today. I will have known experimentally what Plotin said: that object and subject are no more two principles, and that the beatified soul can no longer distinguish them. I am no more I. I have become the one whom I contemplate.

p088 ..... My Correspondence With Jesus

St Gertrude said, 'I am you; you are I. I am not you, you are not I. You and I are a new person: ~You-I~.' Perhaps it is you who take the initiative and apply to me the words of the bridge in Solomon's Song, 'My beloved is mine and I am not' - ~Dodi li veani lo~.

I desire the fulness of pleasure in your love. You inspired the erotic imagery of the Song of Songs and of the mystical writings of other religions. Your first miracle was performed at a wedding in Cana. Is a Puritan asceticism the best way to thank you for your generosity?

If a hostess works hard to prepare a dinner for her guests, will she rejoice if they proclaim a fast and refuse to eat? Puritans walk through the beautiful garden of life gathering thorns and throwing away roses. They imagine they thus please God, the gardener who planted the flowers for them.

The bride in Solomon's Song was not a Puritan in her relationship with you; neither am I. Let us both forget about ourselves in an eternal embrace.

Come!

It is such an ardent embrace, a full one, like those in bridal chambers, but, strangely, you were never seen other than fully clothed.

If anyone had a reason to walk nude, it was you when you were resurrected from the dead. You had left the linen in which you have been wrapped in the tomb. Perhaps, in anticipation of resurrection, you prepared beforehand garments for your needs. We do not know. But it is certain that you were always clothed.

Your embrace is always circumspect, but still you are able to communicate to your bride the intensity of your unfathomable love.

It is for this that I long.

p089

My Eleventh Letter to Jesus

My beloved Jesus,

There exists a strange subjunctive world into which the devil tried to introduce you. '~If~ you are the Son of God,' he said, addressing you. The very word 'if' shows that all the rest of the sentence is nonsense. Reality knows no 'ifs.' Pilate used the interrogative mood when he asked, 'Are you the king of the Jews?' Wherever there is a sign of interrogation, there is no truth.

I acknowledge only the declarative mood. 'My Beloved is mine, and I am his.' I am the bride of the King of kings.

An author used the following sentence: 'Proper writing [and you have heard this a million times] avoids exaggeration.' He did not realize that he was exaggerating.

Those who teach 'truth' often are unaware that they lie. When I was a child I was told this classic story.

As a father and a boy walked together, the boy said, 'I saw a dog as big as an elephant.'

The father replied, 'We are now approaching what is called the liar's bridge. When a liar passes over it, it collapses and everyone dies.'

Now the boy was afraid. After a few steps, he said, 'Well, the dog was as big as an ox.'

They drew nearer. The bridge was already in sight.

Finally, the boy conceded, 'The dog was really as big as a dog.' With this the story ended.

The truth is that the father would also have fallen into the water, because he told a lie about an ordinary bridge. Rather, the author of the story would have had to die, because everything he recounted was a fabrication.

So in the world one is condemned for lying in the name of a moral system which itself is a lie. Immorality is a lie, too. The world's assertions and denials of truth are all wrong. '~Every~ imagination of the thoughts of a man's heart is only evil continually' (GEN 6:5). ~Every~ imagination, including what we label as good.

I do not need this world and its systems of thought.

If I alone had been a sinner and the whole world were righteous, you, in whose embrace I am, would have come to be crucified only for me.

There I go pronouncing the word again. I started this whole series of letters with the concern of decrucifying you or, if Paul's assertion that you are also nailed to crosses in heaven is only a metaphor, of decrucifying your oppressed little brethren who suffer here.

Then I had a sudden illumination and spent, not time, but something outside of time with you in the inebriation of love. Your hands caressed me, as I lay at your feet. Neither the bride in Solomon's Song nor I observed any wounds.

How could that be? You are said to be 'the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world' (REV 13:8), then slain again on earth, then slain in heaven. Slain, slain, and again slain. This seems to be your whole existence.

But you never had to be slain. In Gethsemane you said you could have called twelve legions of angels to your defence, though it was written that you have to die. So you yourself acknowledge that there was an alternative to what was written.

But before the foundation of the world there were no Scriptures. In Gethsemane you had a problem: 'How shall the Scriptures be fulfilled if I call upon angels?' (MTT 26:54). This problem did not exist before the foundation of the world. Why were you slain then? And what Scripture do you now fulfill in allowing yourself to be crucified again and again?

I dare even to reproach you for not being as respectful of Scriptures as you were in Gethsemane. Scripture says your role in heave is to be seated on the throne near your Father, to rule the world and to intercede for us. Why are you not mindful of this? Why do you depart from Scripture and endure the cross again and again?

The hours spent in loving embrace vanished as if they had never been. We had been one. Now we discuss. Dialecticians say discussions are the midwives of truth because they shed light from many quarters. But I am not interested in truth obtained by this method.

One question alone remains for me: why has my Beloved been torn from my side? Why did you - why do you - suffer with so much stubbornness, in spite of your bride's longing after you, yes, in spite of Scripture which required only one crucifixion?

I guess I will not persuade you to renounce your sufferings willingly. You are the King of the Jews, who were called in the Bible a stiff-necked people. You are the most stiff-necked of all. To try to keep you from crucifixion is like trying to convince the sea not to ebb and flow or the pine trees on mountaintops not to bend in the tempest.

You have a heart of stone. It could not be otherwise, since you are the express image of God. And John compares the Father to a precious stone (REV 4:3). Precious, precious, but still a stone. It is not what lovers wish it to be. Never has a precious stone yielded to a poor girl's legitimate desire to ornament her neck. You also do only your own will. If on occasion it seems that you do ours, it is because - with the unfathomable means at your command - you inspired us to will what you had already decided. We are caught in a net from which there is no escape.

What about me? I intend to publish these letters. But I am a pastor who is supposed to spread faith, not doubt. It is the devil who sows doubt.

Another question arises: Why did you choose Judas, a devil, for an apostle? He must have realized at times that he was a devil. I have known pastors and even bishops who were clearly conscious of being devils. Why did you choose such men? Is it because you did not want to conquer, but to suffer? Could you have been crucified without the Judases, Caiaphases and Pilates?

Well, I have an inspiration. I have found at least one method to decrucify you, to keep you from being put on crosses any more: a general strike.

My life should be dedicated to convincing men not to betray, or sell their fellowmen, or sentence innocents, or whip, or mock, or crucify. If I succeed in organising such a strike, your divine decision to be crucified again and again will be foiled by me, a small creature indeed.

But there are all kinds of Hitlers living today, national leaders as well as minor functionaries. I was once a tormentor of others and was saved. So this is the way to achieve my goal; win tormentors to the way of love.

If Abels would not sacrifice lambs to God who does not need them but would offer them to Cains as a sign of friendship; if Jacobs would not deceive Esaus in order to obtain blessings but would be happy about Esaus receiving them; if all would yield like Jonathan their legitimate right to the throne in favour of Davids who are surely worse than they - then love might disarm crucifiers.

p093 ..... My 11th Letter to Jesus

In the past, love has not proved that it has this power.

Once, when a house was on fire, a man threw a cup of water on it, only to see it burn to the ground. 'Water does not extinguish fire,' he concluded. The fool! A cup of water does not quench it, but fire engines with water hoses do. The little love we have shown until now has not succeeded. Flames of love might very well.

The fact is, I was once a crucifier, till an encounter with your all-forgiving love changed me. If I could be transformed, others can too.

I will dedicate my life to this.

p094

My Twelfth Letter to Jesus

Dear Jesus,

The story is told about King Kansa in India, who sent soldiers to arrest Krishna. The latter, seeing the soldiers, smiled and said, 'I know who you are and why you come. I am ready to follow you to your king, but let me speak to you first about the king of heaven who is my king too.' And he told them about Mahadeva, his glory and revelations.

When he finished, the soldiers gave him their weapons and said, 'We will not take you as a prisoner to our king, but rather we will follow you to yours.'

When the soldiers failed to return, Nysumba, Kansa's wife, said to him, 'Send the noblemen.' These promised the king they would not listen to Krishna. But when they saw the shining of his eyes, his warm presence, and the respect shown by the multitude, they changed their minds.

He spoke to them about the inner slavery of those who do evil and of the heavenly freedom of those who do good. The noblemen then said, 'We promised the king to bring you bound in chains, but we cannot do so, because you have broken ours.'

The Jewish prophets were not alone in their expectations regarding you. The Krishna legend also knew about your coming.

p095 ..... My 12th Letter to Jesus

At one time, officers were sent to arrest you. Unable to fulfill their mission, they defended themselves with the words, 'Never did any man speak like this man' (JHN 45:46).

You spoke. At that time it was as true as it is today that the whole of reality is your speech, but we are so deaf to truth that you considered the shouting of reality not enough but added to it your own voice in human language.

Are men today less hardhearted than they were then? If not, why are you silent now? Why do you allow your church in half the world - under Communism and Islam - to be silenced? Many of the preachers in the West find themselves unable to speak out about important issues. They are silenced by the attraction of the world.

I had escaped this nagging question for a short time. Now it has come back, but I will shrug it off. I love you and surely do not wish to quarrel.

I can understand how foreign it must have been for you to become a historic person. Like Melchisedek you are without father or mother, temple, people and human habits (GEN 14:18-20; HEB 7:1-4). Because of the brevity of life on earth, we have historicised you too much. I understand you to be entirely other.

I will make no claim on you. My only desire is to organize the strike. As a matter of fact, I should not have disclosed to you this secret, since there is a fundamental misunderstanding between us. For too long we have beaten around the bush.

Please realize that for humans who think, it is incomprehensible that we have to pray endlessly to the Almighty to have his name hallowed, his kingdom triumph and his will fulfilled.

I love you without understanding. You might want so suffer. I want to ensure that there will be no one to satisfy your desire. You will have to be happy.

You remember how, when I was in solitary confinement, I drew your face with chalk on the door. You looked sad. Then I erased the drawing and made another with your lips curled upward. I made you smile. Some can make God rejoice with singing (ZEP 3:17). We can make the Man of Sorrows smile. This is my ambition.

You can use any excuse with me. You said to men, 'How long shall I be with you? How long shall I suffer you?' (MTT 17:17). We are your suffering. One translation says, 'How is it I even talk with you?' You express impatience about having to suffer us, but nevertheless you desire to suffer.

I want to cut this tangled knot. You should no longer have to suffer, nor your disciples, nor anyone in the world. Hell should remain empty.

We cannot accept the situation in the world today. The Talmud Berahot records these words of Rabbi Papa: 'It is better for a man to throw himself into a burning oven than to make someone blush in public.' To insult a person is like killing him, because you cause his blood to shed itself upon his face. Human blood should not be shed anywhere, in any way, with malice.

Unfortunately, on this sin-cursed earth a knowledge of good co-exists with the results of the Fall. And so the lofty principle of respect for human life co-exists with preparations for nuclear war. While some sing sons praising you, millions of human beings are born each year, most of them in areas of widespread poverty and malnutrition, where the possibility of hearing the gospel intelligently set forth is virtually nil.

There are those who try to account for human suffering with high-flown explanations. Rabbi Elimelekh of Lizensk supposed that it comes from God as a veil, because man is too weak to accept divine charity which is absolute. But such rationalisations are of no avail to ignorant, starving children whose bellies are swollen with hunger, nor to their mothers who have no milk in their breasts.

p097 ..... My 12th Letter to Jesus

It took scientists decades to reconstruct the pithecanthropus, the monkey-man whose past experience can in no way be proved. But many women might testify that their husbands belong to this species, and sub-human pithecanthropuses like Hitler, Stalin, Mao, Amin and Bokassa have ruled half of the world in this century.

In any case, in all those who suffer, whether physically or spiritually, it is you who suffer.

I do not know if I will succeed, but I will try together with others to change all this, to make your sufferings cease or at least to diminish them greatly for a time.

It is futile and unrealistic to attempt to change the world. Therefore I will try gentle changes. They will be accepted more easily.

Among many primitive peoples, a woman accused of adultery had to prove her innocence by putting her hand in boiling water or taking poison. Needless to say, all were found guilty.

God knew the ancient Jews were a superstitious people. He also knew that in such cases it would have been too much to demand understanding and forgiveness. So he undertook a devious solution. He ordered that the suspected woman drink plain water in which a writing had been put and upon which some formula had been pronounced (NUM 5:11ff). If her belly swelled, she was to be pronounced guilty; if not, she was innocent. Obviously, a glass of water does not cause one's belly to swell. With such a system, no woman was ever proved adulterous. The husbands were satisfied and the women went free.

I do not know yet how I will fare in this undertaking. Perhaps I will tell those who inflict suffering to be satisfied with less than crucifixion.

You must have much fellowship with Francis of Assisi. You remember how he accomplished his ends. When robbers who lived in the forest surrounding his monastery assaulted worshippers, the friars wanted to call the police.

p098 ..... My Correspondence With Jesus

Francis said, 'No, but rather take them some food and beverage; tell them I give them by blessing and that I ask for only one thing: they should rob but not kill.' The thieves consented. Then he obtained from them the promise not to rob on Sundays and great feasts. Gradually he changed them into good men.

This might be a workable method. Well, I will not discuss these questions with you but with my fellow-believers.

For the time being, I will curtail my correspondence with you in order to speak to my peers.

My besetting sin is pride. I know. Some of it is inherited. I am presumed to be a descendant of Rabbi Dov Ber of Meseritch, a great personality of the Hassidic movement.

It is said that at the age of five he saw his mother crying because, when their house burned down, they lost their family tree proving they were descendants of King David. The future Maggid told her, 'Do not cry. I will give you another lineage. It will become an honour to be my descendant.'

Forgive me for writing to you in such a presumptuous manner. I boasted about what I would do. Surely you will forgive. Let us just remain in love. And until I write again, 'Be thou like a roe or a young hart upon the mountains of Bether' (SOS 2:17).

p099

My First Letter to Christians

Dear brethren and sisters,

I submit to you a series of twelve letters I wrote to Jesus. I think they are self-explanatory.

They started with the grandiose plan of decrucifying him. But I think I will have to come down to earth. Some of the major problems of our planet, such as famine, housing, unemployment, drug addiction, prostitution, pollution, overpopulation, alcoholism, revolution, racism, the danger of war, terrorism, are all too much for our small minds without adding the task I proposed.

We can solve problems only one by one and step by step.

History has shown that revolution is not a magic word that makes problems disappear. If this were the intended outcome, all revolutions have failed. By the same token, there is no possibility of an instantaneous Christian revolution that would satisfy the heart of our Master. He could never be satisfied with less than the whole creation being wholly his.

I am sure he has a good plan to achieve this end. He taught us never to start a war unless we have calculated in advance the size of our forces compared with the enemy's. and never to build a tower without being sure that we have the wherewithal to finish it (LUK 14:28-31).

He must certainly follow his own advice. God surely did not create the earth nor did Jesus start to build his church without first calculating all the consequences.

In our human realm we do not launch a satellite without the full assurance that it will reach its target and, if so desired, return to earth safely. The One who gave us the mind to accomplish such feats is surely far more intelligent than his creatures. He knows every sparrow and the hair on every head.

An office manager would be fired for incompetence if he spend money on useless statistics. God knows not only how but also why such minutiae are accounted for in such detail.

Hebrew, the language of his revelation, does not contain the word 'to think.' For this the Jews use the word ~likshav~, which really means 'to count.' There may be deep significance to the fact that God gave 'Numbers' as the title of one of his books in the Bible.

More than this, God saw to it that in the three languages of the Bible, Hebrew, Aramaic and Greek, every letter also represents a figure. The apocalyptic beast has no name but a number: 666 (REV 13:18). Jesus has a number, too. The numbers of letters of his Greek name are 888. In the language of symbolism, six is the figure for pettiness. The beast is 'almost nothing to the cube.' As for 777, it represents the superlative of human holiness, 888 the superlative of divine holiness on earth.

Well, in the Bible everything is calculation. Christ calculated his final victory and reunion with the Father in glory in a state without any crucifixions or other sorrow.

The Zohar asserts, 'No blessing from above can rest on anything that is counted.... Blessing does not rest on what is numbered.' The intention of the writer is good. He wants to teach that with God quality counts, not quantity. But God's world is permeated with mathematical concepts. Among other things, God commanded Moses to number the Jewish people (EXO 30:11).

p101 ..... My 1st Letter to Christians

Everything is counted, including the troubles through which we have to pass, but these transitory troubles should not disturb us.

The Hebrew word for 'parable' - ~mashal~ - has two other meanings: to reign, and song of mockery. In all Jesus' parables, good triumphs in the end. The prodigal son returns and the lost sheep is found. The fruitful seed brings forth so much that it makes up for what is lost. Jesus will also triumph in the end, and evil will be mocked.

Faith looks beyond the painful present to his last triumph and is patient. But none of us is all faith. We are humans with faith, which means we are often impatient. Not knowing his calculations, we long to accomplish things now.

In my letters to Jesus, I made the mistake of overstating my intentions. I now feel that we should rather do concrete things; we should be pragmatic, down to earth, realistic.

When I write to you, I do not have the same feelings I had when I wrote to him. Then I felt terrible pain sharing the sufferings he must endure while being crucified again and again.

Now I am having second thoughts. During this earthly life, he had reduced himself to our level and must have felt the sting of the whip and the crunch of the nails just as we would under such circumstances. But there exist among humans those who exercise mental pain control.

Yogis have this ability; there are rare persons who practise a sort of religious anesthesia. I have known badly tortured prisoners who really experienced the concept that the rest of us hold only intellectually. 'They are not beating my back or soles. They beat a back. This back belongs to a body. I happen to inhabit it for a time, but I have left it many times in the rapture of love, in the ecstasy of prayer, in identifying with the beauties of nature, in dreams. Therefore I can leave it again.'

Such individuals endured torture of their own bodies as if they were spectators in a theatre observing a performance of ~King Lear~, in which characters had their eyes gouged out.

Under scientific control yogis have been known to spend many hours in boxes with so little oxygen that anyone else would be asphyxiated. I have seen 150 prisoners stacked in one cell, in wretched heat, with neither window nor ventilation but only the stench from barrels of human excrement. Specialists say this ability to survive depends upon the brain's capacity to produce the alpha waves that accompany full relaxation and inner quiet. We are forced to acknowledge that there are things that defy human logic.

What some human beings are able to endure, Jesus can surely surpass. What if these crucifixions in heaven about which St Paul speaks are not painful at all?

Divine feelings are so different from ours. It is written that the heavenly Father found pleasure in bruising his Son (ISA 53:10). What breaks our hearts with grief has an entirely different effects upon him. Perhaps this is also true of crucifixions. Perhaps Jesus re-enacts them painlessly, bloodlessly, as is done in every Communion service, just for the instruction of the saints.

If this is so, then instead of decrucifying him and others, I would have to take myself down from the cross of ignorance, which measures heavenly events with a human rod. We could abandon the tremendous assignment to decrucify the Son of God and concentrate instead on producing changes in ourselves.

We possess amazing letters from Christians in Communist prisons, suggesting that some of them have transcended the threshold of sorrow and grief and feel positive joy in enduring tribulation. Their suffering is something like the re-enacting of Jesus' passion in Oberammergau.

Let us too become more and more Godlike, fulfilling Jesus' words. 'You are gods' (JHN 10:34). Does the possibility of becoming one exist? Then I will have no 'He' about whom to care, no 'He' with whom to share.

p103 ..... My 1st Letter to Christians

Eckhardt teaches that the real believer does not even have a God to worship because he is one with God.

Can there be unity with God? We are so different. He likes angelic music and wisdom. We prefer jazz and fun. He is serene and earnest. We enjoy laughter. He feels at ease sitting on a throne age after age. We have never enough of jogging and sports. He is 'the entirely other.'

But God is not limited to the role a Calvinist theologian assigns him. Who invented music and sex? Who gave us the organs with which to laugh? Sometimes he himself laughs (PSA 2:4). And it is not true that he spends endless ages sitting on a throne. Sometimes he takes a ride, at other times he flies. He flew long before men, though on cherubim, not in a jet (PSA 18:10).

We can be united with God, with Jesus. Then he will be no problem to us any more, unless he is a problem to himself, a matter for later discussion.

The Bhagavad-Gita contains the prayer: 'You alone know what you are by the light of your innermost nature. Therefore teach me now and hold back no word in the telling.'

We have sought for less than unity with him because we were not mature. It became a habit to indulge our petty preoccupations. Habit is like a cable of which we weave a thread each day. But if it is possible to fall into habitual neglect, become alienated from God or worshipping him from afar, it is also possible to reverse the process and make it a habit of spending time with him and becoming one with him in thought and feeling.

Then this crucifixion in heaven, if it is real, will be my crucifixion. And since the crucified cannot decrucify himself, there will be no one to decrucify him. We will have to live with this. And the worst pain will have passed, because it is surely much more difficult to see one's beloved suffering than to suffer oneself.

Can this be the solution to what torments me? We will have to speak about this again.

p104

My Second Letter to Christians

Dear brethren and sisters,

Jesus' contemporaries were concerned that he might be a suicidal type. They once asked, 'Will he kill himself?' (JHN 8:22). We also know that, though he was only thirty, he must have looked almost fifty (JHN 8:57).

These are the only physiognomic clues about Jesus that we find in the Gospels. We can infer from them that on Jesus' face one could read tragedy when he thought and spoke about men dying in sin and missing the mark of becoming one with God. A mother does not joke when speaking about a child who is deathly ill.

(A face gives many clues to character. Those who encountered St Catherine began to weep, as they sensed the about Charles Finney, last century's renowned American evangelist.)

We have to become one with him. The divine Bridegroom has but one consuming passion, the desire to become one with his bride, the church, of which we are members.

This passion for oneness is also the supreme desire of the bride. (And in this context the converted male is also a bride, not a bridegroom, and partakes of female characteristics. In Hebrew the word for 'you' addressed p105 ..... My 2nd Letter to Christians to males is ~atah~, to females ~at~. In the Hebrew of DEU 5:27, Moses, with the soul of a bride, is addressed with the feminine "at.")

In no domain is change possible without differentiation. Inequality is the motive force of the universe. Energy manifests itself only where there is a difference of level, otherwise the universe would be static. The difference between God and us may necessarily exist, but through his gracious condescension it can be bridged as his energy flows to us with transforming power.

A religion of 'I and thou' creates by its very nature a relationship of master to servant. The Christian religion unites the 'i' with the 'thou.' There is no more difference of level.

Already during the Old Testament times, the Jews had the feeling that as long as God remained a 'he,' we would always have to forsake him, in order to fulfill the needs of the 'I.' Therefore, God had to become an 'I' within the believer.

This is the mystery contained in the Hebrew expression ~Ani-Hu~, which we find in ISA 48:12: '~Ani-hu ani arishon, af ani aharon.~' The literal translation is, 'A me-he is the first and an only me is the last.'

Even now, at the Feast of the Tabernacles, there is a procession every day in the synagogues, during which these words are sung: '~Ani ve-Hu hoshana~' - 'I and you save me.' ~Ani Hu~ is the ineffable name of God which Jesus made known to his disciples (Jn 17.21-23).

The resurrected Lord appears to the persecutor Saul of Tarsus and asks him, 'Saul, Saul, why do you persecute ~me~?' (Acts 9.4). Now, the truth is that Saul had never touched Jesus with so much as a finger. He had fought against his disciples. But Jesus - even though he might be omniscient - does not know that there is a difference, a distance between himself and his disciples. When he talks about them, he says, 'Me.'

God does not create apart from himself. All his works become by the fact of creation a part of his being. We form God's inner world. God chooses to be one with his creatures.

The Hebrew name 'Jehovah Sabaoth' cannot be translated simply as 'Lord of Hosts.' In many parts of the Bible 'Sabaoth' is not a genitive but an appositive to Jehovah. 'Sabaoth' (Hosts) is an independent name of God. The literal translation would be 'Jehovah-Hosts.' God has the name 'Hosts.'

We have only a pallid image of what this means. Curiously, when Jesus asked a fallen angel what his name was, he replied, 'My name is legion' (Lk 8.30), indicating that some angels apparently have no consciousness of their individuality. They have a feeling of unity that we lack and do not regard themselves as isolated individuals, separate from their comrades.

God has a sense of unity to the superlative. He sees himself as being all the hosts, all the antithetical forces that collide in the world he created and rules. Therefore his name is 'Hosts.' He perceives himself as the only reality.

The believer also comprehends him in terms of this unity, while acknowledging that he speaks to us as to separate individuals. But do we not often talk to ourselves internally as to another person?

'I live, yet not I, but he lives in me,' says St Paul. He is me.

Let us not allow ourselves to be turned away from this. A thief was once arrested and badly beaten by the police. When he was thrown into my cell, his first words were: 'It is useless for them to beat me. I love stealing. As soon as I'm released,

I'll try again.'

I love and desire nothing more than this unity with God. I have not attained it, but I will continue to strive for it. I want to become oblivious of the outside world, which is an inside world ignorant about its true nature.

When bereaved of very dear ones, I could remain quiet and serene. I am not sure if it was callousness on my part, but I felt that my beloved ones were in Godhead. They continue to be there, though in another dimension. Death is not final. The Dakes and the Irish used to dance at funerals.

I realize my letter becomes incoherent. I speak about the infinite, and the written word cannot contain it. In order to see a tuberculosis microbe, one must destroy, stain, and bombard it with photons, which makes it impossible to see the organism as it is 'in vivo.'

A God bombarded by our meditations, contemplations, and speculations becomes very interesting but ceases to be the 'I am what I am.' Perhaps, independently of my thoughts, everything that torments me about him and the whole plan of decrucifixion might be senseless.

This business of setting down everything in words is not good. Even God does not like to put in words all that he has to reveal to us. It is true he gave us the Bible. But why? When asked about one of the Old Testament commands, Jesus said it was given because of our hardness of heart. Those with upright hearts need no commands. Ultimately they need no words either.

The real language of God finds expression in holy men. God provided first an Enoch, then a Noah, an Abraham, Isaac, Rachel, Moses and others like them. When it became difficult to find men of this calibre, he gave many words.

We must transcend the sphere of words. Then we will realize that realities are frightening only when they are put in words, when they are labelled. Otherwise they just are. Even to say 'they are' is too much said. We say too much even if we say only that God is, because he exists in a special sense like no other, which means that the word 'is' is a misnomer when applied to him. He is the force beyond all force.

Hegel wrote, 'God is, in the highest and most unique sense of the word, force, ie, the primal force of all forces, the soul of all souls.'

p108 ..... My Correspondence With Jesus

We perceive him as a 'he.' He perceives man as an 'I.' Therefore he can love us without measure. If we would consider him also an 'I,' and the I and he would both burn with fire and yet remain unconsumed, just like the bush Moses saw in the desert.

The 'I' is a part of my psyche, but my lungs pump air, the vocal cords modulate themselves, and the tongue and the lips articulate the sound. All these which are not the 'I' work together to pronounce the word. They usurp the name 'I' which does not really belong to them. But my whole being robs the 'I,' which is the name only of God. There is only one 'I' and no one besides him to trouble the waters, either to crucify or to decrucify him.

He is me, and I am he. When I understood this, every deed that served and kept my own life became hallowed, since it served the well-being of the Divine. Our deeds are sanctified by the real doer.

Rabbi Baruch of Medzebosh said, 'To attain truth, man must pass forty-nine gates, each opening onto a new question, only to arrive finally before the last gate, beyond which he could not live without faith.'

The unbeliever is all questions; the believer needs no answers. When the veil before the Most Holy Place in the temple was rent at Jesus' death, it was seen to be empty. It had been completely empty since the ark of the covenant disappeared in the Babylonian captivity. In Mithraism, after long exercises, the initiate is brought before the most holy place. When the veil is drawn aside, it is seen to contain nothing.

There is no reply because the questioner, the questioned and the question are one.

Apart from unity with God, all religion, even beautiful plans for decrucifying Jesus, is just imagination and fantasy.

What are we worried about? The soul is a slave if it smiles only when bathed in light; it must continue to smile when it passes through darkness as well.

In Cambodia, the Communists brought a group of men before the statue of Buddha with his ineffable smile and said, 'Pray that he will save you.' Buddha remained silent and smiled. They were all slaughtered. The smile on his lips never ceased. Did the victims understand that one can smile even under such circumstances?

A free soul sings also when his material body is destroyed. The Creator, the Preserver, and the Destroyer are the same Deity.

It is wrong to weep about not having achieved unity with God. Jesus, reduced to human nature, felt our sinfulness so much that he looked like one who could commit suicide. In his glory God remains serene even if we sin.

The Lamaists ~Book of Golden Teachings~ says, 'If your blossoming soul bows its ear to the noise of the world, if it finds pleasure in the fun of the great deceit; if, frightened of seeing the burning tears of pain and deafened by cries, it hides itself fearfully in the shell of consciousness of the I, know, O disciple, that your soul is unworthy of the silent God.'

I started the letters to Jesus and to you as a sick soul. I was not living in unity with him.

Now I realize that the great importance of Jesus consists in the fact that he had the highest comprehension of the absolute unity of human and divine existence. It is rather the metaphysical, than the historical, in Jesus which saves.

In the metaphysical, it was not wicked men who slew Jesus. He was slain before the foundation of the world, when there were no unjust judges, greedy kings, Judases, or raging mobs. Who slew him then? What does the slaughtering of a lamb mean there?

Abel slaughtered a lamb as a sacrifice to God. Would not God have preferred to see this lamb playing in a meadow?

Only if I understand these things will I be able to think fruitfully about decrucifying him.

I will have to consider all these things again.

p110

My Third Letter to Christians

Dear brethren and sisters,

I wish to free Jesus and those who bear his name, but only a free man can free others.

If I want to help sick men, I cannot start by doctoring them; I have to study for a few years and become a physician first.

The story is told that an English king gave an architect a great deal of money to built St Paul's cathedral. Years passed while the architect did nothing. When the king asked why, he replied, 'I have to work on myself first to eliminate from my heart all greed for money.' After a few more years, he excused himself again: 'I had to fight against the desire for fame.' Only after cleansing himself did he do the work.

He who wants to decrucify Jesus should not attempt the task till he has learned in depth what is required. Or rather, he should start by unlearning the many wrong things taught for centuries in the churches.

If one approaches the task of unlearning first, learning will be easier. It is obviously easier to recognize error, which is on the surface, than to reach truth, which is in the depths beneath.

When we unlearn the things we have known before learning the new, when we have swept away all the p111 ..... My 3rd Letter to Christians

fancies that populate the mind and that have been accepted on the basis of hearsay, we realize that we all are what John the Baptist was said to be: a voice. We are the voices of other superior beings.

Demons have spoken through men. Satan used even the voice of an apostle to suggest to Jesus a false thought.

But Deity also speaks through us. On one occasion Peter expressed what he thought was his opinion about Jesus. The Saviour told him his observation was inspired by God, not his own mind.

No doubt many of the biblical authors did not know that God was speaking through them. Was the author of the Book of Esther aware of it? He never even mentions the name of God in his book. But notwithstanding he was a voice for God.

Let us empty ourselves of human thoughts and seek an awareness of God's presence such as Jesus possessed. Then we will be able to say, 'It is not I that speak, but the Father.' No physical laboratory has ever possessed a more exact physical apparatus for conveying another's voice than a man controlled by Jesus.

We must become pure like Jesus to decrucify him. But if we become like him, will we not be crucified ourselves? So many saints have ended like this. The saints are crucified together with Jesus, yes, buried with him (ROM 6:4). Where do they get these foolish ideas about decrucifixions and great liberations? Do they think in their graves? Do the dead think, if they died with Jesus?

It is as if I were going mad, as if this were my swan song before I lost my mind.

I am surrounded by so many mysteries.

Jacob had thirteen children that we know about: twelve sons and Dinah. We are told the story of the twelve tribes. Where are Dinah's descendants? Why are we not told their fate?

When Jesus died, many saints arose from the dead and entered Jerusalem on resurrection day (MTT 27:52; cf ISA 26:19). Their appearance must have produced quite a stir. What did they have to say? What happened to them afterward? Did they die again? Did they ascend with Jesus?

Why do all these questions come into my mind?

If we do not decrucify Jesus and his followers, soon nothing will be left of this old world but rubble and corpses. It is urgent that we ensure the triumph of good.

Instead of doing so, I have to start the long process of accomplishing what I had neglected all my life: becoming like Jesus. I am not even sure I will help him by doing so or will just become one more crucified victim. True, with the prospect of a glorious resurrection, but where? In heaven where there are still more crucifixions?

Meanwhile, mankind runs to its doom, and I cannot help.

I look up for succor. I find only the sweet smile of Jesus, who assures me of his perfect unity with the Father. The Bible speaks of this unity in many places.

In REV 6:17 we read about the day of ~his~ wrath, though in the preceding verse two beings are the subject: the one who sits on the throne and the Lamb. The two beings are one. REV 11:15 says the same thing: 'The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord, and of his Christ' - two persons. 'And he [not they] shall reign for ever and ever.'

God and Jesus do not form a plural, even from a grammatical viewpoint. Neither do God and I.

My consciousness of my 'I,' though it is only a little part of my being, extends itself to the whole person and considers everything as his 'I.' Even more does God consider everything as his 'I.' The godlier we become, the more we think like him.

I was convinced I could do something to end Jesus' pain. His one great pain - what hurts him again and again like a crucifixion - is that the world is alienated from the Father.

I will do away with this alienation. But the world is too enormous a task for me, and even for the church universal. The church is out of contact with at least one half of mankind. Well, I could start with the country in which I live. But the United States of America is too big for me. My city, Los Angeles, is also inhabited by millions who speak a multitude of languages, English, Spanish, Filipino, Japanese, Korean, Indonesian, Samoan, Romanian and so on. Every my street is too big.

So I have to start with myself. I will be one with God as a house with its foundation, as a branch with the vine, as a bride with the bridegroom, as an arm to the body.

The limbs without the body are just pieces of meat. The body without the limbs is just a stump. The Kabbalah says, 'God with Israel is God; God without Israel is not God.'

But wait! The hand never thinks about what to do for the head, not even how to serve it. It was wrong for wicked men to crucify him. My endeavours to decrucify him are wrong too. Jesus said, 'I will come in such an hour as ye think not' (MTT 24:44). Thinking is his exclusive prerogative. It is a sign of sickness if the foot contracts without the head's will, or when the hand cannot carry out the orders of the head.

It is not for me to do even nice things like decrucifying him without his first ordering me to do so. My brain, too, is only a member of his and should think only his thoughts. Jesus rebuked Peter for a thought which did not savour as being of God, though it was a loving thought (MTT 16:23).

Once when Jesus gave sight to someone born blind, the Pharisees, instead of admiring this great work of God, were offended at a trifle: that the miracle had been performed on the Sabbath day. Please, do not do the same thing. Do not find fault with some vagary in my writing.

I believe I am close to an important truth that I can share with you. Consider the time when Jesus, wanting to give sight to a blind man, first made clay and anointed the man's eyes with it (JHN 9:5), making him even more blind. When Saul of Tarsus the persecutor, blinded by hate, first met Jesus, he also became physically blind. This also happened to Milton when he started to write ~Paradise Lost~.

I had an encounter in depth with Jesus and became blind. 'Who is blind but my servant?' (ISA 42:18), the prophet asks. Jesus caused me to abandon a multitude of notions I had had before. I am open now to new ones. Only when I have received them in clarity, will I be able to wash myself in the pool of Siloam. I am now at the important stage of unlearning what I knew before.

I have to unlearn to 'think Jewish,' feeling obliged to do so because I happened to be born into this nation; but I must be careful at the same time to continue to love my nation. If Jesus had a preferential love for this nation, who am I to strip myself of nationalism? I must keep it, without allowing my mind to be biased by it.

I have to unlearn to be Protestant because this happened to be the first form in which I knew Christianity.

I will have to unlearn to be anti-Communist, for the fact that the Communists made me suffer is not sufficient reason to be their foe.

I will have to be a member at Jesus' disposal, without any intention of my own, not even to decrucify him. Let him decide. He might decide that I should pass through agonising sufferings, too.

We are stones in a building of which he is the foundation - an image of rest. We are branches where he is the vine - an image of life. We are united to him as spouse to husband - an image of love. But there are still two lives.

I love most the metaphor about the body and its members. It is the clearest, bespeaking only one life. A husband can travel far away from his wife, but the members are inseparable from the body. A man whose head is at a distance of even an inch from his body is dead. Neither we, nor our head, can live even one second without being one. Christ and we are both in danger of death if we separate from each other for even one moment. He cannot rejoice in glory without us. Perhaps this is what is meant by his crucifixion in heaven.

p115 ..... My 3rd Letter to Christians

John the Baptist's head was on a charger while his body lay in a prison cell. Jesus must not pass through such a tragedy. This is what decrucifying him would mean. Nothing less than our perfect union with God can help.

Luther says in his ~Commentary on Galatians~: 'The Christian is Christ.'

This is his position. It must become a fact of experience.

Leslie B. Flynn, in ~Dare to Care Like Jesus~, wrote: 'A Christian baroness, living in the highlands of Nairobi, Kenya, told of a young national who was employed as her houseboy. After three months he asked the baroness to give him a letter of reference to a friendly sheik some miles away. The baroness, not wishing the houseboy to leave just when he had learned the routine of the household, offered to increase his pay. The lad replied that he was not leaving for higher pay. Rather, he had decided he would become either a Christian or a Mohammedan. This was why he had come to work for the baroness for three months. He had wished to see how Christians acted. Now he wanted to work for three months for the sheik to observe the ways of the Mohammedans. Then he would decide which way of life he would follow. The baroness was stunned as she recalled her many blemishes in her dealings with the houseboy. She could only exclaim, 'Why didn't you tell me at the beginning!'

Well, the young Kenyan did not warn her, but the best Christian teachers had said that she is Christ and has to behave accordingly.

Let us stop here for a time.

p116

My Fourth Letter to Christians

Dear brethren and sisters,

I imagine many Christians will say my thoughts are not in Scripture. But what does the conductor of an orchestra do? Does he not extract from the score what is not written?

When the renowned Toscanini was conducting a piece by Verdi, he inserted his own ~rallentando~ in the score. Later he asked Verdi if he liked his execution and approved the fact that he had added the "rallentando." Verdi thought a moment, certain that he had indicated the rubric. Toscanini had read into the music the composer's intention.

The Talmud relates that Rabbi Akiba, while teaching, once remarked, 'This is what Moses intended when he said these words.' Moses, standing near God, protested: 'Shut his mouth! Those were not my thoughts.' God replied, 'Keep quiet! He knows better than you the meaning of your words.'

Every orchestra conductor must be allowed to add something to the music, just as every executive must allow his secretaries and typists, and every author his translators, to give rein to their own ideas and emendations.

A preacher and a Christian writer also have the right to let the thoughts come. I had no outline in mind for this book, nor any prefatory notes, when I sat down to write. I had not the slightest idea of what would follow after writing the first page. Thoughts came, and I allowed them to flow.

Once while walking on a street in Bucharest I felt a strong impulse to stop. Leaning near a shop window, I wrote down almost as if under dictation the main contents of a book. It has been considered one of my best. I have also dreamt whole articles and sermons, which were much appreciated.

Spurgeon's wife says he once arose from bed in sleep, went to his desk, wrote out a sermon, then went back to sleep. Next morning he knew nothing about what had happened.

There must be some purpose in this book of mine. As yet I know not what.

A false teacher or a false messiah uses extraordinary caution in the way he acts, speaks, and writes. The true Messiah, on the other hand, did not behave as the Jews expected of a messiah. He permitted himself words and attitudes that offended and, being genuine, did not need to act his role.

The man who cries after knowledge, who seeks her as silver and searches for her as for hidden treasure (PRO 2:3,4), may use an unorthodox manner of speech. But whatever leads to truth is truth.

This should be enough by way of introduction.

I must arrive at such a unity with God as to be able to have the assurance that God is where I am. If you had asked Jesus for his address, he could have given you the street and number where the Virgin Mary lived or the street and number of the house in Bethany.

If my desires are fulfilled, I will be united with Christ in my future destiny as well. How could I die if he is alive? A man whose head is above water does not drown. This is true of us, however deep we might have fallen into misery and sin, since Jesus, the head, is always above the water. If a prisoner who tries to escape can squeeze his head through the bars, he will be able to get his whole body through also. How could Christ remain only as an isolated head in heaven without taking with him the body as well?

In the ancient Egyptian ~Book of the Dead~, long ago this was written: 'As truly as Osiris lives, this man will live. As truly as Osiris did not die, it is true neither will he die. As truly as Osiris did not perish, neither will he perish.'

The sign that one has achieved this unity is that he no longer has doubts about being with him in heaven. A son whose father promises him something does no say, 'I hope you will keep your word,' because this would be an insult.

If salvation is by faith, perishing is by doubt.

Thus far I am clear. But is it a beautiful perspective to be with him in heaven when he is crucified there again and again?

This must be settled too. Paul was very lax in his manner of writing. He described believers in whose houses he stayed as being crucified, dead, and buried with Christ, and at the same time they were joyous Christians. He included himself among those crucified and yet could say to Christians, 'Always rejoice.'

So the phrase about Jesus being crucified in heaven afresh is also a metaphor and has an entirely different meaning. When I meet Paul in heaven, I will chide him about the many hours of sadness he has produced in me. I could have been spared if he had been more explicit.

I can well imagine how he will reply. He might use a parable of Spurgeon, whom he must have befriended:

> A man cultivated in his orchard world-renowned apples of exquisite flavour. Once he invited his friend to visit him, saying, 'You will eat apples such as you have never eaten before.' The friend excused himself. After the second and third time, the man wondered and asked him why. The friend confessed, 'I had heard about your apples. Once when > passing by your orchard, I picked up some apples that had fallen on the ground. Never had I bitten such a sour one. I made sad reflections about the difference between advertising and reality.'

>
> The man laughed: 'My apples are so good I had to protect them from naughty children and thieves. Therefore, I planted around the fence two rows of bad apples. My guests enter through the gate. The good apples are for them alone.'

God has prepared a paradise of beauties and joys such as the human mind cannot even imagine. Perhaps he had to shield it from unworthy intruders and therefore enjoined Paul to use language that would frighten them away. Heaven is all glory.

A stone was taken from my heart when I understood this. Perhaps this is the whole answer to my quest about decrucifixion. Heaven surely shares with concern and love our sorrows and above all our falling short of unity with God. But this does not dim its happiness.

Well, it seems that I do not have to decrucify Jesus - but what about his disciples who suffer and die on crosses in many parts of the world? Do we not have to decrucify them?

We strive for unity with God. How does he feel about the pain of his children? He is so unlike those who have not become one of them.

When Lazarus died, his sisters suffered and wept. Jesus said, 'I am glad for your sake, that you may believe' (JHN 11:15). Faith, which ultimately leads to union with God, is so valuable that transitory sorrows, which serve to increase faith, are not worthy even to be mentioned. What does the weariness of a journey matter when it leads to a wedding with the much Beloved?

A Christian who was told that his son had died in a Communist jail broke the news to his wife in this way: 'I have heard news about our child. He sings and praises the Lord.'

After eight years of prison, during which time I had no knowledge about my wife, I met a believer recently imprisoned whom I had known in liberty. I asked him about her. He said, 'I have been in your home. She smiles and sings as usual.'

Death, even death on a cross in unspeakable torture, does not destroy life but only sins and the dangers to which they expose us.

Let us not confound death with non-existence and life with existence. There are men who exist without being alive. Some have only a name that they live and are dead (REV 3:1).

Prolonged life in jail is good preparation for the state after death. There the hours are not counted. Life is not measured in days and years; one loses the notion of time in prison. Death means to be freed from shadows; it means entrance into the kingdom of truth. Henceforth the soul is out of peril. A believer becomes irrevocably an heir of the kingdom.

I myself have suffered much. I possess 350 poems that I composed in jail. They are not of artistic value, but as I re-read them I wonder about the deep quiet, serenity, and joy that is in most of them. They could as well have been composed in moments of delight amid the beauties of nature. When I conceived them, I was thirty feet under the earth, hungry, in chains, with never a view of sun, moon, stars, rain or snow.

It seems that for a time I had forgotten my deprivation, and I suffered about the sufferings of others as I had not suffered about my own.

The Soviet Christian Jakob Loewen wrote, when freed from jail, 'I must confess I never dared to pray for being freed from prison. God led me to be there. I considered my state as being willed by him. We desire to be his witnesses everywhere through word and attitudes. In prison we are, by our simple presence there, a call toward the living God. God knows how long I must serve him in this capacity. Therefore I asked of him only to be kept in the faith.'

p121 ..... My 4th Letter to Christians

In my plans for decrucifying Jesus and his church, I have gone too far. This is dangerous.

The Talmud says four men forced an entrance into the highest heaven. One died, one went mad, one became an apostate; only one was illuminated.

Rabbi Yaakov-Yitzchak of Lublin and his two friends Mendl of Riminov and the Maggid of Kozhenitz devised a strategy to constrain the Messiah to come and put an end to exile. They all died in the same year under mysterious circumstances.

We are small; let us not adventure too far.

I finish this letter with high aims. When I write again it will be about more immediate things.

p122

My Fifth Letter to Christians

Dear brethren and sisters,

Does the end justify the means? Well, if not the end, what else could justify means?

When the Jewish high priest said, 'It is expedient for us that one man should die for the people,' he did not speak of himself, but prophesied (JHN 11:50,51).

It is not respectable to find pleasure in the violent death of your own son, but if this serves the salvation of mankind, the feeling is justified (ISA 53:10). God was pleased but only because he saw what lay beyond.

The end of becoming one with God has as its means the imposing of great hardship upon family and loved ones.

How did poor Zebedee feel when his sons James and John, his hope for old age, left him in a ship with his hired servants? (MRK 1:19,20). They went because a stranger had called them.

Spurgeon's last sermon before his death was about unity with God. He finished it with the words, 'This evening I spoke to you in some kind of Dutch, and you did not understand me at all.' During the last period of his life, he spoke repeatedly from EPH 5:30, where it is said that 'we are bone of his bones.'

This teaching about unity with God is very little known in Christianity, though the New Testament often alludes to it. Jesus says, 'In that day you shall ask me nothing' (JHN 16:23). We will ask him nothing because he will not be someone apart from us. 'He that is joined unto the Lord is one spirit' (1CO 6:17).

I myself have known these verses for almost half a century. Notwithstanding I started this book with many futile questions. Who addressed them, and to whom? The questioner, the questioned and the question are one.

When I left prison, someone said, 'Wurmbrand does not look to God any more.' I wish it had been true then. To a believer this is a compliment. How could someone look to a Being with whom he has become one? What can one ask him? He has become identified with the believer. 'Who is blind, but my servant? or deaf, as my messenger that I sent? Who is blind as he that is perfect, and blind as the Lord's servant?' (ISA 42:19).

Meister Eckhardt, the renowned German medieval mystic, insists repeatedly on the teaching that God's intention is for men to lose their God, because as long as one has a God, knows him and speaks with him, he is separated from him. The purpose of God is to abolish himself in the soul. The name of God is not fit for him. He received it from creatures. His preferred name is 'I.' This is the name that Jesus manifested to the men whom the Father gave him out of the world (JHN 17:6).

The idea of the unity between the believer and God is an essential part of Christian thought.

The apocryphal Gospel of Eve says, 'I stood on a high mountain, and I saw a tall man and another who was short. I heard something like a thunder, and I approached to hear. Then he spoke to me and said, "I am you and you are I, and wherever you are, I am too, and I am alike in all things. You can pluck me from wherever you wish. And if you pluck me, you pluck yourself."'

Augustine had some hesitations, but he too wrote,

p124 ..... My Correspondence With Jesus

'How should I call you, seeing I am in you? From where could you come to me?'

John Chrysostom wrote, 'This is true love, not to see in the lover and the beloved two separate beings, but only one.'

Th,rŠse of Avila writes in ~The Inner Castle~: 'Unity with God is like water which when it falls from the sky into a river or fountain confounds itself so much with it that they cannot be separated any more. Neither could one distinguish which is the water from the river and which from the sky. For it is like a river entering the sea, which cannot be separated anymore.'

If you choose to walk this way of oneness with God, men will blow trumpets at your misstep. Do not wonder! In this world, the wind is always in Christ's face. The world agrees with true religion only in the measure to which God agrees with the devil. You will have to suffer.

John Bunyan, who advanced with great steps toward the heavenly city where the wedding between Christ and his church is celebrated, sat in jail for over twelve years, knowing that his four children, one of whom was blind, were starving. Since then thousands have had to suffer and still do.

This is what prompted me to be so preoccupied with decrucifying them. Somehow the sufferers themselves do not think about this. I also did not worry about such things while I was in prison. I don't know why I am so tormented now.

Bunyan passed his time in prison not thinking about how to escape and make others escape, but writing books, some nine in all. Among them was the classic that has been a spiritual guide to millions, ~Pilgrim's Progress~.

While non-conformists were driven from home, ruined by fines, and locked up, he wrote, 'Persecution of the godly was of God never intended for their destruction, but for their glory, and to make them shine the p125 ..... My 5th Letter to Christians

more when they are beyond the valley of the shadow of death.' And again: 'I have often thought that the best Christians are found in the worst of times; and I have thought again that one reason why we are no better is because God purges us no more. I know these things are against the grain of the flesh, but they are not against the graces of the spirit.'

~Pilgrim's Progress~ was not a book that Bunyan had premeditated. It was begun as a kind of relaxation. Neither did I plan the present letters. At a certain point my mind collided with with his. I wanted to decrucify him. He does not wish to be decrucified.

Bunyan had to suffer not only from the king and bishops. Baptists denounced him as a devil. They heaped upon him scurrilous abuse and ridicule. In addition to writing books, he also made hundreds of long lace tags, which were sold to provide for the bare necessities of his home and himself.

When he had to decide whether to submit to the authorities or go to jail, he said, 'I was as a man who was pulling down his house upon the head of his wife and children, yet, thought I, I must do it, I must do it.... I have determined, the Almighty God being my help and my shield, yet to suffer, if frail life might continue so long, even till the moss shall grow on my eyebrows, rather than to violate my faith and principles.'

What is behind this willingness to suffer, even this joy in tribulations?

Human language is poor and cannot make the right distinctions. On the one hand there are the facts: to be tortured, jailed, deprived, crucified. On the other hand is one's personal perception of these states. The objective situation in which a man finds himself, and the feelings or thoughts of a man about his situation are not always the same.

A man might not feel bad while suffering from a deadly disease such as leukemia. Mind has some sway over matter. I know of a man in my own experience who overcame a fatal illness in prison, though all physicians had said that he must die. Men with certain religious beliefs also walk on fire without experiencing pain. Those who have faith and confidence that God is a very present help, who see some sense in bearing heavy crosses, who do not yield to anxiety and depression, overcome great physical suffering.

One who has a deep desire to enjoy his life with God can enjoy it under the most adverse circumstances. He needs no decrucifying.

He is happy because he is one with God, as Angelus Silesius says: 'I am not I, neither you you. You are the I in me. ... He who wishes to be like God must become unlike all things else.' Thus it is possible to fulfill 1JN 2:6: 'He that says he abides in him, must live as Jesus himself lived.'

The idea of identification with God belongs to the essence of the Christian faith, but not to it alone.

Some primitive peoples identify strongly with their totems. In South America tribesmen claim they are big parrots. Jung reported that they say about parrots: 'Parrots are we; we are parrots, only we have no feathers.' They cannot be convinced to the contrary.

They have a pre-logical mentality. All adherents of a purely materialistic philosophy are on approximately the same level. They identify themselves with their idol: matter.

In Congo Brazzaville, thousands of natives considered themselves leopards, walked on four legs, threw themselves upon men, and tore them apart with artificial nails. They opened the jugular vein, exactly as leopards do. They identified themselves with the bestial within.

We identify ourselves with God. This also is not logical, but beyond logic, super-logical.

God is love. We identify ourselves with love. But love and suffering are the same thing. The value of love is the price we pay to enjoy it. If we obtain it for less than suffering, we receive a cheap substitute.

If God is love, there must be crucifixions in heaven. The Lamb must be slain from the very beginning. If Christians love, there must be Golgothas even now. To decrucify means to extinguish love.

I have been wrong from the very beginning.

I will have to rethink this whole matter.

My Thirteenth Letter to Jesus

Dear Jesus,

I have left you for a long time without a letter from me. Instead I wrote to my fellow-Christians. All seemed to go well for a while. In my letters to them, some thoughts were shared, some knots untied.

But now I find myself in a cul-de-sac. My last letter was no longer correspondence, but rather some kind of theological treatise about the unity of the believer with you.

To many Christians nowadays it sounds like a new teaching. To you it is old. You have with you John of the Cross. Writing about spiritual marriage, he said that it means to be transformed completely in the Most High. Alphonse di Liguori taught likewise.

John of the Cross was a monk. It is true, a monk who suffered terrible abuse from his brethren in the monastery, but still a monk, which means he lived in a place propitious for contemplation and meditation.

I live in the real world. I meet people, read newspapers, watch TV. I have been in Communist prisons, probably the worst place in the world for spiritual life.

I start the day by reading with John of the Cross that the soul becomes, through spiritual marriage, one with God, that it becomes, in a manner of speaking, God through fellowship. I read that we are God's shadow, that a substantial transformation has taken place.

Protestants are taught to believe that the elements at Communion do not change their substance. They remain bread and wine. But all believers have changed their own substance. They have become one with God. The work of God and that of the soul are one. We give God to God.

After being nourished with such sublime thoughts, I open the newspaper and read:

> In an amphitheater in Chicago, where 3,000 attended a rhythm-and-blues concert, twenty men in the audience attacked an eighteen-year-old girl. They stripped here of all her clothing and violated her, in full view of the crowd. She was sodomized and raped, even with a bottle after the whole gang had had her. The injuries were severe enough to require surgery. In all that crowd listening to music, a number certainly witnessed this savagery. No one intervened (~Los Angeles Times~, 7th January 1982).

This is just a little thing compared with what has happened in Romanian Communist prisons for years. And that was a little thing in comparison with the slaughtering of half the population in Cambodia or the holocaust of Jews in Nazi Germany or of the Armenians and Greeks in Turkey.

John of the Cross says that the soul united with God can give God to everyone, as one can share a possession, and that, by doing this, the soul is filled with delight and great joy.

Then why in the world did he not give God to everyone, even to those who mistreated him? Or was there a hindrance? What hindrances can God encounter?

I would like to unite with you but my heart is torn. Uniting with you means entering into serenity. But this girl sodomised by a gang cries, and with her thousands of other innocent victims. And so I feel the pull to unite with her and be on her side, even if in her despair

p130 ..... My Correspondence With Jesus

she rebels against you, as I have seen so many sufferers do.

In the eighteenth century the Jews of Eastern Europe were divided into two big parties: the Hassidim and the Mitnagdim. The former had a religion that was all joy and exultation in the Lord, while the latter strictly obeyed their laws and regulations.

A Mitnagged gave his daughter to a Hassid on condition he break away from this movement and not visit his rabbi any more. The young man consented and kept his word for a while. But then he began to visit his rabbi once more, at first in secret and then in the open, siding with him again.

The outraged father-in-law went to his own rabbi, who consulted what the books say about the breaking of contractual promises, and pronounced the divorce. The young man was driven out of the house and died soon after of a broken heart.

When the Messiah comes - Rabbi Dov Beer of Mezeritsh said - the resurrected young man will complain about his father-in-law. But the latter will be able to prove he was right. He had obeyed his rabbi's decision. The rabbi will claim too that he was right. He stuck to his law.

But the Messiah will say, 'The law was right, and the rabbi and the father-in-law. But what have I to do with what is right? I care about the young Hassid with a broken heart.'

You, God, are right in all you do. And theologians are right in justifying you and providing satisfactory explanations for suffering. The girl might also have been rightly punished for who knows what past sins and for being at such a wicked concert. But I am little interested in who is right. The only thing that concerns me is who suffers.

I have just found out that you do not suffer and that your being crucified even now is just a figure of speech. But that girl suffers, and with her millions of others.

p131 ..... My 13th Letter to Jesus

I identify with all the sufferers of the world, even if they are in conflict with you.

Perhaps I am totally wrong again. As death is the name given to a profound sleep by those who do not know how to resurrect, suffering might be the name given to a thrilling experience by those who do not know how to change tears into pearls which comfort and crown the martyrs of life.

In the beginning, you saw all the things you had made - including the possibility of suffering - and behold, all was very good (GEN 1:31). Well, I believe, but please help my unbelief.

I will repeat to you the words you said to the heavenly Father: 'All mine are thine,' all these my torments and tribulations, 'and thin are mine,' all your serenity and glory (JHN 17:10).

I will say with Catherine of Genoa: 'God is my I, and I know no other I than this my God.' Or to come back to Meister Eckhardt: 'The eye of God and my eye are one single eye.' 'The humble has as much power over God as God has over himself.' 'Some simple men imagine that they must see God as if He stood there and I here. It is not so. God and I are one.' 'The fire transforms into fire whatever you put into it. So does God.'

Yes, he says even more: 'I stand in the depth of eternal Divinity; here God does all his works through me and I am all that is to be understood. God made all things through me, while I was in the bottomless depth of God.'

It seems senseless to recite before you words of faith which you yourself must have inspired. These words express the highest level a heart can reach.

Ah, I am torn in two - but wait, I could use Paul's expression: 'I am crucified.' I love you and long for perfect union with you. I love also those who suffer on earth, in hell, and in heaven. I feel their pain as mine. I feel every pain, that of innocents and of their henchmen.

The latter suffer too. A Communist officer was in the basement of the Secret Police headquarters with a mass of corpses, the men he had just shot. He began to cry aloud, as he went from corpse to corpse: 'Please say something! Move! I did not mean to do you ill. I did not even know you. I shot you, but did not desire that you be so completely dead for ever. Please speak! Please move!' His comrades first put him in an asylum, then, to silence their own conscience, finished him off.

The pain of this criminal is also mine. To be very honest with you, I must say there is in me a voice that says 'I hate God' because of this tragedy. I do not silence the voice, fearing that if it is repressed it will become louder.

I ask you the question you asked your mother: 'What is it between me and you?'

I might tell you what no one before me dared to tell, not because they were hypocrites, but because the circumstances of their life did not allow them to probe the depths I reached in years of intense sufferings in a Communist prison cell.

God might answer here and there a prayer. He has done so for me, too. But he never fulfilled the great requests of his church, though endlessly presented to him for thousands of years.

He did not cause his name to be hallowed in all the world, he did not bring his kingdom, he did not see to it that his will was fulfilled.

Millions are without a crust of bread. We have the consciousness of many sins unforgiven (this is why Catholics believe in purgatory). We meet temptations every day, and we are not delivered from evil.

Why? What is wrong? It is hard on me to continue this letter today. Farewell till another time.

p133

My Fourteenth Letter to Jesus

Dear Jesus,

I broke off my last letter on a very sore point.

I had even gone so far as to say, 'I hate God.'

Well, there are no pure metals in the earth. Pure metal is an intellectual concept. Instead, we find iron, gold, silver, etc, always in alloys. Similarly, no one has pure love. It is always mixed with other elements. David, Job and many other saints have chided God with harsh words.

God has chosen as the vehicle of his revelation languages in which words have contradictory meanings. In Hebrew, ~Baruch~ is used for 'bless' and 'curse.' ~Kadosh~ means 'holy' and 'sexually perverted'; ~kedeshah~, 'saintly woman' and 'prostitute.'

In Greek, ~afes~ means 'to forgive' and 'to leave.' In the original of the 'Our Father,' we pray 'forgive us our sins' and 'leave us our sins.' Who among those who ask forgiveness does not cherish also the desire to keep them? In Greek we express both desires in one word.

The Kabbalah asks, 'How can one love God with all his heart, seeing he has in his heart both good and bad impulses?' It replies, 'Serve God with both.'

The lover of God is also a critic of God. In the Book of Lamentations are reproaches against God of a kind that Communists can use in their atheistic books.

Such criticism is wrong, and we have to say so even if the guilty are biblical authors. Criticism should never place blame, insult, hurt or retaliate. It should be constructive. But even God should at least listen to criticism, even if he does not take it.

We have a good God and a bad world. Loving God without reservation might mean resigning oneself to a bad world, with all the suffering this involves. Siding with the world in its pain brings one into conflict with God, who has predestined all things, including this pain.

We reproach God; he very justifiably reproaches us. What he demands of us also remains unfulfilled.

You are the middleman. A mediator is not partisan. You did your best to make peace between God and us. You tried to tear down the wall of partition between us. And you suffered for it, as it is written, 'Whoso breaks a hedge a serpent shall bite him.' You were crucified by men, and the heavenly Father found pleasure in your being bruised. He was the last to determine your crucifixion.

Now you continue with your work of peace-making, though much of your loving energy has been squandered.

Generally, good teachings are beautiful, but most are wasted. They were wasted on Lucifer and his angels, on the Jews, and now on Christendom.

But you are love, and love continues to strive.

One of your principal objectives is to teach us the value of suffering, knowing that if rebellion against it ceased, the path of our union with God would be cleared.

What would Beethoven have been without his deafness? His sonatas for piano, his late string quartets, and the ninth symphony became possible only because of his deafness. The absolute concentration, this ascending into other worlds, the complaints never heard before, and the song of joy could be expressed only by a deaf composer. Beethoven created many works before being stricken, but he reached the peak of creativity as a deaf man.

p135 ..... My 14th Letter to Jesus

You want us to accept suffering - ours, that of our fellowmen, and yours. Then we will be one with God. Who will then complain about his not fulfilling the demands in the 'Our Father'? Who will even say the 'Our Father,' and to whom? Who knows what might happen then? We might be united with God even in his finding pleasure in the bruising of his Son.

All problems would disappear.

You must be the One who inspired this deep longing for unity with God even in the pagan religions.

Just as you appropriated the sayings of the Jewish prophets while in Galilee and simply repeated the words of your predecessor John the Baptist, 'Repent, because the kingdom of heaven is near,' so you have humbled yourself to repeat the words of the mythical Krishna.

I read with interest in the Hindu ~Kurma Purana~: 'Yoga is divided into two parts. One is called ~Abhava~ [a word akin to the Hebrew ~Ahavah~ - love], the other ~mahayoga~. ~Abhavah~ is the state in which you meditate about your own I as a zero, lacking qualities. ~Mahayoga~ is the state in which the own I is seen as full of delights, totally righteous and one with God.... Other kinds of yoga of which we hear and read are not worthy to be put on the same level with the wonderful mahayoga, in which the ~yoghin~ knows himself and the whole universe as God.'

I know both states, but my trouble is that I am fixed in neither of them.

~Mai-Trajana-Brahmana-Upanishad~ says: 'Water in water, fire in fire, air in air - no one can distinguish them. Likewise, one cannot distinguish from the great I the man who has entered into him. This man has reached liberty.' 'The One who is in fire, and the One who is in the heart, and the One who is in the sun are one and the same. The man who knows it becomes one with the Unique.'

If this unity were a fact of existence for me, I could say like Jesus, 'I am the way.' Paul felt himself to be like this.

A missionary to Africa relates how he followed a black

p136 ..... My Correspondence With Jesus

guide through the jungle during the night and asked again and again, 'Which is the way?' The guide, who did not know Scripture, replied, 'I am the way. You just follow me.'

But I have not become one with you. Water in water may be indistinguishable, but I can be distinguished from God.

I had the privilege of spending years in solitary confinement. I could practise what is called 'the yoga of six kinds,' the restraint of respiration, meditation, fixed attention, research, and absorption. It did not achieve for me my aim.

Perhaps now I understand. A legend says that once while walking with Peter you saw a small coin on the road and told him, 'Pick it up.' He replied, 'It's not worth it. What can you buy with such a coin?' So you picked it up yourself. A merchant gave you eighteen cherries for it. While continuing the walk, you dropped one after the other. Peter, thirsty, bowed to pick them up. He bowed eighteen times because he had not bowed once at the right time, at your command.

Men spend decades practising yoga because they have not followed your calling. Neither did I. I did not take the one big step of faith that makes me one hated by the world, as you were hated, but that unites a man instantly with God: the erasing of the consciousness of a separate I (except perhaps for conversational purposes). 'I do not live, but you live in me.' I have no other I than you. Then you are I and I am you.

I am reminded of an amusing incident recounted by a Slovak nun. A teacher in primary school, she gave the children candy on St Nicholas' Day. But one child, Stanko, was ill, so she gave another boy, John, a slipper full of candy to take to him.

When Stanko recovered, she asked him if he had enjoyed the present; he said he never received it. She confronted Stanko and John together.

p137 ..... My 14th Letter to Jesus

'I gave them to you,' said John, pointing to himself.

'I received nothing,' Stanko protested.

But John repeated, pointing to himself, 'I gave them to "you." Don't you call me "you"? Well, I gave them to the one you call "you." I fulfilled my assignment.

We smile at this little story. But in our relationship this is reality. You always call me 'you.' I have become a child again, as you taught. You did not even tell me to become a good child, but simply a child. I became a naughty child that takes candies belonging to you. You call me you. I am you. And I have the candy. In a relationship with Godhead this is acceptable.

You told us to become like children; you also taught us that we are gods. In the manger, you were a child-god. But a child-god is also God in all his supremeness.

You are the heart of my desires. I do not simply throw away my self. I thrust it like an arrow toward the goal. There goal and arrow become one.

For a while you were one body with the blessed Virgin. She bore within herself the wonderful Friend. You went with her wherever she walked. So you live within every one of us.

How magnified was your mother! You say that whoever will do the will of your Father who is in heaven is your mother (MTT 12:50). So we too are magnified.

Protestants object that Mary is almost deified by Catholics, instead of comprehending that every Christian is deified. The Hebrew biblical ~ani-hu~ (I am he) shows that the "ani"-I and the "hu"-he have ceased to exist as separate beings.

The two have merged. The new being has no problems, no torments. He is serene, he smiles, he lives above the turmoil of this world.

I understand now. Help me to consummate my chief desire.

p138

My Fifteenth Letter to Jesus

Dear Jesus,

You once wept over Jerusalem in great wracking sobs. At the tomb of Lazarus it was only quiet weeping, or just a welling of tears. I surely would not like to add to your grief.

I also hope that in the end everything will be clear, that saints will not be disappointed. The last words of Moody at death were, 'The earth gets further away. Heaven opens before my eyes. If this is death, it is sweet. God calls me and I have to go. This is my triumph, the day of my coronation.'

He had assured his converts: 'Once you will read in the newspapers that Dwight Moody of East Northfield has died. Don't believe it. Then I will be more alive than now. What is born of the flesh can die, but what is born of the Spirit will live eternally.'

He must have been right. Some organ in his body failed to function well. The whole universe would be unreasonable if a splendid spirit would have to disappear because of some disorder of the flesh.

In music every note is played separately. A melody exists only because we can retain in our consciousness a piece of time. Man is superior to time. We think and we make projects. We are superior to this world. We will survive it.

p139 ..... My 15th Letter to Jesus

All this I believe, and I am thankful that you gave us this eternal life through your sacrifice on the cross.

But - if only these hellish "buts" did not plague me.... The Jew Tevye in ~Fiddler on the Roof~ said to you, 'God, I did not complain that you gave me five daughters in my poverty. But why did you let my only horse go lame just on Sabbath eve?' I have no reply to this.

When innocent men are taken to prison, parting with their wives and poor children is like pulling the flesh from their bones.

But the miracle happens. There are saints among the innocents. Bunyan told his jailers, 'If I were out of prison today, I would preach the gospel again tomorrow by the help of God' - the almighty God in whose world he spent twelve years in jail for preaching his gospel.

Tevye puts daring questions to God but sticks to the Jewish tradition, even if he knows almost nothing about it.

Men in pain, trying to forget their suffering, invented the old, old story: A young man who loved a girl to madness knocked one night at her door, begging admittance. She asked, 'Who is it?' He said, 'It is I.' She replied, 'I cannot receive you, because my room is small and my bed narrow. Only one person has a place in it.'

Knowing the girl loved him dearly, he could not understand her refusal. For many years he wandered in the world, yearning for the girl. And then the inspiration came.

One night, he knocked at her door again. She asked from within, 'Who is it?' This time he replied, 'It is you.' The door opened immediately, and the beloved embraced him.

In heaven, too, there is place for only one. This I understand. Everyone who comes there as an 'I' will be rejected. The one who asks for entrance at the gates of heaven must be able to say to God, 'I am you.' Then he will be received.

p140 ..... My Correspondence With Jesus

I am you, which means I have to abandon all questions and problems belonging to the 'I.' Does God worry about decrucifying Jesus? If not, why should I?

St Claire, when she lay dying amid great sufferings, was asked how she could bear such pain. She answered joyously, 'Ever since I learned of the grace of my Lord Jesus Christ through his servant Francis of Assisi, no suffering has troubled me, no penance has been hard, no sickness too arduous.'

You ask me what all my letters are about? I suppose they are from the unbelieving part of me. For the other part, it would have been enough to give heed to what I myself preach and to the many illustrations I use in order to renounce everything that troubles me.

Consider one of my favourite parables: A dwarf who was also a hunchback decided to commit suicide. Who could ever love him? He would ascend a mountain and throw himself off a cliff. While climbing he met a girl of exquisite beauty. She had made the same decision because her loved one had opted for a rich bride. They decided to commit suicide together.

Continuing the ascent, they met a police officer who told them he was after a notorious robber and murderer. The king had promised a great reward to whoever caught him, and the police officer was sure he would find him. There was an unmistakable identification: the murderer had six fingers on his right hand.

Near the peak was a monastery whose abbot, though only recently tonsured, had already achieved the fame of a great saint and had brought many to conversion. At the very entrance to the monastery the trio saw the abbot. The girl bowed to kiss the right hand. She observed it had six fingers.

The former murderer was now the renowned saint.

With this my story ends.

The audiences always objected. 'The story is not finished yet. What happened to the girl, and the dwarf, and the police officer? Was the abbot apprehended?

Well, the story was a test. The elect fall in adoration before the One who changes murderers into saints. Beside this miracle everything else pales into insignificance.

I believe this response is the only right attitude. Our minds are too preoccupied with many childish questions.

A children's class was shown a painting of the Nativity and they were told, 'The holy family was very poor.' A child asked, 'Where did they get the money to pay the photographer?'

Another child was taught how Adam became a living soul when God breathed his spirit into him sighed, 'So God is dead.' He could not be convinced otherwise. 'Everyone who gives up his spirit is dead.'

We smile about such childish sayings and questions. I suppose you smile about my incoherent thoughts.

I am uncomfortable with attempts to put coherence into our thoughts on religious matters. To what purpose? You see everything. You knew my thoughts in their incoherent state. You know their being systematised is only superficial or cosmetic. It does not belong to the essence.

But - and I come back to my first thoughts about decrucifying you - is there any sense in these thoughts?

In Mahayana Buddhism, there is a belief in Boddhisatvas, men who have achieved perfection and thus at death can enter into nirvana. But as they look at their fellowmen, who are like victims going to the slaughter, immense compassion grips them and they refuse nirvana until they have brought in all these unfortunate souls.

They take upon themselves the burden of sorrow, the pain of all men living. If they were to renounce suffering, they would defraud the world of the root of good.

Like the writings of the Jewish prophets, these hopes of India were forebodings of your coming - you, the Messiah of the Jews, whom Indians might yet call the greatest, yes, the unique, Boddhisatva.

Decrucifying a Boddhisatva is like taking away from a surgeon the tools with which he can save lives. When Communism in Chine chopped off the fingers of pianists, how could they then make music? Suffering is the melody with which Boddhisatvas heal mankind.

Instead of decrucifying them, should we not rather unite with the Boddhisatvas? Don't we all have this priestly calling to bear another's sins and griefs?

Thinking about this role we have to play, John Chrysostom said, 'Speak not of royal purple or diadems, of golden vestments; all these are but shadows more frail than flowers of spring compared with the glories and powers of the priesthood.'

Instead of decrucifying you and others, I should rather hasten to be crucified with you. Then I will be able to write like Paul: 'Those things which you have both learned and received and heard and seen ~in me~, do' (PHP 4:9). At first glance, these are the words of an egotist. Paul gives himself as a model of truth and pattern of life. Paul, a former persecutor, a man who confesses even after conversion, 'Nothing good is in me,' and 'I am the chief of sinners.'

It would have seemed natural for him to write, 'Those things which you have learned and seen ~in Christ~, do.' But he does not say, 'Follow the example ~of Christ~.' His words are, 'Follow ~my example~.'

If I were able to ask Paul about this, he would not understand the question. 'To follow Christ' or 'to follow me, Paul' - what is the difference? Do these not express the same thought? What is the difference between himself and Christ for a man who says, 'I do not live any more, but Christ lives in me'?

Working for a very backward tribe, a missionary doctor cared for a sick woman and told her about Christ. She could not understand his words but saw his goodness.

p143 ..... My 15th Letter to Jesus

Once she asked, 'Tell me, what is this Christ like about whom you speak?' He, in a moment of supreme spiritual courage, replied, 'He is like me.' Then she said, 'If he is so, I love him and trust in him.'

I resolve, therefore, to become like you, and then I will no longer grieve about your being crucified. Like all the great saints of all the centuries, I will have the desire to be crucified with you. I will find my delight in suffering for others.

p144

My Sixteenth Letter to Jesus

Dear Jesus,

I realize the fallacy of all-or-nothing thinking. In jail I composed a poem that began with the words, 'Give yourself fully to me or leave me completely.' I realize now that my statement was wrong.

Innumerable factors shape the relationship between two beings. There are some things in you that make me love you passionately. About some of your activities I have reservations. If I said otherwise, you would know I am lying. Regarding some matters, I would like you to a make a U-turn, to which your reply is, '"You" turn.'

But in faith I apply a mental filter. All men have such a filter. If a man received ten nice letters and one bad, he would fret over the bad letter and ignore the rest. I use the filter in the opposite sense. I erase from my mind everything about which we might disagree, or - to put it mildly - which I do not understand, and I keep only the positive.

I bracket some of the thoughts that occur to me. It is probably too early for me to come to a conclusion about your character. We know only an infinitesimal part of it. For love one does not need more.

Romeo and Juliet fell in love after once glance at a masked ball in which they had scarcely seen each other's face. The next thing they knew was that they belonged to families committed to a blood feud. But the love produced by even such a tenuous knowledge of each other was sufficient to overcome all barriers. It is a love that flouts reason.

The heavenly Bridegroom tells us, 'You have ravished my heart with one single glance of your eyes.' I could say this about you. Many years ago, before I had even read your Gospel or heard a sermon, an inner voice said to me, 'Jesus is a friend. If you would talk over all things with him, you would obtain the peace for which you long.' At that time I had not the slightest idea that you had died for me.

How much did Magdalene know when she kissed your feet and washed them with her tears?

I love you for the little I know of you. Juliet's parents could have brought many telling arguments against an affair with Romeo. And they would have been perfectly right, as the outcome shows. They would have told her that emotional reasoning is not to be trusted, that it is wrong to magnify one pleasant feature in a man, to label someone an ideal lover because he is attractive at first glance. But all such counsel would have been to no avail.

The essence of my life is to praise you. Good men become better when praised; bad men become worse. You cannot become better because the very word 'God' means a being whose better cannot be imagined. I praise you not because of your need, nor because I wish to obtain something from you. I praise you because a voice in me, overcoming all objections, tells me you only are praiseworthy.

I told you the story of the murderer with six fingers on his right hand who had become a saintly abbot. When you were a child, the Virgin Mary told you stories. Why should I not do the same? This story belongs to the Christian tradition, though the Jews have a similar one.

Two impoverished children walked around begging.

A blind man who gave them alms said, 'Become like me.' Then they received something from a deaf man, who repeated the same words. And so it went with a stutterer, a man without legs, and other handicapped individuals.

It took the children many years to understand, but eventually they had an illumination: only the blind see. Men with sight have their attention absorbed by so many things that will prove to be mere will-o'-the-wisps that they are blind to the one reality: you. Only the deaf hear. Those with hearing are distracted by useless noises and things hardly worth hearing. (I know. I was like a deaf man in a jail in which perfect silence reigned. Then I heard your voice and the song of celestial spheres.) Only the stutterer expresses well the contradictory, conflicting, chaotic things he sees and sentiments he experiences. The man who speaks smoothly falsifies incoherent reality in order to be systematic and to speak well.

With this the story ends. What happened further with these children and the men they had met, is no more important. Whoever does not learn from the little that is said will not learn even if he hears the whole story.

At any rate, I do not have to know your whole story. Who could know it?

The Bible says that God created the sun and moon to give light upon the earth. We think of the sun as useful to us, but only a minuscule fraction of its light reaches the earth. It has many more functions.

So we know you as the Saviour of mankind. You are much more than Saviour of one species on what in the universe is only a speck of dust. We know your career only in its relationship to us. Even this we do not know fully, because you continue to live in a glorified human body. Your task is not yet finished.

We even hear about new crucifixions you endure. We do not know their details, nor the resurrections by which they are followed.

To us you are a mystery, but a mystery we love heartily.

p147 ..... My 16th Letter to Jesus

It is such a joy to see you. In a certain sense you are unseen, but you are also seen. It is written that the children of Israel at Sinai saw the voice. Blindfolded dolphins find coins thrown into the water. They can even distinguish between different metals, thanks to the echo of the sound produced by their falling into water. The sound becomes a picture in their mind. Bats, too, 'see' with their ears. They can find insects without seeing them with their eyes. They also hear high-pitched sounds that we cannot perceive.

Nowadays we transform sound waves into images in our clinics through the use of ultrasound technology.

You also speak to us on a pitch that can be caught only by your own sheep. Atheists are right when they say they hear nothing.

Those who guard the borders in Communist countries communicate with their dogs with whistles at a pitch unperceived by human ears. The one who tries to cross the frontier secretly hears nothing.

We have no quarrel with atheists. We understand them. They lack our privilege. They do not hear what we hear. Your words become images within our minds and hearts. We see you; we can always evoke you.

In this sense you are as near to us as you were to the disciples of the first century.

A renowned pastor wrote that at the age of three his grandson wanted to be a monkey, sit on a tree, and eat bananas. By the age of six, he had decided to become an astronaut. So also does mankind change in a few short years.

But you have remained the same. I can evoke you as did John on Patmos.

You are here. All I need is the eye of faith. God gives the milk but not the pail. Faith is a gift of God, but our will also plays a part. I can see you. A power emanates from you toward me, as it did to the woman who had a loss of blood. I can take more power than she did.

p148 ..... My Correspondence With Jesus

Some believers are satisfied to receive from you only enough power to obey the words of God. But I listen to what you have said through the men who wrote the word of God and can go beyond the mere reading. You can make "me" a channel of wisdom and guidance for others.

Furthermore, I can sing an entirely new song. The Talmud says, 'Angels never repeat their litanies.' Even when the angels sing 'Holy, holy, holy is the Lord Sabaoth,' they do not repeat themselves. In Hebrew the words of the Bible have musical notes. Every 'holy' in this verse is sung on another note. So you wish to have the Song of the Lamb sung on the Wurmbrand notes.

Mozart wrote his compositions almost without corrections. Beethoven wrote and rewrote his, innumerable times. He never ceased changing. My thoughts evolve, too. A while ago there was a deep conflict between us. I had wild plans for decrucifying you, even against your will. Then I had the idea of organising a strike of all crucifiers. Then I began to wonder if you really are still crucified.

Now all these thoughts have disappeared. Only love remains.

It is so easy to love you, because you are very much like us. Karl Barth calls God 'the entirely Other.' So he is. But who is not entirely other? A man once said to Rabbi Yakov-Itzhak of Pshiske, 'I would like to know what the birds are singing.' To which the rabbi replied, 'What you yourself are saying. Do you understand?' I am myself entirely other than what I believe or would like myself to be. By being entirely other, you are like me.

A youth was told, 'Don't watch TV so much. You should read the Bible.

He asked, 'Why should I not watch TV?'

'Because there is so much sex and violence in it.'

The youth said truthfully, 'There is more sex and violence in the Bible. On TV you cannot see the slaughter of whole nations, including women and children, and even animals, or sodomy and incest.'

For everything having to do with man, there is a counterpart in heaven. There is a war going on in heaven. Angels had swords before men invented weapons. You wished so much to be like us that you became sin for us, even the most abject sin. No wonder so much in your revelation is like our thoughts and instincts.

In jail, I had a vision of a female angel who had come to lead me to heaven. With surprise, I found myself descending stairs. I was told, 'You thought heaven was above. Well, because many cannot reach the heights, not being able to bear the icy cold of the peaks, heaven has descended below men. No matter how far you descend, heaven is still below you.'

I am in your embrace. All other thoughts have disappeared. Your words have proved true: 'The Son of man will come in an hour when you think not.' We become one.

The Hindus and Sufites, being human, were wrong to say, 'I am he.' I as God would be a godhead to no purpose. But in the Bible God is the one who says, '~Ani-hu~ - I am he.' This is condescension. But whichever way it happened, we are one. My I is denied, my sinful I, as well as my own righteousness, and the compassion my I has for you.

It is wrong for a caterpillar to remain a caterpillar, and for a seed to remain a seed. An embryo is not meant to remain an embryo, nor should children remain children. Adolescents must develop further, as must adults and even the aged. We are all called to godlikeness, to such a likeness with him that we may almost be mistaken for each other, like twins. It was not in vain that apostle Thomas was called in the Bible 'Didymus,' which in Greek means 'the twin.'

Blessed be thou, Jesus, my beloved ~Ani-Hu~. I advance toward you.

p150 ..... My Correspondence With Jesus

The ancient Greeks believed in Neptune as god of the seas. It is said that a sea captain caught by a storm in the Aegean shouted, 'Father Neptune, if you will, sink me; if you will, save me; but whatever your decision, I will keep my rudder true.'

Some you accept, some you reject; some you help, while others encounter great hindrances on their way. I do not know how it will be with me. But I remain true to my resolve: to be united in love with you.

p151

The First Letter from Jesus

My beloved disciple,

I inspired the apostle John to write about 'a beloved disciple.' Many commentators have tried to guess who this might have been and have attached a name to this title. I did not intend that this be done.

I am the only Teacher and I always have only one beloved disciple – you, no one else but you. Everyone can run for the position of ~the one~ beloved disciple by seeking me as teacher.

~You~ are my beloved disciple, but make sure you are convinced of this without any hesitation.

In the sixteenth century I had a unique beloved disciple in Germany, prior John of Landsberg, who wrote the classic ~A Letter from Jesus Christ~. It really was my letter. I lived in him and inspired the letter, but he apologises in the beginning for daring to use my name. He says it is only a literary device, though he should have been convinced of his union with me.

He wrote these words, attributed to me:

> When I stand knocking at your door, I shall be very weak and shivering with cold and shall need you very much. When I stand at your door, I shall be as I was when they freed me from the pillar they bound me to, to whip me and wound me > for your sake. When I show myself to you, I show myself in the form of a man weak, degraded and insulted. I want to impress my image on your mind as one suffering and wounded, so that you take pity on me and lift me up and embrace me, and hold me with the arms of your love.

How could he have doubted that these words were really mine? What reasonable man would doubt the authenticity of Moses' record of the words spoken by an ass to Balaam? The first words of an ass allowed to speak would certainly be these: 'What have I done unto you that you have smitten me?' (NUM 22:28). Certain words have the ring of truth. One can rely on their authenticity.

My way of speaking to men is to insinuate myself into their psyche. When this happens to a beloved disciple, he knows that when he speaks, I speak. Peter was certain of this when he made this recommendation: 'If any man speaks, let him speak as the oracles of God' (1PE 4:11).

Now "I" speak. Listen to me.

You are getting old and useless. You feel frustrated because of this. Therefore you write so many letters.

Not many feel the need of me either. It is still an open question if, when I return, I will find any real faith on earth. But there is a beauty in uselessness.

I like Chuang-Tzu's story: A wandering carpenter examined an old oak tree standing near an earthen altar on a field. He said to his apprentice, 'This tree is no good. Make a ship out of it and it will rot. Make tools and they will break. That is why it has become old.'

That same evening, the oak tree appeared to him in a dream and said, 'Why do you compare me with fruit trees that are useful? Even before the fruit ripens, people attack them. They break the branches and tear the twigs. Because such trees are so productive and bear tasty fruit, they do not live out their natural span. Therefore I decided to become useless. Nothing useful reaches my size. What do you, mortal man, know about useless trees?'

p153 ..... My 1st Letter from Jesus

Next day the carpenter told the apprentice, 'Altars would not last if they were not erected before long-lived, useless trees.'

False gods are widely trusted and continually bothered. I am not as men would like me to be. I leave no prayer unanswered, but often my answer is 'No.' God still says 'No' to multiplied prayers of the church for over 2,000 years that his name be sanctified, his kingdom come, and his will be done on earth.

On earth, I always said 'I am': 'I am the bread of life'; 'I am the light of the world'; 'I am the door of the sheepfold.' Paul, too, said 'I am what I am.'

Peter said, 'I am not.' He said it when he denied me. You say boldly that "I" live in you, that "I" write in your writings, that a letter written by you is "my" letter.

The heathen have had more courage to identify with their gods than Christians have to identify themselves with me, though I have taught them to do so.

You mentioned yourself that in the Egyptian ~Book of the Dead~, the man who has died, after passing through judgement, becomes one with Osiris and is addressed as God. Toth, secretary of the gods, says this about the dead man Hunifer: 'The heart of Osiris has been weighed, and his soul was a witness for him. He was found truthful.' What a witness! This, fourteen centuries before my birth.

The Bhagavad Gita teaches something similar: 'A man bears within himself a wonderful friend, whom he does not know, because God lives within every man, but few find him. The man who sacrifices his desires and works for the being from whom all things come and who created the world, reaches through this sacrifice perfection - because the man who finds in himself joy and happiness and light is one with God.'

The most beautiful words in a heathen religion are from the Lamaist "Book of Golden Teachings": 'Where is now your individuality, O Lanoo [disciple], where is Lanoo himself? A spark united with the fire, a drop sunk in the ocean, the always-existing ray become the full and everlasting light. Now, O Lanoo, you are the one who acts and the witness, you are the one who emits and you are the emitted beam, the light in the sound and the sound in the light.' 'If you succeed in arriving at the seventh degree, you most happy, you will not see before you the Holy Trinity any more, because you yourself will be this trinity.' Before the mystic force can make a god out of you, you must obtain first the capacity to destroy, at your pleasure, your lunar form.' (The moon is the symbol of fantasy.)

The Book of Revelation says, 'The earth and heaven fled away' (REV 20:11). The theoretical world, which is a fiction, has to disappear so that the one reality might remain.

Identify yourself with me and write my letter to the beloved disciple.

I in you will be different from I in others. But everywhere it is "I," just as every pine is still a pine. But the growth of some pines is obstructed by a stone; some have better soil, some are on a slope, others on a cliff; some get more sun, others more water. Every pine is different from its comrades, just as every man is unique.

Remember this from the poem you conceived in prison:

When God made me in the secret place,
He made me to be a 'me';
To be in my own way the herald of his glory,
To be unique as God is.

May your uniqueness and your being challenged by those who would judge you not make you doubt that I am you,

p155 ..... My 1st Letter from Jesus that I speak in you. The Galatian Christians received Paul 'even as Christ Jesus.' They were no fools, neither was Paul a fraud for accepting honours due to him. They equated – and they were right – receiving Paul with receiving me.

You may have two sure signs that it is I who speak: first, that every word is inspired by love; second, that my talk is not systematic, that I will jump from one subject to another. (By the way, I like the way you do so yourself.)

System is a product of reason, a minuscule part of man. Emotion, the irrational, has its part when I speak. Love itself does not belong to reason, but even contradicts it.

I taught that when a king sees that he has only 10,000 soldiers, whereas the enemy has 20,000, he would do well to make peace. This is what reason dictates. But I, abandoned by all disciples except you, the one beloved, took up the fight, did not yield, did not make peace with darkness, and was crucified. No one should expect my letter to be always reasonable, systematic.

In Thomas Aquinas, everything is reasonable. I was nice to him and said, 'You have written well about me.' But he realized his shortcomings and said at the end, 'All I have written is only straw.'

You remember what a Russian Baptist pastor of the underground church said when you tried to teach him systematic theology: 'Did those who founded this science bear a heavy cross? Jesus did not think systematically when crucified. Everyone of his seven last words on Golgotha is on a different subject. It is dangerous to think systematically. Those who do so have not fulfilled the first commandment: to be crucified with Jesus.'

Just leave my thoughts to me; allow them to pass quietly from one sphere to another. My thinking is not subjected to any law.

The value of laws has diminished even in natural science. In microphysics, laws provide only a statistical average, indicating how particles in great numbers behave. Every single particle is unique. How it will behave is unpredictable, indeterminate.

So you are unique; even more am I. I do not fit into any system. I the founder of the Christian religion do not fit even into the category of its founder. I am beyond any such pigeon-hole.

Systematic thinking is clear-cut: either/or.

There was once a king who was hungry. His servants brought him bread and two jars, one with peanut butter, the other with jelly, so as to fix him a sandwich. But he could not decide which he preferred and in an agony of indecision grew hungrier and hungrier. His wise men urged him to eat, some advising peanut butter, others jelly. The hunger increased until finally a girl taught him the magic word 'and.' Make the sandwich with peanut butter ~and~ jelly.

I come with truth and grace, though normally the two do not go well together. I am the truth and the life. I satisfy both demands. Therefore the Kabbalah says, 'God made the world through the latter ~Vav~,' which in Hebrew stands for 'and.'

With me there is room for the whole of life, including all its contradictions. Therefore I can give peace.

Learn from your grandson Alexander. Once he was told he would be taken to the doctor for a cough. He came back happy: 'The doctor does not have a cough.'

Men come to me with sins and sorrows. They look to me and are happy when they leave, because I am sinless and serene. Be like me.

Well, this whole correspondence began because you did not believe me to be serene, but agonising again on crosses. We will speak about this next time.

p157

The Second Letter from Jesus

My beloved,

Be sure of what you write in my name. Luther was never sure whether his break with the Papacy was inspired by me or arose from his own pride and obstinacy. He knew about union with me. He had written in his ~Commentary on Galatians~ The Christian is Christ,' but he did not live up to his own teaching.

He had the excuse of not having read Pushkin's words: 'I write what I live and live what I write.'

How could Luther have united with me, the King of the Jews, while remaining a Jew-hater? How could he have united with the God of love when he loathed the Pope, priests, monks, Baptists and peasants?

But if you are rooted and grounded in love, you can write and speak with confidence in my name.

If you will purify yourself, what you write in my name will not only be beautiful, it will be me. This letter is mine. I have condescended to inspire it in the hope that you will be clean.

You wish to decrucify me. I came to earth to decrucify you. I said so in my first sermon in Nazareth: '[God] has sent me to heal the broken-hearted, to preach deliverance of the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised' (LUK 4:18).

p158 ..... My Correspondence With Jesus

Because you were crucified in sin and sorrow, I too was crucified. The Father could have given me twelve legions of angels to fight for me, but he did not. I never asked him why. Not all his experiences with angels were good. A third of them rebelled with Lucifer. Even now he finds many a mistake with them. Perhaps there was a chance angels would not have obeyed. Apparently they did not volunteer.

You endure your lot, and I endure mine. When you say 'I wish to decrucify you,' this 'I' does not represent your whole person, but only a part of your conscious ego. You have in yourself the shadow that says 'No' to all to which the ego says 'Yes.' Half a man cannot decrucify me. No one is yet more than half a man.

Paul was a beloved disciple, yet even he had to confess that he was divided between two laws (ROM 7:21-23).

Your plans for me did not succeed. My plans for mankind worked out only for a few. We both have to endure crucifixions quietly, confident that the words 'all thing work together for good' apply to us, too.

The Koran borrowed a story from the Jews and beautified it. According to this tale, Moses met Khidr, the first angel of God, in the desert. Khidr agreed to show Moses his works on condition that Moses would express no opinion about them. If he did, Khidr would leave.

The first thing Khidr did was to scuttle near the shore a fishing boat belonging to poor men. Then he killed a handsome young man. Then he restored the wall of a wicked city. Moses, unable to contain himself any longer, protested. Before leaving, Khidr explained: 'Pirates wanted to steal the boat. They would have slaughtered the men too. I saved them. They can salvage the boat later. The young man was on his way to commit a crime. I saved him from infamy. While digging in order to strengthen the wall, two pious youngster found a treasure.'

There is sense behind even the most foolish things.

p159 ..... My 2nd Letter from Jesus

There is a sense behind the folly of Golgotha, behind your pain, and behind my being crucified afresh in heaven by saints who sin.

At a certain moment, you told me, 'I love you' but also 'I hate you.' This is nothing new for me. I know that human love might well be called 'love-hate,' because every man has the ego, the self, the Id, the conscious and the unconscious. Every man has a shadow that resents what the ego embraces.

How I love Rabbi Levi-Itzchak of Berditchev! And he loved me. But he made the same mistake you do. You are preoccupied too much with mankind's sorrows and my sufferings. This leads to melancholy and madness.

I would have preferred that the evangelists describing Golgotha chronicle not only my pain, but also the details of the garden nearby, with its roses and carnations, the children enjoying butterflies, the birds that flitted about, as well as the many who feasted the Passover in quiet and genuine faith. They should not have pictured only the darkness, but also the bright sunshine before the darkness. And they might have acknowledged the genuine, if sorrily misled, faith that made some vote for my death sentence. Evangelists should be more serene.

You commit the same error. The Communist countries are not all prisons full of torture. They also produce love and song and enjoyment of life.

Rabbi Levi-Itzchak of Berditchev, too, had been trapped in the web of suffering. He proclaimed on the Day of Atonement, 'Today all your creatures stand before you so that you may pass sentence. But I say it is you who shall be judged today.'

He refused to blow the ram's horn on New Year's day, as prescribed by Moses' law, shouting, 'Let Ivan do it, since you side with him.'

I shout to him and he shouts to me, not realizing what he is really doing. He shows he has my character; he is one with me. Together we share the cosmic pain and the reactions it produces.

Buddha said life is all evil. He was wrong. Man is not only sin, as some preachers declare in my name. God is not all wrong in denying many human petitions.

You and I, Godhead and man, both live. To live means to evolve toward something higher, to be in a state of tension, to be in conflict with what opposes you. You do not realize that when you are in opposition to me, you are one with me, as I am one with you when I chide and punish you. You are one with my tension.

Our unity is ontological, not psychological. Tao-te-King said it rightly: 'The man with Tao [the supreme God] is identical with Tao as the man with De [matter] is identical with De.'

If you identify with me, think like me. On Golgotha, there were more flowers and saints than crosses. Even if I am crucified in heaven, it is in a splendid heaven that I suffer. So do not be obsessed only by the sufferings that happen here, but admire also the unspeakable beauties in which there is some suffering.

Rabbi Nahman of Bratzlav, another darling of mine, once asked a Jew, 'Did you see the sky today?'

He replied, 'I have been too busy. I have a family to feed.'

'Did you see people today?'

'I saw lots of them. Men and women, and children and cabs and shops.'

'Well, after hundreds of years there will be other men and other shops on other kinds of streets. Only you and I will not be any more. So what is the good of looking at so many things and not having time to enjoy the sky?'

I am the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world. I suffered in Abel and in all the saints since. I hung on a cross in Jerusalem and have been crucified since. Everything passes. These things will pass, too. In the end I will triumph. The eternal beauties and truth and love are unmoved. Look to them and you will have joy.

You cannot decrucify me because you have taken upon yourself too big a task.

You are like St Christopher. Proud of his strength, he was desirous of helping only the strongest. He served a king, but the devil subdued the king, so he served the devil. Then he found out the devil trembles before Christ. So, following a priest's advice, he waited for Christ at a river crossing. It would be something splendid to carry across the stream no less than the Son of God.

But then a little child came. As a pastime, bored by so much waiting, Christopher volunteered to carry the child on his shoulders. But with every step in the water, the child became heavier and heavier, until Christopher realized he was carrying the weight of the whole universe.

There are so many children on Golgothas. In the USA alone, 100,000 living children have been abused sexually. Others are battered, abandoned. Do not concern yourself with decrucifying me. Take upon yourself the suffering of one child, make him happy, and it will be enough. Whoever receives one child receives me. Then you will no longer have the heavy problems that torment you.

Instead of decrucifying me - how can a drop in a bucket solve the problems of an ocean? - decrucify a fellowman.

To raise Lazarus from the dead I gave the command, 'Loose him and let him go' (JHN 11:44). You also loose some man. Make him forget the sins I have forgiven him; do not condemn a sinner whom I have acquitted; do not chide a man whom I love. It will be enough for you.

I was happy that the first Christians liked the story of the resurrection of Lazarus, which they considered a guarantee that they themselves would be resurrected. They were sure I would loose them, too, as they painted and carved the episode on their tombs. Some even had statues of Lazarus in metal or ivory.

You cannot resurrect a dead man, but you can loose one I have resurrected. Do this and I will be fully satisfied.

Saints are not men who do tremendous things. Dreams about unachievably great works are pernicious. Saints are those who do small things well.

Not every David can kill a Goliath - and, in the end, even killing a Goliath is not a big thing. The Philistines continued to be a major source of trouble to Israel for many years. But every David can do one small thing exquisitely, like Th,rŠse of Lisieux. I need no more from you.

And even if the one little thing you do is not quite exquisite and even if my Father is not able to tell you on the last day, 'Well done,' he will at least say to you, 'Well tried, good and faithful servant.'

David's great desire was to build a temple for God. He was not allowed to do so, but God did say, 'Thou didst well that it was in thine heart' (1KI 8:18).

Do, or at least try to do, one little thing well and I will be satisfied.

A young girl applied to a missionary society. When she was called, she was sure she would be sent to some interesting field, perhaps Central Africa or Thailand. The director gave her an envelope and told her, 'You will find in it your assignment. Open the letter at home.' It contained the words, 'Bring your father to Christ.'

Always think about me as a modest God.

When Lord Byron began to write, he knew Walter Scott was the leading protagonist of English literature in his time. One day, an article appeared in the press stating that after the appearance of Byron's brilliant poems, Scott could no longer be considered pre-eminent.

p163 ..... My 2nd Letter from Jesus

Walter Scott was the man who had written that article.

Such nice gestures of modesty and love please me more than expansive plans for cosmic decrucifixions.

Think along these lines.

p164

My beloved,

I see that you cannot dedicate yourself to the one child or the one sufferer who needs you, because you are worried about my being crucified afresh in heaven.

In reading the words of Paul, you have wrongly put the emphasis on the word 'crucified' instead of the phrase 'in heaven.'

Crucifixions in heaven and of the heavenly on earth are entirely different from pains as you know them.

My companion Buddha (do not wonder that I call him so; this is how the bride in Solomon's Song [SOS 1:7] refers to the founders of other religions. They are not my competitors; I have none) – my companion Buddha once was abused. He listened quietly and at the end asked his enemy, 'Friend, to whom does a present that is offered to me belong if I refuse it?'

'To the one who offered it.'

'Well,' said Buddha, 'you offered me insults, which I refuse. They belong to you.'

This is how far Buddha could go. I can go further. There is a spot in my heart which cannot be reached by crucifixion. I do not accept murder at the hands of anybody. Death cannot hold me. I mock it. The blood falls back on those who shed it.

p165 ..... My 3rd Letter from Jesus

So do not pity me. I am serene.

You know about the seven words I spoke on the cross. I hung there for three long hours. What did I do the rest of the time? Why has no one inquired into this?

I admired the flowers. I listened to the voice of the birds. I rejoiced that the Jewish people kept the Passover. I foresaw the beautiful day when they would know about an even greater liberation, which I prepare for them through my sacrifice.

I had sunlight on my face till darkness came.

Then, all other preoccupations being gone, I felt with gladness the wind and I listened to the noise of the leaves.

Some soldiers had fallen asleep while I hung on the cross. I strove not to disturb them.

I saw before my eyes all people of every nation and tribe who would be saved. Do not wonder that I mentioned the flowers before mankind. You always think about me as I am in relationship with men. But man was the last of earthly creations.

It has been asked what God did before there were men. He walked in gardens amid the flowers, enjoy tulips and nightingales.

Isaiah was right: 'It pleased God to bruise me' (ISA 53:10). It pleased Buddha to be insulted; God knew the devil would lose by crucifying me.

And the Father knew that in my human form I, too, had an outer and a hidden man, or what today's psychologists would call the 'ego' and the 'shadow.' What I consider my real 'I' went singing to Gethsemane. To this the apostles were witnesses. But when I was alone in the prison cell, I sang again. And there was an unspeakable joy in my heart as I suffered on Golgotha, too.

A man can be at the same time in heaven and in hell. You experienced this yourself in jail, while singing to the accompanying cling-clang of chains between tortures.

Therefore I could tell the penitent thief, 'Today you will be with me in paradise.' My body was that day in a grave, nowhere else. A part of me was in hell preaching to those who were long since dead (1PE 3:19). But my real 'I' never ceased to rejoice. It could not die.'

I was and am all right. There was real passion on Golgotha. 'Behold, and see if there be any sorrow like unto my sorrow, wherewith the Lord has afflicted me in that day?' (LAM 1:12). This sorrow repeats itself when saints fall away. It is like being crucified again.

But there is only one sorrow. The suffering is palliated by joy. The pain on the cross was eased greatly by the thought of the result.

I cried on the cross, 'My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?' I put the verb in the past tense, thought the being forsaken was actual. Normally, the words should have been, 'Why do you forsake me (now)?'

The explanation is that by an act of will one can place his present sufferings in the past. Then they do not hurt so much. The bad things occurring in your life today hurt deeply. But though worse things have occurred in your past, they are easily bearable.

For the Jewish king Hezekiah God turned back time on his sundial (2KI 20:10). It was again ten hours earlier, when he had not yet become deathly sick nor committed certain sins.

You can place present pains in the past just as you can place future joys in the present.

'The joy that was set before me' I really had before it was given (HEB 12:2). I have it even now when my heart breaks about the trespasses of the elect.

There is no need to decrucify me! By doing so, you would deprive me of the great satisfaction of saving mankind by bearing its sin.

I have warned you all: 'Weep not for me, but weep for yourselves' (LUK 23:28). It is blasphemous to treat me as a pitiable God.

p167 ..... My 3rd Letter from Jesus

I did not come to be ministered unto, but to minister. I do not need your ministrations.

Give up your ideas about decrucify me. Instead, make an unhappy child rejoice. Give aid and comfort to a suffering man. This will do.

In one respect, heaven is a little like prison, where you passed whole nights listening to everyone's story. This is what saints and angels do, too.

Former robbers are unanimous in claiming that they were more alive when in the act of burglary than at any other time in their lives. That they risked being shot and killed did not count; the thrill outweighed every danger.

Those who work in the persecuted underground church do so because they love me, but also because of the exquisite pleasure of conspirational activity.

This is what a Saviour feels when he redeems men even while enduring crucifixion.

In the measure to which I endure passion, your compassion is justified, which means sharing with me the cross with its ultimate joyous outcome. If it were not a joy, I would not have called you to be my companion in suffering.

For those who understand it, my cross exudes strength, confidence and an all-encompassing serenity.

Live on it and convey its meaning to others.

p168

The Fourth Letter from Jesus

My beloved,

I told the penitent thief, 'Today you will be with me in paradise.'

Paradise is no paradise for me if I cannot share it with someone. I came to earth to obtain companions for the heavenly joys.

This same relationship exists between me and the other persons of the Trinity. God is a being of the highest imaginable perfection. But a person who would keep this perfection for himself without sharing it in its fulness with another would not be the highest being imaginable. He had to share it with his eternal Son who is of the same essence as himself.

But there is an even higher dimension to divine perfection: the sharing of mutual love with another Being equally immaculate, so that each shares with a third person the love he receives from another. Therefore God must be at least a Trinity.

I needed the thief for my own supreme joy. I need you. Learn from me and find your delight in one other man. Bring him to a state of paradise. Do it today. Decrucify him, not me.

An atheist once ranted, 'We will destroy everything that is a reminder of God: churches, holy books, priests.'

p169 ..... My 4th Letter from Jesus

A believer replied, 'I wonder how you will pull heaven down.' The atheist has no need to do so. I brought heaven down to the level of criminals and thus gave them its joys. You, too, should open your heaven to your fellow-men.

It need not be for a criminal. It can be for a very honourable person.

Many years ago the British Court News related that Queen Victoria asked a pastor if there was any assurance of salvation and received this reply: 'I know nothing which would warrant it.' A Pastor Townsend sent a letter to the queen asking her to read JHN 3:16: 'God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believes in him should not perish, but have everlasting life'; and ROM 10:9: 'If thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and shalt believe in thine heart that God hath raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved.'

Queen Victoria replied, 'I have carefully and prayerfully read the portions of Scripture referred to. I believe in the finished work of Christ for me and trust by God's grace to meet you in that home of which He said, "I go to prepare a place for you."' ~Signed~ Victoria Guelph.

I like an event in Japan. The Oriental Missionary churches decided to set aside a day on which everyone would do his best to win one soul for Christ. That evening, the superintendent's wife, Nakada, went to bed sad. She had not succeeded.

Suddenly, her sleep was interrupted. A bandit who had broken into the house bent over her and threatened her with a dagger in his hand. 'Now, be quick and give me all you have or I will kill you!'

She was happy and said to him with a smile, 'You might be the one for whom I prayed and waited. I had to win one soul for Christ today. You must hear the story about the Friend of robbers, the Holiest of all who did not hesitate to compare himself with a thief (1TH 5:2), who chose a man just like you, a bandit to be the last person to take with him to heaven when he died.'

The bandit was converted. The story became known, and thousands of conversions followed in many lands.

This woman did something practical. Dreaming about great plans for decrucifying me does not help.

Take practical steps to improve your own behaviour. A young Christian employed in a pawn shop once wrote this resolution:

> I do promise God that I will rise early every morning to have a few minutes, not less than five, in private prayer. I will endeavour to conduct myself as a humble, meek and zealous follower of Jesus and be a serious witness and warning. I will try to lead others to think of the needs of their immortal souls. I hereby vow to read no less than four chapters in God's Word every day. I will cultivate a spirit of self-denial and will yield myself a prisoner of love to the Redeemer of the world.

The young man was William Booth. I liked his resolution and his sticking to it. It helped him become the founder of the Salvation Army.

In Communist countries some Christians have turned traitor for some thirty pieces of silver like Judas. I can give more than silver. I can make men shine like stars in the eternal kingdom of heaven, for bringing souls to me.

Luther dared to say that preaching or simply telling the gospel is more important than what I have done for the salvation of men, because my sacrifice would be of no avail without this human activity.

I became angry at some other sayings of his in which there was hatred, but not at this. His intention was good: to challenge men to win souls.

When Luther explained the Apostles' Creed, he stressed, 'God created ~me~. ... Jesus was crucified for ~my~ salvation. This gives ~me~ a tremendous obligation to represent him in the world, making him known.'

p171 ..... My 4th Letter from Jesus

Luther's saying is acceptable as long as it is understood that salvation does not come through preaching, through accepting the truth, or through faith, but only by what my Father accomplished through my sacrifice on Golgotha.

Bring at least one man from the world of deceit, not from deceit in the world. It is not true that some things in the world are wrong. The world as a whole is wrong. 'The whole world lies in wickedness' (1JN 5:19).

There is deceit even in the belief that there is a world. Science has searched for the ultimate stuff out of which the universe is made and has come to the conclusion that there is no such thing. The sub-atomic particles are energy, which means they are not a something that acts. There exists no energy apart from its action. Actor and action are the same. And in its research, human reason can find some answers only if it admits that there are realms beyond what reason can accommodate; otherwise it too is deceived.

If two particles are caused to collide, they are destroyed and two new ones are created. These decay spontaneously into two additional particles, making them four, out of which two are those with which the experiment began. This defies reason, or at least the accepted laws of physics.

In Gethsemane I asked the Father to spare me from the bitter cup. He found pleasure in bruising me. On the cross I asked to be given at least an explanation why I was forsaken. I was ignored. The Holy Spirit whom I had called the Comforter did not comfort me. He waited for my departure from the earth in order to descend. Not one angel come to my defence.

To you it looks as if Golgotha was an internal drama in the Trinity and in heavenly spheres. You might say, a collision. But our new Trinity is the same Holy Trinity, united in love as ever, magnified by the new birth of millions of children of God.

p172 ..... My Correspondence With Jesus

The laws of the microcosmos are entirely different from the usual laws of physics. In the heavenly spheres, things are also very different from what you experience on earth.

Atheists ask themselves if God is real. But is reality real?

I will quote Heisenberg, one of the most renowned physicists. (Do not wonder that I, Jesus, should quote him. Remember that I quoted Isaiah, too, to support my claims.) Heisenberg stated, 'In the light of the quantum theory elementary particles are no longer real in the same sense as the objects of daily life.' Gravity, matter, energy are ultimately only curvatures of the space-time continuum or, better said, they all all constructs of the human mind.

You need them for practical purposes, but if you reach toward the heights, you should realize that the whole notion of 'world' is an illusion.

Starting with the assertion that 1 + 2 = 4, you can construct a coherent mathematical system, but it will ultimately be all wrong because the premise is wrong. Everything in this world deceives.

Therefore, I have shown preferential love for thieves, prostitutes, criminals, prodigals, those who, though wrong themselves, have the one advantage over other men in that they are brave and daring and enterprising, and reject the standards of the world outright.

In this respect, learn from them. Take up the burden of children of God. Do so without being concerned about the minimal abilities you might have. The brains of Anatole France and Walt Whitman were half the weight of Turghenev's brain, but they could write as well as he. David was only a child but could defeat a Goliath.

But do reject the world, acknowledging as false "all" its whispers. Once you have done this you will confound the wise and the mighty, even if you are foolish, weak, base and despised (1CO 1:27,28).

p173 ..... My 4th Letter from Jesus

Yes, I have chosen even criminals, who can be compared to the fanatical henchmen of Nazism and Communism. Saul of Tarsus was one of them.

Lombroso claimed to have had a flash of inspiration while examining the skull of a famous brigand. He saw in the criminal 'an atavistic being who reproduces in his person the ferocious instincts of primitive humanity and the inferior animals.' So he explained anatomically their enormous jaws, high cheekbones, prominent superciliary arches, solitary lines in the palms, extreme size of the orbits, handle-shaped ears and insensibility to another's pain.

He was wrong. Saul of Tarsus had been insensible to the pain of the first Christians whom he had questioned with a whip and put to death, 'He had breathed slaughter' (ACT 9:1). That same man wrote afterward the love song of 1 Corinthians 13. Lombroso was wrong because he had imputed ferocious instincts to primitive humanity. He had not known Adam and Eve.

Diseased brains can be healed by me and made to serve a good cause.

I repeat again, reject the world. Its thinking is abominable even when it seems benign.

Darwin launched the theory of evolution, a scientific hypothesis that seemed not to have moral or religious implications. But Marx and Stalin embraced it, with chilling consequences.

Ferri stated it simply: 'The universal law of evolution shows us that vital progress of every kind is due to continual selection, by the death of the least fit in the struggle for life. ... I would therefore be in agreement with natural laws that human society should make an artificial selection by the elimination of antisocial elements and incongruous individuals.'

Darwin concocted just a scientific hypothesis about what in the past led to the appearance of men on earth. He launched this seemingly innocent hypothesis in a fundamentally, intrinsically wicked world. Ferri, a man of law, drew from it the conclusion that criminals shuld be sentenced to death. Marx, Lenin, Stalin drew from it the conclusion that millions should be killed, because everyone who impedes the rule of Communism is a criminal. Nietzsche and Hitler saw that whatever thwarts the triumph of the superman - ie, the Aryan race - must be slaughtered.

The possibility that man evolved from primitive organisms is not so important as the evolution from Darwin to Lenin to Hitler and Stalin, the ultimacy of which will be the wiping out of mankind in a nuclear war.

In this world all acorns are bitter. Therefore there are only bitter oak trees.

Arouse your conscience, that inner voice that tells you someone is watching. Consider as sin any minute of life spent on something other than saving souls for eternity from this world doomed to destruction.

Use every opportunity, knowing opportunity is a bird that never perches.

Do not appeal to reason, which is like a courtroom in which I and Judas Iscariot are equals, with the odds in favour of Judas. Appeal, rather, to the heart.

Do not repel youth by posing as the voice of experience and the fount of wisdom. A father told his child, 'Son, when Lincoln was your age, he was earning his own living.' The son replied, 'Yes, father, and when he was your age, he was president of the United States.'

Come with earnestness as one who has a foreboding of the destruction of the whole web of this deceitful world. Point to me as the only Saviour.

Allow for the widest diversity.

Communists say I was the first Communist. Terrorists claim me as their predecessor. German Lutheran pastors have described me as an Aryan Jew-hater. Tyrannical monarchs have used me to legitimate their power. Black theologians say I belong to their race. Catholics characterize me as the only lover in the world whose bride needs a vicar. And so I could go on and on.

In a sick world, faith too can only be sick. Colour is the illness of light, because it tears apart its whiteness, its wholeness.

There are 35,000 kinds of orchids, plus 30,000 man-made hybrids. Some resemble swans, others moths, butterflies, mums, pansies, scorpions, tigers, doves, dancers, slippers. Some have flowers less than one-tenth of an inch in diameter. Others are as broad as ten inches across. But they are all orchids.

In the diversity of flowers lies their beauty. My believers should be one. Since they cannot seem to agree as yet, become many things to many man.

For some time I can be only the Lamb of God, for others rather the Lion of Judah; some are happy that I used the whip, others that I forgave. Some like the sweat of the carpenter or the blood of the innocent victim; others prefer to bow before me as king. Be a Jew to the Jews and a Greek to the Greeks and by all means save souls.

Remember Daniel Webster's words:

If we work upon marble, it will perish;
If we work upon brass, time will efface it;
If we rear temples, they will crumble to dust,
But if we work on immortal minds,
If we imbue them with principles, with the just

Fear of God and love of our fellowmen,
We engrave on those tablets something which Will brighten to all eternity.

You asked me one series of questions. You told me your thoughts. I cannot be obliged to enter into conversation with you on the topics you choose.

The foregoing is my message to you.

p176

The Fifth Letter from Jesus

My beloved,

You probably wonder if the last letter was really mine or just an ordinary product of your own mind attributed to me. It was so down-to-earth. A lecturer could have said some of those things in a Bible school. If he were a gardener, he would not have permitted so many varieties of orchids in his garden.

What comes from me, you are certain, must have deep spiritual significance, must be of lofty mystical import, must startle through novelty.

This is not so. My spoken words as recorded in the New Testament cover only forty days of my life. If they are all read slowly with a loud voice, it will not take more than half an hour. I surely spoke much more than that, but the rest was not thought important enough to be recorded.

When I changed water into wine at Cana, it took but a moment. Do you think I sat there mute during the rest of the celebration?

Usually, I spoke about practical things: buying wood and carpenter's tools, shopping, selling, the news of the village and of the world we knew, a loving word to my mother and to acquaintances, the weather, a joke, small talk, or elementary things from the Bible. Learn to see me in the ordinary thoughts.

p177 ..... My 5th Letter from Jesus

There is nothing elaborate in my speech. Much of it is made up of incomplete, interrupted and unfinished sentences.

The 1943 report of the President of Colombia University contained one word-group, punctuated as a single sentence, that filled 11 pages and consisted of 4,284 words. I was never a university president, nor even a university student.

I never recorded my thoughts on paper. I merely spoke. In spoken language there are no capital letters to show where a sentence begins, nor full stops to show where they end. Spoken language flows like life, without punctuation marks. In my language - Aramaic - capital letters and punctuation marks do not even exist.

Accept as inspired by me a very ordinary letter with very common thoughts. Accept everything I tell you, without asking questions.

Once a grasshopper stopped a centipede and asked him if he really needed so many legs. 'I have only six legs but I don't know what to do with them. That is why I hop about. How do you manage with so many legs?'

'It is so simple,' replied the centipede. 'Watch how I do it.'

The grasshopper waited and waited, but all in vain. Finally, he had to drag the centipede along, because his question had totally unnerved the creature, to the point of paralysis.

You believers have so many things to do only because you ask me so many questions. I would like to minister to you constantly, but you interrupt me with all the problems you raise in your minds. Instead of being useful to you, I have to explain myself in many words, which in turn require further explanation because of the inadequacy of language.

There are two hundred definitions for the word 'sentence' alone. How then can human language provide clarity?

p178 ..... My Correspondence With Jesus

Some languages are privileged. Tamil has a multitude of words for 'laughter.' Whole-hearted, malicious, ironic, sympathetic, innocent laughter - all are called by the same word in the English tongue. Malayalam has different words for every kind of 'yes.' Gaelic has eighty-two words for 'love.' It is surely wrong to call human sentiments for apple pie, a dog, a child and God by the same name. In Malayalam there are also many words for 'banana': every variety is called a different name. Similarly, the Eskimos have many words for snow (new snow, crusty snow, frozen snow are not the same), as Arabs have for 'camel.'

In English there is one word 'God' for a multi-faceted Being, whereas the Jews have Elohim, Jahweh, Adonai, El Shaddai, Sabaoth, El and many others.

Your language does not have words enough to formulate questions properly, let alone give replies.

Do not ask me so many things, but strive to make me loved, using the little you know and can say. Whoever has me as his theme, who speaks about me with the awe and devotion with which my holy mother spoke about me, and sings for me with the same joy with which angels sing, cannot err even if he is far from being wise. I give sense to your words, even if they are a lullaby sung to a child.

I have promised that the righteous will shine like the sun. The sun draws moisture from all over the earth and returns it as rain from the clouds.

Like my servant David, you see me as the Rock. But a rock in a stream can be an impediment to the flow of water, which must then go around on either side. Like the rock surrounded by water, I find myself in your embrace, a prisoner of your love.

I named a prophetess of mine Deborah, which means 'bee,' because the bee gently collects nectar from many flowers and produce honey that men take away for food. Look at these insects and believe in God.

p179 ..... My 5th Letter from Jesus

I have inscribed in the genes the dazzling ability to construct honeycombs of geometric perfection. They can sense the earth's magnetic field and instinctively know how to make a structure that takes it into account. They agree as to which way the comb should face, without a 'foreman' to tell them. I have given to every bee its own plumb-line.

In addition, bees construct their cells as hexagonal prisms, this being the best shape to hold a given volume using the small amount of material. The cells are tilted back at a grade of thirteen degrees to keep the honey from running out.

Believe that I have inscribed in your genes, too, what makes you most useful. But you philosophise too much. It looks as if there might have occurred a catastrophic mutation in your genes. Be still. You will accomplish what I have destined you to do. If bees began to brood over what they do, their honeycombs would be far from perfect.

May my love be uppermost in your mind, rather than condemnation of sin. Fighting sin in yourself and others can become a very dangerous occupation. Some dogs trained for heroin detection have become addicted from sniffing the stuff and eventually died.

To combat sin constantly is also a means in wallowing in it. Instead, look upon it with contempt. Do not attach importance to it.

There is a great deal at stake in the ascension toward the ultimate heights.

In times past, the time it takes the earth to go around the sun was divided by men into 31,536,000 units called seconds. It is barbarous to cut time into pieces. Furthermore, the revolution of the earth is not uniform. Consequently, the operation did not provide exact time. The moon's gravity pulls on the oceans and causes friction. In some years the effect is greater than in others. In addition, paleontologists who have measured fossils of ancient coral, which had annual growth rings like trees, have concluded that 600 million years ago a day on the earth was only 21 hours long.

Now, your notion of a second has changed. Caesium atoms perform an electromagnetic flip. Their electrons, which spin like tops, suddenly point the axis of their spin in a different direction. A second is the time that passes until an atom of caesium flips, the time of 9,192,631,770 photon pulses. A second is thus no longer a limb of the corpse time. It is a period rich in events. Billions of pulsations take place in it. And they happen not only in the caesium atom.

A second is a highly valuable jewel. It is so rich you cannot even think about it. And if you cannot comprehend a second, you certainly have to give up any attempt to grasp the exceeding riches of eternity, which I have promised to the faithful.

My counsel is that you reach toward eternal values. Ascend at a steady pace. Use every second well. A Talmudic writing says, 'Every second presents itself to man first, gets the mark of men, and then goes to tell God what man has done with it.'

Many highly valued frescoes are in grave danger of deterioration. The damage is caused by the fact that the churches are heated on week-ends but left cold during the week. Condensation takes place, and the resulting dampness in the walls is very harmful. In the temple of Jerusalem the same light had to burn uninterruptedly.

Burn for me with equal flames of love until we become one, just as your two eyes unite to produce normal vision. Be mine in your work and mine in your play, mine in your activity and mine in your leisure - not considering the latter as less important.

You have written me much. You yourself asked if I read your writing. You suspected that I cannot read because of being crucified afresh in heaven. I have written to you but am not sure I have satisfied you.

p181 ..... My 5th Letter from Jesus

Correspondence never satisfies lovers. Even the Bible cannot satisfy believers. All the talk between Romeo and Juliet was only preliminary. They both desired the embrace of love.

No other image than that of sexual union is adequate to describe what we both are longing for. It is not true that such a relationship is profane. King Solomon's Song of Songs hymns it, and the Talmud says rightly, 'All Scriptures are holy, but the Song of Songs is most holy.'

Because sexual union is a religious act, Isaiah says, 'I took unto me faithful witnesses to record, Uriah the priest, and Zechariah the son of Jeberechiah. And I went unto the prophetess; and she conceived, and bore a son' (ISA 8:2,3).

Sometimes evangelists who claim to represent me have given birth to spiritual children without first having had such an intimate union with me. Therefore they sometimes bring forth monsters.

Nothing less will satisfy us both than replacing practical or lofty talk with a union as sacred as that between man and wife, where each becomes both. I will not be a riddle for you any more, because you will be you ~and~ I; you will be as much as I as I am myself.

While on earth, I was an 'I' limited to being a Jewish carpenter of the first century. I could not become abstract man. I had to become man of a certain social class in a certain epoch.

You can become my 'I' of another period with another outlook and another assignment.

It is foolish to assume that imitating me means to imitate my dress and customs in another age.

A boy of eleven once played the role of Joseph, my adoptive father, in a Sunday school Christmas programme. When he discussed with his parents what kind of shoes he should wear, they suggested sandals. He wanted cowboy boots. When the father said it was unlikely that Joseph have worn western boots, the son replied, 'Yes, but then he did not have braces on his teeth either.'

Everything in the world has changed over the past 2,000 years. But while I am the same yesterday, today and for ever, this permanent 'I' has not permanent form. Isaiah knew this and prophesied, 'He has no form' (ISA 53:2). Mark says about me, 'He showed himself in another form' (MRK 16:12). I live in you. Luther said rightly, 'The Christian is Christ.' Be yet another form of mine.

When I took upon myself the limitations of humanity, my power was necessarily limited. But to you I have promised all power, which is mediated to you by the Holy Spirit. I said that my disciples will do greater works than I have done, which is obvious, because they will have at their disposal all my power plus the knowledge and experience accumulated during the centuries.

As you use this power, remember above all to be ardent in love.

I mean really ardent.

It is a fact scientifically established that Tibetan Buddhist monks can raise their body temperature through ~tum-mo~ yoga, a meditational practice. They can raise the temperature of fingers and toes by 15 degrees Fahrenheit in a matter of minutes. During cold Himalayan nights, they can dry icy-wet sheets draped over the bodies.

Why not use Christian meditation to increase the heat of your love? It is known that erotic imagination increases the heartbeat and produces physiological changes. Use your imagination and take a seat in the heavenly mansion that I am preparing for you.

See me suffering, and see me joyous and peaceful and triumphant because I have the privilege of suffering afresh as often as saints fall. My incarnation was needed in order to acquaint men with God so that they might love and adore in a realistic, personal manner. Since my ascension to heaven in a glorified body, I feel I may seem remote and less personal again.

By being in you and in other believers, by being present in the world in the form of the poor and persecuted, by the image of my new pains in heaven, I am with you again, softening your heart with my compassion and filling it with the assurance of victory.

Soon we will see each other face to face. Then you will be satisfied.

It is wrong for you to be troubled about anything, even about my being crucified afresh. This indicates that you have not yet entered fully into the relationship you so desire.

When I was on earth, people asked themselves if I were God. They had doubts. Instead of giving them a direct reply about myself, I told them, 'Ye are gods' (JHN 10:34). Discover Godhead in yourself and you will not question my role. Discover who you are in this sphere by setting aside the usual tools of logic. Simply recognize that you dwell in heavenly spheres.

I am God in the supreme sense of the word and know that I am God. You are also god, though in another sense, which you do not realize as yet. You know me in images which are diverse. The contemplation of different images gives you different moods. You see me sitting at the right hand of the heavenly Father and you are happy. Then you think about me as suffering crucifixion afresh and you are despondent. You see me as the Lamb of God who takes away the sins of the world and you are quieted. Then you see me as the Lion of Judah who will devour sinners and you are frightened.

Rest from these images and see me once and for all as the Divine Lover reclining in the innermost chamber of the heart. Then you will have obtained your heart's desire.

p184

The Sixth Letter from Jesus

My beloved,

This will be my last letter to you, since it is time we concluded our correspondence.

Let me summarise my teaching in one proposition: In English, 'I' is written with a capital letter, but you should write it with a small letter and write 'Love' with a capital.

If you do so, you will not be alarmed by the sight of a lover crucified. You will not have the impulse to decrucify him but will try to strengthen him to endure to the end. And you will take up a cross, too.

Every painter who does not love is only a picture-maker; every musician who does not love is only an instrument-player.

On earth there is so much anti-culture, anti-art, anti-politics, anti-marriage, anti-religion. People are against, not for. They do not love.

The martyrs were highly honoured in churches in times past; now we have the heroism of bent backs on which the enemy can ride. It is all because of the lack of love.

A Christian girl who was to be martyred sang heartily the night before. Someone asked, 'Aren't you afraid?' She replied, 'Why this silly question? I am human and experience all emotions, including fear. But if you cannot

p185 ..... My 6th Letter from Jesus laugh and rejoice and sing while you live and have courage, how can you understand a person who sings when she expects to be executed?'

If an individual cannot rejoice while looking for a heaven filled with gladness, how will he understand the deep joy of one who is crucified in heaven again and again, knowing what this suffering will bring to the world?

Do not reproach atheists, but rather ask yourself why they are what they are.

Darwin has destroyed the faith of many. In his ~Voyage of the Beagle~ he provides a clue as to what shaped his thinking. He writes:

> Near Rio de Janeiro I lived opposite an old lady, who kept screws to crush the fingers of her female servants. I have stayed in a house where a young household mulatto daily and hourly was reviled, beaten and persecuted enough to break the spirit of the lowest animal. I have seen a little boy, six or seven years old, struck thrice with a horse-whip (before I could interfere) on his naked head, for having handed me a glass of water not quite clean. ... And these deeds are done and palliated by men who profess to love their > neighbours as themselves, who believe in God and pray that his will be done on earth. It makes one's blood boil, yet heart tremble, to think that we Englishmen and our American descendants with their boastful cry of liberty have been and are so guilty.

Love needs to be spelled not l-o-v-e but s-a-c-r-i-f-i-c-e.

You cannot live more or less ardently just by willing to do so. Our love depends upon many circumstances. Do not be dismayed that you cannot love as the great saints have done.

Physical deficiencies can affect the quality of love. Those who have a pituitary deficiency or who have undergone brain surgery are unable to experience passionate love. An exploration of the brain in the future might explain why some individuals are demonstrative lovers while others are lukewarm. Those who lead dangerous lives can love better than those whose lives are commonplace. The presence of amphetamines also makes a difference.

Natural phenomena can also affect human behaviour. Arson increases 100% during a full moon. Murders increase too by a significant percentage. Because 50% of the human body is composed of water, it is influenced by the gravitational pull of the moon, like the sea with its tides.

But learn from the Jews: they feast the new moon with solemnity. The bad days of the full moon have passed, when ardent love was almost impossible.

No one, not even a genius, can think well twenty-four hours a day; no athlete is fit for competition at any hour. Geniuses and athletes are men who use well their best moments.

Instead of worrying about the times when your love cannot be at the desired fervour, maximise the great moments. Be quiet; you have time to grow in love.

I once said, 'Let tares and wheat (the children of the wicked one and the children of the kingdom) grow together until the harvest, which is the end of the world' (MTT 13:29,30,38,39).

The children of the kingdom will grow until the end of the world, which at that time was 2,000 years away. It was thought that men have only the short span of earthly life for growth. This causes them to be in a hurry and not to grow properly.

It is only because believers have much time for growth in love that they can afford to engage in conflict instead of acts of love.

I am not for peace at any price. The Bible teaches that God ordered some terrible destructions rather than suffering evil to continue. God sanctifies armies to destroy incarnate devils. I repeat what I have said before: 'I came not to bring peace but a sword.'

Using a sword is terribly risky for men who have only this short lifespan for growth in love. Only those who know there is an eternity for embracing and kissing can afford to spend their time in battles. In my short ministry I took time to expel the money-changers from the temple.

Love as much as you can, and fight the right battles. Do not decrucify me, but be ready to be crucified near me.

If you had lived in Jerusalem and had been in the mob confronting Pilate, what would you have replied to his question, 'Whom should I release, Jesus or Barabbas?' The only right answer, as events have proved, was 'Free Barabbas.' His death would have profited no one. But my suffering and death profited the whole human race. Without my sacrifice you would have no hope of spending eternity with me.

When you started writing your letters, first of all you really did not expect a reply. Letters to me were a literary fiction. When you started getting replies, you never thought that I would contradict your plans. Well, I give showers of blessings but usually not those my devotees expect from me.

Your letters are of much loftier spirituality than mine. You feel it a duty to venture to higher realms to speak with me, but the texture of the eternally valuable is woven on the loom of temporal things. You are on earth and have to remain there for the time being.

On earth practise love toward me. The Narada Bakhti Sutras contain some beautiful truths. They state that love for God can manifest itself in eleven ways: love of God's qualities, love of his enchanting beauty, love of worship, love of his remembrance, love of service, love of him as a child, love of him as the Bridegroom, love of total surrender, love of total oneness and love in the form of anguish and separation from him.

There are many more forms of love, but no one has shown me higher love than did my holy mother. I like Luther's words: 'Mary is after Christ the most precious jewel in the whole of Christendom; she is never praised too much. No one can say about her more than that she is the mother of God. We have to consider also in our hearts what it means to be God's mother.

Protestants nowadays shun even the mention of her. They would not call her 'mother of God.' They might call a woman 'the US president's mother,' though she did not give birth to a president but merely brought forth a child who eventually became president. A queen mother also did not give birth to a king. The glory later acquired by these children is somehow shared by the mothers.

No one, therefore, should avoid calling my mother 'mother of God,' because I was God from the first moment of conception in her womb. I have been this from eternity. She was mother only of my human body, except that my humanity cannot be separated from my divinity.

Love me as she loved me. I said, 'Whosoever shall do the will of my Father which is in heaven, the same is my brother, and sister, ~and mother~' (MTT 12:50).

Many have grasped the fact that they can be my little brethren and sisters. Few grasp that they can be mothers to me. They challenge the designation 'mother of God' because they themselves do not strive to fill this role.

Motherly love is the highest form of human love. Every other kind of love is mingled with self-interest. Individuals love their parents because they provide them with the necessities of life. Mother also gives sweets, and father pocket money. Husbands provide security and protection, wives maintain the home and provide loving care.

Mothers just love, whatever their children do. I remember the heartrending attitude of a mother whose grown son had hit her on the head with an axe, then dragged her by the feet to the cellar. The door slammed on his finger. Hearing her criminal son utter profanity, the expiring mother, who had not died instantly, gasped, 'Is it very painful, my son?'

p189 ..... My 6th Letter from Jesus

My mother had no easy lot and spent many a night in tears because of me. It is not easy to be a Saviour's mother. Nor is it easy to be God's bride.

Once in history the sons of God united with the daughters of men (GEN 6:1). Giants were born of this union, giants in wickedness. The world eventually had to be destroyed because of them. After such negative experiences, it was quite an undertaking for the Holy Spirit to unite with the human virgin.

By virtue of my divinity, I must have been a child difficult to rear, difficult to master, though I always tried to be her joy and to show obedience. She loved and loves me with a love than which there is none higher.

You too can be to me a mother. I can be as real to you as I was to my mother when she carried me in her womb or held me in her arms, as real as I am to her now when she stands near my throne.

She is near me not only when I sit on my throne. She is near me also when I am crucified afresh.

The words so often sung, '~Stabat mater dolorosa/Juxta crucem lacrimosa~' (The sorrowful mother stood in tears near the cross) are actual even now. But she only weeps. She does nothing to decrucify me or to ease my suffering, because she understands and consents.

It was only through my death on Golgotha that the sins of men have been erased; it is only through my crucifixion afresh that the repeated sins of saints who have lost their salvation and whom no man can help any more are dealt with. Do not imagine that I accept these fresh crucifixions just because I could not do otherwise. Do not think that they are senseless. Roses will blossom on these new crosses, too.

My mother desires that none should perish and encourages me in what I do. She suffers with me and rejoices in hope with me. In this you do your part: take upon yourself the cross of poverty and renunciation.

A king said to a monk, 'Ask a boon of me.'

The monk replied, 'I will not ask a boon from one of my slaves.'

'How can that be?' queried the king.

The monk explained, 'I have two slaves who are thy masters: covetousness and expectation.'

Renounce covetousness and greed. Take up your cross. The upright post of a cross stands for the 'I,' the crossbeam represents the cancelling of the ego.

My memory is entirely submissive to my will. I can forget completely what I wish to forget. You would do well to make use of my ability by asking me to forget your past sins. I will do so gladly. Then you are as one who never sinned. 'Justified' means 'just as if I'd never sinned.'

The wine I made in Cana was said to be the best wine. Now only old wine is considered the best. When I changed water into something else, it was not a liquid that from then one was wine, but that had been wine. I made it as if it had not been water. So it is with the sins you confess.

As in the case of Hezekiah, I set back the sundial (ISA 38:8) so many degrees and he was again the man he had been before he had committed that day's sins.

I have forgotten all your offences and sins. You do wrong to remind me of them on occasion. It is not good for you, and it diminishes my ability to forget fully.

On the other hand, you should not abuse the privilege in appealing to my forgetfulness, or I might forget to take good care of you. Instead, spend your energy seeking union with me. Give up your you-ness.

When human medicine cannot invent a cure, it invents a jargon. Doctors say nowadays that pain is a figment of the imagination. It is an imbalance in the mind-body complex.

Call it what you like and attribute it to whatever you wish, the fact remains that I am a Man of Sorrows. I knew terrible physical pain when whipped and crucified.

p191 ..... My 6th Letter from Jesus

I still have very real pain now. But I can rejoice in spite of it, in fact, because of it. It is a great joy to endure pain willingly in order to benefit others.

So my counsel to you is to forget about decrucifying me. Instead, share my pain in all its intensity, together with its unspeakable joy.

This is what I have to tell you for the time being.

Truth is not proved by terms and demonstrations,
Nor seen when hidden by concrete relations.
The 'Canon' is no 'cure' for 'ignorance'
Nor can 'Deliv'rance come from 'Indications.'

If at each 'Stage' thy course diverted be To different 'Goals,' true goal thou'lt never see.
And till the veil is lifted from thine eyes
The Sun of truth will never 'Rise' for thee.

Strive to cast off the veil, not to augment Book-lore. No books will further thy intent.
The germ of love to God grows not in books.
Shut up thy books, turn to God and repent.

(Nuruddin Abdur Rahman Jami, translated by Whinfieldd and Kazvini)

End

If you would like to write to Pastor Wurmbrand, please sent your letters to:

P.O. Box 443
Bartlesville, OK 74005
U.S.A.

The End of "My Correspondence with Jesus"

Reaching Toward The Heights

Richard Wurmbrand
Copyright 1992

"To my children Mihai and Judith and their little Amalia and Alex"

Jan 1
|
"Teach us to number our days." (PSA 90:12)

An American urged a friend of his who had just arrived in this country from Thailand, "Quick, let's run to catch this bus!" Once inside, the happy American said, "We have gained three minutes." The Thai asked, "What do you intend to do with them?"

Men in advanced Western countries have no answer to this question. Our generation has forgotten how to walk. It knows only how to run and to drive.

Jesus never ran; He only walked. There were chariots, horses, and camels in His day but we don't read that He used them. It is recorded only once that He rode, and then on an animal which advances at an even slower pace than a human walk.

We do well to save minutes. Every minute is a jewel, but we often realize its value too late. The story is told about a man who walked in the dark along the shore of a river. He stumbled on a small bag containing stones, which he picked up. As a pastime, he amused himself by throwing a stone in the river every once in awhile. He liked to hear the ~plitch-plitch~ in the water. When he arrived home, only two stones were left in the bag. He saw they were diamonds.

We run to save minutes and squander what we have saved in unworthy activities, conversation, and amusements. A cashier is answerable for every cent that has passed through his hands. A man who has lived seventy years will answer before God for thirty-seven million minutes.

Jan 2
|
"God is love." (1JN 4:8)

A Soviet Christian released from prison wrote in a letter:

> My outward appearance is not attractive. In the slave labor camp, I worked beneath the earth. I had an accident which made me a hunchback. Once a boy stared at me and then asked, "Uncle, what do you have on your back?" I was sure that some mockery would follow, but still I answered, "A hunchback."
> "No," said the child. "God is love and gives no one deformities You do not have a hunchback but a box below your shoulders. In this box, angel wings are hidden. One day the box will open and you will fly to heaven with these wings." I began to cry for joy. Even now, I write and cry.

Every man has some kind of "hunchback," some physical, mental, or spiritual handicap, something which makes him different from everyone else.
Things appear this way only if we look at them from the perspective of our limited earthly life. Here we "know in part" (1CO 13:12). And because of this, our lives and sufferings often seem meaningless.

God has allowed one person to have a hunchback, another sickness, or poverty, or a prison term, or bereavement, or some other sorrow. But we will not accept human standards which categorize such things as catastrophes. We will apply to them the standard of this Spirit-filled Soviet child and see in our sorrows boxes which hide angel wings, with which we are meant to fly to heaven.

Jan 3
|
"The LORD is in his holy temple: let all the earth keep silence before him." (HAB 2:20)

Two thousand years ago an Athenian statesman named Phocion waited wearily while his barber gave to the customer he was shaving a summary of the current Athenian political situation. At last the barber turned to Phocion and said, "How would you like to have your beard trimmed?" Phocion replied, "In silence." This simple answer often is quoted in the great literature of the world.

We are victims of a plot against silence, without which no spiritual life is possible. We are subjected daily to the noise of cars, trains, planes, radio, TV, vacuum cleaners, dishwashers, fans - not to mention the chatter and clatter of children and much useless speech of adults.

I have known Christians who have spent years in solitary confinement in complete silence. When they once again heard humans speak, they wondered that so much of their speech lacked content.

If you wish to reach God, create some silence around you. Switch off the many intruders on silence. Enter your closet, or teach your loved ones to be quiet at certain hours.

But silence is not altogether silent. All the scream of men in pain, all the weeping of sufferers, all the cries of real joy, the most earnest discussions, a multitude of sermons, and scientific truth are embedded in the silence which surrounds you. Above these you will hear the voice of God. You will become illuminated if you will listen, as did Jesus when He spent whole nights in prayer on silent mountains.

Jan 4
|
"The angel came in unto (Mary), and said, Hail, thou that art highly favoured, the Lord is with thee: blessed art thou among women." (LUK 1:28)

In a Communist country, a young prisoner was taken from his cell to court. When he returned, his face shone. The other prisoners asked how it went in court. He answered, "As on the day of Mary's annunciation. What a beautiful day! A pure virgin alone in meditation. At once a radiant angel before her. He tells her that she, a creature, will have the Creator as a babe in her arms; that she, a creature, will wash her Creator. She will wash the One who later will cleanse millions of men of their sins. She, a creature, will teach her Creator to walk. She will teach the eternal Word of God to speak. He will be the sun and joy of her house.

"There will be a few difficult moments. She will have to stand weeping at the foot of a cross where God's Son and her Son will die for our salvation, but this will pass. He will be resurrected and will go to heaven, and surely He will take His mother to be with Him. And it will be joy again, without end."

The prisoners thanked him for the nice little sermon, but they insisted, "We asked you something else. How was it in court?"

He repeated, "I told you already. It was like the day of Mary's annunciation. The judges told me that I am sentenced to death. Is it not beautiful? Gates of pearl, streets of gold, angels playing harps, the communion of saints, and above all, rest on Jesus' bosom."

Every year of our life is a new step toward death. Let us make this step joyfully and hopefully. Jesus was resurrected. Those who believe in Him will be resurrected too.

Jan 5
|
"The LORD opened the mouth of the ass." (NUM 22:28)

Believe the Bible. Some of its stories can be accepted by our reason only with difficulty, but there is no alternative. If we don't accept the difficult parts of the Bible, the only choice that remains is to accept the absurd.

Atheists scorn: the Bible says that an ass could speak. But the Bible does not say this. Rather, it states, "The LORD opened the mouth of the ass." Where there is an almighty God, He can cause an ass to speak at any time.

Set aside belief in God for a moment. What remains? Unbelief says man evolved from the ape. This means that at a certain moment an animal, the ape, started to speak without the aid of a higher, more intelligent being than himself. No child learned to speak without being taught by an adult. How did the ape achieve what a child cannot?

You have to accept the fact that an animal spoke, either an animal unaided by anyone, as Darwinism teaches, or an animal whose mouth a wise and almighty God opened. It obviously is easier for reason to accept the latter alternative.

Think also about the inner truth of the first words an animal ever spoke: "What have I done unto thee, that thou hast smitten me?" One day all those whom we have wronged will put this question to us. What will we answer? Even if those we have smitten were guilty, was it absolutely necessary to smite them three times as the false prophet Balaam smote the ass? Would less than that not have been sufficient? Don't listen to those who cavil about the Bible, but rather ponder its words carefully.

Jan 6
|
"If we sin willfully after that we have received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sins." (HEB 10:26)

An old Christian legend says that when God announced to His angels His purpose in creating man in His image, Lucifer, who had not yet fallen from heaven, cried, "Surely He will give them no power to disobey Him." The Son answered him, "Power to fall is power to rise." The devil then willfully decided to fall, taking others with him. His expectation that he would rise again was never fulfilled because he had fallen purposely.

In the story where Mary Magdalene washed Jesus' feet with her tears, Lucifer began to understand how power to fall is connected with power to rise. He understood the profoundness of the words of the Lord, "To whom little is forgiven, the same loveth little," and "Her sins, which are many, are forgiven; for she loved much" (LUK 7:47).

So the devil thought if he could check the power to fall, he might check the power to rise. Therefore he tried to impose the Mosaic law upon the first Christians. Through this teaching he fooled the Galatians (GAL 3:1) and many others. He also tries to subject today's Christians to ordinances such as "Touch not, taste not, handle not" (COL 2:21,22) and plays upon our fears.

But we have the word, "Stand fast therefore in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free" (GAL 5:1). We will not continue in sin that grace may abound (ROM 6:1). Sin will never more be the content of our lives. But neither will we despair if we do sin. Peter could strengthen his brethren because he was converted after having fallen into grievous sin (LUK 22:32).

Jan 7
|
"The sons of God saw the daughters of men that they were fair." (GEN 6:2)

A Jewish book of old, ~Sepher Ierahmeel~, tells the following story about the Old Testament Joseph. A multitude of high-ranking Egyptian women went to the house of Potiphar, to see the handsomeness of his Hebrew servant. Lady Potiphar offered every guest an apple and a knife with which to peel it. When Joseph entered to serve them, they were all so captivated by his appearance that they accidentally cut themselves. Then Lady Potiphar told them, "You have seen him for a minute and you are charmed. Now you understand why I, who see him continually, burn with passion."

Lady Potiphar might have been beautiful, too, but Joseph was holy and refused to sin. And we should follow his example. But if anyone sins in this regard, let us not condemn him or her too harshly. Instead, let us be charitable toward those who yield to human weakness, understanding that sex is the most powerful drive in our nature.
And let us not despair ourselves when we are much tempted even if we have fallen into sin. To give us hope, the first book of the Bible records that even the sons of God, whoever they might be (the interpretations vary), could not resist this temptation.

It is written, "Sin not. And if any man sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous" (1JN 2:1). Because this temptation is powerful, victory over it and refusal to sin in sexual matters is glorious.

Jan 8
|
"Some seeds fell by the way side, and the fowls came and devoured them up." (MTT 13:4)

How is it that some men hear the Word of God gladly, while others allow the fowls – that is, wicked spirits – to devour this good seed?

The Old Testament Joseph was told a dream by Pharaoh's baker with whom he was in prison: "Behold, I had three white baskets on my head: and in the uppermost basket there was of all manner of bakemeats for Pharaoh; and the birds did eat them out of the basket upon my head" (GEN 40:16,17). Joseph interpreted the dream to mean that the baker would be hanged on a tree.

The renowned rabbi of Dubna was asked how Joseph could have known this. He answered, "A painter once painted a man with a basket of bread on his head. Birds came to eat from the picture, believing that it was real bread. A man said, 'What a good painter! How natural he made the bread look!' He was not a good painter. He did not make the man look natural enough to frighten the birds, or they would not have come. Likewise, Joseph understood that if the birds dared come to the baker, then he must be a dead man."

The wicked spirits cannot take away the seeds of the Word of God from a living Christian, but only from one who looks rather like a scarecrow. Scarecrows don't scare spirits. Be sure your faith is a lively faith.

Jan 9
|
"Ask for the old paths, where is the good way, and walk therein." (JER 6:16)

A hunter shouted to his dog, "Nero, seek!" Nero lifted his eyes toward his master and answered, "I lost nothing."

What have Christians lost that they must seek so much? Some seek new cults and delve into the occult. But the old way waits for them The religion which saved righteous Abel, King David, Mary Magdalene, and Peter will hold good for us, too. It is not true that Christianity has been practiced and found insufficient. We did not practice it. We will never find a better means of salvation than the blood of Christ, which was shed for us, nor will we find a better teaching than His teaching of love.

A bored tourist walking through the art galleries of the Louvre told a guard, "I find nothing exceptional in these pictures." The guard answered, "These paintings are not judged by us. We are judged by them."

Christianity has long since been proven true and stands independent of human opinions. The cross, reaching from earth to heaven, is its standard and is the criterion by which all religions, all isms, all philosophies and philosophers, all purveyors of truth are measured. Whether we see the beauty of Christianity and follow its precepts and its Founder, or stray after the foolish inventions of base fellows – as the founders of strange cults are referred to in the Bible (JOB 30:8; DEU 13:13, RSV) we cannot escape being measured and judged.

Let us choose wisely – for eternity.

Jan 10

"Mary ... seeth two angels." (JHN 20:11,12)

There are two ways of looking at a tomb. Peter and another disciple of Jesus came on Easter morning to the tomb of their Master, found it empty, and saw in it the linen in which Jesus had been wrapped. Mary Magdalene also looked into the empty tomb, but she saw angels where the body of Jesus had lain. Some today see only the crumbling of Christian civilization, while others look beyond the dreadful headlines and see angels at work preparing the blessed kingdom of God.

How does a man get to see angels, to sense their presence? The apostles had been very active in the service of the Lord. Mary had sat quietly at the feet of Jesus and heard His word (LUK 10:39), which no doubt began with Moses and all the prophets. She probably heard from His lips the stories of many saints and martyrs for the faith and had become familiar with them.

A church that excludes from its teaching the example of saints and martyrs misses a vital dimension. Read "Moses and the prophets," remembering that "all these things ... are written for our admonition, upon whom the ends of the world are come" (1CO 10:11). And then keep in touch with the living sufferers for Christ. Your eyes will be opened.

Jan 11

"Judge not, that ye be not judged." (MTT 7:1)

Two friends took a stroll along the shore of a river. One slipped and fell into the water. He began to cry, "Help! help! I can't swim." His friend answered, "You don't have to shout like that. I don't know how to swim either, but I don't make as much noise about it as you do."

We sometimes judge men harshly for their ill temper, their incivility. We behave otherwise, but can it be that we do not pass through their deep waters?

The Lord called certain men fools (LUK 11:40). A Pharisee had invited Him to dine with him. It is not recorded that the Pharisee had uttered one provocative word; he had only marveled silently that Jesus did not wash His hands before the meal. We would have wondered, too. Without any apparent provocation, Jesus insults the host and all his friends, calling them "fools." A lawyer who also was a guest at this dinner tried to quiet Jesus. The Lord then turned on him and all his companions saying, "Woe unto you also, ye lawyers" (LUK 11:37-52). Few hosts would tolerate such behavior today.

We judge harshly our unmannered acquaintances. We might have criticized Jesus, too. Have we passed through His deep sorrow to see the essential message of salvation rejected by His own people because of blind leaders who led them astray? Until you have walked a mile in another's shoes, don't judge him.

Jan 12
|
"Christ Jesus ... made himself no reputation." (PHP 2:7)

King Ibrahim sought God and could not find Him. One night he heard someone walking with heavy boots on the roof of the palace. Going up to see who it was, he found his most intimate friend, who shared his spiritual concern. The king asked him,

"What are you doing on the roof?"

"I seek camels."

"What foolishness to seek camels on the roof of a palace," exclaimed the king, to which the friend answered,

"What foolishness to seek God while sitting on a throne."

God gives to everyone a task, whether one be a king, or wealthy business manager, or middle-class housewife, or low-paid worker. We should fulfill this task humbly, with joy and love, but without becoming attached to any outward situation. Positions of fame, of honor, and of riches often bind us, making every search for God fruitless. A Christian can be a king only on the condition he consider himself a servant of his people.

Social prestige and material possessions are easily lost. The Lord long ago warned, "Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth, where moth and rust doth corrupt, and where thieves break through and steal: but lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through nor steal:

for where your treasure is, there will your heart be also" (MTT 6:19-21).

Jesus, who had the highest position, "took upon him the form of a servant ... he humbled himself" (PHP 2:7,8). Let us follow in His footsteps. Otherwise all our endeavor to come nearer to God will be in vain.

Jan 13
|
"In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth." (GEN 1:1)

An atheist shoemaker told his son that nature exists by itself, to which his son replied, "Then it is easier to have the whole of nature than a pair of shoes. For these you have to work hard." If the whole of nature is the random result of the evolution of matter, why don't atheists leave to nature the production of godless books? Why do they work with great diligence to create them? Even an atheistic book is proof that behind every organized thing there exists an intelligent design.

Acknowledge the Creator, adore Him, and don't waste time in useless speculations. Luther, when asked what God did before He created the world, answered, "He sat in the forest and cut rods with which to beat those who asked foolish questions."

There exists a better answer than this witty one. The Lord tells what the Father did before creation. Before the foundation of the world, He loved Christ (see JHN 17:24). To love Jesus is a full-time job. This job can fill God's eternity. The Father also did something else. Before the foundation of the world, He prepared the kingdom for those who feed the hungry, who satisfy the thirsty, who take in strangers, who clothe the naked, and who visit the sick as well as the prisoners (see MTT 25:34-36). Acknowledge God as creator, and do these things, just as Jesus "went about doing good" (ACT 10:38).

Jan 14
|
"The LORD gave, and the LORD hath taken away; blessed be the name of the LORD." (JOB 1:21)

The story is told of an angel who appeared to a mother watching at the cradle of her babe and then asked for her child. She cried, "Death, I won't give him!" The angel smiled and said, "My name is not death, but life. I offer you someone else in exchange." He showed her a fair boy. She refused. He showed her a powerful young man. She refused again. He showed a grown-up industrious man. She repeated, "No, no!" to all the proposals. "I exchange him for no one. I wish to keep my little child."

The angel departed. Time passed, and she had to lose the child. He was exchanged for a boy. She lost the boy. He was exchanged for a young man, and so on.

Why be afraid of death? We don't lose at death what we don't lose every day. Day by day our beloved ones change from one stage of life to another. What we call death is one of these many changes. The bud is no more. It has become a flower. The caterpillar is no more. It has become a butterfly. The sun may have set for you, but it gives its light somewhere else.

Whenever the angel has taken your beloved, acquiesce with humility to God's doings.

Jan 15
|
"Thine enemies ... shall ...flee before thee." (DEU 28:7)

A Christian teacher took a walk with one of his disciples through the forest. The disciple walked a few steps ahead of the master on a narrow trail. A hare fled from him. The master asked, "Why did the hare flee?"

"Because he feared me," the disciple said.

"No," replied the master, "but because you have murderous instincts in you."

Every warrior is happy when his enemies flee before him, but much more blessed is the man to whom his fiercest enemies can come with confidence, knowing beforehand that they will be received with love.

At the end of World War II, the Soviet army occupied Romania. Much of the German army was taken prisoner. Every German soldier could be shot at sight by anyone. One evening while a group of prisoners was being transported from one place to another, two of them profited from darkness and escaped. With their uniforms on, their lives were in danger. Seeing a building with an inscription "Evangelical Lutheran Chapel," they recalled that Lutherans of Romania were mostly of German background, so they entered the precinct. The pastor who encountered them extended a welcome, saying,

"I am Jewish and Christian. My family has been killed by Germans. I have learned from Christ love and forgiveness,. I don't hold you accountable for what the German troops have done to the Jews. You men are in deadly danger. You have taken refuge in our church. You are our honored guests."

One of the Germans said, "If you are a believer, we know we are safe." They had found a haven of refuge.

"When we were enemies, we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son" (ROM 5:10). Let us now be men from whom enemies should have no reason to flee.

Jan 16
|
"We love him, because he first loved us." (1JN 4:19)

I was told the following happening:
When the Soviet army invaded Eastern Europe, a Russian officer was lodged in the house of a painter who liked his expressive face and used him as his model for a painting. While sitting for the artist, the model looked at a picture of the crucified Jesus and asked what it was. The painter answered briefly, but the Russian officer insisted:
"If He was good and wished the salvation of all for eternity, men would surely have taken Him down from the cross in time and cured His wounds."
"Please, don't disturb me in my painting," came the reply. "No, He was not freed. He died on the cross. This is what He was meant to do. He paid the price for our sins. But let us continue our business."
The Russian officer would not be quieted. "How aglow you must be in your love for someone who made such a sacrifice for you." The painter put down his brush. He had many times painted Jesus crucified, but he realized now that it had been done without love aglow. The unbeliever who was his model taught him how he must love Christ.

Jan 17
|
"Upon the likeness of the throne was the likeness as the appearance of a man above upon it." (EZE 1:26)

The verse which follows the above is, "I saw as the colour of amber, as the appearance of fire round about within it, from the appearance of his loins even upward, and from the appearance of his loins even downward, I saw as it were the appearance of fire."
Rashi, the most authoritative rabbinic commentator of the Bible, observes, "One is not allowed to reflect on this verse." Why not? We can easily guess. It is because the description indicates clearly that the God whom Ezekiel saw in his vision had the body of a glorified man. It confirms the Christian doctrine of the incarnation of God's Son in the man Jesus.
Commenting on Zechariah's words, "They shall look upon me whom they have pierced" (ZEC 12:10), the same Rashi writes, "Though the verse applies to the king Messiah, we should rather apply it to king Ezechiah, so as not to allow the Christians to gain."
We can understand the Jewish revulsion against nominal Christianity guilty of the blood of millions of innocents, but still the Christian teaching about the Messiah is true and fulfills the ancient Jewish prophecies. Let us present these prophecies to the Jews and call them lovingly to Christ.

Jan 18
|
"When he saw the wind boisterous, he was afraid." (MTT 14:30)

A miracle had taken place. At the Lord's command, Peter was able to walk on the water, which is contrary to the laws of nature. But while Peter walked on the water, why was he afraid of the wind because it was boisterous? Could Christ perform such a miracle only when the weather was calm?

On another occasion the disciples were fearful in a great storm when the waves beat into their ship, so "that it was now full" (MRK 4:37). Heeding their cries of distress, Jesus made the winds cease and calmed the sea. Now the disciples were happy. But if a ship is full of water, it sinks whether the sea is calm or is agitated by tempest.

The miracle was not that the Lord rebuked the sea. The wonder is that the ship of Jesus has navigated for two thousand years, in good times and bad, though it is full of heresies, schisms, and sins. It still navigates though full of water, when it should have sunk long since according to the laws of hydrodynamics.

You may have passed through many crushing difficulties in life. Don't be afraid when one more is added. It is through a miracle that you have made it until now.

The stone that covered the tomb of Jesus was rolled away by an angel, "for it was very great" (MRK 16:4). Even though your burden has become greater than ever before, God might send an angel to help you.

The admonition "Do not fear" occurs in the Bible 366 times, once for every day of the year - and an extra for leap year.

Jan 19
|
"One of the malefactors which were hanged ... said unto Jesus, Lord, remember me when thou comest into thy kingdom. And Jesus said unto him, Verily I say unto thee, Today shalt thou be with me in paradise." (LUK 23:39,42,43).

Before his death, Lenin told a priest, "I have erred. No doubt many oppressed had to be freed, but our method has provoked other oppressions and horrible massacres. My mortal grief is to be immersed in an ocean of blood from innumerable victims. It is too late to turn back, but to save Russia we would have needed ten St. Francis' of Assisi."

Lenin had come under Christian influence. He had met the Orthodox priest Gapon, later hanged by the Communists. ~Nauka I Religia~, the atheist magazine of the Soviet Union, published the following in December 1973:

> "Lenin showed great interest in the writings of Christian sectarians which a fellow-Communist had gathered, especially in the old manuscripts. He studied them thoroughly.... He was especially interested in their philosophical writings. Once after thoroughly reading their manuscripts he said, 'How interesting! This was created by simple people. Whole books!'"

The Communist magazine says this much. Who knows how much more is behind the story? Perhaps a deathbed conversion. Heaven is a place of surprises. We might be surprised to find there the converted mass-slaughterer of Christians - Vladimir Lenin.

You may be a wicked person. You may be reading this at the end of your life. You can yet go to paradise.

Jan 20

|

"A righteous man regardeth the life of his beast." (PRO 12:10)

We often see horses jumping in races and in circuses, in pictures if not in reality. Now, the foot bones of the horse are weak. This domesticated animal is not made for jumping. He is taught to perform only by being beaten severely. More recently, horses are being subjected to electric shock treatments: circus trainers have mini-electrical batteries in their whips. Horses also are struck on the legs with iron bars to teach them to jump over fences. The pain makes them raise their legs high.

Don't support or cheer such exploitation; rather, pity the animal.

I do not personally admire the pyramids. Moses did not find them worth even a brief mention. He thought about the misery of the slaves who erected them.

In Communist jails, prisoners are very hungry. One slice of bread a week is a longed-for luxury. Yet Christians often save some to feed the pigeons and swallows that come confidently to the sills of windows with iron bars. They know how to distinguish the windows of cells containing Christians. Here they are not disappointed.

The Bible has much to say regarding the care of animals and forbids cruelty and indifference to helpless beasts (DEU 22:4). Jesus spoke about His love for the birds and His concern about animals (LUK 14:5). He did not find it degrading to be compared to a lamb, or a lion, or a hen with chicks.

Let us emulate Him in all things. As we show loving concern for our fellow men, let us not forget to be kind to animals, too.

Jan 21
|
"Bless, and curse not." (ROM 12:14)

Mrs. Gerda Forster, while baby-sitting for a neighbor, suffered the misfortune of having the baby fall out of her hands. The infant was injured on the edge of a large vase, with resultant brain damage. It was paralyzed for life.

The mother cursed Mrs. Forster that her fingers might rot. Mr. Forster offered to pay large compensatory damages. The mother refused and repeated the curse: may her fingers rot.

Mrs. Forster suddenly started to have great pain in her fingers. The fingertips became first white, then blue. It was a case of necrosis, the malady known as "morbus Raynaud." Psychic trauma can produce it, usually in women already possessing a precarious nervous constitution. The fingers had to be amputated.

When I was in solitary confinement, a neighbor tapped out this story in Morse code through the wall: "When I was six, I beat a schoolmate only because he was Jewish. He cursed me that my mother should not be able to see me when she was on her deathbed. Fifty years have passed since. I had just received the news that my mother was dying and intended to go to her deathbed when I was arrested." A curse had been accomplished. I know of other such cases.

I believe some curses are fulfilled. But so are blessings. So bless, don't curse.

Jan 22
|
"It is appointed unto men once to die." (HEB 9:27)

The surest business is that of the mortuary, while other trades may come and go. You might never enter a jeweler's shop or a theater, but you will have to die. How will you meet death?

Julius Caesar died a disillusioned man. His foster son was among his murderers. The great Caesar's last words were, "Brutus, you too?" Goethe said, "More light, more light!" He had not sought it before. Oscar Wilde's last request was, "Please, champagne," and he added, "I die as I lived, above my means." Napoleon died in delirium with the cry, "Mon Dieu, the French nation, at the head of the army!" The renowned arithmetician Lagny passed thirty-six hours in silence on his deathbed. He did not react when his beloved spoke to him. But when an acquaintance asked, "Do you still know how much sixty-seven to the second power is?" the mathematician answered smiling, "Four thousand four hundred eighty-nine" and died. Carlyle said, "So this is death? It is good." The German poet Heine's last words were, " Flowers, flowers. How beautiful is nature!" He had no thought about the Creator. The French writer Rabelais said before dying, "Let the curtain fall. The comedy is finished."

Jesus' last words were, "Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit" (LUK 23:46). When in prison, I decided that if I were conscious in the moment of my death my last words would be "Jesus and Binzea" (the name by which I call my wife). Christians know the reason for death and have the assurance that love waits for them on the other side.

Jan 23
|
"Be ye doers of the word, and not hearers only." (JMS 1:22)

A taxidermist once caught a splendid bird. When he lifted his knife to kill her, she begged, "Spare my life. I have little ones. In exchange I will give you three pieces of advice, very simple, but very useful." The taxidermist wondered at a bird that could speak human language and promised her freedom if the advice was good.

The bird gave the following counsel: "First, never believe anything stupid, no matter who it is who speaks to you. Second, never regret a good thing you have done. Third, never reach for something unattainable."

The taxidermist saw the wisdom of this advice and let the bird go. The bird flew to the first branch and from there mocked him, "You idiot, why did you let me go? I have in my belly a diamond. Had you ripped me open, you would have been rich the rest of your life."

The taxidermist, hearing this, regretted having released her and began to climb the tree to retrieve her. But when he reached the first branch, she was already on the second, and when he was on the second, she was on the third. In the end, he lost his footing, fell from the tree, and broke both his legs.

While he lay groaning under the tree, the bird flew nearer and told him, "You had accepted my three pieces of advice and praised them for being wise. Why did you not regard them for at least five minutes? I told you not to believe anything stupid, no matter who said it. How come you believed that a bird had a diamond in her belly? I told you never to regret a good deed. Why did you regret having freed me? I told you not to reach for the unattainable. Did you not know that you cannot catch a bird with your bare hands? You men have invented the radio and can hear in one country speeches from another, but you have not yet discovered an apparatus to enable you to hear with your ears what your own mouths speak, or to believe in your heart what your mind acknowledges as just."

You accept the Bible as the Word of God. Don't be only a hearer or a reader, but also a doer and a fulfiller.

Jan 24

|

"The LORD God took the man, and put him into the garden of Eden." (GEN 2:15)

It is more pleasant to know that our forefathers lived in a paradise than in a zoo, as Darwin asserts.

"The LORD God formed man of the dust of the ground" (GEN 2:7). Science confirms the fact that our bodies are made of the same elements of which the earth is constituted.

~Sepher Ierahmeel~, an ancient Jewish book, embellishes the biblical account: "God sent the archangel Gabriel to bring Him clay out of which He would make man, but the earth refused to give it up, knowing that it would be cursed because of man's disobedience." There was good reason for the refusal. Think only of the ravaging of the earth from bombing, or from defoliation, or from pollution. But in the end, Gabriel succeeded in convincing the earth. Man was made.

"God created man in his own image" (GEN 1:27). Modern technology recreates man in the image of machines, artificial, standardized, materialistic, programed, always in haste. Modern mass media recreate him after their image, reducing him to a low level, filling him with thoughts of violence and lust. Modern universities induce man to repeat the sin of the first couple and to prefer the tree of knowledge to the tree of life. Abstract theories and ideologies take the place of life.

George Fox, founder of the Quakers, wished to return to the image of God, to "experience God, ... pass beyond the flaming sword, re-enter paradise and seek the state of Adam before his fall."

Christ calls us all to this adventure. He, being God, took the nature of man that we might come back to the image of God.

Jan 25

|

"Let nothing be done through strife." (PHP 2:3)

Soshi walked along the shores of a river with a friend. Soshi said, "How well fish feel in water." The friend replied, "You are not a fish. How do you know that fish feel well?" Soshi said, "You are not me. How do you know that I do not know that fish feel well in water?" We fall out

with one another through questioning or contesting someone else's experiences which are outside our control.

Two friends, both peasants, sat on a log one evening and chatted. The one said, "I would like to have a meadow as big as the sky above our heads." The other said, "I would like to have as many sheep as the stars which we see." The first one asked, "Where would you pasture such a multitude of sheep?"

"No problem," replied the other. "They will graze on your huge pasture." The first one protested, "I will not allow your sheep on my field."

The one had no pasture, the other no sheep, but they quarreled about what they did not have. Don't we quarrel often about things we don't know?

Having the same love, let us be of one accord and of one mind. The other's opinion or attitude might be more worthy of esteem than yours. His experience of today which you consider strange might be yours tomorrow.

The Lord wished us to be one, as He and the Father are one.

Jan 26
|
"Thy servant Joab, he bade me, and he put all these words in the mouth of thine handmaid." (2SM 14:19)

I dreamed one night that I attended a party at which Solzhenitsyn, the renowned Russian writer and Nobel prize winner, read aloud from his book, ~Gulag Archipelago~. I wept bitterly about all the suffering he described. Solzhenitsyn asked me, "Do you know any remedy against these atrocities?" I answered, "I have known many criminals. Everyone had a weak point. Some passionately loved a wife, a child; others had great tenderness for a dog."

Svetlana, Stalin's daughter, tells how she obtained from her father the release of a prisoner. She could have obtained more than that. Kings of old took a rival's son as hostage, knowing the rival would not attack as long as the beloved was held captive. There are offenders who could not commit a felony if you threatened to kill their dog. Hardened murderers in prison gave up their only slice of bread to feed the swallows.

The woman who has stolen your husband might dearly love her mother, through whom you might influence her to give up your husband.

Joab, David's general, knew that the king wished clemency to rule in the country. He appealed to this through a woman whom he used to tell David an invented story about a son of hers, a murderer who should be pardoned. When David granted the petition as expected, she appealed to his desire for consistency and asked clemency for Absalom his son, who had offended greatly.

Make the man who wrongs you or society an object of your loving study. Seek an avenue of access to his heart. The natural love of children for parents can be used to influence them toward believing. Proceed in the same manner with other men. The emperor Constantine was influenced by his Christian mother, St. Helen, to favor the persecuted church of the Roman Empire and eventually to give the Christians liberty.

Jan 27
|
"If ye forgive men their trespasses, your heavenly Father will also forgive you." (MTT 6:14)

I received the following letter from Latin America:

"I write from a guerrilla camp in Peru. I lie awake. Sleep has fled from me. Recently I looked for some radio program to cheer me up, being sad and afraid. The programs of my comrades had become empty to me. They were repetitious and filled with hate. Then I came across your program called 'The Gospel in Marxist Language.' In it we were told that Jesus, the great teacher, spoke of pardoning one's enemies. That passage drove itself into the deepest part of my being. Suddenly, I experienced peace and I wept as a child. I don't understand what has happened. I had hated the rich. My parents had been victims of an exploiting landowner, but for some reason, I don't hate any more. I can't explain it. Is it possible for me not to hate?

"That was the only time I heard your program. How happy I have become, Don Ricardo. Now I shall not miss a single one of your programs. I want to read the Book of books."

This man left the guerillas and joined a church. Two years later he returned to the former comrades, hoping to tell them about Christ. We have not heard from him since. It is probable he was martyred by the Communists.

Jesus healed this soul at once of the most poisonous sentiment hatred. Has someone wronged you? Forgive. Receive forgiveness from God. Only then will you have inner freedom.

Jan 28
|
"Take therefore no thought for the morrow: for the morrow shall take thought for the things of itself." (MTT 6:34)

A Scotsman, traveling on a slow train from Glasgow to London, bought a ticket only to the first station; there he bought a ticket to the second, and so forth. He was asked why. His answer was, "I might have a heart attack while traveling and never reach London. In that case, I would have saved on my fare."

What about saving on worry and apprehension? Why worry about things far away? Perhaps those fears will prove unfounded. Perhaps you will die before arriving at that critical moment. Buy a ticket for one station at a time.

Jesus is the head of His church. Being the head, He has the monopoly on headaches. For you to have a headache because of worry is a sin. You thereby usurp the role of the head, which belongs to Jesus alone.

Luther had a habit of going to the window in the evening and saying, "God, is it my world or Yours? Is it my church or Yours? If they are Your world and Your church, please take care of them. I am tired. I am going to bed. Good night, my God."

Take this attitude. The Talmud says, "When the sun has set, the day is clean." When the evening comes, leave all the past days problems and failures with Jesus. Take no thought of the morrow. Sleep well. Tomorrow's worries might never reach you. They may even vanish overnight. Have a good day and a good night without worrying.

Jan 29
|
"As the lily among thorns, so is my love among the daughters." (SOS 2:2)

In ~Gulistan~ (the Garden of Roses), by the renowned mystic Persian writer Muslih al-Din Saadi, there exists the story about Madshnun and his beloved girl friend Leila. It was an unhappy love, because the father of Leila had given the daughter to another man. Madshnun, mad with love (his very name means "madman"), fled to the wilderness to live with the beasts, without purpose, without hope.

The king of the country had him brought to his palace and reproached him his folly, to which Madshnun answered, "Should you know how beautiful Leila is, you would understand me." The king gave the order that Leila be brought before him.

She was a Bedouin woman like anyone else, even uglier, burned by the sun, frail because of poverty. The meanest slave in his harem was surely more beautiful than she. He could not understand why she should be so much beloved. Madshnun guessed the king's thought and said to him, "You cannot see Leila's beauty, nor can anyone else. This beauty is revealed only to those who look through the window of Madshnun's eyes. Love and beauty are two riddles in one. Only the one who has divined the first, can understand the second."

God so loved the sinning soul that He gave His Son. "Because he first loved us," we love Him (1JN 4:19). His love makes Him see beauty and value in men whom no one else would esteem. Let us believe in the good taste of love. He knows why He has chosen us. We rejoice in His love.

Jan 30
|
"The Lord had said unto Abram, Get thee out of thy country." (GEN 12:1)

In Hebrew the word given by God to Abram is ~Leh leha~, which means, literally translated, "Go for your own benefit" or "for thyself."

Rabbi Nachum Chernobler Zatzal explained the verse as follows: Abram, our forefather in faith, was a wellspring of loving-kindness and hospitality. We read in GEN 18:1 that, though he had just undergone a painful operation, "he sat in the tent door in the heat of the day" that, God forbid, no traveler should pass by without being his guest.

But his hospitality had not been flawless in the beginning because he had never been a wanderer himself. Abram had to have firsthand experience of a traveler's hardship to become perfect in hospitality.

Peter had to pass through the experience of denying Christ. The Lord had told him, "When thou art converted (after such a falling into sin), strengthen thy brethren" (LUK 22:32). You will be able to do so because you will have passed through the bitterness of cowardice yourself.

Godhead had known the whole of human life as seen from the perspective of deity. But the Father told the Son ~Leh leha~ - "Go for your own benefit as future judge of mankind and participate in their sorrows and joys. Lead a human life Yourself. Godhead will thus be enriched by human experience. You will know human life as it looks to humans." So He became a high priest "in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin." Now He is "touched with the feeling of our infirmities" (HEB 4:15).

Accept your experiences of life, the sweet and the bitter. They all prepare you to become more helpful to your fellow men.

Jan 31
|
"Thou shalt love thy neighbour." (MTT 22:39)

Those who bring sunshine to the lives of others cannot keep it from themselves.

Jesus "went about doing good" (ACT 10:38). Therefore He could sing on the night He was betrayed (see MTT 26:30).

Don't require a smile of people. If you see someone without a smile give him yours. Multitudes followed Jesus. It was because He did not expect from them sympathy for His great sorrows. He comforted them in theirs.

Don't get angry at the man who acts in a manner that displeases you. He might have heard a different drummer. Everyone walks to the music he hears. Let him hear from you a more beautiful melody. It might change his pace.

At a party in my home Christians were discussing their friends. Some they considered good believers, others weak, still others unbelievers. An old missionary from India intervened: "Don't classify people. Our judgments might be wrong. As often as we speak, let us better propagate the love of Christ. This will gladden the strong believer, strengthen the weak one, and convert the unbeliever. So we will have done something positive. By categorizing men we are not helping them."

Spread sunshine among others instead of judging how much sunshine another has in his or her life.

Feb 1
|
"Charity ... beareth all things." (1CO 13:7)

The Jewish people have a legend about Abraham, the father of the faithful.

One evening while in deep meditation, the patriarch was disturbed by a knock at the door. It was a drunkard who asked for hospitality. Abraham's first impulse was to drive him away and to continue his sweet communion with God. But then the thought occurred to him: "What would be the purpose of so much more meditation? I know already that God bears with sinners and that He makes the sun to shine over this drunkard and provides him with daily bread. Why should I refuse a man whom God accepts? I can bear with him. God bears with my sins, too."

So the patriarch washed, served the drunkard some food, and prepared a bed for him.

Abraham had less spiritual light than we. Can we not follow his example?

Christians learned that a brother was in the act of committing adultery. They called Bishop Ammona to come with them and to convict the sinner on the spot, so that the church would not be contaminated anymore by his membership. However, when they arrived at the house, the adulterer succeeded in hiding the woman quickly in a big empty case which he had in the room. The bishop was the only one who observed it. He sat on the upturned case and said to the brethren, "Seek." They did and found no one. Ammona told them, "May God forgive you your suspicions and unseemly behavior." When they had left, he told the brother ensnared in sin, "Beware of the devil! "
Then he left. Bishop Ammona could sympathize with his brother in his sin, remembering that he, too, belonged to the same category. He had tried to win him through kindness and understanding.

When Jesus was brought as a lamb to the slaughter, "he opened not his mouth" (ISA 53:7) to say that the sins for which He suffered were not His own. He bore our sins. Let us not only be saved from hell through this, but saved also from judging others. Let us bear everything, and above all human failures and weaknesses.

Feb 2

|

"The fruit of the Spirit is love ... against such there is no law." (GAL 5:22,23)

St. Mechtild of Magdeburg once said, "Love has no virtues." Love has no fixed rules, no immutable principles of action. Augustine's renowned injunction was, "Love God and do as you please." Normally, the lover will fulfill the commandments of Scripture, but he is free in exceptional circumstances.

In the Nazi concentration camp of Auschwitz pregnant women were killed. A Christian woman doctor, herself a prisoner, performed primitive abortions on hundreds of other prisoners. Thus she saved their lives. It is true she killed the embryos, but without her intervention both the children and their mothers would have died.

A German lady had been taken prisoner by the Soviet army and sent to a slave labor camp in Siberia. Women were allowed to come back from there only if they were gravely sick or pregnant. She had left behind three children who had no one to care for them. Her husband was in British captivity. She asked a guard to impregnate her. Thus she was able to return to care for her children. When her husband returned, she explained to him what she had done. He agreed that it was the only recourse under the circumstances.

Missions to Communist and Moslem countries smuggle in Christian literature, using all kinds of strange tricks. Against love there is law, though in normal circumstances love walks according to law.

Feb 3

|

"[Jesus said] Teach all nations." (MTT 28:19)

Mahomet's son-in-law Ali, who should have been his successor was killed, as was Ali's son Husain. The Shiite Moslems, who are the closest to Christianity in their theology, have the following text in their sacred writings: "To weep for Husain is the sense of our life and of our soul. Otherwise we would be the most ungrateful beings. Even in Paradise we will mourn for Husain. It is impossible for a Shiite not to weep.... The death of Husain prepared a way to paradise."

The Kerbela book considered holy by them says, "The death of Husain is our entrance into life. The love toward Ali consumes all sins, as fire consumes the dry wood." They also venerate Ali's wife, Fatima. They believe that she is "the incarnation of everything divine in female nature, the most noble ideal attained by human reason, the queen of paradise." They believe that the "unseen Imam," their religious leader in every generation, is an incarnation of Godhead.

The twelfth descendant of Ali, Mohamed ibn al-Hasan, who disappeared at the age of four, is considered to have been raptured to heaven, from which he will return at the end of time as Mahdi, universal Savior.

We find in Islam, as in many other erroneous religions, tenets which are vaguely akin to our Christian faith. Souls grope after the truth of which they have only a foreboding. But they don't have the light of Christ. Almost all Moslem states forbid Christian missionary work. Let us pray for the conversion of the Islamic world.

Feb 4
|
"As he thinketh in his heart, so is he." (PRO 23:7)

The American cancer specialist Eugene Pendergrass was the first to observe that in most cases cancer appears six to eighteen months after some tragedy in life, be it a bereavement, the unloyalty of a marriage partner, loss in business, etc. But if sorrow of soul can produce this sickness, then peace and hope of soul must be able to contribute greatly to the recovery of health. The cancerous cells can multiply, but the white blood cells can attack and destroy them. This depends much on our faith and determination.

Often we are sick because subconsciously we wish to be sick in order to gain attention and the loving-kindness we miss. But it is wrong to wish only to be the object of love. Be its subject; love others. Those who harbor hatred, those who cannot forgive, are much more prone to cancer and other illnesses than those who forgive easily.

I was sick at one time with generalized tuberculosis of both lungs, backbone and bone tuberculosis, intestinal tuberculosis, jaundice, diabetes, and heart disease. I was in prison where the "medicine" consisted of hunger, lack of air lack of sun, and beatings; But I was determined to live because I felt that I had a calling to fulfill. I prayed and many others prayed for me. A general confession of all my past sins unburdened my soul. Thus God gave me the energy to overcome the sickness.

Some day you must die. It may be that your present sickness is God's means to take you home. Miraculous healings are the exception; otherwise they would not be miraculous. Still, believe in the miraculous. It is in the realm of the possible. And concur with it by having peaceful faith.

Feb 5
|
"Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers." (ROM 13:1

Of twenty-nine members of the Central Committee of the Communist Party which created the revolution in Russia, three were killed by their enemies, two committed suicide, and fifteen were executed by their own comrades. Stalin was disowned after his death. If these revolutionists who wanted to overthrow tyranny had known that the result of their rebellion would be death at the hand of their own comrades and the establishment of a tyranny directed not only against the enemies of the revolution but also against those who made it succeed, would they have started on their career as rebels against existing powers?

Would Trotsky have become a revolutionist had he known beforehand that this revolution would finally bring Stalin to power? Stalin killed two of Trotsky's children plus many relatives, all his adherents, and in the end sent a henchman to finish Trotsky himself with an axe.

The Czarist regime, which had many injustices, would never have committed such crimes against revolutionists or the people.

Most revolutions have not been worth the fight. Revolutions are the worst of solutions. The Jewish state would not have been destroyed by the Romans in A.D. 71 if the people had listened to Jesus' advice: "Resist not evil: but whosoever shall smite thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also" (MTT 5:39).

Let us make revolutionists and terrorists a matter of prayerful concern, asking that they may use their energies in the service of peaceful reforms.

Feb 6
|
The serpent said to Eve:
"God doth know that in the day ye eat (of the fruit of the tree which is in the midst of the garden), then your eyes shall be opened." (GEN 3:5)

It seems as if the purposes of God and those of Satan are the same. The Lord Jesus said to Saul of Tarsus, "I send thee [now to the Gentiles] to open their eyes" (ACT 26:17,18). The devil promises the same thing. Still, the difference is great.

If the serpent opens your eyes, they will always be wide open. Those whose eyes God opens can close them as often as they like. They can close them to the sins of their brother, just as Shem and Japheth covered the nakedness of their father. This is what Christians do for every man.

On the other hand, those whose eyes the serpent has opened are wide open to all future dangers and troubles. They are open to the distractions of biblical intricacies and to all the problems that faith leaves unsolved.

Those who allow God to control what they see can close their eyes in faith in the midst of perils. Why should I worry? "He that keepeth Israel shall neither slumber nor sleep" (PSA 121:4).

The day is coming when we shall see "face to face" (1CO 13:12).

Refuse the devil as your eye doctor. Allow only God to take care of your vision.

Feb 7
|
"[A sparrow] shall not fall on the ground without your Father." (MTT 10:29)

The Chinese pastor Wang-Min-tao had risked his life under the Japanese occupation to maintain the purity of the gospel. Among other things, he refused to allow a picture of the Japanese emperor to hang in his church. He also refused this honor to a picture of Mao Tse-tung. His excuse was that he did not have a picture of Jesus Christ either.

In 1955 he was arrested for his refusal to compromise with the Communists. For two years he was subjected to extreme brainwashing techniques. Maddened by torture, he signed a confession enumerating his "imperialist" sins. He was released.

In freedom he had no peace. He went around muttering continually, "I am Peter; I am Judas," until one day he went to the Communists and told them that he recanted his former confession. For this, he and his wife were put in prison. From jail he wrote the biblical words: "Do not be anxious about me; I am of more value than many sparrows." He died in prison.

Once a prominent leader in Christianity, he had denied his faith. He had fallen. Sparrows don't fall from the tree without the Father's leave. Neither do Christians fall without His will.

Why should God allow us to fall in sin? Daniel says, "Some of them of understanding shall fall, ... to purge, and to make them white" (DAN 11:35). Falls from which we return to the Lord are sources of humility, of light, of strength, and of comfort to others.

"All things work together for good to them that love God" (ROM 8:28). Augustine adds, "even their sins."

Feb 8
|
"It is easier for a camel to go through a needle's eye, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God." (LUK 18:25)

Red China's former minister of foreign affairs, Chou En-Lai, once declared that he was much impressed by this verse, but the Communists criticize Jesus for allowing the rich ruler to depart in peace. He should have arrested him and confiscated all his property.

The Communists believe that the expropriation of capitalist property creates an immediate paradise. Even some leftist clergymen in the West as well as the East have embraced this conviction.

Why should Jesus have taken riches from the young ruler? A man of means and a mean man sometimes are the same person. Whoever takes a rich man's means might also take his meanness, without he might not have remained so rich in a starving world.

Taking the ruler's riches, Jesus also would have taken away the restlessness of his soul which made him to go from rabbi to rabbi asking for the way to life eternal.

Rich men must part with their riches at death if not before.

"My kingdom is not of this world," said Jesus (JHN 18:36). We are to gather our treasures in heaven, "where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through nor steal" (MTT 6:20).

Feb 9
|
"The LORD God called unto Adam, and said unto him, Where art thou?" (GEN 3:9)

A professor of homiletics (preaching) at a seminary asked his students to read this verse of Scripture. Most read the question as would a policeman who had just caught a robber about to break into a house. But a good preacher reads these words as if they were uttered by a broken-hearted father. The world would be less mysterious to us if we could realize that Adam was created by a sad God, sad because of the fall of Lucifer.

And now the new disappointment. Adam fell too. God lost a fellowship in which He had placed great hope.

Later God put an even more tragic question to Cain: "Where is Abel thy brother?" (GEN 4:9).

Where is the good preacher who can read these words as expressing all God's sadness?

These questions must be read so that the listener can overcome the fear that made Adam hide himself, naked and sinful, among the bushes. The questions come from a God who already decided to send the Savior, the seed of the woman, to be bruised for the sins of mankind; they come from a God who put even a criminal like Cain under His special protection. The blood of Christ can cleanse him, too. "Where sin abounded, grace did much more abound" (ROM 5:20).

Have confidence in God for the whole of your life and trust His loving-kindness.

Feb 9

|

"Be not drunk with wine, wherein is excess; but be filled with the Spirit." (EPH 5:18)

You might commit excesses in drinking. You might suffer because a loved one commits this sin. Don't chide alcoholics. Don't chide yourself if you are one. But remind yourself how much money you have lost because of alcohol, how many smiles of your wife or mother, how much laughter of your children, and how much happiness have disappeared from your home because of the criminal plotters of the alcohol Industry, whose victim you are.

Visit a prison and a mental asylum. You will be amazed to find out how many are there because of alcohol. No one goes to jail because he is temperate or a teetotaler.

Do you like it when you vomit? Do you like it when your children despise you? Would you like to be forsaken by your sweetheart? What kind of business sense makes you enrich the saloon keepers and impoverish yourself? Does alcohol help you to avoid car accidents? Do you think better when drunk than when sober?

"Wine is a mocker, strong drink is raging: and whosoever is deceived thereby is not wise" (PRO 20:1).

If you have succumbed and feel helpless or despairing, consider the fact that God's eyes "run down with tears night and day" because of your sin (JER 14:17). He cares. He has the remedy.

You don't need wine. The fullness of the Holy Spirit is available. Unlike alcohol, it gives a euphoria, a sense of exhilaration which is not transitory. The apostles gave the impression of being drunk at Pentecost when they received the Spirit (ACT 2:13), but this was a jubilation which enabled them to accomplish great things for God.

Feb 11

|
"Blessed are the poor in spirit: for theirs is the kingdom of heaven." (MTT 5:3)

In a theater in Moscow at the premier of a new play, ~Christ in a Fur~, the hall was overcrowded.

The actor Alexander Rostovtsev had to play the main role. He belonged to the high circles of Soviet life and was a convinced Marxist.

On the stage was a mockery of an altar. The cross on it was made of bottles of wine and beer. Full glasses surrounded it. Fat "clergymen" said a drunken "liturgy" consisting of blasphemous formulas. In this sham church, "nuns" played cards, drank, and made ugly jokes while the "religious service" went on.

Then Rostovtsev appeared as Christ, dressed in a robe. He had the New Testament in his hands. He was supposed to read two verses from the Sermon on the Mount, then throw away the book in disgust and shout, "Give me my fur and my hat! I prefer a simple proletarian life." But something unexpected happened. The actor read not only two verses, but continued, "Blessed are the meek: for they shall inherit the earth" (MTT 5:5), and so on to the end of the sermon. It was in vain that the prompter made desperate signs for him to stop.

When Rostovtsev came to the last words of Jesus, he made the sign of the cross in the Orthodox manner, said, "Lord, remember me when thou comest into thy kingdom" (LUK 23:42), and left the stage. He was never seen again. The Communists disposed of him.

Let us, like this actor, forget the ugly roles imposed upon us by the world and allow ourselves to be enraptured by the beauties of the Savior's words.

Feb 12
|
"Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life." (REV 2:10)

Great forces persecute the church, such as communism and Islamism. Old tribal religions have revived in Africa. Christians often suffer persecution in their homes and at their work in other countries.

How can the dragon of persecution be killed? Martyrdom is one weapon.

Thomas … Becket, archbishop of Canterbury in the twelfth century, showed the tyrannical King Henry II of England that the church has powers superior to those of this world, and that the divine and permanent cannot be subject to the human and transient. He fought for the noninterference of the state in church matters. For this he was killed. His last words were, "I die willingly, for the name of Jesus and for the defense of the church." The news of his murder so horrified Europe that the movement against the church's liberty was stopped. All recognized him as a martyr.

His blood still showed red on the cathedral stones when, in 1174, King Henry II walked barefoot to Canterbury to suffer a flogging, accepted willingly as penance for his crime, and to keep vigil by the tomb of the man he killed. The blood of the martyr converted the murderer. Could it not happen again?

The first Christians were persecuted by the Roman emperors, but in the end, Roman emperors became Christians.

Cross near cross, grave near grave - this is how the church conquers. Patient suffering will make you, too, a victor.

Feb 13
|
"If there come any unto you, and bring not this doctrine, receive him not into your house." (2JN 10)

All the great teachers of the Christian church were what one would call today narrow-minded. They knew only one way to heaven. Astronauts, returning to earth from the moon are also very narrow-minded. The spaceship must follow a certain limited path which permits little deviation. If they were to miss their entry "slot" by one degree, they could end up lost in space or burned up completely.

We must stay on the path and stick to what we have learned from Christ. Luther differed from Zwingli, the Swiss reformer, in the meaning of Holy Communion. Therefore Luther taught: "He who knows that his pastor teaches in the Zwinglian manner should shun him and remain without the sacrament his whole life rather than receive it from him. He should prefer to die and suffer everything.... It is horrible for me to hear that in one and the same church, and at the same altar, men receive the same sacrament, some of whom believe that they receive only bread and wine while others that they receive the body and blood of Christ."

If we start by calling heretics "separated brethren," we might eventually call devils "separated angels."

Be careful with whom you align yourself. Be wary of schemes to unite the churches. When you tie two birds together, though they might have a total of four wings, they don't fly better. They will not fly at all.

Remain faithful to what you have learned from God's holy Word.

Feb 14
|
"Our Father which art in heaven." (MTT 6:9)

A document making the rounds secretly in the Soviet Union tells the story of a large group of nuns in a labor camp who had refused to work for their captors. They had been manacled and reduced to hunger. All was to no avail. Common prisoners were converted under their influence, and they now had a real convent in the camp. When Irene, the daughter of the prison camp's director, fell gravely ill, he had no choice. He asked for the nuns' prayers. The girl was healed.

The wife of the Communist officer Tcherednitchenko was having a difficult time giving birth. Her life and the life of the child were in danger. Someone suggested to him, "Promise that if everything goes well, you will have the child baptized."

"I can lose everything by this act."

"Well, choose between what you call 'everything' on the one hand and your wife and child on the other." The birth went well. He had the child baptized.

The Communists wished to compel the nuns to abandon their religious habit and to wear the uniform of prisoners. They answered, "We will not wear the badge of the antichrist." Because of this they were compelled to walk naked through the snow in freezing temperatures. They walked singing "Our Father." Not one of them fell ill. When a Communist inquired of the camp's doctor, Mrs. Bravermann, herself an atheist, how this was possible from a medical point of view, she replied, "Did you not hear them singing about a Father in heaven? Well, this is the scientific explanation."

He is your Father, too.

Feb 15
|
"Behold the fowls of the air ... Consider the lilies of the field." (MTT 6:26, 28)

An anthropologist asked an aborigine in Australia: "Tuplin, is the earth round like a ball (holding up a ball of crochet cotton) or square like the box I am sitting on?"

"Round like a ball," the girl promptly replied.

"How do you know?" she asked.

"Oh, Missus, just look all round you; see sky touching the earth all round. Wherever you stand and look, it is all round; put baby down to walk he soon run round, not always straight like a fence; see sheep get lost they run round and round. See younger (kangaroo) run straight very little, then run round and round.... All trees are round, all bushes grown round.. .. Oh, Missus, why do you ask us?" Here in the mind of a primitive native the problem of the roundness of the earth was solved in the simplest manner.

Without genial minds, education, telescopes, and complicated calculations, aborigines have discovered the shape of the earth.

We rely too much on the sayings of scientific, religious, and philosophic authorities. We look into books to discover reality and truth, though the "eternal power and Godhead" can be seen in His creation even by simple people. "For the invisible things ... are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made" (ROM 1:20).

Exercise your own powers of observation, Jesus says, so that you will be better able to judge men, things, and events.

Feb 16

"The publican ... smote upon his breast, saying, God be merciful to me a sinner." (LUK 18:13)

In Russia, a Christian asked his pastor, "How must I say the words, 'Lord, have mercy'?" The pastor answered, "You do well to ask. It is a short but important prayer and is not easily said. When you say the words, evoke the image of the crucified Lord. Look at Him with nails driven into His body and remember His words, 'Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest.' If you say the simple prayer like this, you will glorify God, serve men, and grow in grace yourself."

Say your prayers without worrying about the fact that either others don't pray or they pray in a pharisaical manner.

A religion takes in believers and unbelievers, saints and hypocrites, those who love God and those who only fear Him. It includes persons who yield absolute surrender and others who obey only up to a point. It embraces elaborate rituals and humble prayers of penitent sinners. A religion without all of these is hardly imaginable.

Let others play the role allotted to them. You say again and again the simple prayer given for you, "God, have mercy." He will be merciful to you.

Feb 17

"Whether we live, we live unto the Lord; and whether we die, we die unto the Lord." (ROM 14:8)

When Paulinus, the Christian missionary, came to the Anglo-Saxons asking them to embrace his faith, an old warrior told the king in the national assembly: "On a dark night, when the tempest was abroad and snow was falling without, when you were seated by the fire in the lighted hall, a sparrow entered through a window open for a moment, fluttered through the room, and then left by that same window. We have never seen it again. So we come from somewhere, we enjoy light and heat for a moment, and afterwards we go. If this stranger can tell us whence we come and where we go, we should accept his religion."

Christians have the answers to these questions. All the stars, the planets, the earth, and everything upon it are not as valuable as one single soul – your soul – because your soul knows both itself and them, whereas they know nothing. Our souls came from God but have gone astray, attracted by the things of this world. Therefore Jesus, the Son of God, came to this earth, pleasing the Father by His life of perfect obedience and His sacrificial death on the cross. He did not need to earn these "credits," since the heavenly Father loves Him for His divine nature, but the credits acquired on earth are imparted to His believers, who thus may inherit a beautiful paradise forever.

"He that hath the Son hath life (the only life really worth the name); and he that hath not the Son of God hath not life" (1JN 5:12).

It is amazing how many intellectuals call themselves "agnostics," not realizing that this is the Greek word for "ignorant." To be ignorant is a shame when one has the possibility of acquiring knowledge.

The Christian religion gives a satisfactory answer to the ultimate problems of life.

Feb 18
|
"Lord, is it I?" (MTT 26:22)

A letter smuggled out of Russia by the Baptist church in Barnaui tells how the Secret Police infiltrated their ranks six years ago in the person of a lady named Z. Polushina. She pretended to be a teacher. She wept and prayed and declared herself converted. She soon became a hero. She refused to renounce her faith, lost her job, and was fired by one factory after another because of her Christian testimony. Her husband, a Communist, mistreated her and deprived her of her son. He destroyed her radio because she listened to sermons from abroad.

All the members of the church saw her courage in suffering. So she became highly regarded and appreciated. It was she who unmasked a new member of the church as being an agent of the Secret Police. Held in high esteem, she knew all the secrets of the church, especially since her prayers were always accompanied by tears. After six years, it was discovered that she had been an informer for the Communists, that she had had no husband, no child, and no teacher's job to lose. Everything had been staged.

Don't be bitter nor even surprised if you have been betrayed in friendship or love, or if your trust in a person has proved unfounded. The fault may be yours for not heeding Jesus' commandment, "Beware of men" (MTT 10:17). The number of French, Dutch, and Norwegians who betrayed their fatherland under German occupation was large, as was the number of American soldiers who cooperated with the enemy as prisoners of war in Korea and Vietnam.

Instead of asking fidelity from others, whenever you hear about a treason ask yourself, as did the apostles, "Lord, is it I?" We are all potential Judases, and it is only the grace of God that can keep us loyal to God and to our fellow men.

Feb 19
|
"He that tilleth his land shall be satisfied with bread."
(PRO 12:11)

Mankind has three times the weapons necessary to kill every living being and only half the food it needs. Every second man is undernourished or starving. Strikes, riots, and revolutions do not increase the output of food. Furthermore, they do harm to our fellow men.

Try the means shown by God for such circumstances:

1) Pray regularly, in the words taught by our Lord, "Give us this day our daily bread."

2) Be obedient to God. It is written, "If ye walk in my statutes, and keep my commandments, and do them ... ye shall eat your bread to the full" (LEV 26:3-5).

3) Be careful how you eat. "God hath created [meats] to be received with thanksgiving" (1TM 4:3). "Eat thy bread with joy" (ECC 9:7). The first Christians "did eat their meat with gladness and singleness of heart" (ACT 2:46).

4) "Bring ye all the tithes into the storehouse ... and prove me now herewith, saith the LORD of hosts, if I will not ... pour you out a blessing" (MAL 3:10).

S) Change your attitude, if necessary, to suit the promise, "He that walketh righteously, and speaketh uprightly; he that despiseth the gain of oppressions, that shaketh his hands from holding of bribes, that stoppeth his ears from hearing of blood, and shutteth his eyes from seeing evil; ... bread shall be given him" (ISA 33:15,16).

We, on the contrary, spend "money for that which is not bread" (ISA 55:2). We all squander. We give little thought to the needs of others.

Knowing that hunger stalks the earth, let us change our ways today for the sake of our own spiritual health and for the sake of those who starve.

Feb 20
|
"Mary stood without at the sepulchre weeping." (JHN 20:11)

A woman in tears entered the police station.
"Find my husband. I can't live without him. He has disappeared."
"Please, lady, let us get the facts in order. When did your husband disappear?"
"A week ago."
"Why did you wait till today to let us know?"
"Today he gets his paycheck."
Many of us seek the Lord when we need His help, when we pass through some crisis, not simply because we love Him.
Would you have loved a Savior who hung on a cross and declared Himself to be forsaken by God? Would you have spent your love and sweet spices on a Savior who was a corpse and could be of no help to anyone? Mary Magdalene did.
She sat loving and weeping near His tomb. This is why He was resurrected so early. Though buried on Friday evening, He was alive again on Sunday morning. His Spirit saw Mary weeping at the tomb and He could not bear her tears.
Show God and your fellow men a disinterested love that is not altered by circumstances.

Feb 21
|
"Which is called in the Hebrew tongue." (JHN 5.2)
"Canst thou speak Greek?" (ACT 21:37)

The Bible in its original languages (Hebrew, Aramaic, and Greek) is the Word of God. What we have today is a translation of the Word. The advantage of knowing the biblical languages is obvious. Every man with a high school education can learn Hebrew or Greek by devoting to this study one fourth of an hour a day. I would encourage you to learn the original languages.
In the Authorized Version some words are in italics, which were employed to complete a biblical sentence that seemed incomplete to the translator. Thus, for example, the Hebrew text of 2SM 5:8 is "David said ... Whosoever ... smiteth the Jebusites ... hated of David's soul." That is all. The translators added, "he shall be chief and captain." There is no such promise in the original. David's soldiers should have fulfilled his desire out of love for their country, not in order to be advanced in rank.
In GEN 13:9, Abram says to Lot, "Separate thyself, I pray thee, from me; the left hand, then I will go to the right; or if to the right hand, then I will go the left." The translators added in italics, "if ~thou wilt take~ the left hand, if ~thou depart~ to the right hand." The original is not clear grammatically, but teaches that the two are one body and that separation between believers is like cutting off one's hand.

GEN 30:27 says simply in Hebrew, "Laban said unto [Jacob], ... If I have found favor in thine eyes." The word "tarry" is added by the translators. It was for Jacob to take what course of action he considered best. Love does not impose attitudes upon others. Laban wished only to find favor in Jacob's eyes.

Search the Scriptures in their original setting. Ask your pastors to go to the original for flavor and interpretation.

Feb 22
|
"The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God." (PSA 14:1)

In the psalmist's day, people led a natural life and only isolated fools could deny the existence of God, however they conceived Him. This is no longer true. Modern atheism is an urban phenomenon conceived by men who live in crowded cities, walk and ride on concrete, and are out of touch with nature. Inhabitants of cities have polluted the air and the water. Now they ask where God is. Those who live where the skies are blue, the air clean, and the water sparkling know. There are very few, if any, atheist farmers.

The early crocus, the first robin of spring, the rhythm of the seasons, the dark woods and the fields of ripening grain, the work of insects, the migration of birds, the intricate design of the snowflake all speak of their Creator. "Day unto day uttereth speech, and unto night sheweth knowledge" (PSA 19:2).

Chief Seattle of the Squamish Indians in Washington said in 1854, "The white man's dead forget the country of their birth when they go to walk among the stars. Our dead never forget this beautiful earth, for it is part of us. The perfumed flowers are our sisters, the deer, the horse, the great eagle, these are our brothers. The rock crests, the juices in the meadows, the body heat of the pony, and man all belong to the same family."

But this Indian's reproaches against white men were unjust, as far as the Christians are concerned. We look upon the earth as God's footstool. Jesus walked on it and was buried in it. His body was formed of its elements. He took this body with Him to heaven. He loved the earthly elements, which sing God's glory.

There is no atheism among those brought up in nature. May this assurance confirm your faith in God.

Feb 23
|

"The water was spent in the bottle.... And God opened [Hagar's] eyes and she saw a well of water." (GEN 21:15,19)

Hagar was sent away by Abraham into the wilderness. After traveling a long way with her son Ishmael, she found that the contents of her only bottle of water were depleted.

She was in a desert place. There was no hope. She cast the child under a shrub and sat over against him "a good way off ... and wept." It seemed that the child was lost. A thirsty child, an empty bottle, a scorching sun. She expected him to die.

But there was one factor she had forgotten to take into account. We also tend to forget this when we pass through difficulties. There is a God. He revealed a well of water to the woman who went about with an empty bottle. God may have deprived you of small possibilities in order to give you great ones.

We carry bottles; God has wells.

Let us draw water from the wells of salvation.

Feb 24
|
"It is appointed unto men once to die." (HEB 9:27)

Fourteen of the Japanese war criminals sentenced to death were converted. The last letter of one of them, Nishizawa, says, "I am living thankful days, believing that I may receive salvation ... Saved by the grace of God, to live in Christ and to die is gain." An atheist said on his deathbed, "There is one thing that mars all the pleasure of my life. I'm afraid the Bible is true. If I could only know for a certainty that death is an eternal sleep, I should be happy. But here is what pierces my soul: if the Bible is true, I am lost forever."

The dying advice of Louis IX, king of France, to his daughter was: "I conjure you to love our Lord with all your might, for this is the foundation of all goodness. I wish you could comprehend what the Son of God has done for our redemption. Never be guilty of any deliberate sin, though it were to save your life." Philip Melanchthon, Luther's closest co-worker in the Reformation, said, "I want nothing but heaven; therefore trouble me no more."

Francis Spira, after having been an evangelical preacher for years, recanted in the presence of a multitude for fear of persecution.

His last words were: "I have denied Christ voluntarily and against my convictions. I feel that He hardens me and will allow no hope. It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God."

A dying minister said: "I call heaven and earth to witness, that if I were to recover, I would labor for holiness. As for riches and pleasure and the applause of men, I count them as dross. But now the best resolutions are insignificant, because it is too late."

Remember that you too will die. Repent while you have time.

Feb 25
|
"Being justified freely by his grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus." (ROM 3:24)

A poor fakir prayed to God that he might be fed. A divine voice came to him in his sleep and directed him to go to a certain location, place an arrow in his bow while facing east, and wherever the arrow fell dig for treasure. The fakir shot many arrows and dug in every direction, but all in vain. Then a voice from heaven came to him saying, "You were directed to fix an arrow in your bow, but not to draw the bow with all your might, as you have been doing. Shoot as gently as possible that the arrow may fall close to you, for the hidden treasure is near."

Don't make arduous efforts in religion. When my son was small, he asked me how he should examine himself to see if he were in the faith, as enjoined in 1CO 11:28. I told him that at train stations he must have observed a mechanic proving the wheels with a hammer to see if they had the right vibrations. Then, beating my breast powerfully, I said, "So you must beat your breast, too, asking again and again, 'Heart, do you love Jesus?'"

"Father," he replied, "you are wrong. I once asked the mechanic in the station to allow me to handle the hammer. I discovered that it is very light. We have to beat our breasts very softly. If I hear from inside only a low whisper 'I love Jesus,' this should be enough."

There are some who would rather impose upon themselves great hardships in religion instead of simply believing that the blood of Jesus Christ saves to the uttermost. The Beloved is right here. Just embrace Him.

Feb 26
|
"[Beware of perverse disputings of men of corrupt minds." (1TM 6:5)

Two men disputed over the meaning of the word "glass." The one said, "It is a cylinder, and cursed be he who says otherwise." The second says, "A glass is a vessel of any shape for drinking and accursed is the one who says otherwise."

A glass can also be defined in other ways. It has many relationships and utilitarian possibilities. For instance, it can be a projectile thrown at someone else's head in anger. Ultimately, however, a glass is a glass. Its reality has nothing to do with its name "glass," which it bears only in English. In French it is called ~verre~ and in Russian ~stakan~. Definitions are subjective, incomplete, and are given from a certain point of view.

Let us never forget that every point of view is a point of blindness because it eliminates other points of views which may be equally valid. If I look up, I cease to see the floor of the room. If I look down, I don't see the ceiling. I arrive at truth only through an intuition of the whole of reality with all its intricacies. But reality is not only material, it is also spiritual. It knows itself. Christ is the expression of this self-knowledge of the whole reality. Therefore He says, "I am the truth" (JHN 14:6).

Observe that He never said "He is" the truth. He said "~I am~ the truth." We are not allowed to change the pronoun. If Jesus is for you a "He," you cannot have the truth; He must become your"I." He wishes to live in your heart as truly as He lived in the Virgin Mary's womb. Then, as you identify with Him, your doubts will disappear. You, too, will become a personification of truth. Imperfect? Yes. But with "Christ in you" you have "the hope of glory" (COL 1:27).

Feb 27
|
"Let both grow together." (MTT 13:30)

A gardener in the United States once wrote to the Department of Agriculture: "I've tried everything I've ever heard about or read, including all your bulletins, on how to get rid of dandelions - and I've still got them." By return mail, he received the last word on the subject:
"Dear Sir: If you have tried everything and you still have dandelions, there is only one thing left for you to do. Learn to love them."

Whatever means you employ, you will never get rid of false friends, enemies, rivals, opponents, or annoyances with your marriage partner or other relatives. But you can rid yourself once and for all of the burden they present to you, by declaring them the objects of your love. There exists no alternative to loving your enemies unless you wish to kill yourself slowly by nurturing hatred.

Don't judge your enemies by the attitudes they take toward you, but by the circumstances of their own lives. They may never have been beloved. You might be the scapegoat for their resentment against other persons they do not dare attack. A man who has a nasty employer in the office may sometimes say bitter words to his wife. He has to be silent when the boss rebukes him. His wife becomes the target.

You can't always change the stream of life. Love it with whatever it brings. Jesus said, "I am the life" - the life in all its aspects. Consider it sacred - and handle it with care.

Feb 28
|
"Be ye separate." (2CO 6:17)

A peasant, hearing a proclamation issued by the prince of Tirmid to the effect that a large reward would be given to him who would take a message to Samarkand in the space of four days, hurried to Tirmid as fast as he could. The city became alarmed, thinking that his extreme haste announced the approach of some calamity. When admitted to the presence of the prince, all he had to say was that he had hurried to inform the prince that he could not go to Samarkand that fast.

I often think about this story of Rumi's "Masnavi" when I hear many prayers in churches in which men, who had driven to the service at great speed, excuse themselves before God for the fact that, being sinners, they will not be able to fulfill His commandments. What was the good of coming to tell God this?

You are a weak believer. God does not ask much from you, but only that you should not yoke yourself together with an unbeliever, or else you too might receive the same damnation.

A mouse developed a great affection for a frog. That he might be able to communicate with his friend at all times, he fastened a string to the frog's leg, and the other end of it to its own. Shortly afterward a raven swooped down on the mouse and carried him off, and the frog, being fastened to the mouse, was dragged off and destroyed with it. If it would not have been attached to the mouse, it would have been safe. The raven could not have entered into water.

Instead of telling God again and again that you can't fulfill His commandment, however weak you might be, separate yourself from the world and at once you will be in new surroundings favorable to the keeping of God's will.

Feb 29

|
"It pleased God ... to reveal his Son in me." (GAL 1:15,16)

When Michelangelo used a stonemason as his model for a statue of Christ, he was criticized by his teacher, Ghirlandaio. Michelangelo defended himself: "But Christ was also a workingman, a carpenter." The master replied, "Florence won't accept a working-class Christ. they are used to thinking of Him as a nobleman."

Some are accustomed only to a historical Savior. They will not accept an inner Christ, though to be real Christ must dwell within the heart.

In a renowned French novel, we are told about a British lord who loved to play the fool over a prima donna in the opera. He would go night after night to listen to her. He would send her flowers and jewels. She became interested in him and made an arrangement that they should meet at a party, but she was not introduced under her real name. He did not pay any attention to her then, or at later encounters. He loved her only in her roles on the stage. He did not even recognize the real person.

Many of us bow before Jesus as portrayed in the pages of the Bible; we bow before Him as represented in Holy Communion or in a statue. But when He passes near us in the person of a hungry man, when He suffers in a jail or in a hospital, we do not give Him reverence or take His side. Let us invite Jesus to dwell in our hearts and recognize Him in the shape of the needy who surround us! Let us also recognize His presence in our life and in the lives of others.

Mar 1
|
"The flesh is weak." (MTT 26:41)

It was in the times of Lenin and Stalin. Eight thousand Orthodox priests had been killed.

Father Mikhail was among the few who had not yet been arrested, but he had lost his faith. The loss came suddenly. He had just said during the liturgy, "Blessed be God," when he heard a voice whispering, "There is no God." He looked questioningly at the images of saints hanging on the wall. What did their friendship with God mean? Does such a mighty Friend allow His believers to be thrown to the wild beasts, burned at the stake, tortured? He tried to repress the thought. He repeated to himself the words of the psalm, "The fool hath said in said his heart, There is no God." It did not help.

After that moment, he continued to act as a priest out of duty, but duty he no longer believed. The sorrow around him had been too great. He had to restrain himself to keep from crying out to the peasants who filled the church, "Go home, poor people. There is no God. God would not have permitted this bloody chaos."

Drunk Communists arrested him on an Easter eve. Among them was the cantor of his church whom he had expelled because of immortal behavior. Now he too was a Bolshevik. The head of the gang told the priest, "We have decided to kill you. What have you to say?"

Life was worthless for Father Mikhail. He answered, "As you like." But he was given a chance. "If you renounce Christ and trample on a cross, you will be freed." The thought passed through his mind, "I don't believe. What does a cross mean to me? Let me save my life." But when he opened his mouth, he said, to his own astonishment, "I believe in one God."

It was Good Friday. In remembrance of the crown of thorns, they put his fur cap on his head, with the linen on the outside; they put a sack upon his shoulders as a royal garment, and the cantor knelt saying, "Hail, king of the Jews," and they all beat him. He prayed to the One in whom he did not believe any more, "If You exist, save me." With a loud voice, he repeated, "I believe in one God."

This made such an impression upon the drunk murderers that they freed him. He went home, prostrated himself to the earth in his prayer comer, and said with tears, "I believe."

When assailed by doubts, don't seek an intellectual solution. Take some burden upon yourself for Jesus' sake. Where reason fails, faith will conquer.

Mar 2
|
"He was wounded for our transgressions." (ISA 53:5)

Jesus took our sins upon Himself and suffered for them. Should I not do the same for my guilty fellow man?

An unmarried girl became pregnant. To save her lover from her father's wrath, she told him, "It is my pastor who did it." The father nursed his grudge against the pastor. When the child was born, he brought the baby on Sunday morning into the church, and in front of the congregation he threw it into the pastor's arms shouting"Take it, the fruit of your whoredom with my daughter!" Swearing and shouting insults, the father left the church. The astonished congregation expected a word of explanation from the pastor, but he only caressed the baby and said, "So you are mine? You will surely be my darling." It goes without saying that he lost all his following. Despised by men, he brought up the child in utter poverty.

After a few years, the girl was overcome by remorse and confessed the truth to her father. Stunned by the news, he rushed to the pastor and begged his forgiveness; then he told the truth to the entire church. The congregation waited again, expecting now that their former pastor would explain his strange behavior. But the pastor said only these words: "Do you wish to tell me he is not mine? He surely is my darling." Now he had a congregation bigger than ever before. He had not justified himself when accused unjustly; nor did he boast of his innocence when it was proven.

The Lord has said, "If any man will come after me, let him deny himself" (LUK 9:23). If one denies himself, everyone's self becomes his own; and he realizes that every man is co-responsible for everyone's sins. He never rejects any accusation as not applying to him, but is happy to take it upon himself to ease his brother's burden. This means to have the mind of Christ.

Mar 3
|
"[They] waxed valiant in fight." (HEB 34)

Listen to the story of a hero of the faith.

His name was Florea. He died in the prison of Gherla (Romania) He had been beaten until both arms and both legs were paralyzed because he refused to do slave labor on the Lord's Day. He could only move his neck. It is bad enough to be in such a situation in a nursing home or with one's family, but he was in a prison cell where fellow inmates had no water, no sheets-nothing with which to help him.

We had to spoon-feed him, but where did we get a spoon? Yet he was the most serene and joyful among us. His face shone. When we prisoners sometimes sat around his bed brooding about our sorrows, moaning that our outlook was bad, he would reply, "If the outlook is ad, try the uplook. St. Stephen, surrounded by men who threw stones at him, abandoned by the other members of the church who did not stay with him in his moment of trial, nevertheless looked up and saw Jesus standing at the right hand of the Father. This comforted his heart; it will comfort yours also. Look up!"

After my release from prison, I spoke to his son, aged nine, and told him the story of his father's faithfulness. I added, "I hope that you will become a good man like him." He replied, "Brother, I would like to become a sufferer for Christ as my father has been."

There is no law that obliges Christians to be dull, lukewarm, half-hearted. Christianity can be heroic. The right spelling of the word "love" is "s-a-c-r-i-f-i-c-e."

Mar 4
|
"[Jesus said,] This is my body which is given for you." (LUK 22:19)

When the pastor repeats the word of consecration at Holy Communion, "This is my body," which body does he mean?

Jesus has two natures in one body, a divine nature and a human nature. He also has two bodies: the glorified human body with which He ascended to heaven, and the church, which is His body too. At Communion we commemorate the body which suffered on Golgotha, but we remember also His mystical body, the church universal, which n every century has given martyrs whose blood was shed for the glory of God.

To the glorified body of Christ we can bring adoration. We adore His pierced heart which bled for us. For His mystical body, the church universal, we can do much. We can share the cross of the martyrs of today and alleviate their suffering.

At every communion remember both bodies.

Mar 5
|
"All sins shall be forgiven unto the sons of men, and blasphemies wherewith soever they shall blaspheme." (MRK 3:28)

Once a traveler was sitting in a railroad coach next to a young man who appeared to be depressed. Finally the latter revealed that he was a convict who had just gotten out of prison. He also admitted that his imprisonment had brought shame on his family and that they had neither visited him nor written much. He tried to convince himself that their negligence was only because they were too poor to travel, too uneducated to write. Despite his misgivings, he hoped they had forgiven him.

l o make it as easy as posslble tor them he had written suggesting that if his family had forgiven him they should put up a white ribbon in the big apple tree near the tracks as a signal. If they didn't want him back they were to do nothing; he would understand, stay on the train, and head West.

As the train neared his hometown, the suspense became so great he couldn't bear to look out the window. The older man changed places with him and said he would watch for the apple tree. In a few minutes he put his hand on the young convict's arm. "There it is," he whispered, his voice suddenly unsteady. "It's all right. The whole tree is white with ribbons."

The Hebrews don't even have a singular word for God's compassion. It is rahamim-compassions. Ever,v Hebrew word with the "m" ending is plural. Whatever you have done, there is enough forgiveness in Jesus' blood.

Mar 6
|
"The multitude being very great, and having nothing to eat.

... They did eat, and were filled." (MRK 8:1,8)

About fifty million people die a year, more than a third of them as the result of malnutrition or starvation.

Remember every morning when you awake that you awake in a hungry world. To use food recklessly and wastefully is a grave sin. When grain is fed to livestock to turn it into meat, three quarters of the food value is lost. Americans consume nearly a ton of grain annually per person, whereas an Asian consumes only a fifth as much. If you give up your meat consumption three times a week, you allow agricultural products that now feed livestock to be diverted to the poor and hungry.

The food situation will grow worse. Many Indian children are given the name Dashkal, which means hunger. It is easier to multiply men than the means of existence. Morocco, Kenya, Iraq, and India, for example, will double their population in twenty-five years. This trend virtually guarantees utter catastrophe.

The fact that I cannot solve the global problem does not free me from the responsibility of doing the little I can, through some bona fide institution, to help at least one hungry child survive.

Jesus had been poor as a child. When He saw hungry multitudes He did not dismiss them or turn His back on them. He gave them bread and fish. Do the same. Share what you have with those in need.

Mar 7
|
"They found a man of Cyrene, Simon by name. him they compelled to bear his cross." (MTT 27:32)

You could put into Africa the entire territory of the United States, all of Europe, China, India, and Japan and still have much space left over. This is how large Africa is. So large also must be every Christian's concern for Africa.

In order that this continent might belong to Christ, St. Perpetua and her husband were willing to be hacked to pieces in the year A.D. 201, on this day, March 7. They had refused to burn some incense before the statue of Caesar. That Africa might belong to Christ, the great missionary Livingstone died on his knees at his bedside in Chitambo, in what is today Tanzania. The French missionary Francois Coillard died in Bulawayo (Rhodesia). In one of his last letters he wrote, "The old tent is wearing out, but my heart is still young. My heart belongs to Africa. There is work waiting for me, and there my grave shall be. My great desire is not to live a day longer than I can work."

Africa was a piece of hell on earth when Robert Laws went there along with five other missionaries. The natives were killing each other indiscriminately in tribal wars. Livingstone had cried, "Blood, blood, blood everywhere!" Dr. Laws and his companions worked six years before winning the first convert, but not before four of the missionaries had died from fever.

Dan Crawford, a Scotsman, was the first missionary who decided that "we must think and speak black" in order to win the blacks. He became one of them, and as such he was subject to the cruel King Mushidi of Katanga. He had five hundred wives, was growing rich and fat on the sale of slaves, rubber, and ivory, and each day was putting to death as many human victims as he liked.

Almost all African countries are dictatorships even now. Islam and heathenism, as well as modern secularism, prevail. Communism has taken over many countries.

Jesus, while carrying the cross, was helped by an African. Help Africa come to Christ.

Mar 8
|
"[David] feigned himself mad." (1SM 21:13)

Cardinal Trochta of Czechoslovakia, when he was a priest, was a prisoner of the Nazis. During a mass execution, he was only wounded. He pretended to be dead, was carried away with the corpses, and managed in this way to escape. Thus Trochta deceived the Nazis. A simulated death is the enacting of a lie.

According to strong moralists, he should have been obedient to the authorities who had decided to kill innocents. He should have cried out, "I am not dead yet. Please, another bullet."

Every righteous rule pushed to an extreme becomes ridiculous. We surely have the duty to tell the truth. We as surely have the duty to defend ourselves against murderers; we have to defend our families, our church, and our nation.

The supreme Christian rule is neither love, nor sternness, nor truth, nor wisdom, nor seeking of pleasure, nor asceticism, nor generosity, nor economy, nor self-sacrifice, nor self-defense. It is, in the words of St. Anthony the Great, "to have in all things the right measure."

Our conscience illuminated by the Holy Spirit as we search the Scriptures will show us in every circumstance the right way.

Mar 9
|
"Behold, from henceforth all generations shall call me blessed." (LUK 1: 48)

The renowned Jewish novelist Sholem Asch, who had become a Christian, wrote, "The tread of your feet, Mary, is dear to me as the beat of my heart, and the air I breathe in your presence purifies my being, for you, Mary, are holy and lend sanctity to all that come near."

As often as we look to Jesus crucified, we see His mother watching :he body of her son convulsing with pain. She had tended that same body when He was a babe. She had bathed and fed Him. How often it had been her clelight to kiss Him. Now she gazed at the red welts where the soldiers' whips had struck. She heard the singing leather of the whip snap loud against His skin, which she, stricken by awe, had 3carcely dared to touch.

What should we admire most in her who was so highly favored of God?

I will extol her virginity. She, the virgin who had known no man 3he it was who gave birth to the highest being-the God-man.

Mar 10
|
"Forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors." (MTT 6:12)

During World War II, Simon Wiesenthal, the renowned Jewish hunter of war criminals, wrote that, while doing slave labor in a concentration camp in Lvov (Ukraine), he was called by a nurse to the deathbed of a Nazi officer. This officer told him that his mother was a Christian who had been much grieved when he joined Hitler's youth and afterward his army. He was in a unit which occupied the Soviet town of Dnepropetrovsk. There, two hundred Jews, among them women, children, and babes, were locked in a small house, into which Karl's unit tossed grenades. The house burned. Some Jews, with children in their arms, tried to jump through the window, but Karl shot them. A few days later, in a battle, Karl's unit was ordered to attack. In this battle he was completely blinded and badly injured. The last thing he remembered to have seen was a Jew in flames with a burning child in his arms coming toward him. Now he waited for death, tortured constantly by the vision of the martyred Jewish women and children. Karl wished to be absolved by a Jew. However, Wiesenthal did not pronounce the longed-for word of forgiveness.

We can sympathize with this man who lost almost his entire family because of the cruelty of the Nazis. Criminals have to be defeated and punished. But the man Wiesenthal had before him no longer represented danger. He was suffering the pangs of death. Here a word of forgiveness should have been spoken. But one has to realize first his own sinfulness in the light of Christ's forgiveness. Only then will he be able to absolve others.

Mar 11
|
"Judge not." (MTT 7:1)

The Lord Jesus said to Peter, "I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven" (MTT 16:19). Every child of God can open the kingdom to anyone, even to the worst of men, by proclaiming to him Christ's forgiveness. But the same Jesus says, "I ... have the keys of hell" (REV 1:18). These He gave to no one. He reserved them for Himself. Otherwise some of us would have thrown ourselves into hell through our foolishness, and we would have doomed to hell those who don't believe like us. A mother gives her child a toy, not a knife with which to cut himself. Therefore, Peter got the keys of heaven, but not of hell.

Luther said about Erasmus, his philosophical adversary, "He died without light, without a cross, and without God," which means he doomed him to hell. Erasmus' last words were, "Beloved God."

Only one key has been entrusted to you. Open the gates of heaven to others. Don't condemn anyone. Don't damn yourself either.

Mar 12
|
"Jesus saith, I am ... the life." (JHN 14:6)

Why did God give us His Word? Why not a picture instead? The atom is not picturable. Neitheris realiq; even less so is God. A range of fragrances ortastes could also not have instlucted us as does His Word.

But is the word a perfect means of communication? Some words have many meanings. In Hebrew barach means both "blessing" and "curse"; kedeshah, "prostitute" and "saint"; hesed, "grace" and "abomination." In Greek afes means "to forgive" and "to leave." Bible verses can be interpreted variously. We need assurance. Our eternal life depends upon knowing clearly the will of God.

A pastor told a Jewish boy of twelve, "If Jesus is really the Messiah sent by God and you don't believe in Him, you will be lost eternally." The boy answered, "If Jesus is really the blasphemer our court declared Him to be, you as a preacher who clings to Him, will pass your eternity in hell." There can be no joking in religion. If Christ has not risen and we have given up so many earthly pleasures hoping for the resurrection, "we are of all men most miserable" (1CO 15:19). If there is a resurrection and we have spent our life in vain pleasures, we are fools.

Don't confine yourself only to the words of the Bible but accept the total revelation of God. He reveals Himself through all His actions. The Hebrews through whom the Word of God was given have no word for "word." They use for it the expression davar, which means "thing, something real." The whole of outward and inward reality is God's sure revelation-the entire happening at Golgotha, your whole life with its sins and repentance, its falls and recoveries, its sorrows and joys. Believe in life, His life. Accept Him in your life. Then you will have the assurance of ~eternal~ life.

Mar 13
|
"The scripture cannot be broken." (JHN 10:35)

A Zionist named Shifrin was jailed in Russia. While in prison he met the Baptist Solodiankin, aged seventy-two. "The goodness and transparent purity of that man made a deep impression. Even the soldiers who guarded us became better when he was there." He was almost blind. His glasses had been broken by the interrogator. " Everything he earned as a slave laborer he used like this: half for his sick daughter and 25% for his church. From the rest (7.8 rubles) he bought for himself a little sugar and bread; the rest he gave to the sick prisoners in the camp."

Shifrin told him that he had a Bible and was ready to read it to him In the evening, Solodiankin came. He had changed his shirt and combed himself with great care. L'To read the eternal book is a feast." The Jew read to the Christian from Isaiah. At a certain moment, he was interrupted: "You made a mistake in reading."

It was true. "But do you know the text by heart?"

"Of course."

"Then why should I read it to you?"

"Because it is a joy for me to hear the Scriptures. One gets new ideas."

We recognize the value of a thing only when we don't have it. Let us learn from those who are deprived the real value of the Scriptures, and let us search them diligently.

Mar 14
|
"... vain conversation received by tradition from your fathers." (1PE 1: 18)

We don't belong to a church because of the plausibility of its tenets. We measure their plausibility by the conviction already formed of its veracity.

The majority of mankind adhere to the religion of their parents. If a Catholic man is married to a Catholic woman, the child born of this union will hear from the beginning things that will incline him toward Catholicism. As an adult he will tend to aceept all its arguments, just as someone born of Jewish or Baptist parents will have a bias toward these beliefs.

It is not otherwise with conversions. When an individual passes through a crisis or has his early beliefs shattered, a devotee of some other religion may show him what he conceives to be the way to God. Accepting the comfort, the new sense of life needed at that moment, the individual finds it easy to swallow uncritically a multitude of other dogmas, beliefs, or rituals held by the person who brought him to faith.

It is difficult to find the truth. Start by examining and questioning ancestral religion, the process by which hundreds of millions of men are made to call themselves Christians, Hindus, Moslems, or Jews.

Real religion begins with a readiness to acknowledge that all your beliefs, including the most cherished, may be wrong, that your own religion may be a variety of prejudice just as you conceive others to be. None but the finest spirits ever rose above a hazy group consciousness.

Pass with a broom through your heart, sweeping away everything that does not come from a personal experience with God. That is what I did. In the emptied heart–the heart of the man who denies not only his belief, but himself, his own person–God, the source and aim of all religion, shines.

Acknowledge that you have acquired plejudices of both birth and education. Then "prove all things" by the Word of God and "hold fast that which is good" (1TH 5:21).

Mar 15
|
"[God said to Abraham] Take now thy son, thine only son Isaac ... and offer him [on mount Moriah] for a burnt offering." (GEN 22:2)

A girl named Mary tells the story of the court trial in the Soviet Union in which her mother was deprived of parental rights. They shouted at her, "You are a mother. Deny God! What did He give you? Whom do you love more, your own children or your idol? How can you?" And her mother sat with her scarf covering her eyes, repeating, "God sees everything. He will reward accordingly." When the children, including Mary, cried to her, "Mother, do not leave us," she did not even turn to them.

It is a scene exactly like those we read about in the history of the early martyrs who went into the circus arena to be devoured by wild beasts. They refused to listen to the pleading of their loved ones when asked to recant and save their lives for their children's sake.

With God, it was the mystery of preferring the death of His Son to permitting the eternal death of sinners; with saints, the mystery of preferring to lose their children rather than deny God. Such is our God; so are we. We can do nothing but sing His praise whatever the consequences.

Where choices are to be made, don't hesitate. Sacrifice even what or whom you love most for God. He sacrificed all for you.

Mar 16

|

"If ye have faith as a grain of mustard seed, re shall say unto this mountain, Remove hence to yonder place; and it shall remove." (MTT 17:20)

I tried to move mountains and did not succeed. Nor do I know any child of God able to perform such a deed.

I asked the Lord how it was that His words did not correspond to reality. A disciple of Christ should not deliver monologues in prayer, but should expect to receive answers to his questions. I received an answer to mine:

"You, my beloved, cannot move mountains because your faith is not the size of a grain. You have bushels full of faith. Nobody uses a one-thousand-ton hammer, such as those employed by heavy industry, to crack open a nut. Such a hammer can only perform great works. By the same token, you are called to do greater things than amuse yourself by moving mountains. You can move God. Remember how God decided to destroy the Jewish people after they had worshiped a golden calf, and Moses through his prayer made God change His mind? To produce changes in heavenly decrees is much more important than moving mountains."

Since then, I have stopped trying to move mountains. We are seated with Christ in heavenly places. We participate in things happening there. And when in our ealthly life mountains hinder us, we don't need to command them to move. We can follow the example of Christ, about whom His bride says, "My beloved ... cometh leaping upon the mountains, skipping upon the hills" (SOS 2:8).

Don't try to remove mountains of difficulty in your own life. Jump over them. Do your Christian duty in spite of them.

Mar 17

|
"Do good to them that hate you." (MTT 5:44)

The following episode took place in a prison cell in 8 Communist country:

One day the guards pushed a new prisoner into a cell where only Christians were detained. He was shorn, dirty, and thin. First no one recognized him. But after a few minutes one exclaimed, "This is Captain X." He was one of the worst torturers of Christians. He had arrested and beaten many of those with whom he now shared the prison cell. They surrounded him and asked how he came to be in prison. With tears rolling down his cheek, he told his story.

A couple of months before, while he was sitting in his office, a boy of twelve entered, holding in his hand a flower for the captain's wife, The boy told him, "Captain, you are the one who put my father and mother in prison. Today is my mother's birthday. I always buy her a nower on this day. Because of you I have no mother to gladden today, b ut she is a Christian and taught me to love my enemies and reward evil with good. So I thought I would bring a flower to the mother of your children. Please, take it to your wife and tell her about my love and about the love of Christ."

It was too much even for a Communist captain. He also is a creature of God, enlightened with "the true Light, which lighteth every man that cometh into the world" (JHN 1:9). He embraced the child. He could not torture any more, nor could he retain his position. He now considered it a privilege to sit in prison with those he had himself imprisoned.

Forgiving love is the key to a victorious Christian life.

Mar 18

|
"God hath chosen the weak things of the world." (1CO 1:27)

Nelson achieved all his triumphs by overcoming great handicaps.

Frail and weak, he fell victim to yellow fever in India. He contracted some other unidentified sickness in the West Indies. He, a navy commander, suffered all his life from seasickness. He lost an eye in Corsica. Later his right hand was amputated. In another fight he was heavily wounded in the chest.

But he had learned to overcome pain. And it was he who defeated the naval forces of France and Spain at Trafalgar.

The hero Nelson also had a weak point. He became the subject of a huge scandal in London and Naples through his involvement with Lady Hamilton, another man's wife. It is not the handicaps that are apt to wreck a man's life, but rather his weaknesses of character. "He that ruleth his spirit [is better] than he that taketh a city" (PRO 16:32).

As a human being, Jesus entered life with many handicaps. His birth was rumored to have been irregular. He belonged to a poor family in an oppressed nation. He never had a rabbinical education. But he showed that by faith one can conquer obstacles and be the right kind of person. Jesus is the Son of God. Those who believe in Him are children of God. He said, "Everything is possible to the one who believes."

Don't worry about your physical handicaps or any other kind of handicap. They can be the best stimulants to great achievement.

Find out your specific weakness, and through Christ strengthen the wall of the fortress that is most exposed to the enemy.

Mar 19
|
"Thou hast given him power over all flesh, that he should give eternal life." (JHN 17:2)

Giacomo Puccini was a great success in life. His operas Manon Lescaut and Madame Butterfly made him world-renowned. He had money and fame. Women were after him. It seemed that he had everything needed to make him a happy man. He was anything but happy.

He wrote when he was at the peak of glory, "Success? What is it worth, if in any case old age comes and death. I would like to create new operas, write more musical pieces, but alas, I have no more power."

At the age of eighty-two Mao Tse-tung received the president of Western Germany and told him about his grandiose plans for Red China. The president answered that with persistence he might achieve them, quoting the proverb, "Persistent rivulets of waters pierce the stone," to which Mao replied, "Yes, but I don't have enough water any more."

Kiro-, one of the top leaders of Russian Bolshevism, was killed by Stalin. He had finished his last speech with the words, "I would like to live, to live and to live."

If everything ends with death, even the grandest life is like a banquet given to someone sentenced to death. You enjoy a meal and then you are hanged.

Do you wish lasting achievements and endless energy to create valuable things? Then your first priority must be to assure yourself of life eternal. Jesus said, "Whosoever liveth and believeth in me shall never die" (JHN 11:26).

Mar 20
|
"What they know naturally, as brute beasts, in those things they corrupt themselves." (JUD 10)

It is out of the question that man should have descended from a monkey. Monkeys are faithful to their wives; they don't perform a abortions. Monkeys have no bombs with which to exterminate their own species. Crime, alcoholism, drug addiction, prostitution are unknown among them. They neither make nor view immoral movies.

The monkey, creature of God which has remained as God made it, never claims mankind for progeny. The Darwinist theory is an insult to the ape. No ape ever conceived a book as unsubstantiated as The Origin of Species.

Man has a much higher provenance. He was created by God in His image. The higher the first position, the more catastrophic the fall. Man shows in his intelligence traces of his first state, but too often he bears greater resemblance to the wolf, the fox, the snake, the pig. When man becomes beast, he becomes the beastliest beast. And his descent is all due to the sin of the first human parents, perpetuated and aggravated by their progeny.

It is true that "the ox knoweth his owner, and the ass his master's crib: but lsrael doth not know" (ISA 1:3). What man needs is not to be told he is a relative of the beast. The animal kingdom is distinctly separate from humanity. It has suffered degradation because of the Fall but is closer to its original state than mankind. The urgent need of man is to return to his primary privilege, to regain the innocence Adam lost.

Jesus, through His shed blood, washes us from all sins in this world and will restore us to our forfeited state in the world to come, when "this corruptible shall have put on incorruption" (1CO 15:54)

Mar 21
|
"All things work together for good to them that love God." (ROM 8:28)

The story is told of a lone survivor of a shipwreck who was thrown upon an uninhabited island. After awhile he managed to build for himself a crude hut in which he placed the "little all" that he had saved from the sinking ship. He prayed to God for deliverance and anxiously scanned the horizon each day to hail any ship that might be passing that way.

One day, upon returning from a hunt for food, he was horrified to find his hut in flames! All that he had salvaged was now going up in smoke! The worst had happened, so it appeared. But what at first seemed so great a tragedy was, in reality, for the best, though to the man's limited vision it seemed a devastating loss.

In God's infinite wisdom, his loss was actually an answer to his most eamest prayer. The same day a ship arrived. "We saw your smoke signal," the captain said.

Can we not take our seeming calamities and look for God's best in them?

Even the calamity death worked for the glory of God in the case of Lazarus. And John the beloved was given his great visions of the future of the world and of heaven itself while in exile on the Isle of Patmos.

Mar 22
|
"When [David] had need, and was an hungred ... and they that were with him ... he went into the house of God ... and did eat the shewbread, which is not lawful to eat but for the priests." (MRK 2:25,26)

Powerful needs and strong urges sometimes put a human being in a position that obliges him to break the normal rules set up by God, or is culture. Never rationalize as to what you should do in those circumstances. Be aware of the law; be aware of your special condition. and your psychological complexes, which are as real as metal. Regret the state of fallen man who sometimes cannot even satisfy a legitimate hunger without trespassing against a rule. Say like the apostle, "It is no more I that do [the unlawful thing], but sin that dwelleth in me" (ROM 7:17). Separate your"I" decidedly from the forbidden bread that hunger obliges you to eat.

The much-persecuted Russian Orthodox priest Dudko tells about a Soviet girl who had come to confess. She said, "I believe, but they force me to wear the red neckscarf which is the badge of the pioneers, the atheistic Communist children's organization. I am powerless." If she refused, she would be beaten and expelled from school, and her parents might go to prison. So she sprinkled the red neckscarf with holy water, over which special prayers are said by the priest and which is used in Orthodox rituals. "I put the neckscarf on," she confessed, "only after having sprinkled it."

In the free world, we also are compelled at times to do things which normally should not be done. But then face the facts as they are; don't try to find excuses, but do them in Christ's name. You are only human. And everything is sanctified by prayer (1TM 4:5). "Happy is he that condemneth not himself in that thing which he alloweth" (ROM 14:22).

Mar 23
|
"My house is the house of prayer: but ye have made it a den of thieves." (LUK 19:46)

Many Christians are dissatisfied with their churches. This is to be expected in view of the work of self-demolition that faithless bishops and pastors have done in the church. Would Jesus call the modern churches "dens of thieves"? This pronouncement on the part of Jesus was a broad generalization in His time as well.

How many "thieves" were in the house of prayer? Some of the top leaders of the temple were dishonest, and they brought the temple into ill-repute. But the rank-and-file priest and worshiper could have been very devout. Zacharias, a priest, and his wife Elisabeth, parents of John the Baptist, "were both righteous before God" (LUK 1:5,6). They were righteous in a den of thieves. "[Simeon] came by the Spirit into the temple" (into the den of thieves). "The same man was just and devout ... and the Holy Ghost was upon him" (LUK 2:27,25). So the Holy Spirit works in temples even when they have become dens of thieves.

A publican stood in the temple, in the den of thieves, and found there no encouragement to continue in his sinful life. On the contrary, he "smote upon his breast, saying, God be merciful to me a sinner ... This man went down to his house justified" (LUK 18:13,14). So a man can find salvation even in a temple which has deteriorated to the point of becoming a den of thieves.

The Jewish temple was not a dead or apostate church. It was a den of thieves which the Messiah had not forsaken, in which He worshiped, in which the rituals prescribed by God were fulfilled, in which the law was chanted, and in which there were many saints.

Look for the saints in your church, too. Don't forsake a church lightly or casually. Better still, be a saint.

Mar 24

"The King [shall] say unto them on the right hand, Come then ... shall he say also unto them on the left hand, Depart from me." (MTT 25:34,41)

The existence of an objectively real right and left, with some men separated for eternal life on the right while their fellow men are set apart on the left for everlasting destruction, once was considered only a metaphor of speech. But that is not so. It is a fact.

Certain molecules exist in two forms, one being the mirror image of the other, which means they are related like a left hand and a right hand. If I hold my left hand to a mirror, what I appear to see in the mirror is a right hand. So it is with these molecules called isomers. Proteins are exclusively composed of L- (left-handed) amino acids. This is regarded as a unique characteristic of life-that is, life as we know it, in a fallen creation. The whole purpose of life is to pass from the left, the sinful state to which we belong by nature, to the right, the place of grace. D- amino acids (those of the right hand) are never found in proteins, but in antibiotics which save endangered life.

There exists a right and a left not only in living matter. In 1957, the particle physicists discovered a basic asymmetry in the matter out of which our part of the universe is composed. Electrons emitted during the beta decay of radioactive nuclei such as cobalt 60 are predominantly left-handed. Their particle spin is coupled to their momentum like a left-handed screw. The positron is right-handed.
Nature makes an absolute distinction between right and left, just as there is an absolute distinction between the sons of light and those of darkness. Through repentance the latter can change to the former during their short life span on earth. Those remaining on the left will go to the lake of fire. Time is running out. Hurry!

Mar 25
|
"There was a certain beggar named Lazarus, which was laid at the [rich man's] gate." (LUK 16:20)

Lazarus begged without ever protesting against social injustice. Today this is not the case. The poor have become vocal. No sermon telling them to hold their peace would be effective. In her great, inspired "Magnificat," the Virgin MaIy foretold a time when the hungry would be filled with good things and the rich would be sent away empty (LUK 1:53). We live in this time of total world revolution.
Marie Antoinette, on hearing that the Parisian mob was rioting because it had no bread, suggested, "Let them eat cake." The French monarchy, so completely out of touch with popular feeling, was thus doomed. By the same token, Czar Nicholas II never read Lenin.
The world's richest one billion people have an average income of $3,200 a year. The world's poorest one billion have an income of $120 a year. Many starve in shanty towns. Their days are lived in poverty and illiteracy. Sixty percent of mankind cannot read.
Nevertheless in the eyes of God people are most precious. The Lord tells us to "Sell that ye have, and give alms" (LUK 12:33). Don't give simply castoffs, but give what is needed. Hungry people are more important than houses, cars, chocolates, or operas.
In thirty years the world population will have doubled, along with its demands and hopes. Be understanding and generous about anticipating their material and spiritual needs. Otherwise you may find yourself among the rich who will be sent away empty.

Mar 26
|
"[The Pharisees said about Jesus,] This man is a sinner."

(JHN 9:24)

These Pharisees had never met Jesus personally. They had drawn rash conclusions about who He was from hearsay regarding a single event. Jesus warned against attitudes rashly taken. "[Those] who, when they have heard the word, immediately receive it with gladness ... have no root in themselves, and so endure but for a time" (MRK 4:16,17). Don't accept Jesus hurriedly under the impulse of an urgent evangelistic appeal. Don't reject Him hastily without having listened attentively to the arguments for His case.

Geologists, men of science, were asked to look at this picture for seven seconds:

[small illustration printed here in the book]

It contains a fault with concave cleavage lines at the synform and convex cleavage lines at the antiform. No more than 20 per cent of those tested, including experienced geologists, reproduced it. This drawing, with both sets of cleavages convex, was a common response.

[small illustration printed here in the book]

No quick look at a man oran event can give you the truth. Mary sat an entire evening at Jesus' feet, listened to His words attentively, and pondered them. So she became a faithful disciple. Thomas asked for proofs of Jesus' resurrection, received them, and later became a successful missionary to India.

I don't ask you to come to Jesus immediately if you lack sufficient motivation. Jesus said that you should rather"search the Scriptures" (JHN 5:39), an operation which takes quite a while. But do not reject Jesus without checking His claims carefully. Christians do not ask anyone to believe blindly. Only thorough inquiry and carefu decision produce good Christians.

Mar 27
|
"The Son of man came ... to give his life a ransom...."
(MTT 20:28)

Let us pray for China. Every fourth man in the world today is a Chinese. On the mainland of China Christianity is completely forbidden, but God's Spirit has strange ways of penetrating dark places.

In a hut in a commune, a family gathered around the grandfather who entertained them with stories from the rich Chinese folklore. This time it was the story of Tso-Po-Tao, the man who had been a symbol of goodness. He had traveled once with his friend, Yang-Chiao-Ai. They had to reach Tsu Yuan Wang, but after a few days' journey, they found the snow to be too deep and their food and clothing insufficient. Both could not survive. Tso-Po-Tao urged, "I am a servant. Take the garments of us both and all the food and reach your goal. Why should we both die?" Yang was reluctant to accept this offer, but Tso had already removed his clothes and laid down on the snow with hands outstretched as though wishing to embrace all mankind with his love. In a few minutes he was frozen to death. Then Yang dressed himself in his garments and had food enough to reach the destination. He always remembered with gratitude what Tso had done for him.

A child asked, "Is this a real story or a story-story? Do such good men like Tso exist? I never met that kind of man. Most around us are brutal."

The grandfather replied, "I guess you will not meet many Tsos. I heard once a white man saying that something just like this had happened long ago in a country far away. A man gave His life meekly like a lamb to save many others. The white man said this is why our Chinese character for 'righteousness' is the 'I' covered by "a lamb." We have been saved by this good being, but I am illiterate and did not understand much of his talk. In any case, child, you would do well to take Tso as an example for life."

"God, who at sundry times and in divers manners spake in time past unto the fathers" (HEB 1:1).

Mar 28
|
"Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life." (REV 2:10)

C. T. Studd saw a strangely worded notice in Liverpool in 1908 It caught his attention and his sense of humor: "Cannibals want missionaries." He entered the meeting hall where Karl Kumm told the story of his walking through Africa and of all the tribes who had never heard the story of Jesus Christ. Explorers had been to those regions, even though they knew they were inhabited by cannibals. Big-game hunters, Moslem missionaries, traders of weapons and liquor, European officials, and scientists had risked their lives, but no Christian had ever gone there to tell of Jesus.

Studd asked himself why Christians did not go. God replied, "Why don't you go?" Studd already had long terms of missionary work in China and India behind him. He was sick. He went, notwithstanding, and won cannibals for Christ.

There are still individuals, tribes, and countries that take pleasure in torturing and murdering Christians. Today you can give your life among stone-age peoples in Latin America, in the Philippines, in New Guinea-Papua. Moslem fanatics are always ready to kill Christians. They have killed great numbers in this century in Turkey and Lebanon. Communists are ready to jail anyone who dares to bring Bibles into Communist countries. There are still backward and unreached tribes in Africa. Go there even if you are old and sick. If you cannot go, help with your prayers, your home work, and your contributions to those who do go.

Let us all pray for the Christians who do missionary work in places of great danger, at the risk of their own lives.

Mar 29
|
"They were stoned, they were sawn asunder." (HEB 11:37

It was in 1964. Kingese, the mad ruler of Stanleyville, and other Sambi leaders had vowed to end religious teaching in their country and wipe the name of God from the Congo.

In one hamlet every man who wore trousers instead of a loincloth was killed. In Kindu, the rebels burned so many bodies before the monument of Lumumba that the sidewalk cracked under the constant heat. At Paulis, observers placed the toll at four thousand. Some died by dismemberment, some by being forced to drink gasoline and then having fire touched to their bodies.

Twenty members of the Unevangelized Field Mission and nine from other societies died as martyrs. Seventy among the Catholic missions lost their lives in this world. They all died for Christ. They also died because of the foolishness of granting independence to peoples who were still at an infantile stage.

The missionaries had the consolation of knowing that many Congolese stood firm in their commitment to Christ in spite of the terror.

The corns of wheat had fallen into the ground and died. Their example brought forth a harvest of new souls for Christ. Not everyone of us is called upon to be a martyr, but everyone has to be a co-martyr. We should love Christ whole-heartedly as they did and vicariously share their sorrows, trials, and triumphs in prayer. Let us intercede regularly for Africa.

Mar 30
|
"Preach the gospel to every creature." (MRK 16:15)

Nate Saint, one of the five missionaries martyred in the jungles Ecuador in 1956, before leaving Quito had delivered a premonitory sermon on the subject of expendability. He said: "During the last war we were taught that, in order to obtain our objective, we had to be willing to be expendable, and many lives were spent paying the price of our redemption from the bonds of political slavery.... We know that there is only one answer wben our country demands that we share in the price of freedom - yet when the Lord Jesus asks us to pay the price for world evangelization, we often answer without a word. We cannot go We say it costs too much.... Missionaries constantly face expendability."

Then he was sent to the Auca Indians. The missionaries knew them to be savages, so they used "Jacob's tactics." They dropped gifts while flying over their territories. They received gifts in return. On the last flight, the natives put a beautiful parrot in the bag let down from the plane with a rope.

Then five missionaries landed among the Aucas. Saint was one of them. First they had a happy encounter. The next day they were killed Betty Elliot, one of the wives of the martyred, wrote that same evening, "Nothing was more burning in Jim's heart than that Christ should be named among the Aucas."

Choose one nation, one tribe, one social category to the service of which, for Christ, you would dedicate your heart. You might not be called to go as a missionary to them, but you can be a co-missionary through your prayers, spreading the news about the mission, and helping financially from your earnings.

Mar 31
|
"They loved not their lives unto the death." (REV 12:11)

Did you ever think about the immortal souls of Somalia, a the northwest tip of Africa? In Somalia's sands there is a simple gravestone with the inscription "Merlin R. Grove, Feb. 9, 1929 - July 16, 1962. Jesus said, ... 'No man cometh unto the Father but by me' (JHN 14:6)."

Grove was a Mennonite missionary. A Moslem priest, aroused to anger against him, stabbed him twelve times. Grove's wife Dorothy heard something happening, and when she rushed outdoors, her husband was already dying. The murdererturned on herand stabbed her in the abdomen.

Dorothy had questioned before if she were in the right place as a missionary, not feeling sure that she could love Somalians, whom she considered lazy, fierce, prone to kill. Now that she lay bleeding on the floor, the love of Calvary for Somalians filled her heart. She recovered, She no longer doubted her calling.

The quickest way to have the assurance of salvation is to take upon yourself some suffering for the fact that you are saved. The quickest way to be sure about a certain calling is to take upon yourself a specific cross connected with this calling. You have chosen the right wife or husband or boy friend if you can bear some heavy burden for him or her.

Today Somalia is Communist. Two brands of fanaticism, Moslemism and Marxism, have combined. Is there anyone willing to do his best that Somalians might be saved?

Apr 1
|
"The love of money is the root of all evil." (1TM 6:10)

The Reformation and the irreparable split in Christianity might never have happened if it were not for some of the clergy's love of money and the many personal sins of those involved on all sides. I still wonder if the reformation of the church was necessary.

The church is a continuation of the incarnation of Christ. Christ, its head, sees to it that it should function well, so the church cannot die, Even the gates of hell cannot prevail against it.

However, there exist human institutions called churches, full of men and women who have not been born again. And they do not need to be reformed, but transformed. New birth can change every man into a child of God.

On the human level, scandalous things have happened through the years. Indulgences, and with them the eternal destinies of souls, were offered for sale. The bastard children of King James of Scotland were appointed to some of the wealthiest abbacies in the kingdom while they were still infants. Acts like these produce public revulsion. Certainly they made it easy for a Henry VIII, angry with the Pope because he could not get a divorce from his wife, to take his nation away from Rome. Both sides later made it a crime punishable by death not to agree with the Vatican, guilty of greed, or with the king, guilty of lust.
Similar things happened in other countries.

We must take a look at our clergy and denominational leaders today. Are their priorities in life obvious? Use your dedicated Christian influence to keep them holy in thought and action. Transform your church after the pattern given by Christ, but above all be sure to belong not only to a human institution.

Through new birth become a member of the "glorious church, not having spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing" (EPH 5:27).

Apr 2
|
"God hath ... given him a name which is above every name." (PHP 2:9)

Some men are given names that foreshadow their destiny. Vladimir, in Russian, means "the ruler of the world." Russian history has known two influential men who bore this name. In A.D. 998 Prince Vladimir of Kiev became a Christian. Having to choose between Roman Catholicism and Eastern Orthodoxy, he sent envoys to Europe to find out which of the two religions would be more suitable. These emissaries were impressed with the beautiful music of the Orthodox service and inclined the prince to embrace this form of Christianity. As a result, he ordered all his subjects to be baptized.

About nine hundred years later another Vladimir was born in Russia. At the age of sixteen he became an atheist, all because of a stupid incident. A sin of a Christian can make a God-hater out of a man who was previously a worshiper. Like many young men, Vladimir Lenin had neglected going to church for some time. The lad overheard his father asking a priest what he should do about it. The priest answered, "Beat him and beat him." Indignant, Lenin tore the cross from his neck, resolving never to have anything more to do with religion. He hated it now. As a result of the revolution he fomented, millions of Christians have been killed. Perhaps this never would have happened if the priest had given a wiser and more loving answer.

It is sobering to realize that one word of ours can elevate a soul. One wrong word can destroy it.

Vladimir the prince could not make all his people disciples of Christ. Lenin could not make all the people atheists. In any case, neither of them was a Vladimir – a ruler over the world. Only one is such a ruler – Jesus Christ. He will reign, and before Him every knee will bow.

Apr 3
|
"Present your bodies a living sacrifice." (ROM 12:1)

During the Vietnam war, Buddhist priests who saw their religion endangered by the politics of the Catholic Thieu set fire to themselves. Two monks would pour gasoline on a priest, and then he would commit ritual suicide while thousands watched, kneeling. The Czech Christian Jan Pollach and the East German evangelical pastor Bruescwitz self-immolated themselves as a protest against Communist injustice.

Christians might learn something from this. Suicide in the usual sense of the word is normally forbidden by our religion, but we all have to give ourselves as a living sacrifice to the only cause that really counts.

Jesus' death could be called a sophisticated suicide. He said, "I lay down my life ... No man taketh it from me, but I lay it down of myself" (JHN 10:17,18). He seemed to do His utmost to provoke His enemies to utter anger. He took issue with all the impulses by which men live. Don't even look at a woman with lust! Let your speech be yes, yes, or no, no, which makes all advertising and all promotion impossible! Don't lie even when lying could save your life! Christ did some of His miracles on the Sabbath, even though He knew that this would irritate His enemies. He wished to be crucified, because He knew His death was the only means of salvation for mankind.

Christians also go against the standards of this world, because they too wish to be sacrificed through bearing their cross daily.

"I am crucified with Christ; nevertheless I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me" (GAL 2:20).

Apr 4
|
"[Jesus said:] He that is faithful in that which is least faithful also in much." (LUK 16:10)

We deceive ourselves if we believe that payment of the tithe discharges our financial obligation to God. Imprisoned Christians under persecution, who received one slice of bread a week plus soup containing dirty potato peels, would tithe. Every tenth week they would give their piece of bread to someone who was sick or weaker than they. But this was not all. They knew that man's responsibility encompasses 100 percent of what he has. Many Christians gave their bread every third or every fifth week. Some never ate bread, but gave it always, being content themselves with the dirty soup.

Not simply 10 percent, but all our money belongs to the Lord. It is not true that after giving 10 percent we can do with the rest as we like. Rather, we have been given an expense account by the Lord and we will have to answer for every cent we spend. A traveling salesman cannot buy a fur coat for his wife from his expense account. Neither are we allowed any luxury.

Is your conscience clear? Can you justify before God all that you spend for yourself on food and clothing in a hungry and naked world? Can you justify the luxurious church buildings, choir robes, upholstered pews, when missions lack a dollar to give a Bible in a heathen country? Can you justify your expenses on cosmetics, on entertainment? Will you be able to look in the face of Jesus in the day of judgment and tell Him, "I did well to spend my money like this"? Will He say to you, "Well done, thou good and faithful steward"?

Apr 5
|
"Moses said unto the LORD, O my Lord, I am not eloquent." (EXO 4:10)

Richard Hext was born with crippled hands and feet. His hands hung normally following an operation, but he had not the slightest power in them.

This did not keep him from attaining his ambition to become a painter. He attended the school of arts for seven years. Then he earned his living as a painter-wielding a brush with his teeth. Some of his paintings are so beautiful that they hang in Buckingham Palace.

Moses became a great preacher, though he was a stutterer. Rahab became a saint and an ancestor of the Lord, though she was first a prostitute in a heathen nation. Peter became a martyr, though he was a coward by nature. We first see him trembling before a servant maid who could do him no harm. After the Resurrection the same man stood in a marketplace in Jerusalem defying the rulers of the nation and the mob. History tells us he eventually died for his Lord by his own request crucified head down.

A Christian convicted of both adultery and murder probably would give up hope of ever again being useful to the Lord. But David repented and wrote beautiful psalms which are our spiritual nourishment. Solomon fell into idolatry and promiscuity but became the author of three books of the Bible.

No physical, intellectual, or moral handicap is unconquerable. If you have no hands, paint by using your teeth, but make pictures for the Lord.

Apr 6
|
"Be like-minded, having the same love, being of one accord, of one mind." (PHP 2:2)

Human sin has marred the history of Christendom, which could have been beautiful if those bearing the name of Christ had followed their Master's precepts. Everyone knows of the Catholic Inquisition, but Protestants could be cruel as well.

Her Majesty the Gracious Sovereign of Britain, Elizabeth I, condemned Bishop Plunkett for his Catholic beliefs, ordered him to be partly hanged, then lowered, then ripped off, then his bowels burned (he being still alive), then quartered. Catholics in Piedmont apprehended the Protestant Giovanni Michialin with four of his children. As three of the children were hacked to pieces before Michialin's eyes, the soldiers asked at the death of each child if he would recant; he constantly refused. When the same answer was given the fourth time, a soldier grabbed the child by the legs and dashed out its brains.

Catholics killed thousands of Orthodox in Croatia during the war. Orthodox priests wickedly persecuted Evangelicals in Romania and saw to it that they were jailed. Priests led mass slaughters of Jews. Today Protestants and Catholics kill each other in Northern Ireland in the name of the One who enjoined love even for an enemy.

Let us decide once and for all that we will uproot any thought of resentment or hostility toward another for holding a religion different from ours. Let us guard against using inflammatory language against someone else's religion. It might incite an irresponsible person to rash acts and lead even to murder. Religious differences have to be discussed in love. Whenever there are seemingly irreconcilable differences, each should retain his convictions based on the Word of God. But the supreme commandment is love.

Apr 7
|
"I exhort therefore, that, first of all, supplications, prayers, intercessions, and giving of thanks, be made ... for kings, and for all that are in authority." (1TM 2:1,2)

The text does not say that we should pray only for our country's rulers and government. This is what British, German, Russian, and American clergy did in World War II. Having done this, one can comfortably kill those who belong to the army of another sovereign. It is wrong to pray only for our own king or president.

Rulers and kings are a specific class of society for which we have to pray, just as we pray for the hungry or the sick. A Christian, then, prays at once for his own ruler, as well as for the ruler of the neighboring country and the chief of an aboriginal tribe.

By praying for our rulers and loving them, even though they may be wicked, we will be enabled to lead "a quiet and peaceable life," because the thought of rioting and rebelling will never occur to us. Furthermore, with such an outlook we can be a leaven for good in society. "Therefore ... pray."

Apr 8
|
"Be not drunk with wine, wherein is excess; but be filled with the Spirit." (EPH 5:18)

I will take the figures of the European country least reputed vice.

Since the end of World War II the consumption of alcohol has doubled in Switzerland. The number of alcoholics has increased from 100,000 to 130,000. Twenty percent of the court cases and 23 percent of the divorces are due to alcohol. Alcohol is responsible for one third of the suicides. Each year 1300 persons enter psychiatric asylums as a result of alcohol abuse. The figures for other countries are much worse.

The Bible speaks about being drunk with love, about being so filled with the Holy Spirit as to give the impression of being a drunkard.

Does anyone know of any evil effects from such holy drunkenness?

Drink therefore from the miraculous wine which Jesus gave to the apostles at Cana. You will have many symptoms of drunkenness: drunkards praise their wine, you will praise yours; drunkards sing, you will have an irresistible impulse to sing to the glory of your Savior; drunkards are ready to fight, you also will be willing to fight, even if you are very weak, against much stronger foes.

I am not against drunkenness. But I consider alcohol the wrong beverage. Let us drink of the wine which Jesus freely offers to those who thirst.

Apr 9
|
"Earnestly contend for the faith which was once delivered unto the saints." (JUD 3)

Beware of tolerance in matters of faith. Imagine two schools, one run by a wise man, the other by a fool. In the first, children are taught that 2 and 2 are 4; in the second, that 2 and 2 are 3. Then along comes a teacher who says that after all love is the most important thing. Why should there be differences between teachers of mathematics? Let them each agree to make a small concession so that both can teach the same way. Then children can be taught that 2 and 2 are 3-1/2. Whoever refuses to accept such a loving, agreeable solution is a fanatic, a bigot, and is no longer worthy to be teacher of mathematics. What would you say to this?

Christians love unity but not at the expense of truth.

The Christian church possesses definitive truth much sure than mathematics because it has been revealed by God Himself. From my wallet I can give a man as much as I like, because it is my money. From God's truth I can give nothing. There might be variations among Christians in nonessentials, just as there exist varieties of orchids. I will accept any rose of another color, but I cannot accept a thistle as a rose. Love is not sufficient reason to abandon one word, one letter of the Bible. I can love the heretic, but not the heresy.

Christ is God. He became man, was born of the Virgin Mary, died for our sins, was resurrected bodily, and ascended into heaven. Anyone is free to believe otherwise, but then I wish no unity and no dialogue with him. Professors of mathematics don't conduct dialogues with their pupils. They proclaim the truth and it must be accepted. Christians also proclaim the truth. Whoever refuses to accept it, will perish.

Apr 10
|
"O sing unto the LORD a new song. (PSA 96:1)

It is much more important to save the youth than to save the old manner of worship or the old songs to which we are accustomed. We live in a world in which minds and hearts have been revolutionized. New songs and new manners of worship have arisen. The older generation of Christians feel offended, as if God were inseparably linked only to the liturgy which they have known from childhood. They forget that what is now old was itself once new.

The ~St. Matthew Passion~ of Bach was not accepted in his day. After a few performances it lay forgotten for a hundred years. The ~Great Organ Mass~ of Haydn was declared sacrilegious by the founder of the German Cecilian order, who wrote: "It compares to pure church music like a prostitute to a queen or like a waltz to the death of Christ." This priest, Witt, wrote to the Pope ... he considered this music more suitable for salons: "The military and bacchantic rhythms don't correspond to the earnestness of the church services and the sacrifice on the cross."

Missionaries to Africa tell how much more the hearts of converts are moved when the organ is replaced by their drums.

Open your heart to music and church practices which you personally may not like. They may be helpful to someone with another frame of mind. They may even help someone else praise the Lord better.

Apr 11
|
"Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself." (MTT 22:39)

Don't be content simply to admire the beauty of this commandment or even to tell it to others. Rather sit down and write on a sheet of paper the names of the neighbors who are in need of your love.

Who is frustrated? Who is lonely? Who has been forsaken by his marriage partner or by his children? Who is a dropout?

Squeaky Fromm, of the infamous Manson cult, was driven out by her parents who never exhibited any love for her. When she sat helpless and forsaken in a gutter, Manson, the future killer, passed by and asked her, "Do you need love? I love. Follow me." She followed him and became a member of a satanic sect that knew how to disguise itself behind loving words. She became a drug addict and made an attempt on the life of former President Ford. Now she is serving a life sentence in prison. Think how different her life might have been if a Christian had stopped to befriend a girl weeping by the roadside and had shown her the love of Christ.

Your neighbor who needs your love might be a refugee from a foreign land, he might be one of the many who starve in Africa or India, he might be one of those who lack a knowledge of Christ on a Pacific island, in a Communist or Moslem land, or in your own reputedly Christian country. Don't stop to admire the dictum "Love your neighbour" as you would a picture in an art gallery, but begin to love in a practical way.

Apr 12
|
"What ... God hath joined together, let not man put asunder." (MTT 19:6)

God hates divorce (MAL 2:16). There is really only one basic reason why people divorce. It is that they had no real motive for marriage. They either did not marry with the intent of sacrificing their whole life to the earthly and eternal well-being of the spouse. or else they have abandoned this intent.

It would be unrealistic not to admit that sometimes it is best for a couple to part. Jesus cites the case of adultery, by which He does not mean one instance of falling into sin, but a permanent life style of the marriage partner. We cannot limit permission to divorce to this either. Otherwise we would be like some who might quote the Scripture, "Pay tithe of mint and anise and cummin" (MTT 23:23), to justify not tithing other sources of income. The products mentioned in this Bible verse are only examples of different kinds of earnings.

Likewise, Jesus' mention of adultery as motive for divorce is that there must be a motive as important as this. What can one do when the spouse is a compulsive gambler or an incurable drug addict or alcoholic, when he (or she) endangers the upbringing of children, when he deserts the family, when overt cruelty and homosexuality persist? If the erring spouse refuses to take corrective measures, one cannot insist that the partner remain involved in his illness. I would not remain married to someone who obliged me to be an accomplice in crime.

The best prevention of divorce is earnest prayer and the willingness to open one's eyes and engage in mature reflection as well as consultation with experienced people regarding marriage and children. Girls who marry under the age of twenty have, statistically, three times as great a chance of winding up in divorce court as those who marry later. A survey reveals that 31 percent of girls who married between fourteen and eighteen were pregnant at the time.

Parents, be loving to and considerate of each other, not only for your own happiness and to prevent divorce, but also to serve as an example to your children of what marriage should be, so that theirs will not end in divorce.

Apr 13
|
"Search the scriptures." (JHN 5:39)

In Madagascar, during all the persecution between 1836 and 1861, Christians not only kept their faith alive by secret Bible reading, but the church increased tenfold under this experience. The Formosan hill tribes, almost untouched by Christianity before the Second World War, resisted Japanese pressure and emerged with firmly planted Christian communities based on nothing but the study of the Bible. In Kenya, under the threat of the Mau Mau, it was the Christians whose lives were most deeply rooted in the Bible who stood firm against all attempts to get them to take the heathen Kikuyu oath. The toughness of indigenous churches depends on the degree of devotion to the Bible. The organization of the church, even its ministers and priests, may be destroyed without ultimate disaster so long as the people have - and read - the Bible.

Not everywhere is there persecution, but everywhere the world is adverse to true Christianity. We have to be versed in the Scriptures if we wish our faith to survive.

In Red China, Mao's book of "thought," the most pestilential volume ever vomited forth from the jaws of hell, is chanted in every house and on every street under compulsion. Erasmus, one of the great translators of the Bible, said, "I could wish that the husbandman might sing parts of Scripture at his plough." Speak to each other in psalms and Scriptures. In this lies the salvation of the church.

Be thankful to God that you belong to the privileged elite (only 40 percent of mankind) who know how to read. Be thankful that you belong to the much narrower circle of those who can have a Bible. (In one half of the world it is not available.) You are privileged in that you are able to afford to buy a Bible. (Many desirous Christians in Latin America, Africa, and India have no money for a Bible.) Make the searching of the Scriptures your daily occupation.

Apr 14
|
"I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me." (GAL 2:20)

Among all the biblical authors, I particularly love those whose names are unknown. Moses quotes "The book of the wars of the LORD" (NUM 21:14). Who is its author? JOS 10:13 mentions "the book of Yasher," which means "the righteous." Who might have written it? Paul quotes a Greek poet who said, "We are also [God's] offspring" (ACT 17:28). His saying was of such a superlative nature that it transcended the importance of its author.

When people sing your verses they have become verses indeed, but when a poet is quoted as authority by an apostle of Christ to support his argument, there is no longer need to remember his human name.

Such is the glory of those who write the real songs of God. It is as if they were not written by mere man. A Buddhist legend says a man painted such a masterful picture of Buddha that when he finished only the painting remained. The painter was no longer there. The same is true of the real Christian author, poet, preacher, and of the layman who witnesses as a rank-and-file Christian to another person. He must cease to be himself and must unite with the soul of his listener who starts to believe. He must become one with Jesus about whom he writes or speaks.

When you write, speak, or act for Jesus, let Him infuse your heart with His sacred spirit. You might lose your name by this, but you will gain eternity. You will be quoted by God without mention of a name, because the mystical marriage will have taken place. You will have become united with Him.

Apr 15
|
"The greatest ... is charity." (1CO 13:13)

An old legend says that in the beginning there was God and two swallows. One swallow whispered into the ears of God, "Make something. We should have trees in which to make nests, and air through which to fly, and many countries so that we might migrate to and fro. Life is boresome in a nothing." The other swallow chirped,"Don't create, my God. Once You create matter, energy, and movement, who knows which molecule will unite with which. Some rapacious birds might appear which would eat us up, there might be tempests in which we will perish, and who knows what else. Let it be as it is." God answered, "I wish to create. I wish to have beings on whom to pour My love and who would love Me."

The swallow warned again, "Once You create beings with changing sentiments, thoughts, and moods, they may at a certain moment not love You, but come to hate You. Even a God cannot calculate all possibilities involved in a huge creation. Let us be just as we are, You and the two swallows." The other bird insisted, "Make a world. I promise that I will chirp even if the world turns bad. I will chirp even when I know rapacious birds are stalking me and naughty children have set traps to catch me."

So God decided to make the world. He took upon Himself the risks love, the risks everyone has to take when he begins a friendship or a marriage, the risks everyone has to take when he launched a new idea. He decided to love and, because He loves, we learn to trust and to hope and to aid.

The only alternative to love is nonexistence. If love should totally disappear in the world. the world would no linger be. Think about it.

Apr 16
|
"Do all things without ... disputings." (PHP 2:14)

Six blind men tried to ascertain what an elephant was. One felt its side and thought it a wall. One felt its ear and thought it a fan. One felt its leg and thought it a pillar. One felt its tail and believed he had touched a snake, and so on. We know in part (1CO 13:12).

The story is told how several blind men, cured by the Lord discussed at a party how Jesus heals blindness. The one said, 'I can tell it from my own experience. He simply says, 'Your faith has healed you.' " The other objected, "This is Protestant disregard of good deeds. Faith alone does not suffice. Jesus touches the eyes of the blind man." To which a third added, "It must be done twice. If he touches you only once you see men walking like trees." The former insisted that he had been touched only once and notwithstanding saw perfectly. A fourth one said, "You all have talked nonsense. Jesus makes mud by spitting on the earth. He puts the mud on your eyes. Then you have to go to wash yourself in a certain pool in Palestine. No other pool will do. What you have spoken until now are fancies."

So the four former blind men fall into a great quarrel. Each formed his own denomination. Once Jesus gathered the heads of the four denominations and asked them, "I have healed you all, each one in a different way. Would it not have been better for you to unite in thanking Me for what I have done? Am I not free to heal everyone as I see best?

What you condemn as the error of your brother might very well be a valid personal experience of his with the Lord Jesus.

Apr 17
|
"Not by might, nor by power, but by my spirit, saith the LORD of hosts." (ZEC 4:6).

An admirer of modern art wrote in an English newspaper that "this art is democratic. Anybody can do it." You can make two strokes with the brush in yellow and three others in blue. Make a circle around them in red. The circle does not even need to be round. Paste on it a nose and one eye of a girl cut out of a newspaper. Call it "Mankind's Glorious Future" and critics may well label your painting exciting. It is really exciting. Exciting of what?

Ungifted, untalented, and untaught men produce so-called works of art. Ungifted preachers preach. The result is that many churches are being emptied. Luther made preaching the center of the worship service, rather than Holy Communion, as had been the case before. He forgot to consider that the world does not have many good preachers.

Look at the Pieta. Two life-sized statues are combined into one group. Michelangelo cut into the stone and placed the body of a full-grown man in the lap of a maid. She looks much younger than her son. She has kept the beauty of virginity. He has been the Man of Sorrows. Her face is calm. She knows about resurrection. Such artists are not found on every street. Neither can you make preachers like John Chrysostom by passing boring speakers through theological exams.

Jesus must live within the heart before He becomes the subject of a sermon or a personal witness. "Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh" (MTT 12:34).

Preachers who are not gifted should become something else or be born again with the gift of preaching. Even an uncultured and untalented man can speak interestingly about the person he loves most. Mothers know how to tell about the good in their children. Only those who love Jesus greatly should speak about Him. Otherwise our witnessing for Him will look like modern art. Anyone can do it, but it is not beautiful. Or significant.

To be eloquent in personal witnessing or preaching depends not upon scholarship, but upon being fervent in the Spirit.

Apr 18
|
"The day of the Lord ... is ... a day of darkness and of gloominess." (JOE 2:1,2)

The Lord taught us to say, "Thy kingdom come." He did not mean us to say it light-heartedly. If His kingdom were to come today it would mean the entering of many into everlasting fire. "He that believeth not shall be damned" (MRK 16:16). The believers in Christ are an infinitesimal minority. Where will the others pass their eternity? What will the advent of the kingdom mean for those you love?

A sifting will take place. Some will go to the right, others to the left. Your darling might be found to the left. Can you say with your whole heart, "Thy kingdom come"? Are you willing that many of your family and your nation spend eternity in hell?

The prayer "Thy kingdom come" was taught to give us a sense of urgency. Having both the knowledge of and the desire for its coming, we should spread the gospel around us to the utmost of our abilities.

Be cautious with books about biblical prophecies. I have found that every such book older than twenty years has proven untrue. Luther believed that the advance of the Turks meant the end. Mussolini was said to be the man who would reestablish the kingdom of Rome as allegedly foretold by Daniel. Hitler was considered the apocalyptic beast bearing the number 666 (REV 13:18).

We often have in us an unhealthy curiosity. When the Lord said about the buildings of Jerusalem that there would not be left one stone upon another that would not be thrown down (MRK 13:2), the disciples wanted details about when these things would happen, instead of interceding like Abraham and Moses that the predicted catastrophe might not occur.

There is now much rejoicing about the pouring out of the Spirit in many places. Those who receive His gifts should not forget that the prophecy about this outpouring in JOE 2:28,29 is followed immediately by the announcement of terrible judgments upon mankind. We should not seek merely to interpret these prophecies, but having the Spirit and knowing the dangers, we should become intercessors to prevent the catastrophes. The decrees of God are not unalterable.

Apr 19
|
"All scripture is given by inspiration of God." (2TM 3:16)

During the Reformation, Thomas Muntzer mocked Luther as a scribe addicted to the dead letter of the Bible. He nicknamed Luther a "Bible-gobbler" and said, "It is of no use to have swallowed the Bible one hundred thousand times." Muntzer's religion centered on having the living Spirit. Luther retorted that he would not listen to Muntzer though he had received the Holy Ghost completely, unless he adduced Scripture.

Luther was right in this. St. Jerome had written long before, "To be ignorant of Scriptures is not to know Christ.... A man who is well-grounded in the Scriptures is the bulwark of the church." The contest between being Spirit-guided and Scripture-guided is artificial, because those who have been inwardly taught by the Spirit feel an entire acquiescence to the Scripture and perceive that self-authenticated, carrying with it its own evidence" (Calvin).

A man would have to demonstrate that his attitudes or words were really inspired by the Holy Spirit. The Bible need not and ought not be made subject to demonstrations and arguments from reason. We have received it from God's mouth by the ministry of men. It is superior to any human judgment. When you read the Scripture with faith, they give you the perception of God Himself. It is wrong to believe the Bible because arguments prove it to be true. We do not judge Word the God; it judges us. It is the invincible truth. Christians submit to it completely. Don't allow any spirit to separate you from any part of it.

Apr 20
|
"To the Jew first." (ROM 1:16)

"The sun has never shone on such a bloodthirsty and vindictive people as the Jews, who cherish the idea of murdering and strangling the heathen. No other men under the sun are more greedy than they have been and always will be, as one can see from their accursed usury."

These are the words of Martin Luther. There are other sayings like this in the writings of other great Christian divines, of popes and church fathers.

The sentiments have gone beyond mere words. The Jewish people described as being so despicable have been slaughtered over the centuries by those calling themselves Christians. Hitler received his first education in a Catholic school. He must have heard many times the story about the Jews being God-killers. No wonder that the unjustly hated Jews do not believe in Christ.

The Scriptures, on the other hand, say that the Jews gave to the world the human Son of God (ROM 9:5).

A wanderer walking in a storm drew his overcoat around him tighter and tighter. Then the sun came out with its warmth and light and the wanderer took off his outer garment. Only warm Christian love will lead the chosen people of God, who have gone astray, to give up their prejudices against Jesus and embrace Him as their Savior. Let us as Christians allow ourselves to reflect on them the light and warmth of the Sun of righteousness.

Apr 21
|
"Remember the sabbath day, to keep it holy." (EXO 20:8,

Many businessmen spend their lives in a frantic endeavor to make money, much of which they don't even need (the best proof being that they keep it stored in banks). This accumulation of wealth enables them to buy things they can go without, in order to impress people they don't like.

What is the good of all this frenetic activity to amass wealth?

One of the most important laws of God is the law enjoining rest: Remember to keep the Sabbath. Stop running after money. Cease your constant striving for achievement. Let up on your engagements and committees. Ease the stress of living. Come apart and rest.

The Sabbath is the oldest of God's institutions. Even the heathen understand the importance - could they have had it from Adam? Relax when possible from work, even from important work. Socrates recuperated from stressful experiences by playing with children. In the Jesuit order it was formerly a rule that after two hours of study there was a relaxation period of fifteen minutes when something else had to be done. Cardinal Richelieu relaxed by doing strenuous exercises, such as competing against his manservant in the high jump.

Don't allow yourself to be consumed with the desire to earn more money. An increase in your income may not be a necessity, especially if it increases your worries. Take time to enter into a Sabbath rest. Relax. "Come unto me," Jesus said, "all ye that labour and are heavy laden.... and ye shall find rest unto your souls" (MTT 11:28,29). And while you rest, the One who keeps Israel neither slumbers nor sleeps (PSA 121:4).

Apr 22
|
"O grave, where is thy victory?" (1CO 15:55)

Those who accept the materialistic philosophy of life believe that the individual ceases to exist at death. This contradicts the principle of conservation of energy which is a cornerstone of science. The energy condensed in the atoms constituting my body doesn't disappear at death. As the body decays, these atoms form other combinations. The caloric energy I have does not disappear. It remains a part of the constant total energy of the universe. When the stove gets cold its former warmth has been communicated to the room. So it is when my body becomes a cold corpse.

I also have spiritual energy; the power to will; sentiments; conscience. We know of no kind of energy which should disappear in this universe. There is not the slightest proof to convince us that spiritual energy would be an exception. Death can only transfer it into a new dimension, but cannot destroy it.

The renowned physicist, Maxwell, wrote that "scientific progress ... obliges one to make a profound distinction between the visible side of the human being, which obviously perishes and that which constitutes our 'I' and to adopt the position that human personality, by its nature and calling, lies beyond the borders of the sphere of science." The fact that we cannot comprehend how consciousness could exist when death has severed its ties with the brain - because in us while we are living, mind and brain are connected - does not prove that after death consciousness has disappeared.

The German writer, Goethe, said: "My conviction that we will live eternally stems from the notion of activity. If I will be energetically active until my end, nature, when it sees that my body cannot bear anymore the burden of my spirit, will be obliged to provide me with some other form of existence."

Continue your good work diligently, not worrying about death. God, who has given you a body for the present work, will have to give you another one at death if your work is pleasing to Him.

Apr 23
|
"One soul of five hundred." (NUM 31:28)

In Numbers 31, we are told how God gave the Jews a great victory over the Midianite people. The Jews took a great spoil. God told them to give to the temple a five-hundredth part of it. God is modest. There are times when He asks little.

When the Son of God became incarnate, He chose as His place of birth a stable; as His way of life, sorrow; as His manner of death, crucifixion.

He chose as disciples twelve despised men (1CO 1:28). He allows the world at times to be ruled by monsters and keeps for Himself a little flock. The wicked triumph and the Christians pass through sufferings.

If you ask "Why this modesty of God?" the answer would be, "It is a very immodest thing to question the Creator. Don't ask why, but take your modest place near your modest God."

Christ's church and real Christians never boast of great achievements. His kingdom is not of this world. Here the great achievements belong to tyrants and crooks. God's successes in this world are always modest, for His triumph is in the realm of the spirit.

Be happy about your modest achievements.

Apr 24
|
"I the LORD thy God am a jealous God." (EXO 20:5)

The great painter, Van Gogh, when very sick, wrote to his brother: "I promised myself to consider my illness as nonexistent. Art is jealous. She does not want us to choose illness in preference to her so I do what she wishes. Enough time has been lost, my hands have become too white. People such as I are not allowed to be ill, so to speak. So I have set to drawing regularly from morning until night."

We have a God who is jealous, as art is. He does not want us to escape from problems, disappointments, failures, mischiefs, into nervous breakdowns or mental illness. Christians are not allowed to absent themselves from their work under the pretense of being ill. There should be no spiritual sickness.

A man watched Michelangelo shape a statue. He asked him "What do you do if your chisel has taken away a bit too much of the nose?"

Michelangelo answered, "It does not happen."

The man insisted, "Suppose it has happened. Can you repair the fault?"

The sculptor answered again, "It does not happen."

The man could not understand. "What if it happens?"

Michelangelo shouted angrily at him, "Shut up, and leave me alone! It does not happen!"

"Whosoever abideth in [Jesus] sinneth not" (1JN 3:6), in the sense that he never allows himself the luxury of abandoning his art, his calling, for sin's sake or for trouble's sake. He continues his walk on the way of the Lord. The Lord is jealous. He does not willingly accept or allow us to wallow in sins, sorrows, or laziness.

Apr 25
|
"We also are compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses." (HEB 12:1)

A Christian prisoner in Cuba was asked to sign a statement containing accusations against brethren, which would have led to their arrest. He said, "The chain keeps me from signing this."

The Red officer replied, "But you are not in chains."

"I am," said the Christian; "I am bound by the chains of witnesses who throughout the centuries gave their lives for Christ. I am a link in this chain. I will not break it."

Thomas Aquinas, after having called martyrdom the greatest proof of perfect love, adds: "Words pronounced by the martyrs before authorities are not human words, the simple expression of a human conviction, but words pronounced by the Holy Spirit through the confessors of Jesus."

Learn from the martyrs. You too are a link in this chain. Remain faithful!

Nijole Sadunaite, a young Christian lady, said before the court in Lithuania when she was sentenced for her faith: "This is the happiest day of my life. I am tried for the cause of truth and love toward men ... I have enviable fate, a glorious destiny. My condemnation will be my triumph. I regret only to have done so little for men.... Let us love each other and we will be happy. Only the one who loves not is unhappy.... We must condemn evil, but we must love the man, even the one in error. This you can learn only at the school of Jesus Christ"

This is the teaching which the Holy Spirit gives you through a sufferer for Christ. Apply it in your own life.

Apr 26
|

"The fruit of the Spirit is love ... against such there is no law." (GAL 5:22,23)

More than one third of the world is under Communist dominion. One aim of the Communists is eradication of religion. Bibles have to be smuggled into most countries of the Red bloc. Is it right for Christians sometimes to do illegal things and things which contravene generally accepted moral standards?

The Jewish high priests had a promise from God that He would speak to them from between the two cherubim on the ark of the covenant in the temple. They felt safe. Never would the Messiah dare to come without telling them in advance. No ruler from abroad would visit a country without giving notice. Thus the Roman governor was also sure. The king of the Jews could not appear in the world without his knowledge.

One night, the Light of the world "smuggled" Himself into Palestine as a babe, after having been in the womb of a holy virgin, contrary to accepted moral standards and the laws of biology.

Then He was crucified and buried. A seal was put on His grave by the authorities. Now everyone knows that one is not supposed to break a government seal. But angels are not bound by earthly laws. An angel just rolled away the stone, not caring about the seal.

Would we have advised Jesus to abide by the law and remain in the grave once the authorities had sealed the tomb? Jesus "smuggled" Himself out of the grave into life again.

Some think that we should not break the laws of Communist tyrants. Jesus "broke" the law of gravity and ascended into heaven.

Augustine taught a principle valid for all spheres of life: "Love and do as you like."

Apr 27
|
"Be ye angry and sin not." (EPH 4:26)

Anatolii Krasnov-Levitin, a Soviet writer, said: "Love and anger are sisters. Where there is no anger, there is no love. The words of the ancient prophets were full of a strong wrath because their hearts were full of a powerful love towards their own people, and love brought forth wrath not only against the oppressors of the people, but also against the people themselves because they did not follow the ways of truth. There was also a strong wrath in the words of our Saviour when he looked on the Scribes and Pharisees...." Who does not feel horror and anger against sins has no Christian or human feelings.

To be kind toward offenders is not always the wisest course. Absalom had committed a crime. He had directed his servants to kill his brother Amnon (2SM 13:28). After this murder, Absalom fled from before the face of King David. Banishment is a well-deserved punishment for someone who takes the law into his own hands and kills someone who has never been sentenced to death by the only appointed judge, which was the king. Absalom should have been left in this self-imposed exile.

Instead, David listened to bad advice and forgave the murderer, though he had not shown any sign of repentance and change of life. Nor had he even humbled himself to ask for pardon. So Absalom became big again in Jerusalem and was free to organize a bloody rebellion against his father, King David. Much innocent blood flowed and there was much sorrow. It could easily have been avoided if David had shown in this case holy wrath instead of unholy meekness.

Everyone must pay for his sin, unless he has become a new person through new birth by believing that Jesus paid the penalty for his sin; as it is written, "the chastisement of our peace was upon him" (ISA 53:5). Only then do we have a guarantee that goodness will not be misused.

Apr 28
|
"Jesus said: Take ye away the stone ...." (JHN 11:39)

In a small town, the hearse driver was an unbeliever. The pastor of the church had tried repeatedly to bring him to God without success. One day the car of the pastor was being repaired, and on that day he had to conduct a burial service. So he sat in the hearse next to the driver. He made a new attempt to bring the driver to conversion.

"Sir, would you please do me a favor?" the pastor asked. The Bible contains a difficult verse which speaks about your profession. Help me to understand it. Our Lord Jesus said, 'Let the dead bury their dead.' Now, a dead hearse driver cannot drive a corpse to the cemetery. A dead grave digger cannot dig a grave.

A dead pastor cannot deliver the funeral sermon. What is then the meaning of these words?"

The driver laughed. "Have I not always told you, pastor, that the Bible is sheer nonsense? Take these words of Jesus only and you have the proof of it."

The pastor replied, "Before discarding it, let us consider it a little bit. When the coffin with the dead man whom we have behind us was taken out of the house, you heard his wife crying, 'George, don't leave me alone! Return!' The children also begged their father to stay with them. It was in vain. The dead did not answer because he was dead.

"The same happens with you. For years Christ, the angels Christians have called you to repentance and you have not answered, because you also are dead-spiritually. So a man who is dead spiritually buries a man who is bodily dead. The words of ur Lord do make sense."

Every man who does not have Christ is dead spiritually. Bodily he may live in a nice home. Spiritually his abode is in a grave. Jesus would like to resurrect him from there, as He resurrected Lazarus bodily long ago. Bodily resurrections have been rare, but the Lord wishes the spiritual resurrection of all who are dead in sins and error. He asks us the believers, to be His co-workers in this. He is the only One who can raise the dead, but we are called to take away the stones from the graves.

Apr 29
|

"The Scripture, foreseeing that God would justify the heathen through faith, preached before the gospel unto Abraham, saying, In thee shall all nations be blessed." (GAL 3:8)

Which Scripture preached the gospel to Abraham? The first book of the Holy Scriptures which we possess now was written centuries after Abraham's. death. How then did a Scripture give him the news about his becoming a blessing to all nations?

The Scripture explained to Abraham that this promise would be fulfilled in a descendant of his, Jesus Christ. It spoke to Abraham with such power that he rejoiced thousands of years beforehand to see the day of Christ (JHN 8:56).

Now, which Scripture spoke to Abraham? He did not have our Scriptures. But our Bible tells us that it is based upon more ancient scriptures, that it is an outcry in simple human words of eternal values, for whose expression we lack the adequate language. In DAN 10:21, a being from heaven told Daniel: "I will shew thee that which is noted in the scripture of truth," and he showed him things which were not contained in any holy Scripture written for men until then. In NUM 21:14, "the book of the wars of the LORD," is mentioned and JOS 10:13 mentions "the book of Jasher" (which means in Hebrew "the righteous").

Under special circumstances men specially endowed by God are privileged to read these books. This is what Abraham did. Our Bible puts in human words, accessible to us, thoughts inspired by God. Those other books contain the same thoughts, as they are before being pressed into the narrow frame of human language.

Climb to spiritual heights. Then you will not remain only at the Bible, but will arrive at mysteries of God which can only with great difficulty be put into human words. We apprehend them in moments of ecstasy.

Apr 30
|
"God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son." (JHN 3:16)

A minister had tried unsuccessfully to bring faith to a great railroad trade union leader. Then a strike broke out. It was prolonged. The strikers tightened their belts and held to their demands in the face of hunger and mounting debt.

The minister went to visit the trade union leader and told him, "I have a suggestion which will enable you to win the strike. You can get the full weight of public opinion behind you."

For the first time, the leader became interested in the words of the preacher and asked to learn the proposal. The minister explained, "To demonstrate the truly desperate condition of the workers, and to arouse compassion for them, tie your son to a railroad track and run over him with a locomotive. You will have the victory."

Indignant, the trade leader refused. "I would rather see the whole world starve before I would sacrifice my only son."

God could have sent an ancient saint or an angel to die for us, but instead He gave the best in heaven, Jesus Christ. Realizing the extent of the sacrifice, our hearts are moved to repentance. Jesus died for our sins on Good Friday. But death could not hold Him. Death is a low quality phenomenon. It could not contain the best. He was resurrected. This is what we celebrate on Easter Sunday - Christ's conquering death.

God gave the best He had. We also are meant to give our best. The strict rules of the Jewish temple specified that offerings brought to the Lord had to be of the finest flour.

May 1
|
"He that hath two coats, let him impart to him that hath none." (LUK 3:11)

"Be shod with sandals; and not put on two coats" (MRK 6:9).

During the persecution of Christians under the Roman emperor Diocletian, a Christian, Eustrat, was shod in iron boots with big, sharp nails fixed inside. In these boots, beaten the entire time to run faster, he was led to martyrdom. The church honors his memory.

We are not all called to such sufferings. Martyrdom is the exception. Not all have to wear shoes with nails which would pierce the flesh.

However, God does look into our wardrobe. He taught His first disciples simplicity in clothing. Some contemporary Christians are careful to have the right doctrine, others the right ritual. What about the right number of shoes and suits and dresses?

Christians should give everything they have to the Lord, considering themselves not as owners, but as stewards of material riches. They strip themselves even of their own selves to follow the naked and barefoot Christ on His way to Golgotha.

Christians should be careful about how much clothing and food they have. Billions of souls need the gospel. The children of God will be arrayed in glory in the future.

May 2
|
"... hath God chosen ... things which are not." (1CO 1:28)

"He took the seven loaves, and gave thanks, and brake, and gave to his disciples to set before them.... So they did eat, and were filled" (MRK 8:6,8).

Suppose the disciples would not have had seven loaves, but only three or one; what would have happened? The multitudes would have been satisfied just the same. As a matter of fact, on another occasion Jesus had only five loaves of bread instead of seven. Notwithstanding, He fed an even bigger multitude and a greater number of baskets of fragments remained behind (MRK 6:41-43). You can serve God with the little you have. His blessings do not depend upon the size or quantity of what you have, but upon the fact that you bring them to Him.

Suppose I have nothing to bring, what then? This is impossible, for a man who has nothing to bring to Jesus does not exist. Neither the word, nor the symbol "zero" occur in the Bible.

He can bring his own person, that person which says, "I possess nothing; I am nothing." He has something valuable: himself and his utter poverty. He can bring his sins to Jesus. From the sin of being a fanatic persecutor, Saul of Tarsus was made by God into a zealous apostle. From a sinful, loose woman Mary Magdalene was made a saint possessing steadfast love. Bring your weakness to Christ. This you surely have. His strength will show its perfectness in your weakness.

Start with little, but instead of using this little, bring it to Jesus. And He will multiply it and greatly bless it.

May 3
|
"... Cunning craftiness, whereby they lie in wait to deceive." (EPH 4:14)

Christians should study Mao Tse-tung's works. Before he quarreled with his Russian comrades, he stated the tactics of all Communists in his book, On Protracted War: "Deliberately creating misconceptions for the enemy and then springing surprise attacks upon him in one means ... of achieving superiority and seizing the initiative. What are misconceptions? ... Making a feint to the east but attacking in the west is a way of creating misconceptions among the enemies.... There can never be too much deception in war."

Add to this the fact that for Maoists class struggles and revolutionary wars are the desirable, permanent state of things for centuries to come, and you will learn that according to them, deceitfulness must be a main feature of man's character.

Jesus teaches, "Let your communication be Yea, yea; Nay, nay" (MTT 5:37). We have to choose between a life of lies or a life rooted in truth.

May 4
|
"As soon then as they were come to land, they saw a fire of coals there, and fish laid thereon, and bread." (JHN 21:9)

The disciples were hungry and the Lord Jesus had provided them with a meal.

In this instance He prepared it Himself. At other times He charged an angel to care for a saint. When the prophet Elijah slept under a tree, an angel touched him and said to him, "Arise and eat. And he looked, and, behold, there was a cake baked on the coals and a cruse of water at his head" (1KI 19:6).

It is easy to believe in these miracles after having eaten well, but in some parts of the world Christians are in jail where the food is soup made of unwashed intestines. The dung is swimming in the soup. For such food, you have to do hard slave labor.

Our imprisoned brethren do not suffer only physically. Their faith is stressed, too. Doubts arise. "The Lord is almighty. He could provide food for the first apostles or for Elijah. Why does He not provide some fried fish or cake for me? Why have I to eat unwashed intestines?"

God has provided the necessary food for the Christian prisoners. Only this time, He has not entrusted angels with it, but their fellow Christians. As He had charged an angel to feed Elijah, now He has charged the Christians of the free world to provide their imprisoned brethren with food. It is tragic that many of those who have the task of feeding martyrs steal what God has given them for this purpose and deprive the martyrs of their due.

Are you one of these thieves?

God has also provided for the freedom of Christians under different anti-Christian rulers. However, the Moseses and Joshuas of today those to whom God has entrusted the freedom of the world and of His people, are on strike. Pharaoh has bribed them and they are now on his side.

Would you do something for the freedom of the world?

May 5
|
"The angel of the Lord appeared unto [Joseph] in a dream." (MTT 1:20)

A Chinese poet said, "I dreamed last night that I was a butterfly and now I don't know whether I am a man who dreamed he was a butterfly or perhaps a butterfly who dreams now that he is a man."

The Bible attributes great significance to dreams. It tells thirty-six dreams and also their interpretations. Was Old Testament Joseph basically a shepherd who dreamed of being a ruler or had he the character and talents of a ruler and only dreamed while awake that he was a shepherd? Had Nebuchadnezzar been a king who dreamed at night that he was a beast or was he essentially a wild beast who fancied during daytime he was worthy of kingly honor?

Who wishes to know himself and others should be attentive to his dreams. If New Testament Joseph would have despised dreams as a source of knowledge, he would not have covered the unusual pregnancy the Virgin Mary. She would have been stoned under the suspicion of being an unfaithful bride.

Have paper and pen beside you when you go to bed. Date and record the dreams you have. You will find that things which you considered as incredible in the Bible are daily occurrences in your dreams. Practice will make you understand your dreams. The Talmud says, "Dreams which are not interpreted are like letters which have not been opened."

May 6
|
"Does the hawk fly by thy wisdom?" (JOB 39:26)

In wild Alaska, where beavers have not seen men before and don't fear them, you can watch for hours as they fell trees with their sharp teeth and then transport the branches on artificial canals created by them to the sea where their humid castles emerge from the waters. What they accomplish is a miracle. No atheist could explain how it is that beavers, supposedly the result of an evolution at random, can regulate the level of water in artificial lakes made by them at the exact height necessary for them.

They have dams which open and close according to the changing affluence of waters exactly like it happens in man-made dams. So the level of the water remains equal the entire year. How do the beavers calculate their actions? To create canals and dams like those of the beavers. we would need a staff of first-class engineers. What is a recent discovery in human technique to give to dams a slight curl toward the front in order to distribute equally the pressure of the water on the waft - is a secret which the beavers have known for thousands of years. Where waters run quickly they give to the dams a concave curl which dislocates the pressure of the water from the center to the shore.

It takes an intelligent Being to create intelligence. If the world of men does not make you believe in God, believe in the One who made the beavers and the ants.

May 7
|
"Ye are manifestly declared to be the epistle of Christ."
(2CO 3:3)

One of the proofs of God's existence is the existence of good men. An atheist thinker said that the universe is a gigantic accident consequent upon an infinite succession of happy flukes.

Suppose that chance could have brought forth a material universe. No reasonable being will accept the fact that goodness, noble character, self-sacrifice, forgiveness, generosity are the result of an accidental coming together of elementary particles. Throw symbols of notes into the air: they will not fall as Beethoven's ~Ninth Symphony~.

Why would anyone enter the most difficult of fights - how to become a good human being if he was an accidental aggregate of molecules which will be decomposed tomorrow and of whom no remembrance will remain? Some are good because we are designed as good and these have realized their calling.

Become good yourself, after the model of the divine

Master, and your own life will become a proof of God's existence.

May 8
|
"God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." (JHN 3:16)

This verse is the heart of the Bible. It contains its main message. Every word in it is grand:

"God" - He is the grandest source of everything good;
"so loved" - it is love at its highest peak;
"the world" - it is the widest object which love can have;
"he gave" - giving is the best expression of love;
"his only begotten son" – the grandest gift which could be made;
"whosoever" - it is the greatest number which can be comprehended;
"believes" - the simplest condition possible;
"in him" – the One most trustworthy, faith in whom presents no problem;
"should not perish" - it is delivery from the worst fate;
"but" - the greatest alternative to perishing;
"have" – the greatest assurance – it is a possession not a hope;
"everlasting life" – life of which there can be no longer and no better.

When my son was six years old I asked him if he did not find this verse to be wonderful. He said, "Not at all. I find it normal. For a rich man it is normal to give much and for a God it is not wonderful, but the normal to give no less than His Son and no other life than the everlasting one."

May 9
|
"The King eternal, immortal, invisible." (1TM 1:17)

Why is God unseen? For the same reason that a snowflake that has fallen on a white blanket would be unseen. God is very good. "... everything that he has made ... was very good" (GEN 1:31). How can you distinguish very good from very good? There is not the slightest bit of goodness in Him which He would not have communicated to His creatures.

He does not stand before a mirror, like the wicked queen in Snow White, the fairy tale, to ask, "Mirror, mirror on the wall, who is fairest of us all?" He cannot be the fairest; no superlative can be attributed to Him, because there exists no fairness of His which He would not have shared with the singing birds, the brooks, the majestic mountain peaks, with children.

How much effort does it take for a girl to fall in love with a fair prince? None. So every striving to love God wholeheartedly is false. You cannot help loving Him. The angels told a prophet, "The whole earth is full of his glory" (ISA 6:3), of no less glory than He has on His throne.

"Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God" (MTT 5:8). God is seen in all things and in all events. What makes Him seem unseen is our impurity. Be washed in the blood of Christ, receive the Holy Spirit, and you will behold with open face, though as in a glass, the glory of the Lord, yea, you will be changed into the same image (2CO 3:18).

May 10
|
"We ... rejoice in hope." (ROM 5:2)

The most unfounded hope is much more founded than the most founded despair. I know it from my own experience.

I was sentenced to twenty-five years of hard labor. I had been deathly sick in prison, and doctors had abandoned any hope that I would recover. Under those circumstances I had a completely unfounded hope of ever leading a world-wide mission, having as its purpose the helping of persecuted Christians in Communist countries. Despair and suicide would have been logically justified. There seemed no hope that I would see my son again. Now I have my grandchild on my lap.

Never give up hope. The Talmud says that if a man is sentenced to death, has his head on the block, the executioner has already lifted his axe, and he thinks, "Now I am lost," he is unfaithful. The axe can fall from the executioner's hand. It happened like this with the Romanian King Michael the Brave.

Euthanasia is false. Men doomed by all the doctors of the world can live. Hope for your business, for your children. Hope for your character even though, in spite of thousands of endeavors, it has not improved yet. We have as our hope a God who hung "the earth upon nothing" (JOB 26:7). A hope which He gives holds good even without any foundation.

May 11
|
"I am the LORD thy God, which have brought thee out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage." (EXO 20:2)

Some Christians think that we should not care about politics.

Did Livingstone know the gospel? When he came to Africa, slave trade was going on. Should Livingstone have allowed the slaves to remain slaves? He had read in the Bible how God freed slaves. He could not remain unmoved when he saw the gangs of innocents, chained by the wrists to a long chain, being beaten with whips, exactly as it happens at the transport of prisoners in many countries today.

These terrible things made Dr. Livingstone burn with anger. Many Christians today have lost the virtue of becoming angry against slavery. Some never do get angry, except against those who fight slavery.

Livingstone never forgot to beg the British people to put down the terrible trade in human flesh and blood. He succeeded. Slavery was abolished in the British empire. Today Livingstone's body lies in Westminster Abbey.

The Jewish ark of the covenant was not only a ritual object, but also an ensign of battle. When the Jews, former slaves, passed the Jordan to fight for a land of their own in which they should be free, the ark was borne by the Levites as a flag would be borne now. It was a symbol of the fight for liberty.

Christians are fighters not only for personal righteousness, but also for righteousness in social relations.

May 12
|
"We which have believed do enter into rest." (HEB 4:3)

Men have not been created to be torturers and murderers. To be criminal is unnatural. Therefore the criminals are terribly tormented themselves. Only a tormented man torments others.

In the "White Book About the Trial Siniavski-Daniel," we find the description of how Lenin used to leave his room and go into the yard at two o'clock in the morning. Standing in the snow, he would howl at the moon. He did it every night. He howled a little bit, listened if everything was quiet, then he would howl again, until he began to freeze. Then he would re-enter his room to make plans for the future destiny of Russia.

The story has been told by Lenin's own bodyguard.

Not every man is a tormentor on such a large scale as Lenin or Hitler were, but many have the "stuff" of a Bolshevik. We torment our marriage partners, our parents, our friends, our employees. We are brutal, sadistic.

We find our joy in tormenting others, but in reality we are tormented ourselves. Only a troubled man is a troublemaker.

You could free others from your wickedness and you could be free yourself if you would only listen to Jesus' gracious invitation, "Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest" (MTT 11:28).

May 13
|
"Thou shalt not kill." (EXO 20:13)

In prisons you may hear thieves condemning murderers harshly. They say, "We can repent and make restitution for what we have stolen. Even if we don't, our victim can earn other money. But you cannot give back the life you have taken from a man. You are criminals."

