They have a point. Every sin destroys the relationship between man and man. It also renders man more and more insensitive to the appeal of God. But killing is an irresponsible sin. If you impoverish a man or destroy his good fame, not everything is lost. The victim still has the chance to attain a good position again. However, murder is definitive. It brings a man before his judge and, if he is unprepared for this, to eternal hell. It is a sin apart, this "sin unto death."

Therefore clergymen who condone violence and propagate revolutions are wrong. Governments which lead their countries into war, when it could be avoided, are also wrong; as are also all bloody rioters. Why should revolutions be needed?

V. Tarsis, the Soviet writer, tells in his book, ~Message From an Asylum~, the story of a man who was considered to be crazy by the Communists. This man said: "I began to read the Bible daily. I must confess it is the most dangerous and seducing book. I don't wonder that the comrades observed it and forbade its distribution. Because, if you have read the wise words of the Bible, you can only roar with laughter about revolutions."

When you can have perfect peace of heart and joy even while being oppressed and poor; when you are sure of an eternal, beautiful life in paradise, it will not pass through your mind to spill blood in order to change the social order in this transitory world.

Christians do not participate in these things. They remember God's words, "Thou shalt not kill."

"The ruler of the feast ... saith unto [the bridegroom], Every man at the beginning doth set forth good wine; and when men have well drunk, then that which is worse; but thou hast kept the good wine until now." (JHN 2:9,10)

The devil sometimes gives good things first: beautiful promises selfish pleasures. After much of life has been drunk, a worse wine follows these: a wrecked life, remorse, spiritual blindness, and, in the end, the worst - eternal damnation.

Love knows that the best things are yet to come. It already has the joy of obeying God's commands, fellowship with Christ, with His holy angels and the great communion of saints. This joy, for the present, is mingled with the bitterness of the cross. Now it is a glory in tribulation, distress, persecution, and nakedness, in that amidst tears and shedding of blood, the bride of Christ never ceases to hope. She knows her bridegroom has stored up in His banqueting house the best of wines for the age to come. She is not in a hurry as those who believe they have only this short life. Love does not hasten to obtain results. She can bear with transitory failures, sufferings, and defeats. The last victory is hers.

Not daunted by conflicts, but positively inspired by them, Christians go ahead. Our adversaries don't know the unspeakable joys reserved by Christ for those who are on His side when He is in pain. We love and believe that love will win.

The church of Christ is not endangered by the sinful world. Even the gates of hell cannot prevail against her. It is the sinful world which is rather endangered by the existence of the church, because the last victory is ours.

"Put on the new man, which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness." (EPH 4:24)

Ordinarily, men confuse holiness with goodness, though these are different virtues. "God saw everything that he had made, and, behold, it was very good" (GEN 1:31). After this "very good" followed something entirely different.

"God blessed the seventh day and sanctified it" (GEN 2:3). Sanctification belongs to another sphere than goodness.

A man can be very good, without being holy or put aside for God. There are extreme cases when men are holy without being good. Where is the goodness of Gideon, Jael, Joshua? They were fighters for the triumph of the chosen people. By this they were holy. Those who have read the lives of Athanasius, Luther, and Calvin, see little trace of goodness in them. These men fought ruthlessly for a truth entrusted to them, hitting their adversaries relentlessly. The truth must be victorious.

We become holy by feeding upon the right spiritual food.

In an experiment it was found that worms which usually live in the darkness can be conditioned to leave this habitat and to prefer the light. As often as they would withdraw into darkness, they would get electric shocks, whereas if they came out in the light, they found abundant food. With time, these beings "put on a new worm," to use the biblical expression. Contrary to the habits of their species, from that time on they preferred the light to darkness. Then these worms were cut into small pieces and added in the food given to other worms and, lo, these worms also changed their habits. They had increased, with the addition of the flesh of the new breed of worms, their ribonuclear acid, the depository of memory. They would shun darkness and prefer light just as the beings upon which they had fed. Similar experiments have also been made with other animals.

If you wish to put on the new man, a man of righteousness and holiness, feed upon Christ. He has become flesh in order that He might become your daily food.

"And the LORD God prepared a gourd, and made it to come up over Jonah, that it might be a shadow over his head ... So Jonah was exceeding glad of the gourd." (JON 4:6)

In the Bible the shadow is an image of the transitory. "Our days upon earth are a shadow," says Bildad (JOB 8:9). "[Man] fleeth as a shadow, and continueth not," says Job himself (JOB 14:2). "Man [spends] all the days of his vain life ... as a shadow," says Solomon (ECC 6:12). He had inherited this thought from his father David. "Our days on the earth are as a shadow, and there is none abiding" (1CH 29:15).

Even prophets like Jonah are sometimes "exceedingly glad" in what is transitory.

Jonah first made himself a booth so he could sit under its shadow, forgetting that whatever a man constructs is transitory. A vehement wind overthrew the booth the next day. There is nothing we construct for ourselves which will not be destroyed. Nothing lasts forever. Not even civilizations. Neither will we last here.

Then, Jonah was glad because of the shadow given by a tree but the next day a worm smote the tree. Every tree will die someday. The worm which has eaten it dies. So too the prophet who sat under the tree's shadow. Nineveh to whom he preached would also pass away, although it repented in Jonah's day. Believers die as do unbelievers. There is no sense being glad because of a shadow. Tomorrow you may wish to die because you lost this joy. However, the despair will not last either. It is transitory like every sentiment. Then the earth on which the trees grew, on which men were sometimes glad and sometimes angry will also burn.

Only God is everlasting who says "Should not I spare?" (JON 4:11). He will not spare Nineveh forever. He spares no one forever on this earth. Lazarus, like the others whom Jesus resurrected, had to die again later. Only God remains forever. His word "Shall I not spare?" remains. Shall I not spare in eternity the soul which has trusted in Me?

"Neither did we eat any man's bread for nought; but wrought with labour and travail night and day ..." (2TH 3:8)

Paul's main subject in his epistles was the One whose countenance is like a thousand suns, releasing their splendor, whose eyes are pure and whose whole being is snowy as white jade.

Christ is his main subject, but not the only subject. Sometimes He writes about himself and His co-workers, as in the verse quoted above.

For us, too, the main preoccupation is the One whose virtues resemble the boundless great ocean and in whom infinitely wonderful jewels are amassed. When you know Him, thought expires in enjoyment.

Notwithstanding, we cannot avoid speaking about pastors. Remind your pastor that for those who live of the gospel it is demanded that:

1) They don't eat the bread of their fellow believers for nothing. A medical doctor can report at the end of the year how many patients he has treated, how many he has cured. A shoemaker can report how many pairs of shoes he has made. A pastor must be able to report about his work of spreading the gospel and about the efficiency of his work.

2) They labor day and night. The day alone is not enough. "Blessed is the man who ... [in the Lord's law] meditates day and night" (PSA 1:2). The fruits come when you continue to work during the night.

Christians must be pastors to their pastors.

"He was bruised for our iniquities." (ISA 53:5)

In a country where persecution reigns, a police officer came to arrest a pastor. He asked the latter, "Do you consider me a monster, like everyone else does?"

The pastor answered, "Monster? No, but an unhappy man who believes that no one loves him. God loves you, yea, even in a special manner. It is for evil men that He became man. He did not come on earth because we were nice like altar boys, but because we were dirty. The dirtier we are, the more right we have to His pity."

The officer defended himself, "I am not as bad as that. I am not a thief."

"You are," answered the pastor. "You have stolen from God."

"What?"

"You have robbed Him of your sins. Our sins belong to Him. They are His property. He came to be born as Son of man to take them. All the dirt of our evil deeds are His, not yours. You are a thief, a robber, if you refuse to give them to Him, to the Lamb of God who takes away the sins of the world, who has the right to take them away because they are His property and no one else's. You keep what belongs to someone else."

On that night the pastor remained unimprisoned. The police officer confessed to him his sins. Are you a thief? Do you declare as yours the sins you have committed, though by right they belong to Jesus?

"At midnight there was a cry made, Behold, the bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet him." (MTT 25:6)

The earth turns around on its axis. Midnight is the moment when a part of the earth is the farthest from the sun. Spiritual midnight is the period of the greatest departure of men from God. We are approaching this midnight and its terrific events.

But midnight is not received with the same feelings by the children of God as by the world. At midnight, the firstborn of the Egyptians died, but the chosen people got their freedom.

The Lord has said, "The night cometh, when no man can work" (JHN 9:4). But when a thing is declared impossible in the Bible, this does not refer to the faithful. About them, Jesus declared, "all things are possible to him that believeth" (MRK 9:23).

The holy people can work even at midnight. It was at midnight that Samson took the gates of the city of Gaza (JDG 16:3). At midnight, Ruth received from Boaz the promise, "I will do to thee all that thou requirest" (RUT 3:11). At midnight, Paul and Silas won the jailer of Philippi for the Lord (ACT 16:25).

At midnight, the people of God do their greatest exploits. Therefore, the psalmist says, "At midnight I will rise to give thanks unto thee" (PSA 119:62).

We are not afraid of the darkness in the world. We work. The bridegroom comes soon. We should not meet Him empty-handed.

"Behold, ye despisers, and wonder, and perish...." (ACT 13:41)

Paul quotes here HAB 1:5, adding to the latter's prophecy, by his authority as an apostle, the word "perish," a word of curse addressed to the adversaries of the gospel. The Lord had already pronounced a doom over Jerusalem. He had cursed the fig tree and it withered. Here Paul warns the Jewish state that it will perish - and so it did soon after. It was only recently that God showed again His pity, gathering in a new Jewish state the scattered sheep of Israel.

It sounds unusual for us that an apostle could say to adversaries, "perish." We know that God is love. This He is, but nowhere does the Bible say that He is only love. You cannot exhaust the description of God by one word, "love." You could describe no man by one word. I am a Christian, but I am also male, tall, a pastor, a sinner, a father, and so on. So, love is only one of the attributes of God. There exists also a righteousness, a wrath, a terror of the Lord. These are as clearly expressed in the Bible as His love.

Paul, after having written the hymn of love in 1 Corinthians 13, writes in the same epistle (1CO 16:22), "If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be [cursed]."

Christians have the power to loose and to bind, to bless and to curse. They love their adversaries as individuals and do their best to bring them to salvation, but to the institutions which persecute them, they say prophetically, "perish," and perish they will.

Remember Genghis Khan and his powerful Tartars. In the thirteenth century, without jet planes or atomic weapons, they swept from China to the middle of Europe. It took him half the time it took the Soviets to conquer this territory. But Genghis Khan passed away. We don't fear the stockpiles of bombs which enemies of the gospel have manufactured. Remember Suleiman the Magnificent and his tremendous Turks. Christians prayed and pronounced the word of doom - "perish." The enemy perished.

Spiritual weapons are powerful. They are deadly. One word of Peter dealt death to Ananias and Sapphira, the unfaithful Christians.

"Do justice." (ISA 56:1)

A. Krasnov-Levitin, a Hebrew Christian writer who has been in Soviet prisons for ten years, described a discussion he had with a Christian pacifist. Levitin asked him, "If a bandit attacks your family, why not wrest the axe out of his hand and hit him on the head?"

The pacifist answered, "This is forbidden by the Holy Scriptures. Jesus taught to turn the other cheek if anyone smites you." Levitin replied, "But Jesus never taught to allow your children to be killed by bandits."

He explained further. "What is sensible when only you are attacked becomes foolish when other persons are involved. A man who looks on quietly while another man without defense is beaten, and does not intervene in his favor, is a coward and selfish. This cannot be justified by the doctrine of nonresistance. A man who is silent when falsehood triumphs, is also a coward and selfish.... Mildness, forgetting about insults addressed to your person, are needed to concentrate the will of man toward fighting against injustice, lies, and evil in which the world lives."

The words, "Blessed are those who hunger and thirst after righteousness," Levitin explains as a blessedness not only for those who try to make righteousness triumph in the world. Jude writes about the "common salvation." Every saved man fights to make salvation common, to make Christ's principles rule the world.

All real Christians are fighters against injustice and cruelty. Therefore they are persecuted. Don't be satisfied with personal salvation. Save others also.

"Charity ... doth not behave itself unseemly." (1CO 13:5)

These words usually are understood in the sense that a Christian does not behave impolitely. But Paul himself was sometimes terribly impolite. So was the Lord. So were the reformers and their opponents. Where the fate of the church and of the world are at stake, politeness can do much harm.

The Greek word translated by "unseemly" is ~aschemon~. A literal translation would be "charity does not behave without a scheme."

Christ categorizes men as does a zoologist; He frames them in a system, in a scheme. Some men are "sheep," others "wolves," others "dogs," others "foxes." Some He calls fools, hypocrites, and vipers. Others are beloved disciples. He knows about a beast, a Red dragon, and a chosen dove. Love does not behave unseemly, that is without having this scheme in view.

All men must be loved, but I cannot behave toward the "sheep-type" as toward the "wolf-type." I cannot behave with hypocrites as with beloved disciples, with tyrants as with victims. Woe to the shepherd who would not make a difference and would behave the same toward his sheep, his dogs, and toward wolves. Charity does not behave the same toward a good and a bad husband, an obedient and a disobedient child. The attitude of charity depends upon the situation.

Suppose some gangsters attacked an innocent man; I might love them all, but I would try to protect the innocent man, shooting if necessary at the gangsters. Otherwise I would behave unseemly or ~aschemon~, not taking in account the fact that in the scheme of the world they occupy different positions. The same holds true in our attitude toward those who benefit the church and those who harm it, those who defend their country and those who attack it.

Love does not behave unseemly. It has a diversified love according to the place which every man occupies in the scheme.

"Let be, let us see...." (MTT 27:49)

There exists an invincible indifference, insensitivity, and apathy toward suffering.

There was a multitude on Golgotha who attended the crucifixion of men, who actually heard their cries when nails were hammered into their hands and feet. They must have known that at least one of the three crucified on that Good Friday was the best of men. Otherwise He would not have prayed for His torturers. Otherwise He would not have cared to bring a robber to God, while passing Himself through unspeakable physical suffering. Now this Jesus cried, as in despair, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?"

And what was the reaction of the multitude? They said to each other, "Let be, let us see...." It did not enter their minds to alleviate His suffering by at least giving Him a little bit of water or a word of compassion. "Let be, let us see whether Elias will come to save him."

Elias is not only the proper name of a prophet of old. It is in Hebrew a short sentence which means "Jehovah is my God." In this sense everyone can be an Elias. In this sense the Lord said that John the Baptist was Elias. Each of us must have Jehovah as his or her God. If the compassionate God Jehovah is master of our lives, we will never remain passive when we see innocent suffering.

Those who are in reality without God have the attitude, "Let be, let us see." Men of this type were attending the crucifixion on Golgotha and were not moved by it. Such men will not be moved by the message of today's sufferings. They are damned. They do not care if the little brethren of Jesus are hungry or in jail. We leave these men to the judgment of God.

There is much inertia and apathy to be overcome even in God's elect. Don't remain passive wherever there is a need; if you can, help.

"He is kind unto the unthankful and to the evil." (LUK 6:35)

One of the greatest beauties of the Bible is the fact that two verses do not exist in it. First of all, there exists in the Bible no verse in which Jesus asks anyone: "What sins did you commit? How many? Under what circumstances? With whom? Tell me if your sins were venial, small offenses, or huge crimes." Rather, the Bible tells us Jesus went from person to person saying, "Be of good cheer, son; be of good cheer, daughter; your sins are forgiven" - without inquiring what these sins had been. Neither does He ask you about your past.

Second, there is not one instance in the Bible in which someone apologized to Jesus or asked forgiveness. After the Last Supper, all apostles except John had fled; Peter had denied Him. When they met the resurrected Lord, it would have been nice if they had said, "We are sorry." They did not. This was because whoever looks into the face of Jesus sees on it so much understanding and love he can be sure beforehand that "he forgives everything." Christ wishes to save me much more than I wish to be saved. He wishes me to be in heaven much more than I wish to go there. A man must run fast to run away from God, who is after him with His blessings.

Rely on these two verses which are not in the Bible. Believe that He does not hold your sins against you and that His utmost desire is to forgive you.

"Ye are ... a peculiar people." (1PE 2:9)

King Lear said, "When we are born, we cry that we are come to this great stage of fools." He was right. He has been a fool himself entrusting prematurely all he had to children. He should have known that they were shaped in iniquity and conceived in sin (PSA 51:5).

This is a world of fools. It spoke evil of the Best. It called Him a devil. Hamlet was right: "Be thou as chaste as ice, as pure as snow, thou shalt not escape calumny." Othello called pure Desdemona a whore. "A beggar in his drink could not have laid such terms upon his callet."

Juliet was foolish. She had all the right to be enamored at the age of fourteen. Only she did not love wisely. She told Romeo, "Thy gracious self is the god of my idolatry." It is foolish to make an idol of the object of your love. Would she have lived one year more, she might have changed her idol.

Hamlet said to Ophelia, "Marry a fool, for wise men know well enough what monsters you make of them." How many men are wise and beware?

Iago said about Cassius, "If I can fasten but one cup upon him, he'll be as full of quarrel and offense as my young mistress' dog." Liquor producers succeed in fastening upon us many cups. The world is drunk.

How well that Jesus told us not to belong to this world. We are in it only as strangers and pilgrims. We don't partake in its foolishness.

"If there be any virtue, and if there be any praise, think on these things." (PHP 4:8)

While Cleopas and a friend journeyed toward a village called Emmaus, Jesus joined them. But He had changed. They could not recognize Him. Cleopas asked Jesus: "Art thou only a stranger in Jerusalem, and hast not known the things which are come to pass there in these days? And he said unto them, What things?" (LUK 24:18,19).

Jesus showed interest. So many things had happened in Jerusalem in the last days. Two robbers had been crucified. Would one of His disciples have gone to comfort their grief-stricken mothers? Would one have cared to ask Pilate for the corpses of these thieves so they would not be left on the crosses to be devoured by ravens? One of these thieves had become a brother in the faith. His disciples would at least have assured him a decent burial. And what about His executioners? They had shown wickedness. They needed salvation. Would one of Jesus' disciples have loved them and shown them the way to receive forgiveness?

Three days had passed. How many things had happened in Jerusalem in that time? Homes might have broken up, men might have been injured; there had been bereavements. Some would have committed crimes. Some might have composed new hymns to the praise of Jehovah. Mothers would have cared for children. Others would have seen that their fellow men had bread. Many things happen in three days. "What things?" asks Jesus. He is interested in human life in all its aspects, virtues and sins, joys and sorrows. He wishes to share everything with us.

The disciples, while speaking about "things" which come to pass in Jerusalem, really were obsessed with only one thing: with what had happened to Jesus, the Person they loved.

Many Christians are obsessed only with their own personal relationship with the ascended Lord, who can give them peace here and in paradise hereafter. But Christ is the life, the life around them. It is He whom you can see in His brethren, in hungry, thirsty, naked, sick, and enslaved humanity. You meet Him as often as you meet a child of God.

"Some doubted." (MTT 28:17)

Doubt has a positive value. Where would science have been if Copernicus had not doubted the generally accepted theory that the earth was the center of the universe; or if Einstein had not doubted the absolute value of Euclid's geometry and of Newton's celestial mechanic? Where would religion be if Abraham had not doubted the polytheistic religion he inherited from his ancestors

- or if the apostles had not doubted the judgment pronounced by the chief priests of their nation that Jesus was a blasphemer?

Doubt is legitimate and necessary. There is more wisdom in honest doubt than in some apparent certainties. Many religious people who seem so cocksure of their place in heaven will be lost. Some preachers will even say to the Lord when He returns, "Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy name? and in thy name have cast out devils? and in thy name done many wonderful works?" And Jesus will reply, "I never knew you: depart from me, ye that work iniquity" (MTT 7:22,23).

Instead of insisting that you know God, when you only have Him in your imagination, you should be a seeker. Seekers of God are safe. Augustine, the great teacher of Christianity, wrote: "I would not seek you, if I had not found you already in the depth of my heart." Honest doubt is nothing else than a search for truth. But then it is an agony of the spirit. "As the hart panteth after the water brooks, so panteth my soul after thee, O God" (PSA 42:1). The hart does not pant after sermons and books about water. It is, not interested in conversations about thirst-quenching. The highest notions, the most poetic phrases about the coolness and beauty of water do not satisfy a thirsty man; neither do exact analyses of water's chemical composition. He wishes the water itself.

So is the seeker of God. People weep rivers of tears because they have lost riches or a child. How many have ever met a teardrop because they could not find God? How many can really say from their hearts the words of the psalmist: "My soul thirsteth for God, for the living God ... My tears have been my meat day and night ..." (PSA 42:2,3)?

"Be strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might." (EPH 6:10)

In the USA at least ten percent of the children in elementary schools suffer from dyslexia, a perceptual disorder which blocks their ability to read, spell, or write legibly. The percentage must be approximately the same in other civilized countries. Eighty percent of the prison population of the USA is affected with dyslexia, a state of mind, sometimes inherited, which makes you scramble letters and numbers. A ceiling can be confused with a floor, the word "hostile" with "hospitable." "A" may change to "D"; a number series such as 1-2-3 may come out as 2-1-3. The rage and frustration that results from continued academic failure often is expressed in delinquent and antisocial behavior.

But it must not always be so. Nelson Rockefeller, former vice-president of the United States, said that he also has had this trouble all his life. "I've got reverse reading. I see numbers backwards. I even think of them backwards - that's the worst." He has never mastered spelling, but he overcame his handicap by simply learning to cope with it. Edison was dyslexic, which did not hinder him from becoming a great inventor. General Patton could not read print by the age of twelve. President Wilson also suffered from dyslexia. The same with Albert Einstein, the physicist whose name the universe admires.

Children should be nurtured with two important medicines: the vitamins M and R, lacking often in the nutrition of children today. They stand for morality and religion. Children should be taught that they have a moral duty not to be failures; to achieve something useful in life. They should be taught secondly that there is One who helps to overcome this handicap and others.

You, too, can overcome your handicaps.

"Thou has made [man] a little lower than the angels." (PSA 8:5)

Sigmund Freud, the founder of psychoanalysis, used to boast that he had "completed the uncrowning of man."

Man had been considered to be the crown of God's creation. Then Copernicus showed that man's habitation, the earth, was not the center of the universe as believed until then. Our sun is but one of billions of stars, most of them much larger than ours. Copernicus was a believing Christian and remained so after his discovery; but others drew the conclusion that by reducing the importance of the earth in the universe, man had lost the right to consider himself as a being of special value. Darwin is said to have shown that even on earth man is not something unique and cannot be considered the result of God's design to have a friend, a being with whom to communicate. Man, according to Darwin's hypothesis, is only one of the results of chance evolution, just as gorillas and chimpanzees are. This was a second blow to the superiority of man.

If we really are the product of chance, only matter and not spirit, mere animals, gluttons, and sexists - whence then arises the resistance to these theories? Do apes and bulls resent being considered such? Do little ants resent that they are not considered elephants? Whence man's self-assertion, his idea that he is God's beloved creature superior to and different from all animals? Whence the voice of conscience and the reaching after spiritual peaks?

"God created man in his own image" (GEN 1:27). Nothing similar is said about any creature in the universe. "[God has] crowned him with glory and honour" (PSA 8:5). Man is the crown of creation. When God wished to become incarnate, He became man on our earth. Unto men a child was born; unto men a son was given, and among his names were: Eternal God and The Everlasting Father (ISA 9:6).

Believe in your unique and great calling and fulfill it. Let God's image be seen in you. Let your light so shine that men will glorify the Father.

"Behold, there come seven years of great plenty throughout all the land of Egypt." (GEN 41:29)

Why this exceptional blessing over Egypt? Why should it have great plenty and be warned of famine in meager years to follow? There are three reasons for this which are also the secrets of any successful Christian work:

1. The Pharaoh of that time was every inch a king. He acted as a king not only when awake. His subconscious was also filled with concern for the welfare of his people and he would dream about it at night.

Every Christian is a king. Luther said, "A Christian is a perfectly free lord of all, subject to none." But a Christian is a loving king. Therefore, Luther adds, "A Christian is a dutiful servant of all, subject to all."

A Christian does not ~strive~ to be a soul-winner; it is no imposition to him to place the well-being of the church first. His Christian belief has pervaded his subconscious. He simply ~is~ a soul-winner, a man who puts God's kingdom first.

2. Pharaoh, the dreamer of good, meets another dreamer of dreams, Joseph, and is united with him. Do the same.

3. Pharaoh was completely unprejudiced. He was advised to call to his court a foreigner with another color of skin, a man with what must have seemed to Pharaoh a strange religion, a man who worshiped only one unseen God, a prisoner with a bad reputation. The charge for which he had been jailed was assault on a woman with the intent to commit rape.

But to Pharaoh, every man was first of all a man. Every man could be used for the welfare of the country. Men who committed bad deeds yesterday could become good men this morning. And besides, who knew if the charges against Joseph were true? Slaveholders like Potiphar often jailed their slaves without a fair trial.

The fulfilling of these conditions gave Egypt great plenty and provision for themselves and their neighbors in times of famine. These qualities will make you a winner also.

"All is vanity." (ECC 1:2)

When Corinth was besieged by Philip of Macedonia, everyone was involved in the defense of the city. Some repaired the walls; others threw spears and shot arrows. Diogenes, the philosopher, became active too. He rolled his barrel to and fro on a street. Asked why, he replied, "Well, I don't want to be the only lazy one among so many who work."

"But the others do something useful for the city, which is not your case" he was told.

Solemnly, Diogenes continued to roll the barrel. He considered the work of others as useless as his own. Corinth and the Macedonian empire would pass away, regardless of who won this particular battle. The soldiers of both sides would soon die, the victors as well as the vanquished. After a few centuries, who would care about the details of the battle? Is there anyone today who remembers the names of those combatants? The citizens of the city were busy with things which, in the perspective of eternity, will prove to have been as much vanity as the rolling of the barrel.

In this world, where everything passes away, there is one thing that stands: it is what Christ the eternal One did for us on Golgotha. Other works ultimately will be of no avail. The cross of Christ saves sinners, imparting to them the eternity which the Son of God possesses.

Concerning the cross of Christ, John Chrysostom said: "It is the will of the Father, the honor of the Son, the joy of the Spirit, the jewel of angels, the assurance of the faithful, the glory of Paul."

Don't scorn those who spend their time in amusements, when the earnest labor you take pride in will bring no better results for eternity. Serve Christ, the crucified and resurrected. This is the only work that is not vanity.

"The wise men, the astrologers, have been brought in before me, that they should read this writing, and make known unto me the interpretation thereof: but they could not show the interpretation of the things." (DAN 5:15)

While King Belshazzar of Babylon feasted merrily with his lords and women, a message in Aramaic appeared on the wall. Frightened and sobered, he summoned his counselors to declare the meaning of this unusual occurrence. However, none of them could interpret what had been written. Then he called Daniel and complained to him that his counselors did not know Aramaic.

The language was spoken by the Jews. These captives from Israel had become an important national minority in Babylon, contributing to the empire a prime minister and many other political leaders. But none of the wise men of Babylon had bothered to learn the language, religion, or mentality of the Jews. The enemies of Babylon, the Medes and Persians, were secretly entering the city while the king and his lords entertained themselves. That very night King Belshazzar was slain, and his great empire fell into other hands. His "wise" men lacked wisdom. Not knowing the imminence of the danger, they could not warn the king.

We see the tragic ignorance of these ancient counselors duplicated today. Modern wise men - many who are leaders in the universal church - are clever enough to secure for themselves high positions and the benefits and fame which go with eminence. But they lack an understanding of the people whom they are meant to lead to Christ: nor do they recognize the destructive forces which threaten the church. Today's "wise" men, the spiritual leaders, seem unaware of the grave danger that aggressive Islam, communism, and widespread secularism present to Christianity. The warning to King Belshazzar had been written by a hand on the wall. The warning to the free world is written in blood, and still our wise men cannot read it.

"And all the brethren which are with me." (GAL 1:2)

Paul had decided to write an instructive letter to the church in Galatia. What he wrote down was the eternal Word of God which would serve as edification of Christians to the end of the world. In such a case you don't write your own opinion. You unite with all your brethren. There exists a faith for all which was once delivered to the saints: the faith held by all brethren always and everywhere. Only in communion with all the saints does one become able to deliver everlasting truth. Therefore, Paul wrote his letter to the Galatians in fellowship with "all the brethren" who were with him.

The One on whom Paul relied most was his brother, Jesus. In Him we trust.

Christ, our brother and Lord, has many holy angels. They, too, are our brethren.

Moreover, the glorified saints also are with us.

When Jesus spoke with Moses and Elijah on the Mount of Transfiguration, He asked His disciples not to tell anyone. No one, after meeting a man would say to someone, "You know, he had a nose." To have a nose is not unnatural. We are inclined to make much of the supernatural, but Jesus wished us to consider ourselves continually in communion with the saints who have passed on.

We are against spiritualism, the evoking of the dead; we do not wish to feel their nearness. But we believe that the saints who have gone on to be with the Lord are not far away.

The Bible says, "Seeing we also are compassed about with a great cloud of witnesses" (HEB 12:1). It is told in the biography of John Chrysostom, the greatest preacher Christianity has ever known, that when he wrote his sermons a Christian saw Paul and John standing near him whispering ideas in his ear. Those who have become as children can believe this story. These experiences are not spoken of often because much talk would show that we do not believe the miraculous to be the normal in the Christian life, that we do not believe the communion of saints is an everyday experience.

Let us write our letters "together with the brethren who are with us."

"There was a certain rich man, which had...." (LUK 16:1)

"A certain man had...." (LUK 15:11)

The Bible is God's revelation. Revelation is a word of Latin origin with two meanings. It discovers hidden things unknown before, but it also puts some things behind a veil.

From the beginning, the words of our Lord were conveyed to us in Greek, another language than that spoken by Jesus. We have His words in the veil of a translation, which can never convey the full sense of the original. Even the Hebrew of the Old Testament veils the thoughts of God, wrapping them in the poor language of men. The purpose of the Bible is to awaken in us a longing after the blessed state when there was no Creator apart from creation, when there was only God and we were one in Him - when there was no communication among men in words unfit to express the highest thoughts - as it will be again at the consummation of the ages.

Jesus spoke Aramaic, a dialect of the Hebrew language. Neither in Aramaic nor in Hebrew does the word "to have" exist. Jesus never pronounced this word. Jesus never said of anything that He "had" it. Therefore He could keep perfect joy when they undressed Him to be scourged. They took away from Him clothes, about which He had never said, "I have them." He had never said, "I have a body." The body which they tortured was not His. He owned nothing. Jesus had yielded His body to His Father as a living sacrifice before they killed Him.

He taught His first disciples to think in the same manner. "Neither said any of them that aught of the things which he possessed was his own" (ACT 4:32). Everything belongs to God and we are the stewards of His possessions. He is free to take away at any time the material riches, health, a beloved child, a good name, a friend, fame. These things are only entrusted to us. If they are taken away we lose nothing. They are not ours. This constitutes one of the joys of the Christian life. All Christians are "have-nots" and do not desire to be "haves." Those who have, worry about possible losses. This is not possible for us. Our life is one of full serenity.

"Thou art no more a servant, but a son; and if a son, then an heir of God." (GAL 4:7)

Since genes and DNA have been discovered, we know new things about heredity. We know what irresistible forces, working good or evil, are conveyed to us by heredity from our ancestors.

There is also a heredity of the spirit. God is truly our Father; heavenly Jerusalem is our mother. We inherit from God not only His kingdom, but also His character. The seed of God is in us (1JN 3:9).

The children of English-speaking people speak English; the children of Romanians speak Romanian. The children of God speak the words of God. Peter says in his first epistle (1PE 4:11), "If any man speak, let him speak as the oracles of God." If a man is an heir of God, his words or writings should normally also be oracles of God. If not, then he shouldn't speak or write.

We should all be able to say with Paul, "Ye received me a angel of God, even as Christ Jesus" (GAL 4:14). This is the no] manner to receive someone who speaks as the oracles of God.

A Swedish sister writes that when she completed the translation of a Christian book an angel appeared to her and thanked her. It may make some Christians smile. But I would not waste my time in Christianity if I did not believe at least the first page of the New Testament, where we are told that angels appear. You get the approval of Christians and angels when you speak as the oracles of God.

[Jesus said] "Teach all nations." (MTT 28:19)

If a man stood by a roadside and watched the whole population of China walk past him at the rate of one individual per second, more than twenty years would elapse before the last member of the procession would go by. The most strict Leninism rules these people. Lenin has written, "Everything is moral that is necessary for the annihilation of the old exploiting order." According to Lenin, religion belongs in this category and must be annihilated.

But there are Christians in China who do not fear death. It is the way to enter into the embrace of the heavenly Bridegroom and to receive the holy kiss. A remarkable report comes from the province of Hunan. A preacher was hanged by the Communists, but they left too quickly. The brethren were able to cut him down, and he is still alive. He says that when the rope was around his neck and he was being hauled up over the branch of a tree, all he could think of was our Lord being raised upon the cross.

Pray for the great people of China and for its believers. God loves the Chinese very much. He has made so many of them - 800 million.

"Do good to them which hate you." (LUK 6:27)

St. Patrick begins his "Confession" with the words, "I, Patrick, a sinner, the most uncouth and the least of all the faithful." In the fourth century, he, a Britisher, was taken as slave in a raid by the Irish. He had to herd sheep for them in hunger and nakedness. Their cruelty kindled in the young Christian lad a foolish love toward his slaveholders.

Eventually he succeeded in escaping. In England, and free, he had a dream. A man approached him with a letter and Patrick read, "The voice of the Irish." Then he heard many Irish voices crying, "We beseech you, holy youth, to come over and walk once more among us." For a runaway slave to be caught by his former slaveholder could mean death. But Patrick loved, so the danger did not count. He confessed to a cleric some gross sin he had committed. This made his sin publicly known, and the church would not send Patrick to Ireland. So he returned on his own and brought his former slaveholders to Christ.

Let us bring persecutors to the Savior. Think about the man who has wronged you the most and make it a point of honor to bring him to conversion.

"Enter into the closet." (MTT 6:6)

Teachers of philosophy have given to men unnatural advice Marcus Aurelius wrote: "People seek retreats in villages, on beaches, in the mountains.... This is vulgar, because, whenever you wish, you can withdraw into yourself. Nowhere does man find a more silent and calm retreat than in his soul." You surely can find inner quietness among the noise, but it takes a huge effort.

Why not follow the better example and teaching of the Master, who went into desert places or into the mountains to pray? And when this is not possible, why not assure yourself of quietness in a closet?

The noise of this technological age is part of a plot against spirituality. Radio and TV, among other things, make sure that you never have a bit of quiet. Lovers, friends, have forgotten the art of sitting or walking together in silence. A good 80 percent of the words spoken or written are useless.

The Hebrews, to whom God gave His first revelation, have no word for "word." Through them the Word of God was given, but you cannot say that in Hebrew. Instead of "word," they use ~davar~, which means "the real thing." Let us speak and listen to words only if they are not useless chatter, but realities.

In Hebrew the prologue to the Gospel of John says, "In the beginning was the real thing (davar), and the real thing was with God, and the real thing was God."

Instead of wasting our time in idle talk about things that don't really matter, let us pass much time in our closets in quiet communion with God.

"Verily I say unto you, That whosoever shall say unto this mountain, Be thou removed, and be thou cast into the sea, and shall not doubt in his heart, but shall believe that those things which he says shall come to pass; he shall have whatsoever he saith." (MRK 11:23)

Jesus said these words on the road between Jerusalem and Bethany. The terrain is flat. There is no mountain. When he said "this mountain," He could point toward nothing as being a hindrance on the way.

The mountains of difficulties and obstacles are all in our imagination. We have promises. "Nothing shall by any means hurt you" (LUK 10:19), and "All things work together for good to them that love God" (ROM 8:28). Things and events never touch our souls but remain outside their door. What troubles us are our opinions and our attitudes toward persons and events. Over these we have authority. These we can throw into the sea.

The circumstances in which the Lord said these words show that they don't apply to material mountains. How would the world look if each one of the millions of Jesus' disciples would move mountains to the right or to the left according to his or her pleasure? Every discipline would have a different opinion about where the mountain should be. Jesus speaks about spiritual realities when He teaches us how to remove mountains.

Let events come. Let persons act toward you as they will. Don't regard anything as a mountain in your way. Two and two make four. Fruits contain juice. Men sometimes behave badly. Events can be unpleasant. Yet all things will work together for my good. Difficulties on my way to heaven belong to the world of imagination. I can throw them off.

"Simon ... said ... Master, we have toiled all the night, and have taken nothing: nevertheless at thy word I will let down the net." (LUK 5:5)

William Chalmers Burns went out as a missionary to China in 1847. After seven years he wrote, "I do not know of a single soul brought to Christ through me." The Lord had made him pass through the school of perseverance.

In the Middle East one can still see fishermen throwing a net in a primitive manner, as it was done 2000 years ago. It was hard work. Would we have thrown our nets into the water again after a whole night of vain labor? Reason and the desire to rest pleaded against it; but there exists the magnificent word, "nevertheless." Simon Peter threw in the nets again and did not pause to rest even after miraculous but also tiring fishing. He and his comrades brought their ships to land and did not go to bed. "They ... followed him" (LUK 5:11).

The important thing we must remember is that we should remain at our place of labor in spite of unhappy experiences and unsatisfactory results.

Archbishop Fenelon wrote, "If one were not upheld by the spirit of faith to work on without seeing the fruit of one's labor, one would be disheartened, so little does one accomplish whether in winning others or in amending oneself."

I am president of a world-wide mission. I was brought to Christ by a carpenter, Woelfkes, who had prayed for years - without result that he might not die before bringing one Jew to Christ. God granted him two, my wife and myself. We brought to the Savior a few other Jews; and these, in turn won more. The result can be seen now in thriving Hebrew-Christian congregations in many towns of Israel. Many of the believers come from Woelfkes' homeland, Romania. Once when I told the story of my conversion in a Romanian village I noticed that a very old man in the audience was weeping. He told the end: "God used me to bring that carpenter to Christ. I thought that I had toiled all my life uselessly. I heard from you now that I am the grandfather in faith of many Jews." You also continue on your post, "nevertheless."

"Not I, but Christ liveth in me." (GAL 2:20)

The relationship between Jesus and a believing soul is unique and cannot be well explained in words, there being no real equivalent. In a transfusion, the blood of one man becomes another man's blood. If the latter man is injured and there is a shedding of blood immediately after the transfusion, not the blood of the donor is shed, but that of the recipient. It has become his. In a heart transplant, the heart is no longer that of a corpse, but that of a living man. So it is between Jesus and the believing soul. A transfusion, a transplantation, a change of personalities takes place.

Luther puts it like this: "The Father says to Christ, 'You become Peter who denies, Saul who persecutes, Judas who betrays, Magdalene who sins. Then the law sees Jesus full of all these offenses and tells him that he must die.' Jesus is the greatest murderer, thief, liar, adulterer mankind has ever known. Not in the sense that he committed these crimes, but that he appropriated them to himself." He has become my sinning personality. In exchange, He gives me His personality. In his commentary on the Epistle to the Galatians, Luther daringly says: "The Christian is Christ."

Luther stands here on biblical ground. The greatest teachers of Christianity have taught the same thing. Ignatius wrote, "Christ is our inseparable life." Thomas Aquinas said that Christ and the Christians are "quasi one mystical person." The Scottish Catechism (Craig's) teaches: "Christ is not another person from his people properly."

Jesus was delivered to be crucified. It is Jesus who continues to be delivered to be crucified today in the person of His disciples. All your sufferings are His.

"Lord, teach us to pray." (LUK 11:1)

St. Francis of Assisi prayed like this:
LORD!
Make me an instrument of thy peace;
Where there is hatred, let me sow love;
Where there is doubt, faith;
Where there is despair, hope;
Where there is darkness, light;
And where there is sadness, joy.

O Divine Master, grant that I may not so much seek to be consoled, as to console;

to be understood, as to understand; to be loved, as to love; for it is in giving that we receive, it is in pardoning that we are pardoned, and it is in dying that we are born to eternal life.

How is it that most of us don't act like this? It is because we have the "I." In English, all substantives and pronouns are written with small letters; only the "I" is written with a capital letter. Having an "I," much discomfort can happen to me, because of which I become unhappy and unloving. If you have no "I," what evil can come you?

Therefore the Lord says, "If any man will come after me, let him deny himself," e.g. let him deny the "I." I will be saved only there will be no more "I" to be saved.

"One thing is needful." (LUK 10:42)

The greatest complaint one hears is that people have no time. It is surely so because, like Martha, they are busy with too many things. You would never have heard Mary saying that she had no time. She needed only one thing: to listen to her Beloved and from time to time to do the one thing commanded by Him. He never commands us to do two things in the same moment. There is just one task for each moment of our lives. While fulfilling this one task, I have no other duty. Believers, therefore, always have time.

A new evangelist came into a village and astonished all by his powerful preaching. The news quickly spread, and the next Sunday the entire village gathered in church. He delivered exactly the same sermon. On the third Sunday, when people had come from neighboring villages, again he preached the same sermon. Also the fourth Sunday. The church elders said to each other, "This must be a crook who has learned just one sermon by heart."

"Don't you know how to deliver another sermon?" they asked.

"I have not yet seen you fulfilling what I taught you in the first sermon," he replied. "So why should I burden you with another one?"

Why must we read so many newspapers and listen to so much news, instead of responding to one tragedy near us by offering our help? Why must we read so many new books when we have not put into practice any of the good things already read? Why do I answer another telephone call, when I did not take time to be attentive, compassionate, and kind toward the man who called me first?

How little our Lord said and did! You could compile the essentials in the sixteen chapters of Mark. But every single act and word was pure, beaten gold. Examine your words and actions. You will find that most of them are not needed. Control them and you will have time and serenity. Examine your conscience every evening. Review the day, asking yourself step by step whether the things you did were necessary. Eliminate all useless thoughts and deeds.

"As many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God." (JHN 1:12)

Once when Napoleon was riding in a parade his horse went berserk. Seeing that the emperor was about to be thrown, a foot soldier, at the risk of his own life, grabbed the loose reins and through sheer strength stopped the wild horse and held it still.

Napoleon said, "Thank you, captain."

The newly made captain understood and went directly to the officers' dining room. Sitting down he began to address the officers as his comrades.

"How dare you?" they asked.

"Why not?" he answered. "I am a captain."

They mocked, ú'A captain? You? But you don't have a captain's bars, neither the schooling, nor a company to command."

"I have none of this yet," he replied confidently, "but I ~am~ a captain, because Napoleon called me one."

No child of God should be dismayed that he does not have the behavior of a saint; that he does not have the necessary knowledge; that he may not be acknowledged as a fellow believer by those around him. He has been called "a child of God" by the King of Kings. This is enough.

He who has given you this name will lead you through life, through its ascents and descents, even through death to the fulfilling of your high calling. Only believe that you are a child of God. The rest will come.

"Baptism doth also now save us." (1PE 3:21)

John Chrysostom said: "If we were non-corporeal, God would give us the spiritual things in their simplicity without material form. But because our souls live in bodies, He gives us spiritual gifts in the shape of visible things." He spoke about the ordinances. No Christian life is possible without them.

Augustine wrote: "You cannot gather men in the name of a right or a wrong religion, if you don't unite them through the common use of visible signs or sacraments."

Baptism, Holy Communion, the laying on of hands - all are visible signs of an invisible grace which is given to you.

A cheap ring given by a bridegroom gets a new value. The same is true of any metal made into a coin that bears the stamp of the state. So it is with the water of baptism: it becomes a symbol of the cleansing of sin.

By the same token, in Holy Communion the bread and the wine get the value of the body and blood of the Lord.

It is wrong to look around during Holy Communion to see whether someone is taking it unworthily. Examine yourself. Everyone takes it on his own responsibility. Don't hesitate to take communion from a pastor whose life you know to be bad. The value of the ordinance does lot depend upon the character of the one who gives it, any more than the value of a letter from a loved one depends upon the character of the mailman.

Do not imagine that the ordinances in themselves will help you. They strengthen us on the path toward heaven only if they are taken with faith.

If you have these things in proper perspective, they can become true food for your soul.

"Then cometh Jesus from Galilee to Jordan unto John, to be baptized of him." (MTT 3:13)

St. Ignace said that Jesus was baptized "to cleanse the waters." Most theologians would say that He did it to show His compassion toward sinners. Did Jesus feel Himself to be a sinner? Did He wish to be cleansed?

From the genes of Mary's ovule, by which Jesus was conceived, He inherited physical characteristics from many ancestors, all sinners. Seventy percent of man's character is inherited. If Jesus is God who has become man in the fullest sense of the word, He was subject to the law of heredity. As man He could be influenced. "He had been brought up" (LUK 4:16). His teachers and all those around Him were sinners. He was tempted like all of us. He had our instincts and impulses. As man His knowledge was limited. To save the humble, He had to hit merchants and Pharisees.

He never committed any sin, but He felt as His own all sins committed against Him since He was a child, beginning with the heredity imposed upon Him and the slaughter of the babes in Bethlehem. He felt as His the sorrow of all who had committed crimes. No one ever had felt guilty like Him. Taking all our sins upon Himself, He became the greatest criminal of history. The sense of guilt is the acutest in the most innocent. Paul calls himself the chief of sinners. We would have said that the greatest sinners were Caiaphas, Pilate, and Judas. The completely innocent One felt the paroxysms of guilt.

Therefore He felt the need to be baptized.

Don't wallow in the innocence granted to you by Jesus. Just because you have become whiter than the snow, appropriate to yourself everyone's sin.

"Every man shall bear his own burden." (GAL 6:5)

A bishop committed whoredom. No one knew it. Yet he confessed it before everyone in church. Putting his pallium on the altar, he said, "I cannot be your bishop anymore."

Everybody wept and replied, "May the sin be ours, but keep your bishopric."

He then lay on the floor of the church just inside the door and said, "Whosoever will go out without treading on me shall have no part with God." So they did. When the last had trodden on him, a voice came from heaven: "Because of his great humility, I have forgiven his sin."

This happened in the fourth century. At that time the Christians were a gathering of saints. But today I would recommend that no man with a position in the church, or any church worker do what that bishop did.

I know the case of a Soviet heroine of the faith. She was in prison for having taught children about Christ. She had behaved courageously at interrogations and before the court. In her cell a fellow Christian she had always looked up to as a great leader confessed to her a hidden sin. This made her lose her faith. She did not expect a fellow Christian to have sinned so grievously. She forsook the church and married a Communist. There are times when confessing your sin can hurt someone else. Confess your sins to the Lord. Take your burden to Him.

Only be careful to be considered a sinner by your brethren and sisters. Do not pose as a saint and God will forgive you your sins for your humility.

"If thou dost not speak to warn the wicked from his way ... his blood will I require at thine hand." (EZE 33:8)

One stormy, winter day on Lake Michigan a ship sank not far from the shore. A good swimmer succeeded in saving ten persons, one after another. His colleagues had prepared a fire on the beach. Exhausted, the "savior" warmed himself. Seeing others still wrestling with the waves, he prepared to enter the water again.

His friends advised him not to do it. "You are too tired," they said. "You will drown, too."

"I cannot see men perishing!" he answered.

Gathering all his strength, he saved another five. He had done his utmost. He himself was pulled from the water with difficulty.

Lying exhau8ted near the fire, he saw two men trying hard to keep themselves afloat on a plank. "I must save these, too," he cried.

"It is folly," the others exclaimed. "You will commit suicide!"

He did not listen to them, and saved also these two.

Now the last of his strength was gone, but he could not excuse himself. He was in agony. In the delirium of fever he asked again and again, "How will I present myself before the Lord having saved only 8eventeen? Could I not have saved at least one more?"

We are responsible for the blood of everyone whose physical or spiritual life we could have saved, but have neglected to do so. Are we not all murderers?

Seeing a criminal being led to the gallows, Philip Neri said, "Were it not for the grace of God, I would have deserved to be in his place."

"God ... giveth to all men liberally." (JMS 1:5)

In his important book, ~The Power and the Glory~, Graham Greene has one of his characters say the following to the poor priest whose story is the subject of the work: "I can't think how a man like you can believe those things. The Indians, yes; why, the first time they see an electric light they think it's a miracle."

The priest responds: "And l dare say the first time you saw a man raised from the dead you might think so too. Oh, it's funny, isn't it. It isn't a case of miracle8 not happening-it's just a case of people calling them something else. Can't you see the doctors round the dead man? He isn't breathing any more, his pulse has stopped, his heart's not beating: he's dead. Then somebody gives him back his life, and they all-what's the expression?-reserve their opinion. They won't say it's a miracle, because that's a word they don't like. Then it happens again and again perhaps-because God's about on earth - and they say: there aren't miracles, it is simply that we have enlarged our conception of what life is. Now we know you can be alive without pulse, breath, heart beats. And they invent a new word to describe that state of life, and they say science has again disproved a miracle. You can't get around them."

See the miracles of God in the daily work of doctors, engineers, technicians, psychiatrists, inventors, farmers, factory-workers who improve and ease our life on earth. They are the tool8. The donor, the performer of miracles is God.

"Ye cannot serve God and mammon." (MTT 6:24)

A Christian had received great gifts from God. He had been famous for his holy life. His renown came to the attention of the emperor, who called for him to hear his teachings. The emperor was very satisfied and gave him gold, which he accepted.

When he returned home, the Christian bought some land and houses.

As had often happened in the past, someone possessed by a demon was brought to him. The Christian commanded the demon: "Leave the man!"

The demon scorned, "I will not obey you."

Having never heard such refusals before, the surprised believer asked, "Why don't you obey me?"

The demon replied: "Abandoning your sole preoccupation with God, you have become like us. Therefore I don't obey you."

A rich church is powerles6 in the fight against the devil. So is a rich Christian. A Christian can administrate great riche6, but only on the condition that they are not his, but God's, who has given him the gift of multiplying and using them for His glory.

The moment you consider the riches to be yours, you fall under the curse pronounced by the Lord: "It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God" MTT 19:24).

Think thoroughly about these things before you go about managing what you believe to be your money.

"Suffer it to be so now." (MTT 3:15)

We know what Jesus said at the age of twelve. About the following eighteen years of his life, the Gospels keep perfect silence.

They break it when He reached the age of thirty. His first word is, "Suffer."

John the Baptist could not conceive that the Savior should be baptized by him, as so many sinners had been. Jesus said "Suffer it."

"Suffer little children" to come to the worship service, though they might disturb it (MTT 19:14). "Suffer (in Greek it is the same word, ~afiemi~) the tares to grow together with the wheat" (MTT 13:30).

"They be blind leaders of the blind." We would have added, "Don't allow them to continue." Jesus says, "Let them alone" (MTT 15:14).

A certain man wished to cut down a fig tree because it gave no fruit. The dresser of the vineyard, who represents Jesus in the parable, answers, "Let it alone this year also" (LUK 13:8).

Suffer men and things. Let them alone.

Instead of worrying about the evil which others do, learn from the bees. They care about no one, but feed mankind with honey. Do the same.

"The Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters." (GEN 1:2)

Augustine wrote, "If we had been commanded to build for the Spirit a temple of wood and stones, we would have had a clear proof of the Divinity of the Spirit, because worship is due only to God. But we have an even clearer proof in the fact that we are not to erect, but to ~be~ a temple for him."

The Spirit must be God if blasphemy against Him is the only unforgivable sin.

The presence of the Spirit in the life of the believer must be essential. Jews who went to Samaria risked their lives because they were hated by the Samaritans. Notwithstanding, Peter and John risked their lives and went there with the sole purpose of imparting the Spirit to believers.

Without the Spirit, all religious acts are as useless as light to blind men or melodies to the deaf. Christ was baptized because He knew that afterward the Spirit would descend upon Him. This must be our purpose, too, in every religious practice.

"If any man has not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his" (ROM 8:9). On the other hand, there is no condemnation to them who are in Christ Jesus, who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit (ROM 8:1)ú

"Amen." (REV 22:21)

After Jesus was baptized, He desired to have the Holy Spirit descend upon Him. And the Spirit did so.

When you ask some gift from God in prayer, don't abandon prayer until you get an inner experience, until you see the demand descending upon you in a quasi-material shape and hear from God's mouth the approval of your request.

This is the sense of the word "Amen." You have spoken to God, but God lives within you and uses your mouth to answer your prayer. "Amen" is His approval to what you have required.

A girl overheard the doctor telling her father, "There is no more hope for your wife." The girl went into the adjoining room, knelt down and prayed for the recovery of her mother.

Then she changed her voice and said, "Yes, Mary, I will surely heal her."

Changing her voice again, she said, "God, I thank You."

Entering the other room, she told her father, "God has just promised me He will heal mother."

The mother was healed. This is the sense of our "Amen." It is God's seal of approval uttered through your mouth that your intercession has been accepted.

Every prayer should be followed by an "Amen."

"Thus it becometh us to fulfil all righteousness." (MTT 3:15)

No commandment in the Old Testament obliged a Jew to be baptized. Jesus says that it becomes us to fulfill all righteousness by doing things which are not commanded.

There exist no commandments of God forbidding us to smoke, to wear jewelry (what did God make the emeralds and rubies for?), to go to beauty shops, to pass hours watching television. There are no commandments of God which forbid petting or trying drugs. Righteousness is fulfilled not by obeying commandments, but by asking ourselves the simple question, "Would Jesus like it or do it?"

If you threw some dust at a man, you would not hurt him. Neither would he suffer if you poured water upon him. Nor if you threw straw at him. But earth, straw, and water together make a brick. Throw that and you can crush his head.

So there are many little things, which by themselves are harmless. When they gather in our life, however, they become a heavy weight which might destroy our souls. "The little foxes ... spoil the vines" SOS 2:15).

There is no commandment in the law of God to fight little foxes, but it is good for the possessor of a vineyard to do so. It is good for you to fight certain habits. Even though each one by itself is a mere trifle, together they become a weight that hampers your spiritual life.

"He saw the Spirit of God descending like a dove." (MTT 3:16)

The dove is gentle, friendly with men, like the Holy Spirit, and therefore a fit symbol for Christ. They also have something else in common.

In order to observe doves, one must be very attentive and quiet. These little creatures of nature don't show their ways to noisy men. He who wishes to know them must develop the qualities for observing without being observed, for listening without being heard.

It is the same with the Spirit. One must be quiet, remaining silent before Him (HAB 2:20). The Holy Spirit does not behave the same way when He feels observed as when He is at His ease.

In the first case He is suspicious, worried about how His actions will be interpreted. The Lord says of the Jews, "I would scatter them into corners, I would make the remembrance of them to cease from among men: were it not that I feared the wrath of the enemy ... lest they should say, Our hand is high, and the LORD hath not done all this" (DEU 32:26,27).

The Spirit knows Himself to be observed by His enemies, and He depicts Himself as fearing to be misunderstood and acting otherwise than He normally would. The Lord said, "Because of the people which stand by I said it" (JHN 11:42). To know the words Jesus intended to say, if uninfluenced by those standing by, we have to keep reservedly aloof.

When observed by enemies, complainers, or the curious, the Spirit, like the dove, does not have normal reactions.

Keep silent, don't interfere, and let the Spirit do as He pleases.

"Others save with fear." (JUD 23)

If you see someone drowning, throw him a rope and try to pull him out of the water. If he is much too heavy for you, abandon your endeavor. Otherwise he might pull you into the water, and two will perish instead of one.

The path of endeavoring to bring men to eternal salvation is also fraught with danger. The effort of many a young man trying to bring some girl to salvation has ended with both falling into sin.

Missionaries have gone to Asian countries to tell people about Christ. Instead, some have been converted to Buddhism or have ended up with a mixture of a foreign religion and Christianity. Mission boards have been formed to proclaim the gospel to other nations; and then Christians have become so busy with financial matters of the institution that Christ disappeared from their lives.

Some Christians have entered the slums, places of poverty, to bring Christ's love-but instead they have become infected with the rebellious spirit prevailing there and are now members of rebellious organizations. When speaking with a profane man about things spiritual, there is a danger that he may pull you down into his profane manner of conversation.

How will you save the souls of others if you are not careful about keeping your own soul pure? Leave the castle of your own loving fellowship with the Lord only rarely, after much preparation in prayer.

Be wary of every maneuver of the enemy. Avoid battles which are too dangerous for you. Foolhardiness is not courage. Save with fear.

"Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world." (JHN 1:29)

If you sent a child to the grocery store to buy something with a dollar and the grocer demanded two dollars, you could not punish the child for not fulfilling your command. A teacher cannot expect a child in the primary grades to solve complicated problems of algebra.

Neither does God ask us to save our souls. We don't have the capacity for this. We are not guilty of not saving ourselves. Our guilt consists only in not coming to Jesus, who has the immeasurable power to save the whole world. If the whole world, why not me?

Augustine wrote, "If there had been in the world only one sinner, Jesus would have gladly brought for him the same sacrifice which he brought for the entire world."

Jesus never demanded that you should do for yourself what you cannot do. Just leave your soul to Him. He will do the work.

Leonardo da Vinci, painting the scene where John the Baptist exclaimed, "Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sins of the world," gave John the eyes of a drunkard. He went so far in this that some believed he had painted Bacchus, the god of wine.

John the Baptist must have been drunk with joy when he discovered that such a Savior had appeared.

Appeal to Jesus for the salvation from all your sins.

"Can there any good thing come out of Nazareth?" (JHN 1:46)

Nazareth was a town with an immoral reputation. But Nathanael, who spoke the words of our text, was guilty of one of the most destructive sins: despite toward an entire group of men. Every group of people contains a variety of persons with different personalities and characteristics.

A Lutheran pastor told me, "I have an emotional complex against the Baptists and Pentecostals." He did not realize that he had confessed to a much graver sin than if he had said, "I have lived many years in adultery." His duty was to give up his prejudice immediately for we must forsake every sin.

Every prejudice excludes the man holding it from any possibility of right thinking.

Many will not accept Jesus because He was Jewish; others because He was white.

The Pharisees could not admit that a prophet could come from Galilee (JHN 7:52).

Others took offense at His belonging to the lower class. They asked in mocking tone, "Is not this the carpenter's son?" (MTT 13:55),

Some ask themselves if the church about which so many bad things are said can give anything of value.

God is the Father of all men. There is good in all groups.

The Moabites, on the whole, had behaved badly toward the Jewish people. But from them came Ruth, one of the Bible's saintly women.

The Samaritans had gone astray from the true religion, but Jesus tells us about a good Samaritan.

Flee any racial, national, or denominational prejudice. Judge every person on his or her own merits.

"Let each esteem other better than themselves." (PHP 2:3)

While praying in his cell, St. Anthony heard a voice: "Anthony," it said, "you have not yet arrived at the stage of that tanner." Anthony immediately went to see the tanner to learn from him the ways of sanctification.

The tanner bowed, bewildered that he could have been found worthy of such a visit.

Anthony asked him, "What is your Christian exercise?"

He answered, "In the morning, when I awake, I say to myself, all in my city are much better than I. They are pleasing to God. I am the biggest sinner and deserve punishment."

The sins of others are not our business. Who am I to judge? Only pride judges and condemns fellow men.

A man came to his pastor and asked, "What should I do? I am much tempted by pride."

The pastor answered, "Just accept it. You have plenty to be proud of, seeing that you created heaven and earth."

The young man did not understand.

The pastor dismissed him with the words, "If the One through whom the world has been made came in humility, why should you, who are on!y dust and ashes, be proud? What are your works, you unhappy

"Thou we have known Christ after the flesh, yet now henceforth know we him no more." (2CO 5:16)

Augustine writes: "The face which Jesus had when he was in the flesh is shaped by men in various forms. It is completely unknown how the face of Jesus looked."

We know exactly from sculptures and ancient coins the faces of Julius Caesar or the emperors of Jesus' time, Octavian Augustus and Tiberius; but not that of the King of Kings. God's providence has arranged it to be so. This is because the Caesars were only historic personalities. Jesus is God, the Eternal stepping only briefly into time. We should not associate Him with a certain face expressing the specific features of an age, a sex, a race, a climate.

Jesus lives within many men: some of them beggars, others emperors; some white, others black or red or yellow; some children, some old men; some saints, some beginners in sanctity, some who have fallen in gross sins which they regret. We must learn to see Jesus in all of these.

Therefore there has been great opposition in the church to the introduction of ikons. Becoming familiar with a certain image of Jesus, you no longer recognize Him in the needy near you.

"This is the law, when a man dieth...." (NUM 19:14)

Five missionaries to the Auca Indians in Ecuador were killed in one day. Their wives received the news with composure. The norm of Christian living is to die for one's faith. No one really acknowledges a law to be the law of God if he is not ready to die for it.

Not everyone has the privilege of a martyr's death, but every Christian has to die before he dies. He must be dead to the world, its laws and its sins, before he dies.

Macarius was asked, "What does it mean to be dead to the world?"

He answered, "Go to a cemetery, praise some of the dead and curse others. Then come and tell me what happened."

The inquirer did as commanded. He returned telling Macarius "None answered a word."

Macarius replied, "Do the same."

The five martyrs had guns upon them when they died. They could have defended their lives, but they chose to die rather than to shoot the Indians. They had died before dying. How could a corpse shoot anyone? They were alive only for God.

These martyrs gave their lives to bring the gospel to a tribe which at that time numbered only fifty-six people. Men of all tribes have to be among the saved, those of small tribes, too.

The blood of the martyrs brought seed. The Auca Indians already have their first martyr, one of them who went to evangelize a neighboring tribe.

Let us pray regularly for the many men who are still in the stone age not touched by civilization.

"We ... are compassed about with ... a cloud of witness." (HEB 12:1)

Let us learn from the great saints.

John de la Salle is the father of modern pedagogy. He founded the first free high school and teachers' seminary in France. Because he loved much, he did much. He said, "I cannot think about the many children who perish from ignorance without shedding tears." We are upset by trifles in our personal lives, but how many of us would shed tears for the ignorant?

Unable to bear this burden idly, he distributed his great wealth among the poor and became a poor teacher of the poor. I compare his spirit with that of teachers who are dissatisfied with large salaries and strike to get more. They are examples of selfishness to their students. The catastrophe which they produce in the minds of children by their greed will never be erased by the beauties they teach.

De la Salle had to suffer much from fellow Christians and unemployed teachers.

Pacificus of San Severino was obsessed by the words of the Lord that the harvest is big and the laborers few. He said, "The world needs apostles not doctors of theology." He had decided to become one, going as a missionary to the heathen. But God had appointed him to another apostolate, that of suffering. His feet swelled until he could no longer counsel the souls he loved so much. Then he was afflicted by blindness. His soul was ravaged by inner tempests. Friends insulted him, calling him accursed of God, convinced by his suffering that it was so.

He bore all this suffering valiantly knowing that God's will, not own, must be done in all things. Pacificus still brings souls to Christ three centuries after his death. Through the story of his sufferings lovingly borne, many more have been won to his Lord than if he had gone to preach among the heathen.

Let us learn to be unselfish and submissive to God's will.

"Seek, and ye shall find." (MTT 7:7)

In daily life you find Jesus through prayer. Teresa of Avila wrote, "The devil knows that he has lost the soul that perseveringly practices mental prayer." She also gives a definition of this exercise: "Mental prayer is nothing else than an intimate friendship, a frequent heart-to-heart conversation with Him by whom we know ourselves to be loved."

This is something entirely different than saying your prayers in the morning and evening and at meals. He prays very little and very poorly who prays only when he is on his knees. We have to remain in contact with Jesus the whole day, through short prayers and meditations about everything which occurs. Be aware that in all circumstances God is present and discuss with Him, your best Friend, what would be the best thing to do. Thank Him also in all things.

We read in The Imitation of Christ: "A man does himself more harm, if he seeks not Jesus, than the whole world and all his enemies could do." We are upset about having been offended, or about the catastrophes of war and revolutions. provoked by wicked men, without realizing that the greatest enemy we each have is self.

There was a man who never succeeded in anything he did. An invisible enemy thwarted all his purposes. One evening, lying on his couch and brooding about all his failures, he saw a hand stretching out from behind the curtain to strangle him. He said to himself, "Now I can see my enemy face to face. I am powerful. I will overcome him." With a swift movement, he drew aside the curtain and saw the enemy. It was himself-his neglect to seek Jesus.

"With God all things are possible." (MTT 19:26)

When I was a little child I did not think about God. I had been taught that He is an all-powerful being. This was all I knew. At the age of perhaps eight, another child mocked God in my presence. "If He is all-powerful," the child scoffed, "can He make a weight He cannot lift? If He can, He is not all-powerful. If He cannot, again He is not what He

I liked the joke and the idea of an all-powerful God never occurred to me again.

At the age of twenty-seven, I read the New Testament and found out that God had made a weight He could not lift. He had made of Himself a babe, weighing just a few pounds. He could not lift Himself. The Virgin Mary had to lift God, to take Him from the manger to her breast to feed Him. God had His ears washed. He was too small a child to do it Himself. His jacket which He had torn climbing some tree was patched by His holy mother. He did not know how to sew.

God had made a weight He could not lift. He had become incarnate as the Son of man. And this Son of man was given into the hands of men. They mocked Him; they crucified Him. The only real subject had become a simple object. People around jeered Him for His lack of power. He could not descend from His cros8. Then He became even more of an object-a corpse. If Joseph of Arimathea had not buried Him, His flesh would have been eaten by eagles.

Having made a weight He could not lift, God showed His almightiness by lifting the unliftable. Jesus was resurrected in power and ascended into heaven. Once lifted from the earth, He attracts all men toward Him.

I had been wrong as a child. God is almighty. He can make a weight He Himself cannot lift and is almighty notwithstanding.

"He hungered." (MTT 21:18)

One billion people hunger. We give a figure, but every number represents a person. Ten thousand die daily of malnutrition and starvation, 9,900 of them without having heard of Christ. People of developed countries consume five times as much food as the minimum necessary to save the hungry. In some part of Africa 25 percent of the children die before their first birthday. Their chance of dying is forty times higher than in the USA or Australia. Among those who hunger are the children of thousands of Christian martyrs in the Communist camps.

The Christian philosopher Aristides wrote in the year A.D. 125 to the emperor Hadrian: "With Christians, he who has gives to him who has not, ungrudgingly and without boasting.... If they find poverty in their midst and they do not have spare food, they fast two or three days in order that the needy might be supplied with necessities."

Fast. Renounce. On the day of judgment, the Lord will tell you, "I was an hungered, and ye gave me meat" (MTT 25:35).

"Of him that taketh away thy goods ask them not again." (LUK 6:30)

A Christian surprised burglars stealing his belongings. He told them, "Hurry and finish before the police come. Here, I will help you load the goods into your car. It is my fault for possessing them. I am a Christian and we were meant not to gather treasures on earth. Our Lord has warned us that thieves might steal them. It was my fault not to rely on the Father to take care of my needs. Please forgive me for having given you such a bad example!"

The robbers became interested, asking him one question after another. They did not steal from him, but were converted. The Christian had learned a lesson, too.

"The love of money is the root of all evil" (1TM 6:10). Money must be totally despised by Christians. I

An old legend says that Christ once taught His disciples, "Beware of money." They asked, "Why?" He replied, "Because often it is dishonestly acquired."

They asked again, "Suppose it is honestly earned?" Jesus said, "Beware of money even then, because it usually is sinfully spent."

The disciples asked for the third time, "What if it is honestly gained and well spent?"

The Lord replied, "Even then, beware of money. It always pollutes."

"Nathanael answered and saith unto him, Rabbi, thou art the Son of God." (JHN 1:49)

Islam and Reformed Judaism accept Jesus as a great prophet. They object to His being worshiped as Son of God. We owe them light in this matter.

In Hebrew, the adjective is little used. The Hebrew would not say a talkative person," but ~Ish dvarim~ - "a man of words." For "divine," he could only say, "Son of God." In Aramaic, the language the Lord spoke, the adjectives were used even less. Therefore we find in our Bibles the strange expressions, "children of light," instead of "luminous"; and "son of perdition," instead of "lost."

We have to explain to the Jews and Moslems that we don't believe in Jesus being the Son of God in the usual sense of the word. God has no wife and does not conceive children. The Hebrew of the first century simply did not have another expression to show the degree of Christ's affinity as man and substantial unity with the Father as God than calling

Him "Son of God." I

Modem science supplies us with a new image of what "Son of God" means. We speak about the family of radioactive elements and about a radioactive filiation. Emanation of electrons changes uranium I into uranium II, then into ionium, etc.

We can use different images to exemplify what is meant by the expression "Son of God." What is certain, however, is that Christ is God. The ancients said, "Aut Deus, aut homo non bonus." He was either God or not a good man.

Great authors of the twentieth century try to convince us that Jesus was only man. What kind of being must Jesus have been, if after 2000 years such great effort is still needed to convince men that He was only man. Such a being is God incarnate, in whom we can have full confidence.

"He that receiveth a righteous man in the name of a righteous man shall receive a righteous man's reward." (MTT 10:41)

Macarius of Corinth is considered a saint in the East, not because he died a martyr's death himself, but because he trained men for martyrdom. He encouraged those who were entering the martyr's arena, and thus lit in their hearts the flame of love for Christ and the aspiration of suffering for His sake.

Just as the crown of righteousness is laid up for the martyrs because they finished their course like Paul and kept the faith - so it is laid up for all of the co-workers of the martyrs, their fellow contenders and helpers.

In our day also there are many martyrs: in the Communist world, under the reign of Islam, and in heathen countries. Many Christians, including well-known leaders, compromise with the persecuting powers and sympathize with those who prefer sacrificing incense before Caesar's statue to dying, as many Christians did in the first centuries. At that time those who sacrificed were called ~lapsi~ - "apostates." Now they are called "wise. " And today those who, filled with the Holy Spirit, choose prison and death, are called "full of wine" as the apostles were at Pentecost.

Let us be on the side of those who sit in jails and are sentenced to death for their faith. Let us pray for them and help them. So we will get a crown like theirs.

"Thou art the King of Israel." (JHN 1:49)

It would seem that this name, "King of Israel," which Nathanael gives to Jesus, would cancel any interest non-Jews might otherwise have in Him. What does a European or an American care for a king of the Zulus of 2000 years ago?

A King of the Jews was born and wise men came from abroad, while He was still a babe, to worship Him. And today after twenty centuries men of all races still bow before Him.

There must be something special about the Jews that makes their King so important. Paul wrote: "To whom (the Israelites) pertaineth the adoption, and the glory, and the covenants, and the giving of the law, and the service of God, and the promises; whose are the fathers, and of whom as concerning the flesh Christ came, who is over all, God blessed for ever" (ROM 9:4,5).

The Nazis were consistent when they rejected Christianity as being Jewish. They understood the connection between the church and the Jews better than many Christians do.

Outside the church Israel can do nothing that will last. And without Israel the church cannot triumph. It is only "their receiving" Christ that will be "life from the dead" (ROM 11:15).

A look at the world reveals Israel's chosen role. The great fight is going on between the world which believes in the Jew, Jesus, and the other world which believes in the Jew, Marx. In science, the universe bears the name of another Jew, Einstein.

It is every Christian's duty to pray and work for the conversion of Jews and for the peace of Israel. We must all contribute our energy toward this.

"Go your way." (LUK 7:22)

Saints are men and women completely apart, each in his or her own way. They cannot be judged by applying common measurements.

John of the Cross was not capable of any manual work because he was so preoccupied with God that he could not pay attention to a hammer or scissors in his hands. Joseph of Copertino was so lost in God that he had to pinch himself when called to come back to the awareness of the world. For whatever thing was asked him, he brought something else, because his mind was not tuned to the words of men.

Only some saints are like this. Elisabeth of Hungary was a saint who was attentive to every need of the most humble men, though she was a queen. A human saint, she was the human being Elisabeth at her best, sacrificing everything in order that the ideal Elisabeth might live on earth.

Like Jesus Himself, many saints are considered to have been psychopaths. They were theopaths in the etymological sense of the word - suffering for God. They had died to the world before dying.

Some saints have been warriors, like Joan of Arc. Others have gone to extremes of asceticism. But Therese of Lisieux said, "If the food tastes good, I thank God for it. If it is bad, I accept the mortification.
The surest way to holiness is to accept as mortification whatever occurs."

Find out your calling from God, the ideal "you," the purpose for which you have been elected from before the foundation of the world. Then follow Jesus in your own calling, though it may seem strange to others.

"Remember them that are in bonds, as bound with them." (HEB 13:3)

A Christian in Russia was sentenced to ten years in prison for his faith. He left behind a wife with nine hungry children. The mission, "Jesus to the Communist world" helped them with a small sum of money and received the following amazing response from the wife.

"Glory be to the Lord that He has given us, too, to bear a little chip of His cross." (We complain about many trifles as being unbearable crosses. For her, a husband in prison and nine children to feed, without any source of income, was just a little chip of His cross.) "We must eat our bread with tears, but the Lord be praised for everything. I thank you with tears that the Lord has opened your hearts at such a big distance. Love has a long arm and stretched it out toward us. (When Paul enumerated all the attributes of love in 1CO 13, he forgot to mention that she has a long arm.)

"When we remained alone, the wicked ones said that we would not have wherewith to live, but praised be the Lord that He takes care, as He took care of Elijah, Daniel and of all who served Him.

"God has given me nine children who wait now for their father to come home, but their father put his life at stake for Christ and left his children to suffer for the faith once for all delivered by God to the saints."

Acts of the Apostles in the original is the only biblical book which ends abruptly in the midst of a sentence. It is an unfinished book. The heroism of the first Christians continues to this day.

Let us always remember in prayer our brethren suffering in prison or their faith. And let us not forget their families.

"We ... are changed into the same image from glory to glory." (2CO 3:18)

From scholastic philosophy we received two axioms, which on the face seem contradictory, but in fact complement each other. The first is ~Omne quod recipitur, per modus recipientis recipitur~ - "Whatever we receive, we receive in the manner of the recipient." Hence the variety of religions and opinions about everything.

We all perceive the same reality, but according to our differing backgrounds, heredity, education, character, strength, and the specifics of our intelligence. We never see God as He is, but as He appears to each of us in our own eyes.

This axiom applies even to God. He knows everything about us as we appear from the viewpoint of a divine being. This was not enough however, for a righteous judgment. Therefore the Son of God became the man Jesus. Now He knew in His flesh poverty, oppression, sorrow, opposition, torture, temptation. When He ascended to heaven, Christ enriched the Godhead with a new dimension: human experience.

Therefore it is written in SOS 3:11, "Behold king Solomon with the crown wherewith his mother crowned him in the day of his espousals."

From eternity past Christ possessed the crown of divine glory. Mary gave Him one more crown: to be God incarnate. She gave him the possibility of uniting with human nature and human experience.

The second axiom is: ~Anima quodammodo fit omnia~ - "The soul has the capability somehow of becoming everything." It can identify with what it understands and with what it loves and ardently desires.

Christians know their limitations. They know that their spirit lives in the cage of the personality, but they yearn to see God at last as He is. Our soul has the capacity for this. We will reach our aim.

"God hath chosen ... base things of the world." (1CO 1:27,28)

From among the many persons to whom the Lord could have appeared, he chose the chief of sinners, Saul of Tarsus - a wicked man who had made havoc of the churches, killing some of the believers and forcing others to deny their faith.

The capacity to do evil is a potential capacity to do good.

At one time Niagara Falls was the source of many disasters for the United States and Canada, flooding great territories of both countries and making agriculture impossible. Then one man decided: "If these falls have such potential for destruction, they must have the same potential for good," So dams were built, turbines were installed. Now Niagara Falls supplies electricity to both countries.

When William Booth wished to evangelize Britain, he looked around for suitable men. He considered most pastors to be either professionals who had not been born again, or real children of God who were much too meek and gentle to be capable of revolutionizing their surroundings. So he appealed to prison inmates. Once converted, they became the soldiers and officers of the Salvation Army. They did the great work.

In Hebrew, ~Kedeshah~ means both prostitute and saint. Magdalene was always a ~kedeshah~, first with a minus, later with a plus. The love which she had squandered in sin was now shed in abundance upon the Savior and upon men.

Seek the worst of men, pray for them, and do your best to bring them to conversion. They might become the greatest blessing.

This may apply also to yourself if you are base.

"They were strangers and pilgrims on the earth." (HEB 11:13)

An American evangelist, John Morrison, returned home after preaching in many countries where he had brought tens of thousands to Christ. He happened to travel on the same ship as President Theodore Roosevelt, who was returning from a hunting expedition in Africa where he had shot 8 number of wild hogs.

On the dock at New York thousands cheered. Whom would you say they cheered? Of course they cheered the killer of hogs, who was also the president of the United States. No one was interested in the man who had saved souls. They traveled on the same train. On the station platform again thousands cheered Roosevelt, not Morrison.

An evangelist is human. Morrison felt envy and discontent growing within him. "Is this all the welcome I get when I return home after such an exhaustive journey?" he fretted. A divine voice corrected him: "You are not yet home."

Miserable are the Christians who hope for recognition in this world. Here we have to shun success. What would the value of General Eisenhower or Winston Churchill have been if they had been cheered in Nazi Germany?

Jesus said, "Woe unto you, when all men shall speak well of you" (LUK 6:26). It would be a sure sign that you belong to this world which is hostile toward God.

Let us wait for our full reward in heaven.

"Be not conformed to this world." (ROM 12:2)

We are told in LUK 7 that John the Baptist, while in prison, had doubts concerning whether Jesus was really the Messiah. The uncertainty came though he had proclaimed Him to be the Lamb of God who takes away the sins of the world. Prison often casts shadows on men's spiritual life.

John doubted and communicated his doubts to two of his disciples, who had no doubts until then. They had been sure that Jesus was the Savior. But because someone else had planted a doubt in their heart, they traveled far to tell Jesus about another's doubts and to question Him. They might have spoken to Him in the presence of others, thus further disseminating the doubts.

Jesus answered, "Go your way" (LUK 7:22).

Don't allow yourselves to be infested by someone else's wrong attitudes, even if he is a great-prophet.

Christian sisters worked in a concentration camp in a Siberian forest, where they had to fell trees. Far away there were other barracks with prisoners who did the same work. One evening, while the Christian ladies were gathered in prayer around a little stove, someone knocked at the door.

"Open! Nothing bad will happen to you," a rough voice shouted. The sisters did not dare obey. "Open, or we will smash the door," several voices yelled.

When they opened the door, twenty men with overcoats covered with snow entered. One of them said, "We heard you were Christians. Speak to us about God. We have seen no pastor for thirty years. Tell us something."

Since that evening the barracks became an underground church where the prisoners gathered regularly. The sisters instructed them in the faith, taught them the gospel and prayers long forgotten, and baptized some of them. In exchange, these men sentenced for crimes did the hard work of the sisters, thus giving them more time for prayer.

These were souls who in a Bolshevik surrounding went their way. You go yours, whatever the difficulties of your surroundings.

"Where is the promise of his (Jesus') coming ... all things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation." (2PE 3:4)

Scoffers challenged the Christians in earlier times with these words. They cannot say so anymore. Today entirely new things happen in this old world. Man has interfered artificially with the nucleus of the atom, piling up fifteen tons of explosives for every living inhabitant. The destruction of mankind could happen in a few minutes. Men walk on the moon. Dictators and money-grabbers can change the minds of men at will through drugs and mass media. Population explosion, famines as never before, the unbreathable air in the towns of the privileged nations are all here. The power is no longer in the hands of the white race, which engineered Christian civilization. Representatives of the Third World have the majority in the United Nations, and generally vote as Red China or the Russian Communists dictate.

The state of Israel is an unshakable fact. God brought His people back to the Holy Land. The whole of Jerusalem is theirs, a further sign of the end time.

Anti-Christian forces have invaded the church. ~Capital Voice~, August 1, 1974, published the results of a recent poll: "51% of the Methodist ministers in the USA do not believe in Jesus' resurrection; 60% don't believe in the virgin birth; 62% contest the existence of Satan; 89% of Episcopalian priests don't believe the Bible to be the Word of God. They believe there is no truth." Again a sign of the end time. The abomination of desolation is in the holy place (DAN 9:27).

These are all signs of the Lord's coming. Things do not continue as they were from the beginning. "He that shall endure unto the end, the same shall be saved" (MTT 24:13).

"What manner of man was he which came up to meet you, and told you these words?" (2KI 1:7)

When Elijah sent a message to Ahaziah, king of Israel, the king did not ask his servants the details of the communication, but the question above. The value of a message depends upon the quality of the messenger. A sermon on the words, "Woe unto you that are rich" (LUK 6:24), delivered by a man who strives to become rich would make a ridiculous impression.

The Christians of the first centuries were the right manner of men.

Stripped naked and hanged on walls by four rings to which the ankles and wrists were tied with ropes, they were attacked with truncheons, pincers, and torches. They bore the torture and did not deny Christ nor betray where and when the brethren met together for prayer and worship services.

No machine devised by human mind could have withstood what our brethren and sisters withstood during centuries of persecution. Their underfed bodies resisted better than those of overfed wrestlers. It is because they were the right manner of men.

In sufferings, they did not pity themselves but their torturers. They saw even in those who beat or slandered them angels of grace, who, through humiliations, sanctified them for the future kingdom.

We do not need a new theology, but this old breed of Christians,
What about ourselves becoming such men, whose manner of being would give credibility to our Christian message? With Elijah, even his outward appearance, his simple manner of dressing showed the earnestness with which he spoke.

"Teach us to number our days, that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom." (PSA 90:12)

Augustine wrote in his ~Confessions~: "If nobody asks me about time, I know what it is; but if I am asked, I don't know what to answer." The Russian astronomer Koziereff calls time, "the most important and the strangest quality of nature."
I will not enter into the philosophy of time. It is what makes men belong to different generations, it is the gap between men and their children. They have been born later in time. This makes them look upon parents as symbols of everything old, no more relevant, unfashionable, hypocritically tied to a now worthless moral code. Therefore Freud said, "One of the most difficult professions in the world is to be a parent. "
Some parents are surely not worthy of the honor due them according to the Bible. The American killer, Manson, was the son of a sixteen-year-old prostitute, who gave birth to the child only because she had no money for an abortion. Soon after his birth she entered prison. He was given to relatives who fed him little but beat him much. From the age of fourteen, Manson grew up only in correction houses and prisons.
Some respectable and religious parents have been rewarded by their children with titles like "capitalist swine" or similar expressions.
These are extreme cases. Also extreme are the suicides among teenagers. Their number has increased in the last twenty years by 250 percent. In between is the multitude of youngsters dissatisfied with their parents.
Let us all remember that the problem of children is a problem for the parents who forget that time passes quickly and another generation rises. We must give our children the best of godly examples. Giving them an affluent life is not sufficient. They need the example of a holy life united with a wise education.

"Shewing thyself a pattern." (TIT 2:7)

A candidate for ordination presented himself before the examining commission and the bishop. He had good credentials, including the best marks on all theological subjects. He answered the usual question well. The pastor of his church also confirmed that he was involved in all of its activities.

The godly bishop then asked him some questions which were put to ordinands in the first centuries: "Is despite as welcome to you as profit? Do you love foreign people as much as your relatives? Do you accept with the same joy sickness or health, liberty or prison, beatings or caresses, opposition or applause?"

The candidate answered, "No."

"Then go and study some more," said the bishop.

Many pastors believe they are called upon to interpret and preach the Bible. This is a secondary function. Jesus said He had come "to fulfill the law, or the prophets" (MTT 5:17). He fulfilled what others merely used as subjects for sermons.

Seek for a pastor who is a fulfiller, not a debater, of God's will.

"The day of the Lord so cometh as a thief in the night." (1TH 5:2).

Leonid Brezhnev, Russia's present dictator, shows his old mother his luxurious offices, his villa in the suburbs of Moscow, his Cadillac, his vacation home at the Black Sea, and asks her, "Are you satisfied?"

She replies, "I am happy that you have it so well; but what if the Communists come to power? They are bad guys. They hate the rich and insist upon equality for all."

It is easy for us to laugh about the inconsistencies between the life style of the Communist leaders and their teachings.

The joke could be changed. What if we should show the surroundings in which we live to a godly mother, and she should ssk us, "All is fine, but how will it be when Jesus returns?"

A story says that Jesus came to Rome. He saw the army parading. everyone with his gun. He asked them if they were Christians. When they all nodded, Jesus said, "I have taught that my disciples should not even say a bad word to anyone. I never thought that Christians would use weapons!"

He saw the advertisements in shop windows proclaiming, "Here re the best shoes, or the best cars." Jesus entered the shop8 and said,

I have taught that everyone should put another's honor above his oown. Why don't you rather recommend the products of your competitors?"

He saw the prostitutes. They were all baptized and confirmed. He saw Christians split into different political parties. He saw a Catholic church, a Baptist church, and a Lutheran church. He wondered which was His church. The other names he had never heard of before.

He wished to speak with the pope, but he could not receive an appointment. He had to slip stealthily past the Swiss Guard. Jesus did not look respectable, but rather like a Jesus freak. Before being received by the pope, He was told that He must call him "Holy Father." Jesus replied, "I thought this was a name reserved for God!"

What is your standard of life? What is its moral and spiritual level? Everything seems fine now-but what if Je8us returns?

"The letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life." (2CO 3:6)

The Bible is verbally inspired. Every word in it is from God. Then let us learn from it not to be satisfied only with the words, but use the words to achieve their main purpose: to bring souls to eternal salvation.

We read in AMO 9:11, "In that day will I raise up the tabernacle of David that is fallen, and close up the breaches thereof ... that they (the Jews) may possess the remnant of Edom, and of all the heathen, which are called by my name." This verse predicts a spiritual domination of the Jews throughout the heathen world.

To tell the heathen such a thing at the beginning when they were prejudiced against the Jews, would not have been helpful. So Peter, quoting Amos, simply changed the text: "I ... will build again the tabernacle of David ... that the residue of men might seek after the Lord, and all the Gentiles, upon whom my name is called" (ACT 15:16,17). Compare the two passages. The whole sense is changed. The prophecy means now that the Gentiles will spontaneously seek the Lord. This was acceptable to them.

In EXO 34:35 we read that Moses, after having received from God the tables with the commandments, put a veil over his face because it shone. This would have put Paul, who also had a revelation from God, in an inferior situation toward Moses. So Paul takes the liberty to explain things otherwise: "Moses ... put a veil over his face, that the children of Israel could not stedfastly look to the end of that which is abolished" (2CO 3:13).

The purpose is what counts: souls should be saved. If a sophisticated ritual helps some, and a simple worship others; if rather one preacher or one denomination than another; if one Bible translation can help better than another one, the important thing is not fidelity to methods or words, but to the end, that by all means some should be saved (1CO 9:22).

"Ye shall be hated of all nations." (MTT 24:9)

There is something wrong with Christians who are not hated.

Henrik Ibsen, the renowned Norwegian playwright, was the most rejected artist of the nineteenth century. This was because he did what we should do. He shook sensibilities by bringing up in public subjects that were utterly taboo; and he championed attitudes unpopular in the society of his time. His main message was that in questions of conscience men have to stand firm and not compromise.

Because of this, he and his family had to suffer much. He puts in the mouth of one of the personalities of his plays, The Enemy of the People, words of reproach which he must have heard often from well-meaning friends: "You are a madman; you are insane with egotism. And don't excuse it with humanitarian slogans, because a man who'll drag his family through a lifetime of disgrace is a demon in his heart, a demon who cares more for a public cause than for the lives of his wife and children."

Men who suffer in prisons for Christ's sake in our century have often heard similar reproaches.

Ibsen's reaction was simple. He wrote, "In a storm there's just one thing to remember: it will pass.... Before many can know something, one must know it.... The majority is always wrong.. .. I am in revolt against the age-old lie that the majority is always right."

When an irritated mob threw stones through his hero's windows, Dr. Stockmann said, "I'm going to keep these like sacred relics."

"The strong man must learn to be lonely."

Let us learn to confront public opinion. Jesus never yielded to the blindness of the masses. He is the light. He influences without being influenced. He was hated, but His acceptance of this gained Him friends who loved Him unto death.

"Contend for the faith which was once delivered unto the saints." (JUD 3)

When Nelson, as a teenager, came home from a birdnesting expedition, his aunt chided him for being out so late at night. She said, "I'm surprised that fear did not make you come home."

"Fear?" replied Nelson. "I don't know him."

We don't know the fear of conflicts,. When Spurgeon, the renowned Baptist preacher of Britain, alarmed at the increasing spread of heresy within the denomination, forsook the Baptist Union and took up the fight for biblical belief, he did not expect success. He said, "I am quite willing to be eaten by dogs for the next fifty years, but the more distant future will vindicate me."

Abusive and shameful titles were given to him. He replied to his opponents, that since there was no language sufficiently strong to express the abhorrence he had for them, he would let them pass in silence.

He craved no tolerance. He demanded submission, being sure that his message was from God.

A black preacher in a village said that he abstained from preaching against stealing chickens because such preaching dampened brotherly love. I was rebuked once by a pastor, to whose church I had been invited, for having preached about Herod's sin of taking his brother's wife. This was the sin of the richest supporter of his church, whose contributions he did not wish to lose.

We have to fight this spirit of compromise and everything which is wrong in the church and in mission work, though it may be at the risk of provoking great conflicts. Traitors to Christ's principles should never be our friends.

"My beloved is mine." (SOS 2:16)

A king once told a favorite, "Ask whatever you like and it will be given to you."

The favorite thought it over "If I ask to be a general, I'll become one, and then I will regret not being the prime minister. If I ask for half of the kingdom, I will get it, and then I will be sad for not having the other half." Therefore he said to the king, "Give me your daughter to wife."

In Hebrew and in Greek the word for "soul" is feminine. Being feminine, the believing soul asks from God Christ to be her bridegroom. So we become heirs of all things and all angels will serve us.

How glorious and yet how modest our bridegroom is. Nathanael called him "Son of God" (JHN 1:49). Jesus answered, "Hereafter ye shall see heaven open, and the angels of God ascending and descending upon the Son of man" (JHN 1:51). In the measure in which men discovered the divine in Him, His modest and good heart made Him emphasize His humanity, in order that His brides, who are human and sometimes much too human, can come to Him with confidence. He belongs to them. Our prayer that He should be ours has been fulfilled.

He is not only a divine, but also a human bridegroom, interested in human things, concerned even that there should be wine enough at a marriage feast. How unlike some saints, who, because of their sanctity, become apathetic toward the needs of their fellow men.

Christ does not only deliver sermons; and He does not rebuke continually. He quietly takes supper with us, as a bridegroom would do with a bride.

Bernard of Clairveaux said, "A quiet God quiets everything. To see Him as quiet, means to be quiet." The most quieting thought is, "the Beloved is mille."

"Jesus said unto hun [a malefactor], Verily I say unto thee, To-day shalt thou be with me in paradise." (LUK 23:43)

A world which very much needs our love and our prayers is the world of criminals. Society can give them only the punishment they deserve. We can give them the divine message of forgiveness through the blood of Jesus.

Criminals are continually haunted by their victims-some consciously, others unconsciously. Behind all other words, they hear the last words of their victims. You might speak kindly to them but they know what you think about them: they are murderers.

Even if they have not confessed to the police or to a priest, the words break out of them in their dreams, in their involuntary speech. The victims are near their beds at night.

Emile Zola describes in Therese Raquin a painter who had killed. No one knew what he had done. He continued to paint, but now all faces resembled each other. They were like his victim. Children's faces, women's faces, all reminded him of them.

Criminals have not killed only the men now dead. They have killed also the pity toward themselves in fellow men. They are despised by everyone, except by Jesus, the friend of sinners. He chose to share the fate of criminals, being crucified like them. He preordained that when Pilate offered the release of a prisoner, the mob should choose freedom for a murderer, Barabas. Jesus was glad to die in his place.

He does not despise thieves. He compares Himself with them. "The day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night" (2PE 3:10).

Criminals receive salvation from Jesus. They find also understanding and compassion among His true followers.

"Wandering stars, to whom is reserved the blackness of darkness for ever." (JUD 13)

The Epistle of Jude accredits one of the many pseudepigraphic books, the book of Enoch.

Enoch wrote, "I saw seven stars like seven great burning mountains. When I asked, the angel told me, 'This is the place where heaven and earth end. This is a prison for the stars and the host of heaven. The stars which turn over the fire are those who at the start of their rising trespassed against the commandment of God, not rising in time. So he became angry with them and bound them.... ' "

Remember that this day there are angels who have been in chains for thousands of years. They are surrounded by darkness and await the judgment of the great day.

All prison life is terrible. Hell, for men, is even worse. But who can imagine the torment of a prison for angels, winged beings, used to flying from star to star to fulfill God's will?

Some angels have arrived there because they did not keep "their first estate, but left their own habitation" (JUD 6). Did you keep your high estate of being a Christian? Do you keep your own habitation, the church, or do you mingle with the sinful world? God did not spare angels; will He spare you?

"They that turn many to righteousness [shall shine] as the stars for ever and ever" (DAN 12:3). Are you a shining star? Do you turn many to righteousness?

Fear and trembling is a vital contributing part of the Christian life.

"He hath put down the mighty from their seats, and exalted them of low degree." (LUK 1:52)

Strindberg's play, ~Miss Julie~, is the story of a love affair between a very rich girl and her servant. At a certain moment they tell each other their dreams.

The rich girl: "I'm sitting on top of a pillar that I've climbed up, somehow, and I don't know how to get back down.... l have to get down, but I don't have the courage to jump.... I want to fall, but I don't fall. I know I won't have any peace until I get down, down on the ground. And if I ever get down on the ground, I'd want to go further down, right down into the earth."

The servant: "I used to dream that I'm lying under a tall tree in a dark wood. I want to get up, up to the very top, to look out over the bright landscape with the sun shining on it, to rob the bird's nest up there with the golden eggs in it. I climb and I climb, but the trunk is so thick and so smooth, and it's such a long way to that first branch. But I know that if I could just reach that first branch, I'd go right to the top as if on a ladder."

Many rich people have a complex of guilt because of their privileged situation, though they might not be conscious of it. This makes many of them become revolutionists or supporters of revolutionist causes. They feel that their duty is to descend. The poor, however, envy the rich and would like to ascend.

These normal feelings, if brought into light, could become positive factors in social life. The rich could learn from Jesus to go about doing good and sharing, in many ways, with the underprivileged what they have. The poor could emulate the rich, learning from them how better to use their talents for the good of their families.

He who follows Jesus shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life (JHN 8:12). The unbelievers love darkness rather than light (JHN 3:19). Their feelings are repressed and surface not only in dreams, but also in foolish acts of terrorism, riots, and revolutions. The re3ult is that privileged people lose their positions which they did not enjoy fully, and are replaced by those of low degree, who soon will become disenchanted too.

"[Jesus] went round about the villages, teaching." (MRK 6:6)

Many of us feel frustrated. We are not successes. Neither was Jesus. He was a small-time country preacher. Caiaphas had mass rallies with more than a million in attendance at the great festivals. when Jews from all over the world came to worship in Jerusalem. However, he was not a success. Pilate could depose him whenever he liked. Neither was Pilate a success. Caesar dismissed and exiled him. Neither was it a success to be a Caesar. Julius Caesar was killed by his own son. Nero was killed, too, after his successes in uprooting Christians.

Don't envy great men who can achieve much. It only seems so Great men may make history, but only such history as it is possible for them to make. They stand under the dictate of their surroundings.

Even more than that we are conditioned inwardly by our own past. Robespierre, the bloody dictator of the French revolution, had been abandoned by his father soon after his mother's death. He had to struggle hard for an education. He had been offended in his youth by the young King Louis XVI and the queen. He had been chosen to deliver an address of welcome when they came to his town. They did not say one word of approval, neither did they make a gesture showing appreciation, but drove on. This turned him into a hater of men. He revelled in killing thousands of innocents. He enjoyed seeing the blood of men at the guillotine.

God did not destine us to be killers. To be a killer is always contrary to nature. Therefore, murderers make big mistakes. Robespierre, too, behaved senselessly and died on the guillotine himself. He had achieved nothing. The republic had paved the way for an emperor, Napoleon.

Don't seek successes as the world considers success. They only increase vanity. Bear with resignation your own burden and that of your heredity. Learn from Jesus who was "meek and lowly in heart," content to be a carpenter, an unloved rabbi who went around villages teaching and then was crucified. A resurrection followed.

"I will make with them a covenant of peace." (EZE 34:25)

The Jewess, Simone Weil, escaped from Nazi Germany to Britain. There she died from malnutrition and tuberculosis because she had decided to eat only the ration which the population received in the Nazi-occupied regions. She left behind many books of deep Christian thought, though she was never baptized. She did not join a church so that she would not put a distance between her and the unhappy multitude of unbelievers. She was a soul with a special calling.

She could not endure what is wrongly called the traditional in the church. She thought that tradition did not consist in faithfully keeping old ashes, but in keeping the old fire burning by continually adding new fuel.

She could not imagine what would happen if Jesus would suddenly appear on the front between the lines dividing armies and tell the Christians on both sides, "Love one another as I loved you." He would fall dead riddled with bullets from both sides. On Sunday, the Christ-killers of both armies would worship the One whom they had killed and each would pray for the victory of their fatherland, which would mean the defeat of the adversary.

Many Christian thinkers suffered because of our inconsistency in love. War, class struggles, revolutions, as well as dissensions among Christians are great blasphemies because they are at the opposite pole from the words, "God is love."

"Blessed are the peacemakers: for they shall be called the children of God" (MTT 5:9). Let us seek peace with all men, insofar as it depends upon us.

"God blessed the seventh day." (GEN 2:3)

In the Bible the figure 7 is the symbol of holiness.

"Enoch also, the seventh from Adam, prophesied" (JUD 14). Every seventh year the land had to remain untilled. When seven times seven years passed, the Jews had the year of Jubilee, in which all the land sold in the meantime returned to its first possessor. The days of the creation were seven; seven of each clean animal were saved from the flood. In the Gospel of John, Jesus says in seven ways who He is. On the cross He pronounces seven words. The Book of Revelation contains letters to seven churches, etc.

Why is just the figure 7 the sacred figure? The Chaldeans did not have our decimal system, but a heximal one, e.g. six figures and a zero. The decimal system is arbitrary. In the computers men use the binary system, having only a 1 and a 0. In the heximal system, our 7 was written 10, because there were no more than six figures. Seven became the holy figure because in looking to its written form "10" it symbolized the fact that if you put before the 0, sign of human nothingness, the 1, sign of the one God, the insignificant man becomes important, more important than all the simple figures.

The Jews were descendants of the Chaldeans. So the 7 became their holy figure. In opposition to 7, 6, being the last simple figure, became the symbol of everything petty. The number of the apocalyptic beast is six, six, and again six (REV 13:18), which means a trifle, a trifle, and again a trifle. A lamb can destroy it.

If you are an impersonation of the 7, a man who has denied himself and has become a 0; and if God, "the one," has put Himself as a shield before you, then don't fear huge beasts. They are paper tigers. You will be the victor.

"Blessed are the meek: for they shall inherit the earth." (MTT 5:5)

Compare Washington to Napoleon.

Washington was modest. He desired freedom for a country and obtained it. With this he was satisfied. When the crown was offered to him, he refused. He left behind a new, free state.

Napoleon was eager for his own renown. Being general of the republic was not enough. Consul was not enough; it must be prime consul. In the end he became emperor. He had to depose other kings and replace them with his family. He fought in Egypt and in Moscow, where he had no business to be. He died in exile, a prisoner. His empire is no more.

How many are your preoccupations? No one can do everything without bringing everything into a mess. No one can seek his own renown without getting the reputation of being self-seeking and arrogant.

"Be fruitful, and multiply." (GEN 1:28)

Jesus did not marry, though it was considered shameful for a rabbi in His time to be a bachelor. He might have been loved by many girls. He who was "in favour with God and man" (LUK 2:52), must surely have been in favor also with girls. He was human. He might also have had some preferential love, but renounced it for the calling He had from the Father.

He did not impose the same attitude upon others. To the contrary, He honored the marriage feast in Cana with His presence. God's Word also teaches "Marriage is honourable in all" (HEB 13:4); not only in conversations between marriage partners and common meals, but also in the sex play and sexual intercourse.

Rank and file Christians may choose to be or not to be married. Bishops are obliged by the Bible to have a wife (1TM 3:2). Chrysostom said, "The first degree of chastity is pure virginity, the second is faithfulness in marriage. The chaste love in marriage is a second kind of virginity."

Enjoy fully sexual life in marriage. Overcome medieval prejudices which cause people to consider sexuality as something dirty. The One who made sexual organs, who commanded, "Be fruitful and multiply" and inspired the Bible which teaches that "they shall be one flesh," surely likes it when you exercise your sexual functions in marriage, as He likes every other good thing you do.

There is nothing wrong or shameful about sex in marriage. Let us thank God for this beautiful gift He gave to mankind.

Let spinsters and bachelors also be thankful for their estate. It is a calling apart with its own blessings, and often contains opportunities which married people don't have. It is a simple fact that under persecution, bachelors and spinsters resisted better than those who had to be concerned about a family.

"Marriage is honourable in all." (HEB 13:4)

Every marriage is an adventure. Only great love can make possible the happy cohabitation of two very different persons. Where love is missing, marriage can become fornication with legal documents.

Let us free sexuality from any connection with commercialism. No one can sanctify a marriage whose motives were the wealth of the girl, or the high position of the man. Let us free marriage from problems which are foreign to it: denomination, nationality, race, and party. It is surely ideal if the two partners belong to the same religion, but no one can dictate with whom someone should fall in love. Romeo and Juliet had to die because they belonged to families which had quarreled. Must love die because Catholics have quarreled with Protestants, Jews with Arabs, and blacks with whites? Cannot two persons love and live in harmony even if they do not agree in all matters?

Women are used unnaturally when they are treated as mere objects for pleasure; when they are used as dolls or dressed and ornamented as advertisements for your high social position; when they become idols for which you give up moral duties; when they are made into slaves.

You cannot impose upon today's woman-who can be a doctor, an engineer, or an officer-unjunctions 2000 years old, that say she must be submissive to her husband. It was not Christ's desire, but the backward situation of women at that time, which led to giving such a commandment. Now a cultured woman must be her husband's equal, treated with awe and love, as Christ loved His church.

"The just shall live by his faith." (HAB 2:4)

In the Talmud (Makkoth) it is written: Rabbi Simla said, "613 commandments have been given to Moses ... David came and reduced them to 11. They are: 1) to walk uprightly, 2) to work righteousness, 3) to speak the truth in your heart, 4) not to backbite with the tongue, 5) not to do evil to the neighbour, 6) not to take up a reproach against the neighbour, 7) to have contempt for a vile person, 8) to honor them that fear the Lord, 9) not to swear, 10) not to put out money for usury, 11) not to take reward against the innocent. (PSA 15)

"Isaiah reduced them to six: 1) to walk righteously, 2) to speak uprightly, 3) to despise the gain of oppression, 4) not to take bribes, 5) to stop your ears from hearing of blood, 6) to shut your eye from seeing evil. (ISA 33:15,16)

"Micah came and reduced them to three: 1) to do justly, 2) to love mercy, and 3) to walk humbly with God. (MIC 6:8) "

Rabbi Nachman, son of Isaac, added: Habakkuk reduced them to one: "The just shall live by his faith."

Faith is the great principle of which all the commandments are the elaboration, and which gives them value. Commandments fulfilled without faith do not please God.

Paul mentions this verse of Habakkuk repeatedly. Luther rediscovered its value at the time of the Reformation. If the many commandments are cumbersome for you and you are disoriented, stick to one: have faith in the Lord Jesus and you will live.

"Go and sell that thou hast, and give to the poor." (MTT 19:21)

It is said about Father Serapion that he found in Alexandria a poor man bitten by the cold. He said to himself, "How can I, who am considered to be an ascetic, wear a garment while this poor man, or rather Christ, suffers from the cold? Surely, if I allow him to die from the cold, I will be condemned for homicide on the day of judgment." He undressed himself and gave to the poor his garment.

Then he sat down with his gospel to read. A police constable passed, and seeing him naked, asked, "Father Serapion, who has deprived you of your garments?" He answered "It is the one about whom this book speaks."

Later, he saw a man led to prison because he could not pay his debts. So Serapion sold the gospel and paid the debt.

When he re-entered naked into his cell, his disciple asked him, "Abba, where is your garment?" He answered: "I sent it where we will need it." The disciple asked again, "Where is your gospel?" He replied, "He who told me every day, 'Sell all you have and give to the poor' asked me for it. So I sold it in order to have more confidence on the day of judgment."

Why should we be satisfied with little faith or wavering faith, when we have before our eyes so many splendid examples of consistent faith? Gamblers put all their possessions on a card. We know in whom we have believed. It is the eternal God, Creator of heaven and earth. Let us rely on Him fully and do to our utmost what He commands.

"Ye are a chosen generation." (1PE 2:9)

How do we recognize one of God's elect? By his humility.

The Lord made Abraham a great man, yet the "friend of God" said, "Behold, I ... am but dust and ashes" (GEN 18:27). Though Moses and Aaron dealt with powerful rulers in the name of God, they acted like servants when they spoke even to rebels: "Hear, I pray you," and "What is Aaron?" (NUM 16:8,11). God made David the greatest king on earth, yet he said, "I am a worm, and no man" (PSA 22:6). Lord called Paul to become the greatest of apostles, yet he wrote, "I am the least of the apostles, that am not meet to be called an apostle" 1CO 15:9). The elect of God do not feel superior to their fellow men. They fulfill, in its strictest sense, the commandment, "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself" (LEV 19:18). The sentence in Hebrew could be translated literally, "Love thy neighbor: he is as thyself" - of the same caliber, of the same value, with sins and virtues like your own. That should be reason enough to love him. Election is by grace, without any merit of ours. It does not justify a feeling of superiority. It reduces us rather to the state of servants of our fellow men.

"Present your bodies a living sacrifice." (ROM 12:1)

When the Earl of Morton, regent of Scotland, told a committee of the General Assembly that they were holding a convocation of the king's subjects and that it was treasonable for them to meet without the king's permission, Andrew Melville answered: "If this be so, then Christ and His apostles must have been guilty of treason, for they called together great multitudes without asking permission of the magistrates."

The regent growled in anger, "There will never be quietness in this country till half a dozen of you will be hanged or banished."

Melville replied, "Threaten your courtiers after this manner. It is the same to me whether I rot in the air or in the ground. The earth is the Lord's. I have been ready to give my life where it would not be half so well expended. Let God be glorified."

The Huguenot Admiral Coligny had been wounded for his evangelical faith. The surgeon had amputated his finger and cut the bullet from his arm. "Nothing happens," Coligny said, "but by the will of God. Why do you weep? I am happy in being thus wounded in God's cause. Pray that He may strengthen me. I forgive with all my heart him who fired upon me and those who incited him."

A thrust of a sword to the hilt into the admiral's heart finished him.

Then his corpse was thrown from the balcony.

With this infamous deed the night of Bartholomew started, when thousands of men who also thought like Coligny were killed. Monks encouraged the murderers with the words, "The church revives by the death of heretics."

The Evangelical church has had great men like Knox, who prayed, "O God, give me Scotland or I die." May we learn from them to be men and women of faithful prayer, ready to suffer and die for the holy cause.

"Whether therefore ye eat, or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God." (1CO 10:31)

It is not true that men are converted only through sermons or books or personal witness, which means through words. If you eat and drink and do all things to the glory of God, men should be able to arrive at the truth through watching your behavior at meals, in business, or entertainment.

Someone came to a believer and asked him about the way of truth. The answer was: "Do you hear the murmuring of the brook? There is the entrance." He could have pointed also toward every other phenomenon of God-created nature or any manifestation of a saint.

The mystic is - in the words of John of Ruysbroek - a man who has climbed the tree of faith, which grows from above downward, because its roots are in God. Not only words, but also the grotesqueness of every moment of such climbing speaks about the source. There was a time when God had not created me, though in His plan I had been an elect person before the foundation of the world. I was in Him; we were one. Then He created me. So I became a creature and He became my God.

When I will arrive at the top in my climbing, that is, to the root from where I came, I will cease to be a creature. God then ceases to be my God. I will have become a partaker of the divine being. We have become one. This oneness, this uniqueness manifests itself in everything I do, even if it is far away from religion. It manifests itself though this treasure is contained in earthly vessels.

If someone does not see my participation in the divine nature, it is because a man who has not been born again cannot see the kingdom of heaven (JHN 3:3). He would not have recognized Jesus to be the Son of God.

Continue to be what you are. Angelus Silesius says that our bodies are shells, in which the Spirit of eternity wishes to brood his little ones,

For those illuminated by God, ow[?] manner of eating, drinking, and other things of daily life reveal the mystery of our divine nature.

"The LORD gave, and the LORD hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord." (JOB 1:21)

There was once a man who, when his son died, did not exhibit the terrible grief customary at such occasions. His friends said, "You loved your son dearly. How is it that you are so composed now that he is dead?"

The man replied, "There was a time when I had no son. I did not grieve on that account. Now that he died, I am in the same condition as before. Why should I not keep my peace?"

Believers can remain strong in difficult circumstances.

Confucius once met a man clothed in a deerskin, girdled with a rope and playing on a lute. He asked him, "What makes you so happy?"

The man replied, "I have many things to make me happy. Man is the crown of creation. Lo, God made me a man, not an animal. Some die in childhood. I have become an adult. Many are in prison or bound to a sick bed. I am free and healthy. I ate this morning. I have food enough for tonight. How else could I be than content?"

Only when someone is thus free of earthly cares, can he make real advances in spiritual life.

Many a man has unreasonable fears. If your speech is sweet, how can the echo be otherwise than sweet? If you walk with the body straight, how can your shadow be otherwise than straight? A Christian is not afraid of anyone or any thing.

Jesus was anointed with an oil of gladness above His comrades. He anoints His disciples with the same oil. We never lose anything. He is the Lord, our lover, who takes from us some things in order to multiply and then restitute them.

"Some of them of understanding shall fall, to try them, and to purge, and to make them white." (DAN 11:35)

Jesus foretold His disciples that on the evening of His betrayal they would forsake Him. He foretold Peter that he would deny Him. The strange thing is that none of His disciples begged Him to save them from such a fate, though it seems that this would have been the time to say, "Lead us not into temptation."

The pronouns in the Lord's Prayer are plural. We say, "Lead us not into temptation" for the whole church of Christ that she may not fall away. As for me, I let God decide if He wishes to pass me through the experience of a fall.

If He decides it, we even fall gladly, knowing that God's bottom waits for us. If He pushes me, the fall will not hurt me. It is part of God's providence and it fulfills a good purpose.

Jesus told Peter that not only would he fall, but also that after recovery he would strengthen the brethren. Just after the fall and because of this experience, he was of an unequalled boldness, challenging the people on the day of Pentecost with harsh words which could have cost him his life.

Church history tells us that when sentenced to death, together with his wife, his last desire was to be crucified head down. He did not feel worthy to be crucified head up like his Master. On the cross he said, "In this topsy-turvy world I am now in the right position. I look up toward heaven as men should always do."

The child Jesus "is set for the fall and rising again of many in Israel" (LUK 2:34). Accept both destinies.

"If we say that we have fellowship with him, and walk in darkness, we lie, and do not the truth." (1JN 1:6)

The apostle deals here with the heresy widespread today called antinomianism (anti-law). The adherents of this doctrine believe that a man can live in sin or compromise with it and at the same time have fellowship with God. Antinomians never state their doctrine bluntly like this, but as a matter of fact this is their attitude in life.

The apostle deals gently with antinomians in his day. He writes, "If we say" this wrong thing, not, "if ~you~ say." He includes himself in the possibility of thinking falsely.

The verb for "to walk in darkness," which is a synonym of "to sin," is in the present subjunctive in this verse, indicating habitual action. The simple fact is that Christians sin, some of them often and gravely. This is so much the reality that the apostle writes, "If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves" (1JN 1:8). "And if any man sin, we have an Advocate with the Father" (1JN 2:1). But for the Christian, sin is not the usual attitude. It is a deviation from his habitual course. Children of God sin, but they don't allow sin to dominate them so much that righteousness would be excluded from their life. They walk in the light, not in the darkness. Just because they walk in the light, they are aware of their sinfulness and regret it.

As for those for whom sin is the program of life, no religiosity is of any avail. They cannot have communion with God.

We live in the last days. Morality, laws, and standards break down. The heresy of antinomianism, of lawlessness united with religiosity, is very dangerous today. Let us beware of it.

"Christ Jesus made himself of no reputation." (PHP 2:7)

Niccolo Paganini was one of the best violinists the world has ever seen. Even highly intelligent people like the German poet Henrich Heine, believed that Paganini had made a pact with the devil, giving him his soul for eternity, in exchange for genius, riches, and fame.

Paganini's rise to fame and fortune was difficult. Pursued by creditors he could not pay, he fled from Venice to Vienna, where he had to earn his living playing at marriages or going from saloon to saloon in the slums. He would not be accepted in better restaurants because of his poor clothing. Once while he played the violin in a third-class restaurant, a student gave him a few coins on the condition that he " stop this unbearable noise."

The insult fired Paganini with a mad ambition. He won a competition in the palace of the crown prince. Henceforth a splendid career opened for him. He had world fame and unspeakable riches. Women offered themselves to him. Paganini had succeeded in life, but only through damning his soul. He was an unhappy man, seeking adulation, a money-grabber of unspeakable stinginess and, above all, full of envy of all other artists of the past, present, and future. Only his own art counted in his eyes.

He wrote his music in such difficult combinations of notes that no one except himself, who had a very large hand, will ever be able to play it. Although a millionaire, Paganini would pick up nails, bits of paper or rope which he found on the street, to save buying such articles. He ate the cheapest food. He refused women who loved him, because they might have cost him money.

Success at the price of happiness, costing the ability to enjoy it and to put it in the service of the One from whom it comes-this is the sad story of Paganini. Multiply your talents; seek success: but don't allow the tares of sin to grow in your heart. Relax when you seek success, enjoy it and help others to enjoy it.

"Sit down in the lowest room." (LUK 14:10)

Every one of us wishes growth, growth in wealth, a bigger house, a bigger business, a bigger church or mission, a bigger position. Why? Growth for growth's sake is the philosophy of the cancer cell.

There are many recipes for success. Jesus studied none of them. Instead He sought to be pleasant to His father and to faithfully fulfill His duty, whether it involved a cross or a crown.

Don't give up biblical principles. Don't marry for money, nor earn money dishonestly. Don't rise in politics through demagoguery. Don't call people to become church members without instructing them in the fact that this implies a Christian life. Don't lead a missionary work so that you might have a big income or a large number of converts, but so that the truth might remain in all its purity.

Never give up any slice of truth for ecumenicity's sake. Love everyone but acknowledge as a brother i n faith only the man who stands for the truth as contained in the Bible.

Don't be apologetic about being poor, unnoticed, belonging to some small church. Being ashamed of these, you will become big in the wrong way. Jesus was not ashamed of being a babe in a manger or a man crucified between thieves.

Don't try to be great through producing splits in someone else's family, business, church, or mission. Let the other one enjoy the leadership. Be ready to play the second violin. In this way you will enjoy your modest position much more than the unhappy "successful" people.

"Let all the earth keep silence before him." (HAB 2:20)

The prerequisite for apprehending God is silence. The radio and TV have to be switched off, as well as the noise of air-conditioners, dishwashers, and much talk.

Many souls never find the silent God because of the much noise in their homes.

There is much vain talk. I know no vain silence. Silence is a fullness of which words are only crumbs.

When you appreciate the Word or someone's words as being profound, remember that they come from deep silence. So why should you not come to the source of the river? Why do you stop at the words, "He will bring us to the source of living water"?

I have traveled around the world many times, but the most interesting journeys have been those I made in silence in the depths of my own heart, the only place where God wishes to meet me.

Forsake the outward noises, also the inward ones, the inner debates, the obsessions, the worries. Enter through the golden gate in the realm of silence where the Bridegroom waits for you.

"Mary said, Behold the handmaid of the Lord." (LUK 1:38)

The Virgin Mary has many virtues for which she is worthy of admiration. One of them is her spirit of independence.

She must have been a young peasant girl when the angel appeared to her. When the angel told her that she was chosen to be the Lord's mother, she knew what she risked. Everyone, including her bridegroom, would consider that she had sinned. The punishment for unfaithfulness in betrothal was stoning. Twenty centuries have passed. She still is the subject of mockery in Communist countries, and not only there. She knew also the prophecies. Her song proves it. So she realized that becoming the mother of the Lord, she would become also a mother of sorrows. She knew that a sword would pierce her heart, too, when nails pierced the hands and feet of her son.

One would expect that she would have asked from the angel time for reflection and would have consulted with her bridegroom, her parents if they still were alive, her older relatives, or some priest.

The whole plan of salvation would have remained unfulfilled if she had taken counsel from men. Like Paul later, who when he had seen Jesus, "conferred not with flesh and blood" (GAL 1:16), the young girl, Mary, also asked no one, but said spontaneously to the angel, "Be it unto me according to thy word."

The chastest of women, the example of purity took upon herself the shame of a premarital pregnancy. She knew that what she did was right.

The biblical ideal is that of a submissive womanhood, of a silent woman. However, the submissiveness of a Christian woman is not one of weakness. She is obedient to her husband because she is great and can give him an example of humility. She can be silent because she has much to say and can show everyone that deep silence speaks. She can be dependent because she had inwardly acquired a great independence, which is her love-gift to her husband.

"His decease which he should accomplish at Jerusalem." (LUK 9:31)

Enemies of Christ spread the lie about the collusion of the church with Nazism. They hide the fact that Hitler killed four thousand Catholic priests and kept in prison many thousands of others. The number of Protestant pastors who have met the same fate is not known.

Not only priests, but tens of thousands of laymen also gave their lives for Christ in this period. As is always the case, the church had at that time its Judases also; but those who represent the church are its saints.

August 14 is the day of the execution of the priest Jacob Gapp. Before being led to death, he wrote: "I consider this day as the most beautiful of my life.... I naturally passed through many difficult hours, but I could prepare myself well for death.... Everything passes except heaven. I pray for all; I pray also for my fatherland."

The priest John Steinmeyer wrote in his last letter, "My demand for pardon has been refused. Today at l P.M. the flight to heaven ... I die gladly."

The priest Bernhard Liechtenberg told a fellow prisoner, when both had been beaten with sticks and had their heads put in barrels filled with excrement: "I wish nothing else than what my Savior wills. Quiet. He was spat upon on the way to the cross." He died praying.

Jesus has accomplished many things. The most important was that He accomplished the right decease in Jerusalem. His death had a purpose: He died for our sins. It had the right manner: He died praying, caring for His beloved, opening the kingdom for a thief who was a fellow sufferer.

Not everyone is called to martyrdom. But every Christian can give a good testimony by dying in a dignified, hopeful, and loving manner. Your death should be an accomplishment.

"Be not forgetful to entertain strangers: for thereby some have entertained angels unawares." (HEB 13:2)

Those who entertain the greatest number of angels, being unaware of it, are the Communist prison directors. Here is one such incident.

An Orthodox priest in the Soviet Union worked in a garden. He observed a boy sneaking in to steal apples. He caught him with a strong grip on his hand. The boy was deadly afraid, expecting a beating, but the priest filled his pockets with apples. He put a few more in his hands and told him, "You are welcome any time. Only enter through the gate and bring other boys with you. I have plenty of apples for all of you." Soon some thirty boys gathered regularly in his garden. He instructed them in the gospel, though it is strictly forbidden by the Soviet authorities to teach religion to youth. He also taught them religious songs. After a time the converted boys brought their parents to these meetings. An underground church had begun.

A teacher discovered the "crime" and denounced the priest. He disappeared forever in a Soviet prison. Like an angel, he appeared from nowhere, then went out of sight, but he left behind him a fragrance of heaven and souls inebriated with the love of God.

This was a priest of the True Orthodox Church, followers of Patriarch Tikhon who had refused to cooperate with the Communists. Metropolitan Venianmin and innumerable other priests have been shot, but this church lives and conquers through love. We pity the Communists who do not know that they, unaware, keep angels in their prisons.

The Baptist pastor Odintsov did not allow the atheist government to dictate to him as to how he should lead Christ's church. He was arrested and literally thrown before dogs to be tom to pieces. The director again had had an angel in his jail.

A chill passes through a Christian's spine when he receives a brother. What if he is an angel? The Galatians received St. Paul as an angel of God, even as Christ Jesus (GAL 4:14).

"Jesus said unto her: Woman, what have I to do with thee?" (JHN 2:4)

The German mystic Meister Eckhart wrote, "Woman is the noblest name for soul." Staupitz, Luther's confessor, wrote, "The man who wishes to bring fruits for eternal life must become a woman." With Jesus, woman was 8 name of honor. He addressed His mother in this way, because she was the woman predicted in GEN 3:15, whose seed would bruise the head of the serpent.

The words surely are not words of rebuke. The only evangelist to report them is John, who must have heard the story from the Lord's mother herself. He had taken her to his house after the Crucifixion (JHN 19:27).

The words sound harsh in translation. The Greek original is, ~Ti emoi kai soi, an expression frequently used in the mystery religions of ancient times and having approximately the following sense: "What strange fluid is circulating between us two? How is it you guessed my intention?"

He also explains to her, "My hour has not come yet." His time to do a miracle will have arrived only when the last drop of wine has been exhausted, so He should not be under suspicion that He mixed water with wine. Man's extremity is God's opportunity.

However, his mother has interceded. So He does not wait longer. He who yielded to the prayer of a Canaanite woman (MTT 15:28), how will He not yield to the request of His holy mother?

She knew what He would do; so she said to the servants, " Whatsoever he says unto you, do it." She was sure that He could only order something good, even when what he ordered was strange, like filling pots with water as though the guests were desirous to take a bath, when they needed wine.

Let this be our principle of life also: to do whatever He says.

"Michael the archangel, when contending with the devil ... durst not bring against him a railing accusation." (JUD 9)

Historians of old, Philo of Alexandria and Flavius Josephus describe Pilate as guilty of corruption, insults, rapine, intrigues on the people, arrogance, murders of innocent victims, and constant savagery. The Talmud has strong words about the high priests of Jesus' time.

The Gospels use absolutely no epithets. It is because the evangelists did not hate. They said only what was needed to stimulate faith and action, not what would make the adversary despicable in the eyes of men.

Love is the only possible attitude for a Christian. The tree does not withdraw its protecting shadow from the woodcutter, nor the moon its light from the hovel of the outcast.

In LAM 2:21, Jeremiah tells God, "Thou hast slain [virgins and young men] in the day of thine anger." He prefers to accuse God, who is not reached by our mean words, in order to avoid the great crime of speaking mean words against the actual killers.

Criminals deserve our pity, our love, yea, our respect, for the great suffering they bring upon themselves. To call them names is not a Christian trait. The most terrible waste is the waste of mind. It is such a waste to invent something that would put an adversary to shame.

Christ's death was not the work of some murderers. It was the fulfillment of a plan of God. God the Creator of all beings is also the One who dissolves them in order to resurrect them again. He might sometimes use wicked men to bring to Himself His elected ones. They see all as coming from God, and therefore use no bad words against their murderers.

How much less should we use mean words against those who wrong us.

"Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image." (EXO 20:4)

When we read in the Bible about the idols to which men bow, we think that these belonged to the past. We don't realize how backward a great part of humanity still is. Animism and fetishism are among the most widespread religions even today.

One example is the Konkombas in Ghana (Africa). Their highest worship is given to a fetish, which they have to forsake when they become Christians. This is not easy. They still believe that the fetish wields great power. It makes the owner rich, gives him many wives, health, etc. They bring chicken, goats, and sheep as sacrifices to the fetish.

The Grumade fetish asks from time to time for blood of men. Missionaries testify that a witchdoctor, in service to this fetish, poisoned a man. His body was completely swollen in agony. Then the chief of the tribe ordered the witchdoctor to bring him back to life or he would be in trouble. Soon the swelling passed.

The natives value this fetish above their families.

Some Konkombas would like to combine the Christian faith with keeping the fetish, which is not accepted by missionaries.

Let us keep in prayer those primitives who bow to fetishes, as well as the many superstitious among modern men who have a belief in luck-bringing amulets and other idols.

"Abraham begat Isaac." (MTT 1:2)

The Authorized Version says, "Abraham begat." We would like to translate in the present tense, "begets." The Greek form of the verb used here is called, "aorist," which means etymologically, "without horizon." It is much used in the New Testament and has the connotation of an eternal present, of events outside of time.

In Greek, the aorist is used in the genealogy of the Lord because what we have in this chapter is not only a historical record of what happened once. A comparison with the genealogy of Jesus in Luke 3 shows that they don't match. They do not have to match because they are not only history.

The artificial reduction of the number of ancestors to forty-two and the willful omission of some ancestors from the genealogy shows that this list has another purpose. It was a ladder of initiation. Mature souls in early Christianity, when taught to change from simple believers into men who, like the Virgin Mary, would have Jesus living in them, meditated successively on the lives of Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and all the others until they came to Mary and identified spiritually with her. The genealogy in Luke is another procedure of initiation looking retrospectively from the height of Jesus-likeness to the whole past history.

Even if not in a sophisticated and methodical manner as in times before, every Christian passes through such processes. The Abraham state begets the Isaac state. Therefore the Greek does not use the past tense, but the aorist, the tense without horizon. We are meant not to be slaves of our time, but to live outside of time.

"If any man will come after me, let him deny himself." (LUK 9:23)

A mocker asked a believer, "If you say that Godhead is everywhere, is it also in this dog?" The answer was, "Bow-wow." A wise answer, the answer the dog would give to such a question put to him.

To every question you ask someone else, you will obtain an answer according to that person's constitution. In this respect, men are not different than dogs. You ask high questions about Godhead. No man has any other answer than the "bow-wow" of a very small creature.

We all see things from our limited point of view. Every point of view is a point of blindness because it incapacitates us totally for every other perspective. Lifting up your eyes, you see the ceiling, but not the floor. Looking to the door, I exclude the window from my sight.

Jesus gives manifold salvation, a salvation from points of view, too. The Christian denies himself, which means that he denies himself. He does not look on things anymore from a certain position, because he has no position. The foxes have their holes and the birds their nests, but the Son of man does not have where to place His head.

Not having a certain place for your head frees you. You don't see things anymore from one side or the other. Your answer about the Godhead will not be one of the common "bow-wow." You will have the intuition of the whole, and you will be its witness.

"This man receiveth sinners." (LUK 15:2)

Devil's Island" is the common name of a cluster of little islands ten miles from the South American coast. They are surrounded by an unruly sea infested with sharks. For years it was populated only by hard-core criminals. They did not work much because the climate makes work almost impossible.

For most of them, drink had been the first cause of their downfall. (Men of the liquor industry should be compelled to spend a year with the victims of their vice in a place like this.) A poll established also that 80 percent are children of alcoholics or syphilitics. The vice of their fathers sentenced them to hard labor.

In 1933, officers of the French Salvation Army offered to live and work for Christ among the most rotten and decayed, exposed to insects and pests. One officer said, "Without the love of God it would be impossible to love such men. I shiver to let my thoughts go into this infected place."

Notwithstanding, they went. Here is the description of a meetings "Criminals with shaven heads, bare breasts and sleeves rolled up showing the tatooing. One bears the picture of his wife and child, remarkably done, in two medallions. Others have inscriptions such as, 'Child of sorrows,' or 'Oh, my mother, if thou but saw thy son.' They listen silently with impassive faces."

They did not remain impassive forever. The Salvation Army had a recruit among the criminals. He had committed murder. The police knew nothing about him. Converted at a meeting of the Army, he confessed his crime and was sent to Devil's Island. There he helped the Salvationists. He said, "Would that I had known the one Son of man who saved me, before knowing the sons of men who destroyed me!"

Thanks to the missionary, Charles Pean, and his colleagues many were saved and their situation was improved. Now Devil's Island has ceased to be a penal institution. The Salvation Army has learned from Jesus love toward criminals.

"What he saith unto you, do it." (JHN 2:5)

Therese of Lisieux was the last of several girls in a poor family. One Christmas, a case with toys left over from her older sisters was presented to her and she was asked which one she would like to choose. She answered, "I choose all of them." At the age of fifteen, she entered a Carmelite convent and had to fix her intention upon one specific Christian virtue which she would have to practice above all others. She said again, "I will choose all of them."

Even so the mother of the Lord teaches us to do whatsoever Her son says, without any discrimination. If you choose among the commandments of the Lord, you really say, "I will not do what He commands, but what I like. " We have to obey like soldiers, to go into battle when commanded even if it means sure death and to obey also when He commands what we consider to be shameful retreat.

Moses told the people, "Ye shall observe to do therefore as the LORD your God hath commanded you: ye shall not turn aside to the right hand or to the left" (DEU 5:32). Do commandments have a right and a left side?

The commandment says, "Do not steal." You can steal in order to enjoy more pleasures. You can steal in order to help the poor. You shall not lie. You can lie in order to deceive for selfish reasons. You can lie in order to save lives. There exist sins of the right side and of the left side, but we are meant not to reason at all when He commands. We are simply to obey and to avoid sin.

We have general rules of conduct which are absolutes, unless we have a special command to do otherwise in exceptional circumstances. Love is the supreme standard. Do everything He commands you, however strange or unsuitable His commandment might seem to you.

"I am ... the truth." (JHN 14:6)

Two men, Truth and Falsehood, went swimming. Falsehood stole Truth's clothes, and Truth, rather than lower himself to wear Falsehood's clothes, chose to go without. Hence the expression "the naked truth." Falsehood, in the guise of Truth, goes about deceiving mankind to this day.

Truth can never compromise with Falsehood. They can never walk the same way. It is something else with ~the man~ taken in falsehood. Toward him, Truth is full of love and tries to convince him to leave behind the stolen clothes and stan walking naked, too.

Henry IV of England was a brave man. Therefore he is known as Henry the Great. He was truthful himself and great in kindness toward those with false attitudes.

He once was told about a certain captain who had spread slander against him and had rebelled. Though he had been pardoned and had obtained many benefits, yet for all this he continued not to love the king. Henry IV said, "I will do him so many kindnesses that I will force him to love me whether he will or not." It is thus that naked truth wins false men who disguise themselves as sincere.

Henry IV used to say to those who admired his proceedings, "A man catches more flies with one spoonful of honey than with twenty tons of vinegar."

Love the man in error; love also the man who lives in deliberate falsehood. Just remember: truth is truth and falsehood is falsehood. Never confuse or mix them.

"There are diversities of gifts." (1CO 12:4)

Around A.D. 165, Bishop Carpus was burned alive because he had refused to offer incense to the heathen gods. While the henchmen arranged the stake, he said, "We all have the same Eve as mother, and what things men do to men." When he was mounted on the stake, his face shone. He was asked about it. He answered, "I have been raptured from this world and have seen the glory of the Lord."

St. Mechthild of Magdeburg knew how to write exquisitely about divine mysteries: "The sweet dew of Trinity sprinkles the flower of the elect maid with water from the well of the eternal Godhead. The fruit of the flower is an immortal God and a mortal man and an eternal warrant of life eternal. Our Saviour became our bridegroom."

She knew how to write otherwise, too. She wrote to her bishop, "Your honor has rotted in the mire of vices. You are poor like a beggar, because you want the kingly treasure of love. Jesus will come against you with judgment." For letters like this she was much hated.

Frederic the Wise, duke of Saxonia, when told to conquer the town of Erfurt which had rebelled against him, and when assured that it would cost at the utmost the life of only five men, answered, "One would be too much for me." He preferred peace. He protected Luther, though this was dangerous for his throne. When warned about it, he answered, "I would prefer to take a stick and to leave as a beggar than to act knowingly against God."

Different saints, different callings, but everyone an example of obedience for us.

"What do ye do more than others?" (MTT 5:47)

A Russian revolutionist, Zasulitch, in Czarist times shot General Trepov for flogging a student in the Paviak prison. In 1907, another revolutionist woman, Ragozinikova, fashionably dressed, called at the Central prison in Petersburg and asked to speak with the commandant. She had come to protest the government's policy of flogging her imprisoned comrades. Inside her dress were sewed thirteen pounds of dynamite and a detonator. When the commandant appeared, she killed him with her revolver. The dynamite was for another purpose. She knew that she would be arrested and taken to the headquarters of the Secret Police. Not knowing any other way to penetrate it, she intended to blow it up with herself. But she was searched and the dynamite discovered.

She was sentenced to be hanged. Awaiting execution, she wrote to her family, "Death itself is nothing.... Frightful only is the thought of dying without having achieved what I could have done." When she was hanged, Ragozinikova was twenty years old.

Christian brethren and sisters are flogged today in many Communists Moslem, and heathen countries. Worse, they are tortured. Surely, we will not imitate the methods of the revolutionists. Notwithstanding, we need souls as resolute as Zasulitch and Ragozinikova to defend their fellow believers, to protest, to help, to fight for them. Today Jesus says that our courage and zeal should exceed that of the revolutionists and terrorists, as we seek to help our Christian brethren and sisters in bondage.

"My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" (MTT 27:46)

During the great terror when Tito first came to power, one of his purge victims, a lay assistant in an Orthodox church, hanged himself before he could be shot. He left this note for his wife: "I have gone to remind God of a world He has forgotten."

"Where is God?" Many believing men have asked this question when passing through great sufferings. Job and David questioned God. Even Jesus did it when hanging on a cross.

You may have some heavy sorrow, and doubt about God may nag you.

When Saul of Tarsus, the persecutor, was converted, the first thing the Lord showed him was, "how great things he must suffer." (ACT 9:16). Parents and professors and clergy should teach children and adults sufferology, without the knowledge of which it is impossible to lead the right life. "Man is born unto trouble, as the sparks fly upward" (JOB 5:7). We are taught many useless things. We are not taught to suffer with understanding. Therefore the despair in sorrows.

Life and reality are hidden behind veils. The Jewish high priest had to pass through two thick veils before entering in the most holy place of the temple in Jerusalem. We don't know whether a veiled Moslem lady smiles at us or frowns; and we don't see the intentions of God because of the veils which cover Him.

The curtain was rent at the death of Jesus. Soon after this, He was seen resurrected. The veil was rent for you, too. You will see that all things work together for your good. God is very near you. He does not forget you.

"He ... became obedient." (PHP 2:8)

When Bibles were written by hand, a king of France asked a monk to write for him a Scripture without the verses in which whoredom is condemned.

If it were left up to most of us, we would leave out of the Bible everything which enjoins obedience. Once this is missing, everything else is bearable for us.

Obedience to Christ must be total. Once He orders something, we should not ask ourselves what the results will be. A soldier who advances in obedience against a well-armed enemy in the face of cannon fire knows that he has a great chance of dying if he obeys the orders. This is what obedience means.

Can obedience to a commandment of Christ make us lose many possibilities of doing good? We don't have better minds than Jesus. He surely has weighed also the pros and cons. If He says something, we obey without reflecting. We don't delay, saying that wise men think things over before doing them. The psalmist writes, "I made haste, and delayed not to keep thy commandments" (PSA 119:60).

In our day Christians do not help the poor because welfare agencies do it. Hospitals take care of the sick, orphanages take care of the fatherless, but institutions don't have the touch of personal love.

In former Portuguese Africa, blacks were observed walking miles with their sick past the government hospital to a much more primitive Christian clinic. When asked why, seeing that the medicines were the same, they replied, "This might be so, but it is not the same hands."

Obey and love and add your personal touch to the good done in the world.

"This beginning of miracles did Jesus in Cana." (JHN 2:11)

Missionaries who have lived among savages all report that they seemed to the natives to be miracle workers. Missionaries knew how to make water to burn, even stinking water (gasoline); they made fire in a minute through lighting a match, whereas the natives had to rub two pieces of wood together for a long time. Missionaries could hunt with guns; they could sew; they could talk to each other without opening their mouths, by inscribing some strange signs on paper.

Pearl Buck tells in her novels that the Chinese in remote regions disbelieved her when she said that in England houses were built over houses (she meant apartments) and that carts needed no horses to make them go. The Chinese considered these to be fairy tales.

When Marco Polo, the first European to return from China, said that he had seen yellow men with slanted eyes and pigtails, he got the nickname, "Marco Polo the liar."

What then is the miraculous? It is what a being who is superior physically, intellectually, and spiritually knows and can do, which the inferior being cannot know and do.

Jesus was a superior being-God living as man among us. He could do what men normally cannot do.

Now He is in heaven and has all power. Don't limit His possibilities to normal human experience. He can do above all we can imagine. Come to Him with all your problems and those of mankind. Have confidence in His miraculous power. He can change water into wine. He can change tears into cause for joy.

"Wine that maketh glad the heart of man." (PSA 104:15)

The Talmud, one of the holy books of the Jews, says that men will be accountable before God for every pure joy they could have had an have missed.

This thought is right. Everything God created is good - the bacilli which produce the fermentation of grape juice, too. Sin has changed many things into occasions of sadness, but there has remained still, "a time to laugh ... and a time to dance" (ECC 3:4).

When Jesus changed water into wine in Cana, He showed us that well-understood religion does not exclude human pleasures and joys, providing that they are not inherently evil or that they are not the prominent preoccupation of life. Within these limits, a Christian should share the joys of the world.

Never believe that Jesus, who changed an enormous quantity of water into wine at Cana, reproaches you for a joy. Remember also that His wine, just because it was made out of water, might not have had the intoxicating effects of the everyday wine.

The Christian must thoroughly renounce sin, but not the things which make life to be really life. Beauty, art, joy unite man with God. Religion contains an ever-fresh love which is grateful for the happiness in life.

"This is love, that we walk after his commandments." (2JN 6)

Men are trying hard to be clever and smart and modern, when what is needed is adherence to the old verities.

When Queen Victoria's ministers were urging on her certain mattes of state as being wise procedure, she said impatiently, "Don't talk to me of what is expedient. Tell me what is right."

Some Christians joined the Communist Secret Police in order to use their positions to help the church. They had not foreseen all the consequences. They were commanded to murder. If they obeyed, they would retain their rank and a slight possibility of mitigating other horrors. If they refused in the name of truth, they would die without anyone ever learning of their stand. The murder they were ordered to commit would be carried out anyway. They would die without being useful to anyone through their death.

So life is sometimes rooted in horror. Every grain is dunged with filth before becoming an ear of wheat.

What has one to choose when he has before him only tragic alternatives? Don't choose the expedient. Choose God's commandment: "Do not kill."

In a concentration camp in Nikolaev, a Jew was ordered to hang six other Jews who had committed no other crime than being Jewish. If he did it, six innocents would die. If he refused, seven Jews would die and seven old mothers would weep. He thought about his helpless mother and hanged his fellow Jews. He could never forgive himself. Had he refused, there would have been no regrets. Choose always God's commandment.

"Thy word is truth." (JHN 17:17)

What guarantee do we have that our New Testament is the same as that which was revealed in the first century to the apostles?

Well, the New Testament can claim one advantage over all the writings of old Greece–the age of its manuscripts.

The oldest complete manuscript of Homer we possess is from the tenth century A.D., which means it dates from 2000 years after the death of its author. There is an interval of 1600 years between the date when the poetry of Pindar was written (450 B.C.) and the oldest manuscript (A.D. 1150).

In contrast, the New Testament was finished by the year 100. The oldest complete manuscript dates from about the year A.D. 300, only two hundred years separating the two dates. Even for these two hundred years there exists a chain of rich quotations in the early writings of Christians which guarantee the authenticity of the first manuscripts. We possess 4000 old manuscripts of the New Testament, which can be compared with each other and give us the modern correct text.

We can rely on the teachings of the New Testament. Let us take heed to its principal teaching: "Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God" (JHN 3:5).

When we are born physically, we come in a sack of water. We all are born from water, but being born into this world does not make us heirs of heaven. The teaching of universal salvation can be dangerous. Jesus tells those who have been born from a sack of water that they need to be born from the Spirit, too.

Wesley preached endlessly about the same subject: "You must be born again." When asked why, he answered, "Because you must be born again."

Jesus said it. We can be sure that we have in our New Testament His authentic words.

"Straightway coming up out of the water." (MRK 1:10)

Soldiers begin to march the second they hear the command, "March."
The Gospel According to Mark is characterized by the astonishing repetition of the word, ~evthus~ which in Greek means, "straightway." Some feel that Mark was the rich ruler to whom the Lord had said, "Sell what you have and give to the poor." He had too many possessions. He left the Lord with sadness in his heart. He could not renounce so much. Later he regretted his disobedience and did what the Lord commanded him, although he had remorse for not having done it "straightway." This made him repeat this one word again and again, when needed and when not needed in his Gospel.
It is said about the cavaliers of earlier times that they slept with the spear and shield near them. So the Christian must be ready to obey a commandment the moment it is pronounced, even if it is at night. The bride says in Solomon's Song, "I sleep, but my heart awaketh" (SOS 5:2).
Mary at the marriage in Cana said, "Whatsoever he saith unto you, do it" (JHN 2:5). Be attentive. The words are not, "Do whatsoever He has said before."
It is written, "the word of God increased" (ACT 6:7). "The word of God grew and multiplied" (ACT 12:24). Christ did not speak only 2000 years ago. He has, not become dumb since. He gives teachings in every generation. He is a wonderful counselor (ISA 9:6) in your personal life today. Listen daily to Him and obey immediately what He tells you.

"The ox knoweth his owner." (ISA 1:3)

Our text makes a comparison between men on the one hand and oxen or asses on the other. The comparison is in favor of the animals.
The comparison would not be favorable for us even if we were measured with mice. Mice know how to establish causal relations between the eating of a food and death. If poisoned food has been given to them, the death of one of them is a warning for others. They would not touch the food.
Experiments were made with mice to whom poisons with delayed effect were given, e.g. kumaphen. The mice still found out the cause and transmitted genetically an attitude of refusal toward this poison to their offspring. Moreover, if mice who knew about a poison and had an adversity toward it had other mice put in their cage who knew nothing about the matter, the wise mice hindered those without knowledge from touching the poisoned food, using even violence, as we would try to overpower someone who wanted to commit suicide.

Mice know enough to beware themselves and to warn their comrades of what is deadly for them, even when death is a delayed effect. Yet we men, the crown of creation, do not beware of sin though it brings with it eternal death. We do not have at least as much zeal as mice have to warn others about sin. On the contrary, we sometimes attract others to sin and encourage them in it.

Jesus teaches us to learn from birds (MTT 6:26). Isaiah teaches us to learn from asses and oxen. Let us be ashamed to have to learn even from mice. Sin is poison. Abstain from it and restrain others.

"Forgetting those things which are behind." (PHP 3:13)

~Shema Israel, Adonai Eloheinu Adonai ehad.~

"Listen Israel, the Lord your God is one God." It was this prayer (the words above are their Hebrew original) that was on the lips of many Jews who went to Eichmann's gas chambers while he looked on smiling.

Some twenty years later he was captured by the Israeli Secret Police in Buenos Aires. In his provisional prison, he amazed the guards by reciting this same prayer; this was even more amazing since he claimed not to be a believer at all.

I have known well the world of murderers and big criminals. A mysterious identification with their victims happens in their souls. Mass murderers of Jews became much more obsessed with Jewishness than any Jew would be. Professional abortionists will be haunted by a world of children who point at them, putting the question, "Why did you kill me?" The man who dropped the atomic bomb on Hiroshima, when asked by reporters, "How do you feel about it?" answered, "How did they feel about it?"

We have many victims in life. Jesus became the ideal victim, the innocent lamb betrayed, insulted, wronged, killed for our misdoings. And He died with the words, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do."

Then He addresses Himself to us and says, "I, the victim, have forgiven you. All your victims are now in a world where forgiveness reigns. You are the only one who does not forgive yourself. You are haunted by what you have done. Accept forgiveness. Forgive yourself. The unhealthy identification with the men whom you have wronged will cease. You will have a new personality."

"Love of money is the root of all evil." (1TM 6:10)

It surely is. The possession of much money can be a great evil, too. Usually men cannot handle it without being polluted.

Another great evil is the lack of money. A hungry man is an angry man. Revolutions accompanied by mass killings are made by men without money.

Jesus teaches us to give alms, which means that He wishes the poor to get some money from us. Through this we bring them from one endangered sphere into another.

Money is dangerous. Its simple mention produces harm. Having it as well as not having it can produce trouble.

The solution is to live as if money did not exist, not allowing it to play a role in your making of decisions. Do not seek the job which produces much money, but the one in which you can be most useful to society. Marry not the girl or boy who has more money, but the one whom you can make the happiest. Do not buy the most expensive things, which would give you the occasion to boast, neither the cheapest thing which would prove your detachment from the world. Buy what is needed.

May your sanctified mind decide about having or not having of this nonentity-money. Never allow the having or not having of money determine the state of your mind.

"That they all may be one." (JHN 17:21)

The British publication ~New Society~ has conducted a psychological survey of player3 in symphony orchestras. This shows that brass and string players usually have bad opinions of each other. Woodwind players, especially oboists, are considered as neurotics by their colleagues in the orchestra. Violin and viola players have uneasy, mutually deprecatory attitudes.

The wonder is that people who tend to be mutually hostile to each other can produce an effect of order and harmony.

The moment the conductor lifts his baton, all these emotions are set apart. Only one thing counts now: the success of the concert.

The children of this world sometimes are wiser than the children of light. It is unavoidable that Christians, men and women of such different background, temperaments, experiences of life, cultural levels, nations, races, and social classes should disagree in many things and feel even, however slightly, some hostility toward each other. We are not only partakers of the divine nature; we are human, too. But the human side should be put aside for the common worship and the common action in the service of the Lord.

Ask yourself what is greater the cause which we serve in common or the matter in which we differ? Then you will have the right attitude of love.

"I sleep, but my heart waketh." (SOS 5:2)

The time of sleep must not be lost time.

The renowned Russian chemist Mendeleev did not succeed for a long time in finding the definitive form of the periodicity and quality of simple elements. Once after having worked at it a whole night, he fell asleep in his laboratory. And, lo, he dreamed it was the table. When he awoke, he Jotted it down immediately. Much of the music of the opera ~Snegurotchka~ of Rimski-Korsakov came to him in his sleep. The psychiatrist Bechterev always concentrated on the most important problem in the evening in order to have the answers ready when he awakened from sleep. The chessmaster Karpov dreamed a move which made him win a tournament.

Sometimes more neurons are active during a dream than when one is awake. Therefore the morning is always wiser than the evening.

One evening, New Testament Joseph considered leaving the Virgin Mary, believing she had sinned. He did not sleep well. His heart remained awake. An angel spoke to him. In the morning he did the right thing. He took Mary as his wife. In a dream he learned how to save the child from Herod and also when to return to Palestine. Pharaoh and Nebuchadnezzar both received important warnings in dreams. So did the Old Testament Joseph as well as many others.

Use the time of your sleep well. Let your last thought be from God's Word. Finish the day with prayer. God will speak to you sometimes as you sleep.

"Brethren, if a man be overtaken in a fault, ye which are spiritual, restore such an one in the spirit of meekness." (GAL 6:1)

A. Krasnov-Levitin is a Hebrew-Christian writer from Russia who thrice has been in prison for his heroic attitude. He told his interrogators simply, "You cannot buy and you cannot frighten me."

When freed, he was sad because Krasin, another Christian writer and godson of his, while in prison, cracked under stress and betrayed some names.

Krasnov-Levitin was called as a witness for Krasin's trial. He had hard feelings in his heart toward the Christian who had betrayed others. In court he met an acquaintance, Mrs. Hodorovitch. He asked her what she was doing there. She answered, "Though I don't call myself a Christian, I sympathize with those who suffer, even if they have broken down under the burden of a cross which was too heavy." Krasnov-Levitin became ashamed of his evil thoughts and he himself published the story of his sin.

Not only under torture, but under all temptations and pressures, some Christians are strong and others weak. Some yield. Men who are strong in some circumstances are very weak in others. It is not for us to judge and condemn those who have fallen, but rather to stretch out toward them a helping hand to restore them with words of meekness.

"Mine enemies reproach me." (PSA 42:10)

Christians have to be warned against anti-Semitism, against white and black racism. One of the great dangers is the widespread anti-American feeling. It is just like the anti-Jewish hatred in the past generation, unreasonable and unpleasant to God.

The United States provides 80 percent of the finances and 60 percent of the staff for the world mission of the church. The collapse of America would be a collapse of the entire missionary effort. Therefore criticism of America is propagated by the devil.

As the Jews were described as usurers and deceivers, now the lie is spread that rich America is ruining the poor nations. When the West established its first contacts with the Third World it was already far ahead of them. The white settlers of South Africa also were far ahead of the black population from the beginning. They do not owe their privileged economic situation to the exploitation of the backward nations.

It is true that Americans and other whites consume too much. It is to be noted, however, that per capita production in America exceeds production in India by more than the difference in consumption, allowing it not only to pay for the consumption, but also to give foreign aid.

The whites did not cause the Third World to become poor. They are the only help for these people to overcome poverty.

Beware of anti-Americanism as the devil's tool to destroy the greatest support of mission work and of freedom of religion in the whole world.

"Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God." (JHN 3:5)

Jesus does not say that a man who has not passed through new birth will not be in the heavenly kingdom. He says that this man ~cannot~ enter. A mineral cannot enter into the sphere of living beings except it ix absorbed by them. A plant cannot become an animal. If the animal eats it, it becomes a part of the animal's body. An animal cannot become a man. Man belongs to a superior realm. Only if a man eats an animal will it become part of a human body.

So a man cannot become a child of God through any deed of his. The distance between a child of God and a man is much greater than that between a man and a monkey, because man and monkey are both creatures, whereas the child of God is a partaker of the divine nature. Men cannot become heirs of the kingdom through their endeavors. They are absorbed into it by the all-embracing love of the church.

Then the man has to die, to die to the world, to its laws and to sin. He has to cease to exist as an "1." Jesus says that we have to deny ourselves. A Christian dies before he dies. Then he is absorbed by the divine nature. He becomes a child of God. The new birth has happened.

Die in order to be alive. Someone who has died is not conscious of the human voices around him and is not interested in what is happening.

We remain partly human even after the new birth and continue in the world, but the child of God has an inner sanctuary in which he is dead to the passions, the fun, and the labor of this world. If a child of God would remain with his old preoccupations, he would be like a corpse kept in the house, which spreads only stench.

Don't give undue importance to all other religious things. To be born again is the most important of all.

"I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy, and l will have compassion on whom I will have compassion." (ROM 9:15)

A man was brought to a psychiatrist. His madness consisted in believing that he was a corpse. The psychiatrist was sure that it would be easy to cure him by showing him that corpses do not bleed, whereas from his body blood would flow even when stuck only with a needle.

The psychiatrist took the patient to morgues and made him attend autopsies. He thus convinced him that dead men do not bleed. Then, to convince him that he was alive, he pricked his finger with a penknife. Blood flowed. The man cried, "So I have been mistaken. Corpses ~do~ bleed."

We sometimes are dismayed about the many to whom we have witnessed about Christ, some of them beloved members, of our families, who do not accept the message of the gospel. We cannot attribute it always to our fault.

There exists a vincible and an invincible ignorance. Reactions of men usually are irrational. The most powerful arguments rarely succeed in changing a viewpoint which a man has because of circumstances of birth and education or because of belonging to a certain religion or nation. Prejudices always are more powerful than facts.

It is our responsibility to witness for Christ and to pray. The elect will receive the testimony, fulfilling what has been ordained for them before the creation of the world. Cases of vincible ignorance can be helped by dialogues and good examples. Where the ignorance is invincible, we have to leave the case in the hands of a loving and righteous God. Don't destroy your own peace of heart with unjustified continual reproaches about your inability to convince others.

"Thou shalt not kill." (EXO 20:13)

Abraham Lincoln was the first man to buy a machine gun to protect himself. It did not help him. He was shot.

The machine gun was invented by the American R. J. Gatling. He hoped that by enabling one soldier to do the duty of one hundred, there would be no more need for large armies. But the armies became bigger than even before.

Hiram Maxim patented a much better machine gun, after he was advised in Europe, "Hang your chemistry and electricity. If you want to make a pile of money, invent something that will enable these Europeans to cut each others' throats with greater facility." He really made big money. Not only Europeans killed each other, but Africans, Asians, and Australians, too. Americans gave their part of sacrifice of blood.

The Middle Ages was a time of chivalry in war. It was said already during the American Civil War that shovelry had replaced chivalry. After the atomic bomb on Japanese cities, there remained not even corpses for whom to shovel a grave.

Einstein said that he did not know with what weapons World War III would be fought, but that World War IV would surely be fought with sticks and stones by primitives.

The solution is so simple. It is God's word: "Thou shalt not kill." God does not forbid you to get killed, but to kill. The knowledge of eternal life chases fear. Children of God can afford to be good. While in the world an arms race is going on, we have to run in another race set before us, the race toward Jesus (HEB 12:1,2).

As the world has multiplied its weapons of destruction, let us multiply our actions of love and kindness.

Sep 12

"Any covenant was with him of life and peace." (MAL 2:5)

Christians keep their peace. Why should they squander energy fighting their enemies? Peacefulness is one of the secrets of longevity. To outlive your enemies is better than to try to beat them. Look to the Jews. During almost two thousand years they had no army and outlived their foes. Since they have an army, they are in trouble.

Christians keep their peace. They count the many reasons to be happy and, while doing so, forget to have a look at the many mischiefs which beset them.

When rains and floods come, they get into the ark. If you are not smart enough to get out of the rain, an umbrella will not help you much. You might still get wet and catch pneumonia, too.

Christians live their lives quietly without anxieties. If Jesus is the head of the church, He should also have the monopoly on headaches.

A reporter asked an old lady on her birthday, "What is the secret of living to 105?" She said, "The secret is to keep breathing." Jesus breathed on the apostles and said unto them, "Receive ye the Holy Ghost" (JHN 20:22).

There is a kind of breathing which communicates the Holy Ghost. There are other breathings. "Saul yet breathing out threatenings and slaughter" (ACT 9:1). There is the quiet breathing of faith, which prolongs a life of peace.

Sep 13

"With me it is a very small thing that I should be judged of you." (1CO 4:3)

When Napoleon Bonaparte proclaimed himself Emperor of France, and the English government, ignoring the fact, continued address him simply as general, he said to a friend, "They may call me what they please. They cannot prevent me from being what I am."

With many people politics befuddle policy. They anxiously seek public applause and fear the disapproval of the mob; they always are trying to overhear what people say about them, and they miss the only chance they have to be themselves once in this single life.

You cannot avoid being misunderstood. Moses, the great man of God, was slandered even by Miriam a prophetess, who was also his sister. It is also true that every child of God is exposed to the gossip of men who often speak without thinking.

Don't be concerned about others' opinions. Be yourself, whatever this may mean. Jesus was a first-class child to His mother and a first-class carpenter before becoming a first-class Savior. Lincoln and Garfield had few friends, but were the right men and became presidents of the United States.

Even stains on your character and sins, if confessed to God, cannot hinder you from being what you basically are, a person called by God to do good.

Francis Bacon twice was arrested for debts. As attorney general he was guilty of torturing at the rack an old clergyman, Peacham, to make him confess to treason in a sermon he had never preached. Later Bacon himself pleaded guilty to taking bribes. But then he came to his senses and became one of the greatest intellects mankind has ever known. He retired and wrote Novum Organum and other books which keep him famous century after century, and which have taught many men right statesmanship.

Be what you are, a creature of God sent into this world for a great purpose. Don't allow sayings of others and memories of your past sins to sidetrack you.

"His own sheep ... will flee from [a stranger]." (JHN 10:4,5)

In the middle of the seventeenth century, the Jews all over the world went wild with joy. From Spain to Russia news came that the Messiah had appeared. His name was Sabbatai Zvi.

Rich men gave away their possessions to the poor. Some Jews rolled in the snow or lay with heavy stones on their chests or flagellated themselves to become clean of sin and to be worthy to meet with this Messiah who would lead them back to their Holy Land.

Sabbatai Zvi had given the command that all mourning for the loss of Zion was to cease. He would reconquer it. A Jewish Christian girl brought up in a convent in Poland who had always dreamed of being the Messiah's bride, became Sabbatai's wife. She, too, believed him to be the Anointed.

The Turkish Sultan had Sabbatai brought before him. "If you are God's messenger you can prove it and then we will all honor you. Let my archers shoot at you with their arrows and if you don't die, then you will be acknowledged as the Messiah. Or, you have the alternative to accept our religion. Otherwise you will die."

Sabbatai did not waver. He put on a white Turkish turban and accepted Mohammed's religion. He said to the Sultan, "I am not the Messiah. I am your majesty's humble subject."

The Jews had not believed in Jesus. They had believed in Sabbatai Zvi. All men are prone to believe impostors rather than the embodied Truth. In every century, certain men capture the imagination of millions who consider them as saviors. In the end they all prove to have been deceivers.

Jesus, when defied by those in power, allowed the arrows of death to pierce Him. Lo, He is alive and is the giver of life.

Beware of every new name which appears on the firmament of religion. There is only one name by which men can be saved.

"These things wrote I unto you, that ye sin not." (1JN 2:1)

A Christian is not to sin. "Whosoever abideth in him sinneth not" (1JN 3:6). There might be exceptional circumstances in which a Christian falls into sin but then he should not despair. "If any man sin, we have an advocate with the Father" (1JN 2:1). Taught by what has happened, you try to do better next time.

Persecution has not crushed the church, time has not abated its forces, but continual abuses by its members have shaken its stability and credibility. Sin cannot be a program of life for Christians.

We are not perfect, but we should strive to be able to say about the deeds of our life what Sir Walter Scott said about his writings: "I have been perhaps the most voluminous author of the day and it is a comfort to me to think that I have tried to unsettle no man's faith, to corrupt no man's principle, and that I have written nothing which on my deathbed I should wish blotted."

There is forgiveness of sins, but blessings lie not in forgiven sins. They lie in virtuous deeds which surely will be succeeded by reward, even if sometimes late. One immediate reward of a thing well done is to know that you have done it.

Prefer this small reward to the regrets of forgiven sins. The admonition of the Bible is: "Sin not."

"If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of (God, that giveth to all men liberally." (JMS 1:5)

If Martians existed and you would ask their scientists about life on earth, they probably would say there was none. So we don't know what is happening on the billions of stars throughout the universe.

We don't even know our neighbors, the animals. In December, 1975, ~Sovietskaia Rossia~, published a few amazing facts. A cat passed a driveway out of which a car came at great speed. The cat did not see the car and would surely have been killed, if a shepherd dog had not stopped the cat with its teeth and brought it at the last second to a halt on the sidewalk.

Near the town of Livingstone in South Africa a man had a dog. A crow had also become friendly and came regularly to be fed from the man's hand. One day, the dog disappeared and could not be found. The crow became gluttonous as never before. When she received a piece of meat she would fly away with it and come back crowing loudly asking for more. After a week the man decided to find out where the crow flew. Thus he found his dog which had fallen into a trap. It had been provided for by the crow.

The Cairo engineer, Mahmud Vally, was on the sea in an inflated mattress when the currents took him far away from the shore. He would have been lost if dolphins had not pushed the mattress for a whole day the many miles to shore.

The chimpanzee, when he wishes to drink, wraps up a few leaves to make something similar to a cup.

Will not God (who has given much more than instinct to animals) have taken care that there should be plenty of wisdom in store for the crown of His earthly creation?

God says, "My son, attend unto my wisdom, and bow thine ear to my understanding" (PRO 5:1). Then you will have the light of life.

"Whatsoever ye sha11 ask in prayer, believing, ye shall receive." (MTT 21.22)

This verse seems blatantly to contradict our experience. No man received from God everything he asked for in prayer.

I believe that most of us misunderstand these words of the Lord. We usually express in prayer not what we desire, but what we have desired before kneeling in prayer. We have no promise that these requests will be fulfilled. Jesus speaks about the desires which arise while you pray.

If prayer is really standing before the awful majesty of God, bowing to Him and speaking with Him; if it is forgetting yourself in His inebriating embrace, all desires which you had before that moment will play no role in it. only love remains-love to God and love for the eternal salvation of others. This prayer is one of adoration. God never refuses a deeper spirit of adoration to anyone who asks for it.

St. Catherine said toward the end of her life, "God, you know that for thirty-five years I have asked You for nothing." Whatever you desire in this attitude of heart, is granted. Whatsoever, without restriction.

The bride in the Song of Solomon says, "I am sick of love" (SOS 5:8).
She asks for no medicine or miraculous healing. Martha and Mary sent word to Jesus that Lazarus was sick. They didn't ask Him to come and put His hand upon him. At the highest levels of faith, all desires cease except the desire of nearer union with Him. Such a desire will be fulfilled.

It would be terrible for us if God would give us everything we desired before prayer and expressed in prayer.

Shakespeare has written:

> We, ignorant of ourselves, beg often our own harms,
> Which the wise powers deny for our good,
> So we find profit by losing our prayers.

"Naked came I out of my mother's womb, and naked shall return thither." (JOB 1:21)

The following anecdote comes from the Soviet Union:

In the Ukraine, where meat is scarce, people stood in line the whole night in front of a butcher shop. In the morning, the director of the State store came out and said, "There will be only pork and even of this not much. So Jews should go home. Nothing for them." The Jews left.

After an hour, he came out again and said, "We were told that the quantity allotted to us will be reduced. So only those who work will get meat. Retired persons have to leave." These also left.

Two hours later came another announcement: "There will be very little meat. Only for the Party members. All the others go home."

A hundred Communists remained, wet because of a rain which had started to fall. An hour later the director told them, "We just received another telephone call. There will be no meat today."

One Communist exclaimed, "It is again the dirty Jews who are the profiteers." "What do you mean by this?" someone asked. "Well, they were the first to go home."

The story has a deep spiritual application. In the end we will all remain empty-handed. We stand in line in this world. When we leave it, we will not be able to take with us even a needle. All our possessions will remain behind. The profiteers, the privileged, are those who renounce them first.

Christians know that everything which is under the sun is vanity, that we have come into the world naked and that we will leave it the same way. They die before they die. They renounce what deceived everyone in the end. They go home first and spend their time in their home, in the realm of the Spirit.

"It is appointed unto men once to die." (HEB 9:27)

In many Japanese homes you can find the hieroglyphs "Shinzo arau" (wash your heart or cleanse your soul) exhibited in the nicest place, though not many are still able to read these Chinese signs.

One of the many stains from which we have to cleanse ourselves is the illusion that we have here an abiding place.

A legend says that a woman with the name of Kishagotami told the Savior: "My only babe has died. I can't give him back to the earth. I asked everybody in vain for help. Now I have been sent to you and hope was given me that you can resurrect the dead. I cannot live without my child."

Jesus answered, "All right, I will bring your child back to life, but I need for this some salt. Bring it." She immediately ran toward the first house to ask for salt, but Jesus shouted after her, "Kishagotami, the salt must be from a house where no one has died." This condition, she thought, was not hard to accept.

She asked for salt in the first home. They were happy to serve her, but when asked, they said that their father had died recently. She ran to another home. There the wife had died. In the third home a child had died. Then her eyes opened and she understood what the Lord wanted to teach her.

She returned to Him and said, "I thank You for having taught me that there is no house in which no one has died. Give to my child and me life eternal."

The clinging to this earthly life, the fear of death, keep us prisoners of the evil one. Accept the idea of your death and of the death of your beloved one as being as natural as that of life, and accept the resurrection which the Lord Jesus gives.

"For envy they had delivered him." (MTT 27:18)

Champollion was a poor pupil in school, except at languages. At the age of eleven he had already learned Hebrew, Arabic, Syrian, Chaldean, Persian, and Coptic. All the other subjects in school were uninteresting to him. At the age of seventeen, he was already a member of the Academy, having become famous through his book, ~Egypt Under the Pharaohs~. At the age of twenty, he was a university professor.

His great ambition was to decipher the Egyptian hieroglyphs. When he succeeded, he rushed into the house of a friend with the words, "I discovered," but fell in a swoon when this friend told him, "You are the second. Alexander Lenoir has already published a brochure with the translation of the old Egyptian signs." He discovered afterward there was nothing to worry about. Lenoir's book was a hoax. However, Champollion's character had been disclosed. He himself might have believed that he worked purely in the interest of science. Not so. He was concerned with his own fame. He was not happy that someone else should bring his contribution to the same science. He was jealous. All of the discoveries must go under his name.

Champollion himself became the victim of envies later. He was even put in prison and denounced by colleagues who could not suffer someone else to have a big name.

The motives for the condemnation of Jesus were complex. One of the main motives was envy. Christ knew how to preach as no one else could. He did miracles. He was beloved, where others were only respected. He dared be the Messiah, without having doctorates in divinity.

There is in ever,v one of us a tendency to be envious. The envious will not inherit the kingdom of heaven.

"I press toward the mark." (PHP 3:14)

I once listened to the testimony of a Norwegian lady, now over seventy, as she told how she had received Christ at the age of fourteen.

She had heard a sermon in which the pastor described the Last Judgment. God would sit on His white throne. Behind Him would be a curtain. Before Him in a line would be all those to be judged. God would make a sign with His hand and from behind the curtain would appear beings of unspeakable beauty, radiating with splendor, and one of these beings would stand before every accused. The men and women who had never seen such splendor before would ask God, "Who are these wonderful beings?"

God would answer, "These are each of you as you would have been if you had obeyed My voice."

Then men will realize what they have lost; and, ashamed, they will flee to hell, to escape the sight of the opportunity they rejected.

This illustration brought her to Christ. I heard it forty years ago. I used it often in my sermons and it brought others to the Savior. The sermon of the pastor still works a century after he died.

There is the real "I" and the ideal "I," the person I am and the person God conceived and planned and intended me to be. I can live my everyday life on the level of what is immediate, or I can run toward the goal, the ideal "I," the being which I have been predestinated to become.

Let us be careful not to be ashamed on that day.

"As by the offence of one judgment came upon all men to condemnation; even so by the righteousness of one the free gift came upon all men." (ROM 5:18)

Showing a patient in a sanatorium a huge sycamore tree dead to its roots, a doctor told its story. It had been killed by one small worm.

"Two years ago the tree was as healthy as every other tree in the garden. One day I observed a worm three inches long which tried to penetrate its bark. A naturalist asked me not to kill or bother the worm. He wished to know how much time it would take the worm to destroy the tree. I complied and allowed the black-headed worm to do its works. It made a hole in the bark very quickly. Soon after this, the tree lost its leaves-much earlier than usual. One year later it was dead. The worm had penetrated to the heart of the tree."

Adam and Eve, having committed only one sin, lost Paradise because of this-paradise for themselves and their successors. Moses was excluded from the Promised Land for one sin. Many sit in prisons all their lives because of one wicked deed.

It is the same with righteousness as it is with sin. As one sin of a man can destroy him forever and have a deadly influence upon his children for many generations, so the one deed of Christ, suffering for us on the cross of Golgotha, glorified Him and also gave salvation to all those who believe in Him.

Don't discount as unimportant the one sin which still besets you. Put your faith in the one deed of Jesus Christ.

"The Word ... dwelt among us ... full of grace." (JHN 1:14)

An American Indian who had just arrived from a reservation attended a party in a nice Christian home in San Francisco. A heated debate went on about grace and law. The Indian listened, trying to understand. In the end he was enlightened and asked to be allowed to state his opinion.

"When I was at the train station," he said, "an ugly, old station, I saw a sign on which was written, 'Do not spit.' So me spit. Then I came to this beautiful house. Carpets, curtains, furniture, as I have never seen before. I looked around to see the sign forbidding me to spit. There was none. So I did not spit. The first case showed me the law, the second was grace."

No law, not even the law of God, can give life (GAL 3:21). But what the law cannot do, was done by God sending His Son in the flesh (ROM 8:3).

How can an inscription, "Don't do this or that," even if it is written by the finger of God keep a man from sinning when he is a sinner through and through? It only antagonizes his innate self-will.

The railway station is ugly and there is nothing attractive about it. So I amuse myself by spitting just because it is forbidden. But Christ brings me to another realm. He makes me to sit with Him in heavenly places. I am in the communion of saints and see around me only examples of love and beauty. No one forbids me anymore to spit. But why should I?

Pass from the sphere of law to that of grace.

"Continue thou in the things which thou hast learned and hast been assured of" (2TM 3:14)

Many base their unbelief on the writings of Darwin. The only one who did not draw atheistic conclusions from his writing was Darwin himself.

Lady Hope, a British aristocrat, had been at his bedside often before he died. He was bedridden for a long time and assiduously studied the Bible. She asked him one day what he was reading.

"Hebrews!" he answered, "still Hebrews. The Royal Book, it." Then placing his finger on certain passages, he commented on them.

She made some allusions to the strong opinions expressed by many persons on this history of the Creation, its grandeur, and then their treatment of the earliest chapters of the Book of Genesis.

He seemed greatly distressed. His fingers twitched nervously, and a look of agony came over his face as he said, "I was a young man with unformed ideas. I threw out queries, suggestions, wondering all the time over everything; and to my astonishment the ideas took like wildfire. People made a religion of them."

Then he paused, and after a few more sentences on "the holiness of God" and "the grandeur of this Book," looking at the Bible which he was holding tenderly all the time, he suddenly said, "I have a summerhouse in the garden which holds about thirty people. It is over there," pointing through the open window. "I want you very much to speak there. I know you read the Bible in villages. Tomorrow afternoon I should like the servants on the place, and a few of the neighbors to gather there. Will you speak to them?"

"What shall I speak about?" she asked.

"Jesus Christ," he replied, "and His salvation. Is not that the best theme? And then I want you to sing some hymns with them. If you take the meeting at three o'clock this window will be open, and you will know that I am joining in with the singing."

Does the whole guilt really lie on one who was at that time a young man with unformed ideas, or on the many scientists who have destroyed the faith of millions by holding up unsubstantiated theories?

Only what we will think on our deathbed counts. Don't be rash in your youth to elaborate theories and to act according to them. Seek the old path of righteousness.

"At the name of Jesus every knee should bow." (PHP 2:10)

A young Brahmin came one day to the renowned missionary, E. Stanley Jones, and told him, "Your speeches have found much response. It would be good if you would preach Christ as one of the many ways. There are others, too. We love Krishna. Others love Kali. If you would accept this, all India would listen to you."

This temptation existed already at the beginning of Christianity. The Roman Empire was very tolerant toward religions. They gladly would have accepted Christ as one of the many gods in their Pantheon - on the same footing as Diana, Mars, Apollo, Mithra, and the emperors. What led to the persecution of the first Christians was the insistence that Christ is the only way and that all the others are false.

Personally, I would like it very much if there could be many ways. However, in no regard is the universe constructed according to my wishes. Someone wiser than I, who knows better, has created it. I have to accept it. I have no other choice. I would like to have been born and raised in other circumstances. Again, my life has been predestinated without my being consulted. I cannot decide how men should be saved. The master of the universe has appointed only one way of salvation.

There is no arguing with Him. Receive Jesus Christ and you will be saved. Refuse Him, neglect Him, and you will be damned. It is as simple as this. God did not ask us about our tastes. We would like it if there would only be a heaven. There exists a hell, too. It is so easy

you to avoid it.

"Endure unto the end." (MTT 24:13)

One day a three-year-old child had given her mother a particularly hard day. After one more exasperating episode, mother said, "Rebecca, I'm getting sick and tired of this!"

The child answered innocently, "Well, you'd better go to bed then."

Her answer was right. A Chinese proverb says, "The day you cannot smile, don't open your shop." I would add, "When you cannot smile anymore, close your shop." We are meant to be always nice and gentle. We cannot be so twenty-four hours a day. We sometimes come to the end of our rope. That is the right time to go to bed or to cease, at least, the opening of our mouths and the writing of letters.

We all have mutually exclusive desires. The same man might like to be handsome, well dressed, an ascetic, a millionaire, God's "poverello," like St. Francis of Assisi, a warrior, a peaceful man, have all the pleasures of life, and be a saint. "The flesh lusteth against the Spirit, and the Spirit against the flesh" (GAL 5:17). Within the flesh and within the spirit, different tendencies tempt us. We cannot commit two contradictory sins, to be at the same time stingy and a squanderer. We cannot be two kinds of saints in one: a Joan of Arc and a hermit. "These are contrary the one to the other: so that ye cannot do the things that ye would."

William James said that you must review the options carefully and pick out the best.

If you have chosen to be a mother, be motherly to the end, never giving up, never getting tired and sick of what your child or your brother in faith does.

"A merry heart maketh a cheerful countenance." (PRO 15:13)

Two little boys who had never been to church peeked through the window while a prayer meeting was going on. It apparently was a dry service.

One boy asked the other, "What are they doing in there?"

The other boy replied, "I don't know, but whatever it is, they surely don't enjoy it."

On the contrary, a Hindu once asked a Christian, "What cream do you put on your face to make it shine?"

The man said, "Nothing."

The Hindu retorted, "Yes, you Christians do. Your faces shine."

The Christian religion has many shades. Choose the joyous one. Christians are saved by a deed, by what Christ did for us on Golgotha. May our religion be one of deeds, as that of Dorcas: "a woman full of good works and almsdeeds which she did" (ACT 9:36). There is no better cream for making your face shine than a pure conscience, the knowledge that your response to Christ's deed has filled your own life to the brim with good deeds.

The religion a man has is less important than the man who has the religion. A ritual is less important for a soul than the soul he puts into the ritual. No religion or ritual will ever make you happy, if your whole personality is not in it. "Put on ... bowels of mercies, kindness, humbleness of mind, meekness, longsuffering; forbearing one another, and forgiving one another" (COL 3:12,13). Your heart will become free and your countenance cheerful.

"When he was yet a great way off, his father ... ran ... and kissed him." (LUK 15:20)

In a village a poor woman had an only daughter. She decided to make her a servant maid in town, hoping to buy a field from her earnings. The girl served in a rich home. She was beautiful and intelligent. She soon discovered that she could earn more by not working than by working. Soon the girl had a car, furs, jewels. However, she had lost her soul and had forgotten about mother.
Ten years passed like this, in parties and fun.

One night the remorse came. "How could I neglect mother?" she asked herself. Driving immediately to her village, she arrived there after midnight. The gate to her house was wide open. She was sure her mother must be ill and the doctor had come. Crossing the yard, she saw the light burning in her mother's bedroom.

When she put her foot on the threshold, the voice of her mother asked, "June, is it you?"

"Yes," she replied. "How is it, mother, that the gate is wide open so late at night?"

"Since you left, ten years ago, I have never closed it."

The daughter asked again, "How is it, mother, that the lamp burns in your room so late at night?"

The mother replied, "It is because since you left, I have never turned it off. The heart of a loving mother waited for you."

The same will be your experience if, after having walked astray in sin for years, you return to the heavenly home. You will find the gate wide open and the light burning. God waits for your return with motherly love.

"There is no fear in love." (1JN 4:18)

A missionary to Indonesia tells the story how the natives, being saved from sins, are saved also from fears that literally controlled their lives; such as the fear of going on down the trail after hearing a certain bird call out from the jungle because it had special power from ~iblis~ (the devil). They would turn around and go home because they were afraid of the consequences.

There was also the fear of continuing to prepare a rice field prior to planting because they saw a snake. Thus, they would have to sacrifice a pig, rice, money, some chickens, or whatever the ~dukun~ (witch doctor) requested. If they could not afford to sacrifice to ~iblis~ they had to abandon the field, even if it were very fertile, or else pay the consequences.

Fear of crop failure haunted them if when they burned their field off, an animal got caught in the fire and died. They had to sacrifice to ~iblis~ or pay the consequences.

If they had fear of losing their sick child, they would make a ~jimat~.
This might be a little wooden block, a dove carved on top, a hole dug in from the front in which is placed a stone, and a wooden plug snugly closing the opening. The purpose is to hide the child's soul in the box (represented by the stone) from evil spirits with the dove guarding it.

We modern men don't have these fears, but we have many others of our own: the fear of losses in business, of remaining unemployed, the fear of sorrows, of wars, etc.

The words "don't fear" occur in the Bible 366 times, once for every day of the year. Even the extra day of leap year is covered. If we love God, we are as safe amidst the tempests of life as in heaven, because all things work together for our good (ROM 8:28). Every day of the calendar is covered. Don't fear.

"He that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live." (JHN 11:25)

The great German industrialist, Krupp, produced weapons of war. He supplied many countries with the means of killing millions of men. He himself was haunted by the fear of death. His biographer says that he had forbidden the mention of dying in his home. When a relative died in his home, he fled from the house. He divorced his wife when she chided him for it.

When he became ill the last time, he offered to give the doctor a million marks if he could prolong his life for ten years. It was in vain.

How different from this is the attitude of the believer.

I know about the child of the caretaker of a cemetery. Asked if she was afraid to walk through it at night, she answered, "No, because my home is at its end." So we know that our home is at the end of the road on which we pass through death.

We sympathize with all those who strive for a better society, in which men will be richer, freer, happier. Suppose this ideal were fulfilled, who would be willing to die and forsake such a beautiful life? Happy men die with much more difficulty than the poor. The happy inhabitants of the future Utopia also will have to die.

Every party that doesn't give perpetual youth without old age and endless life without death, deceives. A rich life ending in death is like the banquet given to men sentenced to death before being executed.

Jesus has overcome death. He was resurrected from the grave. He gives life eternal. He is our hope.

"Seek those things which are above." (COL 3:1)

A Christian put the inscription, Linquenda, on the front of his house, which means in Latin, "I will have to leave it."

It is good to remember that one day we will have to leave our business, our library, our beloved ones, our body.

A beggar knocked at the gate of a rich man and asked for one night's lodging.

The rich man shouted, "I cannot let you in. This is not a hotel."

The beggar answered, "Please, forgive me. I will seek shelter somewhere else. Your house really impresses me by its beauty. I will not bother you, but please satisfy my curiosity. Who built this house?"

The rich man, friendlier now that he knew he would not have to put up with the stranger, replied, "My father built it."

"Very nice. Is he still alive?

"No, he died and I inherited it."

"Do you have children? Who will inherit it when you will die?"

"My eldest son. He just married. He will live in it after my decease."

The beggar then said, "Well, the house is just what I thought it to be-a hotel. It is the first time I saw a hotel owner getting angry when someone asked for a room."

All of our houses are hotels. I don't have the slightest idea who stayed in the house, where I write these lines, before I entered it. I don't know who will succeed me. ~Linguenda~ - we will have to leave all.

Jesus came to invite us to an eternal abode, to His paradise. Detach your mind and your lusts from the transitory. You will have to leave it anyway.

"Jesus said, Suffer little children, and forbid them not to come unto me." (MTT 19:14)

Before finishing the complete sentence "Forbid children not to come unto me," the Lord had to say, "Forbid children not to come...." They had to be born before being able to come to Jesus.

The question is discussed with great debate today whether the embryo has the right to live. Does a human being have the right to be conceived, or should this right be voided through birth control pills? Abortionists and birth planners base their arguments on overpopulation, poverty, and much suffering.

I believe that the problem is not whether the embryo has the right to exist. I would ask rather whether nuclear weapons, hunger, and poverty have a right to exist. A revolution must come in this regard. I am only against revolutionists who are resolute to kill others and to die themselves if necessary, but who have no idea how to change society.

The United States is the third richest country in the world. It is first in the world in the percentage of church-goers, yet the proportion of the total American gross national product which goes for economic aid ranks below that of thirteen other free-world nations, according to the World Bank. That proportion has decreased since 1960.

We know the secret of successful revolution: perfect love. The determination with which terrorists pursue their wicked deeds is the one thing lacking among those whose weapon is love. Only then will the danger of nuclear war be gone, and the worst aspects of poverty and hunger, too. Why should children then not come into the world in order to come to Him?

"[Jesus] made a scourge." (JHN 2:15)

Paul said to a sorcerer named Elymas, "O full of all subtilty and all mischief,- thou child of the devil," and he cursed him to blindness (ACT 13:9-11). Paul would have sinned if he had been meek toward an enemy of righteousness.

Luther wrote to a duke who opposed the Word: "Ass of all asses, bloody dog, lying mouth, thick sausage, son of the devil." In a later letter he expresses his wonder that he could have written so gently and explains: "A Christian is a man who has hatred and enmity against nobody, but nurtures only love and goodness; but a preacher must have guts, must bite salt, and say the whole truth, because this is what the Word of God does. It hurts the whole world; it puts its hand into the throats of rulers and princes; it thunders and lightens and assaults big mountains.... As far as I am concerned, I would do no harm and say nothing against any man, but as regards the enemies of Word of God, you should know no friendships and no love."

Christians must be fighters against evil in the church and in the world. They must fight for justice in society, for peace and progress. "The kingdom of God suffereth violence" (MTT 11:12).

The Christian does not indulge in small conflicts. He would not quarrel with his wife or neighbor, but when he has to fight the evil which has penetrated the church, he must always have before him the image of Jesus with the whip in His hand. He must hit and not have remorse. Jesus never apologized to the merchants He had driven out. Hatred toward sin cannot be expressed in dignified words, as love cannot be cold and formal. There can be no politeness toward sin. Love the sinner and awaken him through striking ruthlessly at his sinfulness.

"[Of the Israelites] as concerning the flesh Christ came, who is over all, God blessed for ever." (ROM 9:5)

In a Soviet jail, a Christian prisoner, A. Petrov, wrote a poem called, "If I Were a Jew." Here are some excerpts from it in prose.

If I were a Jew, I would never call myself something else.
We're all brethren. We have our Parises and Romes and Washingtons,
But Israel, it is unique.
Israel is Cain and at the same time Abel, it is servant and master.
From Israel comes freedom and truth and the greatest of sins and the deepest repentance.
Israel is the beginning and end a miracle-from there comes the salvation for all.
If I were a Jew! By the way, this is what everyone should be, judging and slandering nobody,

Bringing honor to our homeland and nation.
The Jews are the salt, the sense, the essence of things.
Remember, you are the descendants of men like David.
The Lord came from you.
Don't spare your forces. In fights, temptations and tempests,
In days of triumph and of great sorrows,
Be worthy of your great predecessors, remember that you are a Jew.
Oh, if I were a Jew.

Is it really something so special to be a Jew, a member of the chosen people, to have a capital city whose name our heavenly abode also bears, the Jerusalem above? We should be thankful to God that "he is not a Jew, which is one outwardly ... he is a Jew which is one inwardly ... whose praise is not of men, but of God" (ROM 2:28,29).

Let us bear with joy the beautiful name of Israelites, let us love Israel, the Jewish nation, the Hebrew Christians. Let us remember also that we, having been grafted into the olive tree of Israel, now have a duty to add fame to the beautiful name "Jew" which has been given to us all.

"Remember them that are in bonds, bound with them." (HEB 13:3)

In Boston, a statue honors Mary Dyer, a Quaker who was twice imprisoned, twice exiled, and finally hanged for her faith.

It happened in the seventeenth century. Massachusetts was ruled by Puritans. They were so pure that they could not tolerate Christians who believed in inward light, in direct communication with God. without the intermediary of a clergy or rituals. So a law was passed that every Quaker coming into the colony would be "soundly whipped. jailed, and kept at hard labor during imprisonment." A man who, although not himself a Quaker, had defended a Quaker assaulted by a zealous Puritan, was whipped and exiled. Any Quaker who converted someone had to be exiled, and if he returned, hanged.

Mary Dyer came from Rhode Island to Boston to visit some imprisoned Quakers. She was flogged and exiled with the threat of death should she return. Three months later she was back, to care for her imprisoned brethren. She and two fellow believers were sentenced to be hanged. Mary watched their execution. Then her hands were bound, her face hooded. She ascended the ladder and put her head in the hangman's noose. At the last moment she was pardoned, but banished.

She returned. She knew she had brethren in jail. She risked public flogging and having her tongue pierced through with a hot iron.

Brought before the court, she said, "If you do not repeal your unrighteous laws, after my death the Lord will send others to witness for the truth. My life means nothing in comparison to the liberty of the truth."

There are thousands of brethren and sisters in prisons today in various countries for their faith. We should also be ready to give our lives for them.

"He must needs go through Samaria." (JHN 4:4)

When the bulk of the Jewish people was led into the Babylonian captivity, the remainder left in Samaria intermarried with the new settlers placed in their land by the oppressors and practiced a mixture of Jewish and heathen religion. When the Jews returned from captivity, they despised these people called Samaritans.

The animosity was so great that Jews and Samaritans would not give each other a glass of water. The Talmud taught that to eat bread from a Samaritan was as sinful as to eat pork; that Samaritans had no part in eternal life. Samaritans were considered as devils.

The capital of Samaria was called Shechem. The Jews gave it the nickname, "Sichar," which meant, "drunkard," as if they themselves had no drunkards.

Jews avoided passing through Samaria. Jesus, though Jewish, went to Samaria. He stood on the side of those hated and despised by His religion. In Jericho, He chose as host Zacchaeus, a tax gatherer despised by the population.

We hurt ourselves when we hate or despise someone. By doing, so we place Jesus on his side.

Don't listen to the arguments brought by your mind to justify despite toward a fellow man. Jesus is the friend of sinners. Be their friend, too.

"Lord, trouble not thyself." (LUK 7:6)

The state of the world would be less of a riddle to us if we would understand that it was created by a sad God. It was created just after the fall of a beloved archangel, Lucifer, who had drawn with him in rebellion one-third of the host of angels.

We could understand the relationship between divinity and the world better if we would meditate on the fact that we have a troubled and weary God. God says through Isaiah, "Your new moons and your appointed feasts my soul hateth: they are a trouble unto me" (ISA 1:14) Isaiah also wrote, "Is it a small thing for you to weary men, but will ye weary my God also?" (ISA 7:13).

We always ask God for comfort and deliverance from our troubles, which is all right, but what about reciprocating sometimes and being a comfort to Him?

St. Therese of Lisieux surprised a young nun complaining to another about some sorrow she had. St. Therese advised her not to do so anymore, not to burden someone else's heart. This nun answered, "You are right. Henceforth I will tell my troubles to Jesus alone."

"Oh no, not to Him," the saint replied. "Has He not had trouble enough? Keep your sadness for yourself. Give Him rest."

She herself had the habit of laying her crucifix on the pillow in the mornings and saying to Jesus, "You rest now. I will work for you."

God has saved us. Let us save Him, too, from more sadness and weariness than what He already has.

"Let all ... evil speaking, be put away from you." (EPH 4:31)

~De mortuis nihil nise bene~ - "Speak nothing about dead men except good." This is a wrong precept. Historic accuracy and justice and the need to learn from other men's mischiefs oblige us sometimes to tell their sins. This proverb dates from the times when people feared the revenge of the spirits.

I would say we should rather determine not to speak evil of the living. The Bible prescribes fixed rules for cases when something blamable is found in 8 man. The first thing is that you should love a man in spite of his sins. Only lovers are allowed to blame and to criticize. Second, you must tell him first what you find wrong in him. If he refuses your advice, bring others to help you persuade him. Then speak with his church. In cases of public sins, you might be obliged sometimes to press the issue publicly, but never become a slanderer or a detractor.

Slander is an old vice. It preceded the appearance of man. The devil is the accuser of the brethren (REV 12:10). He accused us before we committed sins, asking that we should not be created. Slander often precedes the entrance of a person into your life. Before you made his acquaintance, you may have received the suggestion that there was a question concerning a coat, implying that he stole it.

Jesus was killed by slander. They spread lies about Him that He was Samaritan, that He had a devil, that He broke the laws and was a blasphemer. Knowing that slander crucified Christ, Christians abstain from it and never listen to it.

"(God hath chosen the foolish things of the world." (1CO 1:27)

Many people have passed through depressions, neuroses, and psychoses. Some have passed a time in asylums. When they return to normal, they feel branded for life. They know that they have been mental cases and that those around them might not pay attention to their ideas because of this.

As one who has lived among many who have passed through states of madness as a result of tortures and doping in Communist prisons, I can speak from direct knowledge. There is no motive to feel badly about a past and not even about an actual "mental case." Bear your state with easy heart if this is your predicament or comfort others who are in it.

Adolf Woelfli's drawings have been exhibited in all of Europe. innumerable books and studies have been written about his art, because Woelfli was not only a painter who achieved fame, but he was also writer and a musical composer.

His life history? Adolf's father died because of alcoholism when the child was seven. His mother died soon after her husband. At the age f ten, Adolf had to earn his own living. At the age of thirty he was put in hospital for lunatics after having tried to rape a girl of three. Woelfli stayed in this asylum thirty-five years and died there in 1930. He never had a schooling. No one taught him to draw or paint. He had no occasion for self-education except the few books of the asylum's library and a few musical notes in its possession.

If men, using well the natural gifts of God, can overcome schizophrenia and become not only useful, but even remarkable members of society, the more so those who are by faith in Christ children of God and have His Spirit should be able to do so.

If you have been or even still are out of your mind, it is God who has dealt bitterly with you and has afflicted you (RUT 1:20,21). Job has shown that God who takes away can restitute sevenfold what you have lost. Madness is not only a liability, it is an asset, too.

The person you know might not be artistically inclined, but he can become a useful member of your family and of his church.

"They had sung a hymn." (MTT 26:30)

Be careful about the music you hear. Rock music can be deadly.

The Revelation of God consists not only of letters. The Hebrew Bible contains also musical signs. It is not meant to be read, but chanted according to a specific melody. The same word might have different meanings according to the pitch on which this word is sung. Only with its melody does the Bible contain the complete revelation of God.

There is also evil, obscene, and morally corrupting music. Giants like Cervantes, Goethe, and Tolstoy were shocked at the immorality of some music. There is music that wrecks homes today. Understanding between two generations becomes impossible if they listen to types of musics which are so contrary to each other. Neither is all of the classical music good. Tolstoy believed that no one listening to Beethoven's ~Kreutzer Sonata~ could possibly withstand the erotic suggestiveness of the music. Their morals would be in jeopardy and the inevitable would happen, if occasion arose.

It is terrible to hear the beautiful music in Verdi's Othello~ when the Moor chokes Desdemona. You hear Strauss's electrifying music when Salome stripteases and demands the severed head of John the Baptist. Most opera plots could have been written by members of the Mafia. Crime is propagated on the stage, crime accompanied by heavenly music.

People hear Beethoven's Passion According to St. Matthew, and whisper to each other, while the artist sings about the whipping of Jesus, "How beautiful a melody."

Many sins are strengthened in our souls this way. Therefore, Christians are careful about the deceit of music.

Jesus went to Gethsemane singing. Sing His tunes. Listen only to music pleasant to God.

"Take, eat; this is my body." (MTT 26:26)

During World War I, almost two million Armenians were martyred for their faith and nationality by the Turks.

At Der es Zor a group of Armenians stood before the firing squad. One of them, Mavy, told the soldiers, "It is written in your Koran that you should not kill anybody without allowing him first to worship his god." Mavy was granted his request.

He gave a short message from REV 2:10: "Fear none of those things which thou shall suffer ... be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life. " They sang together and took Holy Communion. They had no bread, but distributed some of the glowing sand from the ground saying, "Take and eat. This is my body." Everyone swallowed some sand. Then they were shot. Those who did not die instantly dipped their fingers in their blood. While dying Mavy told them, "Take and drink this. This is my blood given for you."

Christ is a being with two natures: a human and a divine one. He also has two bodies. He has the body of a Jewish carpenter which, after death, was glorified and ascended to heaven, as well as the church, which is also His body. When at Communion the words are said, "Eat; this is my body," both bodies are meant. Jesus suffered and bled 2000 years ago in Palestine in His limited body. It is He Himself who suffers and bleeds also in all those who bleed for Him. They took Communion with their own blood, which was also His blood.

You are a member of His body. Behave as such.

"Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee." (LUK 12:20)

How many years of life do we still have?

A king gave to his clown a marshal's baton and told him, "I nominate you as marshal of the fools. If you ever find one who is more foolish than you, hand it to him."

Years passed. The king was on his deathbed. The clown asked him, "Do you know where you go?"

"No," answered the king. "I know only that I must die."

"So there is a 'must' for kings, too. Did you store for yourself some riches in the world beyond to which you go?"

"I never thought about it."

"You knew that you would have to die and, notwithstanding, you made no definite choice? You did not prepare for heaven? You did not avoid hell?"

"I never took time even to ponder deeply about these things."

The clown took the baton from the sleeve in which he had hidden it, and returned it to the king. "Now I nominate you as marshal of the fools."

Remember that you will die, and that you do not know when this will happen.

"Nor of men sought we glory, neither of you, nor yet of others, when we might have been burdensome, as the apostles of Christ." (1TH 2:6)

A Christian is supposed to be humble and submissive. When hit on one cheek he turns the other. The canvas never quarrels with the painter. He is free to paint on it what he likes, be it a beggar or a king.
The Christian accepts any condition in life as coming from God. If he is successful, he does not boast of it. Can a brush boast that a beautiful picture has been drawn with it? Only the master painter deserves glory. Such is our relationship with Christ. A Christian seeks glory from no one.

Christ was humble, as was Paul, though their humility had a special feature: it was difficult to make others understand it. Jesus had to say: "I seek not mine own glory" (JHN 8:50), and, "I am meek and lowly in heart" (MTT 11:29). Paul also had to assure men that he sought no glory. Normally, a humble man does not go around boasting about his humility. It is only when he makes an impression of great pride, or even arrogance, that he has to explain what is in him.

A Christian is humble in his own affairs, yet he is sure that he has a message from God. This he asserts with full authority, ready to contend with anyone, even to the point of being considered burdensome or annoying, or giving the impression of being an "I-know-better" man. "Apostles of Christ might be burdensome" (1TH 2:6). Paul was such when he wrote that he sought no glory from men.

Know how to exercise authority in God's service.

"Do good to them that hate you." (MTT 5:44)

Here are some true stones from Romania that show how persecuted Christians are following this teaching of Jesus today.

B. had been a Communist state prosecutor. He fell out of the good graces of the party and was imprisoned by his own comrades. Once he was transferred from a prison where hunger reigned, to a mine where the prisoners were given more food since they had to do hard slave labor. At the prison gate he was met by a stranger who immediately gave him something to eat. The stranger sat near him while he ate. He asked the stranger for how long he was sentenced. The answer was twenty years.
"What for?"

"For having given some food to a fugitive pastor sought by the police."

"Who gave you such punishment for a good deed?"

"You were the state prosecutor at my trial. You did not recognize me, but I recognized you. I am a Christian. Christ taught us to reward evil with good. I wished to teach you that it is right to give food to a hungry man."

Dr. Munteanu's father, an Orthodox dean in Romania, had been killed for being a priest. The doctor eventually ended up in prison with the murderers of his father. When the murderers fell sick, he gave them not only medical care, but also his own bread and food.

The Christian, Tsotsea, had been sentenced unjustly to twenty years in prison. After a while, the judge who sentenced him was also imprisoned and fell deathly sick. His disease was repulsive. His waste and urine had to be washed away continually under prison conditions, without running water, cotton, or sheets. Tsotsea, the victim, loved his enemy and cared for him as for a brother until his judge died, reconciled to God and forgiven.

"Whether it be right in the sight of God to hearken unto you more than unto God, judge ye." (ACT 4:19)

Psychological experiments at Yale University demonstrated the dismaying extent to which ordinary men will obey authority, even to the point of inflicting excruciating pain upon another person, such as against someone for whom they have no personal feelings.

A shock machine and three persons were the setting for this experiment. The experimenter was the authority figure. An actor was in collusion with the experimenter. He had to pose as a pupil. The third party-the subject of the experiment-was made to believe that he was teaching the pupil.

The electric shock machine looked authentic. It had switches labeled from fifteen to four hundred fifteen volts with the designations, "Slight shock," "Strong shock," "Danger: severe shock." The last switch bore the label, "XXX." The machine was a fake. It gave no shocks to the actor who played the part of the pupil.

The one doing the teaching had to instruct "the learner" in several simple things and then to examine him. If "the learner" gave the wrong answer, the subject of experiment, "the teacher," had to shock him, first slightly and then stronger and stronger. The actor screamed, shouted, complained of his heart and feigned to fall in swoon. "The teacher" could think only that it was all real.

The experimenter would order strong shocks and suggest to the teacher that he must continue in spite of the pain he inflicted upon " the learner. "

Two-thirds of the subjects at Yale obeyed the experimenter. They were not impressed by the pain shown by "the learner." They had an order and fulfilled it. In Germany, 85 percent of the subjects obeyed authority.

Christians obey authority only if it does not order something contrary to the law of love given by God. For this independence of mind, Christians are hated by beastly rulers. We should never give up our independence. Otherwise, we could become accomplices of criminals.

"Sarai said unto Abram ... I pray thee, go in unto my maid, it may be that I may obtain children by her. And Abram hearkened to the voice of Sarai." (GEN 16:2)

Commenting on this verse the Talmud says that Abram yielded to the authoritative voice with which Sarai requested him to take a servant maid as concubine.

The words "hearkened to the voice" can be expressed in Hebrew in three ways: ~shamoa bekol~, ~shamoa el kol~, and ~shamoa lekol~. ~Lekol~ is used generally only when one has to consent to what is dictated to him. The Midrash, another Jewish commentary, referring to GEN 3:17, where God says to Adam "thou hast hearkened unto the voice of thy wife," explains that Eve, too, has taken a domineering attitude toward him and had imposed her will. So Adam ate the forbidden fruit. This commentary is based on the fact that the term used for harkening to the voice is, in both cases, ~shamoa lekol~.

You can easily discover that someone wishes to tempt you to sin by the fact that he exercises authority in his manner of speech.

The Lord Jesus said, "The princes of the Gentiles exercise dominion over them, and they that are great exercise authority upon them ... but whosoever will be chief among you, let him be your servant" (MTT 20:25-27). A servant entreats you humbly to do something; he never commands. You hearken to the voice out of love or you consider the wisdom of the advice, not because you fear that the other side might give you a hard time. The lover leaves you the freedom of choice.

Christians should not yield to the big tyrants, neither to the little tyrannies exercised over them in daily life.

"All have sinned." (ROM 3:23)

An infidel mocked Christianity. One of his arguments was the bad behavior of some believers. One of these answered, "Did you ever meet anyone who wondered about the bad behavior of atheists?

The infidel answered, "No."

"Well, this is the whole difference," said the believer.

Christianity teaches the highest moral and spiritual standard of living. Christ was Himself the example of how a life should be lived. It is normal that men born in sin, no matter how hard they try, should fail in their endeavors and that there should often be a discrepancy between the high principles proclaimed and our few achievements.

Atheism has no principles of conduct. Marx wrote in the ~Communist Manifesto~ that he wished the abrogation not only of all religion, but also of all morals. Where there are no morals, there can be no inconsistency.

For us it is an honor to be mocked on this account. We are sorry for our sinfulness. The fact that, though climbing, we are still far from our goal, shows that we are among that part of mankind which has set for itself the highest aim.

Join us. If we become a larger party climbing together, we may succeed better.

"Avoid ... oppositions of science falsely so called." (1TM 6:20)

Never allow science to disturb your faith. Science which does not admit the miraculous is not scientific.

In physics, there exists the law of Charles. According to this law, the volume of an ideal gas under constant pressure is directly proportional to the absolute temperature. Since for each degree centigrade of temperature which the ideal gas drops at constant pressure, it loses 1/273 of its volume, at -273ø C., the ideal gas would have zero volume. But this does not happen. First of all because absolute zero has not been achieved, but also because a phase change occurs before it is reached. Balloons made the observation that the pressure-temperature curve drops smoothly as the altitude rises to 40,000 feet, where the thermometer stands at-67ø F.

The scientist has to accept either that beyond 40,000 feet a miracle happens, the natural law is transgressed, the law of Charles is broken; or he has to plead that another law, yet unknown, intervenes when the law of Charles leaves off.

In the first case, he concedes that miracles happen. The miracle of the resurrection of Jesus is possible then, too. If the scientist chooses the other alternative, that laws still unknown account for some experiences, then some laws still unknown may account for the miracles of the Bible, too.

Believe the Bible. No science can contradict it.

"Life ... is even a vapour, that appeareth for a little time, and then vanisheth away." (JMS 4:14)

When you feel important, when you are on an ego trip, when you are inclined to believe that you are the navel of the earth and cannot be replaced, dip your hand into a bucket of water. When you have pulled it out and looked for the hole it left, you will know exactly the measure of your indispensability. The water does not keep even a trace of the fact that your hand was in it.

I have known important Christians who played a big role in church work. They were put in prison under totalitarian regimes. When they were freed, they found out that the church had fared without them as well as with them. In some cases their absence gave younger and more capable men the possibility to develop better.

Jesus, the Son of God, lay in a grave. The planets continued their courses. Flowers bloomed and children played. Jesus left the world for a little while without Himself, to encourage us to do the same, to feel a little bit less important. Then He resurrected and He had entirely new powers.

The saints were saints because they did not consider their staying in this world as absolutely necessary. Knowing that he could go, without the church suffering because of this, Basil the Great could answer the persecutor, Modest, "I don't fear deportation because the whole earth is the Lord's. You have no treasure to take away from me. I possess nothing. To die is gain for me, because this will unite me with Christ for whom I live and work."

By not considering themselves important, the saints became important.

"Be ye followers of me." (1CO 4:16)

One evening a father went to a saloon. Soon his little boy joined him. "How did you find out where I was?" asked the father.

The boy answered, "I just followed your steps in the snow."

The apple does not fall far from the branch. Our dependents follow in our steps. Where do our steps lead?

I stood once at the gate of a prison in which a criminal sentenced to life was detained with chains on his hands and feet because he was considered very dangerous. A police van bringing new convicts stopped before the gate. Among them was the son of the criminal, himself also a murderer sentenced to life, kept also with chains on hands and feet. Father and son met there.

The son lifted his chained hands toward the father and asked him, "Was it for this that you brought me into the world?"

The hardened criminal blushed and let his head drop. He did not answer a word.

Where do our steps lead?

We think about the traces which Abraham's walk left. After thousands of years Judaism, Christianity, and Islam still walk in these steps. Winds and floods could not wipe them away. Paul walked in the bloodstained steps of Christ in self-sacrifice. For two thousand years Christians could follow his example.

Be careful of your steps. You will not be the only one to walk in them.

"O Timothy, keep that which is committed to thy trust." (1TM 6:20)

One of the great losses of the church after the Reformation was the forgetting of the beautiful teachings and examples of the saints of old.

They were humble. When, at the Second Ecumenical Council, quarrels arose about his being bishop of Constantinople, John Chrysostom said, "I am not better than Jonah, the prophet. Throw me into the sea, only let the strife finish." He withdrew forever from the bishopric, quoting to his parishioners as his last words 1TM 6:20.

He was ready to renounce everything, but he would not yield an inch from the truth. He left us the teaching: "There are splendid divergences as well as harmonious concord.... When we are required to act with obvious dishonesty, or with violence and the sword, we must disregard the requirements of the times and rulers (I dare say, not only of secular, but also of church rulers); we must not have communion with evil. We should not touch the contagious. The most horrible thing for a servant of truth is to fear anything more than God, and because of this fear to become a traitor to the faith and the truth."

John Chrysostom was a preacher, though not in the modern sense of the word-e.g., one who delivers a speech for twenty minutes once a week-but he daily called men to repentance. He did not spare his audience. He spoke out against shameful dress, against luxury, among other things, but most of all against the clergy's love of power and against divisions in the church. He said, "Nothing provokes God to wrath more than strife. Even if we do the most perfect works, but destroy the unity, we will be punished as if we had torn apart the body of the Lord."

In exile, he finished his life with the words, "God be praised for everything."

"Walk in love, as Christ also hath loved us." (EPH 5:2)

In 1969 the Christians in Kenya had a difficult time. They had refused to take the heathen oath of the Kikuyu tribe. Many were stabbed because of this. Others were beaten to death. This had happened to a brother, whose wife, also beaten, was lying in the hospital.
She was brought from the hospital to his burial attended by a thousand people, among them some who had hated the deceased.

The wounded wife stood near the grave of her husband. The believers sang Christian hymns. Then the widow spoke. Her speech was published the next day in the newspaper. "Before we finish this burial service, I wish to tell you what my husband told me before dying. He asked me to tell all his murderers that he goes to heaven loving whole-heartedly everybody, his assassins, too. He has forgiven all for what they have done, because Jesus loves them. I, as his widow, also tell all of you, in the presence of my dead husband, that I hate none of those who killed him. I love the killers. I forgive them, knowing that Christ has died for them, too."

This is Christian forgiveness. Make a precise, written list of all men who have ever wronged you. Write over it in large letters, "Jesus loves them." Then burn the list and forgive once and forever all those who have harmed you. Remember how n any you have hurt. To bear a grudge is not the Christian way.

"Every man's work shall be made manifest." (1CO 3:13)

Einstein, who discovered the last laws in physics, and whose name our universe respects, declared at the end of his life: "If I had known, I should have been 8 plumber." It was because he had not known how to conceal some of his science from wicked men. His formula served as the basis for the construction of the first atomic bomb.

How unlike this is the conclusion which Paul draws at the end of his life: "There is laid up for me a crown of righteousness" (2TM 4:8).

Like Einstein, Paul had discovered a mystery, that the Gentiles are called into the kingdom and given the same standing as the chosen people, the Jews. He also had other divine mysteries entrusted to him from God. They were all beneficial. He did not have to regret that he had made them known to the world.

As a result of the activity of scientists who did not seek guidance from God concerning how much to reveal to sinful mankind, today the radioactivity in the world is thirty-five times higher than it was in the beginning of the century. Scientists may have contradicted religion. The problem arises now whether mankind will be able to survive the victory of a godless science. The air, our rivers, and the seas are all polluted.

As a result of the activity of every Christian who witnesses for his Lord, multitudes of men pass from transitory life to life eternal.

Will you regret at the end of your life what you have done, or do you serve Christ and are you sure that your end will be a change to glory?

"Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites." (MTT 23:13)

The Lord Jesus scolded the hypocrites, and He told us to beware of hypocrisy. He never told us, however, not to be in their company.

Many Christians have forsaken the church, complaining that there is too much hypocrisy in it. Business is full of hypocrites, too, but no one stops making money because of that. The relationship between sexes, generations, and nations is full of hypocrisy. Notwithstanding, people fall in love, cohabit with children and parents. Nations coexist. How many remain bachelors and spinsters because married life is full of hypocrites?

One place is surely full of hypocrites. It is hell. Instead of not going to church because you cannot suffer those who only pretend to be religious, you had better beware that you don't go to hell which is full of men with false hearts. In church you are with the hypocrites for only an hour; in hell for eternity.

If you loathe hypocrisy, then take decided steps to get to heaven, the only place where full sincerity reigns.

There is no salvation outside the church, in spite of its many human failures. He who has God as his father, has the church as his mother. A loving child does not forsake his mother when she falls sick. Neither does a Christian forsake the church because he finds in her some faults. She is the keeper of the Word of God and of the ordinances. In her, the communion of the saints is fulfilled.

Regarding hypocrisy, it is best not to look at the straw in your brother's eyes, but rather to take out the beam from your own.

"The mercy of the LORD is from everlasting to everlasting." (PSA 103:17)

The first letter of the Hebrew alphabet is aleph. It is in the form of a man who is pointing to heaven and earth in order to show that the world below is the mirror of the world above.

George Cantor, a mathematical genius who died mad, introduced the aleph in mathematics as the symbol of the transfinite.

What is this transfinite? Draw on a piece of paper a line of ten inches. Everyone knows that the number of points on this line is infinite. Cantor says, "Obviously no." Cut the line into ten pieces. Every line of one inch has an infinite number of points, so the number of points on the first line must have been bigger than infinity, a multitude of infinites which he calls the transfinite. Only so can we understand the expression of the Bible, "from everlasting to everlasting." There exists a multiple of eternities.

The number aleph is the only one that is equal to each of its parts. The number of points on the first line is as big as the number of points on every segment of it, because these can be divided, too. Any part is equal to the whole. A Jewish carpenter said to an apostle, "Who sees me, sees the Father." The one Christ can be "the all in all." He is in His entirety in every believing soul.

The first Christians had the proverb, "When you see a brother, you see God." Luther wrote, "The Christian is Christ." The Lord has taught that as often as you are good to a hungry and suffering man, you do your good deeds to Him. He Himself was the hungry or imprisoned person.

This seems absurd to reason. It is a truth of faith and, since recently, a mathematical commonplace.

"O death, where is thy sting?" (1CO 15:55)

There is an old Christian story, kept in secrecy for the elect only. They hear it from a man or from an angel only in moments of supreme suffering.

A believer had devoted his whole life to seeking revelation in nature, in the faces of men, and within his own heart. He sought the sense of the ineffable name Jehovah. Approaching old age, he was condemned for his faith and was to be devoured by a leopard.

While waiting in the arena of the circus, he observed through the iron bars the wild beast to which he had been assigned for food. He gazed at the spots of its skin, and behold, a wonder. The rhythm of their design and their pattern explained to him the sense of the name of God for which he had been seeking for decades. At once he understood why he had to be sentenced to this cruel death. It was because this was the only means to fulfill his great wish. God had granted him this meeting with the leopard bearing the secret.

The martyr knew then that such a death was no death.

We all will be swallowed up by death in some manner. The question is, "What have you been looking for in life?" If you have looked for the right thing, death will reveal to you the mystery, and it will be just a veil through which you will enter into the presence of the Lord. This applies not only to death, but also to every great suffering. Seek in its forms the name of God.

"Jesus began to shew unto his disciples, how ... he must ... killed." (MTT 16:12)

Every army has had an elite force: the Persian Immortals, the American Green Berets, the German SS., the Soviet Gvardia. The Kamikaze pilots of Japan are probably the best known. They would have a funeral service while alive. After they had entered the cockpit of the aircraft, it would be sealed from the outside. Then they would fly toward some enemy ship and crash with their load of bombs into the ship. It was certain they would die, but they also would destroy many of the foe.

It is as though Jesus had put Himself inside the cockpit of a Kamikaze aircraft. He went knowingly and decidedly to die on the cross for sinners.

We also bring our lives as a living sacrifice for God (ROM 12:1); our baptism is our burial service. We are buried with Christ. Only those who pass through this experience belong to the elite of the church, because having shared Christ's passion they also will know the power of His resurrection.

In 1955, a Professor Singleton showed during an atomic conference in Geneva some carnations which he had grown in the radioactive field of the great nuclear reactor at Brookhaven. They had been white. Now they were a purple-red, a hitherto unknown species. All their cells had been modified and they would continue in their new state.

So is the new man resurrected with Jesus, an avante guard fighter for the cause of the kingdom of God.

"Not I [live], but Christ liveth in me." (GAL 2:20)

God has given us a great gift: to be personalities on our own, Personality is not a part of the universe. The universe is a part of everything which the personality comprehends. This is because the universe, the energy, and whatever material entities may exist are objects of thoughts. Personality is not an object. It always remains the subject.

Jesus has said, "I am the way, the truth, and the life." An "I," a divine subject, has pronounced these words. On the basis of these words, we have asserted for 2000 years that ~He~ is the way, the truth, and the life, which simply is not true. When we reduce Him to a "He," Christ has become an object of our reflections. An object cannot be the truth. Jesus never wanted to become a "He." Jesus is always an "I." Jesus lives in His fullness as an "I" in every believer. The believer is an
"I" also-the same "I" as Jesus. The eyes with which Jesus sees me and my eyes are the same eyes.

A lover could not bear it any more. He knocked at the door of his sweetheart late at night and asked for entrance. "Who is there?" she called.

He answered, "It is I."

The girl from inside responded, "My room is strait and my bed is narrow. I have no room for you. Leave."

He left, not understanding why she had refused him. He knew her to love him dearly. After wandering through the world for several years, he had an illumination. Late one night he knocked again at the door.

She asked, "Who is there?"

He answered, "It is you."

Then the door opened. He heard the words, "For years I have been waiting for you."

When we arrive at the gate of heaven, we must be free people free from being one of the many objects of this world. We must have become a personality on our own, an "I," but this "I" must have become His "I," a reappearance of Jesus in miniature. You must be able to say at the gate to Jesus, "It is You." Then the door will be wide open for us.

"Ye cannot do the things that ye would." (GAL 5:17)

A soldier made great plans how he would fight the foe and conquer him, but when he tried to stretch out his rifle, he found out he could not. When making his plans, he had forgotten to find out first who he was. He was a soldier-but a paper soldier with whom children played.

Many of us make beautiful plans for a life of service to the Lord and mankind. They are futile. We have forgotten that we are born in sin and shaped in iniquity, that even our good deeds are like dirty rags; that we have within us powers incapacitating us so we cannot fulfill beautiful designs. We are no more than toys in the hands of evil forces and of base lusts. We are paper soldiers. Before doing real things, we must become soldiers of flesh and blood.

This miracle is accomplished by Jesus. He gives us new birth. He tells us to eat His flesh and to drink His blood.

He makes us partakers of His spiritual divine nature. He gives us new life, the strength of His grace.

He makes a paper soldier into a real one and only then can the fight begin.

"Clean every whit." (JHN 13:10)

A smith had a son who broke his heart. Every time the son did something wrong, the father would hammer a nail in the door. In time, the whole door was full of nails. The son heard of this in the distant land where he had gone. He was plagued with regrets and it caused him to ask forgiveness from his father. The first nail was taken out of the door.
Then the son returned to God and news began to flow about the good deeds done by the same son. At every such news, the father pulled from the door another nail.

One day the son returned as an honest man, yea, as a saint. He became the joy of his father. The last nail disappeared. The father showed the son the door and explained to him what had happened.

The son said, "Yes, the nails are gone, but the holes have remained."

The father was happy to tell the son that there is One who also can close the holes. The Hebrew word ~asham~ means not only "sacrifice for sin," but also "restitution." In ISA 53:10 it is written that Jesus gave His life as an ~asham~, thus not only atoning for our sins, but also washing them away. To be justified is to be "just as if I'd" never sinned.
We become whiter than snow.

"I will shew thee that which is noted in the scripture of truth." (DAN 10:21)

The angel tells Daniel about a book of the truth and quotes from it things which were not in the prophet's Bible. Our Scripture is a translation into human language of the inexpressible realities of God, contained in this book of truth. Every true preacher of the Word lifts his Bible which is a translation from Hebrew and Greek and says, "This is the book of God." What if the Hebrew and Greek were themselves translations, putting into the primitive languages of men the unspeakable riches of God?

Value the Bible, but don't stop at the words. Jesus said, "I have yet many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now" (JHN 16:12). Why should we not become men who can bear everything and learn from His mouth these hidden things? Forced to explain again to the Hebrews elementary things, Paul complains that he has no time left to speak about the spiritual explanation of the stories of Gideon, Jepthah, etc. (see HEB 11:32). If we would not always return like children to the elementary things of the beginning, we could perhaps learn these explanations which were withheld from the Hebrews 2000 years ago. Jude said that when he wished to write about an important subject, our common salvation, he had to change his mind and warn against some false teachers in the church (JUD 3). If we would drive these out, we could learn what Jude intended to teach.

Go on from the Bible to the realities toward which the Bible points. There is a book of truth in heaven.

"There are not found that returned to give glory to God, save this stranger?" (LUK 17:18)

God once invited all virtues to a banquet. They greeted and embraced each other. They were good friends, except two who stood aloof from each other. God asked them, "Are you not acquainted?" They answered, "We never met before." Their names were " generosity" and "gratitude."

There is a legend about a Roman slave, Androcles, who had fled from his harsh master. He hid in one of the caves of the Lybian desert. Once he observed a lion in pain, because a thorn had entered its flesh. Androcles took the thorn out and healed the wound. Afterward, the two were inseparable friends.

In the end, the master found his slave and brought him bound to Rome, where-according to the custom-he had to be thrown before a wild beast in the circus. It so happened that the lion launched against him was the same lion whose pain he had eased. The lion recognized his friend and instead of devouring him, sat down quietly at his feet. Androcles explained this attitude and was pardoned.

It is easier to find gratitude among beasts than among men. A Turkish proverb says, "If you have done good to somebody, avoid him like a raving dog. He will bite you." The experience of centuries is in this proverb. We all complain about the lack of gratitude of others toward us. Let us make a list of all those who have been good toward us and to whom we have not shown thankfulness.

Let us first be thankful to God for His creation. Let us be thankful to Christ for salvation, let us be thankful to the Holy Spirit for His guidance, and let us be thankful to parents, teachers, doctors, bakers, tailors, and farmers. In other words, let us be thankful to all who work for us and also to all those who have stooped down to help us in difficult moments of our lives.

"And some of them of understanding shall fall, to try them, and to purge, and to make them white." (DAN 11:35)

Most people spell the word "disappointment" wrong. The correct way to write it is, "His appointment." Paul of the Cross wrote, "Indeed, when an undertaking seems to have failed completely, it is then that we see it succeed wonderfully." On Good Friday, Jesus, the hope of the world, died, crying, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" Everything seemed to be lost. This was the preparation of the triumphal Resurrection.

Lincoln was a bankrupt businessman-so he could start his career as the biggest American statesman. Many engagements and marriages have been happily healed when they seemed hopeless. Many people who almost died, afterward spent many years in good health. I have been near death many times. Some Christians who have fallen into deep sin have later become great saints of God. Seemingly Peter's career as an apostle had ended in disgrace with the ugly denial of his Lord on the night Jesus was betrayed. There was no hope that he could ever again be a leader with authority in the church, after having failed so shamefully when he was tested. Forgiven by Jesus, he returned, continued to lead a fruitful life, and died as a martyr.

In 1759, Paul of the Cross wrote: "In the most profound recollection of mental prayer, I shall prepare myself for death." He had to change his mind because there were still some towns to evangelize. So the dying saint continued his activity another sixteen years.

He wrote, "The misfortunes which happen in this world, when accepted from the living hand of God with submission to His most holy will, enable us to run in the path of the divine commandments. Besides, resignation to these events serves as a very efficacious means of obtaining favors, even temporal favors."

Cherish your disappointments. They will prove to have been His appointments.

"Wine ... maketh glad the heart of man." (PSA 104:15)

"God saw every thing that he had made, and, behold, it was very good" (GEN 1:31). Wine is good, too, as are all the other human joys. Sin has brought sadness and grief; but a time to laugh and a time to dance has remained (ECC 3:4).

It is true that Christ teaches us this life is only a vestibule through which we pass to life eternal. But in a well-ordered house the vestibule must be beautiful, too.

Jesus, in changing water into wine in Cana, showed us that well-understood religion excludes no earthly joy so long as it contains no inherent evil and does not receive a prominence causing it to absorb more time and energy than permitted.

Within these limits, it is not wrong for a Christian to lead a life full of joy. The Christian must abandon sin, not things which make life enjoyable.

Many men know only the alternatives of life without God or God without life. Jesus breaks this vicious circle. He gives joyful life with God. The joyful instinct of the healthy child is the ideal example we see in Jesus-not the self-inflicted tortures of the ascetic. The latter may be a special individual calling, but not the rule for the average Christian life.

If you had been at Cana, would you have agreed with what Jesus did, or would you have preferred for Him to deliver a speech scolding those who wished to enjoy themselves at a wedding feast?

"It came to pass." (MTT 11:1)

It is said that King David once called a jeweler and said, "Make me a ring whose appearance will gladden my heart when I am sad, and make me sad when I am joyful. You have two days for this. If you bring the ring, you will be richly rewarded. If not, your head will be where your legs are now."

The jeweler left in despair. He knew his life would be forfeited. Who could make such a ring?

When he crossed the palace yard, little Solomon, who was playing, observed his grief and asked him what it was about. The jeweler told him of the foolish demand the king had made.

The child laughed and said, "Make him a simple ring of tin and write on it the words, 'Gam ze iavoh' 'This will pass, too.' Nothing more is needed. In moments of darkness, the king will read that this will pass and find comfort. In revellings, the ring will remind him that joys in this world are transitory."

The jeweler made the ring and received a rich reward.

One of the beauties of the King James Version of the Bible is that the expression "It came to pass," occurs so often. What burdens you have today will pass. Don't be so occupied with your present griefs. What were you sad about five years ago, on November 4? You don't even remember anymore. So today's sorrows soon will be forgotten. And when you are joyful, don't forget that you have not attained heaven yet. All joys in this world are temporary.

Christians seek the eternal abode in which all tears will be wiped away.

"Love the Lord thy God with all thy heart." (MTT 22:37)

Moslem tradition recites the following legend from the life of our Lord Jesus:

One day He saw a group of people standing around with a sad expression on their faces. He asked them what their trouble was. They answered that they had heard about a horrible hell and were afraid to end up there.

Then he met another group of people, also showing grief. When asked about it they said that they had another burden: they had heard about heaven and trembled to miss it.

Afterward he met a third group overflowing with happiness. They told him that they had found the truth and rejoiced in it.

Jesus, blessed be His name, said, "These men have escaped hell and are sure of heaven."

God promises rewards to the righteous and everlasting punishment to the wicked, but the motivation for the actions of Christians is love toward the Lord and enthusiasm for the truth. If the followers of the luminous path of Jesus would be sure that their road leads toward eternal destruction and if the devil would have a splendid paradise to offer, we would still follow Christ's way of the cross. We do not serve Him for His heaven, but out of love for Him.

Madame de Guyon prayed, "Lord, everything which You wish to give me in the next world, give to my friends. Everything You wish to give me in this world, give to my enemies. To me, give Yourself."

"He ... entered into a ship." (MTT 8:23)

An Oriental emperor in times of old sat on the balcony of his palace and watched with pleasure the many boats which passed near the shore. Each was a sign of the prosperity which flourished under his rule.

He asked a priest who stood near him, "How many boats do you think leave and enter our harbor during one year?" The priest answered "Only four." The wrath of the king was kindled. This priest dared to mock him to his face?

"How do you dare to give me such a reply!" exclaimed the king. "I see at least a hundred boats before my eyes right now, and you tell me there are only four the whole year?"

The priest repeated, "It is as I said, only four: the ship, 'Desire of adventure,' another, 'Desire of fun,' the third, 'Search for fame,' and the fourth, 'Running after money.' These are the real names of all boats, whatever the inscription on their bow. These are the only forces which drive men."

On the small lake Gennesaret one very small boat sailed. Jesus had entered into it. This ship had another name, "Self-sacrifice for the glory of God."

It is a unique ship. In MRK 4:37-39, we are told that Jesus once rebuked a storm and the wind ceased at His command. But that evening a bigger miracle than the stilling of the storm happened. The waves had beaten into the ship, "so that it was now full" (MRK 4:37). When a ship is full of water, it sinks. Whether there is a big gale or the sea is calm does not make a bit of difference. A ship full of water sinks-but not if it is Jesus' ship. It goes forward when no wind blows in its sails; it glides on when the oarsmen have become lazy and do not row anymore. The church advances even when it is filled to the brim with heresies, schisms, and sins that make her the mockery of men. It advances contrary to the laws of hydrodynamics. It is the only ship which stays afloat and sails on though full of water, because its motivation is the right one.

    Choose the right ship in which to make your journey.

"If any man be in Christ, he is a new creature." (2CO 5:17)

    This is the day of the Communist revolution in Russia, the most important fact in the political history of the twentieth century. What did it give to souls?
    In an atheistic meeting in Moscow, the lecturer showed a glass of water to the audience compelled to attend. He put a powder into it. The water became a purplish wine. He explained: "Jesus, at Cana, had such a powder hidden in his, sleeve. People at that time were backward and believed that He had performed a miracle, when as a matter of fact it was only a magician's trick, like mine. I can do even better than Jesus. I can change the wine into water again." Another powder and this change happened. "And now I turn it into wine again." Another powder and his word was, fulfilled.
    A Christian stood up and said, "Comrade lecturer, you have amazed us by your miraculous power. We would ask you only for one thing more. Could you, please, drink a little bit of the wine you just made?"
    "I am sorry," was the reply, "the powder I put into the water is poisonous."
    The Christian then said, "This is the whole difference between you, the Communists, and Jesus. He gives a wine that has gladdened hearts and enlightened minds for 2000 years. You also change water into wine, but it is a wine that poisons our hearts with fear and hatred. "
    No revolution that leaves the hearts of men unchanged can bring lasting good to mankind. The revolution needed is the new birth. It makes men into new creatures as Christ Jesus.

"When ye pray, say." (LUK 11:2)

Let us adopt the following prayer of the early church. It was composed by Eusebius.

O, God, grant that 1 may be no man's enemy,
But friend of all that is eternal and abides.
That I may never invent evil against somebody,
And if evil happens to me, may I be spared
Without hurting the one who wished to do me evil.

May I love, seek, and obtain only the good,
May I desire the good of all men and envy nobody.
May I never wait for someone else to scold me,
When I have done or said something amiss;
But may I reproach myself, until I become better.
May I never obtain a victory
Which would hurt me or my adversary.
May I reconcile friends who are angry with each other.
May I help with all my might those who need my help.
May I never abandon a friend in danger.
May I respect myself.
And for this may I tame all my impulses that might otherwise make me rave.
May I never speak about who is evil and who had done evil,
But seek good men and follow in their footsteps.

"Blessed are the peacemakers." (MTT 5:9)

It is said that in the first generation of monks in the Thebaid desert, Avva Pahone built for himself a hut in the valley, because he had gotten old. His former cell on the hill he gave to Avva George. He soon regretted this, because he saw that hundreds came to Avva George to hear the Word from this saint.

Overwhelmed by envy, Pahone sent a disciple to Avva George, ordering him to leave the cell immediately. The disciple told Avva George, "Father Pahone sends me to you with words of peace and begs for your prayers, because he values your piety very much."

When the disciple returned, Pahone asked him, "Did you tell him what I ordered?"

He replied, "I surely told him what he deserved."

Avva George did not change his place and people continued to flock to him. Pahone sent the disciple a second time. "Tell that hypocrite to leave my cell without delay, otherwise I will drive him out with a stick."

The disciple went to Avva George and told him, "Father Pahone loves you so much. He asked me to assure you of his affection and to convey his blessings. He never ceases day or night to pray for you."

Returned, the disciple reported to his master, "I told him everything needed." So also the third time.

Since Avva George remained in his place, Pahone went with a stick to drive him out. The disciple, who was swifter, ran before him on another path and told Avva George, "I could not detain my master. Though old, he ascends the hill to get a blessing from you."

George went to meet Pahone, knelt before him and said, "I thank you for the many messages of love which you sent through your disciple. I am not worthy of them and of your coming up this steep hill especially to bless me."

Avva Pahone understood how the disciple had fulfilled his task. He embraced Avva George and, returning to his hut, said to the novice, "Until now I was your master. You were my disciple. Henceforth you will teach me, because you know better the ways of love."

"The tree of life also in the midst of the garden." (GEN 2:9)

Every tree is a tree of life. First of all because it is a nature preserve for birds. What the Lord said is true of every tree: "The birds of the air come and lodge in the branches thereof" (MTT 13:32).
Trees are not only for birds. Badgers burrow at their roots. Hundreds of plants, insects, and animals find food and shelter beneath its branches and lovers find a place to enjoy each other.
More than 200 different kinds of insects live in an oak. Innumerable wasps and bugs feed on oak flowers, beetles eat the bark, caterpillars of many kinds eat the leaves. There are the squirrels and the wood mice. Owls in their turn feed on the mice and nest in the hollow trunks of old oaks.
Then there are the ivy, mistletoe, mosses, algae, lichens, and ferns. Near to death, the oak tree is invaded by fungi.
The oak is hospitable to each and every one. Lovers are gladly received to exchange kisses in its shadow. Trees are even places where men can meet with angels. Abraham met angels while resting in the shadow of an oak. Believers are likened to palm trees (SOS 7:7). They are like trees planted by the rivers of water (PSA 1:2). Not only that they have life in themselves, but they give opportunity of life to hundreds of others. They are trees of life for a multitude of creatures.
When dying, a tree gave its wood for a cross on which the salvation of mankind was fulfilled. The tree served even when dead. Let us be trees in God's garden.

"[They] shall betray one another." (MTT 24:10)

One of the darkest features of the Chinese church under communism has been the denunciation movement, when friends and members of the same family were turned against each other in betrayal and hate, everyone seeking only to save his or her own skin. A "Christian" conference in 1951, attended by 152 Protestant leaders, asked the death penalty for the Methodist Bishop Chen and the Evangelist Ku-Jen-en. The Communist Party was more gracious than the brethren. They gave the bishop only five years of prison. No one heard any more from Ku. He probably died in some jail.

The Christian pastor Lu Chih-Wei was attacked in a public meeting by his own daughter: "I now accuse my father, for the way in which he has blinded me, causing me to lose my standing with the people." The father wept. She continued, "Do you think that your false tears are able to bribe my conscience?"

Good Christians, thousands of them, could be induced vehemently to denounce their beloved ones. Brother Sun, editor of the ~Christian Farmer~, was subjected to such mental pressure that he committed suicide. Only a few resisted, among them Watchman Nee and Wang-Min-Tao.

Your not becoming a traitor and your resistance in times of intensive trial depends upon your earlier Christian life. When, after the conversion of Saul of Tarsus, the Lord appeared to Ananias, the pastor of the church, He told him how to teach a new convert: "I will shew him how great things he must suffer" (ACT 9:16).

Every Christian church which does not teach its members the main religious science, sufferology, does not fulfill its duties. Impose upon yourself mortification. Learn to suffer and not to yield. The time may come when you will need this knowledge.

Nov 12

"The LORD ... said unto [Abraham] ... walk before me, and be thou perfect." (GEN 17:1)

A story says that the devil and a friend of his were walking along a street, when they saw on the other side a man bowing down, picking up something and putting it in his bag. The devil told his friend, "This man just found a piece of truth."

"This is a catastrophe for you," said the friend.

"Oh, no," the devil replied. "I will give him the idea of creating an institution for its propagation. It will see to it that the truth is neutralized."

We cannot renounce institutions. If Jesus had only given His teachings and died and resurrected without leaving a church behind, there would be no disciples of Christ today. We have the Scriptures from the church. The church guarantees their authenticity, interprets the difficult parts, preserves the rich experience of generations of Christians, and imparts baptism and Holy Communion.

We would like every man to be a giant of faith like Abraham, who set out on his own and walked before God, when, except for his family, no one believed in him. We could as well desire every baboon to be a man, every aborigine to be a cultured genius. Men are as they are and they need the institutional church for a life of faith.

We must be aware at the same time that institutions not only convey truth, but sometimes also distort it. They are led by men with shortcomings. Nothing can replace firsthand experience and the discovery of the kingdom within ourselves.

So be faithful to the institution and have your personal walk with God.

"Them that have the rule over you ... watch for your souls." (HEB 13:17)

Don't be a troubler in Zion, one who always finds faults with ministers, who is ready to break away from a church or to produce a split.

Every minister, even one who leads a church like the church in Laodicea, where Christ instead of being in the center was kept like a beggar at the door knocking, is a star in Jesus' right hand (REV 2:1). It is for Him and for the rare ones who have a special assignment from Him to reprove and to remove ministers who have gone astray. We can easily be mistaken and uproot wheat together with the tares. We can deceive ourselves into believing that we are doing God's service when we drive a holy man from the pulpit or make his life bitter by continual criticism.

A pastor could achieve nothing good in his congregation because of much gossip directed against him. He left. After this, men were converted through remembering his previous sermons. His value was not appreciated by the congregation while the minister had been with them. The deacon who had hated him most, repented, and went to see him. The pastor's wife received him with the words, "He is dying. Don't go in to see him. The sight of your face might add to his anguish."

How terrible for a Christian to be a source of anguish for a dying saint!

The deacon entered anyway. The dying pastor could only open his languid eyes once and said, "Touch not mine anointed and do my prophets no harm. I have been a sinner. Whatever you have done to me has been right. Don't worry, but you will meet others. Remember these words. The one in whom you find faults might be God's anointed. Touch not my anointed and do my prophets no harm." With this, he passed away.

No minister is perfect-either in his teaching, or in his life. Still they must be held in esteem. An unloved pastor cannot do good to his congregation.

"Thou shalt be saved, and thy house." (ACT 16:31)

There are privileged saints whose faith is tested to its uttermost and who have the chance to show their loyalty to the uttermost.

In the sixteenth century, in Spain, Antonio Herrezuelo was sentenced by the Inquisition to die at the stake for his evangelical belief. Julian Hernandez had smuggled Spanish Scriptures and reformed literature into the country, hidden in wine casks. Smuggling is an old habit in the church of Christ. When caught, Hernandez was brutally tortured for three years, but did not betray those to whom he had given the Bibles. Herrezuelo had received such a Bible and had been converted.

When brought to the stake, Herrezuelo was tormented by the knowledge that his wife, also a believer, had recanted for fear of death and that because of this, the generous inquisitors had changed her death sentence to life imprisonment. One word from the mouth of Antonio and he could escape the stake, too. He could go to jail and hope that one day a pardon would be given and he would be reunited with his wife.

He knew of a better hope: the promise of God given to all believers that they and their houses would be saved. Until the gag was put into his mouth, he admonished his wife to repent. He believed that the Word of God, effective in saving sinners, would also be effective in making a backslidden saint return to the fold of Christ.

He died. His wife went to jail, but had no peace there. The inner fight lasted eight years. After this time, she withdrew her recantation and threw the affirmation of her faith in the teeth of the inquisitors. She was burned, too, and went to join her husband in heaven.

Believe in the promise of God for all who constitute your house.

"I have not shunned to declare unto you all the counsel of God." (ACT 20:27)

A Bible salesman was refused harshly when he tried to sell a Bible. He then offered a New Testament at no charge to the lady.

Her husband mocked. "We are married," he said. "So half of everything she has belongs to me." He took an axe and cut the New Testament in half.

A few weeks later he asked his wife, "Where do you have the other half of the book? I need it. My half finished with the story of a prodigal son returning to his father and saying something. I am curious to know what he said. His words are in your half."

This was not the only man to divide the Bible in half. Jesus came full of truth and grace. Some preachers speak only about truth, leaving for others only grace. Others do the opposite.

The Bible always unites forgiveness of sins with repentance.

Don't halve the Bible.

Don't stop at the fact that Jesus died for our sins. It is also written that we have to present our bodies as a living sacrifice (ROM 12:1).

"They that have known the truth." (2JN 1)

How can a man find the truth? Do we have the necessary spiritual and intellectual qualifications for finding it? Would we recognize it if we met it?

We are small. Can one catch the sun in a butterfly net or the ocean in a thimble? Send a child of three to a big library and ask it to find and bring to you Dante's Divine Comedy. How will the child identify it?

In order to find the truth, I must have an exact definition of what truth is. In order to know which of the many definitions of truth is true, and which of the assertions declaring themselves to be the ultimate truth in religion, politics, morals, etc. are really true, I must know the true signs by which truth is recognized. Who does not know the the truth beforehand, can never find the truth.

We are in a vicious circle. The truth cannot be found. The history of human thought is a graveyard of scientific and other assertions of which mankind once had been cocksure were true, only to later discover they were false.

Possession of truth distinguishable from my person, of truth which I can take or leave, is ruled out. Truth can be only an "I." Therefore Jesus said, "I am the truth" (JHN 14:6).

The rule of truth in a man can never be the rule of someone or something else.

Truth is the manner of being of a Jesus-like person. The more Jesus-likeness, the more truth is indwelling me, a truth which I don't have to seek. It is my character. There is no other answer to the search for truth.

God does not lead us as being someone else, but as identifying Himself with me.

"Let it not be that outward adorning." (1PE 3:3)

Perpetua was in a dungeon for her faith. She could have escaped if she had denied the Savior. Her old father entreated her to do so.

She told him, "Father, do you see this little pitcher here?"

He replied, "Yes."

She said to him again, "Could it be called by any other name than pitcher?"

He replied, "No."

Then Perpetua said, "Neither can I call myself anything else than what I am, a Christian. "

She remained steadfast when her father asked her to have pity on his gray hairs, not to deliver him up to the scorn of men for having an imprisoned criminal as a daughter, and also to remember her infant child. She could not be shaken, because she could not be something other than a Christian, as a pitcher cannot be something other than it is.

Her unbelieving father was beaten with rods in her presence and her child was taken from her. She remained the only thing she could be.

When she was tossed to the wild beasts, her tunic was torn from her side. She immediately covered her legs, being more mindful of her nakedness than of the suffering which waited her. This was her last gesture before dying a martyr's death.

Christians, simply be what you are. You could not be anything else.

"Be not conformed to this world." (ROM 12:2)

A Christian cannot be careful enough in choosing which public events he will attend, what he will watch on TV, or what books he will read. Tertullian, a great Christian teacher of the third century, told of a Christian lady who went to an indecent show and came back possessed. In the exorcism, when the unclean spirit was upbraided for having dared to attack a believer, he firmly replied, "I did it most righteously, for I found her in my domain."

I concede that in many shows there are things that are both pleasant and innocent in themselves, even some things that are excellent. The explanation is simple. No one dilutes poison with gall. The accursed thing is put into delicacies well seasoned and of sweet taste.

Be careful before going to a show even if it seems innocent.

The Christian's joys, his nuptial banquet, are yet to come. We are not in a hurry to get all the possible pleasures out of life. We can fellowship with the world in her entertainment as little as she can fellowship with us in our worship.

The Lord has said, "The world shall rejoice: and ye shall be sorrowful" (JHN 16:20). Let us mourn over the prevailing unrighteousness, while the world is merry, that in the day of the world's doom we may rejoice.

No one can have the pleasures of both lives. Don't scan the newspapers daily to find what fun you can have, but take daily your cross and follow Him.

"The bridegroom came; and they that were ready went in with him to the marriage." (MTT 25:10)

We who live four hundred years after the Reformation can understand only with difficulty the thinking of Christians in the Middle Ages.

In the thirteenth century, no one would have contested the words written by a monk of that time: "All are entitled to enter the family of Christ, when they make a proper use of the blood of their Redeemer and of the milk of the sacred Virgin, their mother; yes, of that adorable blood which encourages the martyrs and soothes their torments and of that virginal milk which sweetens the bitterness of our cup by appeasing the wrath of God."

The Scriptures were almost totally unknown. They tell us about the cleansing power of the blood of Christ. The saving power of Mary's milk is just a beautiful human fancy.

Men at that time loved also to venerate lesser female saints. They might have gone too far in this respect, although many of them were beautiful personalities.

Wartburg, remembered now only as the place where Luther preached, had been the place where St. Elizabeth of Hungary was reared and where she had prayed. She had erected a hospital, which still can be seen at the palace gates so that she might never forget human misery in the splendor of her queenly rank.

Her last words were, "The moment has arrived when God summons His friend to the wedding feast. The Bridegroom seeks His spouse. Silence, silence."

It was on November 19.

"[Let] husbands ... be won by the conversation of the wives." (1PE 3:1)

On a Sabbath day, Rabbi Meir had gone to the synagogue. While he was there his two little boys had climbed up a tree, had fallen, and were found dead beneath the tree. His wife, Beruria, took the corpses to an upper room, covered them with a sheet, and went downstairs to prepare the table for her husband.

When he returned home, he said the prescribed prayers, sat down at table and asked about the children. She answered, "Well, they are children. What can you expect from them?"

When he had finished eating, she said, "I have to ask you a question. A neighbor gave me a pair of costly earrings to keep for her, because her husband was a drunkard and might have sold them. Now her husband is dead and she asked me to give them back. I loved them. When you were not at home, I used to ornament myself with them. before the mirror. They were one of my joys. Should I give them back?"

The rabbi answered, "I wonder about that question, but I think you should return them, and thank her for the privilege of having had them for so long a time."

Then she said, "Come with me. I wish to show you how beautiful they are."

She took him to the upper room, drew away the sheet, and said, "These are the gems. We have enjoyed the time with them. Let us now hand them back to their owner with thankfulness."

He answered, "Blessed is a husband with a wise wife. God has given; God has taken. Let the name of God be praised."

Let us take our losses like this.

"God loveth a cheerful giver." (2CO 9:7)

A Christian told his brother in the faith, "I put aside every Sunday what I have to give to the church. If I am hindered from going, I give the money to my wife to take along or save it for the next time, and add the tithe to the next week's offering. How do you act in this regard?

The brother answered, "Before going to church, I kneel with my family at home and thank God for the privilege of living in a free hand where I can go to God's house. I thank Him for the pastor, for the missionary effort of our congregation, and for all the other things. Then I decide how much to give and bring it to the altar."

After a time the two Christians met again. The second said, "I tried your method. It is marvelous. After praying and thanking God before deciding about how much to give in church, I found always that the sun put aside was much too small, when I had in view the favors received. I increased my giving. My blessings increased accordingly. I find exquisite joy in giving. I am happier than ever before."

Do you give at random or under God's guidance?

"I am come ... to fulfil [the law]." (MTT 5:17)

Shun Shauk, former president of the Japanese Bible Society, tells the following story.

At the end of World War II American soldiers received a hearty welcome in Shinmanbuke, a village on the island of Okinawa. The houses and the streets in this village were clean, unlike anything seen elsewhere, and the inhabitants looked happier than the other Japanese.

The difference came from the fact that thirty years earlier an American missionary had passed through that village. He could not stay long. He just told them a few words and left them a Bible.

Two brothers, Shosei and Mogon, began to live according to this book, though they had no communication with Christians from anywhere else. They had found the Savior through the book and fulfilled His precepts. They witnessed to others. So the one brother became mayor of the village, the other its teacher. The Bible was read daily in school. The village was administrated according to the Bible.

The American chaplain could see that the thirty-year-old Bible had been well used and had changed the life of a village.

Does your Bible lie often on the shelf? Has it changed your life? Have you decided to learn daily from it and to put to practice immediately what you learn? Do you bring its teachings into your school, factory, and community?

If you have not used the Bible wisely until now, learn from these Japanese brethren.

"To-day if ye will hear his voice, harden not your heart." (PSA 95:7,8)

A young man told his mother, "I cannot accept the Bible. It contains so many things which I cannot swallow. They simply make no sense."

The mother answered, "When you were at war, you wrote me once: 'Your letters describe a situation which is unintelligible for me. It is true that I have been away from home for three years. I would understand perhaps if I were with you.'"

The measure of how much the Bible is unintelligible for us shows for how long and how far away we are from our heavenly home, whose thoughts are expressed in the Bible. Return to the parental house and you will understand.

Do it at once.

The Greek tyrant Archacus was on his way to a banquet, when someone handed him a letter, saying, "It is very important."

He answered, "Important things we will leave for tomorrow." Shortly after that, while he was drunk, a dagger of an assassin pierced his heart. His blood fell upon the letter containing a warning about the plot.

Evil forces strive to keep us far away and for a long time from the house of the heavenly Father, in order to keep our minds muddled there with eternal death waiting for us at the end.

Heed the warning. Return.

"Lord, teach us to pray." (LUK 11:1)

When I was a young Christian, I was taught that if you go to a prayer meeting for rain in a time of drought, you have to take an umbrella with you. This would be a token of faith.

Later I read in the Talmud that the Jewish high priest, when he entered once a year into the most holy place, always finished his supplication with the words, "Lord, don't listen to the prayers of wayfarers.

Every wayfarer wishes nice weather for the day on which he travels. How would the world look if God would have to give or stop rain according to our having taken an umbrella or not?

I prefer the vicar who, when asked to pray for rain, answered, "Not while the wind is in this direction."

Our Lord said, "The wind blows wherever it listeth." There are objective laws which reign in nature. To pray against the weather forecast because it does not fit your purpose is as wrong as praying that two times two should not be four.

The great prayer of Christians is, "Thy will be done." Elijah could bring rain. Jesus could rebuke the winds. Do you wish to imitate them? You can't do it on your level. You have to become a powerful, spiritual personality, knowing God's will about the weather. You must know things meteorologists don't know.

"I have manifested thy name unto the men which thou gavest me." (JHN 17: 6)

When the monk, Paulinus, was at the court of Edwin, king of Northumbria, in A.D. 627, endeavoring to persuade him to accept Christianity, the king was in two minds about it, until one of his warriors spoke.

"The present life of man upon earth, O king, seems to me, in comparison to the time which is unknown to us, like the swift flight of a sparrow through that house wherein you sit at supper in winter with your nobility, while the fire blazes in the midst, and the hall is armed, but the wintry storms of rain or snow are raging without. The sparrow, flying in at one door and immediately out at another, whilst he is within is safe from the wintry tempests, but after a short space of fair weather he immediately vanishes out of your sight, passing from winter into winter again. So this life of man appears for a little while, but of what is to follow or what went before we know nothing at all. If therefore this new doctrine tells us something more certain, it seems justly to deserve to be followed."

The new doctrine, the doctrine of Christ, answers this quest. Jesus manifested to us the name of the Father (JHN 17:6). The knowledge of this name opens all doors for a soul here and in eternity. Through all ancient literature of different peoples persists the belief that if the real name of a thing is known to a man, the powers inherent in that thing are under his control. The thought was right. When we know the chemical formula, the last name of a thing, we can act on it.

Through Jesus we know that God is love. God's love is the key for solving the riddle.

"There was silence." (JOB 4:16)

A student went to a great sage and said, "Master, teach me about God."

The sage remained silent.

The student again said to him, "Master, teach me about God."

He still remained silent.

When asked by the student a third time, the sage said, "I taught thee about God. I am silent."

To put God in words is like trying to catch waves with a fishing net. Words have arisen from the necessity of men to understand each other in hunting, production, personal relations. We cannot do without them, but we must be aware that when we apply human words to God, calling Him, "Master, Father, Love," they can bring wrong connotations. A master can be an exploiter. Luther had great difficulty in saying the Lord's Prayer, because he did not like to call God "Father." His father had been very harsh. Love? I love apple pie and my dog. Is it the same sentiment which stands for God?

When Livingstone wished to explain to savages that God is love, he could not do it, because they did not have the word "love" in their language. He found out that the thing which they appreciated most was the meat from the arm of a man when smoked. They called it "unboy." He delivered his famous sermon that, "God is the best unboy." He was criticized for it. But he did what the apostle John had done before him, calling God "love."

Love is a human sentiment. Does anyone believe that God is a sentiment? Because it was the highest which man knew, John applied it to God, as Livingstone applied to Him "unboy."

As for what God ultimately is, you will know it when you keep silent.

"It pleased God.... to reveal his Son in me." (GAL 1:15,16)

What can a man do to discover the Son of God in himself? How can he recover God's image in which he was created and which has been marred by sin? There is no way.

An actor plays Othello. Perhaps he never had an occasion to be jealous and has not known this sentiment. He tries to play the role of a personality foreign to his nature: the prototype of the jealous male. The impersonated person, the role Othello, could never change the character of the actor. The actor can always decide not to play Othello any more.

Every one of us is first of all what he is. Secondly, he takes different attitudes in life, that of a person which plays with sin, that of a hardened sinner, that of a repentant sinner. None of these roles can decide what I should be. It is the fundamental "I" which decides what role to play.

The whole change starts when the Othello played by me does not take himself seriously any more. He knows that he does not really care for the fake Desdemona and never killed her–that the whole scene has been a play. Then your real personality, the Son of God in you, will appear in its entire beauty. The old man, the acting, will have passed away.

It is written in the parable of the prodigal son that when the prodigal son decided to return to his father, he came to himself (LUK 15:17). Every return to God is a return to your real self.

"Weep with them that weep." (ROM 12:15)

A Christian was severely stabbed. The criminal was caught and taken by the police to confront his victim in the hospital. The police assured the Christian, "This man will get his due punishment. He will sit in prison."

The Christian replied, "What an honor for me to meet him now. Jesus said that everyone who sits in prison is His little brother." The Christian bowed before the criminal and died.

Bow before everyone who suffers, even if he suffers for having wronged you. Jesus, the Man of SOlTOW8, sympathizes with the sufferers.

It is written in the Talmud: "When an unrighteous man persecutes a righteous one, God is on the side of the persecuted righteous man. If an unrighteous man persecutes another unrighteous man, God is on the side of the persecuted unrighteous man. If a righteous man persecutes an unrighteous one, even then God is on the side of the persecuted."

Be always on the side of the hungry, even if they are hungry because they are lazy. Be on the side of the thirsty, even if it was their neglect not to have dug a well. Be on the side of the naked even if they have gambled away their clothes. Be on the side of the sick, even if they have destroyed their health through vice. Be on the side of prisoners even if they are criminals, only being careful not to favor them above their victims who were also men innocently persecuted.

"Sell that ye have, and give alms." (LUK 12:33)

The rich man in the parable was clothed in fine linen, which according to Revelation 19 symbolizes the righteousness of the saints. This man had the outward appearance of righteousness, but he could not be acknowledged as such because he was callous toward the poor.

All Christians of industrial countries are in danger of committing the same sin. Developing countries receive only fifteen percent of the final selling price of their product. Producer nations get only eleven cents for every dollar worth of bananas sold to rich countries. The colonial pattern by which poor countries provided cheap raw materials and tropical foods for the rich industrialized nations still exists.

Between 1963 and 1971 Sri Lanka los,t 45 million dollars on exports of tea to Britain alone as a result of falling prices, twice as much as Britain gave in aid.

Within the underdeveloped countries, there is also much social injustice. The richest ten percent of the population in these countries account for about forty percent of the total income, while the poorest forty percent account just for twelve percent of the income.

The individual Christian must use restraint in consumption. The normal thing for a Christian, with whatever income, is not to spend on himself and his family more than the average income of a citizen of his country. Everything above this is luxury.

Ambrose wrote, "If your brother starves while you have the possibility of helping him, you are a thief; and if he dies of hunger, you are a murderer."

"Of such [the little children] is the kingdom of heaven." (MTT 19:14)

One of the saddest moments in the life of a parent is when he observes that his child is retarded. For them I recount the following true story, quoted from the book by Fritz Rienecker, ~The Best Is Still to Come~ (Sonne und Schild, Wuppertal).

"In a home for retarded children, Catherine was nurtured twenty years. The child had been a complete idiot from the beginning and had never spoken a word, but only vegetated. She either gazed quietly at the walls or made disordered movements. To eat, to drink, to sleep, were her whole life. She seemed not to participate at all in what happened around her. A leg had to be amputated. The staff wished Cathy well and hoped that the Lord would soon take her to Himself.

"One day the doctor called the director to come quickly. Catherine was dying. When both entered the room, they could not believe their senses. Catherine was singing Christian hymns she had heard and had picked up, just those suitable for deathbeds. She repeated again and again the German song, 'Where does the soul find its fatherland, its rest?' She sang for half an hour with transfigured face, then she passed away quietly."

So it had only seemed that she was not receptive to what happened around her. From the medical point of view this case is a riddle. God has lifted the veil once to encourage parents of handicapped children. God makes no mistakes. He who cares for sparrows has arranged that the mentally retarded should have a place in heaven, too.

"The LORD God formed man of the dust of the ground." (GEN 2:7)

Man is not formed simply from earth (~eretz~ in Hebrew, from which the English word "earth" comes.) He is formed from the ground. The Hebrew word is ~adamah~, which meant originally exceptionally good soil. The soil of paradise is called ~adamah~ in GEN 2:9. There is also desert or stony ground. God used the best of grounds on which the trees of paradise, even the tree of life grew, to form man of it. The potential of man is huge.

Then God breathed into his nostrils "the breath of life." The Hebrew does not have the singular, "life." The Jews used for it, ~haiim~, which is a plurals "lives." If you would like to write an infidel book in Hebrew saying that man has only one life, you could not do it because the language has no singular for "life." God endowed man with lives: with bodily and spiritual life, with life in this world and life in the next.

Man must be exceptional in that it should be said about him that he is only a little lower than an angel (PSA 8:5). In Hebrew the verse says, "Thou hast made him a little lower than God (~Elohim~)."

In bodily size, man is only a speck of dust in the universe, but who can express his greatness? Blaise Pascal wrote, "A breath, a drop of water, can kill man. But even if the universe would destroy him, man is greater than the universe; because man knows that he dies, while the universe does not know that it kills him."

Remember your greatness and thank the Creator who has given it to you.

"My joy might remain in you." (JHN 15:11)

It is said that a man suffering from melancholic depression visited a psychiatrist, who recommended frequent travels.

The patient answered, "I am traveling continuously and it does not help."

"A glass of wine drunk at a happy party is useful," said the doctor.

The reply was, "I drink whole barrels of alcohol and remain sad."

The doctor had an idea. "There is a clown in town who is unequaled. People cannot control their laughter listening to his jokes and seeing his tricks. Spend your evenings there."

The patient said, "I am that clown. I gladden everyone except myself. And the joy of those who watch me does not last."

The joys which this world gives are illusory, because in the depths of our hearts we realize they are mere escapes from the fact that we are men sentenced to death, men burdened with guilt. When we laugh, there is in us the remembrance that we made others weep.

Only God gives the real joy. He has shown in the resurrection of Christ that He has forgiven all our sins. Jesus our Lord "was delivered for our offences, and was raised again for our justification" (ROM 4:25). The resurrection of Jesus is a pledge that we will resurrect, too, because we belong to Him. We have an inner joy which continues even without external stimulants.

"The works of the flesh are ... adultery, fornication, uncleanness." (GAL 5:19)

A preacher was asked at a student meetings "What is wrong with premarital sex? Everyone tries four or five suits before buying one. Why should I not try sex with four or five girls before marrying one?"

The preacher answered, "There is a flaw in your judgment. By the same token, each girl has to try four or five young men before taking a husband. So in the end you buy a used suit instead of a new one."

Premarital sex is not a preparation for marriage. Should theft be the preparation for an honest life? How can the sexual possession of a person, unaccompanied by love, prepare for a life based on the highest sentiment of affection between two beings of the opposite sex?

Sexual sins are frequent today. They can easily be forgiven, like all other sins. Isaiah said, "He [the Messiah] was wounded for our transgressions, he was bruised for our iniquities" (ISA 53:5), iniquities of whatever kind, including sexual ones. But after being forgiven, let us not continue in them. The price for extramarital affairs is much too high.

Think only about the fate of children born without a stable home, abandoned. Think about the grief of your parents and of the other person's parents.

To avoid sexual sin, practice spiritual hygiene. Be choosy in reading books and magazines, in watching TV or movies. Fill you days to the brim with serving the Lord and your fellow men.

"We are members of one body." (EPH 5:30)

Because we are members of His body, we must be active in continuing His mission today.

Some years ago, a young boy actively involved in sports suffered a diving accident which rendered him permanently paralyzed from his neck down. His mind sent out signals to his members to respond to the desire within his youthful heart to involve himself in further activity, but his arms and legs remained limp and lifeless in the wheelchair.

Even more tragic and heartbreaking is the thought of seeing Christ at the wayside of humanity, His noble mind sending forth signals to His members to show love and mercy, only to find those members paralyzed and silent in fear and neglect.

In earlier times He healed the paralytic. Today He is rendered helpless by the same malady of His body which is the church.

Let us fulfill without delay all the orders issued from His mind, remembering that we are His members.

"For [Christ] I have suffered the loss of all things, and do count them but dung." (PHP 3:8)

You discover easily how much of a Christian a man is if he loses money, fame, health, etc. He was meant to consider all things as dung. Who gets angry when he gets rid of dung, which makes everything around him smell offensively?

Sadly, these biblical words which were reality for Paul are only a phrase for most of us. Even churches try to accumulate dung. There have been attempts at reformation in this regard, but they all failed. Francis of Assisi and Joachim of Fiore, founders of religious, orders having poverty as their supreme rule, resigned from the leadership when they saw that they had not succeeded.

Money, love of fame, attachment to creatures are great competitors of God. With most men, God loses in this competition.

A prince boasted once to a company about the great wealth he possessed. A pastor who was present asked him,, "Your highness, would you kindly accept this pin and return it to me when we meet in eternity?"

The prince replied, "How can you ask for this? 1 can take nothing with me."

"That is right," said the pastor. "We boast of what does not belong to us and might be lost today, instead of accumulating what is of eternal value."

An inscription was found in India, "Jesus, blessing be upon His name, has said, 'This world is a bridge. Pass over it, but don't construct a house on it.' "

Die to the things of this world before you die. Count all things really as dung, that you may win Christ.

"The love of God is shed abroad in our hearts." (ROM 5:5)

While Jesus walked once on the streets of Nazareth - so a Moslem story goes-the mob heaped abuse upon Him. He continued on His way quietly, praying with loud voice for everyone who insulted Him.

He was asked how He could do this, to which He replied, "I give them the only thing I have in My purse."

Smash a bottle filled with milk. No vinegar will spill from it, because the bottle did not contain vinegar. How can words of hatred and vindictiveness flow from a Christian heart? The Christian does not have to choose between several options. He does not fulfill a commandment of love because Christ so ordered. If he would like to hate, he would not know how to do it, because God has renewed his heart.

The first disciples asked the Lord, "Rabbi, where dwellest thou?" He said unto them, "Come and see." They abode with Him that day (JHN 1:38,39).

He could not have taken them to an abode on earth. He had none. He dwells wherever love reigns, be it in a humble cottage, or in a palace. Jesus took the inquirers to a couple of such homes. They understood and became His apostles.

"The disciples were called Christians first in Antioch." (ACT 11:26)

It is said that whales once swam near the shore of America and philosophically asked themselves what they really were. Then they heard some children exclaiming, "Look! whales!" Then the whales were happy. They knew their names and they fancied they knew by this also what they were.

Some believers, in the same way, have been given by men on shore the title "Christians," and mistakenly think that this name discloses their inner reality. It ;s not so. The Lord said, "By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another" (JHN 13:35), not that you "bear a certain name."

In the Italian Alps, peasants have the habit of leaving the door open on Christmas Eve, heating the oven, and having a dinner prepared on the table, in case the holy family pursued by Herod should want to take refuge there.

The Ostjaks, a Mongol tribe in the outer parts of Siberia, the place of deportation under the Czars and under Bolshevism, always put some food outside their door when they go to sleep, in case a fugitive prisoner needs it.

We are what we are, not what we are called. Jesus and the holy ones are always fugitives in this world. Do we show concern for the needy? What we do shows what we are.

"The LORD is good." (PSA 100:5)

One of the oldest problems in religion involves the question of why there is so much suffering among mankind if the world is led by a good God.

The answer is simpler than we would imagine. God is good not only toward the good, but also toward the unthankful and wicked (LUK 6:35). Only an all-embracing goodness is good. Goodness shown to the wicked usually does not have the effect of changing them, but often encourages them to continue in their evil. God's goodness is patient and long-suffering, which is used by those who are evil to commit new crimes. God was patient even with Hitler and Stalin and bore with them for decades. During this time they practiced mass slaughter.

In order for the world to be good, God would have to cease to be good Himself toward the wicked. Who of us would dare to tell God, "Stop being good to sinners," when we know the evil in our own hearts?

On the earthly level, with our human mind, there is no solution for the problem of evil. God has made provision. He is not only good, but He knows how to take revenge as well. He has a day of wrath in reserve. Leave philosophizing to God-He has a better head than we do - and flee urgently from the wrath of God.

"Enoch walked with God." (GEN 5:22)

Don t be afraid to follow a man because he is rejected by the church. Many a saint has been martyred by the church and canonized afterward. Men who would have opposed the church in the saint's lifetime and have taken his defense against the prelates would have served the cause of Christ better than those who obeyed and trusted the church.

Joan of Arc was burned by the church. Celestine V died in prison. There is strong suspicion that he was murdered there by the order of his successor, Pope Boniface VIII. St. John of the Cross was treated like a madman. Huss died at the stake, condemned as a heretic. Thousands of others suffered the same fate.

Our attitude toward the church has to be ambivalent. Whoever has God as his father, has the church as his mother and owes her obedience and love. A mother can go mad, too. The church is not only a divine institution; she is also constituted of men who can commit grave sins in her name. Top church leaders are not exempt from this possibility. So obedience toward the church has a limit which natural reason and the guidance of the Holy Spirit will show you.

The supreme ideal for every Christian is to be, like Abraham, a man who walks with God. Personal contact with God is the best guarantee against a life of error.

"Moses said unto the LORD ... I am not eloquent." (EXO 4:10)

Why did God choose as His messenger a man slow of speech and of a slow tongue? Rabbi Mohliver of Byalystok explained that if he had chosen instead an eloquent orator, such a man would have entered into a long argument with Pharaoh and his advisers about the sociological and psychological evils produced by slavery, about the value of emancipation, about the beauty of a monotheistic religion, and the value of the traditions which the Jews had from their ancestors, etc. He would have become enamored of his own speeches. More and more dialogues would have been initiated, like the endless and useless dialogues which different religions have with each other. The result for the Jews would have been nil.

Because Moses stuttered and could pronounce few words without difficulty, he went directly to the point and said to Pharaoh, "Let my people go." It is such men that God needs even today.

It is as though the whole Bible had been written by men who had difficulty in speaking. They chose monosyllables.

In JHN 3:16, the central verse of the Bible, there are twenty monosyllables in one sentence and only six words with more than a syllable. In JHN 3:17, there are twenty-one monosyllables and only one word with more syllables. I know no other book like this.

It is not a book of eloquence which is important, but one which brings us into the heart of truth.

"God who at sundry times and in divers manners spake." (HEB 1:1)

The Buddhists in Japan have a legend that four eternities ago a king by the name of Amida arrived at the perfection of a Buddha, but refused to enter into the well-deserved Nirvana until all living beings had also entered it. They believe that men who cannot arrive at Buddhahood because of their many sins and cares will arrive at it through the merits of this sacrifice, if they repeat the sacred formula, ~Namu Amida Buddha Butsu~ (I trust fully in Amida Buddha).

God who inspired in many nations aspirations expressed in such legends, has made the hope of sinners a reality in Jesus. The very name Jesus (in Hebrew ~Jeshua~) means "salvation." The Bible assures us repeatedly that whoever calls on His name will be saved. God knows that we are born in sin and conceived in iniquity, that we cannot save ourselves by our endeavors. The sacrifice which Christ accomplished on Golgotha saves sinners, if only they call upon Him, because the calling of their heart is inspired by His love. Don't expect an answer when you call Him. Your call is already His answer.

A concert doesn't really involve two different objects-a pianist and a piano-but rather one unique event, the pianist at the piano. So in the act of faith there are not two parties, the sinner who appeals and the Lord who pities. His pity made you appeal. It is the sign of your acceptance. Believe this and you will live.

Pray also for the Buddhists that they may know the only name in which there is salvation.

"Do not judge." (MTT 7:1)

The Japanese Christian, Endo Shisaku, tells about a missionary, Rodrigo, during the great persecution in the eighteenth century. When arrested, he endured tortures stoically and did not deny his faith. Inwardly, though, he was disturbed by the fact that God kept silent, that He did not answer his prayers. He begged Jesus at least to diminish his pain, but received no answer.

One day he faced the great test. He had the alternative either of seeing dozens of Christians killed before his eyes, or of winning their freedom. They would not even have to recant but he had to give up his faith publicly by treading on an image of Jesus. Out of love toward his brethren, he chose the latter. The moment he did it, he heard for the first time Jesus speaking to him, encouraging him to save the lives of his brethren. It is the character of Jesus willingly to be wounded in all ages so that others may escape. When Pilate offered either to release Jesus or Barabbas, Jesus wished rather Barabbas' release. Would He not wish to have His image trodden under the feet of a pastor so that innocent believers should not die?

Secretly, Rodrigo remained a Christian and brought to salvation even the one who had betrayed him.

The biblical solution is simple. It is to endure everything and never to deny the Lord. On the other hand, life has its complications, in which it is not easy to make the right choice.

Let us remember lovingly in prayer the leaders of the official churches in the Communist countries, commonly referred to as traitors because of their cooperation with the atheist governments. Many of them did it with the thought of saving the churches and their flocks. God understands and is rich in mercy. Let us be the same.

"Be like-minded, having the same love, being of one accord, of one mind." (PHP 2:2)

The Greek word for peace, ~eirene~, means etymologically, "to speak again with each other." Men don't come to an understanding because they never talk. They only make noises when they are together, believing that this is discussion. They change the expressions on their faces and think they understand each other. We are strangers even within our families and among friends. We live together for decades without the normal receiving and giving of aims and ideas. We make use of each other each for his own purpose. We don't love and are not beloved. We are alone. Men don't know the way of peace.

It consists in passing from making noises with words to " realizing." I have translated thus the real sense of the Hebrew word ~ledaber~ as to speak. It has as its root ~davar~, which means not only word, but also thing, reality, cause. A Hebrew is meant not only to speak in words, but also to communicate reality in words. For"knowing," the Hebrews used the same word as for sexual intercourse. In Greek, too, ~gnosis~ has both senses. You know only through intimate union, through a loving embrace in which the two become one. You communicate them not only in words, but also in the warmth of the fellowship of burning hearts. There is no possibility of quarreling in that moment.

The bride in the Song of Solomon prays, "Let him kiss me with the kisses of his mouth" (SOS 1:2). No one can quarrel while his mouth is covered with kisses.

Seek real encounters with your brother, sister, and fellow man. Let it not be only an exchange of words, but a real melting together. Then we will have fulfilled the commandment, "Love one another, as I loved you." Jesus did not only tell us words. He, the Son of God, became man.

"He might fill all things." (EPH 4:10)

Blessed Armelle Nicolas was an illiterate peasant woman who lived in the seventeenth century in France. She said, "God has sent me into the world with the sole purpose of loving Him. By His grace, I loved Him so much, that I cannot love Him anymore in the manner of mortals. It is time that I go to Him, that I may love Him in the manner of the saints in heaven."

She came to this high level of love through practicing the continuous presence of our Lord.

She took every piece of food which others despised, rejoicing that she could leave the good things to others. When she prepared food for her mistress, she thought about Jesus as food for her soul. If she saw a dog following its master faithfully, she decided to do the same. When she saw the quiet lambs in the pasture, who meekly allowed themselves to be shorn and slaughtered, she remembered that Jesus was the Lamb of God who had had the same attitude. When she saw the hen gathering her chickens under her wings, she remembered that she was compared with one of them and that Jesus wished her to be under His shelter. When she was enchanted by beautiful flowers, she remembered the words by which the Lord described Himself: "I am the rose of Sharon, and the lily of the valleys" (SOS 2:1). The fish swimming in the sea taught her to swim in the ocean of His love.

All things were for her allegories of the heavenly realities. So she became an advanced saint.

"Be not righteous over much." (ECC 7:16)

Peter wept a few tears about his denial of Jesus. When he met the resurrected Lord he did not even apologize. Judas' remorse was of an entirely different kind. He confessed to the priests that he had sold innocent blood. Peter had not gone back to the servant girl, before whom he had denied Jesus, to put things straight. Judas gave back the money he had received for betrayal. How few are those who make such restitution.

Contrary to all human logic, Peter received grace and became a prince among the apostles. Judas, after having done things much greater than to weep a little bit, remained without grace and committed suicide.

This is always the fate of those who are righteous over much, who overdo in repentance, who accumulate works of penitence instead of simply relying on the sacrifice of Christ, not only for forgiveness of sins, but also for repairing its effects.

In the Book of Leviticus the Hebrew word used for sins among fellow men is called ~asham~, but the restitution which a thief had to make to the owner is also called ~asham~. Jesus is called ~asham~ in the great prophecy of ISA 53. He is not only the sacrifice for our sins, but also the One who makes restitution. He can give pearls for every tear we have caused someone to weep; He can give new life to those whom we have murdered; He can give heavenly riches to those from whom we stole earthly treasures. Do not dig into your past too much-not even in order to repair it if you cannot do it with an easy and confident heart. Do not make the way of holiness too difficult for yourself.

Judas proceeded like this and failed. Peter did not muse too long over his own sins and won. He shed tears of repentance, met the resurrected Lord, and saw that he had remained Jesus' friend, so the sin of the past was done with. It did not burden him anymore.

"It had been good for that man if he had not been born."
(MTT 26:24)

Would it have been better for me not to have been born? Suppose that the soul is preexistent, to have been in some other sphere before being born on earth. Suppose that I could have known beforehand all the sins which I would commit in life, and all the chain of sufferings and sorrows they would provoke. Suppose that I had known all of the sorrows which have been my lot in life and the possibility of an eternity in hell. If I had had the choice, I would have chosen not to be born. Jesus said about Judas, "it had been better for that man if he had not been born." Did Judas have a choice?

We belong to a Master whose power is absolute. He does not take advice from anyone. We were born without having been consulted. We will live a span of life whose length is not decided by us. It is not decided by us even when we will have a mood which will lead one of us to suicide. We will be judged whether we like it or not. Instead of a useless quarrel with this Master, let us prepare ourselves to meet our God.

There is no other preparation for eternity than to obtain eternal life now through belief in the blood of Christ. In the presence of Judas Jesus said, "This is my blood shed for you!" Judas could have had part, too, in the unbreakable covenant in this blood. Jesus is not ashamed to call sinners His brethren. He would not have been ashamed to call Judas a brother either. He had called him friend.

Only when you think about this life as a prelude to life eternal in paradise, does being born become the right choice. I have a choice after all. I can be born again. I say, "Yes," to this. I enter this time into life concurring willingly with God's decision that I should be His elect.

"It pleased the LORD to bruise him." (ISA 53:10)

Therese of Lisieux had her place at evening prayers just in the front of a sister who had a nervous affliction. She always made a little curious noise, rather like one would make by rubbing two shells together. This tiny noise got Therese down, but she never chided the offender, not even with a look. Something inside her told her that the right thing to do was to put up with it for the love of God and spare the sister any embarrassment. Only she could not ignore the disturbing noise. Perspiration poured down her in the attempt to pray notwithstanding, but it was useless.

Then Therese hit on the idea of liking this exasperating noise. Instead of trying vainly not to hear it, she devoted herself to listening hard, as if the sound were that of delightful music and her prayer consisted of offering the music to the Lord.

It is wrong to escape anxieties and troubles through vain hopes or through quarreling with those who disturb you. Do not only bear sorrows, but positively love them.

In giving to Abraham the order to sacrifice his son, God gave him the additional happiness of specifying an altar three days' journey away, so that he might enjoy for a long time the idea of giving his most beloved for his Master. He could have placed the wood for the fire on an ass, but Isaac preferred to carry the wood up the hill himself. Great sacrifices should be borne, not with patience, but with delight.

The heavenly Father Himself, because it was necessary that His Son should die on the cross for the sins of the world, did not sacrifice Him grudgingly: "It pleased the Lord to bruise him." Adopt this attitude toward whatever disturbs you in life and you will be happy.

"Whosoever therefore shall confess me before men, him will I confess also before my Father which is in heaven." (MTT 10:32)

In Cambodia a prayer meeting took place in a church. Communist soldiers surrounded it. Some entered, took an image of Jesus from the wall, put it on the threshold and ordered, "Everyone who walks out spits on the image and denies Jesus. If not, he is shot."

What would you have done? Some made their excuses. One had a beloved fiancee, whom he had to marry soon. Another one had an old father to care for. A third one had small children at home. They knew Jesus to be forgiving and full of understanding. He knows that they have acted under duress. So they spat, and saved their lives.

The turn of a sixteen-year-old girl came. She made no excuse. Having guns pointed toward her, and having the alternative of spitting on the image or dying, she knelt, kissed the image, and wiped the spittle from its face. She had loved Jesus. She fell dead over the image of her bridegroom.

Souls like this girl's are the smile of mankind. Jesus calls Himself, "The lily of the valley, the rose of Sharon" (SOS 2:1) He expects His souls to have a heart as pure as the lily. He values such purity.

Flocks of healthy and beautiful sheep come from breeding the right type of lambs. Jesus told a pastor, "Feed my lambs." Let us teach our youth such beautiful examples of love even unto death.

"Not without blood." (HEB 9:7)

The religious Jews face a dilemma. The law of Moses states that sins can be remitted only through the atoning blood of innocent victims. On the other hand, the temple being destroyed, there are no sacrifices any more in the Jewish religion. The rabbis teach that the daily reading of a portion from Leviticus about the animal sacrifices is accepted by God as if the sacrifices themselves had been brought.

A Christian entered a Jewish shop and told the owner that he should accept Jesus, because the Jews have no more sacrifices. The Jew replied, "You are misinformed. Our reading of the Bible is accepted by God, counting as much as the blood of rams and lambs in times of old."

The Christian said, "All right. Instead of arguing religion with you, I had better buy a few things." He chose a dozen shirts, some shoes, and ties, among other things. Then he asked for an invoice. This was given. He began to read, "So many shirts cost so much, the ties and the shoes so much, the total some $200." He said farewell and left the

The Jew ran after him crying, "Sir, you have forgotten to pay!"
The Christian answered, "Did I not read the invoice?"
"Yes, but you did not pay the money."

To which the Christian said, "Well, I followed the advice of your rabbis that reading the bill is as good as paying."

It is not only Jews who are mistaken in this regard. There are also Christians who believe that saying the Lord's Prayer can take the place of really having God as Father; and calling Jesus a Savior means as much as really being saved by Him.

Look for the reality. Don't be content with formulas.

"Jesus said, Love your enemies." (MTT 5:44)

Five centuries before Jesus, Sophocles said in ~Antigone~, "I am here not for hating, but for loving." The Old Testament, too, taught love toward one's neighbor. Jesus brought love to its greatest height by demonstrating that it should also embrace the enemy.

A Jewess, Ilse Blumenthal-Weiss, whose husband was gassed and whose son was killed, was also in a concentration camp, in which she composed a poem that says, "I cannot hate. They beat me. They trample me under their feet. I cannot hate. They throw stones at me. I cannot hate. I can only weep bitterly."

A high human achievement-to restrain from sentiments of hatred. God gives more: the power to love the enemy.

Love toward the enemy does not mean avoiding the confrontation with evil. Jesus fought against the merchants in the temple and against the Pharisees. Jesus does not mean for us to flatter the enemy, to embrace him. He did not fall around Caiaphas's neck, neither did He offer Himself as His partner in evil deeds.

Love toward the enemy means to understand him better than he understands himself. His hatred blinds him. You can look with unbiased mind upon his position, too. To love the enemy means that, in defending yourself, you will not be obliged to use his methods. To love him means, like Jesus, to take upon yourself his guilt; to consider his sin as being yours and to atone for it by acts of goodness toward him and his victims.

Having the example of Christ before our eyes, we can do this through the power of His Spirit.

"We glory in tribulations." (ROM 5:3)

Therese of Lisieux was helping with the washing in the convent. A sister opposite her splashed dirty water in her face every time she lifted up a piece of wet clothing from the ledge.

Therese's first instinct was to step back and wipe her face, as a suggestion to her sister that she did wrong. All at once the thought occurred to her, "You're a fool not to take what comes frees" So she decided rather to hide her annoyance. She cultivated instead a liking for dirty water. In the end she became so fond of it that she came back at other times for this happy "dip."

Isaiah had predicted the most cruel sufferings for Jesus. It would have seemed normal for Jesus to shun the reading and pondering of this book. On the contrary, it was His favorite. Isaiah is the only author whom Jesus praises-"Well did Esaias prophesy of you" (MTT 15:7). Welcome the evils of which you are apprehensive; look difficulties straight in the face. They will not haunt you any more.

A Soviet Christian was asked, "How could you bear tortures?" He answered, "Since I was converted, I daydreamed of being tortured, knowing that this would be my fate, as another man would have erotic imaginations. When I passed through them, they could not break me anymore."

Whoever embraces the feet of Jesus crucified, embraces also the beam of the cross. Whosoever wishes to follow Him, has to daily take His cross. Make the cross your joyful expectation. It will become a source of blessing.

Abraham, just when He showed Himself ready to make the highest sacrifice, received the blessing from God that in his seed all the nations would be blessed and that his offspring would be like the stars of heaven and the sand of the sea (GEN 22:17).

"Death passed upon all men." (ROM 5:12)

In St. Lawrence's church in Nuremberg there is a statue called "The woman of the world." She is shown as having a beautiful face and ornamented with jewelry. This is how she looks from one side. From the other side, you see something entirely different: a skeleton on which serpents creep.

St. Francis de Sales advised a Christian, who was a lady at the royal court of France and was obliged to attend parties dressed in beautiful dresses, to escape vanity through spending a few moments before the mirror and imagining how she would look as a skeleton with only a skull instead of a head.

These might not be pleasant thoughts, but nothing is surer than our death. The mortuary is the surest business. It is foolish to try to flee the thought of death.

Jesus knew that He would die, but He could defy death. He said, "Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up" (JHN 2:19). Paul could also defy death, "If our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God" (2CO 5:1).

To receive life eternal is easy. Jesus said in JHN 5:24, "Verily, verily I say unto you, He that heareth my word, and believeth on him that sent me, hath everlasting life."

Believe on the Lord Jesus now and you will know for sure that death is not your end. It will be the entrance into a glorious life.

"[He] took upon him the form of a servant." (PHP 2:7)

Etymologically compassion means to suffer with our fellow man. Rich men and men in high position, as well as middle-class men, must learn to see how the world looks from below. They feast at Christmas but have not caught its meaning.

Jesus came to earth to experience what it is like when heaven disappoints: when one is hungry and it does not rain manna; when one's only shelter is a stable though he is not an ox; when one is crucified and people under the cross are gambling; when one cries to God and gets no response.

Could men of the middle and upper classes not try the same experience? Why should they not go hungry for a few weeks, as their brethren do without any guilt in Mali or Bangladesh?

Jesus says that a thief can enter heaven, but a black person or a badly dressed man cannot enter a rich man's garden. The thief can play with the angels, but the poor child cannot play with the child of the rich.

The dog lies on the sofa with his mistress, but the servant who has worked the whole day to tidy the garden and the maid with the swollen feet who stood the whole day in the kitchen are not invited to sit down.

I know there are many arguments against such an excessively mild behavior with the poor. It might do them harm. The question is not what arguments the rich and the middle classes have, but how these things look from below, for the sixty percent of mankind who are starving or at least badly fed.

Jesus teaches us not to give to poor men kept at the right distance, but to call the poor, the maimed, the lame, the blind, the most disgusting persons into our homes when we have a feast (LUK 14:13). He called you, a wretched sinner, to come to heaven.

"I travail in birth again until Christ be formed in you." (GAL 4:19)

Jesus surely was not born on December 25. The cold is very piercing during the nights in December near Jerusalem. It was not the custom of the Jewish shepherds to watch their flocks in the fields so late.

The Bible does not tell us the date when Jesus became man. The 25th of December was a holiday and an occasion of a carnival in the Roman Empire in honor of the sun. The Christians took advantage of this occasion, when the persecuting authorities had greater difficulty detecting them, to celebrate the birth of Jesus-but not only His physical birth that had happened at a certain date in history. They celebrated the daily miracle of Jesus' birth in the souls of those who had accepted Him as Savior.

Jesus was born in a stable and put in a manger. It was wrong that the shepherds, who each had at least a hut, and the wise men, who might have had comfortable houses, allowed the newborn King to remain in a manger on the hay. They should have taken him into their homes. Jesus' place is not in a manger. The less so is it on a cross. He is not happy to stay in heaven either. The place He longs for is in our hearts. That is where He wants to live.

The moment He is born there and I become for Him a Mary - that is the real Christmas. He said that He wished to have a mother for Himself. "Whosoever shall do the will of my Father which is in heaven, the same is ... my mother" (MTT 12:50).

Celebrate Christmas in this sense.

"Unto us a child is born." (ISA 9:6)

In the Hebrew original this prophecy about the coming of the Savior continues as follows: "Unto us a son is given; and the government shall be upon his shoulder: and his, name s,hall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, heroic God (~El Ghibor~)...."

It was surely a heroic decision to leave heaven and the world of angels, having decided for Himself to be born in a stable, to be in danger of death from early childhood, to live an entire life of sorrow which end would be crucifixion, for the salvation of mankind who would show no gratitude for this sacrifice. Our Lord knew that ultimately good would triumph because of this sacrifice, so He made it.

Christmas is the memorial of the birth of a heroic God.

The main feature of His followers is heroism. Shallowness and lukewarmness do not belong to Christianity.

A renowned preacher, whose father had been a drunkard and his mother a pious, woman, was taught by the latter from early childhood a particular spiritual exercise. He would put on the floor a wine glass, playing cards, dice, pornographic magazines, some money, his own picture, and would trample on it all, shouting, "No! No!" And again, "No! No!" Then he would say to himself, "I belong to a heroic God, and I will always say 'No!' to any temptation to sin."

Let us commemorate the Nativity of a divine hero, forsaking the comfortable ways and making the decision which all heroes in history have made: "To win or to perish, but never to yield."

"If any man will come after me, let him deny himself."

A boy of twelve was asked what he wished to become. He answered, "A missionary in Africa."
"Why?"
"Because then I will be able to hunt lions."
Many of us have the same mentality. We wish to become good Christians. Why? In order to have a better piece of heaven.
The right motive for being a good Christian is to be able to bear a heavier beam of the cross of Christ. The man who is born again wishes to be a better Christian so that in the future, when he passes through sorrows, his first question should not be, "How can I escape?" but, "How can I be useful to the kingdom of God in this new situation?"
We have no sufferings accidentally. They are all foreordained by a loving God. The ship with the apostles passed through a tempest (MTT 8:23-27). The Lord wished to teach them how to cope with a storm. They would have to face many.
He will awake in time if you are in danger of perishing. Until then, suffer silently and work and fight valiantly. It is for this that you were called to be a Christian, not only to enjoy heaven.
Missionaries are not sent to Africa for the thrill of lion hunting.

"Teach all nations." (MTT 28:19)

Pope Gregory, the Great, received this honored title, even though he was a small man, because of one persistent merit. It was he who, in 596, began the mission among the Anglo-Saxons.
The Christianized Anglo-Saxons became a blessing to the whole world. Boniface, an Englishman, Christianized the Germans. Willibrord, also English, converted the Flemish people; Patrick won the Irish to Christ. The creation of the British empire gave the Anglo-Saxons the possibility of spreading Christianity to Asia, Africa, and Australia.
Anglo-Saxons brought the evangelical faith to the United States. Even now, 60 percent of all missionaries and so percent of all mission finances come from the United States.
To keep Christianity alive in the Anglo-Saxon world is of utter strategic importance. Missionaries must go to the farthest shores, but let us not forget that Christianity is decaying in the Anglo-Saxon world.

Only 3 percent of the population of the British Isles goes to church. In America seven out of ten teen-agers never cross the threshold of a church. Seventy percent of the population is unchurched.

Let us pray for the churches in the Anglo-Saxon world.

"[If] I bow down myself in the house of Rimmon, the Lord pardon thy servant in this thing. And [Elisha] said unto him: Go in peace." (2KI 5:18,19)

A Jewish legend says that Moses overheard a shepherd boy praying, "God, if You would appear to me, I would give you wool, milk, and meat for free. If You have some sheep, I would lead them to pasture, without asking for any pay. I would comb Your hair, wash Your robe, and kiss Your hand." Moses was shocked and shouted to the boy to stop it because the prayer was blasphemous.

Then God appeared to Moses and admonished him for what he had done. God told Moses that he had found pleasure in this naive prayer of the boy, more than in the sophisticated prayers of the know-it-alls.

Be wise in handling the false and primitive religious views of others. For someone who only goes to church, never witnessing for Christ to others, the church-going might be the Christianity of a shy person. A wrong belief in one of the many cults must not be interpreted as wickedness. It can be a transit from worldliness to the knowledge of God. The person gropes in darkness, but he might grope for the right thing. Give him some advice delicately, but do not destroy the little light he has.

As a principle, be stingy in giving advice in religious mattes. Ask yourself earnestly how much advice you are ready to take. This should be the dosage of advice imparted by you to others.

"I besought the Lord thrice, that [the messenger of Satan] might depart from me. And he said unto me, My grace is sufficient for thee." (2CO 12:8,9)

Two days remain until the end of the year. We remember the many blessings we received this year, but also the fact that so many desires of the heart and prayers have remained unanswered.

A saint was renowned for having his prayers on behalf of others answered. He was asked, "If this is the case, why then don't you pray that your infirmity should be removed?" He was blind.

He answered, "Submission to the will of God is preferable to the satisfaction of my personal pleasure at being able to see."

Be thankful for answered prayer and accept the will of God for the cases in which you have been refused. He knows best what you need.

Unanswered prayers may have been prayers uttered in ignorance, not knowing the harm which their fulfillment would occasion. A time might come when you will thank God that they have not been fulfilled.

Monica was sad that her prayer for her son, Augustine, was not answered. She had prayed that he would remain with her. He led a wicked life, inclined toward all kinds of occult teachings, and forsook his mother, though she had prayed to the contrary.

Augustine went to Milan, where he met Bishop Ambrose. This led to his conversion. He later became one of the greatest teachers the Christian church has ever had.

"He became poor, that ye through his poverty might be rich." (2CO 8:9)

Recapitulating what we have done this year, we remember our many sins. They have many causes. One of them might be that we do not have the right spiritual teacher.

Beware of religious teachers who have a great following. It is possible they as frauds. If they would tell the full truth, their audience would diminish.

Jesus had thousands around Him when He multiplied bread or healed. His teachings, however, were not accepted by the crowd.

Would the crowd flock to your teacher? Would you follow him if he practiced and taught poverty according to the word of the Master, "Blessed be ye poor" (LUK 6:20)?

A saint was offered some money. He refused with the words, "I have the money necessary for today's good."

"The money you have will not last long," he was told. "Take and you will have for the following days."

He replied, "Guarantee me that I will live longer than my few coins will suffice me, and I will accept your money."

Seek the teacher who will tell you not to worry about the many things you lack, but to be content with the few things you have. Jesus though He was rich, yet for your sakes He became poor (2CO 8:9).

The verb "to have" does not exist in Hebrew. Only God is the possessor of all things. You can possess the possessor of all things. Seek the teacher who will teach you not only how to be content, but how to be jubilant about having God.

"Teach us to number our days." (PSA 90:12)

The year has passed. Let all the troubles, sins, and quarrels of the past year pass with it. For our sins there is forgiveness in the blood of Christ. Next year will bring its own troubles. No need to bring into the trouble of the year which is no more. The quarrels have lost their importance.

A couple, prompted by love, had married. They sat at the table and hugged each other. Suddenly she became afraid. "Did you see?" she exclaimed. "A mouse ran by and entered into the hole there to the right."

He calmed her. "It can do nothing to you. I saw it. A little thing. It entered into the hole to the left."

She insisted that it was the right hole. He used his authority as a husband to impress upon her that he was correct; it must have been in the other hole. They divorced because of this question.

After seven years of separation, friends succeeded in making peace between them. They remarried and sat in the same room at the table. She said, "How stupid we have been to quarrel about a mouse that entered into that hole to the right."

He shouted, "You're starting again?" They divorced the second time. It was forever. Are all our quarrels really less ridiculous than this?

Now another year has gone by. With a year we have come nearer to our appointment with God. What will all our worries and our conflicts which we considered so important count for on the day of His judgment?

Let us examine earnestly what has been amiss during the past year, and start the new year with confidence. We will have in the new year: God, the Savior, the Spirit, the protecting angel. We can be confident.

Prologue

The Rev. Richard Wurmbrand is an evangelical minister of Jewish descent. Most of his family members died in the Holocaust. He endured more than fourteen years of Fascist and Communist imprisonment and torture in his homeland of Romania. He is one of Romania's most widely known Christian leaders, authors, and educators.

In 1945, when Soviet troops invaded Romania and the new Communist regime attempted to control the churches for its own purposes, Richard Wurmbrand immediately began an effective, vigorous "underground" ministry to his enslaved people and to the Russian soldiers. He was finally arrested in 1948, along with his wife Sabina. Sabina served three years as a slave-laborer. Richard Wurmbrand spent three years in solitary confinement - seeing no one but his Communist torturers. Following this period, he was transferred to a mass cell five years, There the torture continued.

Due to his international stature as a Christian leader, diplomats of foreign embassies made inquiries about his safety to the Communist government. They were told he had fled Romania. Secret police, posing as released fellow-prisoners, told his wife stories of attending his burial in the prison cemetery. His family in Romania and his friends abroad were all told to forget him since he was now dead. After spending eight years in prison, Rev. Wurmbrand was released. He promptly resumed his work with the underground Church. Two years later, in 1959, he was re-arrested and sentenced to 25 years in prison.

Rev. Wurmbrand was released in a general amnesty in 1964, and again he continued his underground ministry. Realizing the great danger of a third imprisonment, Christians in Norway negotiated with the Communist authorities for his release from Romania; the Communist government had begun "selling" its political prisoners. The "going price" for a prisoner was set at $1,900, but the price for Wurmbrand was $10,000.

In May 1966, Richard Wurmbrand testified in Washington, D.C. before the Senate's Internal Security Subcommittee. He stripped to the waist to show eighteen deep torture wounds covering hi body. His story was carried across the world in newspapers throughout the U.S., Europe, and Asia. In September 1966, Wurmbrand was warned that the Romanian Communist regime had made a decision to assassinate him, yet even in the face of these threats, he refused to be silent. He has been called the "voice of the Underground Church." Christian leaders have referred to him as a "living martyr" and the "Iron Curtain Paul."

In October 1967, Richard and Sabina Wurmbrand founded a non-profit missionary organization to bring assistance to persecuted Christians around the world. Today, ~The Voice of the Martyrs, Inc.~, directed by Pastor Wurmbrand, continues to carry out this work.

Preface

~If anyone speaks, let him speak as the oracles of God...~ (1PE 4:11).

Did you ever meet a person who speaks ~as the oracles of God~? Do you speak like this? If not, why not? If this Scripture is from God, every bit of speech that is not spoken as His oracle is grave sin. Oracles was a name given to certain priestesses or priests in heathen religions of the past through which sure revelations were given.

How does one arrive at speaking like an oracle? This is the subject of the present book. Would it seem presumptuous to you if I would say that I speak as an oracle of God? But why would a Christian dare to write a book if he would not be convinced of this?

I am not bound to think and write only about dictatorships and jails, nor only about missionary practices. This time I wrote a book with the thoughts about God and human life.

page xvi The Oracles of God

I had most of these thoughts when I was alone in a solitary cell, 30 feet beneath the earth, never, but never, seeing sun, moon, stars, trees, flowers, birds, butterflies. I never saw any other color than gray - the gray of the walls and of our prison uniform. I never heard a voice except the insults of those who watched us.

Don't wonder if some of these thoughts will seem strange.

The same One who said, "Don't murder, don't steal," said, "Speak as my oracles." Ponder about this.

Pastor Richard Wurmbrand

Introduction

A soldier in need approached Alexander the Great and asked for some money. The emperor, who knew the bravery of this soldier in battle, refused, but instead made him ruler over one of his cities. Overcome by such royal largesse, the soldier demurred, exclaiming, "This gift is too big for me!"

"That may be," responded the emperor. "But it is not too great a gift on the part of a king."

As you begin to read this book, you anticipate another collection of human thoughts to be found within its covers. It is proper for you to not ask for much. But I write in the name of Christ, for whom it is customary to give more than a man usually expects. He is the King of Kings. ~When one writes in His name or speaks on His behalf, he is expected to speak the oracles of God~ (see 1PE 4:11).

Shakespeare might have meant just such a man when he wrote:

page xviii The Oracles of God

"His words are bonds, his oaths are oracles. His love sincere, his thoughts immaculate, His tears pure messages, sent from his heart, His heart as far from fraud, as heaven from earth."

In mystery religions of old (as in the Lamaists' religion of today), some priests or priestesses were put into a trance-like state through drugs, dances, or incense, and what they spoke in this condition was thought to come from their god and was therefore deemed an "oracle."

The one who writes or preaches in the name of Christ is meant to be God-intoxicated, a person who has first received the kiss of God.

For not savoring the mind of God, the Lord once reproached Peter: "...You are not mindful of the things of God, but the things of men" (MTT 16:23).

Any man who deals with religious matters, not only the apostles, should not open his mouth unless what he says is a revelation from God. It might be but a little drop from the sea, but it must still be from the sea itself. His words must savor of the things of God.

The Hebrew language has strange expressions for our terms "to speak" or "to tell"; we consider every word expressed, however foolish, as falling into the category of "speaking," not so the Jews. It is in their genius to believe that the word is divine. For "to speak" they use ~ledaber~, akin to ~davar~, which is used for "word." But ~davar~ is also the word for "thing." Hebrew words are real things, not simply talk. ~Ledaber~ means "to communicate a reality."

Another word for "to speak" is ~le-omer~, from the root ~amir~, which means the highest branch of a tree. A man's words are worthy only if he speaks at the highest level he can reach.

For "to tell," the word is ~le-saper~, from ~saper~ meaning "sapphire." "To tell" is to give another a jewel. If you have a jewel to give, talk. If not, keep silent.

It is a risky thing for an author to write a book such as this, but I do so because I love you, my reader.

This book, then, contains the oracles of God.

Some readers may already be laughing skeptically: "What an absurd claim, to speak of oracles of God!" Countless men throughout the ages have claimed to speak such oracles and some still do. All the false prophets and messiahs among the Jewish people, founders of new religions like Mohammed and of new sects like Joseph Smith and Mary Baker Eddy not only claimed, but also sincerely believed, that they spoke the oracles of God. All the promoters of heresies have done so, as did the inquisitors. Hitler and Khomeini spoke as if they were voices of Providence.

So why do I make such a claim?

Well, if you have already begun to laugh, I will tell you a joke to make you laugh even more.

A man named George wanted to sell his horse and therefore boasted among his acquaintances, "My horse is indeed unique. In the morning I send him to the baker and to the dairy, and he brings me bread and milk, as well as the newspaper. The horse knows the way from my home to the office and back. I give him free rein in the evening, and he takes me to my club."

Tom was deeply impressed and paid $2,000 to obtain this remarkable horse.

After much time had passed, George and Tom met at a party. Tom immediately launched into a dismal recital of the horse's inadequacies: "It only likes to enjoy itself, and it is lazy and stubborn when you want to saddle it up for a ride. It doesn't understand any of the things I want it to do."

George warned Tom, "Stop talking like that or you won't be able to sell the horse. I got a good price because I praised it!"

Obviously, only highly touted political and religious convictions are accepted by the populace. Anyone who wants to propagate an idea must boast of its merits. Every salesman for a product has to claim that it is the best.

But one idea, one product, is really the best. The idea of a "best product" cannot be discarded simply because lesser products are also touted as "top of the line."

Of the many pretended oracles of God, some are genuine, some false. It is up to you to determine whether or not what I write is indeed a genuine sapphire.

Every book on metaphysical or religious matters will be useless or even harmful if the reader does not have the gift of a discerning spirit. He must be able to find out if what is presented to him is actually a message from God.

If a book only amuses, then enjoy it and have a little fun. If it claims to be from God but does not contain a message from Him, don't waste time on it. If it does, then you are obliged to accept its ideas in a spirit of obedience. The Master speaks through the author, and you will have to fulfill what He says.

When a reader seeking treasure encounters a writer with jewels to share, amazing things can happen. But the character and frame of mind of the reader must be part of the equation. Then if the writer speaks truth, the reader can expect sure and salutary results.

But be very sure about the writer. Ask yourself whether God speaks through him to your soul, whether the devil speaks, or if this is some human being merely expressing his own thoughts. Most readers, or listeners, are remarkably inattentive.

An experiment was carried out in Israel. The well-known radio announcer Kishon read a novel on the radio, beginning with the last chapter and ending with the first. Then he read only the odd pages of another novel. Later he announced a novel and read the State budget. Only one man was moved to complain.

People swallow bad books, bad sermons, and bad lectures with the same ease with which they swallow good ones - I would even say with greater ease.

Only if you are wary can the reading of this book be of value to you.

* * *

I present this book with the claim that it contains an important message.

What God has for you in this book is not an ordinary gift. Earthly gifts may provide great pleasure, but ultimately they are vain.

In Iran, near the town of Shiraz, there is a small, simple tomb with this inscription: "Man, whosoever you are, and whenever you will come, because I know that you will come, I tell you that I am Emperor Cyrus and that I conquered for the Persians the dominion of the world. Leave me at least with this little piece of land that covers my body." This minimal request has not been fulfilled; his tomb has been depredated.

The earthly gifts God provides are temporary. In time, wicked men or the forces of nature will take them from us. He gives us earthly gifts while making it clear from the beginning they are but tokens that should open our hearts to receive the one great eternal gift reserved for us. This gift is what this book is all about.

I wonder how many of you have ever played cards. If you have, you know that it is neither advantageous nor fun to play with open cards. The challenge and enjoyment lie in not knowing another's cards, in guessing and surmising which cards your opponent may hold. God keeps man in suspense; man doesn't know what trump cards God is holding. An author representing God through his books must do likewise.

I do not want to tell you what God's gift is until I have prepared your heart to receive it. I want to awaken within you a state of intense desire for the unknown and the invisible. I put all my soul into what I write

page 1 Chapter 1: Possess the Truth

A perceptive child can often spot insincerity or indifference. In Sunday school, when the teacher recounted the story of Jesus' sufferings and death, a child remarked, "The story is not true."

Taken aback, the teacher asked, "What makes you say that?"

"If it were true," the boy replied quietly, "you could not tell it without weeping."

Sorrily, some Christian writers, authors of religious hymns, and preachers are boring; others are very good but burn out quickly; and some become soul-less - perhaps it is because they spend too much of their souls on their work without taking due precautions to refill them daily.

William Cowper wrote the renowned hymn:

"There is a fountain, filled with blood,
Drawn from Emmanuel's veins,

And sinners plunged beneath that flood
Lose all their guilty stains.
The dying thief rejoiced to see
That fountain in his day,
And there may I, though vile as he,
Wash all my sins away."

One feels there is life in this song. Cowper poured into it the blood of his own heart. In his old age, he suffered several bouts of insanity; he who had written that "the precious blood shall never lose its power" doubted during his depressions that his own sins were washed away by Christ's sacrifice.

It is necessary that we allow ourselves to be cleansed and purified.

To be in error is a dreadful thing, but it is even worse to embrace truth for the wrong reasons: because it is convenient, because it is pleasant, because it is profitable, because it is socially acceptable. God wants us to love the truth. It is the water of life He offers us. Don't adulterate it with pollutants.

Love truth for its own sake, and it will come to you.

***

The one who claims to speak the oracles of God must expect to be asked many questions.

He can be asked, first of all, "Who are you to make this claim?"

page 3 Chapter 1: Possess the Truth

Every "I" contains a multifaceted "we." We have within us a long history of I's, many sides of our personality. Which of my I's speaks oracles?

If the different faces of the self alternate and I think one thing at one time and something else at another, or if at times I live my unconscious life without thinking, then what happens in my mind at one moment can contradict what happened a few moments before, and I can be certain of nothing. Can something uncertain be the oracle of God?

To claim certainty is mostly a pose. It is not reasonable to always be certain, to know things absolutely, when every event has so many faces, most of which are beyond our ken anyway.

Furthermore, there is no such thing as a state of perpetual illumination. Just as it is impossible to be in a constant state of ecstasy or to stand on tiptoe without relaxation, so it is also impossible to administer truth 24 hours a day, although we may have access to it.

The apostle Peter said one day, under divine inspiration, that Jesus was the Son of God. After a few minutes, another "I" of Peter said such terrible things that Jesus called him "satan." Peter boasted that even if everyone else forsook Jesus, he would not. This was, again, another ~I~; then he denied ever having known Jesus - another ~I~. Later he repented with tears and received the commission to feed Jesus'

sheep, which he also did. (See MTT 16:17-23; MTT 26:7; JHN 21:16-17.)

Legend says that when persecution erupted in Rome, Peter fled. Again, that was another I. While fleeing, he realized that what he was doing was wrong. He returned and died a martyr's death for Christ, asking to be crucified head-down because he did not deserve to die like Jesus. Peter had many I's. That is why he had three names in the Bible: Simon, Cephas, and Peter. It is this same Peter who teaches us in his epistle to speak the oracles of God. Which of the I's of Peter spoke oracles?

We all have many I's. I have had many opinions and convictions in life that I later abandoned. What then authorizes me to believe that today as I write these lines, I am speaking the oracles of God? What about all the things I said yesterday? And what of that I will speak tomorrow?

How can one find out for himself which of his many opinions are the truth of God? Peter, the man who said so many wrong things and vacillated so much, who was publicly accused by St. Paul of prevarication (GAL 2:11 ff), might have wondered himself which of his sayings, if any, were oracles.

How can one choose among the many who claim to speak the oracles of God? Does an objective, sure truth exist? If so, how can one find it?

The oracle of God must tell me, first of all, what an oracle of God is and must then accredit itself as such. The question is an important one, a critical one, but don't try to get quick answers.

Foreign lecturers speaking in Japan have wondered why students don't reply to questions put to them. But in their culture an immediate reply shows contempt for the speaker. It means that his questions are of so little importance that anyone can answer them without difficulty. Therefore the proper reaction to a question is not a quick reply, but meditation upon it, indicating that the question and the questioner deserve respect.

The number of conflicts in families, churches, and society at large would be greatly reduced if spouses, children, parents, parties, leaders, and states would forego the felt need to respond immediately to every question and instead make each question an object of loving, or at least civil, mediation.

Therefore, my advice to you is not to swallow this book in a hurry. Read a portion, then meditate. To make this easier, I have divided the book into small, bite-size portions.

But is there no hurry to find the truth?

St. Augustine says, "You would never have sought the truth if you had not already found it." "The truth induces men to seek the truth," said St. Makarios the Great. And Blaise Pascal wrote, "We could not seek God unless in some real sense we already possessed Him." The fact that you seek truth, that you

page 6 Chapter 1: The Oracles of God

ask for it, shows you have a love for it. Love for truth is an essential part of truth itself. If you seek it earnestly, you can afford to sit down quietly, like Mary Magdalene.

Which is more real to you, your problem or yourself? You existed before you posed the question to yourself about finding truth. How many hours a day do you seek it even now? You are much bigger and more important than your search for truth.

Don't throw away the whole of your life for this particular, though valuable, preoccupation - this search for truth. Live your life. When you work, work. When you eat, eat. When you sleep, sleep. When you amuse yourself, amuse yourself. Truth and life are good companions. They are friends, not enemies. You don't have to exclude the one in order to have the other. Jesus said, "I am the Way." What does this "Way" consist of? He explained Himself immediately: "the Truth ~and~ the Life." (See JHN 14:6.)

Take it easy, take one step at a time, and you will reach the truth. Meanwhile, be yourself.

Truth is the supreme goal, except that truth alone can be found nowhere, just as one cannot find either iron or gold alone in the earth; they exist only in combination with other elements.

Jesus said, "I am the way, the truth ~and~ the life" (JHN 14:6). If one wishes to know truth, he must know life too. If he wishes to fulfill the demands of truth, he must be attentive to the demands of life as well.

page 7 Chapter 1: Possess the Truth

St. Paul taught us to beware of vain philosophy (COL 2:8).

Long ago there lived a king who had a very valuable stallion. He appointed a watchman to do nothing else but guard the magnificent animal during the night. To satisfy his concerns, the king arose at night and went to the guard.

"What are you doing?" he asked.

"Well, your majesty, I was just reflecting on why a circle is round and a square rectangular."

The king exclaimed, "I am happy to have in my service a real philosopher. Just continue."

Later in the night, the king went again and asked the watchman, "What were you doing now?"

"I was trying to find out what happens to the hole in a bagel after it is eaten. I did not eat the hole, but notwithstanding it has disappeared."

The king was very pleased to have a soldier with such interesting thoughts. He came a third time and asked the watchman, "What now? What are you thinking?"

"Now I have a really serious problem. There was a stallion in the stable. It is no longer there. Where could it be?"

For the sake of philosophy, he had lost the stallion of truth.

Seek the truth, but be careful not to destroy your life and the lives of other men for the sake of philosophizing about truth. Without men, where will the truth settle and of what good will it be?

The story is told that Pol Pot, the Communist dictator of Cambodia, declared, "I have a truth that will make my people happy."

He was asked, "What if your people do not accept your formula of truth?"

He replied, "I will kill all those who oppose truth. Truth is for me above all things." Out of a population of five million, he killed two million of his own people.

This is the attitude of the inquisitors of all convictions. This is the philosophy of those who tyrannize their families, forcing them to accept what they consider as truth.

God says, "You shall therefore keep My statutes and My judgments, which if a man does, ~he shall live by them...~" (LEV 18:5).

Truth is given that you and others might live by it, not die by it.

Be careful. Be forewarned.

A sage had a disciple called Moses. When he called, the disciple would reply, "Yes," and come immediately. The master would then tell him a few things, but with a disappointed expression on his face. Moses did not understand why. Again and again, the master would call, "Moses!" Each time

Moses would reply, "Yes," and elicit the same reaction. Eventually he came to the conclusion that his answer "Yes" was not what his master desired.

He changed, and for a time, as often as the master called, "Moses!" he replied, "Here I am." But neither did this answer satisfy the sage, though he continued to impart love to his disciple and to teach him the ways of God.

One day Moses had an illumination, and when the master called, "Moses!" he came, smiled, and said, "I understood." With this, he left his master forever.

The master gave a sign of relief. Moses had become himself. He now knew he was Moses and no longer had to be the copy of his master.

Likewise, I urge you to develop a personality that is able to discern the truth among the many lies that are told.

You may be sure that truth exists. There is no doubt about this. Socrates already showed the fallacy of the contrary assertion.

The Sophist philosopher Gorgias had asserted "Truth does not exist." Socrates challenged these words in a conversation with Kriton, a disciple of Gorgias. He asked the younger man, "Does Gorgias believe what he says?"

"Yes."

page 10 Chapter 1: The Oracles of God

"Then Gorgias contradicts himself."

"How?"

"According to the teaching of your master, no truth exists, yet he considers this, his assertion, to be true. Then he does acknowledge something to be true."

No one can escape the belief that men can know sure truth. If we say, "Everything we know is relative," then this knowledge of ours, that everything known only relatively, is an absolute truth? Everything we postulate is based on just such an assumption. So there exists a kernel of the absolute even in the midst of relativity.

There exist sure oracles.

The Bible calls the Creator "The God of Truth" (PSA 31:5). There is a legend that the blood that flowed from Jesus on Golgotha formed the Hebrew words ~Ani ha-emet~, "I am the truth." We can know a truth.

Socrates said, "I know that I know nothing." This assertion may exhibit modesty, but it can be accepted only with certain qualifications. It is simply not true that Socrates knew nothing. He knew the Greek language. He knew the whole alphabet. He knew grammar-substantives, verbs, conjugations. He knew how to think, how to speak. There always exists a core of sure truth at the heart of what is doubtful and relative in our thinking.

The problem is, we confuse knowing the truth with understanding it. "I have not understood a bar of music in my life, but I have felt it." said Igor Stravinsky. "I shut my eyes in order to see," said the painter Paul Gaugin.

Anna Pavlova, the renowned dancer, when asked once to explain her pirouettes, replied to the interviewer, "If I could say it, I would not have danced it." If painters could say, in words, what they know, they would not resort to the brush and the palette. Einstein and other creative scientists have expressed their need to think in images. Words alone cannot yield the truth.

I have learned much about God not only from the words of Christian hymns, but also from the Gregorian chanting in Orthodox churches and from the music of Bach and others.

Only a small part of truth can be understood: The rest must be caught as an intense longing for a beautiful, loving, harmonious world. Truth is something much better than a set of ideas.

All music critics evaluate the notes played on instruments. But what about the music of the pauses between the notes?

Before being confined in Communist prisons for fourteen years, I believed that the whole Bible as written was the truth. In jail I discovered that in reality I had considered as truth only the black letters of the Bible, without paying attention to the white spaces between the letters, words, and chapters.

In the Bible, Jesus is called "the Word," not the sentence. He is the Word surrounded by white space, the white margins and blank pages within the Bible. Many of the most interesting truths are written with invisible ink on these white spaces.

What did Jesus say to the priests when He conversed with them in the temple at the age of twelve? What did He do between twelve and thirty? What is meant by the assertion that after His crucifixion He descended into hell? What happened after the resurrection between the times He appeared to His disciples?

Learn also from the greater Christ of the white pages, and you will know.

All this may sound irrational, but what if some truth is irrational? It could not be otherwise because there is much that is beyond reason in the universe. Any effort to understand it only by rational means will be futile and superficial.

The chief features of the world are, at one pole conflict and struggle, the clash of antithetical forces, and at the opposite pole, ardent love. Human life is not all rational. It is a madman like Hitler beguiling the German people, then considered rational, with the senseless slogan "Blood and soil," and a loving

priest like Maximilian Kolbe throwing away his life in Auschwitz for a man he never knew. To tell an SS officer he wanted to die in place of another prisoner was foolish. Logic would have taught him that the officer would laugh and kill them both.

Bergson said in ~Creative Evolution~: "The intellect is characterized by a natural inability to comprehend life. Instinct, on the contrary, is molded on the very form of life."

In the search for truth, do not rely on intellect alone. Golgotha means in Aramaic "place of the skull." When Jesus was taken there, He was crucified. If you wish Him to live, bring Him to the place of the heart!

Use instinct, intuition, feeling, faith, a high ideal, a noble dream that should become the truth. Do not be the lackey of truth, saying only what it orders, but be its master and make of reality what your heart dictates in its best moments.

A certain painter, when reproached that his portraits did not look like the subject, replied that it was not his business to exactly replicate how a person looked, but to challenge the person to become like the picture he painted.

This is exactly how God paints the faithful soul. She is called in Scripture "the fairest among women," "A lily among thorns," "without spot or wrinkle" (SOS 6:9; 2:2; EPH 5:27). Rationalists would say this is simply not true. The description does not show the Church as it is. It was never God's intention merely to describe how it is, but to tell us how it should be. This is the image God has of us, and He expects us to conform to it.

It is interesting to note that only in the English language does the word translated "to realize" have the double meaning "to understand, to be aware of," and also "to cause something to be." This is how truth is molded.

* * *

Truth, when communicated in words, is no longer pure truth. It passes through a censorship.

The Wycliffe Bible translators on the Solomon Islands were fined a pig and ten dollars in cash for having used the name "Momoli" in a story in a reading primer. It was simply a contrived name, but it happened to coincide with name of an ancestor who was worshiped.

The translators soon found out they must be cautious. The common word for "sea" - ~asi~ - also had to be avoided because in the past it was the name of an important man. Now it was forbidden.

Another taboo is pronouncing the names of in-laws. Once in a church there was a Scripture reading from the Book of First Peter. The person who read the text accordingly said, "The reading this morning is from the first of my father-in-law, chapter one."

On Misima Island, off Papua, New Guinea, a person who had an in-law with a name that sounded like the word for "big" had to stop singing hymns whenever he came to that word. It was taboo.

We smile about these backward people. But can we express freely in "civilized" nations all we know to be true? Don't we often have to use euphemisms?

It is taboo to speak to children about one of the most dramatic aspects of life, which they will understand only when they are already involved in it. But then it is too late to learn.

In Germany after the defeat of Hitler, the word "fatherland" could no longer be used. It was considered a dirty word.

In psychoanalysis, both the patient and the doctor try to construct out of isolated threads a story that makes sense. When the psychoanalyst and his patient converse, they intentionally invest happenings with a coherence that may not have existed in reality. The facts of life are shaped to give them meaning and purpose. Both use literary skill.

We all try to give sense to everything, instead of acknowledging that nonsense is also part of reality.

A religious person usually romanticizes the story of his conversion. In Jesus' parable of the prodigal son, the youth, reduced to utter misery, returns to his father (who symbolizes God) for the simple reason that at home he would have better food. If the prodigal son had told the story himself, he might have said that a longing of his heart after Heaven made him return to his father's house.

It takes only one black sheep to prove that all sheep are not white. If there were only one deformation of truth, it would be enough to assure us that not all stories and thoughts parading as truth are true. But falsehoods are multiplied without number.

Humanity by itself has no truth and cannot obtain it. Truth can only descend to us from a higher sphere.

There exists an unconscious wisdom called faith. The smallest notion of the unconscious soul is more important and true than the noblest production of our conscious thoughts. God loves to dwell in the darkness of the unconscious. There resides the truth for which the conscious has to fish.

The Sufite Mohammedan sect has a legend about Jesus, told in a beautiful book by Indris Shah.

According to this legend, Jesus once saw a group of sad people who, when asked about their grief, replied, "We fear we may go to hell." Then He saw another group who also looked very depressed and wept.

"What troubles you?" He asked.

"We heard there is a splendid paradise, and we tremble that we might miss it."

page 17 Chapter 1: Possess the Truth

Then He met a third group, all worn out but with faces full of joy. "What makes you so radiant?" He queried.

"Here and there we have obtained some little bits of truth, and we have within us a spirit that promises us even more. We now see things more and more as they really are. With what little truth we have, we realize that nothing else matters to us."

Jesus said, "These are the people who attain.
They will see the face of God."

Seekers after truth generally begin with the presumption that truth is a response to the question "What?" This is wrong.

Pilate put the question, to which he got no reply: "What is truth?" (JHN 18:38). Before him stood the incarnate Truth, but he did not recognize Him.

Pilate's question is like asking, "What is the melody of a peach?" He makes the false assumption that truth is the fruit of discussion, that it is a collection of statements.

The right question is, "~Who~ is the truth?" Truth is a Person. Jesus said, "I am the truth" (JHN 14:6). Jews search the Scriptures; Buddhists search their canons; Muslims search the Koran. Jesus says, "The Scriptures testify of Me. Come to Me" (JHN 5:39; MTT 11:28). Since He promises to live within us, in the measure to which we become like Him, we too can become the truth.

There are no right answers to wrong questions.

In many places in the New Testament, "Jesus" is not just the name of one Person. He is called ~ho Iesous~ - "the Jesus." He bears a generic name. There exists a category of men to whom the name Jesus can be applied at least partially. These are truth-bearers. They represent Jesus. In Kabbalistic poetry they are called "the minuscule faces of God."

St. Laurence Justinian wrote, "He thirsted for us and desired to give Himself to us." Well, He has done so, which means the truth is in us.

We might not realize it most of the time because of not differentiating between what theologians call ~fides directa~ and ~fides reflecta~ - direct and reflected faith. If I say "I believe," I say what I believe to believe I can believe I am a believer and be mistaken. Some, on the other hand, have a direct faith and are not aware of it or are aware only rarely.

But if Jesus lives within us, we are the people to whom John writes: "But you have an anointing of the Holy One, and you ~know~ all things. I have not written to you because you do not know the truth but because you know it" (1JN 2:20,21).

Buddha's last words were, "Seek the truth." Jesus said, "I am the truth." Therefore His disciples are no more searchers for truth but its possessors.

page 19 Chapter 1: Possess the Truth

Scripture says that God "...raised us up together and made us sit together in the heavenly places in Christ Jesus" (EPH 2:6). Observe, "we are raised up" and "sit in heavenly places."

Scientists have launched a space telescope that is clear-sighted because of its position above the atmosphere, which bends, distorts and absorbs light before it reaches the earth. The night sky cannot properly be seen from the earth, any more than objects can be viewed through a fish tank filled with water. Light passing through the atmosphere, or water, is refracted and therefore dislocates the objects being viewed. Furthermore, air and water turbulence blur the images. A space telescope remedies all these defects.

If we look at truth from the earth, we are unable to see it as and where it is, but with Jesus we are seated high above the world in heavenly places where God's peace reigns undisturbed and undistorted. There we become possessors of the truth as it really is.

page 21 Chapter 2: Love the Truth

In the search for truth, we are doomed to meet innumerable speculators, eccentrics, crackpots, and out-and-out fakers, not to mention their gullible victims. Even St. Paul recognized that some of those who taught were largely unreliable. He warned against the "many vain talkers and deceivers" in the early church (TIT 1:10).

Psychologist Bertram Forer bought a newsstand astrology book, from which he extracted the following character reading: "...You are extroverted, affable, sociable, while at other times you are introverted, wary and reserved. Disciplined and controlled on the outside, you tend to be worrisome and insecure on the inside. Your sexual adjustment has presented some problems for you..."

This very same character reading was given to fifty students, who were each made to believe it was uniquely formulated for him as a result of a personality test. Forty-one percent of the students considered it a perfect fit to their personality.

Most of us tend to be gullible and are easily waylaid by countless individuals and organizations eager to lead us astray. A psychologist, Hyman, convinced that he could read palms, decided one day to tell people the exact opposite of what he read in their palms. He found that they swallowed what he said as readily as before.

In a Seattle bus station a woman went to the restroom, leaving her bags by her seat. Profiting from her absence, a man rummaged through her baggage and disappeared with something bundled under his coat. When the woman returned, she cried, "My tape deck was stolen!" Several men who witnessed the incident agreed to give their names and addresses for use in the insurance claim. When they were questioned later, they recalled the color, shape, and size of the tape deck.

The fact is that there never had been a tape deck. The whole incident was staged as an experiment by the University of Washington to show the unreliability of witnesses and of human memory.

If we wish to have the truth, we must realize we have nothing to rely on. Truth can come only as a free gift from above. It is received as revelation or not at all.

page 23 Chapter 2: Love the Truth

The Romans had a saying: ~Quidquid recipitur, secundum modum recipientis recipitur~ - "Whatever is received, is received according to the manner of the one receiving it." Aristotle said, "Wickedness corrupts a man's nature and gives him false principles and evil measures of things." Bad men are condemned to have false ideas. And we are all bad.

Jesus, the Pure, cleanses us from all sins. He, the embodiment of truth, identifies with us and becomes our new personality. He gives us His thoughts.

Those with ears only for what is earthly believe that music consists of the sounds produced by crickets rubbing their legs together. But those who look up will hear the heavenly harmony of truth.

Just as pigeons or snails have a magnetic sense that helps orient them at great distances, so those who hear the sound of ultimate truth are irresistibly attracted to it. They know to whom they are to entrust themselves and where they are going. Jesus told us, "Where I go you know, and the way you know" (JHN 14:4).

Lady Philosophy will criticize us immediately, saying, "Wait a bit. You jumped from the search for truth to the unwarranted assertion that Jesus is the truth. Why Jesus?"

Are we obliged to justify ourselves before her? What are her credentials? And who is she? From whence is her right to interrogate and investigate?

And who are the philosophers? How much do they love me? Who among them sacrificed a heaven for me? Who among them died on a cross for me?

If religion enters into a discussion with philosophy, its doom is unavoidable. Debating philosophy is a good way to commit spiritual suicide. A Romeo would not think of trying to justify before philosophy his sentiments for Juliet. Nor will we define ourselves before the philosophic sowers of doubt.

The oracle says that Jesus is the truth. Where the oracle has spoken, let all else keep silent.

Ultimate truth is not something to be analyzed or debated. It is something to be practiced.

That Jesus is the truth is an essential fact of human life that only ignorance can deny.

The truth has come.

Maritain wrote, "Henceforth, God remains dumb, and has nothing to say, because what He said in times past to the prophets in a fragmentary manner has now been totally said. He gave us His all, which is His son, which means that to try now to interrogate God or to will to have a vision or a revelation does not only mean stupidity, it is also an offense toward God. We should have our eyes fixed on Christ without seeking anything else.

"God could tell you, 'If I have revealed all things to you in my Word, which is my Son, I have no other

page 25 Chapter 2: Love the Truth

Word with which to reply or reveal more than that. Fix your eyes upon Him because in Him I have told you everything. I reveal everything to you, and you will find in Him more than what you desire or ask....

"'You desire words and fragments of revelations; but if you fix your eyes upon Him, you will find everything because He is my entire world, and my entire answer. He is my whole vision and revelation. You have all the answers. I have given you the reply - as brother, teacher and companion, atonement, and reward.'"

It seems Maritain was very sure that God had said everything through Christ. Just one little thing was lacking - that Maritain would add his assurance of Christ's relaxation. My oracle might also be needed as well as the private revelations at some children of God received.

"Joseph, son of David, do not be afraid to take to you Mary...." So said the angel (MTT 1:20b)

I was also afraid to take Mary into my life and into my love. Then I heard the same words spoken to Joseph. Now she is part of my life too, as well as Joseph and the multitude of angels who prepared for and were present at Jesus' birth.

Mary was obedient when the archangel Gabriel told her God desired that she give birth to the Messiah. She was a faithful Jewess who may have known the prophecies. She may have known from

page 26 Chapter 2: The Oracles of God

Isaiah 53 that her child would be "a man of sorrows acquainted with grief." She may have also known from Psalm 22 that "they [would] pierce His hands and His feet" on a cross, that He would be rejected by His people, an object of scorn, that His whole life would be full of pain.

She may have known that the calling to be the mother of God's Son was a call to suffer with her child for 33 years and in the end to stand weeping at the foot of the cross. Her quiet acceptance was heroic: "Let it be to me according to your word" (LUK 1:38).

Joseph's decision was also remarkable. He had loved a pure girl and was sure they would have a blessed marriage and would have children to rear in the fear of the Lord. Then his heart was stricken at the discovery that his bride was pregnant. Whose heart would not have been? She never gave him any explanation. Then an angel told him in a dream that what she had conceived was of the Holy Spirit.

Joseph probably knew little about what or who the Holy Spirit was. Such a thing had never happened before. Such a message was not easy to believe. But he must have been a man who always put the best construction on events, even if it didn't seem advisable given difficult circumstances. He decided to obey the dream.

The experience had been hard on both bride-groom and bride. Mary became taciturn and "pondered these things in her heart." Only a few of her words are reported for 33 years of her life with Jesus. As for Joseph, we are not told of a single word he ever spoke.

The two spent their lives quietly in simple belief. When you have Jesus for a child, there is no need for much talk.

We too have to receive Jesus in faith, even while realizing that we must bear a cross and be crucified with Him.

What proof did Joseph have that the dream was not just a dream? The search for proof comes from doubt, and disbelief is sinful. Atheists may find it difficult to believe, but believers find it difficult to entertain doubt. Disbelief to them is as abhorrent as adultery or killing.

Only those who do not know Jesus question the logical legitimacy of faith. Mary did not doubt when an angel spoke. Neither did Joseph, even if the angel appeared to him only in a dream. How then should we doubt the One who died for us?

When we came to believe in Jesus, it was not the result of reasoning on our part that could very well have been false. When Peter first acknowledged Jesus as the Son of the living God, the Lord assured him, "...flesh and blood has not revealed this to you, but My Father who is in heaven" (MTT 16:17). This also applies to my faith.

We throw in our lot with Jesus because, He has the seeds of truth that contain the fruits of righteousness and the flowers of eternity. What philosophers and doubters have to offer is, by comparison, mere husks.

Jesus is repeatedly referred to as the Mediator. A mediator never represents only one side - he hears the grievances of both parties and seeks a middle way of peace.

God has many grievances against men. They sin against His law, although as Creator He has the right to require obedience.

In ISA 5:1-3 there is a song that is God's complaint:

Now let me sing to my Well-beloved
A song of my Beloved regarding His vineyard:
My Well-beloved has a vineyard
On a very fruitful hill.
He dug it up and cleared out its stones,
And planted it with the choicest vine.
He built a tower in its midst.
And also made a winepress in it;
So He expected it to bring forth good grapes,
But it brought forth wild grapes.
And now, O inhabitants of Jerusalem and men of Judah,
Judge, please, between Me and My vineyard.

Then God asks the question, "What more could have been done to my vineyard?" (ISA 5:4)

page 29 Chapter 2: Love the Truth

Isaiah had no answer to this question. God did. He knew mankind's complaints were justified, too. And He did the one thing more that could be done: He came to share human life with all its hardships. How can one reproach a God who is a poor, suffering man just like you? A God who permits pain must show He is ready to bear it Himself. This is what Jesus did when He became God in the flesh. He also satisfied the just demands of God to the human soul. He paid the ransom for us. He bore the punishment for our sins. This is how peace was established.

A pastor stayed overnight at a farm. In the morning the farmer showed him his chicken house. They paused before a nest on which a hen was seated. Under her wings she sheltered her chicks. "Touch her, pastor," said the farmer. She was cold, dead, unmoving. A weasel had sucked out all her blood, but to protect the chicks, which the weasel would also have attacked, she had not moved.

Such a mediator we have in Jesus.

We may have grievances against God. Jesus did not take His defense in many words, though He said, "No one is good but God." Neither did He quarrel with sinners, but simply showed them His love and then died for them.

On Good Friday He was dead, but under His wings lay the assurance of life. Only a week before, He had lamented over His people, "How often I wanted to gather your children together, as a hen gathers her chicks under her wings, and you were not willing!" (MTT 23:37b).

Because Jesus is just such a mediator, He split time in two. Recorded history divides time into the era before Christ and the rest after Christ (~Anno Domini~ - "in the year of our Lord"). Even those who hate Him number the years from His birth.

During the French Revolution in 1789, a certain Lepaux launched a new religion called "Theophilanthropy." It made no headway, though supported by the government.

Lepaux complained to Talleyrand, a witty statesman, and asked for advice. Talleyrand replied. "There is a sure way to make your religion popular. Get yourself crucified, buried, and then resurrected on the third day. It would be advisable also to perform some miracles, to heal a multitude of the sick, to feed the hungry, and to bring a couple of dead men back to life."

This is how Jesus introduced His religion. This is how He became our Master - master in the absolute sense of the word. When He was still a babe, Simeon called Him "Lord," using for it the Greek word that means "despot" (LUK 2:29). He is an absolute monarch with unlimited power who is obligated to give account to no one for what He does. Therefore just to question His authority is sin.

page 31 Chapter 2: Love the Truth

Though endowed with all power, He does not exercise it. He does not dictate. Rather, He reduced Himself to our level and became a man like us, in fact, a man of low social rank. And He "was in all points tempted as we are" (HEB 4:15). Therefore this almighty "despot" can be our understanding friend.

Father Brown, the central character in Chesterton's crime novels, could easily detect murderers and robbers, because he could feel what was happening in someone else's soul. He knew the potential thief, crook and assassin within himself; he was attentive to the bad impulses of his own heart. He knew that he would do it were he to follow these evil inclinations. By identifying with lawbreakers, by infiltrating their skewed mentality, he was able to follow leads invisible to others.

Jesus, by identifying with mankind, was subject to like temptations - which must have caused Him untold suffering beyond anything we know because He never yielded to them. His encounters with evil enabled Him to have great understanding even for the worst of sinners, even for His betrayer and murderers. He identified completely with them. Their sins became His, and He bore their punishment. The "despot" with complete, absolute power consented to die a malefactor's death on a cross.

Therefore God greatly exalted Him (see PHP 2:9).

Bethlehem is a town connected with the name of two despots. Jesus was born there. Herod was buried

page 32 Chapter 2: The Oracles of God

there. Herod, who severely exercised his despotic powers, is dead, and who knows what lies beyond? Jesus, who renounced His despotic powers, still lives and will dwell with His beloved forevermore.

Every one of us has the potential to dominate someone else. Let us learn how to use this potential from the example of Jesus.

St. John Berchman wrote these beautiful passages in the seventeenth century:

"Think of Jesus Christ raised up on the cross praying for His enemies; see how His blood flows from every wound...Looking at the head of our Lord crowned with thorns, I will pray for my superiors, both ecclesiastical and civil. Considering the wound in His right hand, I will pray for my relatives, for my brothers, my friends and benefactors. The wound in the left hand will remind me to pray for my enemies, for those who have offended me, for all those whom I myself have caused to be saddened.

"For myself, I will take the wound in His sacred side; I will ask Him for these graces:

"1. to love God with all my heart;

"2. to be on fire with zeal for the salvation of my fellow men;

"3. to persevere in my vocation...

"Seeing the feet of Jesus pierced with nails, I will remember to pray for all, both good and bad."

The images of even the most renowned men of all time pale into insignificance when viewed in the light of Jesus, the Son of righteousness.

An anonymous poet compared Jesus with Alexander the Great, the Macedonian emperor who conquered all the countries from Greece to Egypt in the third century B.C.:

"Jesus and Alexander died at thirty-three;
one lived and died for self,
one died for you and me.
One died upon a throne,
the other on a cross;
one's life a triumph seemed,
the other's but a loss.

"One led vast armies forth, the other walked alone;
one shed a whole world's blood,
the other gave His own.
One won the world in life,
and lost it all in death;
the other lost His life,
to win the whole world's faith.

"Jesus and Alexander died at thirty-three;
one died in Babylon, and one in Calvary.

page 34 Chapter 2: The Oracles of God

One gained all for himself, and one Himself He gave.
One conquered every throne,
the other every grave."

In Shakespeare's King Lear, the good is defeated. Cordelia, the king's only faithful daughter, lies dead at the feet of her father who had unjustly rejected her. In all great dramas – as in real life everything ends in death. Oedipus, Medea, and Clytemnestra; and Macbeth, Othello, and all the Richards and Henrys of Shakespeare's plays – all conclude with the great personalities dead and the curtain falling. What they accomplished, good or bad, was for nought.

John Berchman made the wounds of Jesus his subject of meditation. I also meditate on them. But where are these wounds? They are in the glorified body of Jesus, in the body with which He triumphed over death. He showed them to Thomas, and all the apostles saw them as proof of the resurrection.

He assured us, too, of a glorious resurrection.

Worms, fire, or the sea might consume my body. But my spirit will live in a world with no more wanderings and trials. I do not have to pass through many painful incarnations. Beyond death lies paradise.

page 35 Chapter 3: The Measure of the Soul

The medieval mystic Eckhart wrote, "If you ask how big the soul is, you should know that heaven and earth cannot comprehend its grandness, but only God alone, who cannot be comprehended by all the heavens."

Long before Eckhart's time, Heraclitus (2500 B.C.) had said, "If you wish to arrive at the limits of your soul, you will not find them no matter which way you go, so great are its depths."

Even if you do not believe the soul to be immortal, you must acknowledge that it has been considered as such by the greatest spirits of mankind, that the soul would deserve to be transmitted to a permanent sphere, and that it would be good if it could bloom in another world and still be useful.

The Greek philosopher Plato wrote,

"The man whose heart is directed toward love of teaching and wisdom and who exercise this part in himself, will surely have immortal and divine thoughts if he apprehended truth. And in the measure in which it is in human nature to have immortality, he will not miss it."

How little do men value their own soul! Eve sold hers for an apple, Esau for a plate of lentils, and Judas for thirty pieces of silver.

Be careful that you do not sell yours.

The Greek philosopher Plotinus wrote,

"Often when I fall asleep and leave the external world, I come to myself. Then I see a wonderful beauty. I believe strongly in my belonging to a better and higher world. I live within myself...the most splendid life... [in union]...with Godhead. After having sojourned with the Godhead, when I descend to the activity of the body, I ask myself why I am descending and how come my soul ever entered a body when it was what it had revealed itself to me to be, in spite of its inhabiting a body."

Plotinus had experienced a portion of his soul through a dream. It is true that no one has ever seen his world, but neither have we seen our pain or our joy. We simply feel them.

It is nonsense to seek the seat of the soul, because, like life itself, it can be "everywhere."

For years I lived alone in a subterranean Communist prison cell. In solitary confinement we had no books, no radio. There was no voice, no whisper. Perfect silence reigned. No one ever spoke to us.

But in those years I mentally visited relatives and friends, those alive and those who had died. I remembered many churches in many lands; I thought of other spheres, of angels and glorified saints in Heaven, of devils in hell, of Adam and Eve, and of the generation that will witness Jesus' return.

The soul only visits this material world, but since we do not belong to it, the soul cannot find here the explanation for or definition of itself. It is so different from all that is in this world that it sometimes doubts if it is at all, in the sense this world gives to the word "is." Jesus says of His disciples, "Theirs is the kingdom of heaven" (MTT 6:3) - now, not in the future.

The soul is the Kingdom's most exquisite toy.

Jesus says, "The kingdom of God is within you" (LUK 17:21), but not all of it is illuminated. The last words of Goethe, the great German poet were, "Light, more light!"

This we should all seek. May this book aid you in the search.

***

Scientists have sought the locus of the soul in laboratories and during autopsies. They have never found it, nor will they ever. It belongs outside the realm of the objects of the inquest.

What then is the soul, and where is it?

It may be that we are trying to solve a problem that is essentially meaningless. The noted British physicist Sir James Jeans wrote, "It is probably as meaningless to discuss how much room an electron makes up as it is to discuss how much room fear and anxiety or an uncertainty takes up." Matter might not be material at all. Perhaps the soul is not a "something" to be found "somewhere."

Lightning strikes. An artist can paint the splendid flash of light in the dark sky. A scientist describes it as a electrical discharge in the atmosphere. For Luther, lightning was the sign of God's wrath that propelled him into becoming a monk. Which of these perceptions is correct?

A mental event is described by the neurologist as an interplay of nerves, brain cells, and hormones. Shakespeare's Romeo and the early Christians did not even know that hormones existed, yet Romeo died for Juliet, and early believers gave their lives for the ecstasy of their faith.

Will, sentiment, and thought are connected with the body and can be explained in terms of the body. But the contrary is also true. The body and its functions are mental concepts. Our mind tells us (who is the "us" and who does the telling, and who analyzes the relationship between teller and told?) that the different senses give it a multitude of perceptions which it synthesizes into the notion of a body."

page 39 Chapter 3: The Measure of the Soul

Without a body there is no mind. Without a mind, is there no body, but simply a whirlwind of elementary particles? These too are a product of the mind.

Poets and painters tell us about sunsets. Scientists enjoy the portrayal but are also convinced the sun neither rises nor sets; the earth turns around the sun. Which is the truth? Why should science be the truth, and art and everyday experience not be?

When I speak objectively, I limit myself to physiology and anatomy. Thinking as subject, I know my soul.

Virtually everyone lives in the presumption that space is a kind of receptacle within which things are located. A handful of scientifically trained people know that space is an attribute of matter. It is a relationship between things and would not exist without things.

The scientists who think thus also live and walk around in space and create spaceships.

Souls exist just as all the beauties of nature exist, no matter how much scientists might want to reduce them to cold chemical or physical formulas.

This soul can live eternally in happiness and usefulness, or it can get lost through persistence in sin, refusal of repentance, and denial of faith.

If you proposed to an ass, "I will give you enough straw to fill a house if you will allow me to cut off your head," the ass would not accept. But we accept such proposals as often as we sin.

We are like a man who has a costly jewel in the safe but cares more about the safe than the jewel. Observing how well Westerners treat their pets, one might prefer to be their pet than their soul.

Jesus has come to save your soul. Listen to Him!

***

An equilibrist stands upside down on a broomstick teetering over several shaky tables and plays the violin. A person in the audience leans over and says to his friend, "I wonder why he plays the violin in public. He's not a virtuoso."

This is how many people adjudge the thoughts of Christian prisoners wrenched from them in extremes of physical and psychological torture.

I shared and viewed the sufferings of many fellow prisoners in an underground Communist prison. What intrigued us most was that we did not obtain from Heaven what it was obviously reasonable to expect: a slight improvement in our situation, food to quiet our hunger, an abatement of the cruel torture. We did not get what we expected because Heaven is not – humanly speaking – reasonable.

Jesus said, "There will be more joy in heaven over one sinner who repents than over ninety-nine just persons who need no repentance" (see LUK 15:7). This is surely not reasonable.

Jesus also said, "To whom little is forgiven, the same loves little" (LUK 7:47b). Why should one first have to commit many heinous sins before loving Him? Therese of Lisieux objected to these words. Brought up in a devout family, dedicated to the Lord at a very early age, a Carmelite nun at 15, dead at 24, she used to say to the Lord, "I love you much, ardently, though I had not known the great sins of the world."

Nowhere does the Bible speak about the reasonableness of God, but rather about His foolishness (1CO 1:21). He is as unreasonable as the thoughts of little children. Christ became a child and recommended that we become as children too.

The renowned Franciscan Giacopone was considered mad because of the things he did out of love for Jesus. It is said that once even Jesus appeared to him and asked, "Why do you commit such mad deeds?" He replied, "Because You taught me. If I am mad, You are even more so. Where is the reasonableness of Your dying for me? I am a fool because Thou hast been a greater fool."

A newspaper published the story of a man whose hat was blown off while he was out fishing with friends. Quickly he jumped into the icy water to retrieve it and was never seen again. What a tragedy to risk a life for a hat worth a few dollars!

Was it reasonable to sacrifice the life of the unique Son of God for witless, dirty, dumb sheep? I have asked many shepherds what they would do if they saw a wolf. They all replied, "We would run for our lives." No man dies for sheep. Yet Jesus did. He died for beings worse than sheep - for those who denied and betrayed Him, for those who demanded His crucifixion. He died for His killers, for all who blaspheme and hate God.

Do not be surprised if you fail to get from God what you might reasonably expect. If He were truly reasonable, He would never listen to the prayers of people like us, nor would we have salvation.

Rather, God loves to the point of folly.

If you are in the sad situation of experiencing neither His reason nor His mad love, you might consider the fact that in the parable of the ninety and nine, only the lost sheep had sure proof of His love and concern. The others could reasonably say they were neglected and abandoned. When the prodigal son returned home, he was embraced with love, given a ring, and feted with the fatted calf, music, and dancing. The faithful son who came in from the fields all tired out and sweaty was not even greeted with a kind word.

Those who are faithful should simply be glad that others experience His love to folly.

The good Samaritan of the parable was not a tourist. He doubtless was making an important business trip and had appointments to keep. His extraordinary good deed must have delayed him considerably. Perhaps he even neglected other duties because he stopped to serve a wounded man.

While in solitary confinement, I waited for years for God to come to my aid. I realized that He tarried and tried to think of Him as the good Samaritan. I was sure He had set out to help but that He Himself might have seen a wounded man whom He stopped to succor and carry to the inn. I thought that He who saw a sparrow fall might also stop to brush the dew from a flower petal weighted down. In solitary, we were happy about His mad love even in moments when we were not its recipients.

Enraptured, Mary Magdalene of Pazzi ran about her convent carrying an image of the crucified Jesus and crying, "O Love, Love! I shall never cease, my God, to call you 'Love.'" She told the sisters, "He too is mad with love."

Do not count on reasonableness in Heaven and you will never be disappointed. Count only on the fact that there is One who loves you to such folly that He died for you. In response, forget about sweet reason and let yourself fall madly in love with Him. These, my words, are oracles of God.

To learn from your enemies is the best way to love them because it makes you thankful for them.

Jesus' command that we love our enemies is very different from what the world prescribes. Frederick the Great, king of Prussia, once said, "He is a fool, and that nation is a fool, that, having the power to strike his enemy unawares, does not strike and strike him the deadliest."

page 44 Chapter 3: The Oracles of God

To the contrary, in Judaism, love for others is considered a duty.

In ~Baba Quama~, a part of the Talmud, there is an example of some of the beautiful attitudes of love taught by the Jews: "If a companion calls you an ass and asks you to carry him like an ass, put the saddle on yourself immediately." It is better to suffer more injury than to lose your temper. It is better to be among the afflicted than those who afflict.

A very old Amish bishop taught me, "If someone shouts at you or wrongs you, put a thermometer in your mouth immediately to be sure your temperature does not rise."

If someone becomes your adversary, remember that many men are better than they look. There are evil spirits trying to control and direct their lives. Who knows from what pits of corruption they may have arisen? They might not have had opportunity to see the world from an angelic viewpoint.

The Sufites have a beautiful saying: "He who is not my friend, may God be his friend; and he who bears ill will against me, may his joy increase. He who puts thorns in my way on account of enmity, may every flower that blossoms in the garden of his life be without thorns."

In Gethsemane, Jesus called Judas (his betrayer) "Friend."

page 45 Chapter 4: Discern Between Truth and Illusion

There is certain truth: Where lies the difficulty in finding it?

In a free country, many real events take place about which a man can be informed through the media. If he desires, he can check his information by telephoning, writing, or even by traveling to the place where the events took place.

For many years I was a prisoner in a solitary cell without the slightest means of communication with the outside world. There was the world of reality, but I was in no position to ascertain the truth about it because I was in jail.

There is such a thing as truth, but we all are prisoners - of time, space, and our own surroundings. Supposing that ultimate truth lies outside of time and space, what possibility do I have of finding it?

page 46 Chapter 4: The Oracles of God

A man in a bar asked the bartender, "Billy, do you know what time it is?"

"Two o'clock in the morning," was the reply.

The drunkard commented thickly, "I'm probably crazy. I've been drinking since yesterday morning and have been asking people again and again what time it is, and everyone has a different answer."

We are all caught in time. Because time flows, it enters into conflict with our convictions, which tend to be fixed. "I know what I believe. Don't confuse me with the facts," we say, half-joking. But time constantly brings new facts.

Every time you meet a man, you meet someone different from the one you knew before or who has been described to you. But too often, after one or more meetings with a person, we form an opinion that we tend to cling to, whether good or bad. This opinion, which is progressively more difficult to change, epitomizes our view of natural, psychological, and social reality.

Because we humans are prisoners of space, for thousands of years we accepted as truth the notion that the sun travels around the earth. Now we have discovered that this is an optical illusion. But what if our current belief is only another optical illusion that will be uncovered in future centuries?

A man with defective eyesight may imagine that he sees flies on his plate, for him they have full reality. Though the flies are not real, the illusion is.

page 47 Chapter 4: Discern Between Truth and Illusion

The experience of our phenomenal world is like that of the short-sighted man. We all labor under the constant illusion of perceiving things where, in fact, there is only emptiness.

In Brahman initiations, after a very old ritual, when the disciple asks what the world is, the priest swings around a firebrand, which then resembles a solid wheel of flame. This visual response was a splendid foresight of modern science. We now know that, contrary to ancient beliefs, there exists no solid world. We ourselves consist of and are surrounded by a whirlwind of elementary particles which, because of the rapidity of their movement and the limitations of our senses, appear to be solid bodies.

Circling at crazy speeds, the particles can look like a bowl into which one can place "solid" objects. The nonexistent "bowl" can hold the nonexistent "objects." What exists is only the circling of ultra-microscopic particles.

The world is like a firebrand swung around in a circle. It took us thousands of years to come to this knowledge, but we do not know if this will be considered the "real thing" after yet another thousand years, if our imprisonment in time and space does not keep us from going even further in our discoveries.

For many prisoners in solitary confinement, the walls of the cell are the ultimate limits of their reality. Free men also have limits – of time, space, and surroundings.

page 48 Chapter 4: The Oracles of God

One thing further: our only means of knowing the truth, our only instrument for apprehending it, seems to be the mind. But to the works of the mind one can apply the same things that Isaiah, the Jewish prophet, wrote some 3,000 years ago about idolatry:

The craftsman stretches out his rule, he marks it out with chalk; he fashions it with a plane, and he marks it out with a compass, and makes it like the figure of a man, according to the beauty of a man; that it may remain in the house. He cuts down cedars for himself, and takes the cypress and the oak; he secures it for himself among the trees of the forest. He plants a pine, and the rain nourishes it. Then it shall be for a man to burn, for he will take some of it and warm himself; yes, he kindles it and bakes bread; indeed he makes a god and worships it; he makes it a carved image, and falls down to it. He burns half of it in the fire; with this half he eats meat; he roasts a roast, and is satisfied.
He even warms himself and says, "Ah I am warm, I have seen the fire" and the rest of it he makes into a god, his carved image. He falls down before it and worships it, prays to and says, "Deliver me, for thou art my god!"

(ISA 44:13-17)

Are not the worshipers of the mind guilty of the same thing? With a part of the mind we think about how to make a living; with another part we seek fun or amusement; with a part we compose jokes

or poetry; with a part we sometimes dream foolish things; and then with another part of this same mind we conceive a god and bow before it - or what is worse, we deny the very existence of God and the need for Him.

We search for truth with the same mind that composes jokes and fantasizes in dream; that seeks high status in society and picks up a girl in a bar; that creates a beautiful poem and drowns its sensibilities in alcohol or drugs. Then we believe in the product of such an unfastidious mind.

In the Romanian language, the word for "mind" literally means "it lies," because the mind, by its very structure, can only tell lies.

What does the mind know? Its work is done by the brain. What does the mind know about its own brain?

The "text" of the genes of a single ~e. coli~ bacterium cell consists of four million symbols. The human brain is a network of some ten billion nerve cells, each of which has 200,000 contacts with neighboring cells. This huge mechanism, in addition to controlling all sorts of bodily functions, creates symphonies and dirty jokes, decides how to fight for an ideology or religion or rob a bank, plans to woo or deceive, thinks to speak or keep silence. And some of what it thinks, it declares to be the truth. Again, how reliable is this complex organism?

page 50 Chapter 4: The Oracles of God

We see stars in the sky that we know disappeared a long time ago. We see them as fixed, though they move. We have corrected and intensified our eyesight by the use of telescopes. But what if the telescope only magnifies an illusion that will be discovered years hence - supposing, of course, that mankind survives his succession of illusions?

The Bible says of a previous age, "Every intent of the thoughts of [man's] heart was only evil continually" (GEN 6:5b).

In such a context, truth seems unattainable. Therefore the psalmist prayed, "Lead me to the rock that is higher than I" (PSA 61:2). The rock that a child finds impossible to climb is within reach if his father lifts him up. This is what God does for us.

If you can't find the truth, stand without it and love.

St. John of the Cross said, "On the evening of life, we will be judged according to love." Augustine wrote, "Lord, send into my heart sentiments of clemency so that, being drawn by love of truth, I will never lose the truth of love." St. Francis de Sales echoed these sentiments: "Truth which is not charitable ceases to be the truth, because in God, who is the supreme source of truth, charity is inseparable from truth."

Love must embrace the wicked as well as the good. It is said of St. Paissy that when he prayed for one of his disciples who had abandoned Christ, the Lord told him, "Paissy, are you praying for the one who has denied me?" Undisturbed, Paissy continued to pray for this man. "Paissy," the Lord then said to him, "you have equaled me in love."

This is how God enables true Christians to think and act.

It is related that when St. John the evangelist was extremely old, his disciples were wearied of his constant repetition of the words, "Little children, love one another." It seemed that this was all he said. When he was carried into their assembly, they asked him why he always repeated these words. "Because," he replied, "it is the Lord's commandment, and if only this one were fulfilled, it would be enough."

Not fulfilling this commandment is the greatest hindrance to the conversion of peoples and nations. No miracle can suffice where there is no love. It is all-powerful and all-inclusive. It centers in God, and God ~is~ love.

Jesus taught and demonstrated that we should love our enemies. In doing so, we may learn that people often have many faces.

A person's angry words may not actually be directed at their recipient. The anger may have other motivations.

page 52 Chapter 4: The Oracles of God

Frustrated people who cannot convince others of their merits often stir up a great deal of hostility against themselves. Then they feel consoled by believing that these "enemies" stand in the way of the acknowledgment their merits deserve.

If we are having difficulty with "enemies," it would be profitable to ask ourselves if we are engendering this hostility. Are we are behaving like those who irritate us? Are our convictions about them indeed well-founded? Are there overtures we can make to break the bonds of ill will? The history of mankind would have been vastly different if individuals in both high and low positions would have stopped to examine their own hearts and motivations.

Therefore, it is better to love than to hate your enemy because you may not be properly informed about his state of mind. Perhaps you are both seeking truth. Be careful to defend your cause without harming the one who attacks you.

Don't ask many people about the truth. Rather keep silent. "...The Lord is in His holy temple. Let all the earth keep silence before Him" (HAB 2:20).

I greatly miss silence in churches. For years I lived in perfect silence in my solitary underground cell in Communist prisons and have embraced it as a friend.

There have been countless studies about the words of the Bible, but none about its silence on a multitude of subjects that are worthy of notice.

page 53 Chapter 4: Discern Between Truth and Illusion

Most of the great problems of life that concern us certainly troubled such men as Moses and the apostles, all of who met God face to face. Surely they asked difficult questions and received some answers about which the Bible is silent.

A sage once sat in profound meditation. He was asked, "Where is God?" The sage kept silent. The man repeated his question. Again, silence. The question was put the third time. Still, no reply.

"Don't you want to answer?" the man asked.

Finally, the sage said, "I replied, but you did not hear. God dwells in silence."

The Bible not only reveals many things, but it also keeps silence about many things. What did Jesus think and do between the ages of twelve and thirty? We find no answer to this in the Bible, not because there is a secret to be hidden but because such answers are communicated in silence.

Jesus was a marvelous preacher, but He also knew how to keep silence. He was silent before Herod, thus teaching him that soon his foul mouth would be silenced by death. He was silent when Pilate asked Him, "Where are You from?" (JHN 19:9). Pilate should have understood that He was from the realm of silence.

The historian Macrobius relates that in Crete and Egypt, when worshipers came to the temple, they found it locked. A priest called "the keeper of the threshold" stood at the door and asked, "Do you know what house you are entering?" They were obliged to reply, "We know." They were then asked, "Do you know before whom you will stand?" They answered, "We know." Only then was the door unlocked. The worshipers thus had time to compose themselves before appearing in the presence of God.

The Spirit of adoption makes us cry out "Abba! Father!" (ROM 8:15). Not much more is needed. A little child embraces his father's leg and simply says lovingly, "Daddy!" Moved by the spontaneous expression of love, the father will surely do his utmost for the child, for he knows better than the child what is best.

Let us speak to God and for God, but - most importantly - let us also have our times of deep silence.

Surely we must pray in words, but let us not neglect silent prayer. Francis de Sales says that in this "the soul becomes quiet wax, waiting for God to impress on it His word."

As long as one prays in words, there are two: God and the soul. In sacred silence, the two become one. The ability to remain silent in God's arms is the measure of love for God. Mary Magdalene could pass a whole evening quietly at the feet of Jesus, listening to His voice. A bride does not speak when her lips are covered with the kisses of the bridegroom.

The silent no longer need to worry about building on a rock. They become rocks on which others can build.

page 55 Chapter 4: Discern Between Truth and Illusion

As the lotus, rooted in watery darkness, seeks the light and rises to the surface, so the silent, though born and educated in the world, rise above it in unsullied beauty.

St. Francis of Assisi went to town once with another friar to preach. On the way, they were mocked but did not reply. When they returned to the monastery, Francis asked the brother, "How did you like my sermon?"

"You did not say a word."

"We have both preached well," responded Francis. "The message of our sermons was to remain silent when scorned."

Historians report that when King Frederic II asked St. Francis why he was silent, he replied, "Who can put into words the sublimity of silent service?"

How can a God "with whom there is no variation or shadow of turning" (JMS 1:17) move the whole universe? Only a motor that moves can move a machine.

Let a beautiful girl enter a room and sit down quietly in a chair, and all around her will begin to move. Beauty moves while remaining unmoved. God's splendor moves the universe.

Jesus said to Matthew simply, "Follow, Me," without providing any argument as to why Matthew should abandon his business and go after an unknown (see MTT 9:9). The radiation of Jesus' spiritual beauty was sufficient to impel him. Matthew locked his customs office and followed Jesus.

We do not need much talking and moving in prayer. Silent prayer imparts something of Heaven's glory. As we reflect the beauty of holiness, it will move God, Christ, the glorified saints, angels, and those in this world, without our pronouncing a word.

The jewel of silence is a pearl lost by the Church. Let us practice silence but at the same time keep silent about the practice.

The English translation of PSA 109:4 says, "I give myself to prayer." The Hebrew original contains only two words: "I - prayer," not even "I ~am~ prayer," which would establish a relationship between myself and prayer. This would overstate the meaning. I and prayer are identical, as Richard Wurmbrand and myself are identical.

Prayer should consist not only of words but also the spirit and the whole person. Augustine wrote, "The spirit prays, even when the tongue silent," just as the heart and the kidneys function without speaking.

The essence of prayer is quietness, as the beginning of the Orthodox liturgy suggests: "Let us put aside all worldly worry." It is prayer to forsake my opinions, my fantasy, my passions, even my thoughts about God.

page 57 Chapter 4: Discern Between Truth and Illusion

When my son was four, I told him to think about God. He replied, "Why should I think about this big God with my small mind? Let Him with His big mind think about me." Jesus said, "The Son of Man is coming at an hour you do not think..." (MTT 24:44 NAS). Our thoughts play a secondary role in prayer.

At the entrance of a church in Albania, there was this inscription: "Those who wish to enter through the gate of God's house, leave the drunkenness of thoughts to find inside the Judge full of grace."

May prayer be an hour of secret communion with God, but not an hour of self-condemnation (of "down-thinking of yourself," as the Greek in 1 John 3:21 [1JN 3:21] suggests).

Certainly it is proper to review in prayer your past sins one by one, but not as sins attributable to you. They belong to Jesus.

Luther wrote with much boldness, "Christ is the greatest liar, thief, murderer the world has ever had. Not through committing these deeds, but because He took them all upon Himself. Now they are His. After you have ascertained that, because of his sacrifice, you do not have any more sins, which now lie on His shoulders, meditate slowly on all is attributes, visualizing them not as His, but as yours, because they are His gifts to you. His splendid kingdom is within us."

Emerging from such an hour of prayer, you will be able to sing, whatever others may think, "I am a rose

of Sharon" (see SOS 2:1); "I am lovely" (see SOS 1:5); "I will praise You, for I am fearfully and wonderfully made" (PSA 139:14).

It is not the length of prayer that counts, but its quality. Many believers are sad because they feel they cannot pray much. If that is the case and no words come during your time of prayer, keep silent. Perhaps the Lord does not wish to have words. Do not lakes and forests speak to the human soul though they have no mouth?

Contemplate the beauty of His holiness and meditate on His mercy and loving-kindness. What counts in prayer is above all the state of the heart.

I wish to have the truth for myself. There exists something better than this: It is the denial of self. Jesus teaches men to deny themselves for the simple reason that even without our denial, the self is only an illusion. It is we who gather on a string different events of our life, different opinions and convictions that we have maintained over time, and then designate them as the "self."

I am surely not my self. If I were to meet my self on the street as I was at the age of 9, or 14, or 30, or 50, I would not salute him. I would probably not recognize him, except that now we have photographs to remind us of what we once were.

page 59 Chapter 4: Discern Between Truth and Illusion

If I were to read or hear the things I said when was a child, a teenager, or a mature man before my conversion, I would feel absolutely no sympathy for those opinions. I would not even recognize them as being my own.

From Heaven's viewpoint the words and opinions of even the greatest saints on earth must seem childish; glorified saints would probably not recognize them as ever having been their opinion.

Jesus did not consider it useful for us to know even one of His thoughts or words between the ages of twelve and thirty. Of how much less value are our opinions!

What kind of self, then, can I boast of if I can detach myself from it; if I can deny it; or if I can even commit suicide?

Everything I observe has an objective existence: It can also be observed by other individuals, and I can verify my conclusions. The self can be contemplated by no one but me. I have no witness to corroborate my analyses. My "self" declares what my "self" is, and this "self" is not reliable.

Again, the self has as its material tool the brain. The brain is an apparatus with which we think that we think. But let us be honest with ourselves: How many hours a day do we use our brains for thinking? How much of what we have thought proves to be true?

A false comparison has been made between the human brain and a computer. The computer gives mathematically exact results; the brain does not. The self is a deceiver.

The self is a poor instrument for discovering truth.

The shortest biblical names of God in Hebrew are ~Yah~ and ~El~. These names are found even in pre-biblical times, in the Ebla tablets.

It is said that the Japanese used to have very long names. By way of illustration, the story is told about a Japanese boy who fell into a well. Another boy desperately tried to explain to an adult that ~Taramceca- patostarnecaton~ was in danger of drowning, but by the time he finished saying the name, the boy in the well went down for the third time and was beyond saving. Ever since then, the story goes, the Japanese have restricted themselves to short names.

In Hebrew, the name ~Yah~ is constituted of only two letters. By pronouncing just one syllable, a person may be in His presence immediately.

America's fiftieth state, the Hawaiian Islands, were once called the Sandwich Islands after the Earl of Sandwich. From him also comes the name of a popular food often eaten between meals. A passionate gambler, he would not leave the gaming table for lunch or dinner. Therefore, he invented the

"sandwich," which one can eat while pursuing other interests.

If a passion for gambling can shorten the time for eating, so a passion for Heaven may shorten religious talk, and what good is it anyway? "For whoever calls upon the name of the Lord shall be saved" (ROM 10:13). For this purpose, God gives Himself - even in English a monosyllable as a name and puts in one short word the single condition of salvation: "The just shall live by faith" (ROM 1:17b).

The truth must also have a short name by which to be known to those who need it immediately. Like a coin or a bill hidden in a wallet, it must be readily available in an emergency.

But just as popularized science is not science itself, so a shortened message about the truth is not the whole truth.

Be happy to have found the truth in a short name and in a short message. Then seek diligently for more treasure when the emergency has passed.

Small nuggets of truth can tell us a great deal about the whole truth; but the whole truth arrived at by conclusions from the few things that are known, must be kept entire. Nothing less than the whole creed will do in religious matters.

There is both an advantage and a disadvantage to short messages.

Suffering may help one to arrive at truth. "Tears, tears, bitter hulls but with such a sweet kernel," wrote the much-persecuted Romanian Christian poet, Traian Dorz.

Most people have an unjustified phobia against suffering. Unnecessary tragedy should be avoided, but we should also realize that there is much good in suffering.

Milton wrote his finest poetry after he became blind. Beethoven composed his most beautiful music only after he became deaf.

The German philosopher Kant, who suffered from an incurable sickness, wrote, "I have become master of its influence on my thoughts and actions by turning my attention away from this feeling altogether just as if it did not at all concern me." William Wilberforce, hero of the fight against slavery in the British empire, could not live one day without pain-relieving drugs, but he had the willpower to take only a minimum dose.

Henry Stanley, reared in a poor children's orphanage, learned there the endurance he later needed to find the lost Livingstone and to explore the interior of Africa. Kernahan, born without arms or legs, became a member of the British parliament.

Solzhenitsyn wrote, "Blessed be thou, prison." The seven years he spent in Soviet jails made of him the most powerful opponent of Communism.

I can say about myself that my fourteen years in Communist prisons were the most fruitful years of my life.

I know of no great character formed apart from suffering. A world without suffering would consist of weaklings. What kind of love endures without painful sacrifice? He who counts the sufferings involved will never be a daring hero.

Jesus Himself was made perfect through sufferings (HEB 2:10).

When Pope Alexander VI, criticized by Savonarola for his unworthy life, offered him the position of cardinal in order to keep him silent, Savonarola answered, "May God keep me from being unfaithful to Him. I do not desire any other red cap than the crown of a martyr colored with my own blood."

The highest state of a Christian reader, as well that of a Christian writer, is to be Christ-like. (The reader who is not a Christian would please God by becoming one.)

Christ was called a "Man of sorrows (ISA 53:3) and "the Lamb slain before the foundation of the world" (REV 13:8).

To be a Christian, whether writer or reader, means to become a co-sufferer with Christ. The more of His pain we are ready to share, the more truth we will receive.

Someday we will sit with Jesus and the Father on the heavenly throne from which universes are created and administered (REV 3:21). A merciful God "will wipe away all tears" from the eyes of His saints and all will be able to rejoice wholeheartedly (see REV 7:17; REV 21:4).

This book claims to contain the truth, "the oracles of God." There exists a justified skepticism regarding the truth.

Anyone who is convinced that he has what he believes to be the truth must first believe that mankind can know truth and that mankind can know the means for discovering it. He must also believe that he personally knows these methods and has used them well.

Whoever is aware of the limitations of these conditions will not lightly assert that he has the truth.

Goethe said in a conversation with Luden, "Truth is something which must necessarily be thought; something which simply cannot be thought otherwise." An example would be that two and two are four.

The most widespread definition of truth is this: "correspondence between thinking and reality." But the question remains: what is reality? Does reality reveal itself to me as it is?

The world, including our bodies, is constituted of atoms, yet for centuries we did not know this. Who can count the multitude of other specks of reality hidden from us? Our thinking might correspond to reality as we know it today and still be very far from the truth.

To know a truth, we must first have a true definition of truth. I must know what truth is before I declare or accept a teaching as truth. I would also have to know truth before accepting as true any definition of truth. We therefore need an endless series of preliminary knowledge which is unrealizable.

Philosophically, truth is unattainable, but that is no cause for worry because mining is also philosophically impossible. For mining we need tools of iron. In order to have iron tools, we must first be able to mine for iron. And so the argument runs. Meanwhile, miners mine.

page 67 Chapter 5: The Cost of Truth

Jesus, referring to Himself, promised, "You shall know the truth" (JHN 8:32). As a seeker for truth, one must fulfill certain conditions. The first is a readiness to suffer for it when it is discovered.

Four girls once met, whose names were Fire, Air, Water, and Truth. They spoke about many things. On parting, they said, "We are so happy together, let us meet again. Where can we meet? Fire, where do you live?"

Fire replied, "Sisters, rub two pieces of wood together and you will find me."

Air said, "You will find me wherever you see a flower trembling or a leaf moving."

Water said, "Dig in the earth at the roots of trees. I will be there."

Truth said, "I was expelled from the world and no one receives me. Whoever takes my side is crucified."

page 68 Chapter 5: The Oracles of God

It is said that when Pythagoras discovered his renowned theorem, he sacrificed a hundred oxen to the gods. Then the legend states that all the oxen in the world tremble every time a truth is discovered, and the possessors of oxen kill the possessors of truth. Fearing this fate, most men settle for less than truth.

Not so Jesus. He said, "For this cause I was born, and for this cause I have come into the world, that I should bear witness to the truth" (JHN 18:37). He witnesses to the truth and teaches us, by His example, to do the same whatever the result, even if it is a painful and shameful death on a cross.

Second, we must seek the true truth and reject any surrogate. A man went into a shop to buy cloth for a suit. He noticed that the shopkeeper's yardstick was short and asked him why. The merchant answered, "It doesn't matter. It may be short but it's very thick."

Sometimes what is presented as truth might be very beautiful, attractive, or pleasant, and it might give peace or joy, but these qualities cannot replace the most important element we must seek in a religious teaching – its truthfulness.

Third, we must be very careful to examine the words and fruits of those who speak in the name of God. Credulity is dangerous. We can be led astray and lose our souls.

page 69 Chapter 5: The Cost of Truth

It is said that when Alexander the Great went to war against Darius, King of the Persians, he took a bath and caught cold. His friend Philip, a physician, cared for him. Just at that time, Alexander received a letter from his most faithful commander advising him to be suspicious of Philip and not to take his medicine because the physician was in collusion with King Darius to poison him. Philip had allegedly received money and the promise of Darius' sister for his wife. When the physician entered the room with his medicine, Alexander took the glass in one hand and with the other gave the letter to Philip. The emperor drank while Philip read. Then Alexander said to him, "I have confidence in your medicine and in your friendship." He regained his health.

This example is often quoted in sermons to suggest that if we can have such confidence in man, then we can have even more in God – our greatest Friend.

It is my firm conviction that, assuming Alexander really responded in this manner and the story is not legend, he was misguided. Many kings and rulers have been poisoned by their physicians. Many of Stalin's comrades were killed in this manner.

Jesus taught, "Beware of men" (MTT 10:17). We must beware of men in material things, financial matters, and everyday affairs. Even more, we must not easily give our confidence when the eternal destiny of the soul is at stake.

page 70 Chapter 5: The Oracles of God

If anyone desires salvation and sanctification, he might find a religious teacher who is trusted with speaking the oracles of God, but be very choosy.

One of Romania's richest men told me how he attained his wealth. At ten, he was a poor orphan boy without any income or possibility of schooling. He thought to himself, "What should I do? I can start to sell doughnuts on street corners. Then I will have doughnuts. If I start with gold, I will have gold."

He had seen a sign on a large building designating it as the seat of a gold-mining company, so he applied for the job of elevator boy. Once, the owner of the company rode up the elevator and asked who he was. He told his story including his motivation for applying at a gold-mining company.

The owner, impressed, called him into his office where he questioned him at length. He helped him obtain his schooling and enter the university. Eventually, he gave him his daughter as a wife and made him the heir of the company. This is how he became rich.

Dream big, think big. Old Testament Joseph, a shepherd boy, dreamed he would become something big and that his brothers, and even the sun, moon, and stars, would bow before him. His dreams may have seemed laughable, as yours will seem. But he became prime minister of Egypt, a benefactor to many people and a type of the Messiah to come.

page 71 Chapter 5: The Cost of Truth

I was a prisoner of the Communists, confined in an underground cell, but I dreamed about a world- wide mission. My dream came true. This Christian mission (The Voice of the Martyrs) now works in over fifty countries, Communist, former Communist and Muslim, and it prints Christian books in over sixty languages.

Expect great things from God and you will do great things for Him. They might not be spectacular in the eyes of others. Your works might not even be external. They may consist of forming a Christ-like character, rearing a child in the fear of the Lord, witnessing in humility for the Lord; but the results will be of eternal value.

Jesus said, "I will make you fishers of men" (MTT 4:19). The first Christians used a fish as their sign of recognition because the Greek word for for fish spells the initials of "Jesus Christ, Son of God, Savior" - ~Iesus Christos Theos Hiou Soter~.

Yes, catch fish. Catch first of all the greatest fish, ICHTYS, Jesus Himself. When you have caught Him, you have caught the Truth itself, the most reliable of teachers.

A king asked several sages, "How is it that an aquarium filled with water and containing a goldfish weighs as much as the same aquarium with the same amount of water but without the goldfish?" Innumerable answers were given. Even the principle of Archimedes was quoted until in the end someone said, "But does this equality of weight exist? We should first check." Such individuals are rare.

Truth is not easily found. One would be well advised to beware of the peddlers of cheap truth, who rely on the immense credulity of people.

A story is told that may not be true, but it is an excellent illustration of man's gullibility. Allegedly, someone opened a restaurant but without much success. In danger of failing in his venture, the owner resorted to a device to attract customers. He put in the shop window an aquarium filled with water and an inscription, "Here are invisible fish." Thousands gathered to see the unusual fish, and business prospered.

Lord Boyd-Carpenter, who had been financial secretary of the British government under Churchill, wrote: "Once a gathering of the Defense Committee seemed to go on endlessly, without any progress. Churchill, getting bored, suddenly pointed a finger at the window and asked those present, 'What kind of bird is that?' Everybody stared at the window. One said, 'Probably a jay.' Another, 'Perhaps a sea gull.' And so on. Only one dared to say,

'I didn't see any bird.' To which Churchill replied, with laughter 'There was none.'" In this simple way, he showed the ministers and the generals that they spoke empty words.

Likewise, in your search for truth, be sure you verify facts and challenge assertions before accepting them - especially if they ring true. No one likes to discover his coins are counterfeit. "Test all things; hold fast what is good" (1TH 5:21).

In a renowned French movie, ~Typhoon in Nagasaki~, a woman who loves an engineer named Morsac unexpectedly appears on the same train as her dear one who is leaving for Japan. Surprised, he asks, "Why are you here?" She answers, "I didn't stop to think even for a minute. If you leave, I leave too." He then kisses her and tells her, "How beautiful you are when you don't think."

In the Bible it is written that the Son of Man comes in an hour when we do not think (MTT 24:44).

A converted lady who had once been an alcoholic was asked by what method she had overcome her addiction. She replied, "Method? Method takes thinking and repeated endeavors. I knew that my Beloved who died for me willed it, so I promptly obeyed. That was all."

The believer places himself before God like a canvas awaiting a painter. Obedience is taken for granted. The canvas, after all, does not resist the gentle pressure of the artist's brush.

The Christian life is not a life of constant choices between the ways of Christ and those of the world. We are living His life. The choice has already been made. Our self has merged with His Self. We are one in the Beloved who is the Truth.

A soldier by the name of Alexander was brought before Alexander the Great, charged with desertion. Hearing the accusation, the emperor said, "I do not punish you for your cowardice but because, as a man who trembles in battle, you bear my name and put it to shame. You would have gone free if you had changed your name."

We are sinners because, while bearing the name of Christ, we have not behaved accordingly.

After the fall, Jesus never had to choose between coming to earth and not coming. How beautiful that He did not stop to think. Let us imitate Him in this.

The Hindu, the Buddhist, and the Tibetan religions prescribe lengthy and difficult practices of meditation. Christianity is a natural daily loving fulfillment of the wishes of our Bridegroom.

In Carl Maria von Weber's operetta ~Abu Hassan~, a man of Baghdad lived in utter poverty with his wife Fatima. In their desperation, they conceived of the idea that Hassan would feign death for, according to an old custom, every widow or widower without means would receive a big purse from the caliph for the burial. So Fatima ran to the palace with the false news and received a full purse from Zobeide, the caliph's wife.

Hassan then decided on another trick. Now Fatima would feign death. He ran to the palace and also received a purse, this time from the king. A quarrel arose between the caliph and his wife: Who died first, Hassan or Fatima? They went to the poor cottage and disputed the matter in the presence of the two would-be corpses. With a rising voice, the caliph finally promised loudly a thousand ducats to anyone who could tell him who died first. Immediately, Hassan revived and declared he was the first to "die" and claimed this money as well.

We too are poor creatures who have heard that God is rich in mercy toward those dead in trespasses and sins. He offers them forgiveness, blessings, and an eternal paradise.

Now, from this knowledge about the grace of God, two conclusions can be drawn: 1) we should endeavor to be gracious like Him toward those who sin against us, and 2) we should recognize that we are dead in sins without any possibility of helping ourselves, in order to obtain without cost, God's free gifts.

Once we have acknowledged that we are sinners by nature and can receive new life only through God's favor, we should not continue to feign death after being revived. We should not stretch out on a couch and let God do everything. Once you are alive,

page 76 Chapter 5: The Oracles of God

says St. Paul, "work out your own salvation with fear and trembling" (PHP 2:12).

If Baghdad has a good caliph, he should be approached only in times of real need, not in place of working honestly for a living.

Similarly, it is not right to expect God to give us what we can obtain by our own endeavors.

Jesus said to the community of His disciples, "You are the light of the world" (MTT 5:14). You are one light, not lights.

In the former West Germany one evening, 22 planes took off from a military airport for an exercise. Unexpectedly, a thick fog arose. Eight planes immediately returned to base. Four planes got lost. The pilots of the other planes tried to break through the thick wall of fog.

The local radio station interrupted its programming for an urgent news release: "All drivers are asked to go quickly to the airport and keep their headlights on. They will help the planes that are still lost in the fog to land securely. Please communicate the message to other drivers."

Soon the airport was surrounded by 2,500 cars. The drivers were ordered to turn their lights on bright. The lights of one car would not have helped the pilots, but thousands of massed lights did.

A fool poured a cup of water on a house that was on fire and then said, "You see, it is just superstition to believe that water quenches fire. I poured water on the fire, but it continues to burn." He was right, of course. One cup of water will not save a house on fire, but the combined mass of water in fire hoses can.

No one self has all the truth, but only the community of Christians. Let us unite our efforts. We will be able to serve as light to the world and to quench many fires from hell.

Ulrich Zwingli was a Catholic priest in Switzerland in the sixteenth century. A personal conversion experience led him to become first an adherent of Erasmus of Rotterdam and then of the reformer Luther. As a result of his influence, the Reformation became law in Zurich.

Many real abuses practiced in the Catholic church were abolished. All images and organs were thrown out of churches, and celibacy in the priesthood was renounced.

He had to fight at the same time on many fronts: against those who did not accept his puritanical morals, against the Baptists who did not recognize infant baptism, which Zwingli endorsed, and then also against Luther with whom he differed in the understanding of the Lord's Supper. Whereas Luther believed in "consubstantiation" (the bread and wine given to the communicant are the flesh and blood of Jesus), Zwingli believed that communion had only symbolic significance. Because of this difference, Luther refused even to shake hands with him.

Zwingli was very adamant about making the whole of Switzerland forcibly Protestant and urged the "slaughter of the Catholic cantons." He even used terror to encourage respect for his moral rules. In the end, he planned the blockade of food for the Catholic cantons that, with the support of Catholic Austria, then went to war against Zurich. The battle was fierce and hundreds died. The Catholics shouted, "Death to the heretics!" The Protestants replied, "Death to the idolaters!"

Catholics found the dying Zwingli and asked him if he wanted a priest. He made the sign "no." Then they told him, "There is no more time for confessing. Pray to the mother of God and the saints that they may obtain grace for you." When he refused this too, they decided he did not deserve to live.

After he was killed, opinions differed as to what to do with his body. Some proposed that he be cut in five pieces, one for each canton as a trophy. Others were for burning the corpse.

As for his master Luther, he considered Zwingli's death a judgment of God and wondered if the Swiss reformer could be saved and enter Heaven - not because he fought Catholics, but because he had committed the greater sin of differing with Luther on an understanding of Holy Communion. Yet Jesus, in instituting the Lord's Supper, said "Take and eat," not "Take and philosophize about it."

page 79 Chapter 5: The Cost of Truth

Jesus also said, "By this shall all men know that ye are My disciples, if ye have love one to another," (JHN 13:35 KJV). We should all be ashamed of our past hostilities and the continuation of divisions. Let us be known by our love in spite of differences in opinions. It is clear that any opinion is no more than an opinion, not the truth. The truth is far above opinions.

On one point all large Christian denominations agree. The Catholics phrase it this way: "Extra ecclesiam nulla salus"-"Outside the Church there is no salvation." Calvin wrote, "Outside the church there is no forgiveness of sins, and you cannot hope for salvation. Abandoning the church is always fatal." Luther said the same: "Outside the Christian church there is no truth, no Christ, no salvation." These statements are of no great help because the question remains: Which is the Church?

The Jews had a church established by God Himself in all its details, yet its leaders consulted on how to kill the Messiah. "All the chief priests and elders...took counsel," (see MTT 27:1). We are told this because the decision did not arise out of personal wickedness, but out of the collective wickedness of the social category to which the ecclesiastical judges belonged, what we term the clergy.

I would advise all seminarians and all students in Bible schools to show great diffidence and take many precautions before they seek to become part of the clergy.

In Matthew 23, [MMT 23] Jesus pronounced an eightfold "Woe" over the Pharisees, the religious leaders of His day. He called them "fools and blind"; "hypocrites"; "serpents"; and a "brood of vipers."

Many consider these denunciations too violent and undiscriminating, but they were right.

The Lord does not denounce the existence of scribes or an ecclesiastical authority. But if we honestly view the characteristic vices of the clerical elite throughout the ages, especially when the Church was politically powerful, and their awful hindrance to the kind of spirituality Jesus taught, we are forced to acknowledge that He had good reason to utter these terrible woes.

Surely they can be read by the clergy – as well as the flock – only with a sense of horror, especially since the tragic history of the Church has shown the Christian clergy to be no better than the Jewish hierarchy. But why should men of God be so unreliable in spiritual matters? The reasons are many. I will name just one: The manner of recruiting clergy.

The Lord spoke to Moses, saying .."No man...who has any defect, may approach to offer the bread of his God, ...a man blind lame, who has a marred face or any limb too long, a man who has a broken foot or broken hand, or is a hunchback or a dwarf, or a man who has a defect in his eye, or eczema or scab, or is a eunuch," (LEV 21:16-20).

The Jews in Jesus' time observed such commands punctiliously. In our day there are probably few Christian clergymen with such defects, but we have not delved into the deeper meaning of such words.

Why could a man with a broken leg not be a priest? It is because all men with deformities are in danger of developing an inferiority complex and therefore of over-compensating.

God desires that His servants not have defects in their spiritual body. A minister must have the right proportions; he must walk uprightly; he must grow to a proper stature and be full of courage; he must see well spiritually. No one should be ordained in a church without the healing of his spiritual infirmities. Then he will be able to impart truth.

In a factory where fine linen was produced, the workers were told to push a button if the threads became tangled so that the master could come to correct the work.

The threads at a machine where a young girl was working became tangled. An elderly co-worker came to her rescue, but she tangled the threads even more. When the master came, she apologized, "I did the best I could." The master answered, "The best thing you could have done was to call me in the beginning."

page 82 Chapter 5: The Oracles of God

Mary Magdalene did not try to do anything. She just sat quietly at Jesus' feet and the tangled threads of her life were put in order. God said to Moses, "Tell the people to stand still." When they did, the waters of the Red Sea parted.

We must be like men possessing nothing, poor people following the poor Master in perfect quietness.

The earnest searchers for truth are strangers and pilgrims in this world, dead to its allurements and achievements. Expecting nothing from the world, they seek the truth, they love its message and revel in its beauty.

One of the conditions for obtaining truth is not to have possessions, and not to desire to have them. Jesus said, "Blessed are the poor" (MTT 5:3). In Hebrew, the verb "to have" does not exist. You cannot say, "I have a house," "I have a car," because there no concept of "having."

No one can speak the oracles of God, nor can one understand them, if he is attached to possessions.

When St. Francis of Assisi was converted, he threw his purple vestments and all his gold at his father's feet. Standing naked before him, he said, "I will no longer say, 'My father, Peter Bernardone' but, 'Our Father which art in heaven.'"

Because he had the truth, the prophet Jeremiah was taken prisoner and thrown into a muddy pit. He was not success-oriented though he spoke with great earnestness. He was content to fulfill his task, even

page 83 Chapter 5: The Cost of Truth

while knowing his warnings would not be heeded. "Success is not one of God's names," wrote the Jewish philosopher Martin Buber.

A battle over what the truth is rages constantly. In times of war, truth is the first casualty. Everyone engaged in battle proclaims what is profitable for his cause, even if it goes against the truth.

The seeker after truth, then, does not run after the advantages gained from knowing it, reading it, or proclaiming it. He is simply thirsty for truth for truth's sake.

Only when written in this sense and when read with such a spirit will this book be useful.

We can have full confidence in God, the Author of truth.

Hunter and Percy Mather, missionaries in Mongolia, were lost in the Gobi Desert and could not find their way out. One day their servant came to them and announced, "We have only two handfuls of rice."

Mather answered, "It is not so." We have two handfuls of rice and God." And he sat down and recited Psalm 23, knowing that in difficult or depressing situations, God can introduce entirely new elements to alter circumstances. When he came to the words, "You prepare a table before me...," he looked up and saw the caravan of an English explorer who was passing through this inhospitable wilderness for the first time. The Englishman gave the missionaries all they needed and brought them safely out of the desert.

The Mathers knew that it was not admissible to say, "Lord, Lord" and not do His will, neither is it admissible for God to call us "My child" and "My son" and not give us what we ask of Him. They had confidence that their prayers would be answered.

It is wise to be optimistic in one's thoughts and attitudes.

In the Sermon on the Mount, Jesus teaches us to think about God as the good Father who feeds even the birds. Now, birds have their predators, but we are enjoined to think about how God provides for them and to consider ourselves of much greater value. Jesus also suggests that we contemplate the lilies of the field, which God clothes with beauty, though they soon fade and die. We are urged to see the beauty, not the dying. It was Jesus' desire that we apply this principle of sanctified optimism to our daily lives.

In a Laurel and Hardy movie, Hardy is sick and asks his friend to fetch him a doctor. When he returns with a veterinarian, an indignant Hardy asks, "Why did you bring me a vet?" Laurel replies, "It is wrong to discriminate. A person's religion shouldn't count when you're sick."

This is only a comedy, you say. But for a great many people it just does not matter what religion they have, provided they have one. They are less choosy about religion than about food or clothes.

Religion shows me the way to Heaven, just as mathematics charts the course of a spacecraft. A small error in calculation and the astronauts would not reach the moon, nor would they return.

Wrong religion might yield some satisfaction – but it might also land us in hell. Right religion is more important than right virtue. The astronauts must first be sure that everything has been done to ensure a safe return to earth. Then they can decide which virtues to exercise.

At a party, the question was asked, "If you were shipwrecked on a lonely island, what one book would you prefer to have?" One said, "Shakespeare." Another, thinking to show himself a profound believer, said, "The Bible." The smartest was the third: "I would like a book that would teach me how to build a boat to help me get back to the mainland." Right religion is just such a boat.

When St. Paul preached in Athens, he did not say one word against sin, but only against false religion. Likewise, the Books of Kings and Chronicles in the Bible categorize the Jewish kings not according to their economics or politics, but only according to their manner of worship.

Don't accept a veterinarian as your doctor. You are human.

page 86 Chapter 5: The Oracles of God

Every author rejoices when he sees a good review of his book. After we die, God will read the book in which we have inscribed the reality of our lives and will reward us accordingly. It is important to know that we have the possibility of receiving honor and glory from our heavenly Father.

Events on this earth are recorded not only in time and space. When the Russian Communists imprisoned and killed writers and destroyed their literary works, the theologian Bulgakov wrote, "Manuscripts don't burn." There is another world that keeps "photocopies" of all things written on earth.

Over two thousand years ago some obscure Essene scribes in the Qumran community wrote books that remained sealed in jars hidden in caves until the mid-twentieth century. For century after century no one knew of their existence. Then one day an Arab boy found a jar that led to the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls that have so marvelously enriched our knowledge of the Bible.

We may feel that our lives have little value or impact. But the life apparently lost on earth will reappear in a new and greatly improved edition. Such a hope cleanses the soul.

page 87 Chapter 6: Receive Truth

Chapter 6 Receive Truth

The Bible says that Satan deceives the whole world (REV 12:9). Since we are in the world, this means that we can be deceived too. If I am obliged to seek the truth, I might fail as other very sincere seekers have failed. Wariness is an essential part of faith.

Truth is not a butter knife, but a surgeon's scalpel. One must be ready to accept the rigors of its cutting edge.

For example, it is a painful truth that religious as well as non-religious literature is afflicted with the virus of banality. Very often it makes no difference which religious book you read because they all say the same thing. Conversion stories are virtually identical. Read the first three pages of almost any book and you can usually predict, with little margin for error, the middle and the end. To the contrary, God is never banal.

page 88 Chapter 6: The Oracles of God

The French painter Chirico exhibited a large canvas on which nothing was portrayed and entitled it "Void Space." I prefer this to canvases smeared with banalities.

In another art exhibit an empty canvas was shown with the title, "The Grazing Cow." When the painter was asked7 "Where is the grass?" he said, "The cow has eaten it all up."

"And where is the cow."

"Why should the cow remain if it can no longer find grass?" was the reply.

There is more content in such mockery than in many of today's religious books. If you seek the truth, be prepared for entirely new ideas and be willing to count yourself among the very few who receive the truth. Be ready for the eventuality that you might even have to stand alone in defense of the truth.

Nowadays, many churches believe that the truth is arrived at by taking a poll (a good example is the question of the ordination of women), but truth cannot be replaced with public opinion polls. Voices should be weighed, not counted. We have to distinguish between facts and opinions.

When a journalist writes, "Such and such a house burned down," he states a fact. You can verify it by going to see the rubble and ashes. But when he writes, "The concert was bad," he expresses only an opinion. Are you sure you are accepting facts - or merely opinions7

Seek truth even if it comes from very unlikely sources. Occasionally, one can receive fragments of it from untruthful persons. Heaven sometimes speaks through the mouth of Hell. The Apostle John made special note in his gospel of the words of the Jewish high priest Caiaphas who spoke the truth about Jesus' sacrificing His life for the people (JHN 11:49,50), though Caiaphas did not mean to serve the truth. His words were correct, even prophetic.

The seeker after truth may be obliged to give up the beaten path. In the words of Robert Frost, the American poet, he may need to choose "the road less traveled by."

Bacon was the first to speak out against preconceived ideas, against people who took things for granted because authorities like Aristotle and Socrates had uttered them. He introduced the inductive method, which asks us to step from facts to teachings, instead of the accepted deductive method, in which men judged the facts according to the teachings of philosophers of old - who might be wrong.

Jesus said, "I receive testimony from no man" (see JHN 5:34). No man, apart from Jesus, is reliable enough for us to build the whole edifice of truth upon his sayings alone. Not even my own mind is good enough for that.

When Peter declared that Jesus was the Son of the living God, Jesus immediately explained to him that these thoughts did not come from Peter's own mind but were a revelation from God.

We have draped over our beds tight mosquito nets of systems, conventions, abstractions, simplifications, and superficialities. We are also victims of the media who always have a bias. They choose to be anti-this or pro-that and then fit the facts into their predetermined mold. If there is an important political upheaval, the appreciation of these very same facts may undergo a radical change and be give a new significance entirely.

When Hitler took over Germany, the whole history of the country as taught in the schools was changed. The Communists used the same tactics when they came to power. Khomeini did the same thing in Iran.

Too often, the mind does not allow the facts to speak for themselves. They are confined in a strait-jacket of preconceptions. Open the gates of your mind to new ideas. Jesus said, "Put new wine into new wineskins" (see MTT 9:17).

Schiller wrote to Korner, "It is disadvantageous to the creative activity of a soul when the intellect examines too closely the ideas that steam towards it. An idea, fantastic in isolation, might become important through the one which follows it."

Resolve that you will renounce all repugnance toward a new idea simply because it is new.

page 91 Chapter 6: Receive Truth

If you are a seeker for truth, give up any hope a quiet life. Emerson wrote, "God offers to every man his choice between truth and repose. Take whichever you please, but you can never have both."

Seek the truth, not expecting anything for your self. Remember also that the truth you find might be acceptable for a time but may prove to be insubstantial or unreliable later on.

Rembrandt is the only painter who left 90 self-portraits. He painted pitilessly the slow ruin of his own flesh. His times of skepticism and courage, melancholy and calm, appeared like a full confession before a priest. He also painted fancies about himself. He painted himself as a wealthy nobleman and a flamboyant cavalier. Though by 1640 he had become the most successful artist in Amsterdam, he knew this popularity would not last. So he painted his decline as well. After ten years, his popularity was fading. By 1652, he was bankrupt.

As you view the truth about yourself, be sincere in accepting it.

If one were to try to use Hebrew to write a book proving that man has only one life, he could not do it. In the language of the Bible, the word for life is ~haim~, a plural. (All the plural substantives end in -~im~.) In Hebrew one can only say, "I have lives." To say "I have only one life" is impossible.

page 92 Chapter 6: The Oracles of God

There is such a thing as the next life. It is next door to this present life. But we do not have to await death to understand it because faith brings a foretaste of the future into the present.

The renowned English evangelist Charles Spurgeon once asked a parishioner who was on his deathbed, "Will you go to Heaven when you die?"

"No," was the reply, to the dismay of Spurgeon.

"Have I then preached in vain? Don't you know that believers in Jesus go to Heaven at death?"

The dying man answered, "Let them do as they like. I know better. I don't go to Heaven when I die. I have already been in Heaven for thirty years."

In Tewin churchyard, Hertfordshire, England, there are four trees growing from one root. These trees have an interesting story. When Lady Ann Grimston was dying, she mocked religion, saying, "I shall not live again. It is as unlikely that I shall live again as that a tree will grow out of my body." She died and was laid in a strong marble tomb with tall iron railings to hold the masonry together. Somehow a young tree broke through the masonry and destroyed the walls of the tomb (~The Book of Knowledge~, Educational Books, London, 1921).

Atheists have a vague sense of eternal life. Pasternak, whom I have already quoted, was brought up in a godless environment, but in his renowned ~Doctor Zhivago~, he circles around the problem of eternal life:

> "So what will happen to your consciousness? ~Your~ consciousness, yours, not anyone else's. Well, what are ~you~? There's the point. Let's try to find out. What is it about you that you have always known as yourself? What are you conscious of in yourself? Your kidneys? Your liver? Your blood vessels? No. However far back you go in your memory, it is always in some external, active manifestation of yourself that you come across your identity - in the work of your hands, in your family, in other people. And now listen carefully. You in others - this reflects your soul. This is what you are. This is what your consciousness has breathed and lived on and enjoyed throughout your life - your soul, your immortality, your life in others. And what now? You began in others and you will remain in others. And what does it matter to you if later on that is called your memory? And now one last point. There is nothing to fear. There is no such thing as death. Death has nothing to do with us...."

This is how much he knew about eternal life. We know more. In no way can we conceive now the depth, the height, the breadth, the duration of God's love for us. So we cannot imagine yet what awaits us in eternal life.

We will continue to live, but not only in the memory of others. Jesus promised, "To him who overcomes, I will grant to sit with Me on My throne, as I

also overcame and sat down with My Father on His throne" (REV 3:21).

Jesus assures us that there is such a thing as a divine throne. And we can be with Him as real beings, in actuality, sitting in the place from which universes are created and ruled.

I realize that words are not the names of things but of our idea of things. The words above are surely only our idea of the things that will be. But what will be are "real things" that will give us unspeakable joy and a rich reward. Life will have meaning and fulfillment there in a way that we cannot even imagine here.

There exists eternal life with a Heaven and a hell. Many descriptions of them in the Bible are obviously figurative. For instance, Jesus says of a Jewish city, "And thou, Capernaum, which art exalted unto heaven, shalt be brought down to hell" (MTT 11:23a KJV). Now, Capernaum has never been in Heaven; that was simply a manner of describing how greatly exalted the city was. But then the descent to hell must also be only a figure of speech. Whatever the interpretation, there exists a place or state of reward and one of punishment.

We have to accept the fact that some of us shall be damned. Should we pray that no one will be damned? If lice, rats, and disease viruses could pray, that is what they would pray for. Should we pray that guinea pigs not die? Then children must die because of the many sicknesses that can be conquered only through animal experimentation. It is better not to speculate too much about the future, but rather to beware of hell.

We must know about Heaven and hell. Pascal wrote, "The immortality of the soul interests us so much, so touches our lives, that whoever remains disinterested, indifferent to it, must have lost any sentiment."

We need to decide whether we desire to go to hell, the place where men are immobilized in utter selfishness, or to Heaven, the place of utter compassion, of those willing to sacrifice themselves for the good of anyone who suffers in God's great universe if there is the slightest chance to save him.

It is obvious that as long as beings suffer, there will be no possibility of joy for the compassionate except the joy of sharing suffering and trying to be of service. Heaven is a place of love.

The selfish person does not have to die; he is dead already. Those here who are heavenly-minded already have a piece of Heaven and will be in Heaven. Death cannot abolish their existence.

If we are on the way to Heaven, the idea of death should not obsess us. Charles Spurgeon said rightly, "Remember you are immortal until your work is done. If the Lord has more witness for you to bear, you will live to bear it. Who is he that can break the vessel which the Lord intends again to use?"

During World War II, a bomb blast destroyed the beautiful stained glass windows of a European cathedral. Nobody bothered the man who gathered up the tiny fragments. After two years of assiduous labor, the stained glass windows were as good as new and could again embellish the altar.

God can give beauty for ashes, the oil of joy for mourning over the loss of loved ones, and garments of praise for the spirit of heaviness (see ISA 61:3).

Everything that has been wrong in life can be mended. We have only to throw every sin into the fire of Jesus' love. Essentially, hell is also that within us that has refused the fire of love. What dooms us to hell is only the terrible sense of ownership that claims for itself even sin. Throw sin away in the right manner and in the right place, throw it upon Jesus, and you will find yourself in Heaven.

We do not have the choice simply to disappear at death. Sigmund Freud was right when he said, "Fundamentally, nobody believes in his own death." No one could live a day, no one could ever smile, if he were truly convinced that all sense of being in this world is only to prepare a tasty meal for worms in the grave.

Even the heathen philosopher Seneca (the Emperor Nero's advisor) had intimations of immortality,

for he wrote, "As nine months in a mother's womb keeps and prepares us not for itself, but for a world to which we are alike conveyed as soon as we are able to breathe independently and survive in freedom, just so we mature during the interval from babyhood to old age for another birth. A new birth awaits us, new circumstances. The day you dread as your last is your birthday for eternity."

Life after death is contested, though without conviction, by those who have no life before death, i.e., the quality of life that nothing can destroy, not even death. Most people live lives easily disturbed by minor incidents. How could they believe otherwise than that death will destroy it? Such individuals may vegetate or hibernate, but they do not really live.

Some look down on ascetics, who practice detachment from this life in order to prepare better for the next, but the detachment practiced by the unbeliever demands even greater renunciation and more rigorous effort, because he must detach himself from a fuller, richer life in the here and now.

How much did Napoleon renounce to retain his pride! His last thought was to keep his title as emperor, as evidenced by the fact that he himself wrote the announcement of his death: "The emperor of France, Napoleon I. Bonaparte, died on...1821 after a grave and long sickness." His adjutant had to fill in the date.

page 98 Chapter 6: The Oracles of God

Marshal Ney, who was with Napoleon during the invasion of Russia, signed his last letter with the title "Duke of Moscow." Camille Cemoulins, one of the leaders of the French Revolution, asked that his tombstone bear the inscription, "Here rests a man who has great merit before France."

Who cares today about all the titles these men had? Students become bored simply having to study about them.

The great German poet Goethe, on the contrary, was always a believer in eternal life. In his last letter to Wilhelm Humboldt of March 20, 1832, two days before his death, he wrote: "The thought of death does not frighten me, because I know that our spirit is indestructible and immortal. It is like the sun. It only seems to us that it sets, when in truth it moves continually and shines always."

The French queen Marie Antoinette, beheaded during the Revolution, prayed to God in her last letter that her son might not think to avenge her death, and then she blessed the henchmen who performed the bloody deed.

We need to decide in advance in what spirit to die. We would do well not to wait until the last minute as did Voltaire, the cynical critic of the Church. Only a few hours before death he wrote, "I ardently implore God for forgiveness."

How many funerals have we attended? Some day others will attend my funeral. To prepare silently for a good death is the highest philosophy.

page 99 Chapter 6: Receive Truth

"In all you say, remember your end and you will never commit sin," (Apocryphal Wisdom of Sirach 7:36). Plato once said, "~Vera philosophia est meditatio morti~. [True philosophy is the meditation on death.]"

Savonarola said,

> "O man, the devil plays chess with you all during your life and waits for the moment of death to call 'Checkmate!' Therefore be ready. Think well about your last move. If you win at this move, you have won all; if you lose, everything has been vain. To win at this last move means to win the battle for life. Therefore > watch out for the checkmate that threatens you. Always think about death, because if you are not well prepared for this move, you lose all you obtained in this life."

Death is the opposite of life. Things contrary to each other provoke sentiments at opposite poles - but not so where love to God intervenes. We must not hate death because we love life, nor the contrary. We can love life as long as its prolongation is possible without abdication of Christian principles. We also love death, God's messenger who brings us to Him.

Paul writes, "For to me, to live is Christ, and to die is gain," (PHP 1:21).

Thus the miracle has taken place that overthrows all psychological laws. We can have the same sentiment toward opposites. It would seem logical that one who loves a friend can only hate his enemy. Not so in Christianity. We love friends and enemies, just as Jesus did.

We do not avoid the thought of death. It does not frighten us any more than life does. We look death in the face, and because it draws nearer every moment of our lives, we earnestly avoid sin.

St. Dionysus said, "No one who delves into the essence of sin wishes to commit it." Take one minute before committing any sin and say to yourself, "It can send me to hell." Then visualize the suffering and the eternal separation from a loving God. You will not sin. Think about the beauty of Heaven that you can inherit by refraining from trespasses, and you will not sin.

Savonarola also illustrates:

> "Look to the hare. When dogs pursue him, he zigzags while fleeing, to deceive the enemy, that the dogs might not catch him. He was taught to do this by nothing more than dread of the dogs. Just so, if you will think about hell as your enemy, you will not sin as you do now, but will learn to flee from it. And when you are tempted to do evil, you will say: 'Shall I lose heaven, where comfort is eternal, and go to hell where suffering is unceasing, for a little satisfaction, for a little faith, for a little property, all transitory?'

"The one who thinks seriously about death will also think about Heaven and hell. Then love for God and fear will enter the heart and these will lead toward doing good and avoiding evil.

"In the desire to beware of sin, we must have God's grace. Without it and without the light of faith no one can shield himself from sin, and therefore those who wish to live a good life and to keep themselves pure from sin must first ask God to give them light. Therefore, take this as the first rule; pray every day to God that he might give you His light.

"Christians must wear the glasses of death. ~Qualis unusquisque est, talia et sibi videntur~ - Man looks at things according to his disposition. In wrath, you see one way; in passion, in greed, in love, another. May death always be before our eyes.

"You who wish to enrich yourself through dishonest deals, remember death. Put on the glasses of death and say: In hell none of the things I have will help me. You who run after fame, remember that you will die. Put on the glasses of death and consider that all the honors of the world will profit you nothing if you enter into hell. Woman, if you have the desire for luxury, put on the glasses of death and see how not to suffer eternal condemnation because of it. Youth, when tempted to commit

sin, put on the glasses of death, remember that you will have to die, and serve Christ with a pure heart and body. Adults, put on the glasses of death and you will find that they will be very useful for the fight against all temptations."

It is good spiritual exercise to visit cemeteries and the dying. Take a skull as an object of meditation, remembering that this is what your head will one day be like.

Remember the Bible verse, "Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of His saints" (PSA 116:15). Pursue righteousness, and then don't worry. Neither future events in our earthly lives nor death can reach us at a speed of more than sixty minutes an hour. If one is a saint, death is no longer hideous.

What separates us from God, what hinders us from becoming gods (JHN 10:34), what makes death frightening is the power of sin.

In the museum of Naples one can see an old caricature: a butterfly holding reins put around the neck of a dragon. The illustration represents the philosopher Seneca, who tried to restrain through his philosophy the murderous passions of his disciple, the Emperor Nero.

Philosophy is powerless before passion. It does not restrain even the philosopher who himself is dominated by sin.

page 103 Chapter 6: Receive Truth

Evolution is impossible in any sphere without differentiation. Inequality is the motive force of the universe. Energy is manifested only where there is a difference of level. Therefore, as the laws of thermodynamics indicate, the difference between God and man had to exist, man of course being on the lower level. Sin is the stubbornness to remain at a low level.

Some people are free of certain sins. The individual who has never loved does not know the sin of jealousy. Those without the slightest bent for fantasy do not lie. The impotent do not commit adultery. But everyone fights sin of some kind and seems to do his best at times to put himself to shame.

Who could possibly enumerate all human sins?

The first man born on earth, Cain, was a murderer, but he could easily have found forgiveness.

Jewish legend says that Cain told the Lord, "Well, I killed my brother, but You are the one who put a bad impulse in me. You, the guardian of all creatures, allowed me to kill Abel. You are the one who killed him. If You had received my gifts as You did his, envy would not have arisen in me. You must have informers around You because my father and my mother are here on earth and do not know that I killed Abel. But You are in heaven. How do You know it?"

page 104 Chapter 6: The Oracles of God

The Lord said, "Fool, I carry the whole world. I made it and continue to carry it."

Cain said, "You bear the whole world and don't wish to bear my sin?"

God was in Jesus and bore the sin of the whole world, including the sin of Cain. But since the time of Cain, murder has never ceased.

In fact, sin has blighted the landscape of earth so that everything is tainted. By the time of Noah, God noted that "...the wickedness of man was great in the earth, and that every intent of the thoughts of his heart was only evil continually," (GEN 6:5).

If the dollar bills that pass through our hand could tell their story, we would shun them. How many individuals have sold body and soul for this dollar, how often has it been used for alcohol, gambling, prostitution, for a bribe, or for weapons? It is soiled with tears and blood. No beverage inebriates like money.

How ugly is envy! Men snuff out big candles so that their little lights might be seen. A story is told about an angel who came to an envious man and told him, "God has decided to grant you whatever your heart desires, but only with the proviso that the competitor whom you envy will get double what you receive."

The man was granted 24 hours' time to think. Then he said to the angel, "Gouge out one of my eyes so that my competitor may lose all his sight."

page 105 Chapter 6: Receive Truth

Man is capable of many things. He can reach for the stars or sink to the level of a brute. He can use his gifts in the service of others, as Jesus demonstrated, or bury his talents in the ground, thus polluting mother earth. He can enter Heaven by faith or sink into hell by wickedness or indifference.

Heaven or hell – this is the choice. And it must be made.

Obviously, the intelligent choice is not to sin. Human effort can obtain much, even if not everything in this regard.

Greek mythology tells about the sirens – half woman, half bird who sang songs in the Aegean Sea to entice sailors to abandon their ships and drown. Ulysses escaped the temptation by plugging his sailors' ears with wax and having himself lashed to the mast of his ship so that none of them could respond to the seductive sweetness.

Orpheus, too, passed those rocks where the sirens dwelled, but his method of escape was to play and sing with such surpassing sweetness that he drowned out the ravishing songs of the sirens and caused them to abandon their enterprise.

People today can plug their ears to the temptations of sin. They can refuse to read bad literature, watch bad movies, frequent bad places. They can sing a song more beautiful than the cheap songs of a sinful world.

But even the best succeed only partially. Most don't even try. Mankind is burdened with grave sins.

Individuals can repress remorse for a long time, though not forever. A man in Tennessee kept for nearly 70 years a secret that could have freed a Jewish factory superintendent who was convicted and later lynched for the murder of a fourteen-year-old girl. At the age of 83, Alonzo Mann signed a sworn affidavit naming a janitor at the factory and claiming that the star prosecution witness against the superintendent had threatened to kill him if he revealed the truth. His parents had also warned him not to get involved. Anti-Semitism, mob violence, and a revival of the Ku Klux Klan followed.

Everyone tries to run away from the memories of his sins, but they will entrap him, if not in this world, then in the next. We all need forgiveness, and we can have it without charge, with no strings attached. Jesus expressed the desire that those who are forgiven should in turn forgive others. But God forgives before we decide on what to do about those who have wronged us.

In ~The Brothers Karamazov~ by Dostoievsky, Ivan raises objections to forgiveness. The Soviet regime is filled with such unspeakable cruelty that people forget the horrors of the Tsarist regime. Dostoievsky tells about a Tsarist general from whose garden a child stole some apples. Incensed, he had the child stripped naked, then forced him to run and ordered dogs to give chase and tear him to pieces. Who would have condemned a Tsarist general?

Ivan says that God refuses even the Virgin Mary's prayers for the forgiveness of such wicked men until all their victims have forgiven them. How can the mother of this child forgive? The past event is irremediable. What has been done cannot be undone.

Ivan concludes:

> "I don't desire that the mother embrace the wicked person who had her son torn by dogs. She should not dare to forgive. If she wishes, she might forgive him for herself; let her forgive the immeasurable pains of a mother; but she is not entitled to forgive the suffering of her child hounded to death. She, as a mother, is not allowed to forgive the wicked person even if the child itself has forgiven."

It is simple to deal with Ivan's objections. We all commit bad deeds in our dreams. We are not bothered by them when we awake. At the resurrection, we will realize that the world from which we have come was not the real world. The man I killed in dream is alive. The girl I polluted is pure. The man from whom I stole lost nothing.

So it will be when we encounter our former acquaintances in the other world. I will have done no one any wrong; on the contrary, I have done them good.

page 108 Chapter 6: The Oracles of God

Jesus tells about a thief named Zacchaeus who had stolen from many people. He repented and restored fourfold what he had taken unjustly. The man who had lost $1,000 now had $4,000.

Jesus forgives because He is not only compassionate toward His martyred Church, but also full of understanding for the murderous general. He had been a child once and, like all children, had belonged to the Kingdom of Heaven, the kingdom of childish innocence. But He also had been badly treated by those in authority.

No one becomes a murderer just because he likes the idea. Circumstances bring some to this extremity. Even the Nazi and Communist murderers have, each of them, a story about how they became murderers.

A French proverb says, "Who understands all, forgives all." God understands everything. Therefore, everyone can obtain forgiveness.

Stalin was the illegitimate child of a nobleman, who bribed a drunkard, a cobbler, to marry his pregnant mistress. The story became known. As a child, therefore, Stalin was the object of mockery. Children teased him and called him a "bastard," at that time a very degrading appellation.

Then he went to a seminary run by the Russian church that was very chauvinistic. In the seminary of only Georgian students, the mother tongue was forbidden. Stalin was Georgian.

When Stalin was 15, his real father was killed, and he was accused of the murder. Because he was an illegitimate child, he was treated as one belonging to the lower class. For lack of sufficient evidence, he was acquitted.

He later became a member of the Social Democratic Party, as the Bolsheviks were then called. He was given the assignment to commit robberies in order to the finance the party, while his comrades spent their time propagating ideas or organizing strikes against actual injustices. During this period, he fell in love with a girl, but then she was given the assignment to become the mistress of a rich man in order to get money from him for the party. The next day she hanged herself and so on and on his story goes.

We surely deplore Stalin's cruelty toward his victims, but a knowledge of his background helps us understand his moral deviations and excesses. They can be forgiven, especially since we believe in a resurrection in which the innocent will be rewarded for what they suffered with love and faith.

The feelings of martyrs in Heaven must be ambivalent. They feel that their sufferings must be avenged (REV 6:9,10), but would they have had such shining crowns and the white garments of conquerors if it had not been for those who martyred them?

There is a place for forgiveness.

page 110 Chapter 6: The Oracles of God

An important question was posed by Simon Wiesenthal in his book ~The Sunflower~. Wiesenthal is a Jew who suffered persecution under the Nazis and afterwards dedicated his life to hunting those suspected of Nazi war crimes. (Why only Nazi war crimes? The Soviets and the Western allies also committed crimes.)

He had worked during World War II as a slave laborer in Poland doing repairs in a hospital. A nurse called him to the deathbed of a Nazi officer who, with great remorse, told him this story.

He confessed to Wiesenthal that he had been among those who crammed many Jews into a house together, including women and children. Inflammable canisters were set inside, and then the Nazis tossed in grenades that exploded, causing a conflagration.

An old Jew jumped from a window with a little child whose eyes he covered. His garments were aflame. This officer shot them both.

A few days later, he found himself on the battle-front with an order to attack. As the Russian soldiers advanced, he saw coming toward him the burning Jew and the child and said to himself, "I will not shoot at them the second time." In that moment a grenade exploded near him, mortally wounding him.

Before dying, he had only one desire that he had communicated to the nurse: a Jew should tell him he was forgiven. Wiesenthal heard the confession of the

repentant Nazi officer but left the room in silence. He did not say "I forgive."

Since then over forty years have passed, but Wiesenthal has not found peace of heart. He goes from person to person asking, "Did I do right not to say a word of forgiveness? Had I the right to forgive in the name of the Jewish people?" – a question that could also be inverted: "Had I the right to refuse forgiveness in the name of the Jewish people?"

Should he have forgiven? Have the victims of this Nazi officer no right to be avenged, with at least the satisfaction of knowing that he would not die with the serenity of a forgiven man?

Can we be forgiven so easily for all our sins? Can God afford to be so nice? Can man?

Should a mother forgive the one who ordered dogs to maul her child to death? Is she authorized to do so? Who authorized her? The innocent child perhaps?

But again, who gives her the right to be cruel to the murderer and to refuse forgiveness? Does she know how the murdered child thinks about the matter in the next world where he is with Jesus? Jesus forgave those who crucified Him. Is it forbidden to be more than human, far beyond the usual run of men? Is it forbidden to be more than human, better than the best?

Rabbi Hillel advised that we judge no one until we have been in his situation. But have the innocent necessarily been in the situation of murderers or other kinds of vile sinners?

I prefer the attitude of Mrs. Rathenau to Wiesenthal's. Her husband had been a Jew and served as the finance minister of Germany in the twenties. An anti-Semite killed him only because he was Jewish. The mother of the murderer was in desperation over the crime her son had committed. Mrs. Rathenau, wife of the victim, a Christian herself, went to comfort her. She also visited the murderer in jail and brought him to Christ.

Many years later, the murderer was in a high command position in the German army in Marseille, during the Nazi occupation of France. He did his utmost to help Jews escape from France and thereby saved the lives of a great multitude. In the end he was discovered. The former anti-Semite murderer was executed for having been a savior of Jews.

***

Full forgiveness and forgetfulness of wrongs endured are both possible. Depth psychology asserts there is no forgetting, but only de-actualization. However, since through the new birth man becomes a new creature, the past is buried, never to be resurrected. Therefore, nothing divides a person from the one who has hurt him the most. Paul became a respected apostle in the community of early Christians, many of whom he had sentenced to death while persuading others to renounce their faith.

page 113 Chapter 6: Receive Truth

There can be no limit to forgiveness, just as there can be no degree of honesty or virginity. A girl cannot be half-pregnant. Forgiveness is total or it is not forgiveness.

The average man identifies with either the murderer or the victim. Christians can identify with both and love both. In my own case, I always pray for both parties.

The murderer, by killing, has broken a divine law: "Do not kill." Is this law an absolute? The same God ordered the extermination of the Canaanites and the execution of criminals. What if the young German SS officer had been taught to consider the Jews as reprehensible as the Jews in Joshua's time considered the Canaanites?

Why should it have been compulsory for the SS officer to obey the law against killing if we disregard another law of the same God that we must forgive those who trespass against us? The conscience of every person can err. There exist depths in men that attract some to crime, others to sainthood, depths that can also make a criminal become a saint (what every criminal becomes who contritely confesses his sins) and a saint a criminal that is beyond our comprehension. Since every man is a riddle to his fellow man, the best recourse is not to judge but to be helpful.

If Jews will not forgive the death of six million at the hands of the Nazis, neither should the blacks forgive the enslavement of millions who perished in

slave hunts in Africa, and other millions brought to America by the slave-traders; Armenians and Greeks should not forget the Turkish massacres; Arabs should not forget their losses during the establishment of Israel; other nations should not forget the Communist mass murders; Protestants should not forgive the Catholics nor Catholics the Protestants; the North and the South should not forget the thousands who died in the fratricidal American Civil War; the Americans should not forget Bataan, nor the Japanese Hiroshima – one could multiply instances of cruelty and barbarism ad nauseam.

If no one could forgive and no one forget, where would we all be? Nations, religions, and alliances exist only through the grace of forgiving and forgetting even heinous crimes.

Spinoza once wrote cynically, "Everyone has as much right as he has might." Men may have the might to kill, but not the right. We recognize only the right to forgive and also to ask forgiveness.

page 115 Chapter 7: Endure the Pain of Truth

Chapter 7

Endure the Pain of Truth

A legend says that Jesus was once seated at a banquet in Heaven with His apostles. One place was empty. Jesus had not yet pronounced the blessing, so no one had started eating. At a certain moment, Judas entered the room. Jesus received him as a friend and said, "I have waited for you. Now the meal can begin."

I dreamed one night that I asked Mussolini and some other dictators forgiveness for the fact that I do not have a yielding and humble character, that I do not do gladly what others demand of me and thus oblige them to dictate to me. In my dream, in the measure to which I asked forgiveness, the dictators ceased to exist. I find this dream very significant.

Jesus was modest in His demands but rich in His example. In the Sermon on the Mount, He spoke only about forgiving the one who gives you a slap, or takes away your coat, or compels you to do forced labor. But He Himself forgave Caiaphas, Pilate, and His executioners when He said on the cross, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do" (LUK 23:34).

It is well to follow not only His words but also His example, perhaps even to surpass it, as He suggests in His matchless discourse at the Last Supper (JHN 14:12). God is love. We must ~be~ love, not only exercise it.

I have known no believer who was not at some time or other troubled in his faith by the fact of pain. Why should a good God have ordained pain? "Pain is a more terrible lord of mankind than even death itself," wrote Albert Schweitzer.

However, we are told that the main function of pain is to signal the body of any harm to its tissues. We need such signals, admittedly, but could we not do with something less traumatic?

Experience has shown that what is not painful does not work. We do harm to our bodies with our smoking, drinking, poor eating habits, and promiscuity. We ourselves cause our own cancer and heart disease, but because we feel no pain before it is too late, we continue these suicidal practices. Pain is a sign of the intense desire of God to do us good.

If not for pain, we would undoubtedly disregard many dangers to the organism and would compromise ourselves still further. The inability to sense pain is one of the horrors of leprosy. But most of us see pain only as an enemy, and so we consume annually thousands of tons of pain-killers.

Muslims attribute pain to fate, Kismet; Hindus to karma, the result of sin in past incarnation; other Middle Easterners to the evil eye. Pain has meaning. By taking pills, our medicated society deprives itself of the discovery of meaning.

Pain can also be borne courageously; it can be faced. Societies that flee pain in all circumstances turn to horror movies and violence to compensate. Jesus at the cross refused an anesthetic.

Try the experiment of fixing a short time for bearing pain without an analgesic or sorrow without a tranquilizer. Remember that Rachel refused comfort (MTT 2:18).

A man sleeping on the ground with his mouth open had a snake crawl down his throat. Another man who witnessed the event shook him awake and vigorously pounded him on the back again and again to make him vomit. The first man understandably resented what he considered an unjustified attack and responded violently. When finally he vomited up the snake, he had his explanation and complained, "Why didn't you tell me what you were doing?"

The reply was simple: "You were not receptive to arguments at that point. A person in that predicament needs a kick, not an explanation!"

page 118 Chapter 7: The Oracles of God

If God permits suffering, we can be sure it is more painful for Him who permits it than for us who bear it. If we had His wisdom and sought our salvation as passionately as He seeks it for us, we would choose to pass through the very sufferings that afflict us. Therefore, believers bear with understanding the sufferings imposed upon them.

In ~The Fathers of the Desert~ appears the story of a monk well versed in fasting and asceticism who could not resist the thought of whoredom. With this in mind, he went to Jericho to fulfill his desires, but when he approached the prostitute, he discovered that he was covered with leprosy. Gratefully, he returned to the monastery praising God:" Glory be to Thee, O God, that You gave me this punishment to save my soul."

Some believers choose voluntary sufferings. In the ~Zohar~, an ancient book of the Jewish ~Kabbalah~, it is written, "Why did Jacob choose to work seven years for Rachel and not only a few months?" The reply is, "So that when at last he came to her, he would be as it were the Heaven to her earth."

Suffering works. Exile changed the Fascist dictator Mussolini into a Christian. Dostoievsky, sentenced to death in his youth and pardoned when he was already on the gallows, said that in the moment when he slipped from the noose around his neck, he had an illumination: "As an atheist I had been in prison even when I was free, but now jail has become for me the gate to freedom."

page 119 Chapter 7: Endure the Pain of Truth

Dostoievsky remained sick for the rest of his life. God must have had a purpose in this because as a result he created works of art from the sickness of the world in his books ~The Idiot~, ~The Demons~, ~Crime and Punishment~, and so on.

Someday we too may learn that there was a reason for the sufferings we have endured.

An artist painted a bad conscience as a galloping horse surrounded by wasps and mosquitoes. The caption read, "Your running is in vain."

Augustine said it in words, "A man bothered by his conscience is his own punishment. A man can run away from his enemies, but where can he find refuge from himself?"

Regrets alone do not help a troubled conscience. The mind that decides to sin then decides to regret, but conscience is not assuaged. Judas regretted profoundly that he had sold his Lord. Then the same mind reverted to despair and soon decided on suicide.

Repentance is something entirely different. In repentance, one ignores the mind that Luther called "the beast reason, whose eyes should be gouged out, the devil's bride, a lovely whore." He said to reason:

> "Listen, you have lied to me often and in weighty matters in which it was not your business to interfere. You have a limited low-ranking job in matters which do not involve religion, > morals, ultimate truth. Stick to your menial work. For overstepping your attributes, I give you the boot. Out! Henceforth, the mind of Christ will be my mind, I will not be taught anymore to sin, neither to lose my time in vain regrets, nor ever to despair."

This is the change that takes place at the new birth. With such an attitude, even after the betrayal, Judas would have been spared his tragic fate. Saul of Tarsus, the great persecutor of Christians who became the apostle Paul, is an example of what can happen to a person who truly repents.

If Judas had been born again after the betrayal, he would be known today as St. Judas Iscariot. He could have lived out his life and died with peace, understanding that he had been sacrificed on the altar of gathering precious experiences for the Church, just like the man who was born blind with all the ensuing suffering, for no other purpose than that "the works of God should be revealed in him" (JHN 9:3).

***

Truth can be attained only by individuals who have been born again. No one who assumes false names and titles can be considered a gentleman. We bear the name of Christians. Are we entitled to it? Jesus said we must be born again. Have we passed through the new birth? Without this we are fake Christians.

page 121 Chapter 7: Endure the Pain of Truth

Nothing except the new birth can enable us to get to Heaven. No amount of religiosity can cleanse us of our sins.

A Samaritan woman asked Jesus some theological questions. His response was, "Go get your husband and bring him here." The man whom she called her husband really belonged to another woman. And this was not her first sin. She had known many men, from whom she had received pleasure or money. Certainly she had not fulfilled the aim for which God brings individuals together to help one another become like Him.

This woman did not need theology. She was lost. And it made no difference whether she worshiped according to the Samaritan or Jewish religion.

No good intention helps. If a person has ink on his fingers, his decision to wash himself will not make him clean. Only the act of washing removes the stain. We need the washing of the new birth. Therefore we extend to all people everywhere the warning, "You must be born again."

A man who was eating his lunch in a restaurant was approached by another man from a nearby table, who said, "Sir, may I tell you something?"

The first man replied, "I see by your face that you mean serious business. I want to enjoy my dinner, so kindly leave me alone." After finishing his ample meal, he turned to his neighbor: "I did not mean to be rude, but I was very hungry. Now you can tell me what you had on your mind."

The other responded, "I'm sorry, but it's too late. I only wanted to tell you that you had put your overcoat on a chair too near the stove. By now the heat has burned a large hole in it."

Most people do not wish to be disturbed by serious talk about what follows death and about the need for a new birth in order to enter Heaven. The loss is theirs! After death, they will have to face either Heaven or hell. And "unless one is born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God" (JHN 3:3).

A monk always complained to his abbot about the evils committed by his brethren. Exasperated, the abbot advised him to go on a pilgrimage to Israel and bathe in the river Jordan. "But," he told the monk. "when you bathe, you should wear around your neck a garland of onions, garlic and green peppers." The monk returned from the pilgrimage but was still the same man, delighting in slandering others.

The abbot asked him, "Did you bathe in the Jordan?"

"Yes."

"Did you wear the garland of onions, garlic, and green peppers?"

"Yes, though I saw no sense in doing so."

"Please bite into the onion and the garlic." They were bad-tasting, strong and burned his mouth.

"Now bite into the pepper." The monk spat after having done so. Then the abbot said, "You see, bathing onions and peppers in the Jordan does not help. Neither do the rituals to which you subject yourself."

Nothing helps except becoming an entirely new creature who yields up all his self-will. The newborn man is compared by Jesus to the wind that blows in different directions, simply fulfilling the laws of its nature (JHN 3:8).

Cromwell said, "The man who does not know where he is going, goes the farthest." The Bible asks, "Who is blind but My servant?" (ISA 42:19). Abraham forsook his surroundings to follow God to a country that would be shown to him. He was not told where it would be. The newborn man is like an object without its own will, like clay in the hands of the Divine Potter.

Before becoming a man, Jesus was a babe; and before that an embryo; before that a divinely fertilized ovum; before that "the holy thing" (LUK 1:35); a conglomerate of molecules that needed to be organized into a living cell.

In 1CO 1:27, it is written that God chose not men, but certain "things" to be his representatives in the world, i.e., men without self-will, like inanimate objects, ready to be used. This is the result of the new birth.

A kingdom was waiting to have Saul proclaimed as king, but he (unaware of the occasion) was seeking asses. The most beautiful kingdom, the kingdom of Heaven, is awaiting us, on condition of our being born again. Yet we run after trifles.

A king who had a rebellious son sent him into exile. As a result, the son suffered many years of deprivation and even hunger. In the end, the king had compassion on his son, forgave him, and sent emissaries to bring him back. Their instructions were, "Give him whatever he desires." When the prince saw them, he said only, "Give me something good to eat." He could have had his position in the palace restored to him, but he yearned only after a loaf of bread and butter.

We are all in the same situation. Through the new birth, we can become God's children, yet even when we talk with God's messengers, we settle for trivial things.

Express your desire for the new birth today and confess publicly that you belong to Christ. Then your natural desire to be thought consistent will enable you to follow through and investigate Jesus' teachings, and He will give you the grace of being born again.

God's great gift is the possibility of being born again. The new birth does more than purify from sin; it deifies men.

The newborn man begins to live and act as if he had seen paradise before his eyes. Then slowly the baptism of action drives away the dark clouds that veil Heaven, and as clearly as he sees material things, he gains the intuition of invisible powers because this invisible world will become real.

A newborn man is a man who has found God, and all at once the vague, distant notion of the Godhead is exchanged for a personal, sensible, present, and living reality. Here resides the distinction between repentance and regret.

My five-year-old grandson Alex, on being told that he had to go to the doctor's office, asked, "What for?"

"For the cough."

Later, he cheerfully reported to me, "They were wrong to take me to the doctor. He doesn't cough."

When we have sins, problems, and sorrows, pastors show us the way to Jesus, the great Physician. We return from Him radiant: "He is all right. He does not cough. He has none of our problems and unrest."

Jesus met a persecutor of Christians, a multiple murderer and blasphemer, on the road to Damascus. He asked Saul of Tarsus nothing about his state of mind. He did not examine him, X-ray him, inquire about what he had done, come up with a diagnosis, or give a prescription. Jesus simply revealed Himself in the glory of His resurrection. That was all. Then Saul knew, "The doctor does not cough. There is nothing wrong with Jesus. He is healthy, alive, powerful, loving. Far from telling me I must be hospitalized, He gives me great and noble tasks to perform."

page 126 Chapter 7: The Oracles of God

This is the story when a soul has the privilege of meeting Jesus directly. But rarely does this happen. Usually, we meet Him through our Christian leaders and authors of religious books - all Christ's underlings. These surrogates do not always grasp the deep meaning of Jesus' parable of the lost sheep:

> What man of you, having a hundred sheep, if loses one of them, does not leave the ninety-nine in the wilderness, and go after the one which is lost until he finds it? And when he has found it, he lays it on his shoulders, rejoicing. And when > he comes home, he calls together his friends > and neighbors, saying to them, "Rejoice with > me, for I have found my sheep which was lost!"

> I say to you that likewise there will be more joy > in heaven over one sinner who repents than > over ninety-nine just persons who need no > repentance (LUK 15:4-7).

When little Alex heard this story and was asked what he understood from it, he replied, "The shepherd should have been more careful not to lose the sheep."

Holding revival meetings over and over is not enough. In fact, why should Christian "patients" have to be revived at all? Once they are newborn in the faith, why should they get lost?

Luther, drastic as usual in his expressions, when asked, "Whom can we call a true Christian?" replied,

"Whoever has once entered a church. That nothing came of it is not his fault, but that of the pastor."

According to the apostle Paul, "God Himself gave some to be pastors and teachers" (EPH 4:11). Why? If Christ is always with His Church, what is the purpose of subsidiary pastors?

One might as well ask why, when electricity is available everywhere, a lamp is needed to give light. Electricity has to have a focal point at which to manifest itself. The pastor is the focal point through whom Christ shows His beauty.

But the pastor should represent Christ faithfully. It is not enough for him to be a good pastor; he must be an excellent one. Observing him, people should be able to conclude, "the doctor does not cough. I don't have to worry."

A child was asked, "What is Sunday school for?" He replied, "To make children good so they can be resurrected." This is the pastor's occupation. He is a maker of saints, not a maker of sermons, and even less of money.

Who are the pastors one can trust? In 1179, at the third Lateran Council, the papacy decided to uproot heretics. As a result, the Albigenses, the Waldenses, and later the Hussites were tortured and killed by the thousands. Many were killed merely for possessing a Bible.

page 128 Chapter 7: The Oracles of God

Pope Pius V [Pius IV, probably? - Dido, 12/17/01] was canonized, though the breviary calls him "the ruthless inquisitor." In the same breviary, the lesson for May 30 praised King Ferdinand II of Castile for his zeal against heretics. He himself, eager to perform good deeds, carried the wood for the stakes on which heretics were burned.

Ironically, the Protestant reformers often echoed the sentiments of the Catholics they opposed. Calvin wrote:

> "We should define the power wherewith the priests of the church should be invested, seeing that they are put to administer, to proclaim and to preach the Divine Word. Their duty is to dare everything and to compel all the big and highly situated in this world to bow before the majesty of the Almighty God and to serve Him. It is given to them to command everyone from the highest to the most common. It is their duty to build the Kingdom of God and to destroy the wolves. They have to reprove and to give advice to those who listen; to accuse and to destroy the adversaries. They can bind and loose; they can throw lightning and thunder; but all these things in conformity with the Word of God."

Calvin meant just that. He too burned at the stake those with whom he disagreed. We cannot walk in the footsteps of Catholic inquisitors or Protestant persecutors. To whom then should we go?

page 129 Chapter 7: Endure the Pain of Truth

Jesus said, "I will build my church." He used the future tense. He did not say when He would have a church worthy to be called His. Perhaps the churches of today are only the scaffolding for building that one church.

A few have recognized it and have already come to the "church of the firstborn who are registered: in heaven" (HEB 12:23). Seek this church! Seek it within the churches to which you belong!

At a certain moment Jesus gave to Simon a new name – Peter. His true name from then on was the one Jesus had given him, not the one he was known by. He thought of himself as Peter; the past of a certain Simon no longer belonged to him.

We too have to look upon ourselves as Jesus does. We have to call ourselves by the names He gave us: "children of God," "elect," "much beloved," and "apostles."

At a certain point, Simon declared, "I am something entirely different from what I have been. I am not Simon but Peter. When you call 'Simon,' I will not turn my head." If he were here today, he would probably change the name on his driver's license.

The whole world – as well as we ourselves – realizes we are a Church torn asunder by schisms and heresies, hostilities and iniquities, soiled by the blood of innocents shed by fellow Christians.

Neither are we what the world calls us, or what we ourselves think we are. After meeting Jesus, we were called His "fair bride," "a glorious church, not having spot or wrinkle, or any such thing" (EPH 5:27). How is this possible? We simply become through His transforming power, what He says we are, though the world may see us differently and we may have misgivings.

We are one because He says so. Peter is Peter and not Simon. Those who can accept this truth are on their way to the true Church.

Christians are often dissatisfied with their churches and pastors. In some cases, the inner turmoil of the churches has become so great that they ceased to exist.

Bear this patiently. All men defend the institutions of which they are a part, especially if they created them. God allowed His temple, every detail of which He had designed, to be destroyed. The destruction of the temple was a test revealing that His truth remains unaffected by external events, no matter how tragic. The Church will survive no matter what happens to your congregation.

My former church in Bucharest, Romania, has been bulldozed by the Communists, but I constantly receive testimonies showing that what was previously sown within its walls continues to bear fruit.

The Jews worshiped God before they had the wilderness tabernacle. Their own tents, and before this the shacks in which they lived as slaves in Egypt,

served as places of worship. Our homes, too, should be churches.

As for the Church itself, why should we look so much to Christian leaders? Have you ever tried to obtain spiritual edification from the janitor of your church? Do you wonder about the propriety of such a question? Well, the Bible provides long lists of priests and singers, but then adds a list of "gatekeepers," who had "duties just like their brethren, to serve in the house of the Lord," (1CH 26:12).

No history book of any other nation or religion would have included such a list. What were the names of the servants of George Washington and of the lackeys in Buckingham Palace? In what church history will you find the names of the caretakers who served in the great cathedrals?

We can learn from caretakers and so can pastors. Wesley, on entering the pulpit one morning, said in dismay, "I am lost; I left my sermon at home."

The janitor asked him, "Do you remember at least what it was about?"

"Yes, it was about trusting God."

"Parson, trust God to help you deliver a sermon without notes." After this, Wesley never again used notes. If the pastor does not know his sermon, how will the audience learn it?

Do not look down on pastors who make but a small contribution to the advancement of the

page 132 Chapter 7: The Oracles of God

Church. During the last two thousand years, millions of men have been educated in Christianity, but this was not the work of great preachers or exceptional pastors. By and large, the average and less than average pastors did the job. For this we should be grateful. Learn truth from them.

At the Last Supper, the Lord told His disciples that one of them was a traitor. I have witnessed such scenes often in the underground churches. On these occasions each one begins to guess which of those around him might be the evil man. But the first apostles did otherwise.

None of them thought evil of his brother. Each one, knowing the potential for betrayal that lay hidden in his own heart, asked himself, "Am I not the traitor?" Each knew his own readiness to sell even the One he loved most. Therefore the apostles each asked that most unusual question, "Lord, is it I?" (MTT 26:22)

In my church there was a lady who always congratulated me after every sermon, adding to her praise this comment: "Your sermon was just right for Sister So-and-so." One Sunday, weary of not getting through to her, I mentioned from the pulpit that there are those who always apply the sermons to others, instead of drawing lessons for themselves. Afterwards, I was again congratulated by the same person: "A wonderful sermon! It just suited Mr. So-and-so."

page 133 Chapter 7: Endure the Pain of Truth

Let us give up our preoccupation with looking for the speck in a brother's eye and recognize the beam in our own (MTT 7:4).

We often meet people who appear to be perfect gentlemen. We may know of no great sin they have committed, and they may consider themselves upstanding citizens, moral in every way. But is anyone a true gentleman if he regards everyone but his own father?

God is our heavenly Father, and we owe to Him our whole life. We are guests in His world and enjoy the blessings He confers on us. We usually behave well when we are guests in another's home, but somehow we neglect to thank God for the multitude of things He gives us, and often we don't behave well among His other children.

How to worship God is not a big problem. We may express our gratitude by fulfilling the purpose for which we were created.

Is a man who does not pay his debts - assuming he is able - a gentleman? Yet Christians have a prior debt. The apostle Paul describes the state of us all when he writes, "I am a debtor both to Greeks and to barbarians, both to wise and to unwise" (ROM 1:14). As Christians, we are all debtors who owe everyone the greatest opportunity to gain salvation. Do we fulfill this duty?

page 134 Chapter 7: The Oracles of God

Christians must show great determination in this enterprise. If necessary, they must be willing to give their lives that others may come to a knowledge of Christ and be converted. Grateful for their own salvation, and for inner peace, and for the promise of a future life, they are concerned about the salvation of the rest of the world and look for opportunities to serve their fellows.

The world of today is not unbelieving, but ignorant. It includes the heathen, the Jews, those under Communism who are taught atheism, and those who are Christians in name only. In addition, every seventh inhabitant of the earth is a Muslim. How many of these have ever read a Bible or heard an intelligent and loving sermon? Therefore, every one of us must become a missionary.

At a Christian conference in Switzerland, an old man gave his testimony. He told how he had been on the Titanic, which went down in the north Atlantic in 1912 with some 2,200 passengers on board. Among the 700 who survived, he found himself struggling in the cold sea water trying to stay afloat.

Near him swam the American evangelist Harper, who asked him, "Are you saved? Think about your soul." With this, Harper sank under a wave of the icy sea, then after a few seconds reappeared. Again he asked, "Are you prepared to appear before the Lord?"

The man replied, "I don't know how to get saved."

page 135 Chapter 7: Endure the Pain of Truth

"Believe in the Lord Jesus. His blood cleanses from all sins."

"These were his last words," continued the old man. "He succumbed to the rigors of the icy Atlantic. A boat then picked me up. I am Harper's last convert."

When we think about men like this evangelist, we have to be ashamed to call ourselves Christians.

The initial work of Christian missions among the Matacos and Tobas in Argentina was very difficult. For one thing, the missionaries had to walk fifty miles from their station through the jungle to get to these tribes.

One of their first converts was an Indian who had come ornamented with feathers. In his hand he had a heavy stick with which he had just killed his mother. (It was the custom to kill the dying to free them from evil spirits.) In order to obtain their magical powers, witch doctors ate firstborn children. Yet such men were converted, and some even became evangelists.

William Carey was inflamed for missionary work by reading about Captain Cooke's journeys. He asked himself, "If others can rise so much out of a spirit of adventure or in the desire to serve science, why should we not do the same in the service of Christ?"

In his cobbler shop he put a map on the wall and noted what he knew about the religions of different peoples. He constantly had on his mind the millions who are lost.

As an assistant preacher in a small Baptist community, he attended a church conference and asked whether the commandment to preach to all nations was still binding. He was not allowed to continue. He was called "a miserable enthusiast."

Later, Carey went to India where he proved to be a genius of languages. It was he who translated the New Testament into Bengali. Eventually he was to give to the people of India the New Testament in thirty-four languages.

This cobbler, Carey, became a professor of Oriental languages at the University of Calcutta. He wrote grammars and dictionaries in many Indian dialects. He was also a botanist and introduced to India many new agricultural and gardening methods. He was a creator of schools, a teacher of native evangelists.

Because of his influence, the savage habit of throwing children to crocodiles at religious festivals in Gango-Sangor ceased, as did the burning of widows and their being buried alive with their dead husbands. He also took care of lepers.

When he was on his deathbed, one of those standing in the room praised Carey. His last words were, "You have spoken about Dr. Carey. When I am gone,

page 137 Chapter 7: Endure the Pain of Truth

don't speak about Carey but about Carey's Savior." He himself chose the epitaph for his grave: "A miserable worm who appeals to Your compassion."

John Williams at the age of twenty went to preach in the islands of the Pacific. Traveling in a small ship, he went to Raratonga, the Samoa Islands, and Malaysia. Everywhere he went he brought people to Christ and established churches. Idolatry and polygamy disappeared, and many islands became sanctuaries full of the praises of God. Within a circumference of two thousand miles not one island remained without a church. In 1839 on the island of Erromanga, Williams was killed by cannibals after having brought 30,000 souls to Christ.

John Paton came in Williams' place to these volcanic islands. At first he was frightened by the blood-thirsty savages. Because of the influence of traders, they hated the whites who brought new sicknesses to their people. In their culture, a man was free to kill his wife if he no longer favored her, and the killing of children was common among them. They also believed in witchcraft. But with the gospel message Paton conquered the New Hebrides for Christ.

John Elliot, the first missionary to the American Indians in the seventeenth century, was also the first to translate the Bible into a Native American language. Thus the first Bible printed in the United States was for Native American Indians. To do so, he also gave them a written language and a grammar.

page 138 Chapter 7: The Oracles of God

At the age of eighty he still went to visit them in the forests.

David Brainerd, his successor, went to live with Indians in their savagery, sleeping on straw in a wood hut. The Dutch colonists mocked him, but he had only one wish - to win souls for Christ.

He did win souls, but not only among the Indians. Henry Martin read his diary and said to himself, "Now I will spend my life for God." He became the pioneer missionary among Mohammedans.

In Germany Count Zinzendorf, when he was very young, stood before a picture of the crucified Jesus in the Dusseldorf Art Gallery. The picture bore the caption: "This I have done for you. What are you doing for Me?" Zinzendorf could not forget that question. He said, "A faith that does nothing is just chatter." He formed the community of Moravians, which has as its slogan, "The Saviour deserves everything." Missionaries from this community went to Greenland, to the Indians, and to the blacks.

Zinzendorf asked Sorensen, a person from his community, "Would you be willing to go to Labrador as a missionary?" Sorensen answered, "I would go tomorrow if I could get a pair of shoes." Some of the missionaries were killed by the Eskimos, but others followed. Soon the Moravians had missionary activity in twenty-eight countries.

In 1740, missionary Rauch went to the Mohican Indians. Cioop, one of his converts, later said, "First we had a preacher coming to us who told us only that there is a God. We finished with him; we had known that. Another told us, 'Don't lie, don't steal, don't get drunk.' We answered him, 'Go and tell it to the white faces. They do these things more than we do.' But then Rauch came. He spoke to us about the love of God shown in the sacrifice of Jesus, and then he went to sleep quietly in my bed, not fearing that I might kill him. So I was won for Christ."

Allen Gardiner (1794-1851) went as a missionary to Patagonia. Darwin had visited the area and believed that the Patagonians were the link uniting man and ape. They had a very low forehead, and their thoughts and habits were debased. But within two decades the missionaries changed everything. Darwin, after revisiting the country, said, "I always believed that civilizing the Japanese was the greatest miracle of history. Now I am convinced that what the missionaries have done in Patagonia by civilizing the natives is at least as wonderful." And he became one of the regular contributors to their Christian mission. Evolutionists today could follow his example!

In recounting these adventures for God, we walk on holy ground; we should take off our shoes.

We remember Henry Thomas, one of the first missionaries to Korea. While he traveled upriver in a boat, stopping here and there to preach, the natives attacked him from the shore with spears. Wounded,

he jumped into the water, and in one last effort swam to shore holding up a parcel of gospels in his hand that he threw into the hands of the murderers. His wound was fatal and he drowned. Some of his attackers were converted by reading these very gospels.

We remember Bishop Hannington of Uganda who was eaten by cannibals. While he was being taken to the place of execution, he loudly repeated over and over to himself, "Love your enemies. Pray for those who wrong you. Do good to those who do you evil." When the news of his death reached Britain, two of his sons decided to go as missionaries in his place and had the privilege of baptizing and later giving holy communion to those who had eaten their father.

We think about Devasagayan, a native of India. Because he preached the gospel, he was bound to an ox and led from one village to another where the inhabitants beat him. They put around his bare neck a garland of poisonous plants that pricked the skin. Then they put pepper in his open wounds. When one person expressed compassion for the chains he had to wear, he kissed the man and said, "To me they are like beads of pearls." Devasagayan was a man who could not read, but when the passion of Christ was read to him he said, "O Lord, how bad my life has been in comparison with Yours. How can I live well when You suffer?" His last words were, "Lord Jesus, save me."

page 141 Chapter 7: Endure the Pain of Truth

During the war, the Japanese burned alive, crucified, and disemboweled Christians, then hanged them head down. They considered Christ to be the God of the Americans. For many blacks, Jesus is the God of the whites; for Jews, He is the God of the antiSemites; for Communists, He is the God of the capitalists. Missionaries are willing to face all these prejudices as they fulfill Christ's commandment, "Make disciples of all nations."

Strangely, missionaries have also had to fight with some of the churches. Until recently there were still American churches where blacks were not welcome. Mahatma Gandhi did not become a Christian because, being colored, he was not allowed to enter a church in South Africa.

In Romania the synod of the Orthodox church decreed during Nazi times that they would not baptize Jews. In some Lutheran churches, gypsy Christians were given holy communion in a separate cup from that of other believers.

Missionaries have to overcome difficulties created not only by their avowed enemies, but also by their churches. But it still behooves every Christian to be a missionary.

The commandment to go and teach all nations is not given only to professional missionaries. In the Scriptures, we read that it was given to men without schooling: "Now when they saw the boldness of Peter and John, and perceived that they were uneducated and untrained men, they marveled. And they realized that they had been with Jesus" (ACT 4:13). Jesus enjoined a Galilean who had just been healed of demon possession to go and proclaim the Kingdom of God.

God asks today, as He did in ISA 6:8, "Whom shall I send?" The answer is still, "Lord, send me."

Chapter 8

Proclaim the Truth

The Jewish prayer book contains the following petition: "Lord of the universe, you have commanded that we bring certain sacrifices at certain times and that the priests when they serve, and the Levites in their job, and the children of Israel, should stand in a certain place. But because of our unrighteousness, the Temple is destroyed now, the perpetual sacrifices ceased, and we have neither a priest serving, nor Levites in their office. Therefore may it be pleasant, O Lord, our God, and God of our fathers, that the words of our lips might be accepted before you as if we had brought the perpetual sacrifice and were standing on the chosen place." There is deep meaning in such a prayer.

The religious situation among Christians is in a sense similar to that of the Jews. Ideally, Christ the teacher continues His existence in the Church. St. Augustine said, "Christ and the church are one and

page 144 Chapter 8: The Oracles of God

the same person." Bossuet wrote, "The church is Jesus Christ spread out and communicated." These sayings remain valid because the treasure of truth possessed by the Church is tremendous.

But tragically much of modern theology could be called the gospel according to Pilate or according to Judas. In Communist countries many of the clergy played treacherous roles and were denouncers of their brethren.

Who are the trustworthy pastors? This is a question that Jesus asks too: "Who then is a faithful and wise servant, whom his master made ruler over his household, to give them food in due season?" (MTT 24:45).

After putting the question, the greatest Teacher gives no answer. There is just a question mark. In the original manuscripts even the question mark is missing.

Let us also live without demanding an answer. One cannot feed his soul with questions. Know that you need good teachers in the Church. Know that they are scarce. Beware of false teachers and trust in God. The right teaching will find you. This book claims to impart it, to be an oracle of God.

The modern philosopher Bertrand Russell wrote:

> "There is, to me, something a little old about the ethical values of those who think an omnipotent, omniscient, and benevolent Deity, page 145 Chapter 8: Proclaim the Truth

> after preparing the ground through millions of years of lifeless nebula, would consider Himself adequately rewarded by the final emergence of Hitler and Stalin and the H-bomb...
> "It is clear that fundamental Christian doctrines demand a great deal of ethical perversion before they can be accepted. The world, we are told, was created by a God who is both good and omnipotent. But if, before He created > the world, He foresaw all the pain and misery it would contain, He would have to be held responsible! It is not sin that causes the river to overflow its banks or the volcano to erupt. And even if this were true, it would make no difference.

> "If I were to beget a child, knowing beforehand that this child would become a homicidal maniac I would have to accept responsibility for causing his crimes. If God, as such, knew in advance the sins when He decided to go ahead and create man anyway....
> "The usual Christian argument is that the world's suffering is a purification for sin and is therefore a good thing. This argument is, of course, only a rationalization of sadism - but in any case it is a very poor argument. I would invite any Christian to accompany me to the children's ward of any hospital, to watch the suffering endured there, and then to persist > the assertion that these children are so morally degenerate as to deserve what they are undergoing.

> "In order to bring himself to say this, a man must abandon all feelings of mercy and compassion. He must, in short, make himself as cruel as the God, in whom he believes. No man who believes that all is for the best (in this suffering world) can keep his ethical values unimpaired, because he will always find excuses for pain and misery."

Because we do not have all the answers to these questions raised by individuals like Russell, that does not mean God does not exist, but only that we do not understand all His doings.

Atoms existed in reality long before men knew about them, before scientists proved the hypothesis that postulated their existence. Atoms continue to exist, though they still pose mysteries for us.

If we cannot explain why Hitler and Stalin existed in the creation of an omnipotent, omniscient and benevolent Deity, neither can Bertrand Russel explain why thousands of saints have been ready to give their lives in suffering for love, truth, and God.

Russell has no explanation for why rivers overflow, but neither can he explain why rivers exist in the first place and are a boon to mankind and a delight to the eye.

page 147 Chapter 8: Proclaim the Truth

When we say God can do everything, it means He can do all things that are consonant with His character. He cannot annul the cause that produces a certain effect, though He can perform miracles. But the miracle does not cancel the laws of nature that He Himself set in motion. It introduces new elements that counteract or accelerate the predictable effects. Even God cannot make wrong thinking yield the truth.

Russell's error consists in judging reality as subject rather than object. There are beauties that can be seen only from a certain position. The position of subject versus object is not the right position to perceive and understand material and spiritual realities as they are.

One of the biblical names for God is ~El Shaddai~, which means "a sufficient God." Since He answers all our needs, we don't need Him plus explanations about Him. A man can live a full life breathing air without having its qualities explained to him.

God is one, the only one. All reality exists in Him. There is no one apart from Him or co-equal with Him to affirm or deny Him. His creation, for which He alone is responsible, does not break up His oneness. "In Him we live and move and have our being" (ACT 17:28).

Billions of bacteria and viruses inhabit our bodies, but if they had Bertrand Russell's mind, they would deny our existence. And if they had some mystical sense of our existence, they would be against us because we sometimes take medicines that destroy them. God is far above our categories of believing or non-believing.

page 148 Chapter 8: The Oracles of God

* * *

Some years ago while in Norway, I dreamed I heard a voice that said, "You will not always have a God." For a long time the dream troubled me, until finally I grasped its meaning. Meister Eckhardt had a similar intuition: "The man united with God has no God."

The verb "to have" does not exist in Hebrew, the language of the Bible. Even in modern Hebrew no one can say "I have money," "I have a car," or "I have a house"; neither can one say "I have a god."

We are never intended to ~have~ a God. We were meant to realize our high calling by being one with God. Jesus says, "You are gods" (JHN 10:34). We are meant to be overcomers, to whom Jesus gave this promise: "To him who overcomes I will grant to sit with Me on My throne, as I also overcame and sat down My Father on His throne" (REV 3:21). Only God sits on God's throne. This is also my final destination. Then evidently I will no longer have a God. I will be ~with~ God.

Everything less than becoming godlike is unworthy of a child of God. It is a shame for a prince to be only a good shoemaker.

Realize your calling and you will not ask such questions as to why rivers overflow, volcanoes erupt, children are in hospitals, and tyrants reign. You will sit on the heavenly throne from which universes are created and ruled. You will be above these things.

A good pastor is also godlike in this respect. He does not give many explanations, as God does not explain Himself much. The right pastor will help you realize your calling to be "god." You will no longer ask foolish questions. You will sit on a throne in perfect serenity, doing the right things whether you are understood or misunderstood.

The Hebrew does not have the singular "face," but only the plural "faces" - ~panim~. (Every Hebrew word with ~-im~ at the end is a plural.)

God, too, has many faces. One of His faces is hidden, veiled in deep darkness. Those like Russell who look at that face and see nothing cannot escape the strange impulse to write against this "nothing." They are like today's astronomers who write volumes about black holes, about whose existence they can only postulate.

But this is not the only face of God. In the Bible God is called "Our Father." The Hebrew word ~av~, meaning "father," is strange. It is a masculine noun, but in the plural it receives the ending characteristic of feminine nouns and becomes ~avot~ instead of the normal ~avim~.

So God is a father who also has female attributes. It is written, "So God created man in His own image;

page 150 Chapter 8: The Oracles of God

in the image of God He created him," and if you ask what this image is, the explanation follows: "male and female He created them" (see GEN 1:27). Furthermore, God compares Himself to a mother: "As one whom his mother comforts, so I will comfort you" (ISA 66:13a). Also, "Can a woman forget her nursing child, and not have compassion on the son of her womb? Surely they may forget, yet I will not forget you" (ISA 49:15).

There is no possible good that He does not embody and that, as both father and mother, He would not gladly impart to His children.

A rabbi told a joke from the pulpit: A Jew won a million dollars in a lottery. The agent who sold him the ticket asked how he knew what number to choose. "Well, this is not a problem for a Jew. In our Bible, seven is the holy number: The seventh day is Sabbath, there are seven branches in the candlestick and so on. Seven times seven is forty-eight. So I chose number 748 and won."

The agent replied, "But seven times seven is forty-nine, not forty-eight."

"Well, God knew that I was poor in arithmetic and knew I'd make a mistake, so He made 748, not 749, the winning number."

The rabbi continued, "As long as you are a member of the chosen people, you don't have to worry. God will honor even your mistakes. You will always be on the winning side." This is not simply a joke.

page 151 Chapter 8: Proclaim the Truth

A few years ago, I met a prince who was a member of an Asian royal house. When young, he had decided to commit suicide. To give a genteel setting to his intentions, he looked up a radio program in the news paper and fixed his suicide for the next day at 1:00 p.m. when there would be dance music.

According to the radio log, the half-hour musical program was followed by preaching at 10:30. How ever, the man at the radio station made a mistake. At ten o'clock that night, he put on the sermon which began with the words, "Perhaps you are fed up with life and have decided to end it all. This is the right decision. Throw away your life and get another one. Jesus offers you a new, rich life." Through another person's careless mistake, the prince changed his mind and was converted.

Christians too can be quiet about their mistakes. God can use mistakes to glorify His name. He knows if we are poor in arithmetic.

The first ecumenical council of Nicea (325 A.D.) worked out a method of calculating the date for Easter Sunday for Christians . It had to depend on the Jewish Passover that was celebrated only at the time of the full moon.

However, great care was taken that it not coincide with the Jewish Passover, though the events celebrated at Easter obviously took place at that time.

page 152 Chapter 8: The Oracles of God

Writing about the acts of the first council (which were not preserved in written form), Constantine the Great, emperor at that time, made some very good observations and some that do not bring him credit.

We read: "What could be more beautiful and festive than when a feast that instills within us the hope of immortality is celebrated by everyone without variation, in accordance with a single rite and an established order?"

But he also says: "It appeared unseemly to celebrate this holy feast together with the Jews who, having defiled their hands with an iniquitous act, have rightly been stricken as impure with blindness of soul...Your prudence would have striven in any way to see to it that our pure souls would not in any way have communicated and would not have been taken with the customs of these most worthless people."

Jesus, a Jew, was sentenced by the Jews Annas and Caiaphas, and also by Romans. We have this information from Jews whose aim it was to cause the nations to believe that Jesus was the promised Messiah. This Jew, after being crucified, was resurrected on the third day in Israel. Within weeks, the Holy Spirit fell upon a company of Jews. Thus the first church was established in Jerusalem and was constituted of at least three thousand people – all Jewish.

Why must these events be celebrated with enmity toward the Jewish people? Why must the rule demand that Easter cannot be celebrated when the Jews have their Passover – even though it commemorates another event?

The Council of Constantinople promulgated a decision in which all innovations regarding the date of the Easter feast were committed to a curse. He who in this regard "does not follow the customs of the church...as well as the impious astronomers who counteract the decrees of the holy councils, let them be cursed, separated from the church of Christ and the assemblies of the faithful."

When some Orthodox churches, under pressure from their respective governments, changed the calendar to make Easter come nearer to Passover, other Orthodox churches considered this betrayal of the faith. A split occurred that resulted in a breach of unity.

Healing of the schisms caused by hatred and discord is a consummation devoutly to be wished!

A Christian must be a valiant fighter for truth, Spurgeon said:

> "When I came to London as a young minister, I knew very well that the doctrines which I preached were by no means popular, but I for that reason brought them out with all the more emphasis. What a storm was raised! I > was reading the other day a tirade of abuse which was poured upon me about twenty years ago. I must have been a horridly bad > fellow according to that description; but I was pleased to observe that it was not I that was bad, but the doctrines which I preached.

>
> "I teach the same truths now; and after having preached them these four-and-twenty years or so, what can I say of the results? Why, that no man loses anything by bringing the truth right straight out.
>
> "I wish to bear this witness, not about myself, but about the truth which I have preached. Nothing has succeeded better than preaching out boldly what I have believed, and standing to it in defiance of all opposition, and never caring a snap of the fingers whether it offended or whether it pleased."

We should imitate Spurgeon in his zeal for truth.

I have had a guardian angel for all my eighty-five years; you have also had one since you were born. What did your angel do before your birth? Angels were created long before men.

Perhaps before guarding me, my angel guarded others of former generations which means he possesses a tremendous experience of life to draw from in serving me. Our angels have the experience of the beatific vision; they see God every day (MTT 18:10).

While in jail, I had occasion to observe fights between two groups of ants. It was always a cruel war. But if one group had one single man as its ally, he could wipe out the whole camp of the enemy with one giant step. Likewise, one angel assured the victory to the Israelites by killing 185,000 Assyrians in one night.

We possess the history of several ancient peoples among which the most important is the history of the Jews. Many of the Jewish people were in communion with angels. Even God was called "the Angel of the Lord" when He appeared to men like Jacob and Moses.

(In my book, ~In God's Underground~, I mentioned briefly how I got acquainted with an angel. It was an illuminating experience, figuratively and literally.)

page 157 Chapter 9: Abide in Faith

Is it ever lawful to divorce? Jesus said that Moses had permitted it only because men had hardened their hearts. A spouse who is not allowed to divorce can turn his partner's life into hell. The ideal, as expressed by Him, is that those joined by marriage should remain together for life. But where is the ideal husband, the ideal wife? People continue to have hardened hearts.

I knew the wife of a clergyman who constantly had to watch over her daughter of twelve so that her father would not assault her sexually. I advised divorce. I knew that Jesus' point of view was that of the potential victim.

Is it right to be a denunciator? Ahasuerus was a cruel despot and two of his servants had plotted to lay hands on him. Mordecai and Esther denounced the plotters to the king who had them hanged

page 158 Chapter 9: The Oracles of God

(EST 2:21-23). Mordecai and Esther are rightly considered examples for believers.

Not to denounce sin can be a sin. It is written, "If a person sins in hearing the utterance of an oath and is a witness, whether he has seen or known the matter - if he does not tell it, he bears guilt" (LEV 5:1). This refers to a blasphemous or criminal oath.

Old Testament Joseph reported to his father the evil words of his brothers (GEN 37:2). Someone reported to David about Absalom's plan to kill him (2SM 15 and 17). St. Paul's nephew revealed conspiracy to kill the apostle. Were these reprehensible acts?

The majority of Church fathers excuse the actions of Tamar who mated with her father-in-law, knowing that her progeny would be the proper ancestor of the future Messiah. They also excuse the incest of the daughters of Lot who did not wish to have children from idolaters; the ruse by which Jacob obtained the blessing reserved for his older brother because he knew his brother was unfit to receive it; Moses' killing of an Egyptian oppressor; Samson's suicide that killed many of the enemies of God, etc. Is it right to dissimulate (hide under a false or hidden pretense) for a good purpose?

Jansenius and Duvergier of St. Cyran, when young, decided to dedicate their lives to the reformation of the Catholic church. They also determined to keep silent about their purposes until they could insinuate themselves into high places where they would be effective. The first became an abbot, the second a bishop.

I cannot see how we can win any war without dissimulation. Underground churches in Communist and Muslim countries dissimulate constantly. The leaders live and travel under pretended names, hide their whereabouts, mislead the authorities and secret police, and so on.

Sir Stafford Cripps, hearing one of the broadcasts of the British Psychological Warfare branch during World War II, said, "If we have to report to this sort of thing to win the war, I'd rather we lost it." He should have seen what a lost war looks like in the shambles of Germany and Japan; then he would have changed his mind.

Other members of the British war cabinet were wiser than he. They sent an exact double of Marshal Montgomery to Gibraltar while he himself was putting the final touches to the plans for D-Day (the invasion of France). The Germans did not expect an imminent attack, knowing Montgomery to be far away on an inspection.

The British cabinet had followed a biblical pattern in which soldiers were taught to lie in wait under cover of darkness (JDG 9:32). Ruse is an effective weapon for those who have a great calling

but are weak. If anyone has scruples about dissimulation, certainly we can all agree that it is not morally necessary to disclose all one knows.

During World War II, the German ship ~Graf Spee~ was in Montevideo for repairs for only forty-eight hours, the time limit for a neutral harbor. Two small British ships lay in wait but were impotent to take the ~Graf Spee~. The British Admiralty, aware that the larger ships were too far away to arrive in time, resorted to deception and signaled that a big battleship with an aircraft carrier would join them soon. The Admiralty was sure the Germans would break the code. The result was that the German Captain Langdorff scuttled the ship and committed suicide. The British won without a battle.

Was it proper for Moses to send some Jews to spy out the land of Canaan?

Newton's laws of mechanics and Maxwell's laws of electro-dynamics are valid up to a point, but they do not work in the infrastructure of the atom. Biblical and moral laws are valid when applied correctly.

To say there exist no absolute moral laws because they do not apply everywhere at all times is wrong. This is the error of situational ethics. To say that those who apply absolute moral laws must not have concrete circumstances in view is also wrong. This is the error of the legalists. An Eskimo has to conform to other circumstances than a Zulu, which does not make either immoral per se.

page 161 Chapter 9: Abide in Faith

Krishna taught that we should be preoccupied only with deeds, not with their fruits. Jesus said, on the other hand, that we will know the moral value of a deed by its fruits. And it is really not of primordial importance to do great works. Whatever we do, even on a small scale, should be done with a great heart. But one cannot recommend a given response for all circumstances.

There are times when we must boast and times when we must humble ourselves. When the devil comes to you with the temptation to be haughty, humble yourself because of your many sins. When he drives you to despair about your salvation, boast your rank as a child of God.

In church confess your sin, and in every day life be a saint. Usually we do the contrary; we sin in everyday life and sing holy songs in church.

***

Jesus was not very polite to the Pharisees when He turned and pronounced His woes against them - especially in public. His confrontation could scarcely have pleased them. From this experience we may conclude that it is not a duty always to be polite. Politeness does not always come first. Nothing comes first ~always~.

In Scripture there is a very strange expression: "it happened on the second Sabbath after the first" (LUK 6:1). Obviously, any Sabbath can be the second after the first. Why the designation? The Greek expression is ~deuteroprotos~, which means literally "the second things first."

page 162 Chapter 9: The Oracles of God

The occasion involved the Sabbath on which Jesus' disciples did something forbidden by law. Being hungry, they plucked heads of grain on the Sabbath and ate them.

Now, there are days on which secondary things take first priority. As a general rule, filling the stomach is a secondary matter, but there are times when nagging hunger moves it into first place.

Jesus reminded those who objected that when David was hungry, he had eaten forbidden things of which it was lawful only for the priests to partake. Jesus had no word of condemnation for David, who with his small band of men had been on the run, persecuted because he defended a just cause. In effect, Jesus excused his action.

"If the law makes false suppositions," mused Mr. Bumble, a character in Dickens' ~Great Expectations~, "then the law is an ass, an idiot." Laws are asses when they apply ordinary norms to exceptional circumstances.

During World War II, the Nazis wanted to deport and then kill all the Jews of Rome. The city's municipal government could not save all the Jews, but it salvaged the lives of many by changing their identities, giving them forged documents, and hiding their true parentage.

For humanitarian reasons the respective employees committed acts that would be considered immoral and would be condemned by the laws of any civilized country. But the circumstances were extraordinary and demanded extrajudicial acts. A man who really loves another is willing to do extraordinary things, even if it means breaking the rules.

We should be harmless as a dove and wise as a serpent (see (MTT 10:16), not foolish as an ass, and never mindless as a swine. (The atheist philosopher Nietzsche boasted that he was the sow mentioned by Jesus in MTT 7:6!)

Both Judaism and Christianity have at times used questionable methods to establish their religions. Zinzendorf wrote, "If our predecessors had not used methods which our principles no longer admit, Christianity would not be. We have to thank those who did an ugly preparatory work in order that we might remain clean." There exists no ideal crystal or gas. Reality differs from laboratory formulas. So it is with morals.

Must one always speak out for the Savior? When Paul was confronted by his accusers before the governor, Felix, he did not say one word about Jesus (ACT 24:10-21). Under the circumstances, it was more important to defend himself than to witness for Jesus. (Later he did take opportunity to do so.)

Dr. Fritz, in his ~Pastoral Theology~, says that it is not under all circumstances wrong or contrary to love to omit private admonition. He cites Luther's statement about the Eighth Commandment: "For when the matter is public in the light of day, there can be no slandering or false judging or testifying; as, when we now reprove the Pope and his doctrine which is publicly set forth in books and proclaimed in all the world. For where the sin is public, the reproof also must be public that everyone may learn to guard against it" (pp. 230-232).

Luther also says that false teachers are to be condemned without a hearing, without entering long discussions with them, since their errors have already been sufficiently refuted by the public confessions of the church (Walch edition, IV, 1057). And elsewhere Luther commends the holy fathers of Nicea for not allowing the Arians to defend their heresies out silencing them by "hissing unanimously."

In Dedeken's ~Thesaurus~, an opinion is given regarding the question of whether public sin must first be verified before being rebuked. This is vigorously denied, with the argumentation that John the Baptist didn't ask Herod what he had done (he might have denied it); but condemned his public sin, as also Nathan did with David. Likewise Joseph told his father when there was an evil report about his brothers (Genesis 37), and Paul wrote public admonitions on the basis of what he had heard (2TH 3:11) (~Thesaurus~, I, 864-865)

page 165 Chapter 9: Abide in Faith

If moral problems are so intricate, where lies the solution? How can one know for sure what is good and what is bad?

Meister Eckhart long ago gave a reply to this question:

> "Everything is good that a man does who has become one with God."

It is important to avoid quarreling. ~The Fathers of the Desert~ contains the story of two brethren who decided to live together. One of them said, "Whatever my brother tells me I will do." The other said, "I will always do what my brother decides." For many years they lived together harmoniously. When the enemy saw it, he tried to divide them.

One day, as they sat on a bench in front of the house, he showed himself to one as a dove and to the other as a crow. The one said, "Do you see the dove?" The other said, "It is a crow." They began to quarrel, each claiming to be right. In the end they beat each other until blood flowed, to the great joy of the enemy, and then they separated.

Three days later, distressed over their fractured relationship, they woke up to a realization of the cunning of the enemy. They reunited and lived in harmony until the end. The bird had been a swallow.

How stupid for men who worship the same Christ to fight about the manner of worshiping, especially

page 166 Chapter 9: The Oracles of God

since one's particular Christianity in most cases is due to an accident of birth.

We should also avoid slander and should abstain even from listening to it. Furthermore, if others speak evil of you, you are not permitted to reply in kind.

Michelangelo and Raphael were both great artists, but whereas the latter was very much beloved, Michelangelo felt himself despised because he was ugly as a result of an accident he had in his youth.

Once, friends came to Raphael and said "Michelangelo is speaking much evil of you." In reply, Raphael arose and said, "As for me, I thank God for having the privilege of living in the same century as the unsurpassed artistic genius Michelangelo."

"Why do you praise him when he insults you?"

Raphael replied, "My attitude toward Michelangelo depends not upon his attitude toward me, but upon the dictates of truth and love."

Remember that not only artists, but also the workers in God's Kingdom are few. We cannot afford to discard a single one. Even if a brother is weak and a sinner, we cannot spend time on anything that would deflect us from effective work for the Kingdom.

I have no artistic talent when it comes to drawing. Once when my granddaughter, then five, saw me sketching some human faces, she said, "Grandpa, you sin. God made men beautiful. You make them look ugly." Her assessment applies not only to bad painters or to artists like Picasso, but also to those who speak evil of men.

The Bible records a notable example of the virtue of not speaking evil of another. Pilate was the sixth Roman procurator of Judea and held the office for ten years. He has been described by both Josephus and Philo as an arbitrary, tyrannical ruler who, because of this, was recalled by Rome and banished to Gaul where he died by his own hand.

We have the unflattering information about him from other sources as well; the evangelists record nothing bad about him.

The Talmud, in the treatise ~Pesahim 57A~, wrote about the high priest who sentenced Jesus, "Woe over the house of Annas, woe over their curses, woe for their serpent-like hissings."

The Bible does not say one bad word about Jesus' judges.

One cannot over-emphasize the virtue of peace-making. ~Mehilta~, a Jewish religious writing, says, "If in regard to stones which cannot hear or see or talk just because they are the stones of an altar which is to make peace between Israel and their Father in Heaven, you are ordered not to lift up an iron tool upon them, how much more shall no punishment befall him who makes peace between two men, or between a man and his wife, or between two towns and nations, or between families and government."

page 168 Chapter 9: The Oracles of God

Without peacemaking, you will never have the great Christian virtue of calmness and tranquility. Without inner peace, it is difficult to use your time well. A Christian is a lover of peace if for no other reason than that quarrels are a great waste of time.

Euclid, the Greek mathematician of antiquity, once had a misunderstanding with a friend who threatened him by saying, "May I die if I do not avenge myself against you."

The philosopher answered, "May I die if I do not make peace with you." These words ended the quarrel.

We have a Savior who was so intent on making peace between the sinner and an offended God that He gave His life for it. We too should be willing to make this commitment.

Inner peace is a prerequisite for making peace. During a tempest at sea when the ship was tossed to and fro by the angry waves, the wife of a naval officer asked her husband, "How can you be so calm in such a storm?"

The officer drew his sword, pointed it at his wife's breast, and asked, "Why are you calm and unafraid?" Surprised, she protested, "Why should I be afraid? The sword is in the hand of my husband who loves me too much to harm me."

Her husband smiled and said, "This is the source of my calm, too. The wind and the waves are in the hands of my loving Father. Why should I be afraid?"

page 169 Chapter 9: Abide in Faith

When Jesus preached in the Jewish synagogues His teachings were different from the rabbis' discourses. If He were here today and were allowed in our churches, He would preach a different message from what is commonly heard in the pulpit.

When He spoke, the common people heard Him gladly, though He said things that might have been considered egocentric: "I am the bread of life. He who comes to Me shall never hunger, and he who believes in Me shall never thirst" (JHN 6:35).

Those who took offense did so because those who had believed in Him did not act at all like men whose hunger and thirst had been satisfied. They were as anxious as ever to enjoy the things and pleasures of this world, along with miracles or high spiritual experiences no longer needed by those whose hunger has been satisfied.

May Jesus have all there is of us, as He has given us all there is of Him. St. Augustine said, "One must be very greedy to have God and to run after other things, too."

Kant testified to Jesus' ideal perfection. Hegel wrote, "He is the union of the human and the divine." Spinoza -"He is the truest symbol of heavenly wisdom." Rousseau - "He is the highest person we can possibly imagine with respect to religion, the Being without whose presence in the mind, perfect piety is impossible." Renan - "He is the most beautiful incarnation of God in the most beautiful of forms."

page 170 Chapter 9: The Oracles of God

It is written that when Jesus was in Jerusalem at the Passover, during the feast,many believed in His name when they saw the signs which He did. But Jesus did not believe in them" (JHN 2:23-24 - my translation from the original Greek).

May we be such ardent believers in the Perfect One that He in turn might say joyously that He believes in us because we have given Him all that is in us. I will say to men, "I believe in Jesus," and He will say in Heaven, "I believe in Richard Wurmbrand."

* * *

Many readers of this present book love Jesus, I am sure. But there are many degrees of love. The bride in Solomon's song is "lovesick" (SOS 5:8). This is a sickness without recovery. You yearn for the Beloved in the same way that a person with a high fever yearns for water.

To some people, religion is rooted in fear. In others it is a do-it-or-you-will-be-damned proposition. To still others, it is social service or cultic practice. To the lovesick, it is an ardent passion that leads ultimately to being crucified with Jesus. You live no more; He lives in you. And just as His life was that of a Man of Sorrows, acquainted with grief, of a Shepherd whose primary concern was to sacrifice His life to the wolves on behalf of His sheep, so you too will take suffering consciously upon yourself.

To be God-filled, to be Christ-filled, and to be Spirit-filled, are not the same thing. The God-filled person shares God's serenity. In Him there is no variation or shadow of turning (JMS 1:17). The Christ-filled person knows the Church is the continuation of Christ's incarnation with all the human temptations, sufferings, weaknesses, and triumphs it involves. He continues this fight. The Spirit-filled person sees his main role in being what the Spirit is - a comforter, a guide to light.

This is what I had to tell you and you can be sure these are oracles of God. Is what I gave you much too little? Is it not too big a claim to put the name divine oracles to to thoughts of yours, some of which are simply common sense? You might have expected more.

Those who believe the Bible to be the oracle of God would do well to read the endless genealogies in it and Numbers 1-4 with boring details of a census. The common, the average, the boring also belong to reality and to God's truth - the more simple truths which can be helpful on the way of salvation. We should not expect things too big.

What can Einstein reveal to toddlers? What can God say to little beings like us? We are still in primary grades, but we can get hints of what follows in high school, college, and the university.

Today's partial oracles prepare us for gradually getting the whole truth in all of its beauty.

From the back cover:
"I believe it is very profitable to see Christ in the lives of his saints." Richard Wurmbrand

Pastor Wurmbrand has met many heroes of faith. Not all were "heroes" in the world's sense: some were criminals, some even torturers. All, however, have overcome their weaknesses to perform acts of love, humility and self-sacrifice.

"Can we also become the sort of men and women the Bible calls 'more than conquerors'? asks Pastor Wurmbrand. "I have personally known such people. I have known dying men who gave the medicine that could have saved their lives for another sick prisoner. I have seen men who were terribly hungry give their last piece of bread to another. I have seen the joy on their faces. I have heard them singing, their faces shining like the sun."

~The Overcomers~ is not about perfect saints of God. It is about ordinary, sinful, fallible people who found a strength not of their own making: a strength available to us all.

Pastor Wurmbrand spent fourteen years in Romanian prisons for his faith. A gifted teacher and linguist, he is founder of the international organization Voice of the Martyrs.

PREFACE

THE PURPOSE OF THIS BOOK is to present a series of "overcomers" - men and women who not only endured for the sake of their faith, but used obstacles to ascend to great spiritual heights.

When Jesus entered Jerusalem on Palm Sunday the crowd chanted to him, "Hosanna in the highest!" "Hosanna" is a contraction of two Hebrew words: ~Hosha~, "save," and ~na~, "please." Hosanna in the "highest" means, "Please save us in the highest sense of this word" (or, "Save us on the highest plane").

I can save a hungry orphan from his hunger by giving a little money for his support. I can save him even better by contributing regularly to his bodily needs. But I can save him best by adopting him and making him heir of all I possess.

Individuals asked and obtained from Jesus different kinds of salvation: from sickness, from immediate trouble, from sins, from death. But he can provide a salvation much higher than all of these: he can save us from being only human. He can give beyond anything we might dare to ask or think. He offers us the privilege of one day sitting with him and his Father on his throne, from which universes are created and ruled (REV 3:21).

Those called to such heights soar even now above average men and women, even if outwardly they are lowly or downtrodden.

I was in jail with a remarkable man, Pastor Francis Vishky, leader of the organization ~Christian Endeavour~ in Romania. He was sentenced to twenty-two years because of sermons that displeased the Communists. His wife and seven children were deported to a desert place, where it was difficult to obtain bread and water. His heavenly calm even in such a situation was amazing. It was the calm of a heavenly throne.

I would like to tell you what happened at the moment of his arrest. On that particular morning the whole family was at the breakfast table, where they read PSA 23:4,5: "Yea though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil: for thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff they comfort me. Thou preparest a table before me in the presence of mine enemies: thou anointest my head with oil, my cup runneth over."

Without knocking, three officers of the Secret Police broke into the house. "This is a search," they said, with no further explanation. But everyone knew that after the search the father would be taken to prison. The family continued to eat quietly. The police wondered that they still had an appetite and remained calm.

Vishky later said that they understood the psalm better under those tense circumstances than they had previously. God had not promised that his children would not pass through the valley of the shadow of death, but that in it they would fear no evil.

"He prepares a table before us in the presence of our enemies." On the table we will not always have what we desire. He can serve us with suffering, trials, deportation, jail, even violent death. But the valley through which we pass is called the valley of the ~shadow~ of death, not of death. The shadow of a dog cannot bite; the shadow of death cannot kill.

Vishky added, "The Jews were commanded to eat the whole Passover lamb - with its head, its legs, its entrails" (EXO 12:9). The entrails were far from appetizing, and on the legs there was not much meat. We have to accept the whole Jesus: what is pleasant to us, but also his crown of thorns .

In jail, Vishky maintained the same calm, the same serenity. This happens when one knows he is destined for a throne. Not only crowned kings but also crown princes have to behave royally. We learn how to obtain such a character from those at this high level of faith. That is why in this book I will provide many examples of faith under pressure.

Do you perhaps say "too many"?

How much time do we spend watching TV, listening to radio, and reading newspapers and magazines? A poll taken in the USA reveals that only 9% of those who speak to us in the media have a connection with religion of any kind. But by continual repetition they fill the needs of the 80% of American churchgoers with the thoughts of people with no high ideals, or even of bad people who cannot possibly help us live a righteous life.

The Bible is repetitious. It deals with 1,300 persons. Some of them are luminous examples of faith, others average believers. To know their names and something about their lives is extremely useful, just as it was useful to me to have certain contacts when I first came to the USA. Many of these Bible characters will be our friends in heaven. Others show by their ugly lives what kind of people we should be wary of if we wish to enter heaven ourselves. So it is good for you to get acquainted with the heroes of faith I describe .

Since Jesus' ascension to heaven, there have been many who continue in his footsteps. These "fill up in their flesh what is lacking in the afflictions of Christ." These will be the main subJect of the present book.

The Story of the Rothschild Dynasty

When I speak to Jews about Christ, I often illustrate the significance of what he has done for us by telling them the story of how the Rothschild dynasty of multi-millionaires began. Its founder, Mayer Amshel Rothschild, had been a poor boy who served in the house of Rabbi David Moshe of Chortkov. This rabbi had set aside in a drawer 200 golden coins as a dowry for his daughter.

Rothschild married a girl from another town, where he opened a little shop that did quite well. Years passed, and the time came for the rabbi's daughter to marry. As the wedding approached, the rabbi opened the drawer to take out the coins to give to the bridegroom, only to discover to his horror that the money was not there. No one in the house had any explanation as to how it could have disappeared. The suspicion fell on Rothschild. They asked themselves:
Where did he get the money to open his shop?
Surely he was the thief.

The rabbi defended him: "It is not right to accuse anyone without proof."

But the family insisted, "You must go and speak to him. Otherwise we will be disgraced. The guests have started to arrive, and the wedding will not take place."

Reluctantly the rabbi went, apologized for having to ask such an embarrassing question, but explained the terrible predicament in which he found himself. Looking his former employee in the eye he asked, "Do you know something about the money?"

page 10 The Overcomers

Rothschild was silent a few minutes, then said, "I have stolen it. I will repay it here and now. Please forgive me."

The rabbi, who had an understanding for human sin, gladly forgave him. The wedding took place, and he officiated with great joy. Rothschild went broke. Many years later it was discovered that the 200 gold coins had been stolen by a servant girl, who shared it with a lover. At a drunken party the lover bragged how he came to possess the money. He was arrested, and both acknowledged their theft. The rabbi went to Rothschild and asked him pointedly, "Why did you confess to a sin you had not committed? And why did you give me the money?"

He replied, "I saw you terribly sad. I imagined the weeping of your wife and of the girl. I was ready to give you all my money immediately to make up for the loss, but I knew you would not accept such a sacrifice from me. So I had to say it was your money, which I stole. So you were peaceful and had joy."

Then Rabbi David Moshe blessed him: "May God reward this deed of yours by giving you and all your descendants great riches." The blessing was fulfilled. The Rothschilds are among the richest men in the world. One can only admire such a deed. But should we stop at admiration, or should we strive to become heroes ourselves in some area of life?

This Rothschild's deed has the fragrance of our inspiration from Jesus. To make his message and gift more acceptable to us, Jesus took the lowliest appearance of a man, allowing himself to be born not only into a poor family but in a humble stable for beasts. Even more, he became sin for us and ended his earthly life crucified among thieves. He went so far as to declare that my sins are his!

The Only Female Monk

When I speak in a Christian Orthodox church, I tell the story of Theodora from their ~Lives of Saints~, which - sadly - the average Orthodox never reads.

When Theodora's mother died, her father decided to become a monk and suggested that she enter a convent. But she was so attached to her father that she decided to go to the monastery with him. Since she was not conspicuously feminine in appearance, she was accepted as a monk. Because of her (or more appropriately "his") sweetness, she soon became a favourite among her brethren, whom she served with all devotion. From time to time the abbot sent "him" and two monks to a town far away to purchase what was needed in the monastery. They would spend the night in an inn.

The inn owner had a young daughter. One day he discovered to his horror that she was pregnant, and used violence to find out who had brought this shame upon them. Wanting to protect her lover from her father's fury, the girl said, "The young, handsome monk did it to me."

Her father went to the abbot in a rage and complained to him. He in turn questioned Theodora who, thinking that one of "his" fellow monks was responsible, fell on her knees and said, "Forgive me. I am guilty." Knowing that the monk would be expelled from the monastery for this misdeed, Theodora thought, "If he sinned like this as a monk, he will do even worse things when he is dismissed." So she said only, "Forgive me, Father, I have sinned."

"He" was immediately expelled but did not leave the monastery. For years in heat or cold she stood at the gate asking forgiveness from all who came and went. In the end the abbot had pity on her and took her in again, but until the end of her life she was kept at menial work and was not given any consideration.

When she died and the corpse had to be washed, according to the monastic rules, it was seen that "he" was a woman.

She had taken upon herself another's guilt to keep him in the religious atmosphere of the monastery in the hope that he would not fall even deeper into sin.

The Orthodox church honours the name of Theodora.

Such deeds are so far beyond what we meet in daily life that you wonder if those who act like this are from our world, or if they receive their inspiration from another realm.

Hannah, a personality of the Old Testament, sang with sadness, "There is none holy like the Lord" (1SM 2:2). This song is tragic. God wishes us all to be holy and perfect like himself. Jesus is only adored for his love and self-sacrifice, but he would prefer to see his example followed, to be "one among many brethren."

We are all invited to take decisive steps toward this.

Tso-Po-Tao's Sacrifice

Once when preaching in China (Taiwan), I tried to do so Chinese-style. I told my listeners a story from the Chuen-Chin period of Chinese history (the fifteenth century BC).

Tso-Po-Tao went on a journey with Yang-Chao-Ai, during which they were overtaken by a heavy snowstorm. Unprepared for this, they had neither the clothing nor the food to survive. Tso-Po-Tao offered to undress and give all his clothing and food to Yang-Chao-Ai so that he at least might be saved. Yang refused, but in vain. Tso was already naked and half-frozen. Tso died, and Yang's life was spared.

As is my custom, I had thought much upon my sermon before delivering it. In deep meditation, one has a sense of the reality of the persons who pass through the mind. It was almost as if I had heard with my own ears the words of Tso-Po-Tao: "I give my body for you." I saw him undressing while the snow fell. After removing his jacket and feeling the sharp cold, he surely must have felt a strong temptation to keep at least his shirt for himself. But his face shone more and more. His features became even more determined. He did not stop before he was completely naked, like the first couple in paradise, who had no cause for shame. I marvelled at his sacrifice and admired him as Yang-Chao-Ai must have admired him. Certainly his surviving friend would never forget this moment that held the grandeur of eternity .

I read this story decades ago and could never forget it. It represents the pinnacle of what the inner man of the heart longs for.

My audience were moved too.

Then I paused - what would music be without pauses? Preachers should not go on and on without interruption - I remained a little time in adoration of the God of love, who taught men and women of all ages to ascend to such heights.

Then I continued: "As in the case of Tso-Po-Tao who travelled with Yang-Chao-Ai, when righteousness and sin travel together both seem doomed to die. In the storms of life, righteousness does not bear sin, and sin cannot bear righteousness. Therefore Jesus, the embodiment of righteousness, chose to die. He gave more than his food and clothes: he gave his body and blood to the sinner that he might survive. Gratitude for this sacrifice changes hearts. The Chinese character for "righteousness" is the "I" covered by a lamb. We live by the fact that Jesus, called the Lamb of God because of his meekness, gave himself for us."

I did not end my sermon with this. I knew some of my listeners had a question: Could only Tso-Po-Tao before Christ and a limited number of such people after Christ have had such beauty of character? Or can we also ascend to such heights? Can we also become masters of love, masters of life, the sort of men and women whom the Bible calls "more than conquerors" - victors over selfishness?

I have personally known such people. I have known dying men in Communist prisons who gave the medicine that could have saved their lives to another sick prisoner, even to one belonging to a faction utterly opposed to them. I have seen men who were terribly hungry give their last piece of bread to another. I have seen the joy on their faces when they brought the greatest sacrifice. I have heard some of them singing, their faces shining like the sun. Can we also become masters of a joy that persists even in the midst of terrible suffering? What is the key to this palace?

Religious people will say it is the grace of God that makes some men stronger and better than others. It does not depend on us.

But the Bible is a Jewish book. The Jewish mind jumps over a whole chain of intermediary events and explains them by their first cause. In GEN 41:13, we read that a young man by the name of Joseph hanged the baker of an Egyptian king. But in Chapter GEN 40:22, it is written that the one who hanged the baker was the king, not Joseph, who was in prison. This is an insoluble contradiction in the average mind, but not in Jewish thinking. Joseph was the first to inform the baker, with whom he shared prison life, that he would be hanged, so he is considered as the one who hanged him.

In the same way the Bible ascribes to God alone the merit for all the good that is in humanity, but he gives every good thing as a potential. Every child is a potential grown-up, but he must do his part in feeding, exercising, and developing his abilities. So we receive goodness, love, self-sacrifice, nobility of character in potential. But these qualities must be learned in the school of hard knocks. How to become a person of great stature must be learned with the same earnestness and persistence with which we learn a trade, overcoming failure, rising after falling again and again, always remembering that the primary source of what is good in us is God.

I feel called to write this book because I knew intimately several such people during my many years of work in the Romanian Underground Church under both Fascism and Communism, as well as in jail. T learned much from them.

I also have first-hand knowledge about others from my twenty-five years of work in the International Christian Mission to the Communist World, which was in regular contact with the heroes of persecuted churches in all parts of the world.

This book will touch on other subjects as well, but more than anything else it will acquaint you with the Garden of Eden. Therese of Avila said: "The soul of the righteous is nothing else than a paradise. It is the world that the Heavenly Bridegroom inhabits and in which he rejoices [PRO 8:31]. How splendid must be a lodging place in which dwells a king so powerful, so wise, so pure, and so rich in all good lives!"

This part of the book will be an ascent to the paradise in which dwell such masters of love and life.

We Can Ascend from the Worst Depths

Some of us live very far from such heights. Some of us wallow in great sin. But some very depraved people have moments of grandeur. There is just a little seed of good in them, but eventually it could grow.

The Talmud, the holy book of the Jews, contains following story:

> Once during a drought, Rabbi Abahu heard a voice: "If Pentikaka [which means in Greek "five evils"] prayed, it would rain.
> Abahu asked Pentikaka about his occupation. He replied, "I provide men with prostitutes, I clean the theatre, I take the clothes of prostitutes to the laundry, I dance and play the cymbals before them."

The rabbi asked, "Did you ever do good?"
He replied, "While I cleaned the theatre, I saw a woman weeping. She told me, 'My husband is in prison. I will prostitute myself and rescue him.' Then

I sold all I had. even the blanket, and gave the money to the woman. I told her, 'Take this, ransom him, and don't sin.'"
Hearing this, Rabbi Abahu exclaimed, "His prayer is worthy to be accepted."

Such hidden possibilities exist even in bad men.

In Romania, Berila was given a life sentence for murdering a couple together with all their four children - the youngest still a baby - to steal a small sum of money for drink. He had even killed their cat. A baker by profession, he worked in the prison bakery where not only bread was made but also biscuits and cakes for the prison staff. Berila risked heavy beatings by bringing to hungry prisoners some of the goodies reserved only for officers and wardens.

But whence this gem in a dirty place? Could I also be such a jewel? Am I, too, called to ascend?

This is not a book that simply tells a good person how to become better. Those who have wings can fly from peak to peak, each higher than the last. Those who do not can ascend from a deep pit on a ladder, slowly, rung by rung. The Bible uses both these images.

Many former criminals have become exemplary saints.

This Book Will Profit You

Thousands of books appear each year. Why should you read this one? How will you profit from it? Should a person read unprofitable books as well? Must we not be as choosy in reading books as we are in selecting the food we eat?

The wrong kind of book can poison a life. Marx, Nietzsche, Lenin, Hitler, Mao, de Sade and many more wrote books that others read, believe, and act upon. Tens of millions of people have died as a result in wars and revolutions. De Sade wrote books that inflamed the mind to violence and lust. Books can be dangerous. Some have taught men to hate and despise their fellow men, with the result that they hated and were hated. Mankind would be much better off if some books had never been written.

The Bible says that for fear of the authorities who had just crucified Jesus, his first disciples were assembled behind closed doors (JHN 20:19). It was wise to do so. They too were in danger of being arrested and killed. But if it is wise to keep the doors shut for fear of persecutors who can kill only the body, should we not also keep the gates of the mind shut so that no pernicious ideas, no false images of reality, no lies can enter and destroy the soul?

Evagre of Pantus, the third-century Greek church teacher, wrote "Be the door-keeper of your heart and don't let thoughts enter it without interrogating them first: "On whose side are you, on mine or on my adversary's?'" Readers should ask themselves before starting a book, "How can this book profit me? I have a short life and a very limited time for reading. Why should I spend it on this particular book? What is its importance for me?"

Many have a prejudice against religion. They argue, "It speaks about lofty things without practical usefulness in this world." I once thought like this and was surprised therefore to find what a tremendous role the subJect of "profit" plays in the Bible.

The Communists tried to build an economy on something other than the desire for profit and failed. God himself placed it within the human heart. The Bible warns against "vanity...things wherein there is no profit" (JER 16:19). It teaches men to calculate "what profit he has from all his labour" (ECC 1:3). It claims, "Godliness is profitable unto all things, having promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come" (1TM 4:8). It puts the question, "What profit is it that we have kept God's ordinance?" (MAL 3:14).

The Apostle Paul did exactly what I do at this moment. He wrote, "I speak for your own profit" (1CO 7:35). Jesus himself taught explicitly that we should seek what is profitable. He said, "What is a man profited, if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul?" (MTT 16:26).

My claim is that the present book will profit you.

Siberia's Ice Can Be Melted

Of the contemporary masters of life, I want you to meet

Bishop Victor Belikh, a Ukrainian Christian whom I met in Kishinev. He had spent twenty-four years in Communist jails. The first twenty he passed in solitary confinement without ever knowing anything about his family and friends. He was allowed no family visits and no correspondence.

Every evening a straw mattress was put in the cell for him to sleep on for seven hours. In the morning it was taken away. The rest of the time he was not allowed to lie down even on the cold concrete, nor was he allowed to sit or stand on it. For seventeen hours a day he had to walk around his cell uninterruptedly, as horses do in a circus. He was surveyed by jailors through the peephole in the cell door. If he stopped or broke down, they threw buckets of water on him or beat him and he was forced to continue. After twenty years of such a regime, he was sent to forced labour in northern Siberia, where the ice never melts, for another four years.

I asked him, "How could you bear this suffering after the years in solitary confinement and a starvation diet?"

He replied by singing a song he composed: "With the flames of love's fire that Jesus kindled in my heart, I caused the ice of Siberia to melt. Halleluja!" His face shone. The Bible writes that the face of Stephen, first martyr of Christianity, shone when he was sentenced to death.

I did not feel worthy to stand before such a man. What an honour Jesus gave me to be called a "brother in faith" by such a man to have become a member of a family that breeds such exemplary humans! But more than that, the possibility is given to each of us to become such masters of life. This is not only the grace of God but also assiduous work on your own character. It is as if at birth we are given a block of marble, a hammer, a chisel, and are told, "You can hew out of this the image of an emperor." Jesus does not wish to be the only most holy Person, but the first among many brethren and sisters of the same kind. We are all called to be holy.

Men put in Belikh's situation are rare, but many men in deportation, in labour camps, in places devastated by war and revolution, even many poor in rich countries, have no shelter from the cold. But there is another kind of cold. It is often icy cold in well-to-do homes. Love has grown cold. There is no longer a smile or pleasant gesture for those who were once loved. Spouses, parents, children, friends have become alienated from each other.

In Jesus' time there was no electricity. The smallest light had to be kept burning. There were not even matches to kindle a fire. One had to be very thrifty. Jesus says about himself that "He will not quench a smoking flax." [ISA 42:3, MTT 12:20] When I was in jail, we blew again and again on what seemed no more than the remembrance of a fire that had gone out, and we succeeded in bringing it to life again. If everyone around you is icy, don't despair. Ice can be made to melt if the fire of Jesus' love burns in your heart.

A Short, Light Affliction

One of the profits you will have from reading this book is that it will greatly enlarge your vision.

Life is too short to be narrow. You need to enlarge your horizons, sharing the joys and sorrows of your fellow men and having fellowship with angels, glorified saints, and God.

The Hebrew word for "seasons" - ~moadim~ - also means "festivals." The profit of godliness is that it changes all seasons into festivals. We rejoice about all the joys of all who rejoice. We have a second source of joy that unbelievers don't have. We rejoice also in tribulations.

Nobody is the same person after meeting, as I did, John Jue Han Ding. He is a Chinese pastor who went to Tibet to preach the gospel. For this he was arrested by the Communists and spent twenty years in prison. In him I met a being such as I had never met before. To look into his shining face, to hear the heavenly music coming from his mouth, to get acquainted with his story, enlarged my knowledge of dedication and holiness.

I felt like a botanist discovering in some virgin forest a flower of exquisite beauty, previously completely unknown.

The tortures he endured are beyond description. It is enough to say that at a certain moment they tied his hands behind his back and then emptied a bucket of human waste on his head. He was kept like that for days, without being given any opportunity to clean himself. He was given food, but with his hands tied behind his back he had to lie on the floor and lick it up like an animal. The food had to pass through soiled lips. He still did not deny his faith and refused to admit to crimes he had not committed.

Then his torturers filled with human waste a cell in which he was detained with a multitude of common criminals. Now they all waded and suffocated in it. The common criminals were told they would all be kept like this indefinitely unless they forced him to comply with the demands of the interrogators. To survive, these criminals now competed in torturing him day and night.

When he came to this point in his story, John Jue Han Ding passed from speaking to singing, with a beautiful voice and an ecstatic face, a text from one of Paul's epistles: "For our light affliction, which is but for a moment, works for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory; while we look not at the things which are seen, but at the the things which are not seen: for the things which are seen are temporal; but the things which are not seen are eternal (2CO 4:17,18).

How heavy our light afflictions seem, and how light for him what we would consider the heaviest affliction imaginable. In his life we see a saint passing through the deepest pits of suffering and reaching the greatest heights of inner peace.

Are such beings only men?

In the Hebrew of 1SM 10:22, referring to Saul, future king of the Jews, after the word ~Ish~, which stands for "man," a big white space is left in the middle of a sentence. Rabbis explain it as showing that Saul, receiving the Spirit from above, has become more than a man. The opportunity has been given to him to reach heavenly heights.

This happened in the case of our Chinese brother.

People are seldom forced to endure cruelties like those he suffered. But everyone has cause for sadness or is acquainted with others in deep sorrow. We can point them to God, to Christ. But it is also very effective to point them to contemporary Christlike exemplars of heroism. Ding refused to the end to sign what the Communists demanded of him, thus demonstrating that one can successfully withstand any evil. Some men are unbreakable, more than conquerors. Under exceptional circumstances Jue Han Ding remained firm. We can take courage from his fortitude so that we too can be more than conquerors.

I believe it is very profitable to see Christ in the lives of his saints.

The first great Christian theologians, known now as "the Church Fathers," called the Greek philosophers Socrates, Plato and Aristotle "Christians before Christ." They were sure that noble truth, even if found among the heathen, is from the eternal Christ. In his epistles, the apostle Paul sometimes proves his point by quoting from heathen poets, even from a poem of praise to the heathen god Zeus in Acts 17.

Christ is eternally self-existent and omnipresent.

Amshel Rothschild was not a Christian. Tso-Po-Tao lived before Christ came to this earth. They too belonged to the soul of his church, striving after what is noble, true, beautiful, and loving even without knowing him. It is written that on the eighth day his parents gave the Saviour the name "Jesus." The shepherds in Bethlehem and the Magi believed in him without knowing this most holy name.

Psychotherapist's Soul Healed

Kasparovitch, one of the most famous Soviet psychotherapists, had been educated in atheism like everyone else in Russia. But now that religion is free in that benighted country, he received for the first time a Gospel. Here he found two of Jesus' sayings, through which, he says, God revealed himself to him. The first was, "Not as I will, but as you will" (MTT 26:39). In this he found the key to a healthy mental life and to healthy relations with his fellow men.

Two wills operate in a person's life: that of his own consciousness and that of his Creator. The former appeared yesterday and will disappear tomorrow. It knows as much as a toddler knows. It is determined by the passions, impulses, interests, and pleasures of the self, which must come to realize its own pettiness and unreliability. Therefore it has to say, "Not my will" but "The will of my all-knowing Creator, who loves me and has a host of angels to fulfill his plans for my life."

The experience is like that of a patient who surrenders his consciousness to an anesthetist and surgeon to do with his body what they know to be best. Not the will of the sick, but that of the surgeon. Not my will, but that of God.

Jesus' words "Not as I will, but as you will" apply not only to God but also to relations between men. Our guide in life should be, "Not my will, but as my spouse, my child, my parents, my boss, my employee, the man with whom I am in conflict wills - providing it does not harm him."

Accept these words of Jesus, and you too will be healthy.

Kasparovitch was also struck by Jesus' expressed purpose in his earthly life: "I came not to destroy, but to fulfil";

"I came not to judge, but to save"; "I came to seek and to save that which was lost."

Jesus knew why he came into the world. There is a purpose also in my appearing in the world. I must fulfill the law of love. If I live according to this law, I will be happy and will make others happy.

In the former USSR, many are now making such discoveries. To bring the light of Christ to those forcibly kept in darkness has been my life's work for over half a century.

Let Us Depart to the Other Side

I am now 83 years old. In the Bible there is a man called Barzillai who is described as "very old," though he was only 80. My life has also been full of suffering, and even now I have many burdens to bear. It is natural for me to ask myself if I will be able to write this new book.

When General Morescat told Napoleon that the crossing of the Alps would be very difficult, the Emperor asked, "But is it possible?"

The general replied, "If you make an extraordinary effort."

"Then let us go," said Napoleon.

Napoleon's army had to cross to the other side of the Alps. I too have to cross a barrier, and I would like us to make the crossing together.

In several places, the gospel tells about Jesus' commandment to his disciples "to depart or go before him to the other side" (of the sea of Galilee). At other times he accompanies them.

The Bible has a mystical as well as a historical meaning. Though we live on earth, we sometimes have to depart to another realm. This was true of the apostle Paul and his companions when they were in jail. For certain periods they were raptured to heavenly places. There were hours of relaxation when they were surrounded not by jailors and torturers, but by angels. Then they had to "cross the sea" again and return to the material world with its locked doors, iron bars, whips, and crosses. After a time there would be another crossing to the world of the spirit.

Under both Fascism and Communism I endured suffering and strife, and I am sure that those of you in the free world have had your crosses too. But the purpose of this book is to elevate ourselves – author and reader alike – to the realm in which all that is petty in human life is conquered, to a place from which we can better view our lives, our churches, and our countries. This journey will not be easy, but with God's help we may succeed.

Transparent Angels

It is twenty years since Vania Moiseev, a young Romanian, died a martyr's death in the then USSR. His life can serve as a model for us.

He was a soldier in the Soviet army who had the same faith we all have, but with a difference: his faith was contagious. If one has the flu, the chances are that someone else will catch it. So it is with faith.

Moiseev spoke about his faith to his comrades and officers. And then he sang about the glory of Christ in his barracks, though this was strictly prohibited. To those who threatened him he replied, "A lark threatened with death for singing would still continue to sing. She cannot renounce her nature. Neither can we Christians." His singing brought fellow soldiers to Christ. For punishment he was forced to stand all night long outside the barracks in the depth of winter, clothed only in a summer uniform. He was flogged and finally stabbed in the heart, just like Jesus, whose heart was pierced by a sword; thus he too had an imprint of Jesus' wound .

He took all the suffering valiantly, saying that an angel had shown him heavenly Jerusalem. An uncultured man, he described angels as no theologian would have done. He said, "Angels are transparent. If an angel stands before you with a man behind him, the presence of the angel does not keep you from seeing the man. On the contrary: looking at a man through an angel makes him more beautiful. I see my torturers through an angel. In that way, even they become lovable."

People have arbitrarily declared that angels are invisible. Yet Jesus said to Nathanael, "You shall see angels of God" (JHN 1:51). If he could see them, why can't we? But you have to understand that they are transparent. Every time you saw the good side of a person you once rejected as totally despicable, an angel was standing between and he altered your perception.

Liuba Ganevskaya had been arrested for her faith by Russian Communists. She was kept in a solitary cell, starved and beaten. One night she said to herself, "Enough is enough. I will not take the blows meekly anymore. Tonight, if they begin again, I will tell the police officer to his face that he is a criminal." But that night when he insulted her with foul words and was ready to jump at her, somehow she saw him differently. She observed for the first time that he was as tired of beating as she was of being beaten. She was worn out from lack of sleep, and so was he. He was as desperate over not obtaining from her the denunciation of others that he expected as she was about suffering for refusing to comply.

A voice told her, "He is so much like you. You are both caught in the same drama of life. Stalin, the chief Communist dictator, killed thousands of God's children, but he also killed 10,000 officers of his own secret police. Three successive heads of police, Yagoda, Yezhov and Beria, were shot by their comrades, just like the Christians they had persecuted. You and your torturers pass through the same vale of tears." Liuba looked up at the one who had already lifted the whip to beat her and smiled. Stunned, he asked her, "Why do you smile?"

She replied, "I don't see you as a mirror would reflect you right now. I see you as you surely once were, a beautiful innocent child. We are the same age. We could have been playmates. Jesus likened those who would later whip and crucify him to children (MTT 12:17). I see you, too, as I hope you will be. There was once a persecutor worse than you, Saul of Tarsus; and he became an apostle and a saint."

Liuba had seen a transparent angel.

She asked the now pacified torturer what burden so weighed on him that it drove him to the madness of beating a person who had done him no harm. Because of her loving concern, he became a changed man. She had walked in a manner worthy of God.

We too should look like that at spouses, children, parents, brothers, sisters, men and women of other religions, party, class, or race with whom we are in conflict; if we find ourselves beginning to understand, love and forgive them, then we may know that we have seen an angel.

Stealing from God

A Communist officer who came to arrest a pastor asked him, "Do you consider me a monster, as everyone else does?"

The pastor, repressing any natural revulsion toward his oppressor, loved the man and answered, "Monster? No, I see an unhappy man who believes that no one loves him. But God loves you, and in a special way. It was for evil men that he became man. He did not come to earth because we were nice altar-boys, but because we were dirty. The dirtier we are, the more right we have to his pity."

The officer defended himself. "I am not as bad as that. I am not a thief."

"You are," answered the pastor. "You have stolen from God."

"What?" came the sharp retort. "How?"

"You have robbed him of your sins. Our sins belong to him. To take them as his property, he came to be born as the Son of man. The dirt of our evil deeds are his, not yours. If you refuse to give them to him, the Lamb of God who takes away the sin of the world, who has the right to take them away because they are his property, you are a thief. Only a robber keeps what belongs to someone else."

That night the pastor remained unimprisoned.

In our day, Communism is the greatest sin committed by mankind. It robs Jesus of what belongs to him: the sins of all of us. In our fight against the evils of this ideology, we realize we are dealing not with some human weakness but with tremendous devilish forces that control the actions of men.

Jesus equated sin with sickness (MTT 9:11,12). Communists have a disgusting, contagious sickness. Devils rule them, therefore we must love them. But all the while we must hate their sickness. Communism is powerful, but the Saviour has given us even greater power to cast out these devils and heal people of the deadly disease of Communism, and of compromise with Communism.

We as Christians are unworthy to lift our eyes to God, but our vocation can be touched by no one. It pleased God to call such sinners as you and me to heal sickness and to cast out devils. We engage in this fight undaunted by our own frailty because we do so in his strength.

Poet Risks Jail

Solouhin, a Russian Communist, was bitterly attacked by his comrades for writing "wrong" poetry, which might have landed him in jail. One sees in his poems a primitive, unconscious groping for God, a seeking for what is holy without religious knowledge of any kind. They would not satisfy an American fundamentalist minister, who would find they did not correspond with his Bible and books of dogma but would fail to see that because of his own failure to engage in secret missionary work in Russia, the young poet probably had never seen a Bible or any other Christian book.

In one poem, Solouhin describes an ancient Orthodox church, with holy images seemingly of burnished gold. When evening came "in the church, even darkness somehow appeared to be golden."

How golden is even darkness when it is a church - this, only a Russian could tell you. Their churches have been taken away; therefore they value them. Westerners have churches on every corner; therefore they criticize them, not observing how golden are even the churches' failures and sins, because there is always in the church not only the human but also the divine.

One ikon there, says Solouhin, is five centuries old. For 500 years the holy mother painted on it wept over her to-be-crucified Son, but also wept with all the sinners who bowed in church confessing their sins. Then the image was thrown on the rubbish heap. The church was transformed into an official building for the Soviets, where no one weeps with those who weep. The holy image was picked up by a farmer lady, who hung it in a place of honour in her home. On a visit to her village, Solouhin saw it and told the lady that she could get good money by selling it to some museum because of its value as an artistic antiquity. The farmer lady answered, "Cut me in pieces, burn out my eyes with red-hot irons - I will not give the mother of the Lord, the luminous Mary's picture, to be mocked by devils. She speaks to me every day."

Solouhin finished his poem by telling us that for years he travelled without ever being able to forget the picture of the holy mother and the Holy Child in her lap.

The Russian publication ~Religion and Atheism in the Soviet Union~ reported the following:

> A teacher, Mrs Ziazeva, wrote to the newspapers and > to the propagandists of atheism that, after studying the gospel, the Koran [holy book of the Moslems] and the Vedas [holy book of the Hindus], she came to > Christianity in its Eastern Orthodox form because it gave light and warmth to her philosophical search.

> The Soviet historian Anna Tihaia returned her membership card to the Komsomol, the Communist youth organization, because it is atheistic. When interrogated, she explained how she arrived at her belief in God, after having thought critically about the contemporary science of official materialism. She could not remain a university professor. She became a unqualified worker in a factory and a Baptist activist.

The gospel survived in other Communist countries well, even among the ruling class. When the Soviets entered Czechoslovakia the members of the Czech Parliament, surrounded by Russian troops, were in panic. Only one member, a Christian, quietly took out his Bible and read. The others asked him, "Don't you care about the tragedy around us? We ourselves might be arrested and deported to Siberia soon. How can you sit so quietly?"

He answered, "This is the Word of God, which gives comfort to the troubled heart."

Then they invited him to read the Scriptures from the rostrum of the Communist Parliament, from which only bitter Leninist theories had been propagated. Later sixty members of parliament asked for Bibles and received them.

Renowned Beggar in Church History

J. Tauler, the renowned priest and theologian whom Luther calls his teacher, felt that he did not have the real thing - intimacy with Christ - and prayed for years for an encounter with somebody who did. There was nobody among his colleagues.

page 30 The Overcomers

One day, he heard a voice: "Go to that church and you will find the one whom you seek."

He went. At the porch was a beggar in rags. Tauler said "Good day."

"I don't remember ever having had a bad day," the beggar responded.

"Well, may you have a happy life."

The beggar said, "I was never unhappy. All my days were good. I praised God when I was hungry, when it rained and snowed, and when I was homeless. When I am despised or encounter any other evil, I don't cease to give thanks to God. I am always happy, because I will, without any reservation, all that God wills for me. I receive with joy from God whatever he gives me, be it sweet or bitter. This makes me happy."

Tauler asked him, "What would you do if you were damned for eternity?"

"I have two arms: humility and love. With these I would embrace him so mightily that if I had to enter hell, he would have to enter with me. It would be sweeter for me to be with him in hell than without him in heaven."

"When did you find God?"

When I forsook attachment to any creature."

"But who are you?"

"I am a king."

"Where is your kingdom?"

"It is right in my heart. Christ gave it to me when he shed his blood for me."

The churches that have passed through persecution have such saints. The Lutheran pastor Traugott Hahn, who was killed by the Communists in Latvia in 1919, was one. He had written: "Higher Christianity starts only where martyrdom and sacrifice start. Without sacrifice, there is no salvation. It is foolishness to wish happiness on earth. Life is self-denial. To put everything at stake for God and his church, to follow him to the very end, is more than happiness. It is bliss."

This book was written to enable us to encounter men of this calibre.

Small Gems

Genuine heroes, larger-than-life figures, are very rare. Heroes are persons for whom the exceptional becomes the norm. Frequently they do not last long. Some of them might not have ended up as heroes if they had lived longer. But there are little gems even among those who tried and did not succeed. More souls have been won for Christ by preachers who did what little they could, than by renowned evangelists.

A tiny poodle once stood near a wolfhound. The large dog asked scornfully, "Do you consider yourself a dog?" The little one did not have the courage to stand up to the large dog but nevertheless replied, "Sir, I might not be such a big dog as you, but neither can you say I am a cat."

The smallest dog is still a dog. And a person who shows a little bit of heroism in Christian life is still a hero. Many of the top leaders of the official Baptist Church in the former Soviet Union were stooges of the Communists. Here is a letter of instruction issued by the leadership to the churches in 1960. It was written by the Baptist pastor Karev:

> The young under 18 should not be baptized; baptisms of persons between 18 and 30 have to be reduced to a minimum; gatherings of pastors are forbidden, as are courses for teaching music directors and the gathering of funds for the poor; pastors have to take a stand against missionary activities, since they are "unhealthy."

Such instructions were given not by atheist authorities directly but by Baptist preachers who had become their servants. The rank-and-file Christian knew that his pastor was a traitor. But in the show church in Moscow this same pastor had to read from the Bible. The songs praised the Saviour. The sermon, though not delivered in the right spirit, mentioned the name of Jesus. What a mighty work of God it was that thousands of Christians did not take offence at the wicked character of their pastor but thronged the church to hear the name of Christ and to adore him! One can worship God even in a religious service led by a Judas.

The same thing happened in the Soviet Orthodox Church. The Christian Nobel prize winner Alexander Solzhenitsyn revealed that the synod of bishops was guided by the Communist state. He wrote:

> A church led in a dictatorial manner by atheists is something unheard of in almost 2,000 years of Christianity. The printed Gospel can be obtained nowhere in our country. We receive the Bible from abroad [a reference to organizations like ours that smuggle Bibles]. But Orthodox believers pack the churches in which the liturgy is said by bishops and priests who are tools of Communism. The traitors chant the praises of Christ. They give a communion which is so holy that not even its being consecrated and imparted by a treacherous priest makes it lose its value.

Not all preachers who do such things are stooges. Some are real Christians who try to serve their Master in this shameful way. There exists not only the spoken word but also body language. the gestures, facial expressions and tears running down the cheek.

In Japanese there are forty words for "No." Some of them mean "Yes."

I knew a man who had to laud the Communist regime in his speech. These were his words: "Under the wise leadership of the genial Ceausescu and the Communist Party, our country is lifted yearly to a higher and higher and higher way of life, up to the zenith." But as he pronounced these words, he began with his arms lifted high. Every time he said the word "higher" he lowered his arms a little bit more. When he said "zenith" his arms were at his side.

p033

Everyone understood what he meant. This is also a way to express the truth.

That man ended up in prison, but he had served the truth in his own way. There had been a spark of heroism in him.

Be Grand Among Dwarfs

Christ invites everyone to grandeur. If one cannot be even the smallest of the giants, he can strive to be the greatest among dwarfs.

The Romanian Orthodox priest X had been an anti-Semite and had written a book proving that a Jew cannot become a Christian. Soon after the Communist takeover, he changed his politics and became a collaborator with the Reds. He won their confidence and was given a high position in the Ministry of Cults.

Later he became converted. He remained in favour with the Communists and so could reveal to us their secrets, including the names of informers within the church. He even told us those who had informed against me; he rendered the Underground Church important services while making a semblance of being loyal to the Reds. At the congress of the World Council of Churches in Uppsala, he spoke publicly against us, but secretly he met with leaders of our Scandinavian missions and assured them that the assertions about the persecutions were correct and all accusations brought against me were slander.

We honour his memory. God will reward him for the good done to the Underground Church, though it would certainly be much better if there were no compromise at all, if every Christian would say a decided "no" to every temptation of sin or fear.

We cannot point an accusing finger at those who are only half or partial heroes. Half a loaf is better than none. We have a modest God. In Numbers 31 [NUM 31], he tells the Jews that he will give them a great victory in battle and much booty. Though the victory will be his, he says he will be satisfied with only one-fiftieth of the booty. No one else would have struck such a deal.

p034

To the weaklings who served God with their weakness, I quote the words of Jesus: "All men cannot receive this saying, save they to whom it is given" (MTT 19:11). These words have freed my conscience from many unfounded regrets and much painful remorse. They can free others too.

It is obvious that not all commandments of the Bible are written for all believers. No one is obliged to fulfil all of them, and we must not feel bad when we cannot accomplish them. Some commandments are given only to the Jewish priests, others only to husbands or wives, others to children. The commandments for masters are not the same as those to servants. Many verses concern exclusively the generation that conquered Canaan. Some apply only to farmers. God does not expect the same thing from men of various temperaments and different educational backgrounds. Everyone should serve God according to his calling and his own gifts, without torturing his conscience over the fact that he cannot do other things for which he is not qualified. Not a few of those who were heroes in the encounter with Communist terror and suffered much, once freed, showed no power at all to resist the temptations of sex, money, or pride.

As one body, all together, we should fulfil the whole law, but no individual alone can be expected to fulfil it. Only Jesus was able to say, "I came to fulfil the law" (MTT 5:17).

There are certain commands that can be received only by exceptional beings to whom they are given and only in corresponding situations.

Let us strive to be at least grand dwarfs.

p035

Compromise and Regret

In Romania, when a nun who had been in hiding was arrested, she cracked under torture and gave the names of all who had sheltered her and even those who had ever given her something to eat. They were all given life sentences, and their whole families were arrested, including grandparents, parents, and children. Many died. The nun passed her days weeping about what she had done.

An Italian paper told the story of a bishop who returned to his cell from an interrogation under torture, no longer recognizing his friends. He repeated again and again, "I have no other alternative but to hang myself." He was a man of fifty who had been active, capable, courageous.

At the World Baptist Congress in Tokyo, the Soviet delegation lied about religious liberty in their country and paraded the blood-stained flag of Communism along with the flags of the other nations represented. I stood up and protested loudly: "This is not the flag of Russia, but the universal flag of God-hatred. It is red with the blood of the martyrs." Some Baptists used physical violence to drive me out of the Congress, as 10,000 delegates from countries worldwide cheered the Red flag. Not one took up my defence.

But the story does not end there. When I went to the Baptist church in Moscow in 1991, Bytchkov (who had been their General Secretary) kissed me and said publicly, "Fascists and Communists have beaten you. We Baptists have beaten you too." How many preachers who have not sinned like the Russian Baptist collaborators of Communism would have exhibited the heroism of such a humble apology? How many of those who have not sinned like the bishop or nun would have repented, as Jesus said, "in sackcloth and ashes"?

Today we should be slow to condemn believers who, under pressure, did foolish things. We must keep in mind

p036

how much they have suffered. In Czechoslovakia, the Communists put an empty bucket over the head of a bound prisoner and hammered on it again and again. Laughing contemptuously, they said, "By this method we could make even Jesus say he is not the Saviour."

They were wrong about Jesus. But humans are often very weak and sometimes yield to more than physical tortures .

Iurii Shukevitch was imprisoned as a child for his father's "crime" of being a Ukrainian fighter against Communism. When asked to dissociate himself from his father, he refused, just as my wife and son did when I was thrown into Romanian jails. Shukevitch was in jail and deportation for thirty-four years (1948-1968 and 1972-1986) for fulfilling the one commandment with a promised blessing: Honour your parents. Then, blind and after all that suffering, he had the great pain inflicted upon him. The Communists published a forged letter in which he allegedly denied his father.

Individuals whose childhood was stolen from them, who are heroes of the faith, are often victims of depression. They are prone to irrational attitudes and aggressiveness, even against friends. Their whole life becomes distorted, even if they are Christians, because in jail they had no opportunity to learn more Christian doctrine.

It is written in REV 4:8 that certain angels are covered with eyes. Therefore they see not only what we do and the conditions that shaped our actions, but also what we would have been under different circumstances. No violinist can play without a violin. Can God's wisdom penetrate a brain damaged by torture? This prisoner probably betrayed someone and then regretted it. Under the influence of drugs, another bishop declared, contrary to his convictions, "The Vatican is an international centre of espionage led by warmongers."

Jesus called Judas, after Judas had betrayed him without any pressure to do so, "friend." Will he not do the same to this nun, this bishop, to you and me when we give way to impulses stronger than our conscience? If this nun and the bishop had lived in a free country, they might have been model Christians.

Solzhenitsyn, the Christian writer and Nobel prize winner expelled from the Soviet Union, states that in the first thirty-five years of the Communist regime between forty and fifty million citizens passed through concentration camps, and more followed later. But these are not the only victims of Communism. How many millions have become Judases to save their own liberty by causing others to enter prison? How many yielded to the tragedy of becoming torturers and inhumane guards? The faith of how many millions has been destroyed, because they were not able to bear seeing so much suffering in a world created by a loving God?

Rising After a Deep Fall

At least 50,000 Orthodox priests were killed by the Soviets. An Orthodox priest, Father Mihail, was among the few not yet arrested, but he had lost his faith. The loss came suddenly. He had just chanted during the liturgy "Blessed be God" when he heard a voice whispering, "There is no God."

He looked questioningly at the images of saints hanging on the walls. What did their friendship with God mean? Does such a mighty Friend allow his believers to be thrown before wild beasts, burned on stakes, tortured inhumanely? He tried to repress these thoughts. He repeated to himself again and again the words of the psalm, "The fool has said in his heart, There is no God." [PSA 14:1] It did not help.

Subsequent to that moment, he continued to act as a priest out of a sense of duty, but he no longer believed. The sorrow around him was too great. He had to restrain himself to keep from crying out to the peasants who filled the church, "Go home, poor people. There is no God. God, if he existed, would not permit this bloody chaos."

Drunken Communists arrested him on an Easter eve. Among them was the cantor of his church, whom he had dismissed because of immoral behaviour. Now he too was a Communist. The head of the gang told the priest, "We have decided to kill you. What have you to say?"

Life was worthless for Father Mihail. He answered, "As you like."

But he was given a chance. "If you renounce Christ and trample on a cross, you will be freed."

The thought passed through his mind, I don't believe. What does a cross mean to me? Let me save my life." But when he opened his mouth, he said, to his own surprise, "I believe in one God."

Then the former cantor proposed that he should be crucified. "It is Easter. Let him be resurrected." As a caricature of the crown of thorns, they put his fur cap on his head with the linen on the outside; they put a sack upon his shoulders as a royal garment, and the cantor knelt, saying, "Hail, King of the Jews!" Then they beat him.

He prayed to the One in whom he did not believe: "If you exist, save me." With a loud voice, he repeated, "I believe in one God."

This made such an impression upon the drunken murderers that they freed him. He came home, prostrated himself on the earth in his prayer corner, and said with tears, "I believe."

By being faithful in spite of extreme doubts, by asserting his belief when dark clouds had separated him from heaven, by sharing the suffering of Christ though he was not even sure any more of his existence, he won his soul.

Some Christians bear their suffering with patience, resignation and love. Other martyrs ask the torturers who insult and mistreat them to forgive them for not having been even better Christians. A believer once wrote, "The first five years in jail I suffered as an innocent. When I reached twentieth year, I realized my guilt. Everyone is guilty who has been less than a sun, less than Christlike."

Martyrs at Different Levels

Ivan Horev died for Christ in jail. His son Nikolai also went to jail for twenty years.
It is a rule that when an officer enters a cell everyone has to stand to attention. Once, Nikolai Horev was slow to show such respect. For this he was punished with a hundred days in solitary, in which food was given only every second day. After this, a new torture called "Afrikanka" was applied to him. He was put barefoot in a box with room only to stand. On the floor was a multitude of small pyramids with sharp edges. To protect his feet, he could only stand between them on his heels or his toes, both positions excruciatingly painful. Horev fainted.
When he regained consciousness, he remembered being in a most beautiful place, where he was taught, "Never turn your face in anger from your tormentors. Jesus the Master did not turn his face from those who spat on him. Look at your enemies with the same love with which a bride loves her bridegroom."
Horev belongs among those lifted to higher spiritual realms.
Soon after this, his son Benjamin was put in the same cell. In it he found an inscription on the wall made by his father.
Every Christian has a cross to bear, but some bear it loving passionately those who impose it on them. They are able to smile at their torturers.
But not all martyrs are like this, since they are on different spiritual levels. Some, primarily those killed for Christ at an early age of their faith, cry out, "How long, Lord, holy and true, until you judge and avenge our blood on those who dwell on the earth?" (REV 6:10). Out of caution, God keeps these martyrs under the altar. It would be terrible if such sentiments were to become dominant. But these too have a martyr's crown.
St Catherine of Siena in the fourteenth century brought to repentance a criminal sentenced to death, whom she had visited in jail. He asked her to be with him when he was beheaded. Early the next morning she went to the place of execution, put her head on the block, and prayed that at the last moment light and peace might be given to him. There is no more effective prayer than that in which you transpose yourself into the situation of the one for whom you pray. The former criminal died with the words "Jesus: Catherine" on his lips and went to the wedding of the Lamb, having been washed in his blood.

We should identify in prayer with the martyrs, especially those who are weak and cannot remain loving and pure to the very end. Pray for them because they too are human and cannot always live on the heights. No ballerina can stand twenty-four hours on tiptoe. No one's behaviour is saintly twenty-four hours a day. Even the noblest sufferer for Christ needs comfort, encouragement, and the willingness of a friend to cover up their sins. And even the least among us can be helpful to this extent.

Those who have passed through Communist prisons are unspeakably poor. When arrested, they suffer the loss of home and furniture. Many are no longer able to work physically or intellectually. Their children were not allowed to study or attend school. Therefore they are in desperate need of material help. St. Ambrose said, "Whosoever can help a poor man and does not do so is a thief, and if the other dies of hunger, he is a murderer." Let us be careful. The one from whom we steal or kill in this way may be a Christian who has suffered for his faith.

Patience with Those Who Waver

Since not all who were persecuted for their faith were strong or bore their cross with dignity and resisted temptation - like us in the free world? - how should we relate to them? Over 700 years before the coming of Jesus, Isaiah prophesied the appearance of a servant of God in whose name the Gentiles would trust: "A bruised reed shall he not break? and smoking flax shall he not quench, till he send forth judgment unto victory" (MTT 12:20).

Often quoted to show the merciful nature of the Lord, these words should speak to us in a more profound way than just make us beg for his pity. In our age of readily available fire, from matches to blow-torches, it is hard to imagine how important it was in the primitive society of Isaiah's time for someone not to quench smoking flax. But anyone who has tried to light a campfire when drenched by rain or depending on a last match realizes that in order to start a fire, it is not enough to leave smoking twigs or leaves alone, even briefly. One has to blow repeatedly and inhale smoke for a long period, starting and restarting the fire until blood rushes to the head and one feels dizzy. Even in a dry house, the effort needed to start a fire in the fireplace or a primitive stove is considerable, especially if a person is trembling with the cold. Such is the price for keeping smoking flax from being quenched. For in those times, fire was left overnight to smoulder in the ashes so that it could be more easily rekindled the next morning.

The first disciples spoke of this from their own familiar experience. Jesus must have kept many a fire from being quenched. Even after his resurrection, he waited for them on the shores of Lake Tiberias, with a fire on which fish were being broiled (JHN 21:9). This must have been a pleasant surprise for the disciples after a whole night of unsuccessful fishing. All true followers of Jesus also work hard, giving their breath to fan into flame the tiny sparks in the ashes of another's life.

Communists who burned genitals with red-hot iron pokers were able to break even a cardinal. When a Catholic receives a cardinal's beret, the Pope tells him that this is to be a sign that he will defend the faith ~usque ad sanguem~, to the blood. But a cardinal confessed at his trial to having been a spy and a black marketeer.

The effects of brainwashing last many years: another cardinal, in Rome after eighteen years in Soviet jails, declared, "The Catholic is nowhere in opposition to authority. This certainly applies to the Soviet regime." It was not the cardinal who said this but the Communist brainwasher who had programmed him to do so.

In Russia, Alexander Ogorodnikov organized a Christian seminar. For this he received a mild sentence: one year. But when he had finished this term, he was tried once more for having preached about Christ in prison. The public, gathered in the courtyard of the tribunal, was not allowed to enter. Ogorodnikov opened the window near the dock and shouted the story of Christ to the crowd. For this he was given another six years, which he served. But then three more years were added on.

He wrote a depressing letter to his mother. Heroes too have their memories of despair when it seems to them that everything is lost. Jesus himself cried out on the cross, "My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?" [MTT 27:46; MRK 15:34] Ogorodnikov said he was kept in punishment cells at 30øF. He hoped for death, as the end of pain. He even cut his veins, but was discovered. We should not judge him. The spirit is strong but the flesh is weak. It was after a long hunger strike that he yielded to despair: he had demanded a Bible. What really brought him to desperation was the silence around him. Like all of us, he was hungry for love. Attempts at suicide and harsh words are often simply the expression of one desire: "Show me love and recognition."

He wrote:

> Men are so terribly tortured that they wish for death and no one cares. Soldiers hopelessly wounded are shot to free them from pain, whereas I have to endure it lifelong. Suicide is a terrible, unpardonable sin. I have committed it. If the persecutors killed me, they would free me from suffering. Only publicity can save me, and this is possible only through you.

> Why don't you write me at least to tell me if my son Dima goes to church, takes Communion, wears a cross? He should not enter the Communist children's organization, because he is a Christian. If you don't write me, I will give myself entirely into the hands of the torturers without protesting. Your silence is a stab in my back.
> It is difficult to realize that you are not needed by anyone, that you are destined to forgo a life full of energy without receiving sympathy, that you must hunger, suffer cold, be deprived of books, that even life, God's holy gift, must consist of blank pain.
>
> May God protect you.

Paul knew that the best of men pass through such times of despondency; so he wrote, "Strengthen the hands which hang down, and the feeble knees" (HEB 12:12).

Our mission published Ogorodnikov's letter in many countries, along with his address. We also printed a letter from another prisoner who, when freed, found a hungry family with nothing to give him. Neighbours helped with a few potatoes. These, cooked without any fat, were his first meal after years of starvation. As a result, some of our readers wrote to these sufferers. Their letters and the information that their families would be cared for lifted the spirits of these despairing souls and gave them hope.

The same Ogorodnikov who wrote such a despondent letter recently communicated the following:

> I bow my head and bend my knees with profound gratitude for your prayers and compassionate activity in defence of the persecuted Russian Christians. In the concentration camps, buried in the gravelike darkness of solitary cells, in the silence that changes even time into torture, when silent yearning erodes the heart, hungry, when it seems that the world has forgotten you - I felt physically how your prayers warmed me in the cold of my cell, tying us together in > our common faith. Your hand passed through the high wall and barbed wire. The power of your love changed my despair to undefeatable hope. The all-seeing God heard your prayers and opened the prison gates. We see now how your love, faith, and works change history.

Raped Minds

Jesus would not enter the house of a disciple if not invited. The Communists, on the other hand, use even the threat of homosexual rape to subdue the minds of believers. For this purpose they put the brethren Klassen and Tchemodanov in cells reserved for homosexuals.

They forced the Orthodox priest Dudko to recant on nationwide TV. Dudko had been the most renowned evangelist of the USSR. Solzhenitsyn and other prominent Russian personalities consider him their spiritual father. But under threat he expressed his regret for his "fight against atheism, which is a fight against the Soviet regime." He acknowledged that he had done great harm to the church and the country by his preaching.

We feel that Dudko is not guilty before God. One who is injected with depersonalizing chemical substances or subjected to extreme beatings and pressure is no longer himself and is thus not responsible for his actions. Jesus never steps across the threshold of our will, but asks for our consent, as we should do to others. By contrast, Communist leaders impose their will with cruelty.

When the situation changed in the USSR, Dudko wrote in a new book, ~The Lost Coin~: "I realize that in prison I have betrayed the interests of the church. I have in my soul inexpressible pain. I see no way out. I am ready to do anything to repair my fault. How did I come to such a point? This question gives me no peace day or night."

In a letter he says, "I overestimated my resources, and no one has ever fallen so low. Why? What happened? Whom should I accuse? First, surely, myself."

The hope for Dudko, as for all of us, is the finished work of Christ. On the cross, Jesus said, "It is finished." He had made perfect expiation for sin, satisfying all the demands of the law. He has paid all our debts. There remains nothing for us to do, however low we may have fallen, except to receive his love with confidence and to continue our life with praise. Though one is abandoned by all others, he is not abandoned by God.

Such men are also counted as heroes before God. Their temporary fall is not imputed to them. The apostle Peter, called "the rock" by Jesus, fell repeatedly into sin. The other apostles fled when Jesus was arrested.

Let us also walk the way of heroism, though we live under entirely different circumstances. Let us do so even with stumbling steps. If we fall seven times a day, we can be forgiven. We are considered as if we had never sinned.

In the free world individuals have temptations that differ from those faced under terrorist governments. Here we are more apt to yield to the temptations of alcohol, drugs, sexual impurity, dishonesty, theft, and the like. Many of us commit such sins again and again, though we strive, some of us heroically, to resist them.

Jumping over Mountains

Before writing again about quite another category of Christians, I offer an "intermezzo" about the organization we started twenty-five years ago: Christian Missions to the Communist World.

In spite of recent events, this Communist world is now enormous: China with its 1.1 billion inhabitants, Vietnam, Laos, Cuba, plus the considerable power it wields in countries that took the path of economic and political reform and in which forty to seventy years of religious brainwashing continues to exert its influence.

Previously it comprehended as well the USSR, Eastern Europe, and a multitude of African states, such as Ethiopia, Somalia, Congo, Angola, Mozambique, Zimbabwe, Benin.

We were a small group of people: Bishop Norderval, a Norwegian Lutheran; Stuart Harris, an English Baptist preacher; Hans Braun, a German industrialist; a Dutch pastor Maris; a Swiss lady Hedi Fluri; Hans Zarcher, a Swiss bookkeeper; Pat Henegan, owner of a South African shipping business; Colette Grossu, former prisoner of the Communists, living in France; my wife Sabina, myself, and my son Mihai and his wife Judith.

What could we do against the immense power of Communism, as portrayed in our media? In our planning, we did not consider it so fearsome as it was portrayed.

But hasn't it been a world power? Decidedly not. Communism is only one power on the ridiculously tiny earth, one of the smallest planets orbiting around a modest star, one of 100 billions in our galaxy, one of one billion galaxies. Travelling at the speed of light one can reach the sun, which is 93 million miles away, in eight minutes. To reach the edge of our galaxy would take 100,000 years and that of the universe 10 billion years. Communism, like all earthly "isms," is a very little thing, though to us it seems like a mountain. But can't we move mountains?

I am a Jew. In my youth I was an atheist. The words of Christ had no authority for me. Even after I had accepted him, some of his words seemed fantastic. He says, "If ye have faith as a grain of mustard seed, ye shall say unto this mountain, Remove hence to yonder place, and it shall remove" (MTT 17:20). I tried to move mountains and did not succeed. Neither do I know any child of God who could perform such a deed.

I asked the Lord how it was that his words did not correspond to reality.

Now, a disciple of Christ should not deliver monologues in prayer, but should expect to receive answers to his questions. I received an answer to mine: "You, my beloved cannot move mountains because your faith is not the size of a grain. You have bushels full of faith. You do not use a thousand-ton hammer, such as those employed by heavy industry, to crack open a nut. Such a hammer can only perform great works. By the same token, you are called to do greater things than amuse yourself by moving mountains. You can move God. Remember how God decided to destroy the Jewish people after they had worshipped a golden calf, and Moses through his prayer made God change his mind. To produce changes in heavenly decrees is much more important than moving mountains."

Since then, I have stopped trying to move mountains. We are seated with Christ in heavenly places. We participate in things happening there. And when in our earthly life mountains hinder us, we don't command them to move. We follow the example of Christ, about whom his bride says "My beloved comes leaping upon the mountains, skipping upon the hills" (SOS 2:8).

We need not try to remove mountains of difficulties in our own lives. We should jump over them and do our Christian duty in spite of them.

We knew the words, "He who is in you is greater than he who is in the world" (1JN 4:4). But what should we use to start a mission that we conceived of as worldwide in scope? It is written that Jesus took seven loaves that were given to him, gave thanks, broke them, and gave them to the multitude. "They ate and were filled" (MRK 8:6-8). Suppose the disciples had not seven but only three loaves or only one. What would have happened? The multitude would have been satisfied just the same. As a matter of fact, on another occasion Jesus used only five loaves instead of seven. Notwithstanding, he fed an even bigger multitude and a greater number of baskets full of fragments remained behind (MRK 8:19, 20).

We realized we could serve God with the very little we had. His blessings do not depend upon the size or quantity of what we have but upon the fact that we bring them to him.

But suppose we have nothing to bring - what then? But that is impossible; the Hebrew, Aramean and Greek languages in which the Bible was written did not have the word "zero" or its mathematical symbol "0." A man who has nothing to bring to Jesus does not exist.

He can bring his own person, the very person that says, "I possess nothing." He has something very valuable: himself and his utter poverty. He can bring his sins to Jesus. From the sin of being a fanatical persecutor, God made Saul of Tarsus a zealous apostle. From the sin of a loose life Jesus made a saint with steadfast love, Mary Magdalene. If we bring our weakness to Christ, which we surely have, his strength will show its perfection in our weakness.

Our mission began with very little, almost nothing in fact; but instead of using this little directly, we brought it to Jesus. And he multiplied it and greatly blessed it.

By All Means

We decided to spread the gospel in Communist countries. By what means? Only one is biblical. Paul writes that it was his purpose to save souls "by all means" (1CO 9:22). He who is choosy about the means of propagating the gospel is not biblical.

While we respected Communist laws, we interpreted them in our own manner or broke them. To give just a few examples, we threw thousands of plastic bags into the Bering Straits separating Alaska from the USSR; in the Black Sea near the shores of the Ukraine; in the sea between the Greek islands and Albania. Each tightly-sealed bag contained a Gospel in the local language or a brochure showing the way of salvation, and a piece of chewing gum to induce even the worst Communist policeman to open the bag. We also enclosed pieces of straw to make the bag float on the water. Waves brought the bags to shore. We had studied the currents in the sea, to be sure they would arrive as we planned. The method worked.

When Albania opened up for religion recently, we met a man who had found such a Gospel, was converted through reading it, and from then on watched the shore to find others, which he distributed. Discovered, he spent nine years in jail for this "crime."

We asked him, "Are you angry at us? If it weren't for our activity, you wouldn't have been in prison."

He replied, "It was worth it."

After nine years in jail for Christ, he was able for the first time to attend church, and he received a Bible.

We also flew the message of Christ in balloons from West to East Germany, from South to North Korea. People are saved by all means - even by very poor means. The Albanian did not require a whole Bible, much less volumes of theology. He was saved by only one Gospel, which sustained him for nine years as a prisoner of Christ.

Of course, we smuggled in Bibles and Christian literature, by land, by sea, by tourists, by diplomats, by any means we could devise. We also smuggled in, piece by piece, printing presses, which were then assembled and sometimes put to work literally underground. The work entailed tremendous risks, but the rewards outweighed them by far. We created bookstores, print shops, mission centres in Romania, Hungary, Russia, Ethiopia, China. We were relentless in our endeavours.

Unfounded Hopes Are Founded

From prison, I had written to my family, "The most unfounded hope is much more founded than the most founded despair." At that point I had been sentenced to twenty years of forced labour and was deathly ill. I hoped then that once I were free and capable of working I would be able to help other persecuted children of God and spread the gospel to Communist countries far and wide. In my case, this hope came true. For twenty-five years I have been in the free world, and God has used me to create an international mission that has fulfilled my dream.

My family and I came to the West as poor, unknown immigrants, our only treasure our vision and our unfounded hope. We had no means to fulfill it. But despair is useless. Hope is a force to be reckoned with.

During these years there have been threats against my life, including the constant danger of being kidnapped. Sometimes simple swindlers, at other times church leaders who perhaps did not realize they served the Communist cause instead of God's attacked us. But I nurtured only hope. In all our adversities God made us more than conquerors. Thousands of believers on earth and angels in heaven made our earnest dream, as are all dreams that come from God, a reality.

At a wedding in Cana, Jesus was told, "Every man at the beginning does set forth good wine; and when men have well drunk, then that which is worse. But thou hast kept the good wine until now (JHN 2:10). The devil sometimes gives good things first: beautiful promises, selfish pleasures. After one has drunk deeply, a worse wine follows: wrecked lives, remorse, spiritual blindness, and in the end, the worst, eternal damnation.

Love knows that the best things are yet to come. Now it tastes the joy of obeying God's commands and delights in the fellowship of Christ, his holy angels, and the great communion of saints. This joy is for the present mingled with the bitterness of the cross. Now it is a glory in tribulations, distress, persecution, and nakedness. But in the midst of tears and the shedding of blood, the bride of Christ never ceases to hope. She knows her Bridegroom has stored up in his banqueting house the best of wines for the future. She is not in a hurry. Loves does not hasten to obtain results. She can bear with transitory failures, sufferings and defeats. The ultimate victory is hers.

We had nothing to fear. In September 1970 I wrote to all our missions:

> The church of Christ is not endangered by Communism. Even the gates of hell cannot prevail against her. It is Communism that is endangered by the existence of the church, because the final victory is ours. We have won for Christ the daughter of Stalin, the greatest mass-murderer of Christians; Mrs Kosygin, the wife of the Russian dictator; Pasternak, Solzhenitsyn, Siniavski, and other first-rank Soviet writers, formerly members of the Communist Party. We don't tremble before Communism. It should be in a panic because of us. The best of wines are stored up for the children of God.

There were a few little victories that the persecuted church had won by then. It continued to survive on hope, as did we. We fervently believed our teaching was correct: "Hate Communism, but love the Communists. Break through the Iron Curtain with the gospel and the prayers of saints." Communist governments have fallen. The Word of God is now disseminated freely in many countries of the former Communist bloc, whereas only a short time ago it was a crime to own or share a Bible. We helped the churches in Communist countries not only with Bibles, Christian literature, radio, printing facilities, material aid; we were able to give more than these. We gave them our love.

There has always been persecution of religion, as well as heroism. But under Fascism and Communism, mankind saw its spiritual midnight - and God's people their spiritual zenith. Today in many parts of the world there are still atrocities against those of other beliefs, but nowhere have they been practised on such a large scale.

Blessings at Midnight

The earth turns on its axis. Midnight is the moment when a part of the earth is the farthest away from the sun. Spiritual midnight is the period of the greatest departure of men from God. Today our generation has experienced unmentionable events in a midnight of unparalleled darkness. But midnight is not received with the same feelings by the children of God as by the world. At midnight, the firstborn of the Egyptians died, but the chosen people obtained their freedom.

The Lord said, "The night comes when no man can work" (JHN 9:4). But whenever something is declared impossible in the Bible, this does not refer to the faithful. About them Jesus declared, "All things are possible to him that believes" (MRK 9:23).

God's people can work even at midnight. It was at midnight that Samson took the gates of the city of Gaza (JDG 16:3). At midnight, Ruth received from Boaz the promise, "I will do to you all that you require" (RUT 3:11). At midnight, Paul and Silas won for the Lord the jailer of Philippi (ACT 16:25). At midnight, the people of God do their greatest exploits. Therefore, the psalmist says, "At midnight I will rise to give thanks unto thee" (PSA 119:62).

They are not afraid of the darkness in the world. They work. The Bridegroom comes soon. True children of God cannot meet him empty-handed.

Heroes in the Worst of Horrors

No one will ever be able to describe all the horrors of Communism. Edward Buca, a former inmate of Soviet concentration camps, describes in his book ~Vorkuta~ a particular horror. A Communist police officer tied a woman down, took a large candle and pushed it into her private parts, then lit it. He told the woman, "You have a little time to think things over. Soon the flame will reach your body.

When you're ready to sign the confession, give me the signal by blinking three times." As the flame burned down to her body, he watched calmly. Once he took out the candle, lit a cigarette with it, and put it back.

Prisoners who had tried to escape were beaten savagely, then tied behind galloping reindeer and dragged to death. A prisoner was compelled to play the harmonica near the corpses, which had been exposed to public view.

More gruesome horrors can scarcely be imagined.

But this is only one side of the story. I would never have told it, were there not a transcendent side that more than compensates for the ugliness.

In the third volume of his ~Gulag Archipelago~, Solzhenitsyn tells the story of an evangelist whose name "seems to have been Alexander Sisoiev." He never published volumes of sermons, was never on TV, had no mass rallies. Just as the creed says nothing about the sermons of Jesus but only that he suffered under Pontius Pilate, was crucified and buried, so history says about Sisoiev only that he was an evangelist and that he was shot in the Kengir concentration camp, after spending many years in prison in quiet communion with his Lord. At that time, shooting of the innocent was an everyday occurrence. But this man "called perhaps Sisoiev" had been a man apart. Those who looked at him "took knowledge that he had been with Jesus," though he was "unlearned and ignorant" like Peter and John (ACT 4:13).

The camp inmates were resigned to the beating and shooting of other prisoners, but when this saint - whose name is not even known for sure - was shot, the whole camp of 2,500 prisoners - among whom were murderers, burglars, thieves, and 500 political prisoners - rebelled. They refused to work and attacked the guards. Their supreme request was that the person responsible for the shooting be punished.

In the end, the Communists quenched the revolt after killing about 700 political prisoners and criminals, who died showing their love for and solidarity with a man about whom we know nothing except that he knew how to maintain his privacy, how to commune in quietness with God and had an inner closet even in a common prison cell.

Perhaps instead of having conferences about modern evangelization methods it is more important for us to be like the one "whose name was perhaps Sisoiev."

I picked this case at random from countless such stories we have heard. I could as well have spoken about Zdorovets, terribly beaten in a Soviet prison; or Dubizki, to whom poison was administered in jail; or Peter Siemens, whom the Communist poisoners call "a poisoner of souls" in their newspaper because he brought people to Christ. For this he was sentenced to three years in prison.

These men are great not for what they wrote or spoke;

we do not know their words. But we do know that they spent much time alone with the Lord and as a result they shine now like stars in the firmament of the gospel and in the memory of their fellow prisoners.

Mark's Gospel says, "Without a parable Jesus spoke not unto them" (MRK 4:34). Every parable of Jesus has a streak of sadness in it. We know Jesus wept [JHN 11:35], whereas we have no report that he ever laughed or smiled. He must feel uneasy around politicians and evangelists who have a professional smile on their lips. In one parable he says a sower must count on the sad fact that three-quarters of his seed will be lost, while a grain of mustard seed grows out of all proportion and becomes a tree. Such fantastic growth of plants has taken place only after the explosion of atomic bombs in Japan. Tragedy also makes the mustard seed of the Kingdom of Heaven grow exceptionally high. The Church advances by the blood of the martyrs.

All Christians must be prepared to face adversity and personal trauma. God can protect us and give us happy days, but no believer is exempt from tribulations. Let us expect them with serenity.

The Simplest Way to Obtain God's Love

"There are hundreds of ways to obtain God's love, but only one is certain," said a preacher.

"What's that?" asked a colleague.

"Aha," retorted the first, "I thought you wouldn't know."

The least-known way to obtain God's love is the simplest one: to keep his commandments. Jesus said, "He that has my commandments, and keeps them, he it is that loves me; and he that loves me shall be loved of my Father, and I will love him" (JHN 14:21). He also said, "If you will enter into life, keep the commandments" (MTT 19:17). Every morning, sing a hymn, read a Bible portion, pray, have a quiet time for listening to what God has to say to you that day, and then set about to fulfill his commands. All his commandments can be resolved into one: to imitate Jesus and the best of men, even though this might involve suffering and possibly death.

In the battle of Waterloo, Napoleon was defeated by the British general Wellington. Lord Hill, showing the latter the corpse of his aide-de-camp Gordon, asked: "What is your instruction, my lord, if you are killed?"

The answer was brief: "Do the same as me."

Jesus died for the glory of the Father and commands all his disciples to die to sin (ROM 6:2) and to lose, if necessary, their natural life in obedience to the commandments. The Bible teaches, "This is the law: when a man dies..." (NUM 19:14).

A religion is truly religion if you are ready to die for it. What is not worthy of the sacrifice of life is not religion. Your desire to lead a consistent Christian life might lead to renunciation and heavy losses. Jesus was ready to die on a cross at the age of thirty-three, and we are meant to imitate him in dedication to God and love toward our fellow men. Whoever keeps this commandment is his beloved.

The church urges us to a heroic Christian life. One of the names of Jesus is "Heroic God" (ISA 9:6, in Hebrew).

Orthodox Martyrs

~Give Them Peace with the Saints~, a book secretly compiled by the True Orthodox Church of the Soviet Union, provides the following accounts.

The first Orthodox priest ever killed by the Communists was John Kotchurov. In Essentuke, the priest John Riabuhin, together with many others, had his limbs hacked off and was buried while still breathing. The priest John Krasnov was burned alive in a ship's cauldron. The priest Alexander Podolskii was beaten to death. Those who tried to bury him were shot. The deacon Tikhon sang his burial service, while his son, aged ten, dug his grave, having been compelled by the Reds to do so.

The priest Grigorii Dmitrevskii first had his nose and ears cut off, then his head (exactly what the Communist guerrillas did in Rhodesia). The priest Grigorii Nikolski was shot with a bullet through his mouth after saying the liturgy. The murderers told him, "Now we will give you holy Communion."

The secret police went to search the house of Antonii, the Orthodox bishop of Arkhangelsk. Finding the vessel for holy communion, they threw it to the floor and stomped on it. The bishop threw himself over it, trying to defend it with his body. In the scuffle he lost consciousness. When he awoke he was in jail.

They asked his opinion about the future of the Russian church and wanted to know if he desired the overthrow of the Soviets. He answered that the church would be glorified through the suffering of its martyrs, as in the first centuries, and that he prayed daily that the Soviet government would not shed blood and would be forgiven of its sins.

First he was threatened with death, then was promised

freedom if he would become an informer for the police. The bishop was not frightened and could not be bought. Such is the character of all those who see afar, who see the heavenly city where believers will spend eternity.
He was put in a small cell together with five others. They endured bitter cold, received only two glasses of water a day and nothing else. They could not wash or change their clothes, and lived in their stench. They lost their teeth. The bishop became so weak that he could not cleanse his beard from the invading bugs and lice. When he felt death near, he chanted his own funeral service. He died with prayers on his lips.
Dostoievsky, the greatest Russian writer, wrote:

> I believe there is nothing lovelier, deeper, more sympathetic and more perfect than Jesus. I say to myself with jealous love that not only is there no one else like him, but there could be no one. I would say even more. If anyone could prove to me that Christ is outside the truth, and if the truth did really exclude Christ, I should prefer to stay with Christ and not with truth. There is in the world only one figure of absolute beauty: Christ.

So the complete works of Dostoievsky had to be forbidden in Russia. It is like forbidding Shakespeare in English-peaking countries. Eugen Vaghin, who published Dostoievskii, got thirteen years of prison, which meant thirteen years of torture. A document later proved that one of the punishments inflicted in jail was exposure of naked prisoners to mosquitoes. The prisoners had their hands handcuffed behind them and were unable to defend themselves.
Vaghin survived fourteen years of such imprisonment. When he was freed, he was the same man enamoured of Jesus, who left everything for him.

Baptist Confessors

~The Bulletin of the Council of Relatives of Christian Prisoners in the Soviet Union~ published excerpts of the protocol of a trial.

Brother George Jeltonoshko and Sister Nadeja Troshtshenko were brought before court in Nikolaiev, accused of having spread Bibles, Gospels and spiritual literature.
Jeltonoshko told the court: "I refuse to have a lawyer. I feel I am right. Righteousness needs no defence." (Why do we all attempt to defend ourselves so much when accused?)
The judge asked him, "Do you plead guilty?"
He answered: "No! To spread Christian literature is the duty of a Christian."
The Communist judge asked him to follow the example of the traitors from the official church who respect the Soviet law and do not propagate the gospel.
Jeltonoshko answered that he could not do like them because Christ had said, "Go into the whole world and preach."
The Communist judge took the defence of the official churches, which compromised with Communism, while the Underground churches did not, and asked again, "Why don't you remain in the official churches? They also consist of believers."
He answered, "The devils also believe and tremble."
The judge was inquisitive, "Where do you meet for prayers?"
The answer was, "True worshippers worship everywhere."

At this trial Sister Zinaida Kozakova was mentioned.

She had distributed among the Red Army leaflets entitled ~Spiritual Passport~. This is what they contained:

~Name~: Christian. ~Father's name~: God. ~Last name~: Blessed. ~Date of Birth~: Now is the accepted time; behold, now is the time of salvation. ~Country of origin~: The holy land. ~Town~: Jerusalem. ~Nationality~: New creation. ~Profession~: Co-worker with God. ~Military duty~: Good soldier of Christ. ~Passport issued by whom~: By faith. ~On the basis of what documents was the passport issued~: Love believes everything. ~To what social category do you belong, rich, poor, or middle class~: In everything we are enriched by Christ. ~Property~: I possess all things present and future. ~Family~: great multitude. ~Education~: We know all things (JHN 2:20). ~Profession~: Prayer and the service of the Word.

Lost Lives Can No Longer Be Lost

What was the price of faithfully teaching the Scripture? Jeltonoshko was sentenced to three years of prison, Troshtshenko to eighteen months. But it is not the length of the prison term that counts, but the prison regime. In a Soviet jail, no prisoner is allowed to share his beliefs with anyone else. The punishments for doing so are so vicious that in one concentration camp fifteen prisoners sewed their lips together in protest against the terror.

In Bulgaria, in the prison of Belen, there was a pit with hungry dogs. Naked prisoners were thrown into it if they broke some prison rule. In some cases God performed miracles. Brother Trofim Dimitrov was thrown to the dogs. While being led to the place, he prayed for his enemies, who threw him into the pit. Immediately a great howling was heard. When the officers looked into the pit, they saw Brother Dimitrov kneeling in prayer and the dogs in panic, barking and trying to jump the walls in order to save themselves from the strange power emanating from him. It remains God's mystery why he performs such miracles for some, whereas others have to drink the bitter cup until the end.

In Cuba, there were some 30,000 political prisoners (which includes those sentenced for their faith). In a document smuggled out of Cuban prisons, we were told that our brethren, among others, were forced into an ice-cold shower followed by a hot one. After being thus treated, they had sulphur thrown on them to make their skin burn. Bodies of prisoners were crushed with bulldozers.

The abbot Roman Braga, my former fellow-prisoner, wrote about a Christian to whom the Communists, with revolvers in their hands, offered the alternatives of raping his daughter or being shot. He chose the latter.

I was sometimes accused of dramatizing the situation in Eastern countries, but who in the world can dramatize what is already an unequalled drama?

A Soviet newspaper described certain Christians as "men who have lost the human image" and claimed that > they destroy their brethren and sisters from their denomination and other witnesses who are dangerous > to them. So at the liquidation of secret "death chambers" of the ~Innokentists~ [the Innocents - a specific Russian Christian group] approximately twenty corpses of men, women and children between the ages of 14 and 50 were discovered. Many of them had been buried alive. In such sects, men are exhausted through fasting, the forbidding of meat and other nutritious produces, and through the ascetic form of life. The heavy, oppressive conditions in the sectarian communities often lead to crimes or psychic illness (~Sovietskaia Moldavia~, January 16,1973).

These Christians had allegedly been killed by their own brethren. Christians in the Soviet Union were sometimes charged with ritual murder - that is, with the accusation that in order to receive forgiveness of sins from God they kill a member of the church. This was the first time that we found Christians charged not with murdering one individual, but with ritual mass murder.

Everywhere in the world it is known that Jesus taught Christians to love and to save lives. Only in the Communist camp is the lie spread that at their religious services they kill. In the fifties, in Red China, Catholic nuns were accused of having killed children in hospitals. Nowhere else in the world are nuns charged with such activity. Such monstrous accusations brought against Christians were simply ridiculous.

Soviet Christians have no lives of their own to lose. From the hell of Soviet prisons, a believer smuggled out the following letter, which shows a heart full of peace and adoration that doesn't even seem to be aware of the horrors in the environment.

> "Marvellous are thy works" (PSA 139:14). I greet and congratulate you with these words, dear mother and dear daughter, on your birthday. This was the text of the first cable in the world, in 1845-a verse from the Bible. The inventor of the telegraph was Samuel Morse. As to his father George Morse, it is significant that he was a renowned evangelist. This Bible text was written 3,000 years ago and entered so deeply into the hearts of many generations of men with a living faith in God that it was transcribed faultlessly by hand during 2,500 years. In 1455, it was first printed. The first printed book was the Bible.

> The works of God are really marvellous in all things, in nature and technique, in the lives of all men, in the destiny of people and of mankind, and especially of his church. It is a great joy to contemplate the work of his hand and of his creative mind in all that > surrounds us. The Bible is also the first book from which men read when circling around the moon ...

> I see from your letters that you are very troubled because of me. My beloved, this should not be. Keep your health, and don't let your heart be troubled. May it be in perfect peace, because everything happens according to his will.

Soviet Christians see God's will and good intentions even while bearing Communist atrocities, whereas unbelievers or those who believe superficially say to Jesus, "Depart from us – you made us lose a herd of swine."

The present book is written with the purpose of offering readers, all of whom encounter hardships in life, though not like the foregoing, the perfect calm of sufferers for Christ. It is a gift of God, but it needs to be cultivated.

Transparent Purity

When the Jew Avram Shifrin was in a Soviet jail for his Zionist activities, he met a 72-year-old Baptist named Solodiankin, about whom he wrote the following:

"The goodness and transparent purity of that man made a huge impression. Even the soldiers who guarded us became better when he was there." He was almost blind, and his glasses had been broken by the interrogator. "Everything he earned as a slave labourer he used like this: half for his sick daughter and 25% for his church. From the rest (7 or 8 rubles) he bought for himself a little sugar and bread; the rest he gave to the sick prisoners in the camp."

Shifrin told him that he had a Bible and was ready to read it to him. In the evening, Solodiankin came. He had changed his shirt and combed his hair with great care. "To read the eternal book is a feast," he said.

The Jew read to the Christian from Isaiah. At a certain moment, he was interrupted:

"You made a mistake."

It was true. "But do you know the text by heart?"

"Of course," replied the Christian.

"Then why should I read it to you?"

"Because it is a joy for me to hear the Scriptures. One gets new ideas."

Once when the prisoners were compelled to listen to a lecture about Lenin, Solodiankin arose and contradicted the speaker publicly: "Why do you make a god out of a simple man? Throughout history many have been honoured like him as big men, but what are they before the Creator?" For this he was punished.

During that time we were smuggling Bibles into the USSR. Some who claimed smuggling was wrong reproached us roundly. But without smuggling, blind Solodiankin and thousands like him would have remained without the Word of God.

We praise God for such men as Solodiankin and Jews who read the Bible to them. We adore God who does these great works, and we will continue to smuggle Christian books wherever barriers exist (certain Christian literature and Bibles are still forbidden in China, Vietnam, and many Moslem countries).

Love "With All Your Very Much"

Micaela was an Orthodox nun who believed that the Communion bread and wine were really the body and blood of our Lord. When the Soviet Army entered the Vladimireshti convent in Romania, she defended the altar with her body, Thrown in prison, she was mistreated beyond description. But from her solitary cell she tapped out prayers in Morse code through the wall to fellow-prisoners until she died.

In another Romanian prison, some guards, pretending to be sympathetic, inquired of female prisoners about their children's birthdays. Those particular days were then chosen to give them severe beatings with rubber truncheons. Weeping was forbidden. If a mother wept after being beaten, she was beaten again.

In jail, the temptation to abandon the faith is always present. The devil whispers, "Howl with the wolves, and the suffering will end." But the Christian does not wish the suffering to end at the cost of his faith. Those who proclaim that being a Christian means prosperity, health, and well-being preach "another gospel which is not a gospel" (GAL 1:6, 7). Why should a Christian desire to escape suffering when it is written about him that he "takes pleasure in infirmities, in reproaches, in necessities, in persecution, in distresses for Christ's sake" (2CO 12:10)? Who wants to escape pleasure?

When I was in a Romanian Communist prison, our feet were swollen with oedema caused by hunger. At times we had only one slice of bread a week. Rats jumping over our faces awoke us at night. Rarely, the wind brought a tree-leaf into the barren yard in which we walked, but it reminded us that a world of trees, flowers and joy still existed. A daisy had succeeded in growing between stones in the yard. I plucked its petals, saying over each one, "She loves me, with joy, with sorrow, with little, or nothing." The last petal told me that she - my wife Sabina, who was in another jail - loved me with sorrow.

The cell walls did not tell us that story of those who had been there before us. If we were to die in this cell, the walls would still remain silent. We often felt forsaken, unremembered. The temptation to join the world of wickedness and deceit in order to go free was great. Under totally different circumstances, we all have such temptations. But by the grace of God we had made the decision, like Job, not to speak wickedly and not to utter deceit. Our words will continue to speak of love and faith and truth. God has helped many to fulfill this promise.

In prison our brethren and sisters learn Christlikeness, likeness to the Man of Sorrows.

Twenty times a night they would be awakened by the guards who watched them through the peephole. "Take your hands out from under the blanket!" "Turn your face to the door!" "Dress yourself for interrogation!" Their eyes would be blindfolded, and like the blind they would be taken before torturers and would not know from which side the next blow would come.

Prisoners were hungry. But a more formidable problem even than eating was going to the toilet. This was a favour granted by the Communists only after pleadings that sometimes lasted a whole night. Even then, female prisoners often had to fulfill their needs in the presence of males.

Our brethren in the faith endured all this, remaining good and faithful. No bad or wicked word escaped their lips. We should emulate their example in our trials and resolve to guard the words of our mouth and the meditation of our heart, that they may be acceptable in the eyes of him who loves us and gave his life for our sins.

Brother Michael Ershov spent forty-three years in Soviet jails for his faith in Christ. Time and distance quench small loves, but increase great ones. During those years his love for Christ burned ever more brightly as he walked the way of the cross. Such faith seems overdrawn. Everything exaggerated becomes insignificant. But there exists no possibility of exaggeration in the mutual love between God and man. On both sides it is a love with all one's heart, with all one's soul, with all one's might (DEU 6:5). In the Hebrew original it is not "with all thy might," but ~bekol meodha~ which means literally "with all your very much."

Prison Letters

When there were no cars, trains, planes, phones, faxes, and all the gadgets that make modern life easier, men had time to write letters. Today a person who cultivates this art form is rare. We could well learn from the masters of life and love to write beautifully.

Over the years we have received many letters smuggled out of prisons. The following are representative:

> Thank you for the parcel. The officers took counsel from each other several days on what to do with the parcel. Then in the end the order came that I could receive it on condition that I write back, Please don't send parcels more than four times a year." I answered, "I can write this, but what the others will do I don't know." My beloved, I must confess that I miss nothing. The Lord has given me a good appetite so that I am satisfied even with the food which no pig would eat. [This sentence could inspire us never to bicker about the food we have in the West.] We are bent to the earth with gratitude that so many pray for us, as we have heard from you that it happens. Yes, our well-being depends on this...
> My hair becomes gray; I have more and more wrinkles on my face. I have to work in great heat. My work is at an oven in which brooms are dried. I work 18 hours a day, from five in the evening until eight in the morning. During this time I have to be entirely naked, but still the sweat can be gathered with buckets from my body. You have to wipe yourself continually.

Is the oak in our garden still growing? ["Oak" is the nickname of one of the leaders of the Underground church. In this way our brother inquires about progress of the underground work.] When I was a child, the percentage of Baptists among the active Christians of Russia was small. Now it has greatly increased.

From another letter, from a Christian prisoner in the Soviet Union:

The pressures which are used against us here and which are repugnant to the flesh, cause men to lose completely their honour and to become worse than animals. But these same things are useful and unavoidable, for those who love God, in becoming godly. Therefore we have no reason to complain.

Recently we were brought before a court. It was proposed that we walk crooked ways in order to have things better in the future. One of the judges said, "Is all the pain you have had to endure not enough to have produced in you a change of mind?"

I answered, "I have passed through no pains. Prison is a place in which I have learned very many good things, and which has made me more determined in my faith. You will not be able to understand this riddle because you don't believe in God."

I will now be appointed as the gardener of the prison, and I would be very happy to receive from you some flower seeds. I would like to smell the fragrance of flowers that come from you, who show me so much love. [The seeds were sent by means that would ensure their arrival.]

When you look ahead, everything is dark and horrifying, but we can say, "Up to this point God helped."

We received many letters like this and they were very encouraging, showing us that the faith of our brethren was not only unbroken, but had become more beautiful than ever.

Our suffering brethren followed the advice of the fourth-century saint Ephrem the Syrian: "When attacked, bear it;

when wronged, be patient; when defamed, be forgiving;
when what is yours is taken away, be thankful."
May God help us to have such attitudes!

Russian Believers in Psychiatric Asylums

While many of our brethren were in prison, some were in psychiatric asylums. There too they praised God. Brother Shimanov wrote from an asylum: "The bedlam, the anxiety about my family, the tension of my nerves all destroy me. But if they drive me mad or if I remain sane, I accept everything God sends, as a child accepts everything from the hand of his father: the sweet and the bitter, folly or reason, light or darkness, every disaster and all clarity. Cowardice is unreasonable. In the asylum, I have thought often that the will of God keeps intact the freedom of man."

We too should lay aside our grumbling and complaining and accept with good grace all the things that befall us. Jesus accepted flogging, mockery, death on the cross, an early tomb, and the descent into hell. A glorious resurrection followed for him. It will follow for us too, if in all circumstances - even in maddening ones - we keep saying, "Let God be magnified."

Where did these Christians get such strength? From a source available to all of us: prayer. Perhaps we can learn from them.

Natalia Gorbanevskaya, who was put in the section for the mentally ill in the Butyrka prison in Moscow, composed the following prayer which she repeated again and again.

> Don't crush me, Lord, don't lose me like a card in a lost game. Don't reject me so as to make me wander through the world not believing anything. You walked on the sea as if it had been dry land. No obstacle can hinder your steps. Don't send me out into this world of suffering without a firm staff, without aim and support. You, God and Son of Man, if it was your will to put on these shoulders the yoke which makes chains rattle at every step, don't allow my soul to freeze outside in the ice, in the cold night.

The Soviet Hebrew Christian Krasnov-Levitin described his time in jail:

> When I was in prison, I lived every day in the spirit of the liturgy. At eight in the morning I began to walk to and fro in my cell and said the words of the liturgy. In doing so, I felt united with Christendom in the whole world...The prison walls pulled back. The whole universe, the visible and the invisible, became my habitation...After the liturgy I felt a spiritual elation, clarity and inner purity.

Such prayers work. Levitin says that "there is no power in the world that can resist the power of God" obtained by prayer.

However, this assertion must be qualified. The godly character of a newborn person cannot be broken, but the organ through which it expresses itself is the brain - one-and-a-half pounds of tissue, subject to all the laws of matter. Communists destroyed the brains of some believer through doping, hunger, sleep deprivation, and beating on the head. Some Christians treated in this manner beyond endurance could no longer resist.

The most tragic example I know is that of Nikolai Moiseev. He was exposed to the worst treatment for eight years in an asylum, in which he was interned because of his faith. When in the end his family was allowed to visit him, he did not recognize them. They spoke about Jesus. There was no response. He no longer recognized the name. He had sacrificed for Christ more than anyone else: his faith in Christ. Neither the once-cherished name nor the word Christ meant anything to him.

I am sure this man is saved. I would like to have a place like his in heaven. The Communists were able to destroy the most precious organ of his outward man, but like all of us he had the hidden man of the heart, which the poison chemicals did not reach. This hidden man was in the embrace of Christ during those torturous years.

We were spared the worst. We can at least pray and thus obtain strength.

In PSA 138:1, we read, "I will praise thee with my whole heart." The highest form of praise I know is to become silent, overawed by the majesty of God. Kneel silently in adoration before the One who shows his glory in his saints. Here words cease.

Those Who Cannot Be Shaken

While we Christians remain silent, let us allow our Jewish friend Shifrin to say what he saw and rejoice:

> The Christians whom I met in prison were quiet and concentrated. They strongly believed that the Creator leads them the right way, and they received sufferings as blessings. They did not resist the guards in worldly things, but stood firm when their religious convictions were touched. There they could not be shaken...When I looked toward them, I sometimes felt that holy rays came from their barracks filled with holiness and prayers.

The following is a resume of an article that appeared in Soviet newspaper (~Znamia Iunosti~):

> An old man of small size enters the dock of the courtroom. He puts his hands on his breast and says "Peace be with you, brethren and sisters." He is a pastor. We have before us a fisher of men, who by teaching about life after death brought many victims into his clever nets. Outwardly he is a quiet missionary. From the first minute of the trial he ornaments himself with the aureole of a martyr, ready to suffer for the faith, for Christ.
> In 1948 he had already been sentenced to jail once for propagation of religion. But he did not learn the > lesson. He started his underground work again. What is the charge against Artem Hivuk? The following are the words of the attorney of the district of Brest Tarasenko: "For a long time, he was leader of the unregistered congregation of the "rebellious sectarians" [the name given by the Communists to the Underground Christians]. He propagated religion. He trespassed against the law regarding religious cults." Hivuk was extremely zealous to win the youth. And he succeeded often.

>
> Hivuk said to the judges, "All are equal before God. An enemy is also a friend. You have no right to hit him."
> Children he won for Christ refused to join the Pioneers [a Communist children's organization]. All, beginning with the director of the school and finishing with the leader of the Pioneers, seem to have > sympathized with Hivuk. They gave him liberty to work, contrary to the instructions of the Secret Police. Things went so far in the complicity of the local Soviet leaders with Hivuk that he got to the point of asking permission to use the school building for religious services. This could not be allowed, so the Christians gathered in private homes and, during the summer, in nature. There children sang "heavenly melodies." [How heavenly these melodies must have been for Communists to call them so!] Hivuk travelled from place to place preaching, including Moscow.

For these "crimes" he was sentenced to many years.

In the free world we would not be sentenced for shedding light around us. The irony is that we so seldom avail ourselves of our opportunities.

The Choice to Be a Saint

There still are unnumbered Christian prisoners throughout the world, in such places as China, Vietnam, Burma, and Moslem countries. What happens to them spiritually?

It would seem that the long stretches of barbed-wire fence, the watchtowers, search-lights, long columns of ragged human figures grey in the greyness of the dawn, the shouts and whistles of command that are encountered from the moment one enters prison, all depress and suffocate a person spiritually.

Valentina Saveleva wrote after her release,

> We were often knee-deep in the mud. Our coats and boots were never dry. There was no washroom. The water was not drinkable because of the salt. Many had to sleep on the dirt floor. There were not enough blankets to keep warm. When we awakened in the morning, we had to be careful not to rise too quickly, for our hair was frozen to the dirt floor. It was impossible to remain free from lice. Many died of tuberculosis. Food was scarce and hardly edible. The temperature was seldom above 41øF. The prison was full of demon-possessed criminals, who cursed day and night. They wanted to destroy my faith.

Can love be the absolute law under such circumstances, or do they justify becoming lawless? The renowned psychologist Sigmund Freud, wishing to belittle morality, asserted:

"Let one attempt to expose a number of the most diverse people uniformly to hunger! With the increase of hunger, all individual differences will blur and in their stead will appear the uniform expression of the one instilled urge."

Freud had not known hunger. I have for fourteen years in Communist jails. Hunger, like any other pain, does not produce uniform results. Under pressure, some individuals become swine and others saints. Some grabbed the little piece of bread belonging to a fellow prisoner; others renounced their only bit of bread and medicine to save another's life.

Christians know how to forgo even life itself. In Zimbabwe, a guerilla lifted his axe to kill a priest. Nearby was another priest, Killian Knoerl, who could have escaped. Instead, he chose to fight for his brother against the guerilla. He himself was killed.

The lawless have no scruples; they steal and betray, so they certainly should have. But they are neurotic and need Jesus' cure. The spiritually healthy, on the other hand, remain loving even if it means suffering pain and even death. The lawless find an excuse for their sins: fate, heredity, or environment. But though God in his providence may have allowed me to pass through trials and tribulations, how I react to them is up to me. As a free moral agent, I can choose to be guided in all things by love or I can choose to be lawless. I can be alive in Christ, certain of a future life - or I can be emotionally dead on this earth.

Paul wrote four of his epistles while in jail. They contain many prayers, but not one for his release. I have read hundreds of letters from Christian prisoners, but not once do they demand prayers for their freedom. During my fourteen years in Communist prisons I composed around 300 poems, some of which were published in ~Sermons in Solitary Confinement~, ~Stronger than Prison Walls~, and ~Alone with God~. Not one shows a desire to be rid of my chains. The Romanian Christian poets Traian Dorz and Moldovanu were also in jail for many years. The songs they composed were all full of the joy produced by the suffering for a glorious cause.

In the USSR, the Communists made a film about the Lithuanian priest Svarinskas, who was in jail. The purpose of the film was to show how dangerous he was to society. Svarinskas is shown preaching: "If a priest under atheism boasts of serving a parish for twenty-five years without being driven out by the atheists, he is a bad priest. Were he good, they would have chased him out long since. Persecution is the sign that a priest fulfils his duty. Where atheism reigns, the only right place for a priest to die is in jail." The apostle Paul must have thought like this. Therefore he never prayed for his release.

The majority of our prayers are usually for release from difficult situations. But why should I pray to be released from an unhappy marriage, from the brutality of a parent, from a child who breaks my heart, or from other miseries? Missionaries have gone joyfully to savages to show them the love of Christ. Some, like John Williams and Bishop Hannington, were eaten by cannibals. They went to death reciting Jesus' words, "Love your enemies, do good to those who hate you." [MTT 5:44; LUK 6:27]

We too should be patient, though the brain reels. His grace is sufficient to quell the grief.

Our brethren and sisters in jail volunteer to take beatings for others. In Auschwitz, under Hitler, Mary Skobtseva and Maximilian Kolbe stepped forward and asked to be executed in place of others. They died a martyr's death. When it was very cold, prisoners gave away sweaters so that others might feel warm. I have witnessed such scenes myself.

Concern for others drowns out your own troubles. Focus on God as the saints in prison do and you will know that heavenly peace comes from patient cross-bearing. To get out of the neurosis of lawlessness, begin to practice the law of love, at least in little things. Deny yourself for a period the food you love most, or some luxury in clothing, and think of those who eat unbearable food and are in rags. Interrupt your sleep for prayer on behalf of those interrogated during the night. Give up some item of cosmetics for those who cannot even wash. Renounce an hour of TV for those who for years have been in solitary confinement in underground cells and see nothing. Try to be silent for a day in order to empathize with the solitary, who cannot speak to anyone for years.

Sacrifice your complaining and grumbling for one day. Take time from other preoccupations to pray for the persecuted.

The Duty to Remain Sane

Sufferers learned under torture to see the horrors of prison life as no more than the buzzing of tiresome flies, because jail was like Golgotha, where there were not only crosses but also a beautiful garden (JHN 19:41).

Young believers learned from those matured through decades of pain. They had the best theological training, where religion is not simply taught but practised at the highest level. Perhaps we too should look to experienced saints and sit at their feet, as our persecuted brethren have done. They lived under conditions calculated to drive one insane, with criminals and madmen whose behaviour and speech were outrageously obscene. Frequently our hungry brethren and sisters were bullied with unimaginable cruelty. The syncopated beating of hundreds of agonized hearts oppressed the faithful during the night.

If we find ourselves provoked beyond endurance, let us remember and learn from our imprisoned holy brethren. They heed the voice of conscience, which tells them it is their duty to stay sane by being open to the life-giving Spirit of God. Every letter and personal contact with them revealed that they live in a realm of peace. They are burning flames on the altar of Christ. They are kind to all, especially their torturers who, knowing no kindness, need to benefit from a surplus from another source. No suffering is absurd if it generates such love for the wicked.

Our mission has been privileged to be constantly in touch with these saints. It has received and conveyed to the free world great inspiration from them. The National Institute of Mental Health (USA) claims that 62% of Americans suffer from a diagnosable mental illness. One half of all hospital beds in the USA are occupied by mental cases.

In other countries the situation is not much better. Our generation suffers from a wide-spread neurosis: lawlessness. The law is not embedded in our thinking. Everyone walks according to his own fancies without regard to the highest law: an all-absorbing, fervent love for God and man. If I do not have such love as a guide in all my actions, woe is me! I am sick and urgently need the cure that only Jesus can offer.

The Lord met and still meets much apathy, but he also meets ardent love. There are still souls who burn passionately for him, like John and Magdalene.

The Christian student Leonas Sileikis in Soviet Lithuania had to be examined before a commission of seven teachers. She was asked what she thought about atheist books. She replied, They contain lies and slander."

A Communist delivered to her a speech against religion and then asked, "Do you renounce your faith?"
Her answer was, "I believe and will continue to do so."
The director of the school explained to her father, who was present, the danger of religion. He replied, "It is not true that religion is dangerous. The fruit of treading religion under your feet is that students do not respect the teachers any more; they drink, smoke and are promiscuous."
The teacher showed his wisdom: "Seeing that few go to church nowadays, it is important to join the majority."
The father answered, "Only corpses flow with the current. A living person can swim against it."
The director warned him, With such ideas you will make it impossible for your daughter to continue her studies."
Her father replied, "It isn't I who hinder her, but you. What good is study if you have to renounce the highest value, a personal faith?"
The wise men brought to the holy Child gold, frankincense and myrrh. This family has fulfilled the commandment, with which I challenge you: "Present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service" (ROM 12:1).

The Happiest Day

When Nijole Sadunaite, a Catholic, was sentenced in Soviet Lithuania she told the court:

> Truth needs no defence, because it is all-powerful and unconquerable. Only deceit and lies, being powerless before truth, need weapons, soldiers and prisons to prolong their infamous rule for a while. A biased government digs its own grave. I am on the right side and am ready to lose liberty for truth. I will gladly give even my life. Only those who love have the right to blame and criticize the objects of their love. Therefore I speak to you. You rejoice about your victory. Victory over what? Over morality? Over mean and debased men infected by fear?
> Thanks be to God, not all men have compromised yet. We [Christians] are not many in society, but quality is on our side. Without fear of prison, we have to condemn all actions that lead to injustice and humiliation. We must distinguish what is written by men from what is commanded by God.

We owe to Caesar only what remains after having given to God what is his due. The most important thing in life is to free heart and mind from fear, because yielding to evil is the greatest sin.
This day is the happiest of my life. I was judged today for the cause of truth and love toward men. What cause could be more important? I have an enviable fate, a glorious destiny. My condemnation will be my triumph. I regret only having done so little for men. Standing today on the side of the eternal truth of Jesus Christ, I remember his fourth beatitude: "Blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness, for they shall be filled" (MTT 5:6). There exists no greater joy than to suffer for truth and for one's fellow men.

How could I not rejoice when God Almighty has promised that light will overcome darkness and truth will overcome error and lies! May God give us the assurance that his last judgment will be favourable to all of us. I will ask this in prayer for you every day of my life. Let us love each other and we will be happy. Only the one who loves not is unhappy.
We must condemn evil, but we must love the man, even the one in error. This you can learn only at the school of Jesus Christ, who is the only truth for all, the only way and the only life. Good Jesus, your Kingdom comes into our souls.

She was sentenced to three years in prison. When, after being freed, she met the Pope in Rome, he asked her, "How was it in jail?" She replied, "Romantic."

We have our sorrows, troubles, apprehensions, even dramas. But she lifted before court the veil which she, like every other Christian, wears in everyday life and which makes us appear busy only with the things of this world, even if they are good works. She beheld with open face the glory of God and was changed into the same image of our Redeemer (2CO 3:18).

We too are called; we too can resist sinful surroundings.

Evghenii Pushkov was a Baptist music student in Russia who had advanced to the point of playing in the Philharmonic. But he knew he could further his career only by renouncing his faith, since the Soviets would not allow a witnessing Christian to affirm himself in the arts. One day, he invited his father and wife to the concert. The orchestra played Tchaikovsky's lovely "Dying Swan" based on the legend that the swan sings only once in life, just before its death. Evghenii put all his heart into the music; he had decided that it would be his own swan song. He would henceforth prefer Jesus. His family, sensing his decision, were in tears. After the concert, he embraced them and said, "Henceforth you will not weep for me any more. I dedicate myself wholly to the Lord." Sadly, such a decision in a Communist country does not banish tears. He went to prison for his faith.

In a Soviet prison there was a Lithuanian Christian lady who as a child had looked down from the attic and seen the Communists kill her whole family of eight, then leave laughing. After that she never spoke. Sentenced to 25 years, she spent them in perfect silence. Only once, in the beginning, did she tell her story to one inmate. After that, she spent all her free time walking alone to and fro through the prison yard, in sunshine, rain and snow. She bore her burden in silence without ever grumbling. She had seen God face to face.

How do we bear our lesser tragedies?

The Orthodox bishop Andrew was sentenced to death. The story is told that before the execution, he asked to be allowed to pray. As he knelt, he simply was no more. The henchmen were in a panic, knowing they would lose their lives if he disappeared. After an hour he reappeared, on his knees in prayer, surrounded by a luminous cloud. The sentence was carried out, but one of the henchmen was converted and told the story.

If it is difficult for you to believe such a tale, then listen to this one. A child came home from Sunday school and told his mother, "We were taught that when the Jews under Joshua had to cross the Jordan, the soldiers built a pontoon bridge, while planes were hovering in the sky to protect them."

The mother objected: "Surely you could not have been taught that."

"No, mother. But if I told you that I was taught a miracle happened and the Jordan was divided so God's people went across on dry land, you would not have believed it."

I believe in biblical miracles. I believe miracles happen even today. The greatest miracle is that the henchman was converted. The fantasy of this man who passed in one minute from a readiness to kill a saint to becoming a saint himself works powerfully. It also makes him see things that might not have happened. Those who witness God's miracles become very sure of their beliefs.

Praise God in Suffering

"A bishop must be...a lover of good" (TIT 1:8, according to the original).

In the first church "bishop" was not a rank in a hierarchy. All the elders of the church were considered bishops (in Greek ~episkopos~) through the empowering of the Holy Spirit (cf ACT 20:17-28). Even our English word "elder of the church" is misleading. These elders were sometimes very young, as was the case with Timothy. The Greek word for elder means "farseeing".

In plain English, the Scripture quoted above means "an overseer of the church, a church leader, whatever his name - bishop, pastor, priest, preacher, mission director - must be a lover of good." The highest good is to have God living in one's innermost being. A church leader must love to bring men to this stage, to teach them to deny their selves until nothing remains but God. A church leader must also do this work when persecution comes. Some 40,000 clergymen were killed by the Communists, because they fulfilled their duty. Lenin, Stalin, Khrushchev, Kosygin, Mao, Ceausescu, and other butchers were responsible for their deaths.

We thank God that the church has self-sacrificing leaders. The Russian pastor Serghei Golev had been in prison 22 years when his wife came to visit him. She was forbidden to do so because it was discovered that he had a New Testament in hiding. She could see him only from afar. He was in tears. She shouted to him, "I never saw you weeping. Strengthen yourself. Soon everything will end."

From behind the barbed wire, he answered, "I got tired. Greet all those who sincerely love the Lord."

Strength returned to him when, after this, several brethren discussed in the prison cell how they would like to die. One said, "I wish to die while serving the church. Let her bury me." Another, "I desire to be with my family, to bring my children to faith and then to die." Pastor Golev, who had had that one moment of weakness, said, "I wish to die in prison. Here I passed my best years. Straight from here to the Lord - this is my prayer."

We had this communication from the Underground Church itself. Her communications contain no idle talk. She tells with soberness and humility the story of her heavy suffering, but also praises God for the endurance he has given her amid tribulations.

The same communication tells the story of Sister Nadejda Sloboda. No one would call her a pastor. But she was the first one in her village to be converted through gospel broadcasting in Russian (a work our mission engages in). Don't call her a pastor - but the fact is that she formed a church in her village. The church grew so mightily that the police had to surround the village to keep people from the collective farms around from coming to hear its message. Sister Sloboda was sentenced for this to four years of prison. Her five children were forcibly taken to an atheistic boarding school. Her husband remained alone. In prison, Sister Sloboda was confined for two months in an unheated, isolated cell, where she had to sleep on the concrete floor without a mattress, all because she had told other prisoners about Christ. During the day she worked. Everybody wondered how she could endure it. She answered, "I fall asleep on the cold concrete floor trusting in God and it becomes warm around me. I rest in the arms of God."

The prison director suggested to her that she make a request to be freed from this punishment. She answered, "It was not I who decided to be put in this cell. It is not for me to ask to be released from it" (we are reminded of St Paul's refusal to leave the prison in Philippi until the magistrates came and besought him to do so - ACT 16:36-39). Such stars exist in the Christian firmament.

In the free world, attending churches, I sometimes say to myself, "If the day of God's judgment were a fashion show, many in this congregation would be saved." Our imprisoned sister Sloboda is clothed in the righteousness of Christ and in the zeal to make God manifest in her life.

In China, a sword was put to the chest of a Christian, who was asked, "Are you a Christian?"

He answered, "Yes."

He would have been killed if an officer had not said, "Free him; he is an idiot."

Someone asked him later, "How could you confess Christ with such courage?"

He replied, "I had read the story of Peter's denial of Christ, and I did not wish to weep bitterly."

It is stupid to fear those who can kill only the body, instead of fearing the one who can throw body and soul into Gehenna.

The martyr Otto Wiebe wrote before his death in a Soviet prison: "It is a great joy for me to suffer for my Saviour. This is not something unexpected but has been a conscious choice from early youth. And this is proof of his divine power, which enables a child of God to bear in surrender, quietly, to his honour, the cross he lays on us." He left behind eight children. Such martyr families should be helped, but we should also learn from those who give their lives for Christ. Brother Wiebe died in prison after having shared the prophetic calling of his church to oppose devilish Marxism. He died praising God. We too can learn to praise God in our sufferings.

Considered Fools

In forced labour camps the work quotas were high. The hungry prisoners could not fulfil them, so they were punished by being given less food. Amid sufferings like these, the Christians of Frunze (USSR) could write, "We pray for our persecutors, that the Lord may give them repentance. We ask the children of God to pray with us for a spiritual awakening of our nation." They might have had to walk through a snowstorm to their slave labour camp. But they lived separated from the much worse storms of hate and doubt. They loved and believed, they looked upon men as friends and embraced them all in their heart. Their life was rich. Their sacrifice still burns bright. We are all called to this high stage of salvation.

In a Lithuanian court the priest Seskevicius showed much courage. The prosecutor had asked that he be punished because he taught religion, which is opposed to science. Seskivicius answered, "If religion hinders the progress of science, may I put the question: Who were the first to set foot on the moon? The believers or the unbelievers? They were believers." The first food eaten on the moon was holy communion (by an American astronaut who has since become an evangelist). Seskevicius also said to his judges, "To answer violence with violence is not difficult. It is the natural reaction of all beings. But not to react is a sign of superior spiritual force." He did not react. He went quietly to prison. Others did react. Christians fought the Soviet troops on the streets of Kaunas in defense of their imprisoned priests.

A. Jaugelis was sentenced to two years for having printed secretly ~The Chronicle of the Catholic Lithuanian Church~. How happy he must be in his prison cell, that God gave him the grace to say as his last words before court: "Millions of martyrs suffered and died for Christ and the truth preached by him. You atheists should not have the illusion that there are no more such heroes who have no fear to suffer for the truth, for the faith, for the church."

Christians are able to retain love for their torturers even in the worst of circumstances. The peak of Communist horrors was attained in the Romanian prison of Piteshti.

Several would sit on the belly of a prisoner to make him excrete. Then he would be forced to eat his own excrement and drink his urine. Such as the daily routine in this infamous prison. There the Christian Sherban George committed suicide. His last words were: "The Communists' crimes are too horrible. I cannot pray to God for them from a distance. I must go to him to speak on their behalf. Do not avenge my death."

Inspiring, too, was the courage shown by the Ukrainian Christians Shevtchenko, Timtshak, Solovieva, Alekseeva, Borushko, Zaborskii, and Krivoi, who stood trial before the court in Odessa. Brother Krivoi had already spent ten years in prison for his faith. When the court convened and the accused were asked to stand, they fell to their knees instead and one of them began to pray aloud. Why should they pay their respects to the representatives of a state that is not an authority ordained by God, but the apocalyptic beast drunk with the blood of saints? The president of the court asked our sister Alekseeva why she refused to have an attorney. Her reply was, "I have long since taken Jesus Christ as my defender. My witness is in heaven and my record is on high" (JOB 16:19). Shevtchenko also refused to have an attorney, saying, "An atheist cannot defend a believer. God is my protector."

Hundreds of Christians had gathered outside the courthouse. Because they were not allowed to enter, they waited outside during the long bitterly cold hours. The accused refused to answer a single question until their brethren were allowed to enter. And they won!

So the Baptists in chains decided who would enter the courtroom, not the Communist authorities. Never comply, always resist. This is the lesson which we can take from these heroes of faith. Resist, fight, and you will succeed.

The transcript of this trial tells us the most appalling things. We will mention only one. The Communists charged that the Russian Baptists had cut the veins of the one to be baptized and then all the believers had drunk of his blood.

Not since Nero's time have such mad lies been told about Christians. Sister Solovieva was accused, among other charges, of organizing a group of young Christians to help an elderly lady work her garden. She said in her own defence, "Article 176 of the law of cults forbids churches to give material assistance to their members. [To help someone work his garden is therefore a punishable act, if it is done by a church member.] I wish to tell the court that to my knowledge nowhere, not even in the most retrograde country, can the law ask the right to control how I use money honestly earned and forbid that I should give it to those in need.

Then Sister Solovieva became the accuser of the Soviets before world opinion, as she said to them, "The legislation about cults has as its aim to deprive the believers of the most elementary rights of citizens. It commits genocide. The existing legislation puts us in such a position as to make the existence of believers impossible...I don't consider the spreading of Christian literature a crime. I spread literature and will continue to do so whenever I have the slightest opportunity."

She went to prison for this. What about those of us who are free to spread Christian literature? When did you last give out a Christian publication? (Our mission can supply very effective Christian literature for free distribution.)

Brother Timtshak began his defence with these words: "I consider myself happy to sit on the bench of the accused not as a thief or a murderer or someone who meddles in another's business. I rejoice about my situation which I am in for Christ's sake...In my sermons I preached about the love of God. I told how Christ loved men even unto death on the cross, so that everyone who believes in him might have life everlasting. I have preached this, I preach it today, and I will continue to preach it."

Brother Krivoi said in his final words, "Suffering as a Christian, I am ready to wear chains. I have been a believer for forty years (ten of which were spent in Siberian prisons).

You will not re-educate me and you will not break me with threats."

These brothers and sisters of ours were sentenced to Siberia, to the land of the white death. There they performed slave labour in ragged clothing. They stood knee-deep in swamps and in snow. Their food was meager and the weak among them died, as Lamdin did. But their names will remain for ever written in heaven and in the hearts of Christians everywhere.

The pastors of the official Russian Church, who willingly inform on their own flock, considered these martyrs fools. Even some American Christian magazines declared the attitude of these martyrs "unwise." The accusation is not new. St Peter considered it unwise for Jesus to go to his death. Brethren begged Paul not to go to Jerusalem. The name of St Paul remains. Who today remembers his "kind advisers" or critics?

Charles Spurgeon, the celebrated Baptist preacher, once said, "I cannot do otherwise than contend with those who contend with God." These Russian martyrs belong in the same category as him.

Suffering for Another's Crime

A priest by the name of Nikiforov-Volghin tells in his book ~Dust on the Road~ about an encounter he had in prison with a Christian, who told him this story:

> Once I came home and heard a cry. I found my wife dead, stabbed in the heart by an acquaintance. The murderer fell at my feet asking forgiveness. I said to him, "Go, and never do this again." Then I went to the police and took responsibility for the crime. I was given a sentence.
> In Krasnoiarsk jail, one prisoner killed another. I took this crime upon myself also. I am sentenced for > life. I could not do otherwise. Loving God, I look upon all men as upon angels. My only prayer is, "I am yours and you are mine. Have mercy on me." I would not have told you these things had you not been a priest. You asked me why I am here, and I owed you the truth."

> I was present when this prisoner died. It was as if heaven had opened. The prisoner's last words were, "Lord, I would like to continue to suffer for others, but thy will be done."

What a high calling - to suffer for what others had done! This means, to imitate Jesus exactly.

Once we received an eyewitness report about the stoning to death of a Christian girl in a Communist labour camp. She was bound hand and foot and made to kneel in the center of a circle of people, who were commanded to stone her. Those who refused to do so were shot. She died with her face shining, like St Stephen. One at least of those who saw her then was led to faith in Christ through that girl who sealed her testimony with her blood.

A young man prayed for his persecutors as he hung six days on a cross before he died. Five students who were sent out to dig deep holes, to which they were consigned, sang Christian hymns as they were buried.

The Chinese abbot Tong, decapitated by the Reds for his faith, said, "Toward the Communist initiatives, only one attitude is possible. It is to say "no" and to give your head. If we start a dialogue with them where Communism has power, we are lost." Another Chinese martyr, Pastor Tsand, gave this advice: "If you are arrested, your conduct can be only this: silence."

Brother Kozlov, a man who spent ten years in prison for robbery, was converted in jail and afterwards spent ten years in prison for Christ in the Soviet Union. Risking a new arrest, he wrote to "Kosygin, Brezhnev & Co., Butchers, Inc.": "If you would not prevent Christians who are in prisons even today from speaking about Christ to this miserable world, how much the life of thousands of sinners would be changed! You would not need to keep one million atheist lecturers propagating an atheist morale."

Courage and continual unrelenting attacks succeed. Kozlov was actually called to a hearing by Soviet rulers. The converted robber spoke to the impenitent robbers as on Golgotha. The one who stole a couple of hundred roubles witnessed for Christ to those who have stolen one-third of the world. But God can do miracles. There are strong indications that Brezhnev died as a convert.

The heroism of Christian martyrs spreads its perfume in spite of the horrors. In one case, male guards tore the clothes off of nuns and carried them naked through the prison yard. The prison walls are thick. Their cries of shame do not reach the free world, where most Christians sleep undisturbed. A group of thirty Orthodox Christians refused to wear the badge showing their number as prisoners. They were children of God. A child of God does not allow himself to be reduced to a number. Each one is a jewel apart. They declared quietly, "We will not work for Satan and we will not lift our hats before you Communist officers. We show reverence only to God." For this they were punished with half a year in solitary confinement, in unheated small cells where there was scarcely room to turn around. Food was given only every third day. The group passed before the prison director. Approaching him, everyone signed himself with the sign of the cross and exorcised him with the words, "Perish, Satan."

The Strength Not to Become Depressed

In Albania, the first self-declared atheist state in the world, of 200 priests, only fourteen were alive when the country was liberated. Two thousand mosques and churches have been destroyed. The cathedral of Tirana became a sports hall, mosques were changed into public toilets.

The results of this atheist terror? A group of 116 young couples were discovered to have gathered in Fier for the purpose of a collective marriage ceremony. The Albanian Communist press had declared that some Christians had tattooed a cross on their palm, Moslems a crescent, to make it very clear from the first handshake that they stuck to their faith in God.

In Albania, the priests Fausti and Dajani had been locked for two months in primitive latrines full of excrement. They were then condemned to death and executed. When led to the place of execution together with others, Fausti said, "Let us go to the house of the Lord."

We received the following letter from the mother of the Baptist prisoner Valerii Nasaruk:

> My son wished to come to the West and learn to be a preacher. God said, "No. I lead you into another school, in prison." I attended his trial. It was hard on me. I would have preferred to be in his place. But God gives one power to bear everything. The greatest trial was when they asked me in court - I his mother - to advise Valerii to change his ways. I could not do it. I comforted him. The world accuses us, his parents, for his being sentenced, saying it is the result of our teaching. Even some believers cannot understand us. But neither was our Saviour understood.

Even Peter warned Jesus about saving his own life.
We can visit Valerii. Thank God he is courageous. He greets you all."

Valerii was courageous in prison. His mother, deprived of her son and condemned by many, through Christ had the strength not to be depressed.

Courageous Nuns

A document spread secretly in the Soviet Union tells the story of a large group of nuns in a labour camp who had refused to work for the Antichrist. They had been manacled and reduced to hunger. All was to no avail. Common prisoners were converted under their influence. They now had a real convent in the camp. When Irene, the daughter of the prison camp's director, fell gravely sick, he had no choice. He asked for the nuns' prayers. The girl was healed.

The wife of the Communist officer Tcherednitchenko had a difficult birth. Her life and the life of the child were in danger. Someone suggested to him, "Promise the nurse that if everything goes well, you will baptize the child."

"I can lose everything by this."

"Well, choose between what you call "everything" on one hand and your wife and child on the other."

The birth went well, and he baptized the child. He lost his job. The new commander wanted to compel the nuns to abandon their religious vestments and to wear the uniform of prisoners. They answered, "We will not wear the badge of the Antichrist." They were compelled to walk naked through the snow at a freezing temperature. They went, singing the "Our Father." Not one of them fell sick. When a Communist asked the camp's atheist doctor, a Mrs Bravermann, how this was medically possible, she replied, "Didn't you hear them singing about a Father in heaven? Well, this is the scientific explanation."

Our mission has taken up the defence of these persecuted Christians. We could help martyrs with a piece of bread, but they shared with us their nameless joy, their being true to the Truth, Christ the Lord.

Christians Infiltrated the Secret Police

In the sixties, the name of Nikolai Kokhlov appeared in a BBC documentary. A captain of the Soviet Secret Police, he was given the assignment of going to West Germany to infiltrate the Russian Freedom Movement and assassinate its leader, Dr Okolovitch. He simply had to open a box of cigarettes concealing a silent gun firing cyanide bullets and Dr Okolovitch would have been finished.

The infiltrator was received into the Liberation movement - and was invited to the flat of its leader. But instead of killing him, Kokhlov put the murder weapon on the table and told his story. He and his wife were underground Christians - who had infiltrated the Communist Secret Police. His wife had warned him, "If you kill, I shall divorce you." He had no need of this injunction, since he believed in Christ wholeheartedly. He had fulfilled his duty of love and saved the life of a man condemned to death by the Communists. Then the Communists tried to poison their supposed agent, putting a deadly dose of thallium in his coffee in a restaurant in West Germany. They did not succeed.

How did people like Kokhlov become Christians? Probably through a Bible or other Christian book smuggled into Russia by some mission. But why do we assume that it was most probably the work of our organization? For the simple reason that out of all mission organizations claiming to work behind the Iron Curtain, ours seemed to have a monopoly on being constantly attacked by the Communist press.

One such brutal attack that mentioned our name on four pages appeared in the Soviet periodical ~Znanie~ in January of 1974. Shortly after, another appeared in the Soviet newspaper ~Radianska Ukraina~, which contained a gruesome story about the killing of tens of thousands of Jews, Ukrainians, and Poles during the war and about other killings during the Russian Revolution. These mass murders were not perpetrated by counter-revolutionists or Nazis, claim the Soviets, but by Evangelicals and Baptists: not successful in overthrowing the Soviet regime, these Christians, who are in reality Fascists, tried to kill the souls of the Soviet population by smuggling Bibles. The leaders of this "criminal activity" were Pastor Richard Wurmbrand and the director of the Swedish Slavic mission, Brother Martinson.

Chinese Heroes of Faith

On his deathbed General Booth, founder of the Salvation Army, told his son Bramwell, "Take the gospel to China." Years ago I wrote that if I were on my deathbed, I would say, "Take the gospel to the Communist camp." This wish has been fulfilled.

In China, under the terror of Mao, some Christians prayed in whispers with their wives, to avoid telling about their faith to the children lest they speak about it in school. But others formed secret house churches that eventually mushroomed. When Mao came to power there were no more than three million Christians in China. Now the Protestants alone are said to number seventy million.

During the time of the fiercest terror, Sister Kwang organized small groups of itinerant evangelists who went from place to place forming small congregations. Her twelve-year-old son was beaten by the Red Guards till he died. She and her husband were publicly whipped, yet refused to deny Christ. In jail, she volunteered to clean toilets in order to be able to circulate and tell fellow-prisoners about Christ, bringing many to conversion. Freed for a time "Mother Kwang", as she was called by friends and co-workers, created about 300 congregations, some with hundreds, some with thousands of members. In 1974, she was sentenced to lifelong imprisonment, tortured, and put in an underground cell with only a bucket for sanitary needs as furniture. Since it was rarely emptied, Mother Kwang was plagued with lice and mosquitoes. Her only food was unwashed rice, full of sand. Freed after more than a decade in prison, she continued to live by laws "different from all other people's," including those who seek peace by conforming to the whims of tyrants.

In Mao's time, in a Chudse hospital, it was required that each morning everyone kowtow to Mao's image. One doctor remembered the three Jews of old who allowed themselves to be thrown into a burning fiery furnace rather than yield to idolatry, so he refused. For this he was beaten daily. He sang while being beaten: "Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Trouble, distress, persecution?" The Communists beat him with a rope, a metal rod, and a heavy cudgel, yet God's consolation was greater than the suffering. He did not bow.

Then they tried to break him by making his wife and seven children attend his tortures. His wife pleaded, "What will our children do if you die? For our sake, please do as they demand!" But this Chinese doctor knew the teaching of Jesus: "If anyone comes to me and does not hate his father and mother, wife and children, brothers and sisters, yes, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple" (LUK 14:26).

From the experience of the universal church throughout the centuries, he could expect some of his children to be traumatized for life and even to doubt for ever his parental love. He could also expect that they would follow their father's example if they were God's elect and in time become heroic believers ready to sacrifice themselves. The Communists hung the doctor up to be beaten; they poked irons in his face, heated in the fire. On another occasion he was stripped naked and forced to stand on a bench in freezing weather. The Lord who protected the three worthies in the furnace protected him in the cold. He survived and remained faithful. For such a one, God becomes the supreme desire and no sacrifice is too great.

A church with such heroes of the faith has power, as the following story indicates.

In Red China, someone wanted to rape a girl on her way home from a house church, where she had received such teachings. She did not scream, kick, or run. She had been taught to love assailants and to see in them men who have to be brought to salvation. With all meekness, she asked her would-be rapist for permission to pray before he fulfilled his sinful desire. It was granted. She knelt and prayed loudly. There must have been flames of love in this prayer, because when she opened her eyes and arose from kneeling, the rapist was also kneeling, though unable to move. He had become paralyzed. She ran back to the church to tell what had happened. The elders said she must forgive the man (she already understood this) and pray for his healing. As a result, he was restored, and all the non-Christians in her village turned to Christ.

According to another report, two Chinese Christians were led to torture and death. "It is finished," said one in a whisper. His brother answered, "No, that's not what Jesus said when he suffered. He said, "It is accomplished." "

Our brethren and sisters in China were terribly tortured by having water forced up the nose, by having their hands crushed with wood between the knuckles, and by severe electric shocks. Only those who love Christ supremely can resist such inhumanity.

Enlarge Your Self

Please read attentively, because I would like to offer you something that will appeal to your self-interest and still satisfy your most basic spiritual needs and drives.

You and I are by nature insignificant. We dislike some of the shallowness of our work and amusements. All our thoughts are much too petty. However, the self can be enlarged. I will tell you how.

A friend has been described by Plato as one soul in two bosoms. Friendship makes one live the beauty of two lives at once. The church of Christ has been created by God as a fellowship of friends. It is written that after the descent of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost "the multitude of them that believed were of one heart and of one soul" (ACT 4:32). How huge this heart and this soul were! Between Jonathan and David in the Old Testament was a friendship like that. "Jonathan was knit with the soul of David and Jonathan loved him as his own soul" (1SM 18:1). He did not hesitate a moment in renouncing even the throne to the benefit of his friend.

This is one of the great benefits the real church of Christ has to offer: a tremendous opportunity for growth and enrichment with the experience of saints all over the world. You can share in the most beautiful Christian lives.

The Russian psychiatrist Dr Nikolai Rozanov was an ascetic who never had money except what he needed for charity. Because he told his patients, "Trust in God," he was sentenced to five years of prison. He had engaged in forbidden religious propaganda by saying these few words.

Eventually he left prison strengthened in his faith and always greeted people with the old Russian Christian greeting, "May God save you." He continued to go to church and even sang in the choir. For this he was placed for an additional four years in a psychiatric asylum. As a result of the injections he received there, he could no longer control his arms and legs. Before regaining his freedom, he paid in death the ultimate price for his faith.

The Soviet underground church produced many men like this who were steadfast in the faith amid sufferings. We have the privilege of enlarging our own self by becoming one in heart and soul with such individuals. They, in turn, are one in heart and soul with Christ. Union with such saints is also union with God.

Chain Letters

In a Soviet newspaper, ~Molodioj Gruzii~, we learned about the sentencing of three Orthodox Christians, Kasimov, Matchalov and Abramishvili. They had committed the crime of organizing the sending of chain letters.

Since this was a specific Soviet crime unknown in the free world, we should explain. Unable to publish the gospel or print Christian books, our brethren decided to write long-hand or typewritten letters with many carbon copies - they have no copy machines - and send them to addresses picked from the telephone book, or else to put them in mailboxes. Those who received the letters were then asked in turn to multiply and distribute them by the same means. Thus they reached far corners of the Soviet Union. The work began in the Caucasus, but Ukrainian newspapers indicated that such letters circulated in their republic too.

The letter for which our brethren went to prison started with "Our Father," the meaning of which people in the Soviet Union would not know if it were not for such chain letters. Then it continued: "Atheists are the helpers of Antichrist. Have no fellowship with them...The "paradise" that atheists and their government have created on earth is deceptive. The antichrists buy men with movies and other amusements and lead them astray with godless teachings... They take our children and put them into kindergartens and schools which are incubators without love. There they destroy faith in God. They become harsh, thieves, drunkards." The letter finishes with the appeal, "Pray; ask grace from God, forgiveness, and protection."

These letters were of special importance to Soviet children who were not allowed to attend religious services. They were an important means of instructing them in the faith. It was not a question of just a few letters. The newspaper informed us that the Christians flooded the town of Tbilisi with their writings.

Another newspaper, ~Molodioj Moldavii~, spoke of "an offensive on the part of the believers." After fifty years of bloody tyranny, the atheists of the Soviet Union were on the defensive. And one of the weapons with which Christians defeated the Communists, who had at their disposal all the schools, publishing houses, radio and television stations, plus prisons and instruments of torture, were these simple chain letters!

I call upon readers of this book to use similar weapons. The church was never meant to be an organization in which a few do the work and the others contribute money. We are all to be part of the priesthood of all believers, involved in the ministry of spreading the good news far and near.

Suffering Not an Unconquerable Obstacle

Bishop Vladimir Ghica died for Christ in the Jilava jail of Romania (where I too was once imprisoned). When ordained, he had prayed, "Lord, take my heart and never give it back to me. Why was I born if not to love you passionately?" His last words on his deathbed were these: "May the pains inflicted upon me, united to your pain, O Lord, heal and bless those who tortured me to death." Too often when we are wronged by others we become resentful and bitter, instead of putting our sufferings in the service of those who inflict them. Let us learn from saints like this bishop to shed every tear and to utter every groan in the spirit of self-sacrificing love for those who wrong us. Enlarge your bosom by making all these lives yours.

Jail is no hindrance to a useful Christian life.

The American bishop Walsh, who spent twenty years in a solitary prison cell in China, wrote: "I woke up one morning and found myself in jail. The word of the Lord came to me: "This is what you dreamed of - time to say all the prayers you want to." I could not pray much while I was working. But now I had time to pray for my family, for friends, for everyone under the sun. Prayer is powerful."

If you are depressed, forsaken, idled, bereaved, do as Bishop Walsh did. When I have bouts of depression and am no good for any work, I pray in a depressed manner until the depression is gone. Jesus himself "offered up prayers and supplications with vehement cries and tears" (HEB 5:7). At the end of such prayers he could say to others, "I leave you my joy."

Liu Xiaobo was a leader of the protest on Tiananmen Square in Beijing, China, which ended in a massacre. He himself was arrested. But in jail he stopped thinking only about the sins of the Communist oppressors, when the word of the Lord came to him through a Christian fellow-prisoner.

Realizing his own sinfulness, he wrote, "How can a person who has no sense of sin ever hear the voice of God?" He thought to himself: "Jesus was nailed to the cross because of his love for sinners. But Christians I have known in China and those in the West don't come forward to sacrifice themselves for the sins of others. For many, religion has become another form of entertainment."

He changed his perspective: "Instead of fighting Communists because they do sinful things, I must dedicate myself to them, even unto death. If not, we all remain at the bottom of the same chasm instead of climbing to the peaks above. If anti-Communists don't love the Communists ardently and become willing to die for them, instead of fighting against them, it is like a paraplegic fighting a quadriplegic."

His thoughts may be useful to us in our conflicts with others. They can help us ascend to the peaks.

An Arab Girl

Mary Khoury was seventeen when Damour, her village in Lebanon, was raided by Muslim fanatics bent on converting everyone to Islam by force. She and her parents were confronted with one choice: "If you do not become a Muslim, you will be shot."

She knew Jesus had been given a similar choice: "Give up your plan of saving sinners or you will be crucified." He chose the cross. Therefore she replied, "I was baptized as a Christian and his word came to me: "Don't deny your faith." I will obey him. Go ahead and shoot." A young man did so, and left her for dead. Two days later, the Red Cross came into her village. Mary, alone of her family, was found alive, but the bullet had severed her spinal cord. She was now a paraplegic. Her paralyzed arms were stretched out and bent at the elbows, reminiscent of Christ at his crucifixion.

But words from the Lord had come to her. She knew what she must do with her handicapped life. "Everyone has a vocation," she said. "I can never marry or do any physical work. So I will offer my life for Muslims, like the one who cut my father's throat, stabbed my mother while cursing her, and tried to kill me. My life will be a prayer for them." Such prayers shattered Communism, as billions spent on nuclear weapons could never do. They will also bring Muslims to the Son of God. Therese of Lisieux said, "Sufferings gladly borne for others convert more people than sermons."

Mary's example encouraged other Christians to take a heroic stand. During 1990, the fiercest year of the fifteen-year Lebanese civil war, 1,000 were killed, 3,000 wounded and 300,000 fled the country - among them missionaries whose duty should have been to stay with their flock. But some remained. Luciem Accad, director of the Bible Society, stayed on, though a family of five was killed next door and a shell exploded in his own home, sending a wall crashing down on him. The blast left him deaf in one ear, but the other is enough for him to use in spreading God's word.

His spirit was good. "People are coming to the Lord every day," he reported.

Identifying with Christ

If a man stood by a roadside and watched the whole population of China walk past him at the rate of one individual per second, more than twenty years would elapse before the last member of the procession went by. The strictest Leninism rules these people. Lenin wrote, "Everything is moral that is necessary for the annihilation of the old exploiting order." According to Lenin, religion belongs in this category. It must be obliterated.

But Christians in China trust death. It is the way to enter into the embraces of the heavenly Bridegroom and to receive the holy kiss. A strange report comes from the province of Hunan. A preacher was hanged by the Communists, but they left too quickly. The brethren were able to cut him down, and he is still alive. He says that when the rope was around his neck and he was being hauled up over the branch of a tree, all he could think of was our Lord being raised up on the cross.

A Christian poem by Radu Gyn was smuggled out of a Romanian prison. It is characteristic of the belief of the Underground Church. Here are its main thoughts:

> Last night, Jesus entered my cell. How sad, how tall was Christ.
> He stood near my bed and said, "Put your hand on my wounds."
> He had on his ankles marks and rust, as if he had once borne chains.
> I arose from under my gray blanket, "Lord, whence, from what age, do you come?"

Jesus put a finger to his mouth and made me a sign to be silent.
When I awoke from sleep, the straw smelled like roses.
But Jesus was no more there.
I shouted through iron bars, "Where are You, Lord?"

Then I saw in my own hands the marks of his nails.

The Underground Church bears in its body the marks of Christ. Whoever blesses her blesses him. Whoever helps her helps him. Whoever learns from her learns from him.
Let us learn from these overcomers of the world!

Like the Day of Annunciation

When I was in prison, a young cellmate Jon Lugajanu was taken to court. When he returned, his face shone. The other prisoners asked what happened.
He answered, "It was like the day of Mary's annunciation. What a beautiful day! A pure virgin sits alone in meditation. At once a radiant angels stands before her. He tells her that she, a creature, will have the Creator as a baby in her arms; that she, a creature, will wash her Creator; that she will wash the One who afterwards will wash millions of men from their sins. She, a creature, will teach her Creator to walk. She will teach the eternal Word of God to speak. He will be the sun and joy of her house. There will be a few difficult moments. She will have to stand weeping at the foot of a cross where God's Son and her Son will die for our salvation, but this will pass. He will be resurrected and will go to heaven and, surely, he will call his mother to be with him. And it will be joy again, without end."
The prisoners thanked him for the nice little sermon, but they insisted, "We asked you something else. How was it in court?"
He repeated, "I told you already. It was like the day of Mary's annunciation. It was announced that I am sentenced to death. Is it not beautiful? Gates of pearl, streets of gold, angels playing harps, the communion of saints, and above all, rest on Jesus' bosom."

This is how suffering and death are received by Christians in Communist countries. How much we can learn from them!

Those Whom Poison Does Not Kill

In the lives of many prisoners, the Lord's promise is fulfilled: "If those who believe shall drink any deadly thing, it shall not hurt them" (MRK 16:18). The Communist Secret Police poison the prisoners slowly, sometimes putting drugs in their food, in order to break them morally and transform them through biological experiments into primitive creatures who will not think. But we have evidence to the contrary. I quote from a letter smuggled out of prison by the Soviet Christian David Klassen (remember: the following lines come from a prison cell):

> At midnight I bowed my knee before God and thanked him for all the graces which he has shown us. He has forgiven all our sins...He places us on the way of truth, he comforts us in our misery, in our suffering, in our separation...We will pray for the cleansing of the church of Christ, that she may bring forth more fruit... We will pray for the ministers, for the youth, for the prisoners and their families, for our country and its government.

From another letter written in prison:

> Don't weep, soul, that griefs surround you. Your lot does not lie in earthly life. The whole of happiness is where the saints who finished their course on earth live peacefully. Yes, I was obliged to go this way. There is no other way for me as a minister. And if someone wishes to be a minister, he must know beforehand that, when the Jews entered into the Holy > Land, crossing the Jordan, the priests entered first in the dangerous water and were the last to leave it.

How much we who eat dainties can learn from these Christians fed with poisonous food!

The prophet Obadiah charged the Edomites, a people who lived 2,000 years ago at the east of the Dead Sea, with participating in the sacking of Jerusalem and in the desecration of the temple. He said, "Ye have drunk upon my holy mountain" (OBA 16). The Communists have also changed many churches into cocktail bars. They have done even worse: they have changed churches into courthouses in which Christians are judged for their faith.

The Catholic priest Stephen Kurti was sentenced to death in Albania for having baptized a child. The trial took place in the former church of the town of Milot. The priest pleaded guilty and said, "I am a priest. It is my duty to give the sacraments." He left behind as his only property a radio.

Feeding on Beautiful Examples

The apostle Paul wrote, "Put on the new man, which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness" (EPH 4:24).

Ordinarily, men confuse holiness with goodness, though they are very different virtues. "God saw every thing that he had made, and, behold, it was very good" (GEN 1:31). After this "very good" followed something entirely different: "God blessed the seventh day and sanctified it" (GEN 2:3). Sanctification belongs to another sphere than goodness. A man can be very good without being holy, set apart for God. There are extreme cases when men are holy without being good. Where is the goodness of Gideon, Jael, Joshua? They were fighters for the triumph of the chosen people. In this they were holy. Whoever reads the lives of Athanasius, Luther, or Calvin sees very little trace of goodness in them. They fought ruthlessly for a truth entrusted to them, relentlessly confronting their adversaries. The truth must be victorious.

We have this commandment: to become holy by putting on the new man. But how can someone "put on a new man" in reality? The answer is, by feeding upon the right spiritual food. Worms that live in darkness have been conditioned to prefer the light. As often as they withdrew into darkness, they would get electric shocks, whereas if they came out into the light they would find abundant food. In time, these creatures "put on a new worm." Contrary to the habit of their species, they preferred light to darkness. Then these worms were cut up into small pieces and added to the food given to other worms, and marvel of marvels, these worms also changed their habits. The RNA in their cells, the depository of memory, had programmed them differently. Similar experiments have been performed on other animals.

If you desire to put on the new man, a man of righteousness and holiness, feed upon Christ, who called himself the bread of life. He became flesh in order that he might become your daily food. Feed also on the example of saints and martyrs.

By beholding we become changed. A person who feeds his mind on the levity of TV shows, who reads bad books or chooses evil company, becomes superficial in his attitudes and evil in his behaviour. But by faith you can put on the new man, without any effort, by beholding Jesus and by letting your spirit feed on the beautiful examples of faith given by the martyrs. This is why I write about so many.

At one time I was in prison with the Adventist pastor Boian of Ploiesti. Released on the same day as me, he was asked by a Communist officer, "What will you do now?"

He answered, "I will begin again my Christian work, with or without your permission, exactly where I left off when you arrested me."

He kept his word. Eventually he appeared before court again. The judge asked him, "Do you believe that Jesus will return and destroy his enemies?"

"He surely will."

"Will he destroy me also?"

"Without the slightest doubt I can assure you that you will be destroyed exactly like the others if you don't repent."

The judge went on, "Do you regret having preached illegally?"

"Why do you have stupid laws that forbid what is pleasing to the Lord? If you apply them, God will punish you here and in eternity."

"You were not allowed by us to preach." (In Communist countries, pastors must be licensed by the government.)

Boian's answer was, "God not only allowed me to preach, but commanded me to do so. Read the order yourself in the Bible. You will find it in MTT 28:19, 20."

He was sentenced to eight years in prison. He already had three years of jail behind him.

Such fearlessness is an excellent food for souls. By looking at these examples of courage, by looking upon Christ who has inspired them, we put on, without effort, the new man, just as worms put on "the new worm." A new breed of Christians appears, shunning comfort and seeking new spheres of zealous activity.

Your Life Can Be Exemplary

"And the Lord God prepared a gourd and made it to come up over Jonah that it might be a shadow over his head...So Jonah was exceeding glad of the gourd" (JON 4:6).

In the Bible the shadow is an image of the transitory. "Our days on earth are a shadow," says Bildad (JOB 8:9). "Man flees as a shadow and continues not," says Job himself (JOB 14:2). "Man spends all the days of his vain life as a shadow," says Solomon (ECC 6:12). He had inherited this thought from his father David. "Our days on the earth are as a shadow and there is none abiding" (1CH 29:15).

Even prophets like Jonah are sometimes "exceedingly glad" about what is very transitory. He had first made a booth so he could sit under its shadow, forgetting that whatever a man constructs is transitory. A vehement wind overthrew the booth the next day. There is nothing that we construct for ourselves that will not be destroyed. Nothing lasts for ever, not even civilizations, let alone us as individuals on this earth.

Jonah was exceedingly glad because of the shadow given by a gourd. But the next day a worm "smote it." Every gourd dies some day, as well as the worm that has eaten it and the prophet who sat under its shadow. Nineveh, to whom Jonah preached, also passed away, though it was granted another century and a half after its repentance. Believers die, as do unbelievers.

There is no sense in being exceedingly glad because of a shadow. Tomorrow you will wish to die because you lost this joy. But the despair will not last because it too is transitory like every feeling. Then the earth on which the gourd grew, about which men were sometimes glad and sometimes angry, will also burn. Only God is everlasting, and it was he who said, "Should I not spare ...?" (JON 4:11). Nineveh he would not spare for ever. Even Lazarus, whom Jesus resurrected, had to die again. Only God lives for ever. And his word remains: "Shall I not spare?" Shall I not spare in eternity the soul that has trusted in me?

Christians don't seek their comfort in the shadow of what passes. They are not depressed because of defeats and failures; victories might follow. They are not inebriated by successes. These too do not last. They have an unvarying source of joy: their eternal Lord, who will share eternity with them.

According to the law of gravity, all objects are attracted toward the centre of the earth. But flowers grow upward and planes rise to high altitudes, not because the law of gravity is false, but because gravity is not the only law. Biological laws are at work in the case of the flower, laws of aerodynamics in the case of the plane. There are forces in nature that overcome the force of gravity. Psychology would say that the result of prolonged persecution united with betrayal on the part of some church leaders who weaken the faith can only wear out the saints. But this depressive force is not the only one. It is counteracted by the power of the Holy Spirit and by the communion of the saints. Paul, writing to Timothy, gives himself as an example: "Thou hast fully known my doctrine, manner of life, purpose, faith, long-suffering, charity, patience" (2TM 3:10). Modern preachers usually avoid doing this. They speak about the example of Christ, not their own. Is this reasonable?

A madman once asked the cook in an asylum, "Are you able to prepare good food that makes those who eat it look fit and healthy?"

The cook answered, "I surely do."

The madman said, "You"d better become a mental patient in our institution, because you are the cook yet you yourself are thin and pale."

How can someone show me the right doctrine, the right manner of living, the right faith and the right charity, if he does not have them himself? Example is the best witness and the best sermon.

If the apostle gave himself as an example to be followed, it does not mean that he had a sinless life. Only One is sinless. But Christ "was delivered [to death] for our offences and was raised again for our justification" (ROM 4:25). So I am justified, that is, "I'm just-as-if-I'd never sinned." And I can give myself as a model to be followed by others as I myself strive to become more and more Christ-like.

Twenty years ago an Italian magazine told of a Catholic priest, Alexander Zavatta, who had spent ten years in a Soviet prison camp. He asserted at that time that there were still millions of innocents in Soviet jails, and he described the tortures to which he had been subjected in order to force him to make accusations against other Christians. Fearing that he might crack because of the great pain, he stretched out his tongue and bit it as hard as he could, hoping in his despair to cut it off so as not to become a traitor. Fortunately he did not succeed. Since the council of Nicea in 325 AD, self-mutilation has been considered unlawful for a Christian. The priest knew it, but he did something unlawful in order to remain loyal to his Christian brethren.

Another Christian prisoner in Cuba was asked to sign a statement containing charges against brethren that would lead to their arrest. He said, "The chain keeps me from signing this."

The Communist officer protested, "But you are not in chains."

"I am," said the Christian. "I am bound by the chain of witnesses who throughout the centuries gave their lives for Christ. I am a link in this chain. I will not break it."

Thomas Aquinas, after calling martyrdom the greatest proof of perfect love, adds: "Words pronounced by martyrs before the authorities are not human words, the simple expression of a human conviction, but words pronounced by the Holy Spirit through the confessors of faith."

We too are links in this chain. We can learn from the martyrs.

Exemplary Chinese Girls

In Kiangsi, Red China, a pastor and two Christian girls were sentenced to death. As on many other occasions in church history, the persecutors mocked them. They promised to release the pastor if he would shoot the girls. He accepted. The girls waited in the prison yard for the announced execution. A fellow-prisoner who watched the scene from his prison cell described their faces as pale but beautiful beyond belief, infinitely sad but sweet. Humanly speaking, they were fearful, but decided to submit to death without renouncing their faith. Then, flanked by guards, the executioner came with a revolver in his hand: it was their own pastor.

He told them about the deal he had struck with the Communists and how wise it had been to do so. They would have died in any case, but so would he. Is it not better that a pastor should remain alive? The girls whispered to each other, then bowed respectfully before the pastor. One of them said:

"Before being shot by you, we wish to thank you heartily for what you have meant to us. You baptized us, you taught us the way of eternal life, you gave us holy communion with the same hand in which you now hold the gun. May God reward you for all the good you have done us. You also taught us that Christians are sometimes weak and commit terrible sins, but they can be forgiven again. When you regret what you are about to do to us, do not despair like Judas, but repent like Peter. God bless you. And remember that our last thought was not one of indignation against your failure. Everyone passes through hours of darkness. We die with gratitude."

They bowed again. The pastor's heart was hardened. He shot the girls. Afterwards he was shot by the Communists.

Life often creates conflicts between people, though not always as dramatic as that just recounted. Let us learn from these martyr girls how to meet the betrayal of friendships and the unfaithfulness of those in whom we have confided.

Another episode from Red China: A girl was put through much torture to get her to betray the secrets of the Underground Church. She was asked how she could bear so much suffering.

She replied, "It was not hard. I had been taught by my pastor that the real torture lasts very little. For one minute of torture, there are ten minutes of glancing at the enraged faces and the implements of pain. I decided to keep my eyes closed the whole time. I did not see the stick before it hit me, nor afterward. The suffering was much reduced. I relied on the promise of Christ: "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God" (MTT 5:8). I purified my heart of fear of men, and I learned to see God. Just so, many had seen him before. When the Communists became aware of my defence, they stuck my eyelids open with tape, but it was too late. My vision had already taken on a new aspect."

Extraordinary Christmas Greeting

A Christmas letter smuggled out of the Soviet Union arrived in the West after much delay. It was written by the Russian Christian writer Alexander Petrov-Agatov, who had spent a total of thirty years in prisons and concentration camps for his faith before being released. This letter is a gem of love. Read it carefully:

On Christmas Eve I remember all men, independent of their faith and colour, of their social position or level of education. I remember men in power and those who suffer in jails and camps, the rich and the poor, the strong and the weak, those who have risen to peaks and those who have fallen into the abyss, the sick and the healthy, the persecuted and the persecutors. Foremost, I think about those whom I only recently left after having been with them in prison and camps for almost thirty years...

On our festive table there is a small Christmas tree: apples, grapes and other dainties. In my heart words ring like a bell: can you eat all these things while at least one man is hungry? Can you sleep in a warm bed when somewhere a prisoner is not allowed to lie down even on the cold concrete?

Garlands ornament my Christmas tree while the heavy chains of slavery and barbed wire surround the camps. I do not write only about Soviet camps and prisons. I think also about those who have no freedom in other countries. I think about all those who do not eat and drink this night, who cannot look at the most sparkling star which made Christ known to the wise men because the prison windows are covered with planks.

I greet, on Christmas day, our eagles and doves - mothers and wives, brides and those who could not become brides - my sisters who take the cross for the word of God, for truth, for righteousness, for faithfulness toward God and love toward men...

Christmas greetings to all the persecuted, the suffering, to all those who seek light. Christmas greetings to all persecutors and oppressors, to all those who curse and confiscate.

Christmas greetings to Helen Zagriazkina, who betrayed me seven years ago. I visited the church in which you worshipped. I wished to see you face to face, but was told that you don't go there any more. But do you ever pray? Pray, pray!

All men, prisoners and guards, men of the secret police and patrol officers, secretaries or the Communist central committees and presidents - pray while it is not too late. There will be no second birth of Christ. There will be a second coming. "Behold, I come soon," says the Lord. Soon, very soon.

Reading such words of wisdom and love from one who has suffered thirty years of jail helps us value our sufferings. "Jesus, though he were a Son, yet learned his obedience by the things which he suffered" (HEB 5:8).

Not favourable, but unfavourable circumstances are the hammers that shape the saints of God. Only men and women of courage who throw themselves into depths of sorrow come up with pearls, not those who for the sake of comfort shun the sea and the waves.

"Baptize Me or I'll Shoot!"

Those who are badly hurt in the free world usually try to escape from their tormentors. Not so with Annmarie, a young Slovak Christian. While she was being tortured, her main desire was to prevent her torturer from going to perdition. She shared with him again and again the beauty of Christ and his kingdom. His reply was more punches and more whipping, to which she responded by using every pause in the beating to bring him to God.

The holy word worked in the criminal. Once when she was brought before him, he asked her in mockery, "Tell me more about your God." Torturers often got tired of beating and would take coffee breaks. During these pauses, they were ready, while smoking, to listen, to be entertained. Annmarie complied with his request, adding, "In vain you beat me. You will never succeed in beating out of me my love for God nor my ardent love for you."

He mocked her: "Usually girls wait for boys to declare their love first. What is this stupid declaration of love on your part? We are not in the love business here. You should be telling me the secrets of the Underground Church. If you don't, I will beat out of you all your loves, for God, for me, or for other young men."

She replied, "While you beat me, I looked at your hands. They are beautiful. I imagine how your wife enjoys it when you use them to caress her. When one caresses, two persons have pleasure, the caressed and the one caressing. But what is the good of beating? It is terrible for those of us who are victims. But it must be terrible for you too to have your ears deafened with cries of suffering. And this day by day, every day. It must be maddening. So why don't you turn from beating to caressing?

"I will tell you one thing more, something no girl normally tells a young man. But here we are in extraordinary circumstances. You have very attractive lips. How happy your wife must be when you kiss her; what rapture this must be for both of you. May I ask you a simple question? Isn't kissing better than swearing, shouting foul words, or being angry? Both you and the person you address are soiled by such language. Then why not kiss instead of swearing? God created our lips for this."

"Where do you get all these foolish thoughts?" he asked.

She replied, "I have a boyfriend, the sweetest of all. Not that he loves me. He is love, the most exquisite love, love of a kind that does not seek pleasure so much as to fill the beloved with joy. Since knowing this boyfriend, I too can only love. Whether I am caressed or hurt, I can only love. You love hatred now. I call upon you to love love."

He gave her a powerful blow, and she fell to the concrete, hitting her temple and passing out. When she came to, she saw him sitting quietly as if in meditation. He told her, "I have been thinking about your boyfriend. What he says makes sense. Caressing is better than beating and kissing is better than swearing. I"m surprised that this simple truth has not been obvious to me before. Who is this boyfriend of yours?"

Annmarie told him the Name above every name.

He asked simply, "How can I make him be my friend too?"

She replied, "You must repent and be baptized."

"Then baptize me immediately," he demanded.

She replied, "I can't do that!" She did not know that in special circumstances everyone can baptize, even a child.

He pointed a revolver at her: "Baptize me now or I'll shoot you!"

The words seem strange, but they fulfil precisely the words of Jesus, "The kingdom of heaven suffers violence, and the violent take it by force" (MTT 11:12). This man wanted the kingdom forcefully and was ready to shoot his way into it.

He dragged her to a pool and dumped her into the water, following after. Annmarie baptized him. After a time, the converted torturer, risking his own liberty, gave her the certificate of release from jail of another prisoner who had died the day she was to be set free.

Christ Outside the Church

Without churches and without Bibles, people in the Communist camp have suffered from a thirst for God. They find him outside church buildings.

In a capital city, I once entered the tourist agency of a Communist country. When I told them my identity, they immediately called their embassy. The embassy sent over a representative, and I had before me four Communists, considered trustworthy enough to be sent abroad. I told them about Christ. Instead of the expected words of opposition, the one from the embassy told me, "Pastor, I dreamed one night that I was in a meadow. Jesus was also there and caressed my head. Why should I have dreamt about him? I did not believe in him. And why should Jesus have caressed an atheist? The whole of the next day I was in a kind of ecstasy. Could you explain to me what this means?"

What an opportunity for a pastor! I used it to good advantage.

"The most High dwelleth not in temples made with hands; as saith the prophet" (ACT 7:48). What a shock these words must have been for the Jews of old. Each year they travelled from countries far away or hundreds of miles in their own country to fulfil the obligation, imposed by their religious laws, of making frequent pilgrimages to Jerusalem. When they arrived at the Temple to meet God, the words of the prophet were read to them: "The Most High does not dwell in temples made by hands." Where then can man find God? And what are temples for if God is not in them?

Temples serve to point to the first real tabernacle, which the will of the Most High placed in a manger in a stable among cattle. God came to "tabernacle" with men as a Baby, in whom dwelt all the fullness of the Godhead bodily. And in the New Jerusalem the prophet John "saw no temple, for the Lord God Almighty and the Lamb are the temple of it" (REV 21:22).

The Communists, of course, do not know this. They believed that by destroying churches they would destroy people's belief in God. But God can speak to an atheist in his bedroom.

One Russian Orthodox priest, Serghei Zheludkov of Pskov, publicly aligned himself with Pavel Litvinov, a Russian freedom-fighter, sentenced because he protested against the invasion of Czechoslovakia by the Soviet Union. Zheludkov wrote him a wonderful letter:

> I heard that you are an atheist. This does not hinder my admiration for you...The church, the mystical body of Christ, consists of men of good will and action, independent of their so-called "convictions." As a healthy cell of a living body may know nothing about the head of the body, about the whole body, so a man of good will may be "an unbeliever," may not know and not think about Christ, about God - and, notwithstanding, belong to the church of Christ. Today in Russia many call themselves atheists only because of lack of education... Love, liberty, truth, fearlessness, loyalty, all these are names of our Lord, whom you honour, not knowing him, and whom you preached in your wonderful courageous attitudes.

Some of these ideas may seem strange to Western Christians. But I know of a young Russian scientist who, on a visit to the United States, was asked about religious persecution in Russia. He answered very sincerely, "We have to put many Christians in prison, because at their religious services they cut off the hands and legs of children as a sacrifice to God." He had been taught such things about Christianity.

If this were all I knew about Christianity, I would be anti-Christian too!

Sacrificing the Dearest

A girl named Mary tells the story of the court trial in Russia in which her mother was deprived of parental rights. The Communists shouted at her, "You are a mother. Deny God. What did he give you? Whom do you love more, your own children or your idol? How can you?"

Her mother sat with her scarf covering her eyes, repeating, "God sees everything. He will reward."

When Mary and the other children cried to her, "Mother, do not leave us!" she did not even turn to them.

It is a scene exactly like those we read about in the history of the early martyrs, who went into the circus arena to be devoured by wild beasts and would not listen to the pleading of their loved ones who asked them to recant and save their lives, for their children's sake. With God, the mystery of preferring the death of his Son to permitting the eternal death of sinners: with saints, the mystery of preferring to lose their children rather than to deny God. Such is our God: so are we. We can do nothing but sing his praises, whatever the consequences.

The story of Mary shows the strength of a mother's faith. Now let's look at the example of a child. Many little ones often excel in Christian virtues.

A missionary couple named Barendsen - he Dutch, she Finnish - went to Afghanistan to preach the gospel, knowing they would encounter both Communist and Muslim terrorism. Being one in spirit with Christ, they were ready to give their lives for him. Both were stabbed to death. At their burial, their five-year-old son said loudly, "I am a Christian. I forgive the murderers of my parents." We know of one Muslim who was converted after hearing this child, who had an intimate knowledge of Jesus.

In ~Almanach St Peter Clavier 1990~, Amelio Crotti, who had been a prisoner in China, wrote:

> From my cell I heard a mother speak soothing words to her child of five. She had been arrested with the child because she had protested against the arrest of her bishop. All the prisoners were indignant at seeing the suffering of the child. Even the prison director said to the mother, "Don't you have pity on your daughter? It is sufficient for you to declare that you give up being a Christian and will not go to church any more. Then you and the child will be free."
> In despair, the woman agreed and was released.
> After two weeks she was forced to shout from a stage before 10,000 people, "I am no longer a Christian."
> On their return home, the child, who had stood near her when she denied her faith, said, "Mummy, today Jesus is not satisfied with you."
> The mother explained, "You wept in prison. I had to say this out of love for you."
> Siao-Mei replied, "I promise that if we go to jail again for Jesus, I will not weep."
> The mother ran to the prison director and told him, "You convinced me I should say wrong things for my daughter's sake, but she has more courage than I."

Both went back to prison. But Siao-Mei no longer wept.

Jesus was born in a stable. Children of Christians have been in dreary, damp prison cells with heroic mothers who remind us in their saintliness of the holy virgin Mary.

A Russian, Vladimir Tatishtshev, was arrested in Shanghai. The authorities had iron tubes put on his legs, which they then tightened with screws and hammered until they broke his bones, to make him confess imaginary crimes. He refused. Then the Communist police went to his home. An officer picked up Tatishtshev's baby and told the mother, "If you don't sign an accusation against the prisoner, we will smash your child's head." The mother could not believe that such a thing could happen, so she refused. Then the police officer, a woman herself, smashed the head of the baby against the wall. The mother stabbed the officer, and the other Communists shot the mother.

Three corpses! Sin unto death. Countless episodes of this nature took place, and still happen in Red China, not to mention India, Tibet, Sudan, and North Vietnam. The free world knows little of real suffering.

The Communist newspaper ~Uchitelskaia Gazeta~ revealed that in the village of Burnii a teacher wrote on the blackboard, "There is no God" and asked the children to read it. One girl raised her hand, stood up, and read loudly and clearly, "God exists." The children told the teacher the parable of the prodigal son. The teacher, Matrena Matveeva, complained that all her pupils were children of believers. Every pupil in the village! She organized an atheist festival. Not even one child came. The children spent two to three hours a day in prayer. You might say that is too much. How many hours do American children spend watching TV?

When we read in the Bible that blessings are promised to children of the faithful, some of us expect a good material position, a happy marriage, high degrees, and positions of honour. But the Bible never deceives us about what is understood by "blessings." The Lord Jesus said, "Blessed are they which are persecuted for righteousness' sake: for theirs is the kingdom of heaven. Blessed are ye, when men shall revile you, and persecute you, and shall say all manner of evil against you falsely, for my sake" (MTT 5:10,11).

Christians know only one sadness: not to be saints. They have one suffering: not to share enough the sufferings of Christ and their fellow men. When sorrows are given to their children because they have the right attitude in life,

Christians rejoice and count them as blessings. I write these things as a parent, grandparent, and great-grandparent myself, having searched my heart thoroughly to determine what I wish for my children and grandchildren. I desire for them "the fellowship of Christ's sufferings," that "they might be made conformable unto his death" so "that they might attain to the resurrection from the dead" (PHP 3:10, 11).

Special Children

"It shall come to pass, if thou shalt hearken diligently unto the voice of the Lord thy God, to observe and to do all his commandments which I command thee this day...blessed shall be the fruit of thy body" (DEU 28:1, 4).

I thought about this promise of God when I read the second volume of Solzhenitsyn, Christian writer and Nobel prize winner expelled by the Soviet government. He relates the story of a Russian couple named Leshtshev, who had been imprisoned for their faith. They left children behind who grew up richly blessed, because their parents hearkened to the voice of God even when it meant heavy suffering. The children also had the privilege of being imprisoned for their belief in Christ. This was their blessing, which once more was multiplied. They too had children, all of whom were sent to concentration camps for their adherence to Christ.

All, that is, except Zoia, who was ten years old. She was put in a home for children to be re-educated. There she declared that she would never part with the cross her mother put around her neck just before leaving the house in handcuffs. To be very sure that the Reds would not take the cross away from her while she slept, she bound the chain tightly around her neck. Considered incurable, Zoia was sent to a home for mentally deficient children. Here she continued the fight for her cross and for the Saviour whom it symbolized. When other children tried to teach her to blaspheme and steal, she answered, "A holy woman like my mother should not have a criminal child."

She brought several of her schoolmates to faith. As in any school at that time, there was a statue of Stalin in the yard. These children wrote on it their opinion about this ruling criminal, and expressed their homage to Christ. Then they decided to smash the head of the statue of the greatest murderer in history, who killed countless millions of innocent men, women and children in his lust for power. The Secret Police were alarmed. Declaring it a "terrorist act," they demanded: "Denounce the criminal! If not, all 150 children will be shot."

Zoia Leshtsheva came forward: "I alone have done it. Why should Stalin have a head if he never had loving, righteous, compassionate thoughts?" She had a special blessing promised by God to children of faithful parents. She was sentenced to death at the age of fourteen. Her sentence was changed to ten years of prison, to which another term was added, and then another. Her parents and brethren were long since freed while she continued to enjoy God's blessing in prison.

Pupils of a Soviet high school in Vilnus were taken to the Museum of Atheism. There, a lecturer showed them an ancient crucifix and explained, "This is a symbol of Christian superstition. The Christians irrationally believe that a certain Jesus was the Son of God, that he came down from heaven to die on a cross to atone for the sins we have committed, and to open for us the gates of paradise, which we Communists know does not exist."

A girl exclaimed in tears, "This is what I need. I need Jesus. I love him." The atheist had brought her to Christ.

Below are two letters written by Soviet Christian children to their mothers in prison for their faith:

> God bless you, dear Mummy. Sincere greetings from your loving daughter. Don't be troubled by our temporary > separation; the mischief is not eternal. Joy will hasten to come back. It will give courage to our family and to your heart. Now you know prison. Little Mummy, I can't imagine the feast we will have when you return. I do my lessons. Now it is evening. Tomorrow it will be morning. So day after day. And one day your release will come. I embrace you.

Another little girl:

> Dear mother, when you come home, I will not think any more about solitude and pain. I made a poem for you:

You have a heart of gold,
You're young at heart, not old.
The Lord observes you from on high.
We'll be together soon, you and I.

I beg you not to weep, though I realize that prison will leave marks on your memory. Your loving daughter ...

The Christians who die in prison leave behind children who eat from garbage, stuffing potato peels and stale bread crusts into their mouths with feverish fingers. But these children have learned from their fathers an earnest faith. The Moscow atheist magazine ~Nauka i Religia~ describes them: "In Kislovodsk, I spoke after a religious service with a girl of eleven. She was sincerely convinced that while she prays the good Lord looks at her and smiles. She says, "There is God; I see him myself. I believe no one who says he does not exist." Another little girl kissed an image of Jesus crucified. Then she made her doll kiss it too. When asked why, she said, "God looked at the doll. I saw it."

The magazine continues to tell us what Iurii, a boy of twelve, says: "In my prayers, I ask God to give me strength to fight those who are against God. We have to fight them not with the sword, but with the Bible." Another boy of the same age says, "I ask God to forgive my sins, to make me strong, and that there should be no evil in me."

Some years ago we received an open letter from two "small orphan children in the Lord", Shura and Galia Sloboda:

Dear children of God, we, your small sisters in the Lord, have been separated from our dear mother and father and two little sisters and a baby brother, although we are still very young. We have been taken away from them through the People's Court in the Verchedvinskii region, district of Vitebsk, because our dear ones taught us salvation in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ...We have been put in the orphanage of Vitebsk. We cannot endure to be away from them, and we have therefore fled home twice, but the mighty of this world have again and again snatched us away from our family and placed us in the orphanage. Every day, we kneel by the side of our beds and pray for you all. And for this, we are terrorized, and they always threaten to send us to a labour camp.

On December 24, we felt urged to write to Moscow and complain about all threats and persecutions. We demanded to be allowed home during the winter holidays. Moscow gave their permission. But, alas, mother was no longer home! She had been sentenced to loss of freedom for four years because she had witnessed about Jesus Christ. Father received us together with our younger sisters and baby brother. He consoled us for a long time and said that Christians who love their Lord very much have to walk on a heavy path.

Dear mothers and fathers, who have consolation in the Lord, when you gather in your happy families, remember us when it is well with you! We ask you always in your meetings to carry us before our Almighty God in prayer, so that we can endure also this hard blow in our young lives and even unto death remain faithful in our hearts and trust in our Lord, who loves all."

The faithfulness of little children in Communist countries is often amazing. The son of someone named Ilyinov declared before court, "I will kill nobody. I will not, and that is final." Another child, Lilia Skomorokhova, declared, "I cannot be a member of the Pioneers [Communist children's organization]. Believers can't be members. Mummy told me she wishes to meet me in the other world. Communists don't get there."

A communication smuggled out of the Soviet Union told of the Baptist children Vania Vasiliev, Nadia Zdorova and others between eight and fourteen years of age who were lured or intimidated by the Communist prosecutor Skrortshov into signing statements giving the names of the teachers of their Sunday School. As a result, four leading Christians of the town of Saki have been sentenced. Their conscience will brand these children for ever as Judases; but obviously, at their age they did not realize they were being entrapped.

Also in the Soviet Union, the children of the Baptist family named Vidish were forcibly put in a home for mentally sick children, only because they believed in Christ. After one year of suffering there, they were abducted by their parents, who succeeded in bringing them into another town where doctors found them to be normal. But will the souls of these children ever recover from what they suffered?

What characterized the literature printed secretly by Christians in Russia was first of all its great care for the children. For instance, the following story appeared. Sister Mary L. had five children: Vania, Pavlik, Andrei, Vera, and Sveta. She bought them a rubber doll. But when the children played "prayer meeting," the knees of this doll could not be bent. So the children complained to their mother that she had bought them "an unbelieving doll." A believer is recognized by the fact that he bends his knees before the Creator.

Children taught in school that the cosmonauts did not see God in space answered: "But did the cosmonauts have a pure heart? Without it you will never see God, wherever you travel. With it, you can see him everywhere!"

In this secret literature, parents were asked to teach their children to be able to prove in school the existence of God. The leaflets maintained that Christian children in Russia "amaze lecturers and teachers by their steadfastness and religious heroism."

Always Turn to What Is Hardest

Lenin, founder of modern international Communism, was a man who hated God. At the age of sixteen, he became upset by a stupid remark of a priest he overheard talking to his father: "If your son does not go to church willingly, beat him." Lenin tore off the cross he wore around his neck. As often happens, an incident that was really a trifle created in him a complex of antipathy toward religion. He confounded one wrong utterance of a priest with all the realities for which the notion "priest" stands: God, the Bible, eternal life. Then Holbach became his favourite philosopher, and he would later recommend strongly the wide dissemination of the writings of Holbach to the masses. He liked this philosopher, who had written, "God is my personal enemy."

What a small, seemingly insignificant incident led Lenin to become an atheist! It might be useful to note how Sigmund Freud, the renowned psychiatrist, also became an atheist. In his childhood, Freud had greatly admired his father, looking upon him as a hero. When Sigmund was seven, his father told him that he had been attacked once by a gang that shouted:

"Down from the pavement, you dirty Jew! Jews should walk in the middle of the street." They also threw his cap in the mud.

The child asked, "Daddy, what did you do then?"

The father replied, "I grabbed the cap and left the pavement."

That was obviously the right thing to do when dealing with a gang. Heroism is a rare virtue which should not be squandered on minor incidents. But the father did not explain this to Sigmund, and the boy could not have been expected to understand. From that moment on Freud despised and hated his father. This hatred, which began with so small a reason, grew to the point where he dreamed of killing his father. When he matured, he extended his hatred to all fathers. He wrote a book against Moses because he was the father of the Jewish people. Freud also wrote against God, the Father of the universe.

Do our so-called convictions also have trifles as their origin?

Vietnam, Cuba and above all China still apply strictly Lenin's principle:

> Terror must be perpetrated unmercifully and in the shortest time possible, because people cannot endure continued cruelty of the regime... the trials must be conducted promptly, ending in swift sentences for the greatest number of clergy... the confiscation of monasteries and churches should be carried out with the greatest severity, without scruples and in the shortest possible time. The more priests executed during this occasion, the better.

Such adamant terror can be broken only by adamant faithfulness. Lukewarm Christians cannot resist. Elect souls, whom it is good to imitate, should follow the teaching of John of the Cross to "turn always to what is hardest, not to what is easy; to what is most distasteful, not to what tastes best; to labour, not to rest; to what is lowest and most contemptible, not to the highest and most precious."

Christians in such countries know they must propagate the gospel without counting the cost. We must do the same in our own circumstances.

Great persecution still rages in Vietnam. In the Filipino monthly ~Impact~, the Jesuit priest F. Gomez, who spent fifteen years in Vietnamese jails, described the power of darkness behind this persecution. He had a discussion with a high-ranking Communist official from Hanoi, who told him, "We do not admit the heresy of pluralism, because this means division and weakness. We care only about the people." He immediately added an explanation of what he meant: "'People' are only those who have the correct ideology and live according to it. There are some stubborn, hard-headed men like Archbishop Thuan. These will never become 'people.'" He also told the priest, "Nobody will come out of the concentration camp until he is converted to Communism. Those who do not convert will disappear." When the priest asked if Communists would grant religious freedom, the Communist official answered, "Freedom exists so that you can obey, in different ways, the rules of the Communist Party."

Shocked by the Communist's frankness, the Jesuit said to him, "I am a foreigner who can leave the country. If I repeat what you have said in the free world, it will certainly be bad propaganda for Communism."

The Communist answered, "Priest, no one will believe you."

The wicked are adamant in wickedness. We will be conquerors only if we are adamant in our goodness.

Men's Madness

Jesus must have pondered much about men's madness. While carrying his cross to Golgotha, he quoted the words of Hosea: "They shall say to the mountains, 'Cover us!' and to the hills, 'Fall on us!'" (HOS 10:8). Only madmen can speak thus, instead of saying, "Let us pray to God that he will protect us" or "Let us seek shelter." What good does it do to have a mountain fall on you?

What would Jesus say about today's madness?

In the nineteenth century, missionaries went to give the gospel to African cannibals. Some missionaries were eaten. When Bishop Hannington was devoured in Uganda, his two sons went to replace him. Eventually they baptized and gave communion to men who had digested their own father's flesh. These men told the sons that the bishop, while being led to his death, repeated unceasingly Jesus' words, "Love your enemies."

Modern men are worse than cannibals, who, with practical intent, kill men in order to eat them. We do not eat humans, so why did we kill tens of millions in world wars, why did Fascists and Communists kill more tens of millions in the years before and after?

It is folly to ask why men kill. They are mad and must be brought to the fear of God.

Corrie ten Boom related how Christians in Nazi death camps discussed ways to bring Nazis to salvation. God used me to form a mission to Communists and terrorists, men worse than cannibals. Why doesn't the world church declare this as its purpose? Why have there been so many Christian congresses without a word on the subject of winning to Christ the members of Communist parties and youth organizations?

The explanation is that many of us have not become really God-fearing, that many Christians still share the madness of the world. I wish every reader were a Christian, but not an average one. We should be serious in our thinking.

A Flower in Jesus' Garden

Armando Valladares is a Cuban Christian poet who was kept in jail for twenty-two years. After gaining his freedom, he published his memoirs. In them he described the horrors that took place in these Cuban jails, where there were more than 15,000 prisoners held on religious and political charges. A prisoner of only twelve was put in a cell with criminals. They bound him naked, laid him on his belly, and raped him. (In Russia, too, the brethren Tchemodanov and Klassen were put in cells with homosexuals.) In Cuban jails prisoners were beaten to a pulp. The jail had a large tank containing faeces and urine. Prisoners were forced to stand up to the neck in this filth.

It would seem that under such conditions only one law could work: self-preservation at the expense of belief. But Christians have "laws different from all other people's."

A believer named Geraldo, every time beatings started, shouted unceasingly, "Father, forgive them for they don't know what they do." He was shot while praying this prayer.

Valladares was once in the prison yard. An officer asked him, "Where do you get your power to resist? Why do you endure all this instead of giving up?" He plucked a flower, showed it to the Communist, and said, "Before there were men on earth, there were flowers. When Capitalism and Communism are long since forgotten, the flowers will still be there. Our holy book compares the faithful with flowers. It is written, 'Like a lily among thorns, so is my beloved among girls' (SOS 2:2). Try to be a flower in Jesus' garden, and you will live for ever."

From that moment, the officer became a different man. He no longer persecuted believers.

We can learn from such brethren to overcome the sorrows of our own lives.

Seek a Church on Fire

In Vietnam, a number of Buddhist pagodas and churches are kept open in the big cities to preserve appearances, but the majority of the pastors and religious have been sent to concentration camps.

Reverend Thich Quang Do was arrested in 1985. To induce him to collaborate, the Communists also arrested his 85-year-old mother, who was senile. Her hands were so stiff she could no longer hold her bowl, nor could she see to keep herself clean. Thich Quang Do was given the choice of denying his faith or letting his mother perish in suffering and filth.

The same methods are used against many Buddhists.

The world would say, "Do the will of the henchmen and save your mother." But Christians have a "different law." For no reason will they deny the God of Israel, who is the Maker of the universe and the Father of all mankind. He can make a mother's suffering serve her eternal good.

Mordecai's refusal to bow to the tyrant Haman - as recounted in the biblical book of Esther - threatened the existence of the whole Jewish nation, yet he did not bow, and God saved the nation. Haman and his ten sons, who were like him, were hanged.

The Communists trained male and female Secret Police officers to be professional seducers. They sent them to Christian prisoners, who many times had been doped with sexually-stimulating drugs beforehand, to seduce them. The moment the victim had fallen into their net, a snapshot was taken. Then the victim was blackmailed: "If we publish the picture, your family and your church will despise you." Some were asked afterwards to become informers of the Secret Police or were forced to give public statements that they denied Christ.

Mary X was an outstanding example of faith. Judged together with Tchernetskaia for having run secret Sunday schools, she had been sentenced to four years of prison,

while Tchernetskaia was sentenced to five. Mary protested against the milder sentence, asking for the privilege of suffering as much as her friend. But towards the end of her sentence a professional seducer was sent to her. She fell into sin and under blackmail gave a shameful declaration denying her faith.

Similar things happen with brethren after they have passed through many years of prison. In the Old Testament, Joseph refused the temptation of a beautiful woman. Many others have done the same, but they had not been administered mind-bending drugs as is the case with our sisters and brethren, and their nerves were not shattered through brainwashing and torture.

Leaders of the Underground church whom we met told us, with tears in their eyes, "We knew how to resist atheist propaganda and torture, but we do not know how to counteract the forced drugging."

There always remains a solution: What one can't resist should be borne in faith as another cross of strange design. Love bears all things - all, without exception. It also bears inescapable sins.

What False Church Leaders Praised

Our heart aches for the leaders of all official denominations in the former USSR. They, along with those who worked with them in the West, praised religious liberty under Communism, which did not exist. To show what these men praised, I quote from the book ~Let History Judge~, by the Russian Communist Roy Medvedev. The source cannot be challenged. In this work he tells some of the tortures applied to prisoners in the Leninist jails of the Soviet Union. Among them were innumerable Christians. Children were killed in the presence of their mothers to make the mother confess to imaginary crimes. When one prisoner refused to denounce innocents, a person completely unknown to him was brought in. The prisoner was told, "He will be shot if you do not sign what we ask." Thinking it a joke, the prisoner refused. The man was shot. After a few days, a second youngster was shot before his eyes. To avoid the killing of others, the prisoner then denounced his friends, who afterwards were also killed. The prisoner never recovered, knowing himself to be guilty of the death of many.

The Communists gouged out the eyes of prisoners and perforated eardrums. They put out their cigarettes on the naked bodies of prisoners and ripped open stomachs. In Leningrad, prisoners were covered by a box with nails driven in from all four sides. Others were forced to drink urine. Medvedev, himself a Leninist and a partisan of terror, criticized only what he called "excess." A Communist exposed Communist cruelty.

Official church leaders praised the one who initiated it. At the same time, they called the brethren of the Underground Church "the devil's fire."

We should not swallow the lie that there was terror only in Stalin's day. His successors were equally guilty. It seems that the extent of their crimes becomes known only after their downfall. Tortures like those described above might have broken our sister Mary X, who was sentenced to five years of prison for her faith. In a Communist newspaper she acknowledged that she had been imprisoned justly because she had really committed the crime of teaching children about Christ. She asked people abroad not to bother about her but to take up the defence of Angela Davis, the American Communist charged with the murder of four people. She finished her article with the words, "I ask parents and educators to warn their children about men of the church and of the sects."

How much urine were Christian girls compelled to drink before writing such things? Were their mothers beaten in their presence? They were weak. A Christian should fear nothing except God and fear. But a church leader who praises Lenin, the initiator of this system, is a disgrace. And church leaders who praise the one who praised Lenin are another disgrace.

Bishop Marshall of the Lutheran Church of America wrote sympathetically about his meeting with the Lutheran bishop of Hungary, Kaldy, a man whom he described as "enthusiastic about the Communist economic and political system." Enthusiastic about the political system that kept in prison the pastors Hegyeman, Turi, Katona, and many other Christians? Enthusiastic about a system imposed on Hungary by Russian tanks? A system that forbade pastors any contact with youth? Bishops should be "lovers of good," not of regimes that torture and poison children with atheism.

There are faithful bishops who give their lives for the church. There are other men of high rank in the church who are not "lovers of good." Be very careful to whom you entrust your soul. God gave some to be pastors and teachers "for the perfecting of the saints," to make them grow "unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ" (EPH 4:11-13). A bishop should lead you to high fellowship with God. If he does not, find someone better.

If you have been unsuccessful in finding the right pastor in your community, take the faithful pastors of the Underground Church as your example. Prayer will unite you with them. You will catch their fire and you will set your church on fire.

Somewhere a church was burning down. Among the spectators was a well-known atheist. The pastor said to him, "While the church was in good condition, you did not attend. But now that it is on fire, you come."

The atheist replied, "If your church had always been on fire, I would have attended regularly."

Faith Overcomes Everything

The Serbian female lieutenant Vidal Neditch specialized in beating men on the genitals with a rod (later she was imprisoned and tortured by her own comrades). Prisoners were given salty food and then kept without water. They were forced to run around their own cells, as in a circus ring, day and night without interruption. Trained dogs would jump at them if they stopped even for a moment. This is how confessions were obtained; these confessions in turn would lead to other sentences.

One torturer, in a moment of relaxation between two sessions of beatings, told his victim that torture was the most ancient of the fine arts, older than love, and certainly much richer and more varied. "Torture is what makes the difference between a man and an animal. Animals can't torture. In the human body, the zones of pleasure are fewer than the zones of pain. Pain is more intense and can last longer than pleasure." This monster believed that if there were a God, he made man to be tortured. "Everything that speeds up the coming of Communism is good. I have no scruples." This torturer ended up in a lunatic asylum.

For hours, prisoners had to listen to lectures about the beauty of the Communist regime. Driven to despair, one prisoner, not wishing to listen any more, cut off his own ears and sent them in a parcel to the Central Committee of the Communist Party. In Romania, a prisoner tattooed on his chest the words "Slave of the Communist Party." For this he was sentenced to death.

A Czech Communist newspaper wrote:

> The church as a whole has been in prison since 1950...Her press resembles letters from a jail...In prison, guards fired from the observation towers into prison cells, dogs without muzzles were let in the prison hospital, the inmates were beaten on their heads with horsewhips and sprayed with water from > hoses, and the investigator yelled:..."Do you desire human rights? We do not recognize any humanitarianism." Many of the inmates suffered internal injuries. Some, like Hermanovsky, a very young man, became insane from the torture. In one of the transports was also the 75-year-old bishop Vohtassak. They stripped him naked, and he had to stand for several hours on the stone floor and, when he could not continue the squatting exercises, they yelled at him, "Squat until you spit your soul, you ___!"

Communists have developed almost irresistible methods of torture. Brigadier-General John Flinn declared, "They could bring me to a state of mind in which, if they had ordered it, I would have shot my own mother." The United States Government did well to absolve all former prisoners of war of what they said under such extreme duress.

The Albanian prisoner G. Gardin, who served ten years, wrote that on the way to work prisoners passed long blackberry hedges.

> One day a young man slowed down to pick some. The guard who followed the line of prisoners found him in the bushes. The marshal was informed, and at dinner time the poor man was hung from the torture-pole, his hands tied with metal wire. At first, he resisted the pain caused by the weight of his body suspended from his wrists. He soon started to yell and implore, "Kill me! ...Please...one shot!" His breathing became difficult and he stopped talking; his face turned purple, and after a while his head bent forward.

Only then did they take him down.

The work-day of prisoners was fifteen hours. Sick prisoners were forced to work until they died of exhaustion. The food ration consisted of a ladle of soup twice a day, two pounds of bread, and meat only once a week. If a prisoner failed to meet the work quota by the end of the day, he received no food in the evening. Sometimes men with no other guilt than pure exhaustion were hung by their feet to a peg and left there for hours head-down. In the heat of summer they were deprived of even a drop of water, just as the damned receive not a drop of water in hell. A Communist jail is its ante-chamber.

The priests Fausti and Dajani were locked for two months in primitive latrines full of excrement. They were then condemned to death, while other Christians were sentenced to life-long imprisonment. When the two priests were led to execution with others, Fausti said, "Let us go to the house of the Lord."

The Absolute Torture

In Romania, unspeakable things happened. D. Bacu reported the following:

> We had to scrub the floors, while two or three other prisoners rode on us...We were obliged to eat like pigs. We had to kneel, with our hands handcuffed behind us, and lap hot soup from the dish. At noon, bread was thrown to us, which we had to eat in the same position, using only the mouth. The last crumb had to be gathered from the floor with the lips or tongue. We had to wash the dish with our tongues.
>
> The whole day you had to sit at the bedside, with your feet stretched out, with your hands on your knees, head up, looking straight forward, without the right to move. After sixteen hours of such torture, you were allowed to sleep but only on your back, face upwards, your body perfectly stretched out, with your hands over the blanket. If you changed your position, you were hit powerfully with a stick by the one who watched.
> Sixteen prisoners were once put one on top of the other. Under the pressure of this weight, the abdominal muscles of the lowest yielded. He did in the cell what he was not allowed to do in the toilet. He was compelled to clean his underpants with his tongue. At first he refused. Then his fingers were bruised between two pieces of wood. In the end...

The student A.O. was compelled to fulfil his necessities in his dish, then to receive food in the same dish and eat. The student N.V., unable to cut his veins, stuck his head in a bucket of hot food, hoping to die. He did not succeed. [Christians trying to commit suicide! What a good subject for moral indignation in the free world on the part of those who eat apple pie...] Some tried to tear open their veins with their teeth.

It was forbidden to hit a prisoner in the temples, in the region of the heart, in the neck, wherever death might follow. The Communists did not wish physical death. ..They made a devilish experiment: the death of the soul, to be replaced by conditioned reflexes. Not physical, but moral death.

At Easter, they clothed a prisoner in sheets and made him play the role of Jesus Christ. Out of soap they made a genital organ, which a theological student, the would-be Christ, had to wear on his chest instead of the cross. He was forced to walk around the room, beaten with sticks, as if he were on the road to Golgotha. Other Christians had to bow before him, to kiss this genital organ and to say, "I bow before your Almightiness." There was only one who did not stoop to such blasphemy. He was tortured for hours.

The Christian teacher Antonio Borro succeeded in escaping miraculously from Cuba some years ago. Having passed through prison himself, he told how the prisoners were treated. He was put in a cell, a kind of cage, in which he could only sit. He was dragged by the feet to interrogations, during which he was beaten with a rope on his face and with sticks on his back.

Borro was exchanged for some adherents of Castro in Honduras. Otherwise he would have experienced the other tortures applied to prisoners in Cuba. Among them he recounts the following: Our brethren were bathed in acid; a hammer and sickle were tattooed on the skin with a red-hot iron poker; their heads were put in a box of bees. He himself was shown a picture of medical students practicing vivisection on men who were still alive, and was threatened with having to undergo this. So he "confessed" to having committed immoral acts, being an agent of the CIA and an opponent of Communism, the last of course being true.

In China, Christians were forced to stand at attention for two hours before a picture of Mao-Tse-Tung with three bricks on each shoulder. Every twenty minutes a brick was added. In the end they had to carry eighteen bricks. If their knees buckled for a moment, the torture would begin again. Other Christians had their heads shaved. On the bald head were placed hot ashes, while the victim stood at attention before the idol of Mao.

The Chinese church has not only survived in spite of these happenings; it has mushroomed. When Mao came to power in 1948, there were 3.5 million Christians in China. After decades of fierce terror, Evangelicals alone are presumed to be 70 million. The number of Catholics has grown too.

Lenin's Alleged Conversion

In June of 1926, ~Osservatore Romano~, official organ of the Vatican, published an account claiming that the Hungarian priest Vittorio Bodo, friend of Lenin from the time of his youth as an emigrant in the West, visited him when he was fatally ill.

Lenin allegedly told the priest, "I have erred. No doubt many oppressed had to be freed, but our method has provoked other oppressions and horrible massacres. My mortal grief is to be immersed in an ocean of blood of innumerable victims. It is too late to turn back, though what we would have needed in order to save Russia was ten St Francis' of Assisi."

Mgr D"Herbigny, bishop of llio, doubting the story, spoke personally with the priest Bodo and had it confirmed from his mouth. He spoke about this encounter in a lecture published in an Italian magazine in 1946.

Lenin had been under Christian influence. His wife Krupskaia wrote in her memoirs that he had met the Orthodox priest Gapon, later hanged by the Communists. But most amazing is what ~Nauka I Religia~, the Soviet atheist magazine, published in December 1973:

> Lenin showed great interest in the writings of Christian sectarians, which a fellow-Communist had gathered, especially in the old manuscripts. studied them thoroughly... He was especially interested in their philosophical writings. Once after thoroughly reading the manuscripts of "the spiritual Molokani" [a specific Russian sect, afterwards almost uprooted by the Communists], he said, "How interesting. This has been created by simple people. Whole books."

The Communist magazine says this much. Who knows how much more is behind the story? Perhaps a deathbed conversion due to some primitive writings of old believers or due to some book about Francis of Assisi given to him by the priest Bodo. We don't know. Heaven is a place of surprises. We might be surprised to find there the converted mass-slaughterer of Christians Vladimir Lenin. Some dissidents who emerged from the Soviet Union asserted that they knew Lenin had confessed to a priest before his death. His Christian victims suffered and died praying for him. Their prayers may very well have been accepted.

We have always urged people to write to Communist leaders and to left wing personalities in our own country, as well as to leaders in the free world. In Judah, "the princes went in to the king in the court...and told all the words of Jeremiah the prophet in the ears of the king" (JER 36:20). We should catch big fish for Christ!

Malenkov, first co-worker and successor to Stalin who collaborated in the killing of millions of innocents, died a born-again Christian. His conversion came about one day when he, the privileged Communist ruler who enjoyed all the luxuries of life, took it upon himself to join poor citizens who were waiting in a long line to get bread. A slavemaster wanted to find out how it was to feel the other end of the whip. The KGB officers Ataiev and I. Konnikov, after torturing many Christians, died as Christian martyrs themselves. They came to the Saviour by bowing over their victims to try to feel how it was to be tortured.

If we practice faith consistently as our persecuted brethren do, we will also acquire enormous spiritual power and will be able to overcome seemingly invincible enmity.

Letters from Families of Martyrs

In religious life, as in every craft, there are three steps. First, one starts as a learner, a disciple. Then he becomes a worker, and finally, if he persists, a master. The apostle Paul calls himself a master-builder.

I am saddened when I meet Christians who have remained disciples for decades, never becoming reliable workers. As for becoming masters, able to disciple others, they do not even have this as their aim. The Bible tells us to compete with each other and to run so that we might get the prize, which can be obtained only by outrunning all the others (1CO 9:24, 25).

When I became a missionary, I read the history of renowned preachers and missionaries of old and strove to attain their level of competence and if possible to surpass it.

However, I realized that one must be prompted by a desire to serve God better, not by personal ambition.

There are many callings in the service of the Lord, and everyone has some gift, however modest. The calling of those of us who work in Christian Missions to the Communist World has always been to help the persecuted church. One privilege we have in this work is to give support to families of martyrs. Over the years we have received countless letters from those to whom our mission has sent help by secret channels. These have served to validate the work of our mission. I would like to share a few:

> Only God knows how many are in prison for their faith...Many are expelled from their jobs for their faith...In the churches you see thin and worn-out faces. You can see that many have come from prison...A mother has died. The family went to the burial and they read the Holy Scriptures. But there were some spies there. These spies have lied that brethren have delivered a sermon and they were sentenced (these brethren left behind children: five for one and nine for the other)...I had to serve in the Army three years. Instead, I went to prison for five years because of the Word of God...But many of the wicked people have repented and we rejoice with them in the Word of God. Then I was taken out of the concentration camp. They told us that we have filled the camp with our religion...
> There was one who could write a whole page only with Bible verses. I asked him how he knew them. He answered that his beloved mother had fed him from > childhood with the Word of God...Only God knows the sorrow which is in that house, because they have small children. They ask mother where father has gone and why he does not come back. And now mother too has to leave the children to work in a collective farm... A young brother by the name of

> Vasile was on the field. They came there and bound him and took him to prison. They have taken George too ...

A mother who was left with nine children wrote:

> Glory be to the Lord that he has given us also a little chip of his cross to bear. May he only give us strength and help to bear it and to pass through the straight way reserved for Christians...We must eat our bread with tears, but the Lord be praised for everything...I thank you with tears that the Lord has opened your hearts at such a big distance. May God bless and reward you for your work. May he give you long and happy life and life eternal beyond. When we remained alone, the wicked ones said that we will not have the wherewithal to live, but praised be the Lord that he takes care, as he took care of Elijah, Daniel and of all who served him... God has given me nine children who wait now for their father to come home, but their father put his life at stake for Christ and left his children to suffer for the faith once for all delivered by God to the saints.

From another letter from the family in which both parents died for Christ:

> Know about us that we have remained orphans. May God reward your care for us and bless you with all blessings. The brethren who preached at the burial of mother were arrested...You cannot imagine how life is here. You go to bed with fear and arise with fear... The persecution is very heavy, and there are many prisoners.

Here is a letter from another family of Christian martyrs:

> May the Lord Jesus who out of his free will stretched his hands on the cross to pass us from death to life reward you with eternal life for what you sent us. I am

content that I share the sufferings of Christ, because if we suffer with him, we will also rejoice with him...A glass of water given in his name will not be forgotten ...A man offered 300 roubles for my New Testament. Men are hungry for the Word of God.

The Urgency of God's Tasks

We have had great satisfaction in the work of supporting martyrs' families. Serving God according to the gifts he has given us always produces joy. But no one can do the work of God, of whatever kind, in a world of rebels against God without encountering great difficulties, problems, criticism, attacks, and even persecution. Our mission is no exception.

In the hope that our experiences might help you overcome difficulties of your own, I will share a few of ours.

We have assisted the suffering church in Communist countries by smuggling in Bibles, Christian literature, and in some places printing machines. For this we have occasionally been attacked, even in Christian circles. It is said that such secret work cannot be done without deception and that it is better to leave a third of the world unevangelized than to tell a lie. We will not quarrel with those who think like this. We tell them, "We have seen another angel" than they have seen. This other angel has sealed us with the seal of God on which it is written, "Save some by all means" (1CO 9:22), through ordinary or extraordinary methods.

At the beginning of the last century, an unusually intelligent girl by the name of Barry felt the call to become a physician. Because girls were not accepted in universities she disguised herself as a boy. She passed her exams at the age of ten. At fourteen she was a doctor in the army and in time rose to a high military rank, nobody suspecting she was a woman. She dedicated all her life to the medical care of convicts, paupers, lunatics, and lepers, as well as the military of South Africa and Jamaica. Only at her death was it discovered that she was a female.

If one calls her life a perpetual lie because she was acting as a man, who is to blame? The dedicated physician, or those who made laws forbidding even exceptionally gifted girls to fulfil their God-given vocation?

The same principle applied to the work of smuggling Bibles and Christian literature where they are forbidden. Our couriers have acted as tourists, diplomats, sportsmen, newspapermen, etc. They have had to use disguises. If this is a sin, the Communists are responsible for it. We contest their right to forbid the life-giving gospel to whole nations, and we defy their laws. The same principle also applies to one's personal life. If marriage partners and friends acted joyous even when they felt depressed, if they smiled at each other even when they felt like weeping, if they were gentle even when indignant, their lives would change significantly. There exists a saintly honesty and a saintly acting. You need to be aware of the difference and the reasons for employing each of them.

A Christian in Romania told another, "I was questioned by the police about whether you distribute Bibles secretly. I did not wish to lose my salvation by telling a lie, so I gave incriminating declarations against you. Be prepared to be arrested." I scorn such "truthful" speech.

Working with a Sense of Urgency

The Orthodox Jews of Jesus' time were extremely reluctant to allow any work to be done on the seventh day of the week. The Sabbath was a day for worshipping in the temple. Jesus no doubt startled them by asking, "Which of you shall have an ass or an ox fallen into a pit, and will not straightway pull him out on the Sabbath day?" (LUK 14:5).

At first glance, many words of Jesus seem to us childishly simple to understand, and we marvel why his contemporaries had difficulty with their meaning. Jesus healed several sick people on the Sabbath and, as if this were not enough to upset the religious authorities, he even commanded one of them to carry his own bed during the Sabbath day. While those around him may have wondered why healing could not be postponed another day, since these people had been sick for years, Jesus treated the afflicted as total emergencies. He illustrated the same urgency on other occasions. When the Jews were upset that his disciples plucked and ate ears of corn on the Sabbath day, Jesus compared their action to King David's. When fleeing in great haste from Saul's wrath he ate of the consecrated temple bread (MTT 12:3).

If we look superficially, like the Jews of Jesus' time, we too will fail to perceive the urgency. Why not postpone by one day the healing of a condition that existed for many years, or the carrying of one's bed? What could this hurry have to do with Jesus' spiritual message on earth?

The falling of an ox into a well or pit was indeed a dire emergency that would not have allowed its owner to have an easy day. In fact, it might have wrecked more than the Sabbath, and perhaps his whole livelihood. A drowned ox was a big loss, for it was the animal used to pull the plough and thus obtain a crop of wheat to feed the family.

The donkey was used for transportation and for carrying loads. Its falling into a well must have been, in those times, a bigger disaster than wrecking a car nowadays. Also, how long could a family survive without water? The situation could not be ignored or postponed.

There is no step-by-step procedure on how to hoist an ox out of a narrow well, yet great skill is needed. It is difficult to get an ass moving even on a straight road, let alone climbing or backing out of a well. The carrot and stick would be useless as threats. The one suffering the loss would try all orthodox and unorthodox methods, use all approved and unapproved, pleasant and unpleasant means in order to get his animal out, in whatever shape. There is no indication as to how much time or financial and emotional effort the task would take. The owner would work frantically against time and most likely alone, for the place is narrow. Such a disaster occurs suddenly. A small slip and the damage is done.

Those who don't know Jesus live without knowing real life. Lives without Jesus are irremediably lost. In such cases, one should not be choosy about the means of rescue.

The work of spreading the gospel where it is forbidden or hindered must be treated as an emergency.

The Greek word ~eutheos~, here translated in LUK 14:5 as "straightaway," is the most characteristic word of Mark"s Gospel. It is found more often in Mark than in all the other Gospels combined. The reason is as follows. Tradition identifies Mark with the rich man to whom Jesus said that, in order to be perfect, he should sell everything he had and give to the poor. It seemed to him at that time too big a price, and he left the place with sadness. Later he repented and fulfilled the commandment of the Lord, but there remained remorse in his heart for the time lost in disobedience. Therefore he repeats continually in his Gospel the word ~eutheos~ - straightaway.

What is good must be done straightaway. Only this moment is ours. The next moment might belong to death, even if we are young and in perfect health. If we don't act straightaway, other cares might make us forget our duty. So if our hearts are moved by the suffering of our fellow-believers, wherever they might be today, let us act on our convictions and loving impulses. Tomorrow may be too late. Those who work with such a sense of urgency make a great impact.

A report out of China revealed how Christianity spread in that repressive society:

> Ten brethren and sisters were imprisoned, beaten and > bound. They regarded their sufferings for the Lord as more precious than the treasures of Egypt. They had preached with tears streaming down, causing the passers-by and street-sellers, Christians and non-Christians to stand still and listen. Even the fortune tellers were moved by the Holy Spirit and burst out crying. Many people hearing the Word forgot to eat, work, or even return home.

>
> The brethren and sisters preached until they were exhausted, but the crowd would not let them leave. However, the authorities came and dragged the Christians away one by one, binding them with ropes and beating them with electric-shock poles, knocking them unconscious. But when they revived, they continued to pray, sing and preach to the bystanders.
>
> When they were bound and beaten, many people noticed a strange expression on their faces, and the crowd saw to their amazement that they were smiling. Their spirit and appearance was so lively and gracious that many were led to believe in Jesus by their example. When the brothers and sisters in that area saw them bound and forced to kneel on the ground for more than three days without food or water, and beaten with sticks until their faces were covered with blood, with their hands made black by the ropes - but still praying, singing and praising the Lord - then they too wished to share persecution. So in this area recently the flame of the gospel has spread everywhere.
> In men's eyes this is an unfortunate happening, but for Christians it is like a rich banquet. This lesson cannot be learned from books, and this sweetness is not usually tasted by men. This rich life does not exist in a comfortable environment. Where there is no cross, there is no crown. If the spices are not refined to become oil, the fragrance of the perfume cannot flow forth; and if the grapes are not crushed in the vat, they will not become wine.

"Dear brethren," concludes the one who recounted this incident, "these saints who have gone down into the furnace, far from being harmed, have had their faces glorified."

God's Smuggling Work

Some critics have advised us over the years, though in vain, to stop smuggling Christian literature because smuggling is immoral. If smuggling is immoral, why does God engage in the practice?

Let's look back at the story of Jesus. The Jewish high priests had a promise from God that he would speak to them from between the two cherubim on the ark of the covenant in the Temple. They felt safe. Never would the Messiah dare to come without telling them in advance. No ruler from abroad would visit a country without giving notice. Thus the Roman governor was also sure. The King of the Jews could not appear in the world without his knowledge.

One night, the Light of the world "smuggled" himself into Palestine as a baby, after having been in the womb of a holy virgin, contrary to accepted moral standards and the laws of biology. What a pity that the critics of Bible-smuggling did not live at that time! They would have had something against which to protest.

Some Soviet church leaders, knowing that if arrested they might be tortured to death, went into hiding, which is possible only by assuming a false identity. "Deceit!" some cry. "Lack of integrity!" But God lived on earth without telling people who he was. The people of Nazareth thought they were dealing with a carpenter bearing the common Jewish name "Jeshua." Later, when some began to believe he was the Messiah, he entreated them not to tell anyone, exactly as an underground worker under Communism or Islam would do.

Then he was crucified and buried. A seal was put on his grave by the authorities. Now everyone knows that one is not supposed to break a seal. But angels are not bound by earthly laws. An angel just rolled away the stone, without worrying about the seal.

Would today's Christian magazines have advised Jesus to abide by the law and remain in the tomb after the authorities had sealed it? But Jesus "smuggled" himself out of the grave into life again. Some tell us that we should not break the laws of Communist tyrants. Jesus "broke" the law of gravity and ascended into heaven!

What do these critics really know about love for the Word of God and for the church? In some cases, Christians in the Soviet Union did not fret when a church was locked and sealed by the authorities. They cautiously unlocked it with another key so as not to damage the seal in its place.

We continue to denounce the crimes of the Communists and Islam and to smuggle Christian literature into the Communist and Moslem camp, telling people about the resurrected Saviour who makes possible our resurrection.

We asked a Russian brother who collaborated with us in this secret work if his conscience did not tell him to be submissive to the authorities. His answer amazed us:

> If we are wrong, the whole Baptist religion is wrong. I read an article in our secret magazine that told about Thomas Helwys, pastor of the first Baptist church on English soil. He went to prison because he had said that the king had no power over the immortal souls of his subjects, to make laws and ordinances for them and to put spiritual rulers over them. I read about a letter smuggled out of prison in England in 1620 by a Baptist, John. The letter was written in milk, just as we do now. The jailers would not notice. Our families would know how to make the letters readable. He > wrote, "The magistrate can only compel the body, not the mind and the conscience."

>
> If we are wrong, John Bunyan was a fool! He preferred to sit twelve years in prison rather than worship in a manner determined by someone else. And for him it was only a matter of complying with another form of Christian religion, whereas we have had to comply with regulations imposed by atheists.
>
> Some feared and went back to the official church > under pressure. But they were an infinitesimal minority. The Underground Church continued. The Christian people stood with us. Even some Communists and police officers rendered us a precious service.

Men saved in the highest sense of the word are also saved from codes of conduct purportedly established once and for ever for all circumstances. They have the Holy Spirit to give them personal guidance in extraordinary situations.

From a subterranean prison in Rome, St Paul wrote, "I can do all things through Christ who strengthens me" (PHP 4:13). However, he was not tortured as Communists have tortured Christians in our day.

In Red China's prisons, some of our brethren and sisters in the faith had to sit motionless, leaning toward the wall, from five in the morning until nine o'clock at night, day after day, month after month, for years. Every day was like an enemy determined to torture them to death. They were not allowed to speak to the other inmates of the cell and were forbidden either to laugh or to weep. If a prisoner had to cough, he had to say to the warden who continually spied on him, "Bau-gau," which means "Please give me permission." It was "Bau-gau" for spitting, for scratching oneself, for killing vermin, for using the toilet.

If all at once someone in the cell went mad and began to sing, the rest had to sit motionless while their fellow-prisoner was silenced through beatings. With chains on their hands and feet, they could not even help him.

In HEB 13:3, it is written, "Remember them that are in bonds, as bound with them." Try to sit for as little as six hours like this, motionless, on the floor (in prison, on the cold concrete) to see how your brethren fare!

Don't Repress Evil Memories

"Zacharias praised God" (LUK 1:64).

Zacharias and Elisabeth, parents of John the Baptist, were well along in years when the child was born to them. While he was a normal child, his father had a vision telling him that his son would be a prophet of the Highest. Zacharias knew what this meant. Prophets are predestined to live a dramatic life. Their tragedy is that they learn early what is right and as a rule end up by being slain, either physically or by slander. Today Christians may acknowledge that the biblical prophets were right, but their own generations rejected them.

The prophet's life is by its very nature thorny. He never compromises the truth in order to make a friend, never withholds a blow at error to avoid making an enemy. With the firm assurance that he speaks for God, he pursues his course unmoved by the prospect of temporal advantage. He is ever outspoken and straightforward, believing that in the end his message will weld believers into a God-conscious body actively involved in warfare against the world, the flesh and the devil.

Prophets have friends but also implacable and often influential enemies. Zacharias knew that this would be the fate of his son, but he praised God. He probably did not live to see his son beheaded by King Herod for fulfilling his prophetic duty, but he may have done so.

The word "prophet" comes from ~pro-phemi~ in Greek, which means "to speak for." Prophets speak for God. In the name of God, John the Baptist would condemn the king's sin, and pay the price for doing so. His father could very well have foreseen such an eventuality. Still he was able to praise God for giving him a son predestined to be a man of sorrows. We too can praise God in spite of present or future pains. We can see in them the tender mercy of God expressed in a manner unintelligible to our limited reason.

The Underground Church in Communist countries has had a prophetic calling. We are one of its mouthpieces. Although God has laid upon us a heavy burden, we praise him, as did Zacharias. This task of ours impels us to catalogue its pain, to recount again and again its atrocious suffering, to diagnose its evil origin. I have done this for half a century.

You may ask why I bring up so much ugliness and so many terrible memories. Some of my best friends have told me that it is hard for them to listen to my painful accounts. Isn't it better to forget the tragic side of life and stop wallowing in adversity? Every knowledgeable psychologist will insist that the repression of bitter memories is a sure path to neurosis. The Bible recounts not only the beauties of life but also the worst deeds committed by individuals, the worst calamities that befell people, even the degrading sins committed by saints in moments of temptation or darkness. The events of the trial and crucifixion of Jesus are not pleasant to read. It is both wrong and futile to try to forget the past. Rather, one gets rid of this burden by re-actualizing it.

My recommendation is that you seat yourself comfortably and then call up before your eyes the circumstances of the past that burden you most, especially any encounters with those against whom you have sinned or who have sinned against you.

Then evoke the presence of Jesus. We all can evoke a beloved person and see him with our heart's eyes. Relive the tragic or sordid events of the past, all the while looking at the face of Jesus to see how he feels about them. You will discover that he is not judgmental, censorious or bitter about anything we have done, no matter how reprehensible. He himself stood in line with sinners to be baptized by John. Having been tempted in all things like us, he does not look down upon us. Imagine how the best of men would judge you for what you have done; then remember that he is better than the best. In Hebrew the word "mercy" does not exist, but only the plural ~rahamim~, "mercies". No one can exhaust his mercy.

With Jesus by your side, walk again the way of your past sins, knowing that nothing is too degrading for him. Tell him you love him and claim his forgiveness. Then accept the fact that not only does he understand and forgive, but he also forgets.

Do this for all who have hurt you terribly, those who insulted, robbed, demeaned, molested, raped, tortured you. Look upon them with the eyes of the all-understanding and all-forgiving Jesus. Then you will be able to forgive them too and to love them with all your heart.

Your memory will be healed. This has worked for me; it will work for you too.

Don't Believe Only in a Historic Christ

Not all Christians think alike. Some believe that Christ was born only in Bethlehem for our salvation, and they celebrate this event at Christmas. Others, rejecting the spiritual contraceptives of unbelief and pride, have allowed Christ to be born also in their own souls after being touched by the Holy Spirit. Furthermore, they have kept worldliness and false teaching from bringing the Divine embryo to abortion. He lives within their hearts.

When Michelangelo used a stone-mason as a model for a statue of Christ, he was criticized by his teacher Ghirlandio.

Michelangelo defended himself: "But Christ was also a working-man, a carpenter."

The master replied, "Florence won't accept a working-class Christ. They are used to having him as a nobleman."

So some are accustomed only to a historical Saviour. They would not accept an inner Christ, though to be real, Christ must dwell within the heart. To all outward appearances, Jesus was a Jewish carpenter and rabbi. Thousands knew him without observing that he was more. His being Christ became visible only through spiritual insight.

Thus it is today. I invite you to take a step forward from celebrating only Jesus' birth in Bethlehem two thousand years ago. We must become Christian "in the inward parts" (PSA 51:6).

A Christmas focusing only on the outward, historical event is perilous to the soul. It brings death in the disguise of merriment, whereas Christ born within brings life eternal. Once Christ lives in us, we are "the light of the world" and "the salt of the earth" (MTT 5:13,14), "partakers of the divine nature" (2PE 1:4), children of God. Then we can rejoice about, and in spite of, everything. When the sea becomes stormy, fish descend to the depths, where it is calm. When suffering and disappointment of all kinds accumulate in your life, add to them the suffering of others. With Christ, enter into the depths of even greater sorrows freely chosen. Go willingly to Gethsemane!

We are told only once that Jesus and his disciples sang. It was just after the Last Supper, when he went to Gethsemane to be betrayed, forsaken, bound, and delivered into the hands of murderers. "Rejoice!" he says. Deep joy is the privilege of those who, prompted by love, choose heavy crosses. Jesus sang a psalm of praise knowing that, in addition to dying on a cross for us, according to a prophecy, he would bear a suffering not prophesied: descending into hell. This joy out of the depths he communicates to us. Add to your suffering the weeping with those who weep. This will give you joy.

We can rejoice because there are Christians like the

Russian Mary Avinova, who told her Communist interrogators, "I believe in God, in truth, nobility and beauty, and I hope to do so until I die. I don't fear the sufferings you impose upon me. Dostoievski once said, 'Where there is sorrow and pain, the soil is sacred.'"

She was in jail not only with fellow Christians and criminals but also with Communists who had some quarrel with their Party and were now sentenced. One of them, a woman, told Mary, "I have one son. I wanted to make him a first-class Communist, but he was too soft-hearted. So I got together two dozen puppies and kittens in a basket and ordered him to drown them. He burst into tears, but I made him do it. He had to be a ruthless fighter for Communism. We know no pity, compassion, or other bourgeois weaknesses." Such a son now tortured his mother and Mary without compunction.

But this picture is not all dark. There is reason to rejoice. Avinova was able to give comfort and light and eternal hope to this monstrous mother.

Martyrs of Our Mission

The dictator Idi Amin killed Brother Joseph Kiwanuka, trustee of our mission in Uganda. Amin had falsely accused him of belonging to the CIA, only because he distributed our literature.

At that time, Amin was the only ruler who received arms from the Soviet Union as a gift, so he obeyed his benefactors. In his eyes, everyone who denounced the crimes of Communism, showing the better way of Christ, was an agent of "American imperialism."

Brother Kiwanuka received a warning and fled to neighbouring Kenya. The Ugandan police kidnapped him out of a flying helicopter. His crushed body was drowned in Lake Victoria. He left behind a widow and many children. In addition, the whole Christian tribe of Lugbanas was killed by Amin.

Wang-Shin-Mei was beaten to death while on assignment to smuggle Christian literature into Red China for us, while another man involved in our courier work disappeared in Cuba. The translator of my book ~Tortured for Christ~ in Amharic (Ethiopia) was put in jail. To make this book known was considered a crime by the Communists. Today he still suffers from the mistreatment he endured. Now he leads our mission centre in Addis Ababa. His name is Testsray Neffrim.

The Burmese pastor Wy-Foo died by being hanged head-down in China. He had been caught smuggling our literature over the frontier.

Your life might be smooth if you decide to walk with Jesus all the way, but it might also be very tempestuous at times. The reward is that if Jesus lives within you, you will be an overcomer and will sit with him on his throne.

Personal Attacks

I have to warn you that the disciple cannot be above his master. Jesus was attacked personally with insults and slander. If you walk the road toward master-hood, you can expect the same treatment.

The apostle Paul's main subject in his epistles was the One whose countenance shines like the sun releasing its splendour, whose eyes are pure, and whose whole being is as snowy as white jade. Christ is the main subject - but not the only one. Sometimes Paul wrote about himself and his co-workers. So you will forgive us if we give ourselves as examples in this matter.

Over the years our mission specifically, and I personally, have been the targets of fierce criticism and vilification on the part of the Communists and their stooges. The Soviet Union sent a protest to the French government for allowing Solzhenitsyn to speak on television. The Swiss authorities informed our mission that they received a similar protest against the advertisements announcing my books. In Finland, where the film of Solzhenitsyn's novel ~One Day in the Life of Ivan Denisovitch~ was forbidden, the government, acting under Soviet pressure, asked the Lutheran bishops not to grant me the use of churches. As a result, I had to preach in privately-owned halls.

The Communists forced the owners of the hall in Helsinki to cancel the agreement. The administrator of a hall in Turku belonging to the fire brigade replied to the Communists, "When a fire breaks out, our boys go to quench it, risking their lives without asking to what party the man belongs whose house is burning. The cry of every suffering person can be shouted in this hall. Wurmbrand brings the cries of martyrs. He will speak here." She had more courage than the bishops.

A book published in Russia, ~Diversion Without Dynamite~, by Belov and Shilkin, concentrated heavily on our international organization, on me and my son. It described our activities as "tempestuous." The story told about me was that I was allegedly sentenced in Romania for anti-Communist activity under the guise of religion. Then the authors claimed that all our assertions about persecution in the Soviets were fanciful. What hurt them most was my book ~Was Marx a Satanist?~ (now titled ~Marx and Satan~), which has been translated and continually reprinted in many languages. "Wurmbrand is among the most ardent opponents of detente" - the authors even praised anti-Communists if they have the one virtue of also being anti-Wurmbrand.

In an article in ~Nauka i Religia~, principal atheist magazine of Moscow, these same authors said that "Wurmbrand's temperament might be envied by the greatest football players. His shouting is savage. This fighter calls for a crusade against Socialism, which he calls an offspring of Satan. He was imprisoned in Romania for distributing religious literature inciting against the government." In this article, two things were remarkable. First, that I was called a "devilish pastor" for my book on Marx, though the authors produced not one single fact to refute the documentation of my thesis. Second, the article congratulated Christian leaders, even anti-Communists, who took a stand against me. They might be adversaries of Communism, but as long as they opposed me, chief enemy of Communism, they were approved by Moscow.

In view of the foregoing, we are not surprised about attacks against us in the West. These attacks have occurred in many countries. For instance, an Italian paper lambasted our Italian director, Dr Laiso, for his anti-Communist speeches over our radio station in Marchirolo, calling them "infamies." It is "infamy" in their view to say that Communists have killed and continue to kill millions of innocents and that they aim at abolishing all religion.

In a book entitled ~Soviet Evangelicals~, a Mr Savatsky attacked us as follows:

> The Wurmbrand mission fits the image of 19th-century mission imperialism. It is anti-Communist. It is as much committed to the overthrow of Communism as to helping believers in Communist societies. In Wurmbrand's world view, a Christian must oppose Communism, which logically means Soviet Christians must be anti-Communist, perhaps also unpatriotic. The Wurmbrand position confirms the charges of Soviet writers that religion is the servant of reactionary capitalism. In Wurmbrand's view, genuine > Christians in the USSR can be only those who are suffering. Those who are not apparently suffering, as the official Baptist leadership, must obviously be tools of the political police. Wurmbrand insists that in a battle situation one can have only friends and enemies and therefore one plays into the enemy's hands if one acknowledges complex nuances, draws attention to gray areas. Wurmbrand's writings are predominant in > the religious bookstores of America and Europe, which means the majority of concerned Christians have formed their image of Christians in the USSR through his influence and distortions.

Then follows the greatest compliment of all: "Through these missions large numbers of Bibles and other Christian literature have become available in the Soviet Union, and the Bible hunger has eased noticeably."

This admission we cherished!

Doubtless you have never heard of Klaus Kempner, but at one time he wore the imposing title of Supreme National Counsellor of the Lutheran Church in West Germany. He circulated behind our back a letter indicating that he had spent three years studying "the problem of Wurmbrand." Now, the devil tries hard to trick me into pride. To be the object of study of a Supreme Counsellor for three years could mean something! This study was so important that the Counsellor forgot to warn his parishioners about the Communist danger and never told them about the martyrs of today. After three years, he found out that I put much sentiment into my messages. The Counsellor considered this a mistake. But should sermons be dry and boring? He accuses me also of being a mystic. This Supreme Lutheran Counsellor does not know that Luther took his teaching from the mystic Tauler.

Another accusation: "Wurmbrand paints only with black and white and knows with absolute surety who are the children of light and the children of darkness." I accept this accusation. The Communist torturers and those who cover up their crimes are darker than the night; those who give their lives for Christ in Communist prisons and those who help them are whiter than snow. So we think.

The Supreme Counsellor did not approve of my followers. He emphasized that they were mostly men of personal piety, without academic degrees. He, the Counsellor, forgot that the apostles were such men. He also said that it was not good to call Wurmbrand a deceiver or a psychopath, since these things have always been said about the prophets, so he called me the creator of a new sect. He went on to say that in my view salvation depends not on faith in Jesus Christ but upon my own message. These accusations were patently ridiculous. The Lutheran Church of West Germany, as well as other churches, should have been helping families of Christian martyrs with a piece of bread and fighting Communism in their own country, instead of trying to feed my pride.

The principal slander against us is that we engage in politics, not religion.

Christians should not get involved in cheap politics, but they should join in the battle to free the whole world from the rule of Satan, because it is commanded by Jesus, though it is unpopular and might lead to loss of life. Jesus praised a good Samaritan who helped a man wounded by robbers. Suppose the Samaritan had come that way half an hour earlier, while the robbers were beating the victim? Would he have said, "I am a pacifist; I don't mix in violent fights; finish beating him up, and then I will pour wine and oil on his wounds"? Or would he have organized a protest march against the beating, announcing to the robbers that the police force had been withdrawn? Or would love have prompted him to fight in defence of the innocent?

We know the answer. Divine love would not have allowed the good Samaritan to stand aside, and the commandment to us is: imitate him. Whoever keeps this commandment will be beloved by Christ. It is the government"s calling to lead the fight on the diplomatic, military, cultural, and economic fields. As a religious organization, we lead only a spiritual fight. This has to be consistent, without the slightest compromise, like our personal fight against sin. We belong to a heroic God.

The best thing is to concur with your slanderer and help him spread his slander. Although not everything he says about you might be true, basically he is right in describing you as a sinner. He helps you by destroying your pride and depriving you of glory which is due only to God. So you will not mind false accusations, let alone true, against you. They will not hurt you a bit if you fulfil the first command of Jesus: "If anyone desires to come after me, let him deny himself" (MTT 16:24).

A Christian can listen quietly to all evil spoken about him. He is not the person attacked. He has abandoned the old personality and has identified with Jesus. I myself have the worst opinion about everything in Wurmbrand that is a remnant of the old, which is not from Jesus.

Begin with Little Things

The thought might occur to you: "The height to which this book calls me is not for me." This then would also be your reply to Jesus' call, "Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect" (MTT 5:48). I have invented nothing. The challenge I gave is from Jesus. But perhaps there is still a misunderstanding.

Let us suppose you have a child in elementary school who is a perfect pupil. His penmanship is beautiful; he writes as he is taught. He gets all A's. He is perfect for his age. Later he can be a perfect teenager, a perfect college student, a perfect son. There are stages in perfection.

Ascent toward heaven's perfection starts with a descent, with a split in a man's consciousness. He realizes that he is constituted of two persons. God calls "Abraham, Abraham" (GEN 22:11), "Samuel, Samuel" (1SM 3:10) with a line between the two names called a disjunctive sign, showing separation. It could be translated "the two persons living in Abraham." You are at the same time what you are and what you must become; you are a fact and an ideal; you are a chaos and an incipient cosmos; you are a compound of vague desires and firm decisions.

The fight begins within yourself to become a harmonious personality, a fulfillment of the ideal. When God says "Moses, Moses," there is no more a disjunctive sign. The two sides serve the Lord. This is the fulfillment of the commandment, "You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart (LUK 10:27).

Nowadays one can be a church-goer all his life and never hear a word about mortification, though the Bible recommends it, just as it teaches that salvation is by faith. "Mortify your members," says the apostle Paul.

Practice humility, which Vincent de Paul calls the most powerful weapon to overcome the devil, because he neither knows how to use it nor does he understand how to defend himself against it.

Deny yourself in little things to learn the great denial: that of the self.

Don't complain about your crosses. By the very fact that we call our sufferings crosses, we acknowledge their holiness. Receive them with great affection.

Give evidence of meekness through your words, gestures, actions.

Give up commanding and start obeying, in all matters except sin.

Be simple like little children, who think, speak and act sincerely.

Don't lose time. Bonaventure said that one loses glory in proportion to the number of good deeds he could have done in that hour.

Use more and more of your time in prayer.

Believing that God is omnipotent, wise and good, have full confidence in him.

Love and love some more. Choose this above every other attitude. God knows how weak we are and appreciates good intentions, which you are too weak to fulfil, as if they were good deeds.

Don't Retire Because of Age

Just as you have to overcome the difficulties of beginning, so you must resist the temptation to finish your work before the last breath.

To abandon the cause at an age when one has accumulated valuable experience is selfish. Getting old does not necessarily mean becoming weak. The Greek dramatist Sophocles wrote Oedipus at the age of ninety. Titian painted at ninety-nine, the Russian painter Repin at eighty-six. Verdi wrote his last opera at the age of eighty. "When Isaac was old, his eyes were dim" (GEN 27:1). "Eli was ninety and eight years old; and his eyes were dim" (1SM 4:15). Moses was 120 and his eyes were not dim. He could lead his people to the very end, and before his death he delivered important speeches that have guided the faithful for thousands of years. It is because Moses was privileged to see God face to face. But we too may have this privilege, which enables us to be useful in his kingdom whatever our age or outward condition.

The blessings we hear in church-"The Lord make his face to shine upon you" and "the Lord lift up his countenance upon you" (NUM 6:25, 26)-would be meaningless if we could not see God's face. In Jesus, God became real and visible. I can evoke his face before my eyes just like the face of anyone else dear to me. Knowing how my wife relates to me, I can be sure of her expression if I wish to "see" her in my mind's eye. So also can I see the face of God in relation to me.

A courier of our mission found an underground church in China whose pastor was 103. He had not retired at seventy, nor at eighty. Why then should he retire at 103? He lived in a hut with no furniture but a straw mattress. He was a successful pastor, with as many disciples as Jesus: twelve were gathered in his home.

A Language Without the Word "To Have"

Luke records that "There was a certain rich man which had ..." (LUK 16:1) and "A certain man had ..." (LUK 15:11).

The Bible is God's revelation. Revelation is a word of Latin origin that has two meanings. It discovers hidden things unknown before, but it also re-veils them, it puts them behind a veil. From the beginning, the words of our Lord were conveyed to us in Greek, a language other than that spoken by Jesus. We have his words in the veil of a translation, which can never convey the full sense of the original, and even the Hebrew of the Old Testament veils the thoughts of God, wrapping them in the poor language of men. The purpose of the Bible is to awaken in us a longing for the blessed state when there was no Creator and no creation, when there was only God and we were all in him; when there was no communication among men in words unfit to express the highest thoughts, and we were one in him; as it will be again at the consummation of the ages.

Jesus spoke Aramaic, a dialect of the Hebrew language. Neither in Aramaic nor in Hebrew does the word "to have" exist. So Jesus never pronounced this word. Jesus never said about anything that he "had" it. Therefore he could retain perfect joy when he was undressed to be scourged, since he had never said about his clothes, "I have them."

He had never said, "I have a body." The body that was tortured was not his. He owned nothing. He had yielded his body to his Father as a living sacrifice before being killed. He never said, "I have a mother." As you cannot be separated from what you don't have, he did not feel death as a separation from her.

He taught his first disciples to think in the same manner. "Neither said any of them that any of the things which he possessed was his own" (ACT 4:32). Everything belongs to God and we are the stewards of his possessions. He is free to take away at any time the material riches, health, a beloved child, a good name, a friend, fame. These things are only entrusted to us. If they are taken away we lose nothing. They are not ours.

This constitutes one of the joys of the Christian life. All Christians are "have-nots" and do not desire to be "haves." Those who have, worry about possible losses. This is not possible for us. Our life is one of full serenity.

In his book ~The Release of the Spirit~, Watchman Nee, who died in a Chinese jail, takes this thought the furthest when he writes, "If we have to remember to pray, this shows that our outer man has not been broken; for if it were, unceasing communion with the Lord would exist."

A Christian does not have a Lord, because this implies one other than he. The Christian is one with the Lord, a part of his mystical body.

Having nothing of our own, but being one with the compassionate Lord, we look with his eyes upon this troubled world.

A Few More Examples

To encourage individuals in their ascent, I will give a few more examples of those who were conquerors.

When the Russian Baptist pastor P. Rumatchik was in jail for the fifth time, he wrote these heartening words from his cell: "With him, my beloved Master, it is good everywhere. With him I have light in the dark dungeon. I had asked him to be where I am needed, not where it is better for the outward man, but where I can bear fruit. This is my calling."

If church leaders speak about our relations with the Communist world, they should also question why we should disarm before those who imprison such saints.

Another Russian Christian prisoner also wrote a moving letter:

> I meditate here on the words of Jesus: "That whosoever believes in him should...have everlasting life" (JHN 3:16). I am among criminals. It is an understatement that men can become like animals. Animals > are without sin. But the men surrounding me in jail reach depths of devilish darkness unreachable for animals. It would be easier to live in a stable than among these criminals. Every word of theirs is filthy, every gesture repugnant. "Their throat is an open sepulchre;...[their] mouth is full of cursing and bitterness" (ROM 3:13, 14). But against this background shines the love of God. Whosoever believes - even such men - can have eternal life. God sent me to prison to bring them this good news.

In Cuba, Armando Valladares was arrested at the age of twenty-three, swiftly tried, and sentenced to thirty years in prison. He served twenty-two years of terrible torture, yet he remained a Christian. Eventually he succeeded in coming to the United States. Here he wrote how betrayed he felt by Western religious leaders who advocate disarmament instead of pleading for the Christians persecuted and tortured by the Communists. He wrote:

> During those years, with the purpose of forcing us to abandon our religious beliefs and to demoralize us, the Cuban Communist indoctrinators repeatedly used the statements of support for Castro's revolution made by some representatives of Western Christian churches. Every time that a pamphlet was published in the United States, every time a clergyman would write an article in support of Fidel Castro's dictatorship, a translation would reach us and that was worse for the Christian political prisoners than the beatings or the hunger. While we waited for the solidarity embrace from our brothers in Christ, incomprehensively to us, those who were embraced were our tormentors.

> To be Christian under those circumstances meant that I could not hate my tormentors; it meant maintaining the belief that suffering was meaningful, because if man gives up his moral and religious values, or if he allows himself to be carried by a desire to hate or revenge his existence loses all meaning. I should add that this experience has not been mine only - I saw dozens of Christians suffering and dying - committed like myself to maintaining their dignity and their richness of spirit beyond misery and pain. Today, I remember with emotion Gerardo Gonzalez, a Protestant preacher, who knew by heart > whole biblical passages and who would copy them by hand to share with his brothers in belief. I cannot forget this man whom all of us called "Brother in Faith." He interposed himself before a burst of machine-gun fire to save other prisoners who were beaten in what is known now as the massacre of Boniato prison. Gerardo repeated before dying the words said by Christ on the cross: "Forgive them, Father, for they know not what they do." And all of us, when the blood had dried, struggled with our consciences to attain something so difficult yet so beautiful: the ability to forgive our enemies.

In La Cabana, called the Widow-maker, Valladares lived with 300 other prisoners in a dark humid dungeon designed to house 30 inmates. They slept in shifts on straw pallets crawling with bedbugs and lice. Flies and mosquitoes buzzed everywhere, attracted by the overflowing toilet buckets. Leeches dropped from walls; cockroaches scurried into the prisoners' rations as they ate. And hordes of rats prowled the prison, unafraid of the weakened, dying men.

Death was everywhere. The infamous ~El Paredon~ - the firing-squad wall - resounded continually. Yet Valladares prayed and wrote daily and shared his spirit of ~esperanza~. And endured.

From a Soviet prison Pastor M. Horev wrote: "I remember when my father was taken to jail. I was six. He let the police officers wait while we all knelt and prayed - the little children, mother, and then father. I remember his words: "Lord, I love my family very much. But I love you more than anything else. Therefore I choose the thorny road. I entrust my family with all its needs to you. I allow you to take responsibility for them. I trust that when my sufferings end I will see them before your throne. Bless our separation."

Horev and thousands like him entrusted their children to the heavenly Father. Where is God? He has made his home with us (JHN 14:23). Our homes are God's address, which means that the children of martyrs have been entrusted to us. Have we provided for these children, or have we neglected even to think about them?

In Sofia, Bulgaria, an imprisoned Christian was put in a cell the size of a man, with nails inside that pressed into his flesh at the slightest movement. When the door was locked, his first words were, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." When the warden asked what this meant, he was told about the gospel. As a result, he opened the door. When the officer came, he found both prisoner and warden kneeling in adoration before God. The warden told him, "I am no longer under your orders. I belong to Christ." He too was put in prison.

Every church service should mention the martyrs and engender among believers respect for those who were willing to sacrifice all for the Christ they adored.

Two Opposite Attitudes

The Communists know this better than we do. At one point the Hungarian government allowed religious instruction in schools, but on one condition: the saints and martyrs of all times were not to be mentioned. They understand all too well what effect their lives would have on students. A church that does not teach the example of saints is purposeless- and surely harmless, as far as the atheists are concerned.

Therefore our mission has done just the opposite. During a session of the Anglican Synod in London, Canon Stephens paid us a great compliment: "Wurmbrand provided the church with a dimension which was necessary... a great, moving sense of the presence of Christ in the modern confessors and martyrs."

"Absence of martyrs and saints in religious teaching" is a commandment of the Communists that is also respected by innumerable Western churches. But our mission has pointed to the example of martyrs in order to open hearts to the communion of angels and Christ. This is the proper teaching.

When Georgi Vins was first sentenced to five years in jail and five years of deportation, he addressed the prosecutor and judges at his trial as follows: "I don't see in you enemies. You are my brothers and sisters in the great human family. After I have left the courthouse, I will pray in my cell to God for you all, that he may reveal to you his divine truth and the marvellous sense of life. It is the Bible which formed me. It is the Bible which has taught me always to tell the truth."

It is significant that Vins understood the importance of learning from martyrs. His book ~The Family Chronicle~, originally smuggled out of Russia, was nothing more than a series of lives of martyrs, beginning with his own parents and relatives. This is how a real Christian leader writes church history.

Read again his words of love toward his persecutors, who destroyed his parents and himself in jails. Look with the same love upon your enemies. Then you will begin to realize that they have guardian angels too, and you will have opened your heart to the unseen world.

Five hundred years ago Savonarola said, "Death is the most solemn moment of our life. Then it is that the evil one makes his last attack on us. It is as though he were always playing chess with man, and awaiting the approach of death to give checkmate. He who wins at that moment wins the battle of life."

We lead you to the bare boards on which a Christian martyr dies and conquers. We urge you to become this kind of follower of Christ.

Devout Souls

In Lebanon, Christians were killed by Palestinians, but God's true children do not lose their lives by bullets. They have lost them already at the moment of their conversion. Life is no more theirs. I share with joy a letter found on the corpse of a Christian student of twenty-two, who was shot while peacefully on his way to Nabha to share Christmas with his family there.

> If my foreboding is fulfilled that I will be killed on this journey, I tell my mother and my family: Don't be sad, don't weep exceedingly. My absence will be short and we will see each other in heaven. There joy reigns. Don't fear. God's mercy will reunite us. I have only one request. Forgive with all your heart those who have killed me. Pray with me that my blood, though it is that of a sinner, might be accepted for the sins of Lebanon, that it might be accepted together with the blood of the victims of all religions... May my death teach men love...Pray and pray and love your enemies. If Abou-Khalil can give some of his planks for a coffin, I will lie very well in it. Please, make no burial meal. May men forgive me. I am dust. I, a sinner, in Jesus Christ, Ghasibe Hayrouz.

As a Jew, I feel proud to have such an Arab as my brother in Christ. When he accepted Jesus, he had lost everything, even the desire to live on earth one more day than God had ordained. He had lost all enmity toward those who might take his life. Forgiving his murderers was as easy for him as breathing.

A former Soviet prisoner remembers:

> There were several nuns in our camp. Christmas day fell on a Sunday. The nuns, taking advantage of this day of rest, scattered all over the camp and began to glorify Christ. One of these carollers came to our barracks and, standing in the doorway, in a voice filled with enthusiasm and emotion, began to sing about the Saviour's birth. Not everyone in the barracks immediately grasped what she was singing, and some in the rear corners even began to crack flat jokes about her. But then someone said "A carol," in a voice full of inspiration. Everyone fell silent. Suddenly the walls seemed to have disappeared; so did the strict-regime Siberian labour camp of the KGB. Each and every one of us, swept up on the wings of overpowering emotion, was carried far, far away from these "oases of death" [as the prisoners called the camps]. Each one lowered his head and remembered his distant childhood: carolling in front of village huts on happy evenings like Christmas, the New Year, Epiphany, or celebrating with joy and gladness within the family. And the voice of the nun, formerly a young peasant girl, overcome with emotion, gained strength and glorified Christ:
>
> Thy Nativity, O Christ our God, > hath shined upon the world > the light of knowledge;
> for thereby, they that worshipped the stars > were taught by a star > to worship and know thee, > the Sun of Righteousness.
> O Lord, glory be to thee.

And then the barracks resounded with the second stanza:

> Today, a Virgin gives birth to him who is transcendent in essence; and the earth offereth a cave to him who is intangible.

Angels with shepherds give glory;
with a star, the Magi do journey;
for our sake a young Child is born, who is the pre-eternal God.

Even some of those near death raised themselves on their plank beds and listened with wonder. The singing gradually died away. The nun sighed with emotion and began to extend Christmas greetings: "I greet all of you, God's martyrs, on this great day of Christ's birth!" Dozens of voices, weighed down with grief and fear, answered with friendly emotion from all the corners of the barracks: "Thank you, friend, and to you a Blessed Christmas, too!" It would seem that this Christmas prayer contained no counter-revolutionary phrases, but the stool pigeons had already reported the incident to the camp authorities. Barely had the nun stepped out of the barracks when the camp guard swooped down, seized her, and led her to the commandant's office. A quarter of an hour later, all the other nuns were rounded up in a convoy and taken to the camp zone where there was an underground isolation cell.

On the way, the nuns fearlessly continued to sing: "Christ is born, glorify him." No force exerted could break the feeling of that joyous religious uplifting shared by those who professed their faith in Christ. Suddenly one of the dying men, gathering up all his remaining strength, in premortal anguish shouted, "Death to the butchers!" It was a cry of a dying man who had been driven to insanity by suffering, who as prisoners say "has come to the doorknob of the morgue." After two days the order of the camp commandant was posted on the bulletin board: "For a display of religious feelings and a demonstration of obscurantism in the prisoner barracks, former nun prisoners (names) are to be moved to the camp isolation cell for a period of three months where they must remain in total isolation from other prisoners; they are deprived of the right to correspond with relatives for a period of one year, and without fail are to be taken out to work. Prisoner (name of dying man) for counter-revolutionary cries in Barracks No. 27, as witnessed by all other occupants, also to be moved to an isolation cell."

Within a few days the poor man was already dead. His thin body was taken to the mass grave and thrown on top of the other corpses which were dumped there earlier, and covered with lime.

I promised to give you the examples of overcomers, masters of life and love, men and women who are more than conquerors. I have provided but a few of these often nameless heroes. Follow their example and you too will become a model person, as God wishes us all to be.

Why the Suffering?

Suffering drives some to despair, to suicide. It torments some souls. Others are grateful for it. I have seen faithful Christian prisoners dancing for joy. They have recognized God as almighty and in patience they show love toward the evil men who torture them. They know this love of God is irresistible. It will conquer.

Even the best of Christians are troubled by the question, "Why does an almighty God send, or at least allow, suffering?" When you are nagged by thoughts like this, say to yourself, "I am still in elementary school. When I graduate from the university of Christian life, I will understand his ways better and doubts will cease."

We do not have the right notion of might, which to us means the power to crush, to subdue, to suppress, to punish. There exists another might: it is the might to love, to be patient and quiet, to suffer innocently, and to be good to the wrongdoer. When we think about energy, we think of it as kinetic, a quality that makes all things move. But there exists the huge reservoir of potential energy, of energy at rest. There exists the power of quietness, of serenity.

A Communist officer told a Christian while beating him, "I am almighty, as you suppose your God to be. I can kill you ."

The Christian answered, "The power is all on my side. I can love you while you torture me to death."

Such is God's almightiness - it is reflected in the deep tranquility of the souls of saints. They do not ask the troublesome question, "Why all the sorrow?" because they learned to love the Cross and to be rejected without comfort. Once you take this attitude, the perplexity ceases. What child is troubled when he receives a much-desired gift?

The peak of holiness is never to ask anything for yourself and never to refuse a cross with which God honours you, and then to accept life meekly as it comes, without questions. We are not ready to understand the answers yet. Some day we will know as also we are known by God (2CO 13:12).

The saint is not a man who has much light from God. He is a nothing, through whom shines God's power to endure, to hope, and to love even the worst of men. Who knows if the murderer of today will not be a future apostle, if today"s loose woman will not be a Magdalene? And cannot God compensate in eternity the wrong suffered here for a little while?

We bless the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost. We say to the Lord, "Blessed is the womb that bore thee" (LUK 11:27) and advance on the path of faith, without tormenting ourselves with many "Whys" about suffering, which we welcome because in them we can glorify Christ joyfully.

How impressive is the prayer of a woman in the camp of Vorkuta in Siberia: "O God, accept all my sufferings, my tiredness, my humiliations, my tears, my nostalgia, my being hungry, my suffering of cold, all the bitterness accumulated in my soul...Dear Lord, have pity also on those who persecute and torture us day and night. Grant them, too, the divine grace of knowing the sweetness and happiness of your love."

Children of Promise

The apostle Paul wrote to the Romans, "They which are the children of the flesh, these are not the children of God: but the children of the promise are counted for the seed. For this is the word of promise, At this time will I come, and Sarah shall have a son" (ROM 9:8, 9).

The Bible divides men into two categories: the children of the flesh, who have been born naturally and live the usual way in the world, and the children of promise, who are born again by a miracle of God and live, on this earth, the holy life expected of citizens in the promised land of heaven.

Isaac is the first man in the Bible called a "child of promise." His life is an example for us. Children of promise have a good conscience, which keeps them from killing someone or even hurting his reputation or well-being.

Don't add to your suffering the futile exercise of trying to find out its cause. When Isaac was still young and could not possibly understand what was happening, his father Abraham bound him and lifted his knife to kill him (Genesis 22). When his life was saved, he did not say a word of reproach to his father, nor did he question him. He could have sued his father for attempted murder and would have won the court case, but he was a child of promise. He continued to love and respect his father until he could understand more fully what had happened.

A servant of his father decided on his behalf who would be his wife. He did not insist upon his right to choose for himself. The servant had chosen Rebekah, and "he loved her" (GEN 24:67). He would have loved any other girl an old servant might have picked for him.

When Isaac dug a well of water, other men contended, "The well is ours." Isaac did not go to court. He left them the well and dug another. When that was taken over by herdsmen too, without a word of quarrel he dug a third, until he had satisfied all his covetous neighbours with wells. In the end he had one for himself. When his son Jacob cheated him, he uttered no word of reproach. "Isaac called Jacob and blessed him" (GEN 28:1).

Accept quietly what an as yet unintelligible God gives you, and do not fear. Do not fear even torture. Christians are under no obligation to be in their bodies while being tortured. Paul wrote about a man caught up to the third heaven, "whether in the body, I cannot tell; or whether out of the body, I cannot tell" (2CO 12:2). If you learn to dwell out of the body, the wrongs in your life are no longer committed by you but by the sin that dwells in you (ROM 7:17). The daily afflictions and even tortures do not make you lose your inner peace.

Indifference or Refusal

Some wonder why the churches haven't cared about the multitude of Christians persecuted in Communist countries. This kind of neglect has a long history.

St Paul wrote, "No church communicated with me as concerning giving and receiving" (PHP 4:15). He had founded many churches himself, but when he, and probably many others, entered prison for the faith, his brethren did not realize that prison means hunger, destitution, anguish of

soul. They did not realize that prisons also have much to give to the churches. For Christian prisoners, the fact that Jesus enters through locked doors bringing peace is not simply an old Easter story. It happens every day in their cells. Their experiences can enrich the followers of Christ. Christians did not sense that the suffering of some is a rich treasure from which all can draw; that hands wearing chains can bless well. So it happened that no church had communicated with Paul when he was a prisoner, concerning giving and receiving, except the Philippians.

There exists an invincible indifference, insensitivity, apathy toward suffering. We sometimes wonder why people do not react when they are told the story of the cross of Christ, why they remain unmoved when they hear about the sufferings of Christians in Communist countries.

There was a multitude on Golgotha who attended the crucifixion of men and who actually heard their cries when nails were hammered into their hands and feet. They must have known that at least One of them was the best of men. Otherwise he would not have prayed for his torturers or cared to bring a robber to God, while passing through unspeakable physical suffering himself. Now this Jesus cried, as in despair, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" And what was the reaction of the multitude? They said to each other, "Let be, let us see..." It did not pass through their minds to alleviate his suffering by at least giving him a little bit of water or a word of compassion. "Let be, let us see whether Elias will come to save him."

Elias is not only the proper name of a prophet of old. It is in Hebrew a short sentence which means, "Jehovah is my God." In this sense everyone can be an Elias. In this sense the Lord said that St John the Baptist was Elias. Each of us must have Jehovah as our God. If the compassionate God Jehovah is master of our life, we will never remain impassive when we see innocent suffering.

Those who are in reality without God have this attitude, "Let be, let us see." Men of this type attended the crucifixion on Golgotha and were not moved by it. They were not moved by the message of the Underground Church. They do not care if the little brethren of Jesus are hungry or in jail. They will answer at the judgment for their indifference and neglect. We pity them.

There exists an even worse category.

"Gadarenes began to pray Jesus to depart out of their coasts" (MRK 5:17). They had good reason to do so. Jesus had chased demons out of a man by ordering them to enter into a herd of swine, which then ran down a slope straight into the sea and drowned. The Gadarenes thus lost their whole property, the bread for themselves and their children. It meant nothing to them that the man had been cured.

How would you react if the entrance of Jesus into your life meant the loss of your house, your car, your bank account, and your job? You might perhaps continue to use holy phrases without meaning them. The Gadarenes uttered a prayer that was at least sincere: "Depart from us, Jesus."

Jesus is used to being driven out. When Holman Hunt painted his renowned picture "The Light of the World," in which the Lord is shown begging entrance, knocking at the door of a house, his feet are turned not toward the door but the roadway. He has more chance to be refused than accepted, because to accept him costs much.

The apostle Paul writes, "For Christ Jesus my Lord, I have suffered the loss of all things and do count them but dung, that I may win Christ" (PHP 3:8). Do we also look upon our nice furniture, a new car, the better job we just got, the money we possess, as upon repulsive dung? When someone encounters dung, he wishes to get away from it - the sooner the better. Is this our attitude toward earthly possessions? Whoever wishes to win Christ must lose his attachment to them.

Friendship with Jesus is costly. Faith alone saves, but saving faith is never alone. It is always accompanied by great sacrifices for Christ's sake.

As we bring sacrifices to him, let us have full understanding for those who do not have the power to offer them, who remain indifferent to our sufferings or even increase them.

Prepare to Enter Through the Veil

There is a special manner of worshipping God: it involves action.

A man dug weeds together with his wife in their garden. Looking up, he saw an angel, who said to him, "It is time to come to your eternal abode."

The man answered, "It would leave so much more work for my wife to do. Please allow me to finish." The angel nodded his assent. In the evening, the man helped his wife wash the dishes. The angel came again, calling him to the eternal abode. But they had had guests and the dishes were many. The man said, "I don't want to leave the whole burden of putting the house in order to my wife. Please let me tarry a little bit longer." Again the angel acquiesced. Later, when the man had gone to bed, he called the angel and said, "Now you can come and take me to the eternal abode."

The angel appeared and answered, "That is where you have been this whole day."

To work for the Kingdom of heaven is heaven. To work for the glory of God is to worship. God calls Christians to be active in his harvest.

"Ye become followers of us and of the Lord" (1TH 1:6). St. Paul considered himself the chief of sinners. He surely did not lie when he referred to himself this way, nor did he display false humility. He must have had serious motives to describe himself like this. Notwithstanding, he was sure that whoever followed him and his co-workers became by this very fact also a follower of Christ. He had this confidence in his calling.

From the Experience of Our Missions

Jesus said, "If thine eye offend thee, pluck it out" (MRK 9:47). The Aramaean language that Jesus spoke was extremely poor. It did not have the words "idea, sentiment, passion, intention, intuition, perspective, manner of looking at things." For all these different notions Jesus had to use the word "eye." He never intended that we should pluck out our physical eye, which never offends. Plucking it out would not be helpful, since blind men commit as many sins as those who see.

But he taught us to pluck out decidedly from our mind a certain manner of looking at reality. We have a lacrimal system given by God, and we are meant to use it rightly. "Weep with those who weep," wrote Paul (ROM 12:15). Jesus wept when he saw his friends Mary and Martha in grief. Don't use your tears so much for your own sorrows! What you think about the events of your life may be wrong.

The tears of two women were floating side by side down the Mississippi River. The first tear said, "I am the tear of a woman who lost her lover." The second tear replied, "And I am the tear of the woman who got him."

Shed tears for the sufferings of others, thus showing them your love and sympathy. It is only with tears in your eyes that you can see reality clearly. Weep with God's weeping about the sins of the world, including your own.

When our political leadership discussed the relative merits of various weapons systems, we advocated the love bomb and the gospel missile. Mao said rightly, "It is not important what weapons the enemy has, but rather what the man who uses the weapons thinks." We felt that the Soviet Union should be "attacked" on a large front with the gospel, with the teaching of love. Every converted Soviet citizen would then be a sympathizer of the West. where Christianity is free, and a foe of the satanic system oppressing him. The church is separate from the state in most countries of the free world. This is an arrangement benefiting the inner life of a nation, but the gospel can be a powerful weapon for winning a large population of an inimical country to our side. Then the terrible option of killer weapons systems will be avoided.

There are always Christians who say, "We should just preach the gospel and not bother about Communism or democracy." They have expressed their disagreement with my anti-Communism. "Christianity can live in every form of society," they claim.

I wonder where they learned their gospel.

Did Livingstone know the gospel? When he went to Africa, there existed a booming slave trade. According to the theology of my critics, he should have allowed the slaves to remain slaves and not have preached to them about Christ. He had read in the Bible about how God freed the Jewish slaves. He could not remain unmoved when he saw the gangs of slaves, bound at the wrist to a long chain, beaten with whips, exactly like prisoners of the Communists in Red China and the Soviet Union as they were being transported.

"These terrible things made Dr Livingstone burn with anger," wrote Maskey Miller in his ~History of South Africa~. Many Christians today have lost the virtue of becoming angry about slavery. Some never get angry except at a Wurmbrand and our missions, which have always fought against Communist slavery. Livingstone never forgot to beg the British people to put down the terrible trade in human flesh and blood. He succeeded. Slavery was abolished in the British empire - only to be reintroduced in our day by Communist African governments.

Today Livingstone's body lies in Westminster Abbey, while those in our churches who claim to honour his memory criticize us for opposing a form of slavery that has engulfed whole nations. The gospel we preach includes the mandate, "Let my people go!"

From our first beginnings twenty-five years ago, we always aimed to create a spirit of concern for the persecuted, to stimulate prayer for them everywhere, and to encourage Christians in many lands to supply Bibles and literature for areas where they were forbidden. Other similar organizations acknowledged their indebtedness to us. As a result, millions have been reached by our work in Communist countries and the free world.

It began with very few who remembered the words of John Chrysostom:

> The power of the righteous consists not in their number but in the grace of the Spirit. There were twelve apostles. How little leaven! All men were unbelievers. How much the dough! But those twelve turned the world upside down. Let only ten change, and soon they will be twenty, the twenty will become 100, the 100 will become 1,000, and the 1,000 a whole town. Just as the lighting of ten candles can give light to a whole house, so it is with spiritual acts. Let only ten change and we can start a fire that will give light to all.

To do this we needed sanctification. We had to strive hard for this. The Greek word for sanctification is ~haghiasmos~, which means to become unearthly (~ha~, not, and ~gheos~, earthly). We were human and had our temptations. We could not fight Communism outwardly without fighting inwardly as well.

Sexual impulses are very strong. They have defeated many Christians, but we fought to subdue them. There have been fallings into sin, but also rising from sin to even greater purity. We had to be honest in money matters and strive to attain the other virtues as well. Yet sanctification comprehends more than this: it means accepting lovingly any cross given by God; it means putting Christ above any earthly attachment, even our own families and our own lives.

We sing easily, "Let goods and kindred go, this mortal life also." We had to do more than sing. We had to let them go. We had great examples before us.

The Russian monk Amphilochia, while in prison, had cold water poured on his naked body in freezing weather. Another, Gregor, had been tortured to death. His fingers had been cut off and his back flayed in the sign of the cross.

Macarius knew something similar might happen to him. He was asked to give statements about other monks, which the Secret Police would then use as evidence to imprison them. Macarius replied, "My beloved, I did not become a monk to serve as a traitor, but to perfect my life through prayer, imitating my predecessors in faith."

The police officer promised that if he complied he would be appointed bishop, a real honour. (In the Soviet Union, the atheist government decided who would lead a church.)

He replied, "Better to be a small daisy." For his steadfastness, Macarius was beaten until blood flowed from his mouth, nose, and ears, yet he remained alive.

Looking at such heroes of faith, we had to sanctify ourselves, bearing with love, joy, and humility the crosses we received. Millions are in danger of not knowing about the great and dreadful day of the Lord. What preparation does one need for this? Just readiness for sacrifice. During the nineteenth century, when the story of West Indian slavery became known to the Moravian church, the news was that it was impossible to reach the slaves because slaveholders would not allow evangelizing. So two missionaries went to the West Indies and worked on the plantations as slaves under the lash. The slaves themselves, touched by their sacrifice, were thus prepared for "that great day."

This is the spirit that animates our mission. We unleashed a storm of prayer for Communist countries. We bombarded them with the gospel. The dissolution of the Soviet Union and the fall of the Berlin Wall represent God"s answer. We give him the glory.

The same fire will burn in you when you fulfil your calling, in whatever work is allotted to you.

Parables of the Three Trees

In underground churches the parable of the three trees is often told. It also comforts prisoners of faith. We think it is useful for children and adults in the West as well.

In a forest, the story goes, three young trees were great friends. They all agreed to pray not to die by decaying in old age, but to be felled so that their wood might be useful to men.

The first tree desired to become a manger in which tired cattle would feed after a long day's work. God rewarded its modesty. It became a very special manger - the one in which was laid the very Son of God. It saw the angels watching over the Child. It heard the blessed virgin's lullabies. Wise men and shepherds bowed before it. What tree had ever had a more beautiful fate?

The second tree, looking at the boats on the lake below, prayed that its wood might be used for making a boat. The prayer was answered, and many travellers embarked and disembarked as they went about their business. On a particular day it had a special passenger: the Son of God. It heard Jesus speak words of love and wisdom never known before. In a fierce storm, it seemed that the boat would perish, but he said, "Peace, be still!" and the tempest stopped immediately. It had been worthwhile to die as a tree to witness such a scene.

The third tree did not know what it wanted to be, so others decided for it. They made out of it a large cross to serve as an instrument of torture. Who was ever sadder than this tree? One day the Son of God was nailed to it. But the cross did not hear groaning and swearing as on other crosses. It heard words of divine forgiveness, words opening the gates of heaven even to a repenting thief, caring words for his mother, and words of confidence to his Father. The wood then understood that its part in the crucifixion of Jesus provided for the salvation of mankind.

We also rejoice about our crosses and tribulations.

Ordinarily, no one seeks pain. Only exceptional souls are called to great renunciation: voluntary poverty, chastity, obedience, even unto death. We others do not rejoice because of tribulations. We could well go on without them, yet we rejoice in them at least if they cannot be avoided.

Tribulations can also be a source of happiness and peace.

The Humble Glorify Christ

Paul was able to write, "Nor of men sought we glory, neither of you, nor yet of others, when we might have been burdensome, as the apostles of Christ" (1TH 2:6).

A Christian is supposed to be humble in his private affairs. When hit on one cheek he turns the other. The canvas never quarrels with the painter. He is free to paint on it what he likes, be it a beggar or a king. The Christian accepts any condition in life as coming from God. If he is successful, he does not boast of it. Can a brush boast that a beautiful picture has been drawn with it? Only the master-painter deserves glory. So is our relationship with Christ. A Christian seeks glory from no one.

Therese of Lisieux gives a little illustration in her autobiography. One day while standing near a sister who was washing the laundry, she was inadvertently splashed in her face with dirty water. If Therese had left suddenly without uttering a word of reproach, the sister might have guessed that she had done something wrong and been sad about it. If she had said, 'Stop it!'" a quarrel might have arisen.

Therese said to herself, "What is wrong with being splashed with dirty water? Jesus, the Son of God, allowed himself to be spat upon." Thinking like this, she began to like the dirt with which she was sprinkled. For you too this is the best response when subjected to humiliations in private life.

Christ was humble, as was St Paul, though their humility had a special feature: it was difficult to make others understand it. Jesus had to say, "I seek not mine own glory" (JHN 8:50), and "I am meek and lowly in heart" (MTT 11:29). Paul also had to assure men that he sought no glory. Normally, a humble man does not go around boasting about his humility. It is only when he makes an impression of great pride, or even arrogance that he has to explain what is in him.

Don't worry if, when you humble yourself, others consider you haughty. A Christian is humble in his own affairs, yet he is very sure that he has a message from God. This he asserts with full authority, ready to contend with anyone, even to the point of being considered burdensome or annoying, or giving the impression of being an "I-know-better" man. "Apostles of Christ might be burdensome" 1TH 2:6). Paul was such when he wrote that he sought no glory from men.

We too are unworthy messengers, but we have a worthy message. We once received a highly interesting letter from an American Christian:

> In my neighbourhood I am considered a poor man, because my income is low, but I am respected. Others have less than I. But I have enough even to give aid to the poor. So I am wealthy. I am also rich with children. I have twelve. When I read R. Wurmbrand's book ~Tortured for Christ~, I decided to do something for the persecuted Christians. So I got more copies and placed them in obvious places where they would be found. I put my name and phone in each book, so that those touched by the message might contact me for common prayer. I thought: Should I pray? If my house caught fire, I would not only pray for the burning to cease or for the fire department to come,

> I would pray and call the firemen too, and I would get out my own fire hose. I decided to prepare a talk on this subject and send it to all churches, asking the pastors to invite me to deliver it. I will take your books about atrocities suffered by Christians in Communist lands to all Christian bookstores and will ask them to display them well. My brethren who live under Communism risk imprisonment and death for delivering a written message. Should I not risk some inconvenience?
> I am a man with only one year of high school and do hard work. I was a drunkard. A brother prayed for me and now I am God's child.

I recommend that you be as enthusiastic and practical as this brother in the service of the Lord, wherever he might call you.

Nowadays, people suffer from neglect, from the fact that no one converses with them. Their loved ones prefer to watch TV. Knock at the doors of friends and neighbours; assure them that you don't wish to disturb their privacy but, on the contrary, wish to help them learn of communion with God by giving them the examples of those who achieved it even under bloody dictatorship. Such a programme is not utopian. We rejoice now that Communism has suffered a huge defeat at our hands.

The Soviets themselves had a foreboding of what was to come. Their publishing house "Politicheskoye Izdatelstvo" issued in 1972 a book called ~Subversion Without Dynamite~, by Belov and Shilkin. It showed pictures of Christian literature smuggled in, of cars with special hiding places, Christian books imported disguised in covers of novels, magazines found under the carpets of trains arriving from the West, balloons flying over their territory and releasing Christian tracts, and so on. The Soviets described as "a bunch of criminals" all missions like ours. They call our books "dynamite." They were right.

The Secret of Success

Old Testament Joseph said, "Behold, there come seven years of great plenty throughout all the land of Egypt" (GEN 41:29). Why this exceptional blessing over Egypt? Why should it have great plenty and be warned of famine in meager years to follow? There are three reasons for this that are also the secrets of a successful mission:

1. ~The Pharaoh of that time was every inch a king.~ He acted as a king not only when awake. His subconscious was also filled with concern for the welfare of his people and so he dreamt about it at night.

Every Christian is a king. Luther said, "A Christian is a perfectly free lord of all, subject to none." But a Christian is a loving king. Therefore, Luther adds, "A Christian is a dutiful servant of all, subject to all." A Christian does not have to strive to be a soul-winner; it is no imposition to him to place the well-being of the church first. His Christian belief has pervaded his subconscious. He simply is a soul-winner, a man who puts God's Kingdom first. When he falls asleep, when the power of will disappears, the extension of God's Kingdom is his dream. My dream, from the first day of my conversion, was to witness for Christ to the Russians. Such dreams are always fulfilled.

2. ~Pharaoh, the dreamer of good, met another dreamer of dreams, Joseph, and united with him.~ When I came to the West after many years of dreaming in Communist prisons about a mission to the Communist world, I met Western pastors and believers who had had the same dream but did not know how to fulfil it. We could unite.

3. ~Pharaoh was completely unprejudiced.~ He was advised to call to his court a foreigner with another colour of skin, a man with what must have seemed to Pharaoh a queer religion, a man who worshipped only one unseen God, a prisoner with a very bad reputation. The charge for which he had been jailed was assault on a woman with intent to rape.

But for this Pharaoh, every man was first of all a man.

Every man could be used for the welfare of the country. Men who had committed very bad deeds yesterday could have become good men this morning. And besides, who knew if the charges against Joseph were true? Slave-holders like Potiphar often jailed their slaves without a fair trial.

We too have also maintained an attitude devoid of prejudice. Is a man a Communist torturer? St Paul was also a torturer of Christians. A torturer can be a future apostle. We know no prejudice against him. We just love him and try to win him for Christ.

Is someone a traitor of the Underground Church, or is there a church leader in the West who compromises with Communism? We realize that the heart of every man is easily deceived. We love him and try to win him for the right attitude.

Communism wanted to dominate the white, black, and yellow peoples of the earth. Death and Communism, one of its harbingers, want men of all races. But so does love, and "Love is strong as death" (SOS 8:6). We can love the political right-winger and left-winger, the fundamentalist or modernist, and all those in between. We can love the Khmer Rouge and the North Koreans, as well as those who oppose them. We do not admit any prejudice in our heart. We are serious when we sing, "Crown Him King of all."

The fulfilling of these conditions gave Egypt great plenty and provision for themselves and their neighbours in the days of famine. The fulfilling of these conditions also made our mission work obtain great victories, which were followed by even greater ones.

I offer you the examples of valiant men and women of our missions, along with heroes of faith in conditions of great suffering. Inspired by them, you too may lead a life of true fulfillment and usefulness for the Kingdom of God. You too may cause him to "rejoice over you with singing" (ZEP 3:17).

The End of "The Overcomers"

The Pastor's Wife

Sabina Wurmbrand
Copyright 1970, 1989
Edited by Charles Foley

The incredible story of Sabina Wurmbrand's imprisonment and survival during her husband's 14 years' persecution in Communist prisons for underground Christian activities.

In 1948, when Soviet propaganda was asserting that free Christian worship was being tolerated behind the Iron Curtain, the Communists arrested Pastor Richard Wurmbrand in Rumania for secret Christian activities.

~The Pastor's Wife~ is Sabina Wurmbrand's true story of her efforts to get her husband released, her subsequent imprisonment and, above all, her unceasing efforts to help build a Christian underground church in the shadow of Communist repression and its dummy churches.

For the truth is that the Communists to this day cannot tolerate genuine Christianity, and are still executing or imprisoning underground Christians. This is the urgent message of ~The Pastor's Wife~.

In order to preserve certain people from identification by the Communist authorities, names of people and places have been deliberately disguised in this narrative. S.W.

PART ONE

I MEET THE SOVIET ARMY

In the summer of 1944, when Hitler's Germany began to collapse, a million Soviet troops entered Rumania. As the first columns approached Bucharest we went to meet them on a No. 7 tram.

It was the last day of August. Cloudless and hot. The guns were silent. Somewhere across the fields, bells were pealing.

My husband Richard, as a wartime pastor, had known many Russians in Rumanian prison camps. They were by nature instinctively religious, he said, and not less so for twenty-five years drilling in atheism.

"We must go out and meet them," said Richard. "To speak to Russians about Christ is heaven on earth."

When we dropped off at the suburban crossroads I saw a group of red flags, carried by local Communists who had come out of hiding to greet the "glorious Red Army." They looked at us in doubt. Most people were keeping out of the way of the liberators for the time being, although a big official reception had been prepared in Bucharest.

Richard was a striking young man. Tall and broad-shouldered, with a confident air that sprung from sureness in his faith. I stood beside him, half his height. Smiling, since the war was over now and we would all be friends again.

In a patch of shade two or three Rumanian officials waited. Nervously they rehearsed some words in Russian. They had come to make the age-old gift to the stranger - a loaf of bread, a handful of salt.

We gazed up the empty road, wondering what to expect. The Russians were our allies now. But also a conquering army with known tastes in rape and robbery.

In the distance appeared a boy on a bicycle, pedalling for dear life.

"They're coming," he shrilled. "The Russians are coming!"

The Communists fell into line. Up went the wilting red flags. The officials, who had been discussing plans for celebrations in the capital, stood like sacrificial victims under the hot sun. Roaring motor-cycles approached. Then the first tanks.

From their turrets sprouted red-starred helmets. The Communists quavered out the "Internationale." The macadamed road shook under the weight of the invaders. Great treads slowed and stopped. The leading tank towered over us. Dusty grey scarred steel. A huge gun-barrel pointing skywards. As the welcoming speech ended, an officer leant over and took the bread and salt which was held up. He stared at the black loaf as if it might explode. And laughed. The young sergeant beside him caught my eye. "Well, sweetheart," he grinned. "And what have you to offer?" Few women were out on the streets that day. I said: "I've brought you the Holy Bible." I handed up a copy. "Bread, salt and Bibles. All we want is a drink!" He guffawed and pushed back his helmet. The fair hair glittered in the sun. "Thanks, anyway!" he said. Metal tracks bit into the road. Engines belched black fumes. The column thundered past. We choked and wiped our eyes. From the tram on the way home we saw Russians looting; wine-casks being rolled out on to the pavement, chickens, hams, sausages vanishing into sacks. Soldiers pointed excitedly into the windows of suburban shops. Bucharest was then a sad shell of its old self but to these giant Russian children it was rich beyond belief. Richard spoke to some of them when we got out, but the only answer was: "Where can we find vodka?" So we returned home to make new plans. From these poor souls God had been stolen in exchange for the promise of an earthly paradise, which can never be fulfilled by human means alone. One thing everyone knew: the Nazi terror was over at last. People hoped that the Russians would calm down and soon go their way in peace. Few guessed that a new and more lasting tyranny had begun. Certainly I did not know that we had just set out on a road that led to prison and would be marked by the graves of friends.

I didn't believe Richard when he warned me, before we married, "You'll have no easy life with me."

In those days we cared little about God. Nor, very much, about other people. We didn't want children. We wanted pleasure.

Then we became Christians. Richard worked for Norwegian and Swedish and British missions. He became a pastor. He played a role in the World Council of Churches. He preached in churches of many denominations, and in bars, brothels and prisons.

p009 The Pastor's Wife

I was thirty-one years old when the Russians came, and by then Richard was a well-known preacher and author.

We suffered both as Jews and as Christians under the Rumanian fascists led by Marshal Antonescu, Hitler's puppet. Richard was arrested three times. We were both among a group of seven Jews court-martialled on charges of holding "illegal religious meetings." A Rumanian woman came to the police station and told the officer: "You have detained my Jewish brethren. It would be a privilege for me to suffer with them."

It was enough. She was arrested and tried with us. God put many such friends on our way. They seemed like angels in the shape of men, working day and night for our good, appearing at every turning in our lives. God has thousands and thousands of such angels and he uses a multitude of them to make us what we are.

One was an influential priest within the Orthodox church, which was favoured by Antonescu. He spoke for us at our trial, saying we were his brothers in Christ. A German Baptist, Pastor Fleischer, and others, gave evidence for us, saying we did great work for Christianity. They risked their lives, and shamed the judges - who knew we were innocent - into acquitting us.

Each time Richard was in trouble there was a powerful trio that interceded for him: Pastor Solheim and his wife, and the Swedish Ambassador, von Reutersw„rd, to whom they introduced us. Without their repeated interventions, Richard would have passed the whole Nazi era in prison. The Ambassador had considerable influence, since Marshal Antonescu used his neutral embassy to keep in contact with Moscow. (Antonescu's ally Hitler, after all, might lose the war.) Once when Richard was seized in a round-up of Jews and put to work with a labour gang, Reutersward's strong protests saved him. He helped us countless times.

Bucharest was lucky. Terrible pogroms occurred in the provinces. In one day at Iasi, 11,000 Jews were slaughtered. Perhaps in Bucharest there were the ten righteous people of whom the Bible speaks as being a reason for saving Sodom and Gomorrah. We heard that seven young girls had survived in Tassy with the Norwegian missionary, Sister Olga, who had brought them to Christ. How could we smuggle them into Bucharest before the next massacre? Jews were not permitted to travel.

A Christian friend in the police had the girls arrested and sent to the capital. We met the train and brought them to our home and safety. Another young man reached the capital from this district with his girl friend and stayed with us. What help and comfort they all were in years to come - especially the young man. He became my successor as pastor when I was arrested.

p010 The Pastor's Wife

Where there's a will there's a way, and we willed this: we could save these girls from the slaughter that threatened. But so many people wished only not to be involved and failed in their Christian duty and allowed thousands who might have been saved to perish. There was no one to rescue the tens of thousands of Jews deported from provincial towns, including my own family who lived near the frontier town of Czernowitz. It was winter. Many captives collapsed in the snow. Others died of starvation. Soldiers massacred the rest. My parents, my brother and three sisters, many friends and relatives never came back. Even today the thought is like a wound; it bleeds whenever it is touched.

Jewish history is full of such traumatic events. Remembrance of them is inscribed deeply in the heart of every Jew. This can carry them beyond self, to weep with the multitudes from other nations who mourn over similar tragedies.

Our only son Mihai was five years old by the time Nazism was overthrown. He"d taken in more than a child would in normal times. Fear and death were everywhere. He missed nothing. Our apartment was a gathering place and every night people came to tell their troubles. He listened and learnt early of cruelty and suffering. Richard taught him, told him stories. Mihai adored his father who, although always busy with his mission, found time every day to speak and play with him. Once he explained how John the Baptist said that a man with two coats should give "to him that hath none." "You've got two suits, Daddy," said Mihai. "So I have," Richard replied. He"d just bought his first new suit in years. "You can give the new one to old, Mr. Ionescu who always wears that smelly jacket." Richard promised he would and Mihai went content to bed. He always took what he was told very seriously and drew his own conclusions. He was very attentive to how his father worked on the hearts of others. Sometimes the conversions produced by Richard's work had side results for Mihai - he became a favourite with the converts, who brought him toys and candy.

During the war we had moved to a smaller apartment. Our neighbours in the new block were violently anti-Jewish. This hatred pervaded Rumania and even Christians, particularly Christian prelates, played a role in inciting it. Few failed to succumb to the phobia.

In our courtyard were pasted big posters of Corneliu Codreanu, the Iron Guard leader - a symbol of everything anti-semitic. And JEW was stamped on our identity cards, as on our hearts. We didn't feel very comfortable. But Richard went from neighbour to neighbour breaking the ice. He had a confidence that souls can be won for Christ, and a trust that was not easily dismayed by worldly cynicism or brutality. He could find the right word about the Saviour for different people or warn about the punishment of God without giving offence. He could charm or cajole, yet be very direct.

His blue eyes could look into your soul.

Richard went to work strategically, first on our new landlord, then one by one on neighbours. He began by trying to make them laugh.

Mr. Parvalescu, on the third floor, exploded: "You Jews have never done a damned thing that's any good!"

Richard, who was standing in their parlour simply replied: That's a fine sewing-machine. What's its make? A Singer! Hold on - wasn't that invented by a Jew? Mr. Parvalescu, if you really think the Jews are so useless, you"d better get rid of it!"

Across the landing from us was waspish, middle-aged Mrs. Georgescu, who raged about "those Jews." But soon she was confiding her woes to Richard. Her husband had left her. Her young son was wild. She feared he would catch venereal disease. Richard promised to speak to him.

"But even if he was to catch something," said Richard, "these things can be cured now. Although the remedy was invented by a Jew."

He broke down their prejudice. Then he told them the Gospel message. Soon they began to change. We met a new politeness; then affection. Posters of Codreanu were replaced by Bible verses. And in that small block, when hell raged outside, we lived as in another world of friendship and peace.

One new friend was a policeman with a motor-cycle. He drank and beat his wife, until Richard spoke to him and Christ gave him a new heart. Then he took Mihai for rides. A motor-cycle was a rarity in those days. Mihai was the happiest of boys.

When air-raids began we couldn't leave the city. Jews were not allowed to travel. But the policeman took Mihai out to stay with friends in the country until the worst was over. If they were challenged, Mihai was to give the fine old Rumanian name of "Jon M. Vlad." He was thrilled by the adventure.

Mihai heard much about cruelty and suffering but in this house he knew also great goodness. He was surrounded only by friends and from their love he learnt many lessons that were of great value to him later.

Anutza, one of my closest friends, called one day for coffee at our flat. Small and fair, pretty and gay, she came from Norway. And she talked like a flowing river.

"Oh these Russians! Have you heard about our new deal with Moscow? They take all our wheat and in return we give the all our oil. Yesterday I saw a Red Army man with three wristwatches on each arm. They take them from people in the streets as if they were collecting bus tickets!"

She laughed, but for the country it was no laughing matter. The Soviet Army looted goods worth thousands of millions of dollars. Then, on orders from the Kremlin, our navy, our merchant fleet, half the rolling stock and every car was carried off to Russia. The shops were empty. Endless queues waited every where. But Stalin said the Red Army would leave when Germany was finally beaten. Perhaps it would all be over soon.

"Oh, let's talk about something nice! Sabina, I heard you speak at the ladies" guild; what a lawyer the world lost in you! It was beautiful, and your husband's sermon was wonderful too. So much history and art and philosophy, and isn't two hours rather long?" We in Norway aren't used to such long ones, although for myself I just wish he"d keep on and on."

Anutza loved to chatter. She'd come to collect another pile of our church magazine, ~The Friend~. The fascists had banned it. Now we were all working to put out issues.

Briefly we enjoyed a spell of religious freedom. The dictator Antonescu had been taken to Moscow, then brought back and shot. Orthodox church prelates who had exercised tyranny over Jews and Protestants had lost their absolute dominion.

At last we had a democratic government. To please the Russians, Communists filled a few posts. Scarcely anyone realized what lay ahead.

"After all," they said, "this is a country of twenty million people. We haven't got enough real Communists to fill a football stadium."

All through the war we had worked to help victims of the Nazis - Jews in concentration camps, children left parentless by the massacres, Rumanian Protestants who were greatly persecuted under Antonescu. We organized the first relief to Hungarian Jews and to another oppressed minority - the gypsies.

But now a new minority had been created. The hunter had become the hunted. German troops left behind in the retreat had to fend for themselves and many died.

We were utterly opposed to the Nazis: they had killed millions; they had devastated whole countries, leaving cities in ruins; our friends and relatives had been thrown into their furnaces. But now they were defeated and offered no danger. Most of the soldiers who remained were like ourselves, simply victims of war. They were starving and terrified. We could not refuse them help.

p013 The Pastor's Wife

People said: "You're taking foolish risks for the sake of murderers."

"God is always on the side of the persecuted," Richard answered. It was not only Martin Bormann and Co. who were being hunted like animals: it was also the silly boys who had paraded in Brown Shirts on Sunday afternoons and become soldiers by order. And not everyone was brave enough to prefer death to taking part in Nazi massacres. Anti-semitism had prevailed among Germans and Rumanians, but there existed also small groups who had risked their lives to help Jews. Why hate a whole people because of a Hitler and his many followers? Why not rather love this people for the sake of its saints and the few who resisted the tyrants.

The Bible tells us what it really means to be a Jew. The Biblical word for Hebrew (~Ivri~) means etymologically to ~stand on the other side~. The first Hebrew was Abraham, and he was one in a real sense of the word, standing on the other side. When all men worshipped idols, Abraham worshipped the living God. When others are bent on revenge, on ways of doing more evil than their neighbour, God gives to some the ability to return good for evil.

Once three German officers hid in a tiny outhouse in our yard. It was a dark little garage, half-buried in snow. We fed them, and emptied their buckets at night. We hated their former atrocities. We ourselves had been the victims. But now we talked to them, trying to make them feel less like caged beasts.

One evening when I called, their captain said: "I must tell you something that's on my mind. You know that it is death to shelter a German soldier. Yet you do it - and you are Jews! I must tell you that when the German army recaptures Bucharest, which it surely will, I'll never do for you what you have done for us."

He looked at me strangely. I thought I should try to explain. Sitting down on an upturned box, I said: "I am your host. My family were killed by the Nazis, but even so, as long as you are under my roof I owe you not only protection, but the respect due to a guest. You will suffer. The Bible says, "Whoso sheds man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed." I will protect you as much as I can from the police, but I cannot protect you from the wrath of God."

"Humbug," he answered.

He patted me on the shoulder. I drew back. His hand had shed innocent blood. He apologized: "I did not mean it badly. I just wondered why a Jewess should risk her life for a German soldier. I do not like Jews. And I do not fear God."

"Let us leave it," I said. We remember a word of God in the Old Testament, 'Give love to strangers, for you, too, have been strangers in the land of Egypt.'"

He seemed puzzled.

"That was thousands of years ago. What is it to you if your forefathers suffered in Egypt?"

I said: "To God a thousand years are as one day. Wise men tell us we store the experience of past generations like memorybooks. In our unconscious are written the events of the past. We don't know them, but they are determining our feelings and our judgements.

"And secondly, God says with good reason, love strangers; for in the last resort we are all strangers to each other ... even to ourselves."

"Wait a minute!" said the officer. "Jews have committed crimes against the German people and mankind. Honesty makes me tell you this to your face. But you must look on us as men who have committed crimes against the Jews. And you forgive them all?"

I answered very earnestly, "Even the worst crimes are forgiven by faith in Jesus Christ. I have no authority to forgive. Jesus can do so, if you repent."

The soft crunch of footsteps on loose snow came from the yard outside. I peered out through a crack. But it was only the deaf old janitor from next door. The captain lit one of the cigarettes Richard had found for them (although he himself hated smoking). He inhaled and passed the butt to his friend. He said:

"~Gn„dige Frau~, I won't say I understand you. But perhaps if no one had this gift of returning good for evil you talk about, then there would never be an end to killing."

When I stood up to leave, they rose and gave little formal bows. I put their laundry in my shopping bag and went out.

These men eventually crossed the frontier safely into Germany. But many thousands like them were rounded up and died after spending years in Soviet labour camps, together with Russian Christians who might have taught them further.

Every German at that time wanted to get rid of his Wehrmacht uniform. How proudly they had once worn those well-cut tunics, the badges and the medals. How hard it was now to accept in exchange the poor civilian clothes we offered.

It was at this time that Richard began to bring home Russian soldiers. He was determined to tell them about Christ. Others rightly believed the country should be rid of them.

"Do be careful, Sabina!" said Anutza. "What will you do if the two armies meet in your home?"

We took care not to let that happen.

Richard began by entering Red Army barracks posing as a black-market dealer in cheap watches. A group would gather round. After a time, he would lead the talk away from bargaining to the Bible.

"You haven't come for a watch," an older man would say, "you want to tell us about the saints."

As Richard spoke, one would put a warning hand on his knee.

"Talk watches. The company informer's coming."

The Red army was full of them. They spied on comrades and reported all they said. The young soldiers knew nothing about God. They had never seen a Bible, or been inside a church. Now I learnt why Richard said it was "heaven on earth" to bring the Gospel to Russians.

I found some educated men who knew German or French. I told them the Creed.

"It begins with the words ~I believe~. It isn't like a Party order that tells you what to think. It says that you must become an "I," a personality in your own right. You must think for yourselves.

"An army moves at the speed of the slowest truck. And if men advance in the mass, it will be at the rate of the slowest man. Christ calls you out of the mass. Man's greatest privilege is the right to say Yes or No, even to God."

It was beautiful to see men awakening to Truth.

The work involved a great part of our church. Using dodges to mislead the censor, we printed thousands of Gospels in Russian. Red soldiers went about in groups. They were hard to approach. We invented manoeuvres. Troops moved in goods boarded trains alongside them. When one train began to move wagons which sat for hours in sidings, waiting to move, we hastily handed out Gospels.

Red soldiers often slept in our spare room. Once six stayed, on the same evening, all boots and rifles. I had great trouble keeping the house free from lice. But it was the soldiers, rather than us, who were nervous. It was a long time since they"d lived in a house. How happy they were to be away from their noisy barracks for an hour. But that didn't stop their stealing. Two boys in uniform with country faces came to the door.

"D'you want to buy an umbrella?" they asked, offering three stolen samples.

"Ah, but we are Christians," Richard replied. We don't buy, we have something to sell." He invited them in. I brought them some milk to drink. Then the elder of them, who was fair-haired and hardly more than twenty, stared at me.

"Why, it was you who gave me the Bible!" he exclaimed. In the same moment I recognized him.

"You're the sergeant from the first tank into Bucharest!" I said.

He had the Bible still, in his locker. He had read in it, and settled a question that puzzled him.

Ivan told us over a meal how he had fought his way across Eastern Europe. In his Company was a Jew who, like the rest of them, had been brought up without religion.

"An older man in our unit used to rant at this Jew, 'You killed Christ.' The Jew thought he was crazy. He'd been killing people all the way from Stalingrad to Bucharest. How did he know who he had killed?"

The name of Christ was totally unknown to him.

Ivan brought the Jew to our home. Richard told them everything - from Adam to the Revelation. Stalin ceased to be their God.

They came often to see us. When his regiment moved out, Ivan left a farewell gift - a shining new electric stove.

I looked at Richard. We knew it had not been paid for.

"It's beautiful!" cried Anutza. "Just what the Liebmanns need!" This family had returned from Auschwitz, destitute. We sent them the stove. It had been stolen out of gratitude for being shown the way of Christ. A simple soul's love may show itself in strange ways. If God were really to judge man for all his deeds scarcely anyone would be saved. How good it was that the blood of Jesus Christ covered even such sins.

Richard and his colleague at the Lutheran Church, Pastor Magne Solheim, started a canteen to feed war victims. Our flat, which was rather a guest-house, was always overflowing with friends and strangers. Many were ex-convicts won for Christ by the zealous work in prison of another friend, Milly. We never sat down to luncheon on Sunday with less than a dozen people around the table.

Young girls worked with us. They asked advice sometimes about moral questions. One in particular I didn't know how to answer correctly, because it had been my problem too.

At the age of seventeen I lived in Paris. For the first time, I was free of parental control. I'd been brought up in a strictly Orthodox Jewish family in a small town, hedged about with prohibitions, inhibitions, rules. And now I was up at university, and the first boy in my life took me out. He wanted to kiss me, and I repelled him. I told him a little about how I'd been brought up.

The boy asked simply: "If you believe in God, wouldn't you say that the same God made the hands and the lips? And if I can touch your hand to mine, why is it wrong to touch your lips or to embrace you?"

Teachers, parents, no one had warned me of this question. I had no answer to it. And the boy was very appealing. So I altered my convictions to suit the gay life of Paris. An atheist is free to kiss and to behave as she likes.

His eyes and his hands were the brokers of sin. And as for my eyes and my heart, they were his handmaiden.

But conscience won't be stifled for ever. The problem nagged. Why should a girl keep herself pure? It is at the heart of many moral codes. But what purpose does it serve?

I did not know. Only many years later I learnt the answer.

A pastor's wife doesn't usually discuss sexual questions. Still less is she expected to experience such temptations herself. But both pastors and their wives are human. And in the past Richard and I had led such thoughtless, self-indulgent lives. We were converts, insecure about some things which lifelong Christians took for granted. Sexuality is vital to human nature, and in our marriage the stresses it caused were sometimes great. Richard was so good, so handsome and so brilliant that I feared all the adulation he was given might turn his head. Many girls fell in love with him, and to one he was much attracted. I must say she was lovely: it was a joy to look at her. I saw that Richard was being torn in two. Quietly, I tried to help him. Sin is often the result of occasion. It is a wife's duty to stay close to her husband in crises like these.

He said nothing, but one day, as he played a Christian hymn on the piano, he came to the words, "I need you every hour"; and all the strings of the piano seemed to sing together, and he wept. I put my arms around him and said, "Richard, you're not an angel, don't take it so hard. You are only a man. These things will pass." They did pass. But when I was left alone for fourteen years after Richard's arrest, temptations came to me also. And to some I nearly yielded in my loneliness. Then I understood him better.

THE TERROR

My family grew overnight from one son to four - and three daughters. Thousands of orphaned Jewish children were returning from the concentration camps, often wrapped in paper for warmth, with only rags to wear. I love children. So we were happy to take in six. It was a joy to have them about the house.

Mihai was delighted. He said, "But Mummy, you said I wouldn't be having any more brothers and sisters and look what I have now!"

They were lovely children, but so thin. And with such haunted eyes. What had they seen? All their relatives and friends ha been killed.

Soon their hollow cheeks filled out. They began to laugh and play. The Russian soldiers loved them. They had families of their own, unseen for years. Often Russians talked to Mihai and the children in the street.

"Have a sweet," they offered. And placed a hand on a small head. The children smiled and thanked them. And in turn they gave the soldiers Gospels.

It was dangerous for adults, but children were safe. Russians adore children, and many soldiers who would not otherwise have done so became aware of God. So Mihai began work as a missionary at the age of five.

Our church members went out almost nightly with posters to stick on walls, doors, sides of buses, in railway waiting rooms. Each carried Bible verses or a Christian message. Although friends were arrested for work among the Russians, none betrayed us. As fast as the Communists tore down the posters, we put them back. One of our workers Gabriella, was beautiful. She had no difficulties approaching Russian soldiers, and she gave Bibles to several high-ranking officers. But one day she was arrested and handed by the Soviets to the Rumanian militia. While she sat in prison awaiting trial a man came to her cell. He asked why she was there. As she explained a smile crossed his face. "I'll try to help you," he said. Soon a second stranger appeared and unlocked her cell. He led her out into the street by a side door.

"Now disappear-quickly!" She walked away, free, thanking God. The man was the recently-converted head of police.

We saw many miracles. A friend, Mrs. Georgescu, was ill, but wouldn't see a doctor. She belonged to a strict sect which disapproved of human medicine; it was for God to cure the sickness, they said. All her free time was spent in missionary work to the Russians. She was caught and taken before the Commandant, a petulant red-faced man.

Suddenly, as he shouted at her, she had a violent haemorrhage. The officer saw the blood and paled. "Throw her out!" he cried. Mrs. Georgescu was hustled out into the street. By God's will, she had escaped.

"My poor feet! I queued five hours in Victoria Street this morning and this is all I got." Anutza had a little coffee and some greyish sausage in her bag, the first we had seen in weeks.

It was the anniversary of the Russian "liberation." For two days there was food in the shops. Then shelves were bare again, and windows displayed dusty cardboard meat, empty wine bottles. Rumania was faced by famine.

On top of Soviet looting and extortions ("war damage" claims had come drought, shrivelling crops, leaving millions to exist on starvation level. People made soup from leaves and the roots of trees.

A section of the World Council of Churches sent food, clothes and money and we organized relief for the hungry. A canteen run by Pastor Solheim and Richard fed 200 each day in the church hall. Administrative work was heavy and the Communist government tried to sabotage the effort but we had many voluntary workers.

It was arranged that children in areas worst hit by famine should be brought to Bucharest to live in the houses of brethren. We took a small girl of six. She was thin as a lathe and came to us with only the clothes she wore. I gave her good food - to start with, cereal with sugar and milk. She wouldn't eat. She was a peasant girl and she wanted her own food: ~mamaliga~, a sort of maize cake that was about all she knew. We had to speak very severely to make her taste our food. Slowly she began to put on weight.

We grew very fond of her. Once she said, "You I will love until the autumn." Then the new crop would come and she would return to her parents.

When the Russians occupied Budapest we needed someone to take money for relief work to the mission there. Richard could not leave Bucharest and no one else could take the responsibility. I had to go.

p020 The Pastor's Wife

"You mustn't!" exclaimed Anutza. "These Russian soldiers are hungry for women. You walk in the streets and you find girls with their throats cut and no one does a thing!"

In normal times it wasn't a long journey. But the Red Army was seizing every train and car for their own use. At the stations there was unimaginable confusion and panic as swarms of hungry and displaced people tried to crowd into the few wagons available. After a long search I found a corner. For days we rumbled across the country to Budapest. I was the one woman in a train full of Russian soldiers.

When I arrived German troops were still engaged in house to house fighting. All was in ruins. There was no bus, no taxi, no transport of any kind. I walked everywhere past smoking ruins, unable to find any of the people I sought. The Germans had deported many who never returned. Others had been killed in the last days of street fighting. At last I found Pastor Johnson, leader of the Norwegian mission and Pastor Ungar, a Hebrew Christian who led the free church where Jews and other nationalities worshipped. They couldn't believe their eyes. I seemed like an angel sent by God, they said, coming from nowhere with help just as the famine was at its worst. As people emerged from the cellars food grew scarcer. There was nothing. A horse, killed in the fighting, was cut up for meat and eaten.

Many church buildings had been razed to the ground and hundreds of brethren were homeless. The help I brought was very welcome.

I met Prof. Langley, the Red Cross representative in Budapest, who never tired in his relief work. We ate a meal together before I departed. I said, "May Christ reward you for what you have done."

Langley replied: "When I boarded a tram once and found I had no money for the fare, someone paid for me. And when I tried to thank him, he said, "Don't thank me, I"m repaying what somebody did for me yesterday when I was in the same situation." So it isn't Christ who has to reward me - but I who pay a debt towards him."

From Budapest I went to Vienna. Normally, it's a four-hour journey. Now it took six days!

I found a train about to leave early one morning. People were clinging to the doors and sitting on the roof. It seemed impossible that anyone else could get aboard.

Then I heard my name called. Perched on top of a goods wagon were a group of girls, all Auschwitz refugees, who'd stayed with us in Bucharest. "There's no room, but well make room!" they laughed. So from Tuesday until Sunday we sat on that roof and reached Vienna. This city too, was starving and badly damaged. I contacted friends and Christian leaders there after many adventures and returned only when the work was completed.

For weeks I was completely out of touch with home. Richard told me: "We feared terribly for you. I saw you in visions, in daydreams." When he opened a book, he saw before it my face. When a branch tapped the pane he awoke thinking I was back. "I walked in the mountains," he said, "and called your name aloud. It seemed to me that I heard you answer."

And I had heard, I had answered. I'd found myself searching those littered streets and calling, "Richard! Richard!" We were so close.

The country was now run from Moscow. But the local Communists still played at democracy. "We want friendship with everybody!" they said. "Freedom of worship? Certainly. An all-party Cabinet with King Michael as constitutional monarch? Why not?" It was done simply to dupe the Western powers.

The mask was dropped when the Soviet Minister Vishinsky marched into the palace one morning and gave orders. The army and police must be disbanded. The King must appoint trusted Communists to key posts, or else ... We knew how in Russia the Church had been made a tool of the state. How long would it be before they got to work in Rumania?

I was arranging the church for Sunday service when Solheim came in, looking disturbed.

He said, "Strange news. The Government is summoning what it calls a Congress of Cults. Every confession, ever religion in fact, is asked to send a big delegation. And the conference is to be held in the Parliament building! Who ever heard such a thing? What can they be planning now?"

Everyone had a guess or a rumour to tell. Many churchmen believed what the Government had said about "full religious freedom."

But Richard wondered, "Is it not happening here as it happened in Russia? Lenin strongly defended the persecuted sects, until he came to power. Then tens of thousands of them died in concentration camps. First the church is lulled into acceptance. Then the blow falls."

We conferred with Solheim. He was head of the Mission and he must decide.

"We'll go, and we'll speak out," he said.

On the chosen morning we climbed Parliament Hill. There they all sat, crowded into the galleries and on the floor of the great hall, Moslem and Jew, Protestant and Orthodox, some 4,000 bishops, pastors and priests, rabbis and mullahs.

Red flags hung everywhere. Stalin was formally chosen as honorary president of the Congress. Up on the dais were all the top Communists: the puppet Premier, Petru Groza, the powerful Minister of the Interior, Theoharo Georgescu.

There was even a service in the Patriarchy beforehand. The Communist leaders crossed themselves. They kissed the ikons. They kissed the Patriarch's hand.

The speeches began. Groza, who was simply a quisling of Moscow, explained that the new Rumanian Government was in favour of Faith, any faith, and they would continue to pay the clergy. In fact, they planned to raise stipends. Warm applause greeted this news.

Priests and pastors replied. One after another, they said how happy they were about this appreciation of religion. The State could count on the Church if the Church could count on the State. A bishop remarked that streams of all political colours had joined the church in its history. Now Red would enter, and he was glad. Everyone was glad. All their gladness was broadcast to the world over the radio, direct from the hall.

It was absurd and horrible. Communism was dedicated to the destruction of religion. It had shown its true face in Russia. They spoke out of fear for their families, for their jobs, for their salaries. They could at least have kept silent, instead of filling the air with flattery and lies.

It was as if they spat in Christ's face. I could feel that Richard was boiling. So I told him what was already in his heart and said: "Will you not wash this shame from the face of Christ?"

Richard knew what would happen: "If I speak, you will lose a husband."

At once I replied – it was not my courage, but given to me for the moment: "I don't need a coward for a husband."

He sent up his card. The Communists were delighted. A representative of the World Council of Churches and of foreign missions was going to make propaganda for them. Richard went up to speak and at once a great silence fell on the hall. It was as if the Spirit of the Lord was drawing near.

Richard said that when the children of God meet, the angels also gather there to hear about the wisdom of God. So it was the duty of all present not to praise earthly powers that come and go, but to glorify God the Creator and Christ the Saviour, who died for us on the Cross.

As he spoke the whole atmosphere in the hall began to change.

p023 The Pastor's Wife

My heart filled with joy to think that this message was going out to the entire country.

Suddenly the Minister of Cults, Burducea, jumped to his feet.

"Your right to speak is withdrawn!" he shouted. He bawled orders from the dais to minions.

Richard ignored him and went on. The audience began to applaud. He was saying what they had all wanted to say.

Burducea bellowed, "Cut that microphone!"

The congress shouted him down.

"Pastorul! Pastorul!" they chanted rythmically. "The Pastor! The Pastor!" From 'a pastor," Richard had become 'The Pastor.'

The uproar lasted minutes. The shouting and clapping went on long after the microphone wires were severed and Richard had stepped down. That ended the Congress for the day. We made our way out through noise and confusion.

At home, Richard's mother had heard everything on the radio. When the broadcast was interrupted she imagined she would never see him again.

"I thought they'd arrested you both. What will happen now?" she asked, white-faced.

"Mother," he replied, "I have a powerful Saviour. He'll do what is best for me."

No official move was made. But soon Communist hecklers were sent to break up our meetings. Recently we had opened a new and bigger church hall. Week after week rough-looking youths pushed their way in at the back to whistle, jeer and interrupt.

"We ought to be glad," said Solheim. "Better a rowdy audience that cares than a silent one that only pretends to listen!"

We worked out street-preaching tactics. Many souls were too shy to join us in church. This way we could reach them. We would meet in a group on a street corner to sing hymns. This was totally unknown in Rumania and a crowd always gathered. Then I'd deliver my message, which had to be short and sharp.

Outside the great Malaxa factory one afternoon there was a protest meeting against the Communist take-over. I spoke to workers gathered there about salvation. For some it was the last warning. Next day police opened fire on a crowd at the factory. Many workers were shot.

And once I spoke from the steps of the University. The crowd grew until it filled the square. I'd never had such an audience. People came running from side-streets. Traffic was jammed along one of Bucharest's biggest boulevards. There was no heckling. Just prolonged applause.

While I was telling Richard about my success, Anutza burst in.

p024 The Pastor's Wife

"It's all over town that Ana Pauker made a speech outside the University. They say she's been sent back from Moscow to run Rumania for Stalin!"

Mrs. Pauker was a Communist schoolteacher who had gone to Russia. She became an officer in the Red Army. She was dark and Jewish, and when I began to speak in such a public place, the rumour spread that the notorious Ana Pauker - who had shot her husband Marcel with her own hand for 'deviation' was back.

But no one could understand why Comrade Pauker was telling them to repent of their sins. We roared with laughter.

In 1947 the arrests began. Rigged elections, in which every fraudulent and violent device was used, put the Communists in full control. Leaders of the opposition, honest and dishonest police chiefs, and civil servants were liquidated in a wave of terror. Then came the turn of all the Catholic bishops and innumerable clergy, monks and nuns. On the night they were arrested religious broadcasts were made as usual to the West. Tens of thousands of ordinary people disappeared into jails and labour camps. Others joined freedom fighters in the mountains.

The Jews, who had been able to leave Rumania in the early confusion under the Russians, were now trapped. The borders were closed. By then thousands had fled, leaving all they possessed, preferring life as destitute refugees to 'freedom' under the Soviets. Anutza had reason to believe she was on the list of Jews to be arrested - suspected of heaven knows what "crime against the state." Anyone who had had to do with foreigners was suspect - even the barbers who shaved them.

It was a sad farewell. We had become so close.

"Like David and Jonathan," cried Anutza. "Only I am Jonathan. Jonathan loved most!"

We embraced in tears. Anutza said, "I'll work to get you both out of the country. We'll meet again in freedom."

Richard was sick in bed that day. She knew that he was in great danger of arrest. She leant over the bed and kissed him, making some promise.

And she did work, we did meet. Only it took twenty years.

The terror spread. Secret police burst into homes and made long searches. Then you were taken off to "make a statement."

They said, "Bring nothing, it'll be only for a few hours."

Foreign newspapermen saw vans going through the streets labelled "Meat "Fish," "Bread," and so could report that the population was being provided for; they did not know the vans carried not food but prisoners.

Then we had our first warning. Richard was working in the mission when a plain-clothes man walked in.

"Inspector Riosanu," he introduced himself. "You're Wurmbrand? Then you're the man I hate most in life."

Richard stared at him.

"We've never met before. What do you mean?"

"You remember about ten years ago you used to go out with a girl named Betty? A frizzy blonde who talked a lot?"

"Well, what about it?"

"Tell me why you didn't marry her?"

"I never thought of it."

"No, but I did! Wurmbrand, if you'd on]y married her. You'd have made me a happy man." And he meant it.

"But just to show there's no hard feelings," said the magnanimous Inspector, "I've come to give you a tip. There's a big fat file on you at secret police HQ. I've seen it. Someone's informed against you lately. Been talking to a lot of Russian friends, haven't you?"

Riosanu rasped his sandpapery hands together.

"But I thought we might come to an agreement."

For a bribe, he would destroy the report.

I joined the discussion, and we agreed on a sum. Stuffing the money into his pocket, Riosanu said, "You've got a bargain. The informer's name is ..."

"No!" I broke in, quickly. "We don't want to know."

I wished to feel no resentment against the man. Silly, perhaps. But in those days we couldn't know how many lives informers would destroy.

Riosanu shrugged. "As you please," he said. And he was gone.

Shortly after this, Richard was taken in for questioning. Nothing was said about 'subverting' the Red Army. We still had some influential friends, and through them we obtained Richard's release after three weeks. But we knew it was no more than a respite.

More and more of our friends and helpers were arrested.

I remember the day I first saw a man who'd been tortured by the Secret Police. He could hardly speak through purple and swollen lips. He'd been a kind, friendly man, with a word for everyone. Now in his eyes you saw only hatred and despair.

With bribes and threats, the Communists put certain church leaders to work for them. They threw suspicion of treachery on those who refused to become traitors. The most obstinate went earliest to prison.

p026 The Pastor's Wife

One political obstacle remained. Our beloved young King Michael would not give in without a fight. Only in December 1947, after the United States and Britain recognized the Kremlin's puppet, Groza, was he forced to leave. Groza and Gheorghiu-Dej, a fraudulent lawyer and an ex-railwayman, were the rulers of the country. They ordered the king to abdicate. The palace was surrounded by troops. He had no choice. On that day, the "Rumanian Popular Republic" was born.

I remembered a proverb: ~The earth trembles when a servant becomes a king.~

It seemed a very small cough, and so much was waiting to be done. But in a week I was in bed with bronchitis. Hunger, shortages and the Budapest adventure brought me down with a thump. So I was on my back, feeling exhausted and ethereal, when an uninvited visitor called. A Russian woman doctor. Her face was a mask of tragedy.

Mrs. Vera Yakovlena knew us only slightly. She'd come from a town in the Ukraine where countless priests and churchpeople, including herself, had been deported to Siberian labor camps. From which few returned.

She wasn't interested in my illness. She had a message to impart.

"We worked to clear the woods, men and women together. We had equal rights: we could die of starvation or freeze to death."

Mrs. Yakovlena touched my arm with a hand that bore thick white scars. And trembled with memory. "Every day people died, collapsing from overwork in the snow."

Her punishment when she was found witnessing for Christ was to stand for hours barefoot on ice. When she failed to fulfill her work quota, the guards struck her with their fists. She fell in the snow. And went without the watery broth which was allowed them when they returned to camp.

Weeping, she wandered out into the yard to be alone. And in her misery crossed into the forbidden area near the wire, where prisoners were shot at sight.

A harsh voice yelled, "Hey! is your mother a believer?"

Frightened, Mrs. Yakovlena gasped, "Why do you ask?" For in that moment she had been thinking of her mother.

The guard said, "Because I've been watching you for ten minutes, but I haven't been able to shoot you. I can't move my arm. It's a healthy arm. I've moved it all day. So your mother must be praying for you." His voice warmed. "Run back. I'll look the other way."

p027 The Pastor's Wife

Mrs. Yakovlena saw the soldier later that day. He laughed and raised his arm. "Now I can move it again."

She survived ten years in this camp. Most of the others died. But she came back to tell how, in sorrow and need, God had shown his might. Now she was a doctor in the Soviet Army.

My head ached. Instead of pondering on the miracle, I could think of nothing but her sufferings. What did it mean? Why had she come to tell me such things?

As she stood up to leave, I struggled dimly with my weakness and asked her to stay the night. To wait at least until Richard returned. But already she was at the door. Briefly she paused to say: "My husband was also taken by the GPH. He's been in prison twelve years now. I wonder if we'll ever meet again on this earth." Then she was gone.

Twelve years? I couldn't understand. Much later I learned that this messenger from God meant to tell about the sufferings which I and my husband could expect. Ananias, the head of the Christian Church in Damascus, was also told two thousand years ago, "Show to the new convert, Paul, the future Apostle, all the things which he will have to suffer for my sake."

It wasn't too late to leave the country. Although it grew more difficult every day, thousands were still buying their way out. I knew that Richard didn't really want to go. But he said:

"Under Antonescu's rule we were never imprisoned or more than two or three weeks at a time. With the Communists, it can last for years. And they may take you, too. And Mihai who will look after him, and the other children?"

Then another odd thing happened. A pastor we hadn't seen for a year came to the house. God had used Richard to convert him. He'd been an alcoholic, going from bar to bar, and Richard, meeting him one night, had gone with him, talking, arguing, persuading. When he awoke the next day from his drunkenness, he was a changed man.

Now he reminded us of this. And several times as we talked, he repeated: "What struck me most in what you said then was a verse: "Escape for thy life; look not behind thee." The angel's words to Lot."

When he left, Richard asked me: "Don't you think that may have been a message from God? Why should he come to see us after so long, and repeat over and over, "Escape for thy life"? Wasn't it a warning that I must save my life by fleeing?"

I said, "Escape for what life?" Then I went into the bedroom and opened the scripture where Jesus says: "Whosoever will save his life shall lose it and whosoever will lose his life for my sake shall find it." (MTT 16:25)

I asked Richard, "If you leave now, will you ever be able again to preach about this text?"

We didn't speak again that night about leaving.

But a few days later, Richard said, "If we go to the West, won't we be able to do more for the church in Rumania? If we stay I'll follow the others into prison. It'll be the end of our life together. I'll be tortured, perhaps killed. And if you're imprisoned too, it's the end of the mission. The Solheims are foreigners. They won't be allowed to stay. Mihai will be brought up on the streets - a Communist. What good will it do to anyone?"

I said, "I think we'll have to stay."

Then came a last sign. We'd begun to hold meetings in private houses around Bucharest. They were safer than churches. And never had we had such blessed services, so many conversions. As if God, knowing what lay before us, gave greatest comfort before gravest trouble.

One night we met at the home of a rich man who had lost everything except his great house - soon that would go, too. We took it in turn to keep guard. A secret prayer meeting like this could have landed us all in jail.

Some fifty of us were gathered for an all-night vigil. Towards midnight, a woman kneeling with the rest cried aloud, "And you, the one who thinks of leaving! Remember that the good shepherd did not desert his flock. He stayed to the last."

She had no knowledge of Richard's problem. We all looked at her, puzzled, but she didn't speak again.

When dawn came we walked home through cold streets. It was January and fine grains of snow were falling. I said: "We can't leave now."

Richard agreed. We told everyone, "We're here to stay." They were very happy.

The woman who had this warning presage about Richard was at the station when he came back fourteen years later. She came to meet him with flowers. He remembered her, and said:

"I don't regret taking your advice. I'm thankful for it."

p029 The Pastor's Wife

RICHARD VANISHES

"Richard, what do you think hell is?"

We had spent an evening with friends, and inevitably talk had turned to the Communists. A politician we all knew, a good, upright man, had been arrested, and after a few weeks had hanged himself in his cell. What had he suffered to drive him to suicide? Someone had said: "He must have gone through hell."

"Hell is to sit alone in darkness remembering evil you have done," Richard replied.

Within a few days he was in that hell himself.

On Sunday morning – February 29th, 1948 – Richard walked alone to church. I followed and found Pastor Solheim in the small office, looking upset.

"Richard hasn't turned up," he said. "But he has so much on his mind. He must have remembered some urgent appointment and forgotten he has to come here."

"But he promised he'd see me here in half an hour."

"Perhaps he met a friend who wanted help," said Solheim. "He'll come."

Pastor Solheim took the service. I telephoned friends, but he wasn't with any of them. Fear grew in my heart.

In the afternoon Richard was due to marry a young couple we knew.

"Now don't worry," said Solheim. "You never know with Richard. Remember the time we had that summer camp, and he went off to buy a newspaper in the morning and then telephoned at lunch-time to say he wouldn't be back for breakfast?"

I smiled at the thought. Richard had remembered some urgent business and got a lift into Bucharest. He must have done something like that again. Sunday lunch at our flat was usually a happy crowded occasion. It was not much of a meal. But we talked and sang, and for many who came it was the great event of the week.

Now we sat silently, waiting for Richard. But he didn't come. The night before we'd also had many guests. Richard was talking away happily. Suddenly he stopped. Someone said, "Richard, you look sad – why?" He answered strangely, with a quotation from Ecclesiastes: "I said of laughter, it is mad." (ECC 2:2) It was quite outside our discussion. It came from the depths of his heart. And now we did understand what madness it is to laugh. No one spoke.

Pastor Solheim had to perform the afternoon's wedding. We telephoned all the hospitals. I went around casualty wards thinking he might have been in a street accident. No sign.

I admitted to myself at last what I must do. I must go to the Ministry of the Interior. He had been arrested.

And then began the hours and weeks and years of searching. Of trailing from office to office. Of pushing at any door that might open.

I learnt that important prisoners were kept in cells in the Interior Ministry's basements. So many women were seeking arrested husbands, sons and fathers that an "information office" was opened to handle inquiries. The stairs were crowded with mothers and children. They stood hopelessly waiting to ask for news. A slogan decorated the otherwise bare wall:

WE WILL BE RUTHLESS TO THE CLASS ENEMY

Each in turn put her question. The officials pretended to examine lists of typed names. They peered into filing cabinets. But of all those missing men, no trace could they find.

A rumour spread that Richard had been taken to Moscow. (It had happened to Antonescu and others.) But I couldn't believe he'd gone from my life. Evening after evening, I made a meal and sat by the window. I thought, he'll come tonight. He's done nothing. He'll soon be free. The Communists cannot be worse than the fascists, who always let him go after a week or two.

He didn't come. I put my forehead against the pane and wept. I went to bed late, but couldn't sleep. In the morning, Pastor Solheim went with me to ask the help of the Swedish Ambassador, our ally in the past. Mr. Reutersw„rd said he would speak at once to the Foreign Minister, Ana Pauker.

Mrs. Pauker's answer was ready: "Our information is that Pastor Wurmbrand has absconded from the country with a suitcase full of dollars entrusted to him for famine relief work. They say he is in Denmark."

The Ambassador brought the case up with the Prime Minister. Groza repeated Pauker's version, with a jovial promise: "So Wurmbrand's supposed to be in our jails? If you can prove that, I'll release him!"

The Communists were so sure of themselves. Once in the Secret Police cells, a man ceased to exist.

p031 The Pastor's Wife

No one else could intervene now. The only hope left - which thousands were trying - was bribery.

"You know Theoharo Georgescu, the Cabinet Minister?" asked Klari Meir, a friend of my schooldays. "His brother lives near us, and I've heard that he can open prison doors for the right sum. I'll talk to his wife for you."

Mr. Georgescu was willing. So long as everything was kept absolutely secret. But the price of his favours was high.

I met him, as he wished, in a squalid hovel on the outskirts of town. He was a squat little man in a smart new suit.

"I'm Georgescu," he said "I arrange things. A word to my brother and it's as good as done. Guarantee? You have my word."

We could find the sum he asked, though with great difficulty. It was handed over.

Nothing happened.

It was not the first nor the last time we were swindled in this way. There was nothing we could do. I'd met thieves and criminals in plenty, but these professional tricksters were in a class of their own. Some were high-ranking officials. Few were Communist in anything but name.

"Who knows what's coming?" said a high Party man who'd come to our flat by night. "Perhaps the British and the Americans."

With this in mind for the future (and a cash reward for the present) he tried to help. He would do what he could so long as it did not endanger his job.

A third Communist official was reached through a woman friend who'd known him as a student. They had secret meetings, as if they were lovers, to disguise negotiations.

Nothing came of it all.

After some months of wasted effort a stranger came one evening to the door. The man was unshaven and reeked of plum brandy. He insisted that we talk alone.

"I've met your husband," he said. And my heart turned over. "I'm a warder - don't ask what prison. But I take him his food, and he said you'd pay me well for a bit of news."

"It depends...how much?" I said. We'd had so many failures.

"I'm risking my neck, you know."

The sum he named was huge. He would not bargain.

Pastor Solheim was as doubtful as me. He told the warder: "Bring me a few words in Wurmbrand's writing."

He gave him a bar of chocolate from the famine relief stores.

"Take this to Wurmbrand and bring back a message with his signature."

p032 The Pastor's Wife

Two days later the man returned. He removed his cap. He felt in the lining. And handed me the wrapper from the chocolate bar. I read:

"My dearest wife - I thank you for your sweetness. I'm well Richard."

It was his handwriting. Bold and clear, determined and yet troubled. No possibility of mistaking the tempestuous serenity of those lines.

"He's all right," said the warder. "Some can't take it, in solitary. Don't like their own company." He breathed brandy. "He sends you his love."

We agreed to pay the money if he would continue to carry messages. Finally he said: "All right. But people have got twelve years for this. You know, it's not just the cash."

He risked his freedom out of a divided love: he loved the money, loved the drink it bought. And he also loved Richard. Sometimes he slipped him extra bread. He continued to bring us verbal messages.

"What do you do with this money we pay you?" I asked.

"Get drunk!" he laughed. But the Lord had touched his heart, if not yet about drinking.

Solheim and his dear wife Cilgia, friends in time of trouble, dropped everything and worked only to keep my courage up and rescue Richard. Pastor Solheim came with me to the Swedish Embassy where we were at once received by the Ambassador. When he saw the scrap of paper with Richard's writing he quickly drafted a note to the Premier: "You promised to release Pastor Wurmbrand if we could prove that he is in a Rumanian prison. I now have that proof in my hands."

Groza passed the note on to Ana Pauker at the Foreign Ministry. His joke had misfired. She sent for Mr. von Reutersw„rd and stormed at him. If she said that Wurmbrand had fled to Denmark, then so he had. She would not be insulted by the envoy of a minor power who was poking his nose into a purely domestic matter. She was not a liar!

The Ambassador was declared persona non grata. His superiors questioned the wisdom of his intervention. Richard was a Rumanian national, even if he did work for a foreign mission. Von Reutersw„rd replied that his conscience obliged him to help a man whom he knew to be innocent. He'd been lied to by a Minister of State, and it was his duty to protest. The Ambassador was a man of God and Governments do not always take kindly to such men. He was recalled to Stockholm and retired from the diplomatic service.

p033 The Pastor's Wife

Soon after this, Groza was hoisted to the even emptier position of President of the Grand National Assembly. Once he met Pastorel, the famous Rumanian satirist, and taxed him with putting out malicious jokes about him.

"I'm entitled to respect - I'm the President."

Pastorel: "That's a joke I've never made."

In bitter jokes, the heart finds its revenge. This is what inspires the tragic jokes for which the Jews are known. Now you could be jailed for telling one: Pastorel was sent to prison for six years.

Next, Solheim - who thought of Richard as his other self and of Rumania as his second homeland - was obliged to leave the country. He had identified himself with us and his mission-station, as all good missionaries do. He could help no more. But we still had loyal friends, although to be friendly with us was to put oneself in danger.

The wife of a political prisoner could get no ration card. They were only for "workers." The wife of a political prisoner could not work. Why? Because she had no ration card, and therefore did not exist.

I didn't argue that the highest authorities in the land denied that Richard was in prison.

"How am I to live? And my son?"

"That's your business."

Mihai had become again my only child. Before Richard's arrest we had lost the orphaned children who had come to us from the Nazi massacres in Eastern Rumania. Hearing that the Russians had decided to repopulate, with refugees, the two Eastern provinces (Bessarabia and Bucovina) which they had annexed, we realized that sooner or later the children would be taken from us. Hundreds of Jewish orphans faced this plight. How much better if we could get them to Palestine, where the new State of Israel was about to be born! In agony of mind, we decided to let our boys and girls go. It seemed so much better than waiting for an unknown fate to catch them under the Soviets.

They joined a little army of refugees aboard the Turkish steamer ~Bulbul~. Weeks passed. No news came of their arrival. Each day Richard looked more haggard. An international search began, spreading from the Black Sea to the Eastern Mediterranean. Gradually, hope faded. It was thought that the ~Bulbul~ had hit a wartime mine and gone down with all aboard. But to this day, no one knows. The ship set out. It did not arrive. There were no survivors.

The pain was terrible. We had loved them as our own. When we finally accepted the truth that they were lost, I didn't want to see or speak to anyone. Rare are the men who can comfort men. All my beliefs, in the Resurrection, in everlasting life, were put to a hard test. I had to understand that it is not among the dead that you must seek your lost children, but among the living. Many times I thought I could never overcome this pain; but the Lord gave me strength to go on. Then one day, the word of God slipped quietly into my heart, saying, "My peace I give unto you." I understood anew the word Patience which is repeated so often in the New Testament. In the Greek this word - ~hypomone~ - means "To remain under": to accept, to bear the pain as given from God. It will bear much fruit. God gives as well as takes away, and he put around me many new young people. It remained only not to forget: to have a pitiful heart after all that I had learned.

In my grief I had to comfort Mihai. How bitterly he wept. I held him in my arms and told him a story which I'd often heard on Richard's lips. It comes from the Talmud, a book of great human wisdom.

It is said that during the absence of a famous rabbi from his house his two sons died, both of them of uncommon beauty and enlightened in the Law. His wife bore them to her bedchamber and spread a white covering over their bodies. In the evening the rabbi came home.

"Where are my sons?" he asked. "I repeatedly looked round the School, and I did not see them there." She brought him a cup. He praised the Lord at the going out of the Sabbath, drank, and asked again: "Where are my sons?"

"They will not be afar off," she said, and placed food before him that he might eat.

When he had said grace after the meal she addressed him: "With your permission, I wish to ask you a question."

"Ask it then," he replied.

"A few days ago a person entrusted to me some jewels, and now he demands them back; should I return them?"

"What?" said the rabbi. "Would you hesitate to return to everyone his own?"

"No," she replied. "Yet I thought it best not restore them without first acquainting you."

She then led him to the room, and took the white covering from the dead bodies. "My sons! my sons!" loudly lamented the father. "My sons, the light of my eyes!" The mother turned away and wept bitterly.

At length she took her husband by the hand and said, "Did you not teach me that we must not be reluctant to restore that which was entrusted to our keeping? The Lord gave and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord."

At this time, when so many tragedies were pressing down on us, I found great joy in one of the greatest events in history. The State of Israel came into being in 1948, fulfilling the Bible's prophecies about the return of the Jewish people to their homeland.

"I will gather them from all the countries whither I scattered them in my wrath," says God to the prophet Jeremiah. The return was part of a plan which God laid down, when he blessed the father of Jews, Abraham, and all the world partook of that blessing. Now I saw God's plan coming true, to remain so for ever. When the prophets pledged that God would gather his people from the corners of the earth, they did not know how many nations and continents the Jews would be scattered among. People were eager now to interpret the great events they were witnessing. Men who had not looked at a Bible for years began to search the Scriptures as if they had just been published. Ezekiel, Jeremiah, Amos were pored over, in the hunt for clues as to the next step.

A great new exodus began from Rumania. The Nazis had massacred half a million Rumanian Jews. Those who were left had had more than enough of the Communists, who had once seemed liberators. Jews in the Eastern provinces seized by Russia were being gathered from the street for labour in Soviet mines. The one difference this time was that the Soviets took Rumanians as well as Jews. They were driven off in trucks without a word to their families. Few ever returned.

A young man from my home in Bucovina told me, "My brother spent four months hidden in a hole behind a cupboard to avoid deportation. I got out with only the clothes on my back. I told a Soviet bureaucrat that he could have my flat with all its contents and every penny I had in return for a passport. I got it and left. So much for Communism - it's simply thieving of everything by everyone from everyone."

That was how it was: people gave all they had to get out.

Not long after the birth of the State of Israel, Ana Pauker signed a pact with the new state. It allowed Jews to leave the Communist paradise, for hard cash. The Rumanian People's Republic was in need of foreign currency. It sold Jews for so much per head, depending upon how much brain was in the head. Scientists, doctors and professors cost most.

Every night crowds waited outside the visa office. Old people and young, grandparents with babies wrapped in blankets slept on the pavement. The story was told of the stranger who saw line of Jews that stretched from the police station to Parliament Square. "What is this queue for?" he asked. "Oranges." "But in that shop across the street they're selling oranges with no queue." "Ah, but we wish to eat them from the tree."

The Government wanted to keep "Operation Israel" secret. Special trains left from out-of-the-way stations and obscure sidings. None went from Bucharest Central. Only after dark, from remote suburbs. But each one was packed.

Night after night, we went to see off friends with tears in our eyes.

"Next year in Jerusalem!" The cry has echoed from ghettos and synagogues for centuries. To know that this time it was true brought such joy to my heart.

In the Book of Exodus it says that "a mixed multitude" left Egypt with the Jews. And this proved again true. Many fled from Communism with forged exit visas, pretending to be Jews. A multitude of strangers found a refuge with the departing crowds.

A high-ranking police officer told me, "If you give me money and help in getting a visa, as a Jew, to leave the country, I can get your husband out of jail." A friend I trusted said that this policeman could do what he promised. The offer gave me new hope. I told Mihai.

He was by that time ten years old. Tall for his age, and with sharp cheekbones and questioning eyes. At school he was learning to be the son of a "social outcast." It was a hard lesson. Mihai adored his father. It was not easy to explain why he should be taken from us and locked in prison. Sometimes I trembled for Mihai's faith. When I told him about the new hope, he was excited. Next morning, his elation had gone. He said:

"Mummy, I had a dream. I saw our neighbour holding out his hat and begging two birds to come into it. They fluttered around - and then they flew away."

He said it meant that nothing would come of our scheme. A few days later we heard that the policeman who had offered to help us was himself under arrest. Mihai has had many premonitions in dreams.

Every day more people vanished. Once a number of well-known prisoners were released. They came home in ambulances and showed their bruises and scars and told of the tortures they had suffered. When the required impression had been made, all were re-arrested.

I wept to think that Richard might be at that moment bearing torture. I feared that he might break, and betray his friends.

p037 The Pastor's Wife

He had promised that he would die rather than do so, but who can say how much a man can bear? St. Peter promised that he would not deny Christ.

If Richard died I knew we would meet in the next life. We had agreed to wait for each other at one of the twelve gates of Heaven. We had decided that our rendezvous would be at the Benjamin Gate. Jesus made an appointment like this with his disciples, to meet them after his death, in Galilee. And He kept it.

p038 The Pastor's Wife

MY ARREST

One evening in August I came home late. Mihai was staying with friends in the country so I was free to go my rounds. We women did pastoral work for the church in secret, under the guise of nurses or charwomen. And the hours were long. It was almost 11 p.m. when I finished cleaning the house and caring for the six children of a man whose wife was in hospital. He'd had land and money, but both had been confiscated by the Communists.

I came home through streets that were being decorated with Red flags for the annual celebration of the Red Army's arrival. I was too tired to eat and planned to go straight to bed.

But I found my cousin, who was staying with us while waiting to leave for Israel, very alarmed. A suspicious visitor had called.

"He said he came from the Living Space Office," my relative told me. "Talked about putting more people in the flat. But I'm sure what he really wanted to know was how many exits you have apart from the front door."

I knew then what to expect. A police raid. I wasn't surprised. Just too exhausted, almost, to care. Mihai was in God's good hands. That was what mattered. I went to sleep, commending my husband, my son and all my loved ones to God's care.

At 5 a.m. they hammered on the door. My cousin opened. I heard shouting. Boots clattering on the stairs.

"What's your name?"

"Hitler," stuttered my cousin, who did indeed have that distressing name.

"What! Arrest him!"

My poor cousin tried to explain. His mother had married an Orthodox Jew with beard and curls called Haskel Hitler, who refused to change his name, despite the terrible complications it produced. But the farce ended. They realized he had no connection with his namesake. They pushed him aside and shoved their way into the bedroom.

I was sharing it with a woman guest, a dear sister in the faith. We sat up in bed, clutching the clothes round us.

p039 The Pastor's Wife

"Sabina Wurmbrand?" shouted a bull-necked man in charge, who never stopped shouting as long as he was in the flat. "We know you're hiding arms here. Show us where they are - now!"

Before I could argue they were pulling out trunks, opening cupboards, emptying drawers on the floor. A shelf of books crashed down. My friend sprang from the bed to retrieve them.

"Never mind that! Get your clothes on."

We had to dress in front of six men. They trampled over our things. From time to time they shouted out, as if to encourage each other to keep up the meaningless search.

"So you won't tell us where the arms are hidden!"

"We'll tear this place apart?"

I said, "The only weapon we have in this house is here." And picked up the Bible from under their feet.

Bull-neck roared, "You're coming with us to make a full statement about those arms!"

I laid the Bible on the table and said, "Please allow us a few moments to pray. Then I'll go with you."

They stood gaping while my friend and I prayed together. I embraced my cousin and his mother.

"Next year in Jerusalem!"

Their eyes were full of tears.

"~Leshana haba be-Jerushalaim!~" they answered.

As they led me out, the last thing I did was to snatch up a little parcel from the sideboard. It contained a pair of stockings and underwear. A day or two before a girl from our church had made me the gift. I'd put it aside, unopened, never guessing that it would be the most important thing I took with me to prison.

I was pushed into the back of an Oldsmobile. Blacked-out motor-cycle goggles went over my eyes so that I wouldn't know where we were going. The drive was brief. Minutes later I was lifted out and swept across the pavement. My feet hardly touched the stairs as I was dragged upwards like a bound sheep. I bruised my shins as they hustled me round a corner. The goggles came off. There was a push in the small of the back. A door slammed behind me.

I was in a long bare room crowded with women. They sat on benches, on the floor. The door kept opening to admit more. I saw the wife of a liberal politician. A society woman whose features I'd seen in the newspapers. An actress in a thin low-cut dress. A lady-in-waiting from the Palace.

We were the dangerous, the "socially rotten" elements of Rumania.

By evening several hundred women were crammed into the room. The round-up was on national scale for the anniversary of August 23rd Freedom Day, the Communists called it. The day of the capitulation before Russia.

We huddled together under a single ceiling bulb. No food or drink came.

Each woman was cocooned in her own fears.

How long would it last? What would happen to our children? Mihai had lost his dear father. Now his mother was taken from him. Our home and everything it held would be confiscated. He'd be thrown on the kindness of friends, who were themselves in danger. As I prayed for him, a woman leapt up and beat on the door with her fists. She screamed:

"My children! My children!"

Others cried out for husbands, lovers, sons. A woman beside me collapsed in hysterics. Another was sick. The single toilet overflowed. The door opened only to admit more women, who shouted indignantly at the guards: "But I've done nothing?"

The actress confided, "I'll be released. You'll see!" They thought their innocence would save them! As if this were not 1950, and a Communist State.

All of them had been told, "You're wanted by the police to make a statement." Some passed ten years making the statements.

Next morning we heard brass bands. The Freedom Day parade (attendance compulsory) was on. The windows were painted over. But if the parade was passing below we must be in the police lock-up in Bucharest's main street, which was called Victory Street.

Thousands of boots tramped by. Slogans were rythmically chanted:

"AUGUST 23rd HAS BROUGHT US FREEDOM."

One was a rhyming jingle:

"DEATH TO THE THIEVES AND TRAITORS IN PRISON!"

"Shame!" murmured the socially-rotten elements.

The new national anthem was roared out in march time:

"BROKEN CHAINS REMAIN BEHIND US ..."

Never in the history of Rumania had so many people been in chains.

How the hours dragged, with nothing to do but wait. The day and the night I passed in that room were timeless, a taste of hell which never ends.

At last guards brought black bread and watery soup in heavy metal cans.

Next day a sergeant began calling out names. Were they letting us out?

p041 The Pastor's Wife

My name was on the first list. Again the blacked-out goggles. I was put in a van and taken to what I learnt later was Secret Police headquarters, on Rahova Street.

Before pushing me into a small cell, a woman guard asked those already inside: "Any of you know this woman?"

Nobody did. I was allowed to join them. The policy was never to put friends together. You were permitted no comfort. You were to be alone. During the interrogation stage you never stayed long enough in one cell to make a friend you could trust. Each new arrival could be an informer, planted to spy on prisoners.

Apart from a young medical student, my companions were peasant women, arrested at random. Terror was being used to enforce collectivization on the land. Fierce battles had been fought with officials sent to seize farm property. An unknown number of peasants were executed at drumhead trials, and nearly 100,000 had been given jail sentences.

Days later I was moved into solitary confinement. My cell contained only an iron cot. No bucket - the first thing a prisoner looks for. How I mourned the missing bucket. It meant more than food or warmth or light. Stomach upsets caused by the food, "interrogation fright" on hearing your name called meant nothing to the guards. You were let out at 5 a.m., 3 p.m. and at 10 p.m.

High in the wall was a small window, secured from outside with an iron grill. The cell was damp and chill, even in August. How glad I was of my light summer coat and those woollen stockings.

How long before they called me? What would they ask? I remembered past troubles with the police: waiting for Richard in the cafe across the road from the station; the fear that he'd never leave. He'd said, "Hell is to sit in darkness remembering past sins." I had so many, and now they were vivid before my eyes.

The warder who brought food - boiled oats - was an older man. They were better than the young ones. Often he said a sympathetic word.

"Thicker today!" he murmured, winking at the gruel. Plainly he was one of those who still thought the Americans might come and turn the situation on its head.

Once he offered to smuggle out a letter. But I suspected it might be used to trap friends who received it.

He whispered a hoarse story of how he had asked an officer: "Why are there so many people in jail?" "Mind your business, or there'll be one more," said the officer.

The warder grinned delightedly. "And what happened? Next day they arrested him! Nobody knows why. Never saw him again! Ah, them that judge today, tomorrow will be judged!"

At night I lay trying to block my ears against the crash of steel doors, the scrape of studded boots, the guards' obscenities.

Doors were unlocked near me. Each time I thought: mine next. But it was several claustrophobic days before they came.

The cell door opened.

"Turn your back!"

Goggles snapped over my eyes. I felt black panic as they pulled me by the arms along passages. Left, right, left right. Round corners. Were they going to shoot me? To die without warning in the darkness!

We stopped. The goggles came off. I stood blinded by sunshine in a big room. Guided by the warder, I sat in a real chair and steadied myself with a hand on a real desk. A big oak desk stained with ink. Behind it sat two men wearing the blue-tabbed uniforms of the Secret Police. A heavy middle-aged major cultivating a moustache. A young fair-haired lieutenant who had been present at the raid on my flat. The lieutenant stared at me with a curious knowingness. He had clear blue eyes. His blond good looks reminded me of someone. Unaccountably, he smiled

I shivered. Then I realized: he looked like the boy I'd loved so many years before in Paris. The resemblance was extraordinary.

I expected to hear that some charge had been made against me. But the major said, with weary patience: "You know, Mrs. Wurmbrand what your offence against the state has been. Now you will write for us a detailed statement about it."

"But what should I write? I don't know why you've brought me here."

"You know very well," he said. On a side table were pen and paper. I wrote a few lines saying that I had no idea I why I'd been arrested. He glanced at them, nodded, and asked for the next prisoner.

All the way back to the cell the guard shouted and pushed me blindfolded, into walls. When the door shut behind me I saw his eye through the small spyhole.

"Now you'll sit and think until you write what the officer told you! Or you'll get the treatment!"

Torture. Bullying, mockery, humiliation. Mental torture to soften you up for interrogation. Tape-recorded voices screaming. A firing-squad volley on loudspeakers in the corridors. The torture of being a mother parted from her child.

Physical torture. I'd seen the results of what they did in these cells.

The problem of what to tell interrogators was not new. We'd faced it in Nazi times. Some believed that you must not lie even to save others. They acted on the belief. But love is higher than truth. I don't tell a thief where money is kept in the house. A doctor is right to deceive a madman who has a gun, so that he may be disarmed. Communist hatred is unreasoning madness. We have a duty to mislead those whose sole aim is to destroy.

The major and his assistant were waiting for me next day. He had a string of questions on a pad which he ticked off in turn. Their aim was to extract information that could be used against Richard.

I remember one thing the major said: "Every man has his weak point." And the lieutenant turned his sculptured blonde head and gave his knowing smile.

They would be trying to find Richard's weaknesses. His interrogation would be ruthless. The major was a long time coming to the point. He made a little speech about the blessings of Communism. He assured me that they were my friends. Pastor Wurmbrand's friends, too. They wished to release him, but needed some information first. He asked what Richard had said on this or that occasion to colleagues.

I replied that we discussed religion, never politics.

The major smiled, very sincerely, and said, "Mrs. Wurmbrand, the Bible is full of politics. Prophets who rebelled and complained against Egyptian rule. Jesus spoke out against the ruling class of his day. If your husband is a Christian he must have clear views about the Government."

"My husband doesn't interest himself in politics."

"Yet he had an audience with King Michael before the king left the country. Why?"

"It was not secret. The king gave audiences to many people."

"How long did this audience last?"

"About two hours."

"And in all that time there was no reference to politics?"

"As I say, my husband isn't interested in politics."

"Well, what did he talk about?"

"About the Gospel."

"And what did the king say?"

"He was in favour of it."

The lieutenant gave a little snort of laughter and quickly put his hand to his mouth. From the look in the major's eye, I thought he was due for a resounding reprimand later.

The major's smile became more sincere than ever.

"Now, Mrs. Wurmbrand. You're a very intelligent woman. I can't understand your attitude. You and your husband are Jews. We Communists saved you from the Nazis. You should be grateful. You should be on our side!"

His eyes narrowed. He spoke more slowly.

"Your husband is accused of counter-revolutionary activities. He could be shot. His colleagues have spoken. They support the charge against him."

My heart turned over. He was lying, of course. And watching for my reaction. I tried to look blank. He continued:

"They may just be trying to save themselves. Perhaps ~they~ are the real counter-revolutionaries. We can't judge, unless you tell us everything that people working with the mission used to say.

Everything. Speak out, denounce the real counter-revolutionaries and your husband will be free tomorrow."

The major turned and smiled at his aide, inviting him to share in the happy vision. His pupil said encouragingly: "You could go home to your family."

How sweet that thought was. I put it away, and said: "I know nothing."

Back in the cell at night, nursing bruises won from the guard, I felt my feet against the end of the cot and thought: "Poor Richard, his feet will be hanging over the end." He was so tall.

What were they doing to him now? At one moment I was ready to say anything to be safe with him again; the next, I trembled. I wanted him to live and I wanted him to resist, and the two wishes struggled within me.

The major looked tired, his eyes were slightly bleary but in them there was also a glint of triumph. He drummed his fingers impatiently on the desk-top. The questioning this time centred on the Nazis. What Germans did I know? What were our connections with them? Was I aware that people were being shot for harbouring Nazis? Why had I hidden officers in my home?

I could truthfully say that I had not hidden Nazis. To me they had been simply men. They were in need, and we tried to help them whatever their beliefs, as we'd helped persecuted Jews and gypsies earlier.

"You deny the charge then. Well, we have a surprise for you.

He pressed a buzzer under his desk. Guards brought in a man who I recognized at once: Stefanescu had been with us in 1945. He knew everything that we had done for the Germans.

He shuffled forward. Nervous eyes flickered from the major to his aide, to me. He swallowed, and his eyes closed, shutting out the world.

"Now, Stefanescu," said the major, lighting a cheroot. "Tell us how the Wurmbrands kept Nazis in their home. You know this woman, of course?"

"No."

"What!"

"I've never seen her."

"You're lying!"

"No, sir."

Stefanescu closed his eyes again.

The major shouted and ranted. He put his face an inch from Stefanescu's and bawled at the top of his lungs.

Dazed Stefanescu kept on repeating that he didn't know me.

Yet he knew me well. And he had no good intentions toward me. God had blinded him for that moment.

Finally, the major impatiently told the guards to take him away. He looked at me with speculative eyes, stubbing out the cheroot. After all, he seemed to be thinking, it's absurd: a Jewess, who loses all her family in Nazi pogroms, hiding Nazis in her cellar. Risking her husband's life as well as her own. He switched to asking me about our work in the Red Army.

I managed to dodge the dangerous questions.

Lying awake in the cell later I remembered the big gangly Red Army boys who'd once filled the flat. With what wonderful simplicity they had heard the word of God. One had danced around the room with joy when Richard told him that on the third day Christ had risen from the dead.

The day's events encouraged me. I had a strong feeling of the divine presence in my solitary cell. God had given me the strength and wit to fend off questions about printing Russian Gospels and receiving relief funds. Perhaps the worst was over.

A piece of chalky plaster had worked lose from the wall. I picked it up and drew on the dark blanket a big cross, in thankfulness.

The new interrogator was a big sweating man with a bald head. I stood a long time before the ink-stained desk while he read documents in a brown file.

The blond lieutenant was making notes from a thick text-book. Now and again he looked up at me, slyly. As if he knew something I didn't know. The look on his handsome face was amused and excited like a child in a cinema who knows that something splendidly nasty is going to happen in the next minute.

The bald interrogator's arms were covered in thick hair. At last he began. The questions were all personal. My family, friends trips abroad. Days as a student in Paris. He was warm and friendly. Smooth.

p046 The Pastor's Wife

"And now," he said, in the nondescript official voice of one giving instructions about filling up a form, "we want you to write down your sexual history."

I was slow to understand. He explained patiently.

"Your sexual history. You have one, I suppose? Your first experience. The first boy you went with. How he fondled you. How you returned his kisses. What happened next. Did he possess you on the spot, and which spot? Or was that left to the next one who came along? Tell us about ~his~ embraces. Compare the two. Or three. Continue with your other lovers. We want a complete account, blow by blow, so to speak."

The polite calm tone was like a slap in the face.

The lieutenant was looking at me. His tongue passed over his lips until it found a small red sore at the side of his mouth.

"Write it all down. We want every detail. I'm sure there are plenty."

I tried to keep calm.

"You have no right to ask such a thing. You may accuse me of being a counter-revolutionary or what you like, but this isn't a court of morals."

The hairy fingers tapped the desk-top.

"This is whatever we choose to make it. The story is spread that you are some kind of saint. We think otherwise. We ~know~ otherwise. Now we mean to show in your true colours."

He stared at me, unblinking.

"As a whore," said the lieutenant.

"I shan't do as you ask, of course."

"We'll see about that!"

The bald interrogator blazed, firing obscene questions at me. A stream of four-letter words poured out of his mouth. He punctuated questions by slapping a meaty palm on the desk.

I was soaked in sweat. My head swam. I thought I might faint. I kept refusing to write.

After an hour he stopped. The lieutenant by then had gone back to his book. They'd done all this before, it was a bore.

"Time is on our side," said the bald interrogator.

He had saved up a last twist of the knife.

"Your husband has already confessed to being a traitor and a spy. You're on your way to the rubbish heap." He came round from behind the desk and breathed in my face. "But you won't leave this place without telling us the facts about your sex life."

He glowered at me for a long moment.

I was trembling, convulsively.

Back to the cell, along sour-smelling corridors. The goggles came off a moment before they pushed me inside, and for the first time I saw the number above the door.

Seven.

I was in Cell 7. The holy number. Number of the days of creation. The seven-branched candlestick.

I lay on the cot and sobbed. After a while I grew calmer. My body lay there in the darkness, but my spirit rose and passed the bounds of prison.

I remembered the words, "We are crucified with Christ." If a time came when I had to say, "It is finished," I wanted to give only last words of love to parents and friends and the thief near me, like Jesus. God was with me in my affliction.

"Get up!"

Mielu, the red-faced head warder, was in the doorway. I rose and faced the wall.

"It's not a hotel here. If everyone lay around putting on fat they'd be fighting to get in. You're going to learn what prison's for."

Mielu means in Rumanian "Lamb" but he was not lamb. Besides the regular morning inspection he prowled corridors making snap checks.

"Turn to face me. Anything to report?"

"Can I have a spoon to eat the soup?"

"If you want to speak to me keep your mouth shut."

He cackled at his own joke. It had made him well-known in Rumanian prisons. They said he'd sold bootlaces in cafes before the war. He owed his present position to efficiency as an informer. He had to prove his importance to everyone, on every occasion.

At midday a greasy soup arrived. You had to drink it all. That was the rule. Hunger-strikers were forcibly fed. Two guards held you while a third poured it into your mouth. When this happened you got a soup that was slightly richer than usual: Egg yolk and sugar was added to keep the "patients" strength up. It contained, they said, as much nutrition as three days' of the normal brew. So people refused to eat in the hope of being forcibly fed!

I smiled, remembering how fastidious Richard had been about his food when we first married. How glad he'd be to return to home-cooking now!

Both of us knew by heart passages from the second book of Moses, Exodus. It tells how the children of Israel came out of slavery in Egypt. God delivered them.

Every night in Cell 7 I recited these verses. I knew that Richard, somewhere, was doing the same. God would deliver us.

"Ready to answer my questions now?" Hairy-fingers came close, giving off a smell of alcohol and tobacco. "Are we to be edified by the sex-life of a saint?"

The blond lieutenant glanced at his older colleague, looking a little shocked at this coarse opening.

He had his textbook and notepad again. I suppose he was one of the new "proletarian leaders." A bright lad off the factory floor. Trying to pass exams and win promotion while the interrogation mill ground on around him.

The bald interrogator ran through his routine of obscene questions for twenty minutes. I kept repeating that he had no right to ask such things. Then he paused and lit a cigarette. I imagined the lieutenant would take over. But when the older man walked out the young officer went on studying.

I stared at him, trembling a little. My eyes wouldn't focus properly and my knees felt as if they might give out. I hadn't slept.

How he reminded me of the boy in Paris, long ago. Where was he now? Both were handsome. But how many things a beautiful face can hide. Now and again he looked up from his book and gave that knowing smile. As if he knew the answers to all his coarse colleague's questions.

I stood for three hours. It was a fairly common practice. To avoid wasting their free time, they called a prisoner and let her stand there while they studied. They signed a receipt when the prisoner arrived, another when she left. That officially accounted for their time.

The older man returned and grilled me for another hour. Who I'd slept with, what I did with them.

I was very tired. Exhaustion came in black waves. But I found the strength to say: "I will not tell you what you want." I could give him one piece of information, though - the worst "sexual history" will not prevent a person becoming a great saint if God wills it. Mary Magdalene was a harlot once. But she will be revered when we have been long forgotten.

The interrogator grunted an obscenity. "Take her away," he said.

The blond lieutenant yawned and stretched as I was led out.

Days later I moved back to a communal cell. It was like an icebox. Winter was approaching now. My summer coat and wool stockings were the envy of the cell. I was rich!

I tried to share my riches. The coat served others as a blanket, a dressing-gown, as gala wear for interrogations. I offered the stockings to a girl wearing only a thin cotton dress. Tears ran unchecked down her white face.

p049 The Pastor's Wife

The four other women in this cell, to my astonishment, were wearing full evening dress. Only it was not very full. Low-cut, sleeveless gowns of white satin that trail on the filthy cement floor are not ideal prison dress.

"We'd been to see a film at the American Embassy," one of them told me. "It was about polar bears. On the way home in a taxi we were stopped and pulled out into the street. They took us to Secret Police headquarters. 'We know everything. You're American spies!' they said."

Interrogated for days on end, starved and kept without sleep, they denied the charges. Now they were awaiting trial. The elegant dresses were reduced to rags. Strips had been torn from them for handkerchiefs and towels and other needs.

Each woman in turn handled my coat with delighted cries. It might have been a mink stole.

"Would you like to wear it at your next interrogation?"

"Oh, that ~is~ kind. I feel so naked with bare shoulders before those beasts. It'll give me courage."

The door opened sharply and all our hearts jumped.

"You," said the guard. They could never pronounce my name. Like many other Jewish names, Wurmbrand is of German origin, and the "W" sound baffled them.

"Put the goggles on."

The blind-march along the smelly corridors began.

I entered a room full of men's voices. A silence fell. I could feel them staring at me. It was eerie. Hearing nothing, blindfold, aware of the eyes on me. What now?

"Take the goggles off!"

Bright lights dazzled me. The new, long interrogation room had no windows. It seemed to be underground. Behind a long table sat ten uniformed officers, including the three I'd already met. They stared at me.

"Do you know what has happened to your husband?"

"But don't you know?" I said. "You should be telling me!"

"Sit down," said the major with the moustache. "If you cooperate and answer all our questions, we may allow you to see him."

I really believed they might. We'd committed no crime. Perhaps he'd been tried, acquitted. How na‹ve I was in those days

They had batches of photographs spread out on the desk. Men and women. A sergeant held them up, one by one.

"Who's this?"

"Who's this?"

"You know this man?"

"You know this man?"

p050 The Pastor's Wife

Of the lot, I recognized one man. I tried to keep my eyes blank, and go on steadily saying no.

He was a dear friend. A Russian soldier, baptized in our home. It was a police full-face and profile shot, not a good one. But how he had changed! Where was he now? I kept on saying No. No. No. Shaking my head.

They shouted and bullied. Questions. Questions. Some I couldn't answer. Some I wouldn't. It was a long session and I became confused by the noise and blinding light. My head whirled.

"We have methods of making you talk which you won't like. Don't try to be clever with us. It wastes our time. It wastes your life."

The repetition, the insistence were maddening. My nerves were stretched to breaking point.

It was hours before they sent me back to the cell. I lay on the straw mattress and sobbed wildly, noisily.

"You're not allowed to cry."

The guard stood in the doorway.

But I could not stop. My tears affected the others. They began to weep, too.

The guard, wooden-faced, turned and closed the door.

I sobbed for two hours. Then I picked myself up and tried to think. The questioning led from subject to subject and person to person. Anyone I named would be arrested and grilled in turn. I must name no names. I didn't think I could bear many more sessions like that.

But the next cross-examination was played with new tactics. The bald interrogator was alone, and smiling.

"Mrs. Wurmbrand, you're only thirty-six years old. The best years of a woman's life are before you. Why are you so obstinate? Why do you refuse to co-operate with us? You could go free tomorrow if you'd only give us the names of these traitors ..."

I didn't answer.

"Let's talk sense. Every man has his price, every woman too. D'you know the story of the man in the nightclub who asked the waiter: "How much is that blonde at the bar." "She charges 100 francs." "And that brunette." "Very special. 500 francs." "Well, how about that girl in the corner with a man." "Oh no sir, she's married to him, you couldn't have her for less than 1,000!"

He roared at his own joke, and wiped his face with a handkerchief.

"You're an honest woman. You can raise your price. Judas was a fool to sell his boss for thirty pieces of silver. He could have held out for 300. Tell us what you want? Freedom for you and your husband? A good parish for him? We'd look after your family. You could be very valuable to us. Well?"

When he had finished talking there was a silence in the room. At last I broke it.

"Thanks, but I've sold myself already. The Son of God was tortured and gave his life for me. Through him I can reach heaven. Can you offer a higher prize than that?"

The bald man suddenly looked very tired. His voice was frustrated. He clenched his hairy fist and I thought he might hit me. The hand went back. But he only smoothed his pate and sighed deeply.

October 23rd was our wedding anniversary. But remembering the happiness of that day made me more miserable.

Winter had come. Mihai always caught cold so easily. He slept the sleep of the young, full of small movements, and often tossed the coverlets to the floor. Who would put them back?

Sometimes Mihai was wilful. Once we'd gone for a picnic, and he'd drunk from a stagnant stream although I told him not to. He had a bad throat for weeks. Then he'd climbed a tree and fallen out. He nearly died that time. Who would stop him taking risks now? There was his Aunt Suzanne, whom he loved. But she had her own troubles. A hundred doubts and anxieties pierced me every day.

In November, the prison director came personally to the cell. A small group of women were told to be ready to leave in ten minutes. No questions were allowed. Fearfully, we gathered our poor bits and pieces. We expected either to be freed or shot.

In fact, I had been sentenced to forced labour. A board simply decided, in my absence, that I should serve twenty-four months. When that time ran out a new sentence would be imposed. I was one of many thousands of prisoners classed as " administrative." We went without benefit of trial to the slave camps. At that time we did not know we had been sentenced.

They were an essential part of the economy now. The camps had gone up all over the country. "Saboteurs" who failed to fulfil worknorms, gypsies, criminals, priests, prostitutes, wealthy bourgeois - the whole gamut of people who failed to fit into the Communist world went there for re-education. The camps were huge, with a permanent population of 200,000. Men, women and children. Their ages ranged from twelve years to seventy and over. By such methods "socialist reconstruction" went forward in all the satellite countries.

The State did what it liked and published what it liked. No word appeared in the newspaper about trials and sentences.

p052 The Pastor's Wife

Only congratulations to the Government in creating jobs for all. What marvels it was doing. So unlike the West, where millions were unemployed.

Prominent people in the West pointed to Rumania as an example of a country which had satisfactorily solved its unemployment problems.

Before partaking in this satisfactory solution, I was moved to a transit prison, Jilava, the most feared jail in the country.

p053 The Pastor's Wife

JILAVA

When the truck dipped suddenly and went down a ramp all the women squealed. The light cut out. There was a hollow clang of steel. We stopped, waiting in uneasy silence for orders.

"Take the goggles off!"

It was a big underground basement without windows. Walls shiny with damp. Greasy stone floors. Uniformed women guards milled about. A squat muscular figure with ginger hair wagged a finger and warned:

"I'm Sergeant Aspra, hard by name and hard by nature. Don't you forget it."

She sat down with a colleague, as attractive as herself, behind a trestle table. A clerk was entering names in a ledger.

"All superfluous articles of clothing," declaimed raucous Aspra, "are deposited on joining this establishment. So get out of your clothes."

They took away my summer coat. But left the thin dress, the stockings, now full of holes. An inventory was made. Hours later we tramped along dark passages, vaulted and arched. A smell of decay hung on the humid air. Behind steel grilles stood security troops in khaki forage caps.

I wasn't wholly a stranger to Jilava. It was a fort built in the last century. The cells were deep underground. I'd come here when mass arrests started, with a girl who thought a friend was among the inmates. They ran a finger through the files and said they had no trace of him.

I made the same eight-mile journey from Bucharest after Richard disappeared. I filled in long forms and waited long hours, to be told that nothing was known about him.

Once two fifteen-year-old schoolgirls had shared our cell in the interrogation centre. They had joined a secret patriotic group. "God help you if you ever get to know what it's like at Jilava in Cell Four," whispered the elder girl.

Sergeant Aspra unlocked a heavy door crossed with iron bars.

"This lot for Cell 4!"

*~Aspra~ - in Romanian, "harsh."

p054 The Pastor's Wife

It was the middle of the morning, but the cell was almost dark. A weak electric bulb hung from the ceiling. Two long tiers of wooden bunks lined the sides of a high vaulted room. A narrow corridor ran down the middle. At the far end was a small window, painted over and barred.

Dozens of eyes stared down at me.

"I'm Viorica, your room-chief," said a voice. A hand waved. "Give her the end place."

At the darkest end of the cell stood one lavatory bucket, beside an open drain. The bunk given to me was directly above it. The bucket was shared by fifty women, most of them with bowel trouble from the foul food.

It was airless and suffocatingly hot on the top tier. Sweating women lay half-naked. Wherever you turned your eyes you saw thin arms and crooked legs, fallen chests and sores. It seemed a medieval charnel house.

On some bodies there were marks and scars of torture.

Women lay on the concrete near the door, hoping to breath a little air.

"They're fools!" said a girl near me. "The damp from the floor is more deadly."

Jilava is a Romanian word meaning "damp." The fort was surrounded by a moat. There, dangling from what looked like a small gibbet was a length of railway line. When it was struck with an iron bar at 5 a.m. we rose. A queue formed for the bucket. The cell filled with talk and argument. Canteens clattered as they were filled with water for washing.

On my first morning in Jilava I heard someone singing a hymn.

"There go the nuns!"

My heart lifted. "Nuns, here in Jilava?" I asked.

"Yes, and if Aspra hears them carolling she'll tie their hands behind their backs again. She did it for three hours last time"

A pale girl of about eighteen stopped chewing a crust and said:

"That's nothing! In my last prison, Mislea, they tied the religious women up and put gas masks on their faces. It was horrible!"

Other nuns were held in adjoining cells. Through walls twelve feet thick women could still communicate, at great risk, by placing a tin mug against the stone to listen for tapping. The sound was amplified and could be plainly heard. But one had to watch constantly for guards, who put their eye to the spyhole.

Messages were passed in a kind of prison morse. We learnt that 200 women lived in the four cells of our wing. And up to 3,000 men elsewhere. In a fortress intended for 600!

p055 The Pastor's Wife

People learn what it means to be on this earth with nothing to do when they enter prison. Not to wash, or sew, or work. Women talked with longing about cooking and cleaning. How they would like to bake a cake for their children, then go round the house with a duster, and clean the windows, and scrub the tables. We had nothing even to look at. Time did not pass. It stood still.

"When I think how I used to complain about being overworked," said my neighbour. "I must have been mad!"

A mother understands when the children leave home what a joy working for them was, what wretchedness it is to have nothing to do.

We stood in line at 11 a.m. for soup. Each woman received a slice of black bread. Calmed by the thought of food to come, they waited quietly.

The moment the steaming keg was out of the cell, quarrels flared. Women fought over a piece of bread which they thought was bigger than its neighbours. It began always in the same way, "You bitch, you know it was my turn for first today." Insults were screamed. The cell rang with a hideous caterwauling.

The door burst open. Guards rushed in, striking out with sticks. Aspra bellowed: "We're too good to you, you  If this goes on, you'll starve tomorrow!"

Spilled soup lay in pools on the floor. Sobbing came from dark bunks. When the guards had gone, with a crash of the door, uproar broke loose. Fifty women shouted the rights and wrongs, until Aspra came in again, trumpeting. "There'll be no more food today, or tomorrow either!"

When they'd gone, recriminations were hissed and muttered.

The girl next to me touched my arm.

"You poor thing. You didn't eat."

"Never mind, it wasn't very appetizing."

"It's the rotten carrots. The State vegetable trust dumped 300 tons here. Nobody would buy them even for pigs. We've been swallowing it for weeks. Look - my skin is quite yellow. We call it 'Carrotitis'!"

Her name was Elena, she said.

A big masterful woman peered at me.

"And who are you? Why are you here?" she demanded. "You haven't said a word since you arrived."

I told them my name, and that I was a pastor's wife.

"Religious, eh? Know any Bible stories?" asked a grey-haired peasant woman.

"Yes, tell us something," came other voices. "It's so boring here."

But the masculine woman became still more hostile.

"You'll turn this place into a vicarage."

And she walked off, stiff with rage.

"Don't mind Elsa Gavriloiu," said Elena. "She's an old Party member. Ever so grateful for the chance she's been given to study her ideological errors in Jilava re-educational institute!"

The other ladies laughed and were briefly comforted, until they remembered that for the next thirty-six hours there would be no food.

To cheer them up, I told the story of Joseph and his brethren, which shows how the wheel of life can turn when everything looks hopeless. While their faces were alight with interest I told them some of the story's many meanings.

"You remember that Joseph's father gave him a coat of many colours. In it were dark threads as well as bright ones. Both belong to life. Though his envious brothers sold him as a slave, Joseph lived to become overseer of a great household in Egypt.

"Again the wheel turned, and he was thrown into prison. Yet he rose to be ruler over all Egypt and saved the country from famine. When his brothers, not recognizing him, came seeking corn, they feared that this great lord of Egypt might steal their asses. That's how it is often with us. We worry over little things, and lose sight of the deep meaning which might be hidden in them. Some sorrows are only great because we look at them from a narrow human perspective. We cannot see to the end. Joseph in the end was Egypt's first minister and the rescuer of the brothers who had sold him."

While a handful of women listened, the rest of the cell hummed and squawked like an aviary.

I caught a glance from gingery Viorica.

"Be careful," whispered the peasant woman. "If Aspra hears you talking of God in here, there'll be trouble."

Next morning Viorica appeared in the lane between bunks.

"I know who you are!" she pointed a finger at me. "Hours I've been puzzling my head. Now I know."

I thought she'd heard about my small sermon and meant to deliver justice.

"I knew your name was familiar. I said to myself, where have I heard that name ..."

The others stared. I sat on the top tier like something in a side-show.

"Yes," said stringy Viorica, triumphantly. "She's a preacher. The wife of that Pastor Wurmbrand!"

p057 The Pastor's Wife

The room chief proudly explained that her uncle had charge of an Orthodox church in Bucharest. He had heard Richard's speech at the Congress of Cults.

"The only one in 4,000 to stand up and speak like a man of God, when all the others cheered the Communists," said Viorica. "You know they sacked the Minister of Cults afterwards?"

She turned to me.

"I've been to your church. I thought the service was lovely."

So I was the heroine of the hour. I came down from my purgatorial perch above the bucket. Viorica found me a better bunk ten feet away, which had become vacant. There she paid me a state visit.

"It's no joke being room chief," she said. "Another day like yesterday, dear, and I shall go mad."

Viorica's powers were great. She recommended to Sergeant Aspra who should do the coveted laundry jobs. How humbly women begged to be allowed to wash the guards' dirty underwear. It was hard work, but infinitely preferable to sitting in the darkness and stench of Cell 4, doing nothing.

I received my first dishful of ~tertch~ - maize boiled in water - and looked round for something to eat it with.

"She wants a spoon!" jeered Mrs. Gavriloiu. "Lap it up!"

I tried to eat the thin, damp-smelling gruel from the shallow tin dish. But it dribbled down my chin. To lap seemed too animal, and I gave away my morning ~tertch~.

But the saving thought came, Why not wish to be humbled. Our Lord was, to the utmost. I remembered Gideon, the Biblical hero who went to fight the enemies of Israel. God told him to take as soldiers only those who lapped the water of the river with their tongues "as a dog lappeth" - that is, those who were prepared to accept the last humiliations. (JDG 7:5)

When the next meal came I lapped my food.

Later, Elena showed me how a piece of wood could be splintered off and with a fragment of broken glass carved into something resembling a spoon.

A woman from Mislea jail told how an extra ration had been given there to nursing mothers and pregnant women. "But then it stopped."

"What happened?"

"Half the women immediately said they were pregnant, the others were jealous and caused scenes."

None of us was fat enough to pass as pregnant, though some were becoming swollen with hunger. Only later did we decide that starvation was official policy. It made us listless and so less troublesome. Then, when they wanted people for the labour camps the thought of better food made us keen to "volunteer." Usually we gathered around the nuns' bunks.

"Put your experience with the ladies's guild to work - keep us from squabbling," said Mrs. Stupineanu, Elena's closest ally.

A tall stately woman, she had been left a widow of some means Until Communism came. Then, having lost everything, she survived by selling candles and sweeping out the church of which she'd once been a generous patron. She told a strange story.

One morning in church, as she stood beside her table of candles, she saw a stranger. He crossed himself, not from right to left like the Orthodox worshipper, but from left to right, in Catholic style. He bought a candle but seemed to know little Rumanian. It emerged that he was a seminarist from France, travelling in Europe. How distressed he was at what he'd seen of the persecution of the church!

Mrs. Stupineanu exercised her French, telling him more. Why, in that very church, before that very altar, police thugs had obscenely tortured the priest!

Next day Mrs. Stepineanu was arrested. The Frenchman was a Communist agent. The widow was offered the alternatives of keeping the Secret Police informed about churchgoers - who they were, what they said - or going to jail.

"I've been in Jilava a year now," she said. At forty-six, her hair was white.

There were two Catholic sisters who glowed with calm goodness. Uncomplaining, they looked after the older women. They washed sore bodies. They sang hymns. They brought comfort where none was looked for.

"But are you allowed to sing?" I asked, at our first meeting.

"We are allowed to sing, and they are allowed to beat us," Sister Veronica replied.

Sister Sophia, the younger of the two, showed livid bruises on her arms and neck.

"We sang very softly," she said. "But someone informed on us. They ran in kicking and beating and slapping. Afterwards Sergeant Aspra banned all talking. But how can you keep fifty women quiet!"

Sophia had played the organ in churches and led us in hymns. Others knew songs written for the Army of the Lord, a Salvation Army-type movement rooted in the peasantry.

Most women were of the Orthodox denomination. The illiterate countrywomen greatly feared dying without the priest's last rites. They believed that they became ghosts, unable to enter heaven. Nuns repeated the words of the funeral service, and although the women were not sure that this would work, it seemed better than nothing.

"Lord, give rest among the saints to thy servant who has fallen asleep," the nuns chanted. "Give her rest among green pastures."

Green pastures. We were under the earth. Over our cells grass grew. Cows pastured there. How happy they must be in the sun with plenty to eat!

The nuns in Jilava included Mother Superiors, novices, lay sisters who did social work. Girls of eighteen, women of sixty. When the Government abolished the Greek Catholic church, monks, priests and nuns who refused to merge with the Orthodox church (which was under Communist control) were imprisoned. There they joined their Roman Catholic brethren.

Sergeant Aspra's deputy was Corporal Georgescu, a dull slow girl with a flat face and a still flatter voice. She mustered prisoners for exercise.

"When I say get outside, no one is to be last. All out together!"

Fifty women cannot use one door simultaneously. But nor could you argue with Georgescu.

"When I give an order, you obey," she droned. Behind her back women giggled, imitating the nasal tones, until they grew quite hysterical with laughter. But they scuttled out quickly when she began to shout. It was always the old and infirm who received her blows, since they were the last in the rush.

"Don't you know what pity is!?" I cried. "It's written that those who show no pity will have none from God in the end."

"No, I don't know," she crowed. "And I don't want to know."

But even Georgescu had a weak spot. Although she never gave permission for medical treatment as long as I was in Cell 4, she would allow women suffering from toothache to visit the dentist.

She'd suffered, too, from toothache. She knew what it was.

How wooden these women guards were!

I was used to people who loved, hated, reacted in some personal way. But these girls in uniform had been turned into puppets. If the order was to beat, they beat you. We might have been carpets. And if the order was to go slow, they ignored us. They had passed through security police schools where blind obedience was taught. Most were peasants, who had never owned anything so smart as their new uniforms, nor possessed such expensive toys as their revolvers. They ruled Rumania, and Rumania was their world.

Their demonstrations of the dictatorship of the proletariat in action were directed chiefly at teachers, professor's wives and other people of culture. It was not simply the resentment of the unlettered. They were indoctrinated with the idea that "bourgeois intellectuals" menaced the progress of world Communism. They still believed in the Party and its promises.

To look at Sanda you would have thought her one of the saner people in the cell. She was young and clear-eyed. Tall, with long dark hair. She'd taken a science degree only a month before her arrest, she told me. Her light voice seemed to skim along over the surface of things. You never knew where it would settle next. She had been arrested because of her brother, who was with Colonel Arsenescu's freedom fighters in the mountains. Some of her remarks at university had been reported to the police.

At times, as we talked, a frightening blankness would glaze her eyes. The voice would die out in mid-sentence. I'd seen this before in prisoners and it alarmed me.

One evening, bunks around Sanda's bed were vacated.

A woman clambered up to join me on the second tier.

"Please let me sit with you," she begged. "Sanda's been so strange. I think she's going to have another of her turns."

I went to look at the girl. Tears were flowing unchecked down her face. Her long fingers twisted a strand of hair, nervously.

Suddenly she cried out: "I don't know, I don't remember, I've never seen him before ..."

Viorica ran down the gangway.

"It's too bad!" she whined. "Why don't they take her out? As if I didn't have enough on my hands."

Women crossed themselves in panic.

Sanda was breathing hard: her face reddened. Then with a shrill yelp, like an animal with its leg in a trap, she leapt from the bunk. Arms flailing. Black hair flying. Striking out at anyone in her path. Seizing a pile of mess tins from the sill she hurled them at Viorica's head. They missed and smashed against the door.

Heads vanished under blankets. Screams, noisy weeping filled the air.

Two strong girls wrestled with Sandra. They struggled back and forth in the narrow lane. Viorica shouted useless advice.

"Grab her, trip her! O God, O God!"

A legion of invisible devils seemed to have poured in.

It was Sister Veronica in the end who had the presence of mind to throw a blanket over Sanda's head from behind. They tumbled on the floor. The two girls held Sanda down. Her writhings ceased.

p061 The Pastor's Wife

She was still. They lifted her into a bunk, unconscious, clothes torn and wet with sweat.

Then my flesh began to crawl.

From the far side of the cell came a man's voice.

The cold, controlled voice of an interrogator. Asking questions. The same questions. Over and over again.

Trembling, I went to the other end of the cell. A pale young girl cowered in a bunk, knees up to her chest, rigid with fear.

She began, in her own voice, to give replies: "I don't know. I wasn't there."

Then screams: "Please don't hit me! No please. PLEASE. AhhhhH!"

Her eyes were open. She was reliving, in a trance of fright, her interrogation in a secret police cell. With eerie and mechanical exactness she reproduced the interrogator's deep voice, and answered with a breathless litany of "don't knows." And made choking, coughing noises as if with pain from some kind of torture.

It was only the start.

For an hour the cell was filled with the appalling cacophony of cries and sobs. One woman after another succumbed. An evil force seemed to surround us in the fetid darkness. The single bulb cast mad shadows on the vaulted ceiling.

At first I felt numb with shock.

Then, like an iron that reddens in the fire I felt something swelling in my breast, and found myself living again my interrogation. The nights of fear, the wondering what they were doing with Richard, what was happening to Mihai.

I fought off madness with prayer. Not acting consciously, but letting the words well up in a stream. The nuns were doing the same.

As if it were the one safe place in hell, women crowded round our bunks. Prisoners squeezed in beside me, clasping my hands, they seemed to be fleeing from a nightmare pogrom.

The guards had experienced these tragic scenes before. They kept out.

Sanda, who had set the match to the fuse, lay sleeping, hearing nothing.

The sound of sobbing began to fade. In an hour only exhausted snuffles from the dark broke the silence. The sense of fear dissolved.

For a long time I lay awake, praying silently: "Lord, if you have given me some influence among these women, give me also wisdom of heart to win their souls for you."

Outside in the long corridor the steps of a guard retreated, becoming fainter, and somewhere in the recesses of the prison a great door shut with a hollow boom. I thought I could hear, in another cell, a woman coughing. Tiny, faint jungle noises echoed in the vast warren of Jilava as 3,000 souls tried to sleep and forget.

Next morning I came face to face with Elsa Gavriloiu, the old Party member. She was rumoured to be a former Secret Police officer, who had fallen from grace. Many victims of Party purges were now entering the prisons.

Elsa stuck out her large jaw at me.

"Start that preaching in here again and I'll hammer on the door until the guard comes."

I said, "Elsa, do you still believe in the Party?"

"Certainly. I haven't changed my beliefs. My arrest was all a mistake."

"Nor has my arrest altered my faith. In fact, it's stronger. I want to tell people what a friend they have in Jesus."

"You'll get the whole cell punished. I don't intend to suffer for you and your God. Anyway, he hasn't helped you much."

"This God you so dislike," I wondered. "What sort of being is he? If you say "I don't like Jack" you know what type of character Jack has. What is your idea of God?"

"Ha!" She relished the chance for a textbook reply. God was the fanatic who wouldn't let science tell the truth. The patron of the exploiters of the proletariat. With the money they squeezed they built churches to Him. He blesses weapons of destruction on both sides.

I said, "What you call God is certainly very unlovable. The God I love is another. He shared the poverty of the workers. He was brought up among the oppressed. He fed the hungry and healed the sick. He teaches love. He died for us ..."

"Love!" Her voice cracked. "What good is that? To me, anyway. I tell you, I'm all hate! If you knew how I loathed those treacherous comrades who put me here. I wish them in hell! I gave my whole life to the Party, and this is what they do to me." She bowed her head. There was a hint of a tear in her eye. It didn't seem that there was anything I could do at that moment.

"Praying? Forgive them, Father?" She hissed the words. "I don't accept forgiveness, it's lies." She began to weep.

"It's all the same," she sobbed. "If the Yanks come, I'll be hanged. If the Communists stay, I'm stuck in jail. Forgiveness!"

The tears ran. After a while she sat up and wiped her grey face with an edge of her skirt. Then she began to look at me with a speculative glance.

p063 The Pastor's Wife

"Sabina Wurmbrand, you're sly. I tell you to stop preaching and in five minutes you're preaching to me."

But Mrs. Gavriloiu didn't threaten to call the guards this time.

Now I was known to everyone in Cell 4. Women came for French and German lessons.

"All Mrs. Wurmbrand's lessons start with the words 'Dieu' or 'Gott,'" laughed Fanny Marinescu, my best pupil.

Some came to me because it passed the time. Others thought it would be useful when they were freed. With Bucharest full of Allied troops, interpreters would be in demand.

Fanny's husband and her mother were both in prison. She was twenty-five years old, quiet and shy, with cropped hair and large round eyes.

We spoke first in the courtyard, after the morning count. Sergeant Aspra and her aides were bawling the odds like bookies.

"Look, a blade of grass," she whispered. "Fancy it growing down here.

"How powerful life is!" She put the grass to her lips.

We became close friends. Our French lessons were conducted by writing on the soles of shoes greased with soap. Nothing was supplied in Jilava. Neither paper, nor clothes, nor linen, nor parcels from home. But periodically DDT was dusted about. If you spread it on the soapy sole you could write fairly plainly on it with a splinter.

Sometimes we had to stop the lesson, because she was in pain.

"I don't know what it is," she'd gasp. "It comes in waves."

But to see a doctor was virtually impossible. At long intervals a medical orderly might appear. Sick women mobbed her, shouting, begging for aid and drugs. The orderly allowed three or four "urgent cases" – ones that made most trouble – go to the infirmary.

Treatment took two forms; sulphur pills for diarrhea; aspirins for anything else.

Then Fanny Marinescu collapsed. She was carried out on a blanket. In a few days she was back: a doctor had diagnosed intestinal tuberculosis.

"They promise that I'll be given an operation," she whispered, trying to smile wanly.

Weeks later Fanny was moved to a prison hospital where she died.

The disease had revealed itself to be not tuberculosis, but cancer.

Later, I met Fanny Marinescu's mother in a labour camp, and had to break the news of the tragedy.

p064 The Pastor's Wife

Across the gangway, in the bunk opposite mine, was Mrs. Ioanid. Her son was in the mountains with Colonel Arsenecu's ~maquis~. Her two daughters were also in jail - one in Mislea, the other with us in Jilava, but in an adjoining cell.

The mother saw her daughter walking in the exercise yard. She had scratched a tiny peep-hole in the painted-out window. Anyone caught near it was immediately punished. But sixty-year-old Mrs. Ioanid was prepared to take any risk for this glimpse of her youngest child. As she gazed tears ran down her face.

Sometimes she clambered painfully up to my bunk and talked of her husband and children. She asked about Richard, who was known to many prisoners by name. How did we first meet? Was he always a pastor? A Jew converted to Christianity? Wasn't that rather rare?

"It's a long story," I said. "And sad and bad at times, as well as happy."

I hadn't until now allowed myself to go far back in memory. But Mrs. Ioanid listened so quietly, sitting in the drab light, her lined face in shadow, that I seemed almost to be talking to myself.

From time to time she would murmur, "Yes?" or make a small exclamation of surprise at what, I had to agree, was a strange story. It began with our first meeting. Richard was twenty-seven and I was four years younger.

p065 The Pastor's Wife

MY CONVERSION

I turned into a street in Bucharest where the Wurmbrands lived. An uncle of mine was a regular caller there and I accompanied him for the first time. I looked up at the house. There was a young man, standing on the balcony and wearing such an angry expression that I almost turned back. Seeing my uncle, he waved and came down. When the greetings and introductions were over he told me bluntly why he had been looking so cross.

"My mother is nagging me to get married. She has the very girl - an heiress with a family business, two houses and million dowry."

"It sounds very nice."

"Yes, I don't mind having the business and the inheritance." He laughed. "It's the girl I don't like! But mother says the best way if I want us all to be rich. And I came out on the balcony and saw you."

He added, jokingly, "The thought came into my mind that if I could have a girl like you I wouldn't care about the million."

I didn't go back to Paris. I took a job in Bucharest, and we met every evening. Richard and I found we had everything in common. Both of us had been poor as children, both of us were Jews who'd put aside our religion.

Richard was an up-and-coming business man, using his keen wits to make good money for the first time. He enjoyed spending it and we went together to night clubs and theatres and didn't think too much about tomorrow. Yet something made him say one evening: "I'm not an easy person. You would suffer a lot with me."

But we were too deeply in love to think of anything else.

We had a religious wedding. A wineglass was smashed on the floor in the traditional way. It was meant to remind us of Jerusalem trodden under the feet of the Gentiles.

Happiness lasted less than a year. Then Richard developed an annoying cough. He came back from the doctor white-faced. It was a tuberculosis: there was a patch on one lung. He must go into a sanatorium at once.

p066 The Pastor's Wife

At that time T.B. was a lingering disease which often proved fatal. I felt as if Richard had been sentenced to death. It seemed the worst tragedy of my life, a cruel and horrible trick which was being played on me at my moment of greatest happiness.

When Richard left for the mountain sanatorium, I went to live with his mother. She was kind but many nights I cried myself to sleep.

Every fortnight I went by train to visit him. The place was beautiful. Calm, with great views across hills and valleys covered with green woods. Richard, after a time, seemed almost content there. He said: "For the first time in my life, I'm resting."

He seemed thankful, and grew better. But a strange change was coming over him.

"I've been thinking about the past. All the people I've harmed. My mother. And many girls you don't know about. I've thought only about myself."

"Don't grieve about it," I said. "I've also lived such a life. This is youth."

One day I found him reading a book given to him by a woman patient in the sanatorium.

"It's about the Brothers Ratisbonne," he said. "They founded an order to convert Jews. Others have been praying for me while I wasted my life."

He talked about Jesus Christ. It was the greatest shock he could have given me. In Orthodox Jewish families like mine it was forbidden at that time to mention Christ's name. We had to look away when we passed a church. I'd outgrown my strict Jewish upbringing, I thought. But that Richard should even think about such things upset me terribly.

I knew all the history of Christian persecution of my people. How Jews were forcibly baptized, and how they had killed their own children and then themselves, in thousands, rather than change their religion. How they were forced to listen to Catholic Masses, and stopped their ears with wax to avoid hearing what they considered blasphemy.

And what we saw around us was not encouraging. The Orthodox church was strongly anti-semitic. So was the Lutheran. The biggest anti-semite body in the country was called the "National Christian Defence League." Its chief activity seemed to consist in beating Jewish students and smashing Jewish shops.

So I couldn't see what, in past or present, might persuade Richard to turn Christian. No one had ever explained to me what it was really about.

Richard grew slowly better. I tried to talk to him about the good times we'd have when he got back to Bucharest. He tried to tell me about his discovery of the New Testament, which told the life of Christ. Before, we hadn't thought of having children. Now Richard was talking about how we should bring them up.

He convalesced in a mountain village. And an uncanny thing happened there. An old man, a carpenter, passed the time of day with us. When he heard that Richard was a Jew, his eyes lit up with excitement. Putting a rough hand on his arm he made this little speech: "I asked God to grant me one favour at the end of my life. Because Christ was a Jew, I wanted to bring a Jew to him. And since there are none here, and I cannot leave the village, God must send me one. And here you are, in answer to my prayer!"

Richard was deeply moved, but my heart sank. Before we left, the carpenter gave him a worn Bible, saying, "my wife and I have prayed for hours over this, asking for your conversion."

Richard read and read in it.

I didn't know what to do. I was utterly dismayed. Few outsiders can guess how strong a hold anti-Christian feelings may have on a Jewish heart. Besides the historical reasons, there were nearly always personal ones. As a child I had to walk home from school past a corner where two bigger girls lay in wait to pull my hair "because you're a dirty little Jewess." And they were Christians. It was a game, of a kind. And then, when I grew up, the Nazi persecution of Jews in Germany began.

Richard told me that Jesus himself was a victim of injustice, but I couldn't bear to hear that forbidden name on his lips.

"I don't need him," I said. "You don't need him. It isn't natural. We're ~Jewish~ - it's another way of life!"

And when he spoke of being baptized, I quite lost my head. "I'd rather die than see you become a Christian. It isn't natural!"

I said that if he had to have religion he could practise his own Jewish faith. And for a time he did. He went to the synagogue, but even there he talked about Christ. Then he persuaded me, frightened but also a little curious, to look inside a church.

It was full of pictures of the saints, and he showed me that half of them were Jews, as were Jesus and his holy Mother Mary. The commandments taught to every child were those of the Jewish Book of Moses. The psalms were the Jewish psalms of King David. The Old Testament was full of arguments and prophecies about Christ.

"The fact is," said Richard as he led me around the strange, vaulted building, "that the Christian religion is simply our Jewish faith opened to all the nations of the earth."

Who made it possible that Jewish values, morals and wisdom should prevail throughout the world? Should reach to so many hundreds of millions over two thousand years? Only Christ could have done it. Because of his work the Holy Book of the Jews had been translated from Hebrew into a thousand languages and dialects. And now the Bible was read by ignorant peasants and by the greatest scientists - Pasteur, Einstein ...

So with patient arguments over many nights, Richard wore down my objections. I read the New Testament. I admired and loved the Saviour. But I felt in sympathy with Gandhi when he said: "From Christianity give me Christ and you can keep all the rest." I wanted nothing to do with his followers who had wronged my people.

Richard wouldn't have this. "You can't accept Jesus without accepting his disciples. He would not leave them to come to you. And you can't accept the disciples without calling even Judas a friend, as Jesus did."

In time, my intellectual objections were overcome, but I knew that the emotional ones were still there. They grew not weaker but stronger: for while my mind whispered: "He's right," my heart, my whole upbringing were in revolt. For weeks more this internal struggle raged within me.

One evening Richard walked in from a prayer meeting at the Anglican Church Mission to the Jews. He took my hands in his and said he had "surrendered his heart to Christ." Soon he would be baptized.

I'd thought of myself as a tough, resilient character. But the news was more than I could bear. I shut myself alone in my room for hours. And I decided that on the day he was baptized I would kill myself.

When it came, and I was left alone, I locked my door and threw myself down on the floor, wracked with dry sobs. A terrible emptiness, a windy desert, stretched away inside me. In my desperation, I cried aloud: "Jesus, I can't come to you, I don't want Richard to be yours, I can't bear any more!"

I shocked myself with the force of my own cry. I lay there for a long time, sobbing.

And then, slowly, I grew calmer.

Something had changed within me. Life began to flow back.

When Richard returned from baptism, which had been done in another town, I went with flowers to meet him at the station. He was so happy. And we sat up until late at night, discussing all that had happened. I saw now that I had been quietly moving towards this change with a silent force I hadn't understood, although all the while I'd thought my mind was in charge.

But if I'd given way, I wasn't yet prepared to call myself a Christian. I was young. I wanted to go to parties and dances and cinemas. Not to sit listening to sermons in churches.

To humour me, sometimes Richard would agree. At a party we went to one Sunday evening I suddenly realized that I was not enjoying myself in the least. The noise and the drink and the smoke and the jokes grew worse. And everything about the conversation was either boring or disgusting. My thoughts were no longer there. I said to Richard, "Can't we leave?"

To my surprise, he said it would be rude to go so early. Reading my mind, he kept me there on one pretext or another. Until I felt sick of the whole thing. Until I felt almost physically unclean.

Very late, as we were going home, I said impulsively, "Richard, I'd like to be baptized at once!"

He smiled.

"You've waited a long time. Let's wait now until tomorrow."

He took me next day to meet his new friends from the Anglican Mission, Pastor Adeney, a saintly man, and Pastor Ellison, who also seemed to me to belong to another world. Both had given up everything for their ministry and from them I learnt a Christianity that meant sacrifice and self-renunciation.

I was overflowing with such happiness that I had to share it. On the day after my baptism I hurried to work and told a friend, a Jewish girl, never doubting that she'd be won over too. (I'd forgotten already what I'd been through myself!) But the more I said about my change of heart, the less she wished to hear.

"So now I've lost you!" she said, and turned away, weeping. We'd been very close.

It was only the first lesson.

After my conversion I had a child. We hadn't wanted children in the past, fearing that they'd interfere with our gay life. Our son Mihai was born in 1939. Already the darkest clouds were gathered over Rumania. We were in Hitler's orbit, and we knew that Jews must soon be uprooted. So everything in reason pointed against having a child. But we had Mihai. How glad we are today to have him!

Richard's mother was almost as proud as we were. On the first day she hurried to tell all the relations: "The very image of Richard, and so intelligent!"

Richard told me, "He's dark like you, and very beautiful. But he only cries; when will he say something clever?"

We were so happy.

***

By the time I had finished my story, the evening was almost

p070 The Pastor's Wife

gone. Around the cell, quarrels and arguments were taking their inevitable course. Arms and gesturing hands cast an embroidery of shadows on the ceiling and the cell hummed like an angry hive, as women settled slowly in for the night.

p071 The Pastor's Wife

PROMISES

Men's voices sounded in the corridor. Boots stamped smartly. The great door swung open.

"Stand up!"

A posse of guards filed through the door. After them came nine officers. They stood in a semicircle just inside the cell. Braid glittered on their clean, well-pressed uniforms. Facing them, the ragged band of women with long, greasy hair. No one spoke. The officers stared at us in disgust, and one held a handkerchief to his nose. Then they filed out again, with no word said. The door crashed shut.

We had been inspected for the first and last time in Jilava.

Uproar! Everyone had a theory as to what it meant, for in prison it means something if there are three beans rather than two in the soup.

"Don't ask me how I know, dear," Viorica told her friends. "But the Americans have delivered an ultimatum to Moscow! I heard it yesterday, but I didn't believe it then. Now, this is for your ears only!"

The "secret" was around the cell in a flash. Chattering women in every bunk played endless variations on the theme. They saw themselves free and acclaimed as national heroines. The Americans were coming! If they hadn't already arrived.

It kept us happy until the door was again flung open.

"Come and get it! Carrot soup, my ladies!"

The stench of the steaming keg had preceded its arrival. But many older women didn't stir. They were by now too weak. This lethal diet - although we couldn't guess it then - was part of our preparation for the labour camps. It certainly exposed the weak ones. The "inspection," too, was a preliminary to the move. Our fate had been decided without reference to America.

"It's slave labour, of course," a young teacher told us. "But at the Canal you get a pound and a half of bread a day. And macaroni!"

What bliss! Jilava overflowed with rumours. Every neweomer had something to add about the Canal's wonders. The huge project, which would cost billions, had long been talked about.

The Canal was to run for forty miles across the bare plains of southern Rumania, to link the Danube with the Black Sea.

Millions of tons of rock had to be blasted. Special factories were built to make the cement. Plant was hired from Russia at exorbitant fees. An army of engineers, clerks, administrators was already at work. An entire new government department had been set up, and all Rumania's economy centred on the Canal.

In the labour camps which had gone up along the route it was said that one might even receive parcels.

"Whatever you like from home!"

"Chocolate!"

Chocolate was everyone's dream.

Warm clothes were freely available, and medical attention, at the Canal.

But better than all this: at the Canal you could see your children and your husband – not merely for a brief visit, but for the whole day.

We believed all this. We thought about little else.

"But not everyone will have the right to go," warned Viorica. "As the political officer said to me just the other day, 'in a Socialist society work is a privilege that's not for bandits.'"

Overcrowding in Jilava grew worse. Cell 4 had space for thirty people. By Christmas 1950 there were eighty. You couldn't move without treading on bodies lying in the aisle. How the air stank!

We were overjoyed to be taken out, one morning, for a bath. But this happiness, like all prison delights, was short-lived. Along dark corridors we hurried, pushed and pummelled by male warders. The sudden exercise was too much for women who had lain on their backs for months, and some collapsed.

"Five minutes! Five minutes!" bellowed a young lieutenant with a gypsy face. "Undress, shower and get out here again. And no talking! Or you'll all be punished."

Immediately a woman screeched. And turned on the woman behind her.

"You trod on my sore heel!"

A murmured apology came.

"Perhaps you don't know who I am?"

But we all knew that: she was one of the worst informers in the cell. Calmly, although still breathless from the race along the passages, the offending woman – who was nearly seventy replied:

p073 The Pastor's Wife

"My dear, I scarcely know who I am myself. How could I know who you are?"

A frenzied shrilling rent the air. The lieutenant blew fiercely on a whistle. Red with anger, he shouted:

"No showers! Back to your cells! Move!"

And along the dark corridors, smelling of urine, guards struck out. And swore.

Back in Cell 4, we heard shouting from next door. Some were demanding revenge on the informer. Others wanted to punish the frail old lady who, it appeared, was the wife of a former National Party Leader, one of the country's greatest democrats. Poor Mrs. Mihalache! She played only an accidental role in this farce.

The truth came later – the showers didn't work. The plumbing had broken down. Yet the order had come from above: baths! How to wash so many women without water? The head warder solved the problem by arranging for the informer to create a disturbance.

Mrs. Mihalache's poignant answer spread through the jail. How could we know who we were? Our families, belongings, identities had been taken away. But does a caterpillar know that it will turn into a butterfly? Perhaps in Cell 4, cocooned in suffering, future saints were being made.

Corporal Georgescu arrived next morning with a sheet of paper in her hand. "Everyone on this list must be ready to move at once!"

Expectant silence.

"May we know who's on the list?" Mrs. Gavriloiu dared.

"Don't give ~me~ orders!" She grasped Mrs. Gavriloiu's dress threateningly. "Here!" she pushed the list at her. "Go on, read it to them. You all make me sick!"

Georgescu read with difficulty, and the list was handwritten. The names were read out and the group left the cell. No reason was given for their departure. Few now believed they could be going home. But nothing could be worse than Jilava!

We watched them go enviously. Taking pity, women who were leaving gave away precious odds and ends.

"Would you like this handkerchief, Sabina? I'm afraid it's not too clean." Mrs. Ioanid offered the article that had served her as towel, table napkin and much else.

Sister Veronica, the nun, gave me a long, pleated black underskirt. "Take it, take it!" she begged. "I have another one and there must be ten degrees of frost outside."

I took it. The skirt trailed on the ground, but my legs were warm. Sister Veronica kissed me cheerfully and hurried off, perhaps to her death.

And I went on waiting, day by day, for my name to be called.

I remember January 6th, 1951 I'd been lying in my bunk with my head full of memories, for it was Mihai's birthday. Richard had decided before the birth that we'd have a boy, and even when he'd arrive. One evening he said, "Enough is enough. If he doesn't appear by 9 p.m. I'll call a taxi and take you to the hospital." "But I have no pangs." "I'll decide in this family when you have pangs!" So he did take me to hospital and when he came next morning he had a son to look at.

After a difficult birth, I was in the post-operation ward. "How about another," he said. "I'd like two. But quicker this time." And I'd smiled and said, "Sorry - it can't be done." But how happy we'd been. Now Mihai was eleven.

That day my name was on the list.

I was out of Cell 4 by 8 a.m. and waiting in the corridor. My light summer coat was returned. Georgescu and the guards were quite comically polite to the line of waiting women. They knew no more than we did about our fate. And perhaps we'd meet again in altered circumstances. The Americans might yet come!

All day we hung about, bitterly cold. Women from other cells joined us. At last we climbed into trucks which drove to Ghencea, a transit camp near Bucharest.

I saw barrack huts where men and women sat working. We were led across iron-hard earth, under the winter stars. What heaven! After so many months underground in Jilava, I could look up and see the moon sailing through little clouds. Friend of lovers! How often she'd obliged by hiding her face in the old days, when Richard kissed me in the street!

Ghencea was an old German army barracks, a great barbed-wire-enclosed space of dilapidated wooden huts with outside lavatories. Discipline was lax. You could walk through a door and talk to people from the other huts unhindered. For a moment, unhappiness was washed from our minds. Through the clear, frosty air came cries of greeting.

"Release?!" cried a lanky girl with dark eyes, on hearing the hopeful talk of new arrivals. "What an idea! This is the departure point for the Canal. You'll be packed off there in a few days."

Now there was more news of the Canal. How labour camps and new towns were springing up along the route. A new deep sea harbour was being built at Tasaul. The whole Karasu Valley must be drained.

On the third day I was brought before the commandant, Captain Zaharia Ion, who had been a Party member since the Twenties.

p075 The Pastor's Wife

His emaciated body moved loosely in the carapace of its grandiose uniform. I must have looked startled. He smiled from a skull-like head.

"Do you know why I look like this?" he demanded. "Because I starved in jail under the bourgeoisie! People like you!"

I said I was sorry if he had been unjustly imprisoned. "But I don't belong to the bourgoisie." He looked at me thoughtfully.

"I'll make you an offer."

Instead of going to work on the Canal I could stay as a privileged detainee in comparative comfort at Ghencea. All I need do was report to him in confidence on the prisoners from time to time.

"Thank you," I said. "But in the Bible you can read of two traitors, one who betrayed King David and one who betrayed Jesus. Both hanged themselves. I don't want such an end, so I won't become an informer."

"Then you won't see freedom again!"

As for Captain Zaharia Ion, none of his 'bourgeois' persecutors was as merciless as his Communist comrades proved to be, for they arrested him on false charges later and he died in prison. Now he has been officially 'rehabilitated.' Will this comfort the soul in whose existence neither he nor his brutal masters believed?

In a shunting yard near Bucharest we boarded a train at last for the Canal. The long, black ~duba~ (prison wagon) was crowded not only with "politicals' but with thieves, street-walkers and gypsies. We were pushed through the sliding doors by ill-tempered guards. We sat in half-darkness waiting to move. Light filtered through small, barred windows, high up. At last we began to creak slowly south.

Once I glimpsed a shining stretch of water. River banks of thick green grass. I remembered the river Prut which ran near my home town. In the woods we picked wild strawberries to eat with sugar and cream.

It was many hours later that the train stopped and we tumbled out, tired and aching. CERNAVODA, read a sign on the platform. The name of a small town by the Danube. The camp was miles away. We began to march through the black, wintry night. At last we passed through gates strung with barbed-wire, under tall watch-towers. Searchlights played over rows of identical huts.

p076 The Pastor's Wife

PART 2:

THEL

As our group entered one of the huts at the end of the line a shout of greeting went up from the crowd gathered inside.

"Valiea! Good old Valiea!"

She ran forward to be embraced.

Valiea was a gypsy of a girl of about twenty-six, and an accomplished thief. Many gypsies stole, but Valiea's exploits were famous. She was taken under the wing of the gypsy leader, an older woman with a lovely hooked nose and torrents of jet-black hair. They found her a bed, gave her food, chattered together like starlings.

I knew no one and no one knew me. Or looked at me. It was late on Saturday evening, and they were sprawling about after the day's work. I looked around for a place, but there were already too many prisoners for the few beds. So I sat down on the floor, and at once a woman on the next bed began to tell me about her daughter. She didn't know if the girl had also been arrested, or if she'd been thrown out on the street.

"But the great thing here is that we can hope for a ~vorbitor~ (official permit for visits from relatives). We can even ask them to bring clothes!"

This news, the thought that I might see Mihai kept me awake all night. I turned it over and over in my head. Towards dawn I dozed. And woke up with heart pounding. There was a scuttling and squeaking in the dark.

"Beast!" gasped the woman beside me. "It jumped on my bed!"

Now I recognized that acrid, animal smell. Rats!

An educated voice a little further on said mildly, "Really, the rats have more reason to consider us a nuisance than we them. They've been here longer. By some generations."

Another said, cheerfully, "You should save some bread for them at night. Keeps them from biting."

On Sunday morning, after a night on the floorboards, I hoped for rest and a chance to wash and repair our clothes. It was a vain hope.

The whole female section of the camp was ruled by a woman prisoner with a long criminal record. Biddable Rina had been chosen by the camp commandant for her hatred of politicals. While the criminal prisoners lounged about, the politicals were down on their knees scrubbing and scraping the floor.

"All new arrivals will gather outside for a visit to the bathhouse," she cried.

We lined up and were marched away over the frozen mud under an escort of armed guards.

Among the educated women and well brought-up young girls were a handful of prostitutes. They squeaked and shrieked and, in the way of obscenity, gave as good as they got.

The guards laughed, and stamped their boots. Rina had wrapped her head in a coloured scarf, from which her small nose emerged like a pig's snout as, cackling, she urged them on.

The world spun round. The wet concrete floor came up to hit me. The strain of the journey, the hunger and shame made me faint. I was carried back to the hut and placed on a bed.

Now a strange thing happened. I was thrown a jacket and skirt of sack-like material in dirty grey and white stripes. My stockings were full of holes. But I still wore the long, pleated skirt given me by the nun in Jilava. With my black hair and Jewish looks, I must have had an outlandish appearance.

The politicals looked me over and decided I was not one of them. So reasoned the gypsies, I was one of ~them~.

I said, "I assure you I'm not. I can't speak your language."

The hook-nosed old woman looked wise, and patted my arm. "We know, dear. We know." They were convinced that, for some reason of my own, I was trying to hide my race. From that time on in Cernavoda, I was an adopted gypsy.

Wherever they are, gypsies live a life apart. But in Eastern Europe, Rumania was their favourite country. They roamed about in their caravans, the men wearing their hair long and well-oiled, the women in ankle-length skirts and rich petticoats. They were strikingly beautiful and many of them stole anything they put their hands on.

The Communists sent thousands of them to prisons or to the labour camps, where they continued to steal. It was impossible to hang up an old piece of clothing or a rag. Anything, everything vanished under those capacious petticoats.

p078 The Pastor's Wife

Almost alone among political prisoners at the Canal, I lost nothing.

Richard and I helped the gypsies when they poured from Nazi camps at the end of the war. Now I had my reward.

They said I'd be re-united with my husband and child and travel over many seas and lands to find happiness. I didn't expect to wait fifteen years, though.

They did a good business out of fortune-telling. Women would give their bread away for the sake of hearing that they would be released soon, that their families would prosper. The gypsies had no cards, but they foretold the future by a still older means which may go back to their time under Tamerlane and Genghis Khan. They threw grains of corn on the floor and found hopeful wonders in the pattern they made.

Being nomads, gypsies settled anywhere. Even in prison, they were like a great family. Later, when we were allowed to send postcards to relatives, I acted as their scribe - none of them could read or write - and every message had to begin: "To all the gypsy folk, greetings!"

Sometimes furious quarrels flared among them - it is no legend that sometimes gypsy women use their babies as clubs to beat each other and do not stop until both children are dead. At other times they would dance and sing wildly to forget where they were.

In time I came to know everyone in the hut, including the street girls. Some had beautiful natures, and when they heard the call of Jesus did their best to rise above the mud into which they had been thrown by life.

Next day, early in the morning, we left the camp. A cold wind blew across the plain from the Black Sea. The guards chafed their hands as we waited to move off, surly and resentful at parting from their warm bunks. If we stirred, they worked off their feelings with blows and swearing.

At the gates, under the iron watch-towers, the leading guard shouted: "Taking out 2,000 criminals and counter- revolutionaries!" Or whatever was the number for the day.

The bitter wind blew in our faces and tore at our clothing. The column, it seemed, was endless. I looked forward and saw only ranks of prisoners with armed guards stamping at their sides. Sometimes I dared to look back (which was forbidden) and saw the column stretching away into the distance like one single, enormous beast, an entity with a life of its own. A blind, hopeless beast, the sum of all those bodies and arms and legs, with no purpose but to toil until it dropped. I thought of the slaves in ancient times. Of my forefathers in Egypt who laboured on the Pharaonic works.

We were building an embankment, men and women together.

I had to keep filling a wheelbarrow with earth. Each time the barrow was full a male prisoner had to push it 200 yards, then run with it up a sharp incline to the parapet of the dam. He tipped out the earth and ran back for more. The men's task was harder than ours, but after the first few barrow-loads I staggered whenever I tried to lift the heavy shovel of earth over the side.

Each gang had a "brigade-chief" with several helpers to check how much work you could do. The "norm" required could be anything up to eight cubic metres a day. If, after tremendous efforts, we fulfilled the norm it was raised next day by so many barrowloads. If we failed to fulfill it we were punished.

The "brigadiers" were trusted prisoners. They had special rations - even some pay. And never did a stroke of work themselves. They ruled with powers of life and death. Rina wielded hers to the full.

Talking, and all other forms of human contact were forbidden, but I risked saying a few cheerful words to my companion as I filled the barrow, and quoted the Bible. He looked at me startled - a middle-aged man who looked like a peasant. Then he seized his wheelbarrow and trundled away. Another man came, another barrow. And another. And another.

Then a fourth man said, "Count Rakosi thanks you for your beautiful words and he wants to know who you are."

The "peasant" was a Hungarian aristocrat from Transylvania, a Rumanian province thickly populated with Hungarians which had been under Habsburg rule for centuries. I was so surprised that I left my spade for a moment in the earth.

"Come on! Wake up!" It was Rina's voice from twenty yards off. "Do you want a night in the carcer?"

I began to dig with frenzied strength. The man lifted his barrow and scuttled away.

"Carcer" was a word to freeze the blood. A box six feet high and two and a half foot wide, it was a common punishment in Canal camps. There, after a day's work, you had to stand without moving the whole night. Next day you went back to work again, with a good chance if tired of being ordered back to the carcer that night for not working quickly enough.

We were given a pound of bread at midday, with some soup and oats. It was an improvement on Jilava, but a mockery of our hopes. And on this we had to work on until the end of the day.

Looking around at our emaciated crew, I thought it was no wonder that I hadn't recognized a Count. It was hard to tell one man from the next. All were in patched and ragged clothes. All wore the same expression, in which a kind of blank longing was replaced only by fear.

Yet some had been university dons and some editors; some priests, or business men, or high civil servants. Impossible now to tell them from the thieves, pimps and pickpockets who worked beside them.

We toiled on for another four hours. Light failed, and the great column formed up for the return to camp. On the way several prisoners collapsed. One fell beside me: without a word, two of the stronger men picked him up, placed his arms around their shoulders and moved on. An old woman was borne pick- aback, her stiff legs stood out in stockings full of holes. There was a disturbance up ahead. A man had fallen and couldn't be revived. He was dragged to the side of the road. And hoisted on to the shoulders of three grumbling shapes in the growing dusk. The wind never stopped blowing.

At the gates, the leading guard shouted again: "Returning 2,000 bandits!"

It was dark. In the West, the sky still glowed with a reddish tint.

"Bracing breeze!" one of the guards called, cheerfully, wrapped in his greateoat.

I was chilled to the marrow. My hands and feet were blistered. Every muscle ached and my head felt as if it was someone else's property. Tomorrow, I'd have a streaming cold.

And now we had to wait, a dark herd huddling in the wind, as the head of the column squeezed through the gates. Other columns from different work-points had converged on the entrance, causing a long delay.

When at last we got inside the hut, a squabble broke out. One of the street girls discovered that something she'd hidden beneath her mattress was gone.

"Thieving gypsies!" she cried. "I may be a whore, but at least I keep my hands off other people's things!"

Which brought a reply from Tania, a gypsy girl, who added: "I might have stolen, but at least I never slept with anyone but my own man."

Lisa a Moldavian, shrieked, "Who's that? Your brother?" and cackled at her sad joke. Gypsies often had to sleep in one room: man, wife, mother, mother-in-law, sister-in-law; sometimes in the same bed.

But Lisa was herself a murderer. She'd killed her woman-chasing husband with a shotgun, out of jealousy.

"Don't teach me how to behave!" Tania cried. "I can give back what I take if I want. You who've taken a man's life, can you give it back?"

I tried to shut my ears to this high moral argument. After further rowdy exchanges, Tania stalked back to the thieves' corner. The others received her with cheers, which she acknowledged with a grin.

Tall and pretty, with glistening black hair, Tania was highly respected by her colleagues. And feared, too. The adventures she recounted with such gusto had earned her the name ~ Black-Hand Tania~. Anyone who offended her ran the risk of being expelled from the circle. Anyone who cheated her ran the risk of a night in the carcer, for Tania was not above tipping off the guards about some real or invented crime to punish an enemy. Yet her loyalty to friends was absolute and touching. And she was so proud of her skills. Her riotous account of half-emptying a dress shop had the younger girls in fits of laughter. She picked out the sharpest among them for private tuition, and showed keen character judgement.

The girls had an almost mystical admiration for her ability. They reported that Tania was "always reading books and stuff outside prison, and had once broken into a house when the owners were out and found herself in a library. She began reading and became engrossed, but after a time fell asleep in an armchair with a volume in her hand.

The owners discovered her there when they returned from the theatre. Tania herself didn't admit to being literate, considering it bad for her reputation.

One learnt to distinguish quickly between thieves, prostitutes, gangster's ~molls~ and so on. Years spent in a specific sin had left deep imprints on their souls. By their tricks of speech and behaviour you knew immediately, with no questions asked, what you were dealing with. But Tania was an independent. She was not without nobility.

To me she would say jokingly, "Don't believe that we thieves are without morals. On moral grounds I am decidedly against any theft committed by another gang than mine."

I tried, cautiously, to knock at the door of her heart. I wanted to understand her better. I asked if, as so many were leaving Rumania, Jews and refugees from Communism, she wouldn't also like to get out.

p082 The Pastor's Wife

"To hell with that!" She looked at me scomfully. "All I'm waiting for is to get out of this dump and be together with my boy friend. They couldn't catch ~him~! I'm going to show these so-and-so Communists what we can do." Without any restraint she tattled on about this paragon's underworld adventure, his looks and other abilities.

What about her parents?

"Oh, my parents!" As if she spoke of some worn-out pieces of furniture. "They're a useless pair. My mother had looks as a girl so she had men, too. Then she had me. Exit Dad! Whoever he was. She ended up with a dirty old drunk who used to wallop her every night. And lots of other kids."

Tania pepper-and-salted her talk with so many obscenities that after a time you ceased to hear them. It was like becoming used to a speech defect. I pitied her. I longed to touch just one string of her soul and start an echo there. I hated to see her corrupting others with no trace to regret.

And the great lover, it turned out, was her brother-in-law. The prostitute's gibe had been near the mark. She'd had to share a room with six others, and a bed with her sister and the husband. So it happened. She was twelve at the time. And had been taught to steal from the age of five.

Another day, she burst out:

"Yes, I know - 'thou shalt not steal.' That's what the police said when they beat me up, the so-and-sos. I told them , ~you~ are the so-and-so thieves. You've pinched all the land, all the houses, the whole so-and-so country. Are you telling ~me~ what to do? Sitting on your fat so-and-sos in plushy offices. You ought to try sleeping summer and winter under the bridges in Bucharest and then come and tell me not to steal." She laughed harshly. "Oh, they lammed into me. I lost all my front teeth. I've got this new plate now." She took it out to show me.

Her eyes flashed. A few of her admirers who'd gathered around nodded sympathy.

"Tania, you're wonderful. I'd never have the nerve," said Joana, a fluffy young girl who'd been doxy to a Bucharest gangster. He'd ditched her when the police came and was now safe in Paris.

The other girls looked at me for approval. I said:

"Tania, you have great courage. With your energy and sharpness, you could do a lot better for yourself. Just because your parents were duds, it doesn't mean that you have to be. Lots of great men and women had useless parents, or grew up as orphans. If you directed your mind in the right way, perhaps you could reach greatness, too."

"Me, famous? Doing what?" She suggested some profane possibilities. "Don't get me wrong. I LIKE stealing. It's my life, it's what I'm born to do?"

I ventured an example. "One very great man began life as a swindler, a racketeer. He was called Matthew. But when he met the Lord, he was so moved, so enchanted with his goodness, that he left everything he had and became Matthew the Disciple. A thief became a saint, forgiven and loved throughout the world to this day. A martyr of the church, the author of the gospel read in the whole world."

"Disciple, saint, martyr! Where does she find all these words?" Tania mocked.

The gulf between criminal and political prisoners (all those arrested for religious motives were considered politicals) was not often bridged. It was always the convicted women who got the jobs as norm-checkers or room-chiefs, making life hell for any member of the former middle or upper classes. The thieves addressed them sarcastically as "Madam" and found a hundred small ways to take their revenge. The politicals neither wanted nor tried to make contact with their neighbours. Standing half-way between the two groups - a gypsy-Jewish-Christian talking with love to the worst criminals in the hut and reproaching sin in ladies of high rank - I naturally earned black looks from several sides.

Cernavoda was full of famous names. A breezy society column could have been composed about their doings. In the third person, perhaps. "Queuing for the toilet this morning, Bystander noticed Countess X chatting with former lady-in-waiting, Baroness Y, over the latest kitchen rumour that all graves of socially opprobrious personalities are to be opened and gold and jewelry removed for the benefit of the State."

What strange meetings we saw!

One working party consisted of fascist women. Their chief was Mrs. Codreanu, wife of the Iron Guard leader who had helped to push Rumania into alliance with the Nazis. He had boasted in a book that he'd never shaken hands with a Jew, or entered a Jewish shop.

Now Mrs. Codreanu slaved for the Communists alongside Jewish women. But the prejudice was unchanged.

"That criminal Churchill!" she raged. "A Zionist, a Jewish stooge And Roosevelt, surely a Jew himself! It's because of them we're here today."

The guards were ruthless to these women. Fellow-prisoners attacked them. But they had courage. Because I tried to show them understanding and love, one of them approached me:

p084 The Pastor's Wife

"My friends and I have decided that when all Rumania's Jews are wiped out, dear, you and your family will be spared."

She was surprised that I didn't receive the news with enthusiasm.

Wives of other politicians and women who'd been involved in politics themselves held long discussions on how the world should be run. One said to me, "I've been awake all night thinking out a plan for the future - do you want to hear it?"

I wasn't given any alternative.

"First, there must be a complete military reform. All the uniforms must be royal blue with big shakoes ..."

I said: "Thank you very much - there's no need to develop the plan further. If all the uniforms are royal blue, that'll be just enough."

But sometimes people who seemed foolish or downright wicked had lessons to teach. An Orthodox sister in our hut swore, told spicy stories and stole like a gypsy.

I asked, "But think, how will you be saved?"

She laughed. "A monk taught me how to be saved. I keep two commandments without fail. I never judge another. And I always forgive those who sin against me. So God will be obliged to forgive me, too."

Not the best theology; but I was glad to hear it, for she really had the virtues she claimed.

In 1951 more and more Communist women began appearing in the camps and prisons. At Cernavoda I met Marioara Dragoescu, who'd been imprisoned by the old regime as a leading revolutionary. Now she was sent to forced labour by her comrades as a "counter-revolutionary."

But she would go on fighting for the Communist ideal. The Great Marxist Society was around the corner. In Mislea, the big women's prison, she had nursed her two-month child - then it had been taken from her and put in a State orphanage. She didn't know if she'd ever see it again.

She'd commiserated with George Cristescu, one of the Party founders, who'd served his first prison sentence for Socialism in 1907. He'd also been the first Secretary-General of the Communist Party. Now, at seventy-two, he worked alongside us in the fields from sunrise to sunset, in snow, rain and wind.

Sometimes I filled his barrow with earth. He'd hitched himself to it like a beast. It was easier to pull than to push up the slopes. I remembered something Richard said shortly before his arrest and repeated it to him: "Under a tyranny, prison is the most honourable place to be."

p085 The Pastor's Wife

A smile lit his face. A guard shouted at him and he hurried off, yoked to his load. Next day when we were out together, I whispered: "I'm sorry to get you into trouble with my speaking."

"No, speak! It's like music to hear something different after so long. I've hungered to hear a gentle voice as I hunger for colour after so much grey."

Later he told me of his disillusion. "This Communism they practise is not the ideal I fought and suffered for. I felt it would be dishonest on my part not to protest."

Those of us who had faith realized for the first time how rich we were. The youngest Christians and the weakest had more resources to call upon than the wealthiest old ladies and the most brilliant intellectuals.

People with good brains, education, wit, when deprived of their books and concerts, often seemed to dry up like indoor plants exposed to the winds. Heart and mind were empty.

Mrs. Nailescu, the professor's wife from Cluj, said one day: "How happy you must be to be able to think and keep your mind busy and pray! I can't. I try to remember a poem, and in comes the guard shouting. At once my mind goes back to this everlasting camp. I can't concentrate. I can't discipline myself."

"Society" women were often the most pitiful. Life was harder for them than for anyone. They'd lost most, in the material sense; and they had fewest inner resources to fill the gap. A rubble of old games of bridge, hats, hotels, first-nights, lost weekends and lovers rattled about in their heads like junk in the back seat of a car. Their nerves gave way first, as did their soft white hands.

After work, women came to religious prisoners and asked, begged even, to be told something of what we remembered from the Bible. The words gave hope, comfort, life.

We had no Bible. We ourselves hungered for it more than bread. How I wished I'd learnt more of it by heart! But we repeated daily those passages we knew. And at night also, when we held vigils for prayer. Other Christians, like me, had deliberately committed long passages to memory, knowing that soon their turn would come for arrest. They brought riches to prison. While others quarrelled and fought, we lay on our mattresses and used the Bible for prayer and meditation, and repeated its verses to ourselves through the long nights. We learnt what neweomers brought and taught them what we knew. So an unwritten Bible circulated through all Rumania's prisons.

Meditation goes deeper and deeper. In the first stage, what meditates is not your true self, but what you had mistakenly supposed to be yourself - that is, a conglomerate of what you know from newspapers, books and the cinema. What is You in yourself is very small. In the second stage you must put aside more and more what is not You, what is borrowed, so as to reach the final reality in You. Once you have become Yourself again, it becomes relatively easy to communicate with a person whom you love. At a certain moment, as with a writer when an idea becomes a picture in his mind, you see the one on whom you meditate. Jesus said: "Blessed are the pure in heart for they shall see God," but not only God.

I conversed often with Richard, especially during the years he spent in solitary confinement. He transmitted messages to me. I had a deep inner certainty that we were in contact, that he was present. I was quite sure that he received my thoughts too. These moments recurred through all the fourteen years of his imprisonment, and for long after I was free. I have a note in my Bible, dated in pencil, 1953, some months after my release: Richard came to see me today; he bent over me as I was reading.

I always feared that he, too, might have been sent to one of the slave camps. How could he stand up to such work? Just writing and preaching used to consume all his strength. When a woman told me he was dead, I didn't believe her.

I'd asked everyone at the Canal if they'd had word of Richard, always frightened of the wrong answer, but no one knew anything. Then, three women arrived from Vacaresti, a prison where many of the sick were taken. Every new arrival was like the coming of the postman. We asked the usual questions, hoping for news of our relatives in jail. None had heard of Richard.

A few days later a woman from this group came to me.

"Every time you speak of God I remember Vacaresti," she said. "I was only there a short time, but we had a preacher there, too."

Vacaresti was a converted monastery. Walls between the monks' rooms had been knocked down to make bigger cells. But a few small alcoves remained where special prisoners could be isolated.

"We were waiting on the landing to use the bathroom," said the woman, "when a man was heard talking from behind a locked door. He was saying, "Love Jesus and trust in God's kindness." We were so surprised. Everyone in the prison asked who he was. But it was kept secret, of course."

Now she had met me, she was sure it was Richard. He seemed very ill. After some days he stopped preaching. She heard that he had died.

How many tears, in secrecy, streamed down my face. How the pain tore at my heart. But through this grief, hope grew. I continued to pray, and asked the Lord to add years of life and health to the man who served him faithfully even in the isolation cell.

I was worried that even Mihai might be arrested and sent to the Canal. He was twelve, and boys no older were there. Every day I saw a boy called Marin Motza, of the same age, with his fourteen-year-old sister. Their father was a former Iron Guard leader. He had mixed anti-semitism with a deep orthodox faith. When during the Spanish Civil War anarchists desecrated the churches, he said, "They are shooting in the face of Christ. I can bear no more." And he went to Spain and died there fighting on the side of the future dictator, Franco.

What contradictions there are in the human heart! He left a wonderful Christian testament. In this he said: "When Christ promised that the gates of hell should not prevail against his church, he counted on the church fighting. This assurance doesn't stand if Christians do not do their duty." How true a thought!

Now his wife and children were imprisoned simply because they had belonged to him. Mrs. Motza had an ~id,e fixe~: "My son Marin will be king of Rumania when Communism is overthrown, since the exiled King Michael will never come back."

The whole Iron Guard movement was full of inner contradictions. Its founder, Codreanu, killed and patronized the killings of men who hadn't even committed the crime of being Jews. But among his last words were: "It does not count how a man dies; only how he resurrects." He was strangled by his adversaries.

At Cernavoda camp we were given postcards and told we might write to invite our families to visit us on a certain Sunday. I suspected a trick: weren't we being duped into naming some friend who would then be watched and followed by the Secret Police? So I spent days asking myself: who can I write to? And will they be still there to receive my card? So many had been arrested.

Everyone around me was writing postcards. Each asking herself if there was someone at home to answer. If there was a home. There would be sons who had lost their faith or been arrested, husbands in prison or living with other women. I saw so many tragedies ahead.

But when the great day arrived, no tragedies were revealed; for though our relatives came we were not permitted to meet them.

I woke on Sunday long before reveille was sounded at 5 a.m. The light was on (it was forbidden to switch it off) and outside it looked still like the middle of the night. There was ice on the panes. I longed for morning to come.

And at last it did. I ran out hoping to see the visitors waiting in the compound by the gates. It was a long way off, separated from the camp itself by three fences of barbed wire and an outer zone - no-man's-land that you could not enter.

There I saw my son. Taller, slimmer, in poor clothes. I recognized the man at his side as the pastor of our church. (Since then tragic events have created a gap between him and us, but we remember and are thankful for the great help he and his wife gave in difficult times and if he hates us now we never cease to love him.)

I waved and waved, but they could not see me among all the other women lining the wire. I hurried back to the hut to tell the lady who had the bed next to mine.

She looked at me. At my stained and ragged dress, my odd shoes, the remains of my light summer coat, the piece of string that was my belt.

"You'll frighten the poor child if he sees you like that," she said. "Borrow my blouse - at least it's in one piece."

Tania offered a long, bright gypsy skirt. Valia draped a white headscarf around my hair. Stockings, even a grubby handkerchief, were loaned to me. While we were admiring my new elegance a row broke out in the room.

Rina was in the middle of it, crowing triumphantly. We were to be punished. So many people had failed to fulfill their work norms over the past week that the visit was cancelled.

They had travelled all night from Bucharest, had spent the savings they needed so desperately, for nothing. We could not speak. We could not even receive the clothes and food they'd brought with them.

The group of visitors, about thirty, waited all day at the gates in the hope that the Commandant would change her mind. She didn't. We had no chance even to look at them or wave any more. Throughout the day, guards drove us away from the fence. Guns in the watch-towers were trained on us. From time to time a woman who'd been able to pass by the wire reported: "They're still there!" But in the evening they were gone.

It seemed unlikely that I should ever see Mihai if they were going to insist on everyone fulfilling the work norms. A great number of prisoners had come from Jilava. Hunger and illness left them too weak to meet the ever-increasing demands made upon them.

But we could write again. There was another issue of postcards.

p089 The Pastor's Wife

And several Sundays later, Mihai again made the journey to Cernavoda. This time there was no punishment. But the visitors proceeded alphabetically, and my name always came last. The day might pass without my turn arriving.

Borrowed clothes went from woman to woman.

"How do I look?"

"Perfect!"

Most of them had been awake all night thinking what they would say, rehearsing the words over and over. But usually, when the moment came, they were too overcome to speak. And if you tried to ask about relatives or friends, the guards would stop you. Even the gifts of clothes, which we'd been told we could receive, were rejected on this or that pretext. The meetings gave to many more misery than joy. They hurried back to return the borrowed things, which were snatched up by the next person.

The others watched us sadly. Perhaps, on the next visiting day - in two more months - it would be their turn.

We were taken out to another barrack-hut near the gates. It was not, of course, the "whole day with your families" we'd been promised at Jilava. It was fifteen minutes, standing in the same room, ten yards apart, with the guards listening to every word.

But when I saw my son, I forgot I was a prisoner and what I looked like and where I was, and simply with my eyes I embraced him. How thin he was, and serious! I gazed at him and he at me, and in a flash the fifteen minutes had passed. Our emotion wiped out time. We barely spoke. Not that it was possible to say anything intimate.

I remember that I called across the space that separated us: "Mihai, believe in Jesus with all your heart!" Giving him the best counsel I could; knowing from my experience in prison among so many people, old and young, that only Christ can give the hope that lights the darkest place.

He'd been left like thousands of other boys and girls without a guide. The Communists would profit from that. As it happened in the parable of the prodigal son who wasted all he had and then turned for help to an elder who made him tend swine, men sent the young to live on ideas fit for pigs. I said, "Believe in Jesus' knowing that Jesus alone has the words of eternal life and is the best guide for a motherless child.

He appeared to me very beautiful; every mother is convinced that her son is the most handsome. What was important in this encounter flowered later, as a tree from a small seed. How he had received my words I learnt only after my release.

I was pushed roughly on the shoulder and led out by the guards. In our barrack-hut everyone crowded around, asking what Mihai had said, how he was. But I just shook my head. For hours I couldn't speak. I was somewhere else. I was not in prison.

In the evening there were many who had waited for someone who never came. Now they were weeping aloud as they lay on their straw mattresses.

p091 The Pastor's Wife

THE CARCER

At night, in every hut, a woman had to stay awake on guard duty. What you were supposed to be guarding was never explained (I imagine it was to prevent suicides), but you had to keep on your feet. Punishments for falling asleep were brutal.

A naked light bulb, dangling in the middle of the room, swung gently in the draught. Rows of women tossed and turned. Some snored loudly. Some cried out in nightmare. Every face showed marks of suffering and fear. How long were the hours. How desolately the wind howled outside. As if it had blown all these strangers here together: old, young; women of fashion, vagrants from under the city bridges. All they had in common was pain.

When I was a child I disliked night. Now I longed for it, as the one release from murderous work. Yet when dark came I couldn't sleep. I would rise and pray for the women in our hut, in our camp, for the millions of prisoners in the Communist world, and also for Christians who slept peacefully in the West, and those I imagined were praying for us.

Once, being in any case awake, I offered to take on a shift. It was Tania's. She had no trouble sleeping. But she refused, brusquely.

She said, "Sleep yourself." But meant it kindly.

Later, seeing me still awake, she came to sit on my bed. We talked in whispers. She told me one of her thieves' tales. She'd been in a prison which held 4,000 women. Among them was one who had been governor of that very jail under the old regime.

"She'd had a go at Communist prisoners during the war," said Tania, "and now she was inside herself, which was just where she belonged. It wasn't just that she cooked the books and pinched the food money. They all did that. But this one used to let out the smartest girls for a few days, then bring them in and take a cut of what they'd stolen.

When I tried to speak to her about God, Tania answered: "Before you reach God, the saints kill you!"

It was a common saying in Rumania. There was no lack of outward devotion to the saints, but few had any real idea who they were. I told her that the saints help and intercede for us and really can bring us to God. Saints kill nobody.

I said, "Two worlds exist, the material and the spiritual - but only in the material do the laws of God and man say, "Don't steal." In the spiritual world, steal all you can is the rule. Steal whatever knowledge, manners, wit you can. In the material world, if you steal from me, I lose. But in the spiritual world I lose nothing. I am not against your being a thief. The trouble is that you don't know what to steal. Whatever you take today you'll lose, if not tomorrow, at death. But wisdom and knowledge of God, once taken from somebody, you have eternally."

Perhaps the word did not fall in vain. Buried within us is a deep knowledge that "Do not steal," with the exception above, is one of the fundamental rules of the universe. Something in us says, "Don't desire another's property. And be discrete. Not only his possessions but his being is his sacred property." God has ordained that people, like stars in the sky, shall be at a certain distance from one another. He has given us shyness, shame, pride, dignity, fear as a fence around one's individuality, and no one may jump this fence. Every man is like an atom which cannot be penetrated by force without disintegration, a release of destructive revolutionary energies that may destroy the world.

Although so often hungry, Tania did not forget the birds. Each prisoner ate her small bread ration on her bed, carefully catching the crumbs. Every scrap was valuable: it was the only solid thing we had. But Tania took her hoarded crumbs and and spread them out on the window-sill for the sparrows.

Once she said to a neighbour, "Some Christian you are! You're all talk. You never give to the birds."

To see girls like her giving away these precious crumbs caused me to believe that no man is wholly evil. Human nature when left to itself will show good will at least in such things as this: feeding birds when you are starving.

I was impressed to find in thieves a feature of character which is distinctive to the Tibetans, the people who, for thousands of years, has had the strongest sense of metaphysics. Sven Hedin tells the story that while we in Europe feed only domestic birds for the purpose of later feeding on them, the Tibetans put little cakes on the rocks for the wild birds. Sven Hedin himself, when he got lost, lived on these cakes. Is not wild life also a part of Brahman, the one great All?

In women murderers and in every kind of criminal prisoner you could find a small piece of disinterested goodness.

p093 The Pastor's Wife

At Cernavoda we had to suffer indoctrination lectures every Sunday, when we hoped for rest. In the afternoon the room-chief marched us to the assembly hall, where a woman speaker addressed us. She began by telling us what she thought about God, which was not much, and she warned that anyone who spoke about Him would be punished.

"Outside, everyone is now Communist," she explained. "Only you persist in this religious folly, and we mean to educate you out of it. The Party is in power now and it knows best. You're not here in prison. I won't even hear the word! You are in an institution for re-education. You'll be building your own future happiness! Working for future generations! And by passing the norms of work laid down you may well hasten your own liberty as a rehabilitated citizen."

Then came a propaganda concert. Among us were cabaret singers and small-time actresses, some from the German minority. They had to sing Communist songs mocking Germany, praising the Soviet victors. I felt the pain of their humiliation. Physical hurt passes and in a few hours may be forgotten. But humiliation, even when it seems trivial, sears the heart. Only now was I beginning to understand why Jesus spoke of being "mocked and crucified." I'd wondered before why mockery was worth mentioning in the same breath. Now I knew how it could hurt, and go on hurting.

A German woman was standing on the platform at the end of the hall. She was middle-aged, had once been plump and pretty. She clasped her hands pathetically as she sang, her voice cracking on high notes.

The officers in the front row hooted with laughter. What could be funnier than a faded fraulein making fun of herself?" Tears ran down her cheeks as she quavered on.

Next came a woman, still quite young, who read a poem dripping with gratitude to the Soviets for saving us from the Nazis: "Mother Russia, thank you for what you've done today! "The glorious Red army has shown us all the way ..." etc, etc.

This doggerel was loudly cheered by all present, the room-chiefs leading. Anyone showing a lack of enthusiasm was in for trouble. Informers were watching closely for socially-rotten reactions.

I couldn't condemn the women who took part in these charades. They were worn down with suffering. What was a misery to some of us was an hour's escape for others. And everyone was doing it: hadn't Rumania's most famous religious composer, Aurel Baranga, turned his hand to writing Communist anthems? He was a prisoner at one of the Canal camps now.

Few resisted. And those who did were not unaffected by these indoctrination hours which went on every Sunday at almost every camp on the Canal. Some of the rubbish they threw at you was bound to stick.

I couldn't applaud at the meetings. Everyone said, "Pretend, what does it matter? Is it worth a beating? But when I heard God and fatherland slandered and saw beauty trampled in the dirt, I couldn't. There were always people standing at the back of the hall and I buried myself among them.

But I didn't escape. Someone reported me, and in the evening I was marched into the Commandant's office. Her eyes were unwinking under the peaked cap.

"I have information that you failed to clap during this afternoon's lecture and re-education class, Wurmbrand. All your behaviour here has shown you to be a counter-revolutionary force, unamenable to proper re-education." She mouthed the ritual phrases, then licked her lips. "We've tried to be good to you. Now other methods will be used."

I wasn't allowed to return to the hut that night. I was marched to the guard-room and put into a carcer. It was a narrow cupboard built into the wall in which you could just stand. The iron door had a few holes to admit air and food was passed through a small slit at the bottom.

Carcers existed in every prison. They helped break down resistance before the extortion of a false confession. At the Canal it was the commonest punishment.

After a few hours, my feet were burning. The blood in my temples beat with slow, painful thuds. How many hours would they keep me here? How many years could I last in such conditions? I thought: this evil is spreading over the whole world, it will torment new millions; no one will escape. But this was the path of madness. I knew people had been driven insane in these boxes. They had let these thoughts of horror overcome them. But how to escape?

Richard had told me about the monks of Mount Athos, who repeat incessantly the "prayer of the heart." They say, with every heartbeat, "Lord Jesus, Son of God, have pity on me." I had used the prayer myself.

Then I remembered Richard had passed evenings explaining to me the numerical secrets of the Bible. Neither the Hebrews nor the Greeks had numbers as well as letters. The letters of the Bible are also numbers (a=one, b=two, and so on) and every number has a symbolic value. So I tried to count.

p095 The Pastor's Wife

Drops of water were falling from somewhere on the roof of the box. It was a desolate sound. I counted them to make time pass.

One: there is one God.

Two: there are two tables of the Law.

Three: is for the Trinity.

Four: Christ will gather his elect from the four corners of the earth.

Five: for the Five Books of Moses.

Six: the number of the beast in Revelation is 666.

Seven: is the holy number.

But the sound of dripping water went on, and when I reached fifteen, sixteen, the numbers meant nothing and I went back to the start: One, two, three, four.

I don't know how long I did this, but at a certain moment I simply began to cry aloud to avoid despair.

"One, two, three, four," I cried, and again, "One, two, three, four..." After a time the words became inarticulate. I didn't know what I said. My mind had moved into rest. It blacked out. Yet my spirit continued to say something to God.

I should explain this further, for it is one of the keys to survival in prison. With all the worry and misery you wished often to black out the mind. You sought desperately to escape, but you were hounded and obsessed by thoughts that could lead you into deeper mental trouble. Just as an injured leg is put into plaster to rest, so a tormented mind, a sick mind, a mind grieved by remorse needs rest if it is to be healthy.

It is known that there existed in the early church (and also in the Greek mysteries) a phenomenon known as ~ glossolalia~ speaking in unknown tongues. Religion could never find expression only in words. From the beginning it has been shown also in music, the dance and painting. Language is an imperfect tool: when I say, I love apple pie, I love my wife, I love God, I express three utterly different feelings with one word. And between love and hatred there are as many nuances of feeling that cannot be put into words as there are fractions between one and two. What a mother feels for her child cannot be fitted into words, and frequently she does not use them: she says ~calam-lumsy toodleums~, or whatever, and the child is very happy to hear it.

So there is this phenomenon of glossolalia, of unknown tongues, of unarticulated words. Out of the depths of the heart, in moments of ecstasy or terrible suffering, come sounds, come expressions of love towards God, towards fellow men, made up of words that exist in no dictionary. The mind blacks out: as the Bible puts it, "He that speaketh in an unknown tongue speaks not unto men, but unto God."

In the carcer, this blacking out of the mind, so as to allow unreasoning sounds to come out from the depths of the subconscious saved my sanity. After an hour or two my mind came back, rested. I found, too, that speaking in these unintelligible tongues has one great advantage. You never lie, you deceive no one.

One day soon after this we had an inspection from Colonel Albon, an official touring the Canal camps. It was short and sharp. He walked around Cernavoda, saying nothing, gave a contemptuous glance at the ranks of the grey and ghostly women and was about to leave when a gypsy girl ran up to him. It didn't take her long to say what was on her mind. She'd been secretly meeting a lieutenant in the Security Police and now she was pregnant.

The upshot of this was that Albon made a report to Bucharest, an inquiry was held, and much of what had been happening came out. So all the women were moved out of Cernavoda to a labour colony apart from the men a few miles further down the Canal. This was Camp "Kilometre 4."

p097 The Pastor's Wife

CAMP K4: WINTER

We left camp early in the morning to work on the bank of the Danube. A bed of stones had to be laid in the water. From morning to evening we loaded heavy rocks aboard a barge. Then the barge was ferried out into the river and the rocks were dropped over the side. It was impossible to do this without making a huge splash and within minutes of starting work we were all drenched. The icy wind blowing across the plain of the Baragan froze our clothes stiff. It was like being encased in metal armour. My fingers were cracked and swollen from the cold, crushed by the heavy stones.

In the evening, when we returned to the hut, we could only go to bed in our wet clothes. There was nowhere to dry them, and if you did hang something up overnight it was sure to be stolen. Usually I slept with my damp dress under my head as a pillow and put it on, still damp, in the morning. It dried out on the way to work, just in time to get soaked again. How I longed for a little sun, shivering in the wind that rocked our barge. I was thin as a hurdle, and it seemed to blow right through me.

In the second week I was put to load stones into barrows. Other women wheeled them to the barges and flung them into the Danube. At least I stayed dry. But the stones were sharp and constantly tore the hands. My knuckles were raw, my nails broken and bloody. Sheer exhaustion somehow spared me pain. But I seemed to float a few inches above the ground, as in a dream.

Pick up a rock. Heave it, bent double, for 200 yards. Into the stockpile. Pick up a rock...I wondered if I'd ever be able to straighten again.

In the afternoon, a car appeared on the horizon at the height of a guard's belt. The women glanced at it quickly, fearfully. No one spoke. Even the guards were afraid. The light flashed on its bonnet. A new, highly-polished car. It could mean only one thing. The Secret Police. Some prisoner was wanted for further questioning.

p098 The Pastor's Wife

Every woman there was silently praying. Not back to the cells, the nights of torture!

At once the guards began to shout. The norm-checkers, always more slavishly vicious than their masters, scuttled about repeating their orders.

But for once, to our relief, no one was taken. Instead, a young woman was handed over to the guards. The wind flattened her cotton dress against her thin frame. Grey-faced, she stared at us in horror. We were caked in white stone-dust, the eyes big in our faces like death-masks at a carnival.

The guards gave her a push forward. I saw that she was barefoot. She began to work. It was pitiful to watch. She would drag a stone a few inches. Then her legs faltered and she fell on her knees, cutting them. She struggled up and moved it a few inches. The ghastly pallor of her face could only mean that she'd spent months, perhaps years in underground cells.

It was impossible to talk to her that afternoon. Somehow she survived the march back to camp. We passed under the watchtowers and the guard leading the column cried out, "Reporting back with 350 bandits!"

Late in the evening, after I'd completed two hours of potato-peeling in the kitchens, I got back to the hut to find the girl lying on her bed, which had been pushed in between mine and the next. The white dust stuck to her features, except where tears had carved channels through it. I brought some water and helped her to wash. She blinked her eyes and peered at me as if half-blind.

As she revived a little, others gathered around.

"Poor thing, she can hardly be thirty!"

"She's rather lovely, isn't she?"

"We must find her something for her feet."

"And that dress - it's just a rag."

One of the German actresses, Clara Strauss, rummaged in her bundle and produced a crushed old dress. From someone else came a pair of sandals. These treasures, so generously given, brought fresh tears to her eyes. And slowly she began to tell us a little of her story.

For two years she'd been in solitary confinement in the cells under the Ministry of the Interior. During this interrogation in Bucharest she had been kept without sleep for ten days, while the inquisitors worked on her in relays. Powerful lights and reflectors were turned on her face, night and day. Now she could only see objects within arm's reach.

But none of this mattered much, it seemed, beside the one great question.

"Is it true that we can see our children here? I have a boy and a girl, and I haven't seen them for two years, or heard of them. I left them with my mother, but she was nearly seventy and not well. Is there any way of getting news?"

Her demands were like begging-bowls held out to us. We tried to comfort her. I told her of my meeting with Mihai. But that was a mistake.

"You mean we'll be separated by the length of a room?! But I can't see that far!"

She wept, and turned her face to the grey pillow.

In the following days, some of the women tried to discover the rest of her story. But she had retired behind a wall of reserve. Because she was so desperately weak, we gave her all the help we could in the quarry. It wasn't much. I made her eat a little of my bread, and chatted to her.

"Now we know why Christ at the last supper blessed the bread and then the cup. Usually, one says grace at the start of the whole meal and that's that. But here I've learnt that each thing has its own value. No one ever says here, "I had some bean soup," if there was a bit of bread with it. They say, 'I had bean soup with bread.' It's a treat on its own to thank God for."

Suddenly she fell into my arms, sobbing.

After a time, she grew calmer.

"My mother, she's religious, like you. How I wish I could see her now! Or touch her. She had all the strength. She was the rock to which we clung. And I've been so stupid. If only I'd listened."

She told me the rest of her story. It was a variation on a tragic theme which was becoming ever more commonplace: that of the Faithful Communist. In 1951 more and more Party members came into prison, arrested by former comrades. It was pitiful to see their confusion. Fascists could wallow in contempt and hate; they'd had their day of glory. Christians could love; theirs was to come. But the Communist women were lost. They'd trusted the Party like a God. Now it was like watching a massacre of the innocents. They suffered more than people like myself, who were ready for what was to come, who had seen what sort of regime was over us from the start.

Poor Helena Coliu! She'd been quite high in the Educational Department. Her husband was also a loyal Party man with a good post in the government. Helena worked selflessly for Communism. "Proletarian spirit" was her watchword. The two children were brought up as faithful little members of the Communist Youth.

"I'd honestly have died for Communism," she said. "I believed that when the Party came to power it would turn Rumania into a paradise."

Then she had a love affair with a sculptor.

"He was quite successful, if you judge by the number of busts of Stalin he was able to turn out in a week."

But the sculptor grew bored, and left her. Helena, who had taken their affair seriously, felt bitter. In an unguarded moment she said to a friend, "He's the sort of crank who'd help the partisans in the mountains. I wasted myself on a counter- revolutionary.

The friend was also a fanatical Communist. She denounced the sculptor to the Secret Police, and he was savagely tortured. So tortured that he went mad.

Then Helena was herself arrested. She'd been sleeping with this man. She knew what his dealings were with the counter-revolutionaries. Now she was going to talk! Useless for her to say she'd made it up in a moment of temper, that she was a loyal Party member. Her two-year nightmare began.

At last she was brought to court. The sculptor was there, too, for a ten-minute hearing and a ten-year sentence. The man was completely broken. He neither looked at her nor spoke throughout the trial.

Worst of all, her husband was also present, with her two children. The Secret Police, of course, had not spared them. He had lost his good job. The children had been turned out of their school. They were cut in the street by their playmates.

"I dream about it every night. Even in the daytime I have hallucinations about Gregory. I see him as he was in court, grey in the face, and his eyes dead like a fish. Why did I have to do it! Why did we ever meet!"

I recalled again Richard's words: Hell is to sit alone in darkness remembering past sins. Old memories burnt like fire. You had no defence: no books, no radio, no distraction, no place to go when they came buzzing at you. Here self-deception ceased. Theories about new moral concepts didn't help. Here you knew that the new morality was the old lasciviousness. Helena's remorse was terrible. I knew what she was feeling.

Nearly every woman in prison felt similar burning remorse. Nearly everyone was religious in some degree. Outspoken atheists surprised themselves by calling on God. Everyone wished to have her prayer heard.

But their prayers were wrong. It was like praying that two and two should be something other than four. Accumulation of sins can only bring unhappiness and remorse. It was over sexual failings - adulteries, betrayals, abortions - that regret was most poignant. Women longed to talk about it and ease the pain. I remembered the words of David who had committed such a sin: "Blessed is he...whose sin is covered." So covered by God that there is no need to uncover it before men.

In our hut was Mrs. Radu, wife of a well-known Bucharest business man. She had been a great figure in pre-war society, but her old friends would never have recognized now the gay Zenaida Radu whose hats and Paris frocks and jewels had been their envy.

The fashionable accent sounded strange, coming from that haggard face.

In the evening, as we sat on our straw mattresses, she saw me looking around at our extraordinary gathering of criminals, prostitutes, nuns, peasants and professors.

"What's your conclusion?" she asked, brushing back her greasy hair with a gesture which belonged to her 'smart set' days. "You've seen it all - what do you think? For myself, I've only one thought left: if I could go free, I'd live happily on a crust for the rest of my life."

Like many of her type, she had a deep sense of guilt for frittering her life away. Often she's spoken to me hesitatingly, hinting at some inner torment that she'd like to reveal. Coming to sit on my bed. Or staring at me from across the room. Always, I smiled back.

After several weeks, she told me her trouble. When the Communists took power she was left a widow with a small child. The parties were over, the money was gone, her beauty was going.

"All my lovely things were taken from me," She sobbed at the memory. "I had to work. My hands were ~ruined~. All my old friends avoided me. And then - I had a chance to marry again."

Again that gesture to quell her untidy hair.

"But men just do not want other men's children. I ~knew~ that my poor Jenny - and she was three at the time - was the obstacle. And I ..."

Sweat broke out on her forehead. It was a struggle to tell, and not to tell. I put my hand on her's. She began again quickly:

"I began to neglect her. I didn't feed her properly. It wasn't a conscious thing. At least...she cried too much. I used to shout at her, 'Shut up, little wretch!' She grew thinner and thinner. But I didn't care."

It was if she would die, bringing this out. She gripped my hand and twisted it as if she were in childbirth agony. And if she held anything back there would be no relief.

"I didn't care," the dry voice repeated. "I'd leave her alone and go out. To have fun! With him! I thought he was my salvation."

p102 The Pastor's Wife

"Then on cold winter nights after she fell asleep I'd open the window. The chances were that she might uncover herself and catch cold. Of course, I realize that now. At the time I told myself, 'Fresh air is good for a child and I mustn't overfeed her.' I didn't kill her. But I let her die of neglect."

She whispered the last words of her confession. Not that anyone else was listening. Fifty voices were raised in the usual medley of complaints and quarrels and remembrances. Swearing. Singing bawdy songs.

"I've never told anyone. And I know already there can be no forgiveness for me."

I tried to persuade her that this was not so. I said that in the original Greek of the gospel, Christ is Christos, which is almost identical with the word ~chrestos~, meaning "gracious' We cannot think of him in any other way. Grace and forgiveness are in his very title.

She said, "If ever I get out, I've only one wish, and that is to be good - because here I've seen in every way what it means not to be good."

I replied, "But no one's really good. Therefore the Apostle tells us that if we say we have no sins we are liars. But if we confess our sins then he, Jesus, is righteous to forgive."

Zena finished her story. The prospective husband had turned out to be a philanderer. But she became his mistress and the small allowances he made kept her from factory work. This, combined with her "bourgeois" past, was the only "charge" against her. She'd been denounced by an envious neighbour as being of "socially-rotten" origin and given a two-year "administrative sentence" without trial.

During my journey through different camps and prisons I met many who had been arrested for absurd and fantastic reasons. At Camp K.4 was an old lady, universally known as Granny Apostol, whose crime was that she had once been kind to a lunatic.

The lunatic was an elderly metallurgist who'd made some small coins with the words "NICOLAI, EMPEROR OF RUMANIA" stamped on them. He, of course, was Nicolai, and his chief pleasure was to give these coins to people. "Keep this," he would explain, "because everyone who owns one will become my minister when I come to the throne."

The Secret Police arrested this poor emperor and investigated all his friends and acquaintances. Whenever they found a coin, a man or a woman was tried. Sentences of fifteen and twenty years were handed out by rubber-stamp tribunals.

p103 The Pastor's Wife

"How shameful!" cried Helena, the devoted Party worker. "Couldn't you prove your innocence?"

"I could prove it all right. But who could I prove it to? God and the king are a long way off, as they said when I was a girl. It's still the same. What can you do with that lot? Ignorant, they are. Or frightened."

Granny Apostol was a clever old thing, although she'd spent her life as a servant. She had a simplicity that saw through pretence to the reality of things.

It wasn't that our new rulers were ignorant, but that they were so conceited in their ignorance. Office-boys had become officers in the Secret Police. And this elevation of ignorance ran all the way through the Government to the top where Georghiu-Dej, the ex-railway worker, was establishing himself as Party boss. A joke went round at that time: Georghiu-Dej boasted to de Gaulle that he had liquidated illiteracy in Rumania. He asked, "Do you still have illiterates?" The General answered, "Yes, but not in the government."

The officers at the Canal would not dream of conversing with ragged and dirty women. But if circumstances forced them to talk to us, we heard again and again the same parroted Party slogans. How many times I've been told, "Humanity has produced four great geniuses: Marx, Engels, Lenin and Stalin." If you could have asked about Plato or Bergson or Edison they would have had nothing to say, because they'd never heard of them.

The foolishness of those in power and the fright of the bewildered bureaucrats below them added to the long list of harmless and innocent people in prison.

There was the woman doctor who had casually remarked that she always used a thermometer made in the West. It was so much easier to read than the Russian model. Shortly after she arrived in prison for making this counter-revolutionary statement, she was joined by a nurse who was accused of "non-denunciation" - failure to report the wicked words of her superior as a more "loyal" nurse had done.

Another strange confrontation was between two ladies of pleasure. One had been, briefly, mistress to King Carol. And the other to the Communist Interior Minister, Georgescu. Both had made the mistake of boasting about their days of splendour. The royal companion was automatically contaminated by her contact with the Court. Georgescu's mistress had revealed too much about the luxury in which the new Minister lived, his fifty suits, his champagne and caviar parties. He had her arrested and sent to jail. Later he came to jail, too, imprisoned by his own comrades.

p104 The Pastor's Wife

I met hundreds of people from religious sects who refused to conform. Christian Science ladies, Theosophists, Jehovah's Witnesses.

"It's Saturday," little Annie Stanescu cried. "It must be. They're beating the Seventh Day Adventists!"

Every Saturday the women from this sect were paraded and ordered to work. And every time they refused. They were savagely ill-treated, but nothing could move them. Orthodox and Catholic and Protestant believers would work on Sunday to avoid a beating, but the Adventists went on suffering week after week.

Scores of women came to jail because of an alleged apparition of the Virgin Mary. It occurred in one of Bucharest's main streets. Someone pointed to a church window and shouted, "Look! The Virgin Mary!" And immediately hundreds began sighting the vision. Priests warned. The police made arrests. And still the crowds came.

The police thought they would resolve the question by smashing the window. Immediately, the Virgin Mary appeared in the next pane. So a whole series of windows were smashed. Then the Virgin moved up Victory Street and appeared in the windows of Police Headquarters!

It was when policemen themselves began seeing this vision (many of them had strong Orthodox backgrounds) that mass arrests began.

And so it went on. "It's a great lottery," said Clara, the German cabaret queen. "Sometimes you draw a ticket marked "Prison" and sometimes one marked "Freedom."

Zenaida Radu said: "The ticket I want is marked "The West."" She turned to me: "What do you say?"

I said: "I drew my ticket long ago. On it is written, "Paradise."

At 11 p.m. the door of the hut burst open. Half a dozen guards marched in, shouting at the top of their voices.

"Everybody up!"

"Commandant's inspection!"

Clang, Clang! Clang! on the steel rail.

Dazzled, frightened women jumped shivering from the grey blankets. We struggled and scrambled to gather all our things. Perhaps it was a move!

Our square-shouldered commandant walked in in full uniform with cap and polished boots, as if she were taking a military march-past.

"Women! I want all those who can speak a foreign language to take a pace forward. And I mean a foreign language. Not Russian or Serbian. English, French-that sort of thing."

p105 The Pastor's Wife

A number of women stepped forward. Teachers, journalists former ladies of the Court - a cross-section of bourgeois days. Our names were laboriously copied down. The guards became so cross in their efforts not to look foolish. This performance was always a misery. At last "Double-V. Wurmbrand" was entered as a speaker of French and German and off they went. We had lost two hours' sleep, and for two more hours anguished arguments continued. What did it mean?

"Translators, that's what it is," Clara affirmed.

"The Americans are coming!"

"And the French!"

"Lucky bitches," said one of the prostitutes. "Why should you have some cushy job just because you say you know a few words of frog?"

"And how about you, Clara Strauss, saying you speak French. We know you're a kraut!"

"Not speak French!" Clara gave her stagiest laugh. "My darlings, my PhŠdre was famous. ~Oui, prince, je languis, je brule pour Thes,e.~" Clasping her hand to her throat, she glared at Granny Apostol. "~Que dis-je? Il n'est point mort puisqu'il respire en vous. Toujours devant mes yeux ...~"

"Oh, please let's get some sleep!"

But the criminal prisoners were bursting with malice and jealousy. And it was almost dawn when I fell into a sleep filled with restless dreams.

Yet, as we tramped to work across the plain that morning, my heart felt light. Could it be true? Work as a translator in some warm office, out of this eternal wind? Had some great international upheaval taken place? Our quarrying party was full of rumours.

I worked that day next to a tiny Jewish woman called Jessica. I'd noticed her about the camp many times. She had a calm, sweet smile which was like a promise of peace among so many anguished faces. Keeping an eye on the guards, I explained what had happened in our hut during the night.

"It happens in every hut," she told me. "And in every camp. Sometimes they come in and ask who is a foreigner. And the Germans and Jews hurry to give their non-Rumanian names, thinking they'll be allowed to emigrate. But there is no meaning in it at all. It is just to make you suffer."

Before long I discovered she was right. It was simply another torment to exhaust the mind and sap the will. Many times the hut was dragged from bed after midnight for another instalment of this bitter farce. Once they came for lists of sportswomen. The rumour was that Rumania was short of competitors for the Olympic games - anyone who could run or jump or swim might be taken for training! Most could hardly walk, yet this was accepted as an article of faith.

It made us more susceptible for re-education. A female choir had now been recruited and was learning Communist songs, starting with the ~Internationale~:

"Raise up all the hungry of the earth ..."

"And make a start with us!" carolled Annie Stanescu.

A play called "The True Happiness" was also performed. It showed how true happiness consisted in building a Canal for Socialism. And had rhymes exposing the horrors of capitalist exploitation. And when we were told to weep for America's starving millions, I saw women actually in tears.

After villainous Uncle Sam's efforts to sabotage the Canal had been put to naught, an upstanding Young Communist sang in a soprano, like squeaking glass:

"How we love our father Stalin, Never will our joy in Party fade ..."

The saddest part was the applause and cheering at the end. Some, at least, was genuine. Between tortured and torturer a love-hate relationship can arise. Guards who beat and mocked us were often called by endearing diminutives of their names.

"Before a house can be built, the swamp must be cleaned out, and all the vermin in it!" The younger guards, who'd been taught that we were all "bandits," repeated these catch-phrases learnt in training-school. And we learnt to beware of blank-eyed girls in their early twenties. They could be more brutal than any man. So long as their indoctrination lasted.

But then they were posted to the Canal and for months and years they lived beside their prisoners in this desert place. They marched the long miles with us to the quarries. They stood over us as we laboured. And, although it was strictly forbidden, sometimes they talked with us.

They saw after a while that they were not dealing merely with 'vermin' and 'bandits' but very often with simple peasant women like those of their own family. It was the time of enforced collectivization, when land and beasts were being torn from their owners. As the guards came to learn that their own relatives were starving and being arrested, they began to doubt.

They lost their pride in the job. Then their faith in the Party. The assault on the church went hand in hand with the seizure of all the things they were attached to. This rising revulsion against the consequences of Communism brought about a wonderful change in some of our guards.

We had several schoolgirls at Camp K4, sent there because they had joined patriotic student groups. Among them, fifteen-year-old Maria Tilea was a great beauty. Slave labour seemed only to improve Maria's looks. The skin became translucent, the dark eyes more vivid, the delicate bone structure more clearly marked. She had the self-confidence that came from a growing realization that she was liked and admired by everyone.

Nina, an apple-cheeked guard who had shown me some kindness in the past, was very attentive to this delicately-nurtured girl from another world.

"What a shame, poor girl. Why, she's just a child! They told me I'd be handling thieves and murderesses, but she's such a young lady!"

One day Nina asked Carine, one of my Christian friends: "Are you one of the nuns?"

"No, I"m the wife of a pastor."

"Ah, they told me about you. Giving your bread away and such. You'll make yourself ill. Here - you go to the toilet in a minute and put your hand up to the window ledge on the right."

She went. She reached up and her hand met something wrapped in paper. A sandwich. It would have got Nina sent to a labour camp herself if her generosity had been discovered.

Carine and I had several talks with her. She told us how she had always gone to church as a child. And even when she had to join the Communist Youth she continued to attend - but walked miles to the next village where she wasn't known.

"Once on the way back I met one of the Youth leaders. She kept asking me where I'd been. 'It's Sunday - you haven't been to church, have you?' I said I'd given up all that years ago. I wish I'd had the guts to tell her to mind her own business, but what was the use. I had a good cry when I got home. I felt like Peter denying Christ."

She had cried, but to repent like Peter was something beyond Nina's strength. She let herself be parted from the church, drifted into the militia and became a camp guard. She swallowed the talk about building a better world (and wiping out the middle-class vermin in the process). She'd beaten and ill-treated prisoners to order. Now she saw what Communism had done in villages like her own. And she felt guilt.

Carine was not the only one she helped. I guessed by certain signs that she was befriending young Maria Tilea. The schoolgirl told me, months later when Nina was no longer with us, what she had done for her."

"My parents had still a little money left. And a few things were saved somehow when our property was taken over. I asked Nina if she'd take a message to them that I was well. When she went, Daddy promised her money or a present if she brought me some things - aspirin, chocolate, a woollen pullover."

It could have cost Nina her life. But she did it, smuggling the things into camp, refusing the bribe. The visit to Maria's home was a revelation to Nina. The pretty things, the restful house, the kindness of the Telias were all a new experience. Her belief in Communism was further shaken.

When first I began to talk to her, it was hard going. At that time she still parroted the gibes about religion they all picked up at the training-school. Her heart was closed. When I spoke of Christ she said: "But we Communists are the best friends of Christ! If there is a heaven and Christ is judge, we'll be the most favoured of all. Your husband's a pastor; how many people do you think he's brought to Christ? A few score? A few hundreds? But we Communists take care that Christ gets every year thousands of customers who die with his name on their lips. We're filling his heaven. He ought to be grateful!"

I pointed out that this might mean more than she thought. The wicked man who made a sinner of Mary Magdalene also prepared her to be a saint. The one who instilled in Saul of Tarsus hatred of Christianity also laid the foundations for the future Paul. The Bible says where sin abounds, grace aboundeth even more. And I wondered if the Communists with their jokes about sending Christians to heaven don't attract the pity of heaven on them for their wickedness. This was a step to her conversion.

Nina became a Christian again, and this is something not easily concealed. A traitor like Kim Philby can work undiscovered for two decades because badness is all around and he may hide in it. Under every stone is another beetle. But goodness is a rare butterfly that strikes even insensitive eyes. No one can miss it, and some will want to kill it.

Some time in 1951 Nina vanished from Camp K4.

For long we didn't know what had become of her. Then three new arrivals turned out to be former guards from Canal camps who'd been sentenced for taking bribes from prisoners. Nina had been tried with them and given ten years.

Poor Maria was horribly upset.

"It's all my fault!" she wept.

I said, "Don't take it so badly. It was what she wanted to do in her heart. She'll have greater joy as a prisoner than she ever had as a guard."

We often talked about Nina. Carine said that she knew what lay ahead of her and she would come out at the end as a very strong Christian. Suffering would give her great authority to speak to others. But what if she died in prison? It would be for a good cause and God does not leave unrewarded even a cup of water given to one in suffering. He will reward her, too. Those who die for their faith leave behind the greatest legacy of influence for good.

THE DANUBE

It snowed heavily during the night. As we formed up before the rows of huts, thick flakes continued to fall. The skeletal guard-towers had almost vanished behind the white veil. But the wind had dropped. Every sound was dull and dead.

From the distant kitchens steam was rising through a ventilator. That promise of warmth was only an additional affliction. Few "politicals" were ever granted kitchen work. The laundry ran it a close second. The daily quota there was tough - thirty sheets, thirty pillow-cases, plus shirts and underpants, all done by hand with scraps of low-grade soap. But at least it was inside.

That morning more than the usual number of women tried to report sick. Ana Cretzeanu, camp doctor and herself a prisoner, was not interested.

"Nothing wrong with you!" she said. "Passed fit for work."

How prisoners loathed that whining voice. Dr. Cretzeanu had sold herself for the right to stay indoors out of the snow and rain. She had powers of life and death in a sense that must have been new to the medical profession. She knew that in sending out certain women to work, she was condemning them to death. Some were so weak that they fainted on hearing that they must go out again to the quarries. But she had her orders from the medical board. The more women she allowed to go sick, the less was her own chance of survival or release.

In Hut 10 was another doctor prisoner who had kept her integrity. The inmates used every subterfuge to keep her, if only for a few days, inside the camp. She was over sixty and unfit to march miles to the quarry, let alone work there. And she knew her medicine far better than Cretzeanu. But the camp commandant was well satisfied with her choice of physician. The Hut 10 doctor had to push wheelbarrows.

An aspirin, a warm drink, any kind of pain-reliever was just a dream to us. Toothache had to be borne. The camp was rife with a variety of female diseases brought on by hard work. They were correctly diagnosed by teams of prisoner-doctors. Treatment was another matter.

As we tramped through the snow, Carine said, "Let's not think about Cretzeanu. She's to be pitied. Whenever I hear her crying, "Fit for work!" I remember a friend of mine, a woman doctor, who deliberately joined the militia. For Christ's sake she put on that hateful uniform and played the convinced Communist only to help others. She did wonderful work for the sick before she was betrayed by an informer. She's in prison now."

"Poor soul. She must have been a kind of saint."

We stumbled on over the white plain under a dark sky. In the muffled silence the noise of hammering from the quarry sounded strangely desolate.

During the morning I crushed my fingers between two heavy blocks of stone. It was agony lifting each block into the truck. An elderly woman, a neweomer, noticed my trouble and tried to help me. She asked whether in prison I'd come across a girl called Fanny Marinescu.

"Yes," I said. "I knew her well. I used to teach her French in Jilava, and we became friends."

"What happened to her?"

I said, "She went to Heaven. She died of cancer, left too long untreated."

Then the woman began to weep, and somehow I understood that she was Fanny's mother.

A guard posted himself next to us, and we couldn't talk. One didn't stop work because one's child had died. She stumbled blindly about, clutching the boulders, with tears running down her face. Our hearts and cut hands bled in equal measure.

It wasn't until next day that I could try to offer a few words of comfort. We were waiting at the midday break for the food to come.

"Fanny is in heaven now," I said. "She died in faith in the Redeemer, who is the giver of life everlasting."

"In heaven! Easily said. If it was ~your~ daughter ..."

So I told her how I had lost my own family under the Nazis and my orphan children on the ship to Israel.

"Yet one need not lose peace and serenity. We are all transitory beings - but there is also an eternal existence with God. That is our comfort."

We sat together, nursing our crushed fingers, waiting for the greasy soup. Our legs and arms trembled with exhaustion. She told me her name was Cornelia.

I said: "Your daughter helped many prisoners through hours of depression, telling them about eternal life. I helped others.

And you help me to lift these stones. And in heaven is the great helper who cares for those whom we have lost."

She seemed a little comforted.

One evening she came to my hut. Not many guards were about on cold nights and she had slipped across the yard unseen.

I felt someone sit down on the bed and touch my arm. I opened my eyes and sat up.

Cornelia smiled tremulously. "Let me sit here a little. The devils don't seem to have so much power beside you."

Every Christian reflects a little of the glory of the Lord. In times of suffering others might observe it.

"All our hut has been punished," said Cornelia. I couldn't get out before. We've had to clean the floor every evening this week."

She stroked her thin arms within the old cardigan, for warmth.

"But I didn't come here to complain. I want to tell you something I'll never tell anyone else as long as I live."

The delicate face became transparent, the suffering was transfigured with joy.

"I fell asleep last night without undressing. And at once I was in a great field, as wide as the plain of Baragan where we work. But as far as the eye could see it was full of flowers. The air was filled with a piercing sweet fragrance. Like lily of the valley, and I felt that my daughter was there. Although it was so vast, it was also somehow homely. I'd never seen so many herbs and flowers in one place.

There was a sound of wasps and bees. And clouds of butterflies, great masses of them, all glittering with colour, came towards me. I felt such tranquility of the spirit. All the beauty and majesty of the earth seemed to be gathered in one place.

"Standing alone in a corner I saw a woman who came towards me. She had eyes that looked gently into your very heart, and she put into my hands a bunch of white lily of the valley. Oh, the fragrance was sweet! It hasn't left me yet. From the center of the field I heard the voice of a man, strong and sweet, saying clearly the words of Solomon's song: 'As the lily among the thorns, so is my love among the daughters.'

"And then I woke up and realized I was still at the Canal. And those fearful madmen the guards were waiting for me. But when they banged the rail at five I got up and went out to the quarries as if I'd been dancing in meadows to delight my Beloved one.

"I still see the field of flowers and smell their fragrance and hear that voice. And the woman, I'll never forget her."

The memory lived in her heart. She looked with new eyes on the thousands of small kindnesses, beauties, signs and wonders that are evidence of His presence.

Sometimes the stones of remembrance which we took from the valley of suffering were beautiful.

Days later, the thaw came. I woke to the sound of water dripping from the hut eaves. The iron earth had changed to mud. Blackened patches of snow still hugged the walls where drifts had been, but the mild air was defeating them. How we'd all longed, in these months, to be free of winter's grip!

Even the guards were feeling frisky. They shouted and barked at us and each other like playful dogs. A light breeze blowing from the south bore some undefined scent. Of the sea, perhaps. Or spring.

I was working again on the ferry barges. Out we went into the smooth, black waters of the Danube to heave our great stones with huge splashes into the steam. Great hunks of dark ice floated past. My hands and feet were numb, blue. Big gashes of bland, blue sky appeared among the clouds of a new whiteness.

Male guards always came with the column to and from camp. They were the only men the women ever saw and ribald jokes sometimes flew around their heads. Today there were more than ever.

Annie Stanescu, a shrewish little prostitute, always led these sessions.

"How you dare!" said Zenaida. "That Peter has hands like a gorilla. And all that black hair on the backs! I'm sure he's covered in it, from head to foot. If one could see."

"And there's women here that have!" Annie showed a mouthful of gold teeth. A laugh went up.

"Ugh!" Zenaida was all refined horror.

"Though what they see in us to attract them," wondered Zenaida, "I cannot think. Can you picture a more unappetizing and sexless band of creatures than ourselves? I'm sure we must all smell dreadfully!"

Annie's retort to this brought screams of laughter from her friends. Soiled words went to and fro. No shutting them out.

"Our little saint doesn't like nasty talk!" cried Annie. The guards, loafing and smoking as we worked, looked at me, grinning. "Thinks we're horrid!"

I kept silent. Which was, of course, reproof. But Annie, whose loose chatter was rarely maliciously directed, had done me a worse turn than she intended.

At the end of the day we lined up, worn and sore.

p114 The Pastor's Wife

"Fall in! Fall in!" bellowed the guards. We marched, on this job, to an assembly point where trucks waited.

The muddy path ran along the riverside. I was aware that the eyes of the guard, the man Peter, where fixed on me. An ugly little grin narrowed his gaze. He nudged his companion, a dumb-looking youth with a flattened nose. Then he stuck out a boot so that I fell in the mud which had turned the path to slush.

The women guards roared with laughter.

A hand reached out and dragged me up. Slippery with mud, I struggled and cried out in Peter's grasp.

"What you need now, my lady," he growled, "is a wash."

"Chuck her in the Danube!" screamed a woman's voice.

I felt the other man's paws on me. One caught my wrists and the other my ankles. I was jerked off my feet, swung once and flung through the air. I landed in the rocky shallows with a splash. The breath was knocked out of my body. I was stunned, but still conscious. Icy water poured over me, flowing fast so that it dragged me over the rocks. The current swirled around me. There were shouts from the bank, but I couldn't understand them. Every time I tried to get up the rushing water brought me down. I thrashed about in a futile way, wounding myself on the stones.

Two hands seized me beneath the arms. I was dragged through the shallows. The man who had hold of me tripped and fell backwards, sitting down in the water. Then I was lying flat on the bank.

Someone forced me to sit up, slapping my back. I felt hollow and sick. For the first time I was aware of a sharp pain in my side. Dizziness made me lie down again. When the sick feeling had passed I lay for a while hearing the river – was it the water of life which flows through Paradise? But then I looked up at the sky through black, wet, naked bushes. It was not heaven yet.

"She's all right. Get up!" A woman's voice. She stood looking down at me. "Get moving, or you'll freeze."

The young guard with the peasant face helped me to sit up. Hairy Peter was nowhere in sight. I tried to wring out the edges of my long skirt.

"Come on, come on!"

They pulled me up. I was shivering now, but with shock more than cold. The column was moving along a few hundred yards ahead. I limped after it, helped on by pushes from the woman guard.

When we joined the main party the women cast sympathetic glances towards me. We waited for the trucks.

Hairy Peter shouted, "That's better. Nothing like a cold bath!"

My clothes were cold and clammy and my shoes squelched. I hugged myself and wondered about the pain in my side. It was growing worse. Once we were in the truck, every bump sent a red-hot stab of agony through me .The swaying truck made me feel very sick.

"That brute Peter?" Zenaida muttered her indignation: Our team boss, a criminal prisoner, was in the truck. They'd fished me out quickly once they'd had their laugh. After all, they had to report back to the guard-room with the same number of prisoners as had set out that morning. A slave-labourer less would have been a loss to the State.

Somehow we got back to the hut, where I wrung out my wet things. My side was badly swollen, and the skin had been scraped from my hands and legs. It was agony to raise my arms. Every few minutes during the night I tried to find a more comfortable position. But there was none.

In the morning I saw "Doctor" Cretzeanu. A huge purple and yellow bruise like a map of Africa spread down one side of my body and it was impossible to raise my arm above waist level.

"Fit for work!" she pronounced.

I fell in with the others.

"What's the matter with you?"

The woman overseer was glaring. Perhaps I had swayed. I felt faint. I said, "I can't go to work today. I'm in great pain. I think my ribs are broken."

But Hairy Peter was watching out for me. He caught my wrist and pulled me out of the rank. "What's wrong with her is that she didn't fulfill her norm yesterday. Get on with it!"

He spun me around and planted a large boot in my back. I wasn't so much kicked as heaved forward into the line of women.

So I went to work that day and every following day. I had broken two ribs (doctors established this after my release) but God healed them. We have seen in prison many miraculous healings.

CAMP K4: SUMMER

The spring arrived. Patches of palest new green sprouted among the shabby grass that grew alongside the road to the stone- quarries. A little sweet grass in the tepid water called ~soup~ which came at midday was a great treat. But on that raw plain, though the rain fell and fell, good edible grass was rarer than bitter weed. Only the tougher forms of life survived, in that streaming wind, which took the soup from our spoons before they reached our mouths.

Eating grass was forbidden as was everything by which the politicals might better their condition. We pastured on it, like cattle, when the guards weren't looking. And we watched for informers, who spied on us even in this, believing promises that by doing so they would earn quicker release.

Frogs were also fair game, since their raw meat was considered quite a delicacy. They were surprisingly hard to catch. But sometimes an adventurous ~batrachian~ would hop into the quarry, where at once he paid the supreme penalty.

They lived in large numbers by the river. At night the sound of their voices carried for miles over the fields. I remembered that the Bible speaks of "frog-like spirits." I'd wondered often in the past about this comparison. Then came the Communists with their endless croaking of party slogans. "Long live the Party, croak-croak! Long live the People's Republic, croak-croak-croak! Down with the warlike Imperialists, croak!" And I understood.

Snakes were less popular. The fat green grassy variety were devoured, but noise around the work sites frightened them off. A few were caught by those who worked to clear the stunted scrub and plant in its place ~marram~ grass to prevent soil erosion. Once a wild cat ran across the path with a grass snake in its mouth. A hail of stones and shovels were aimed at the startled creature. It fled without giving up its prey.

The longing for meat, or any protein, was the result of our soupy diet. Call it potato, bean or cabbage, none of it had any goodness. Vitamin deficiency diseases were common. Almost everyone suffered from bouts of diarrhea. Scurvy occurred, and mysterious skin troubles. Cuts and bruises became infected and ulcers up to four inches in diameter formed on legs and feet. The poisons spread through the system and reduced us to utter exhaustion.

But we suffered less than the men. Special sections for priests and Iron Guardsmen at Peninsula camp were totally cut off from other prisoners. They worked longer hours and received less food. Staying alive depended on a prisoner's ingenuity. Or ruthlessness.

Anything that moved was eaten.

"Dog is quite good," a priest who survived this camp assured me. "But I cannot honestly recommend rat."

At Cape Midia, the labour colony was composed chiefly of elderly men, many in their seventies. Harnessed like beasts to barrows of earth, often working barefoot, they could never fulfill the norms. But if a man once did, then the norms were raised. It was a policy of extermination.

Those who did not die, when they collapsed were often beaten to death. "The graveyard at Peninsula," we were told, "is twice the size of the camp."

The work norm is not a Communist invention. The Bible says that the Jews in Egypt were slaves who also had to fulfill a norm, which was constantly raised. At first they received straw to make bricks. Then they had to find it themselves. And they had to make the same number of bricks without straw supplies.

What distinguishes Pharaoh from the Reds is that he did not try and label his exploitation paradise on earth.

All our news was gleaned from new arrivals, of whom there was no lack. One evening the door of our crowded hut opened to admit another twenty women. They were all prostitutes, swept from the streets, dragged from their houses in police round-ups. This was the Communist way of "liquidating the social problems of capitalism"; as usual the remedy was worse than the cure. The new batch had all come from the same prison and they were the most debased women we had yet encountered. Perhaps it was merely that they had suffered their own unrelieved company for too long.

Now with screams, punches and savage obscenities they cleared out a nest for themselves. A little group of nuns was ruthlessly bundled aside. They took refuge with the politicals on the other side of the room. Optimistically, the politicals tried to reason with the neweomers. The whores shrieked with laughter, imitating their accents. The common-law convicts looked on with sickly grins. As for the gypsies, the nuns' troubles left them indifferent, like most other intrusions into their own small world of chatter and squabbles and song.

Many of the prostitutes had open syphilitic sores on their lips. They would be using the same mugs and plates as us. Where they gathered the air seemed a degree more fetid. Sorrily, some had hearts which were as diseased as their bodies

The shorn nuns huddled together under the reddish glow of a naked bulb, like a flock of bald young birds around their mother. Sister Mary was an elderly nun of ascetic looks and limpid spirit whose sore and sculpted face, sharp nose and round steel spectacles (preserved by some miracle of patient subterfuge) reminded me always of Pope Pius XII. Her beatific smile, delicate as a child's, was in itself a treasure.

"But if only she would stop lecturing about the flesh!" complained Zenaida. "It isn't as if, poor soul, she has any herself to worry about."

How hard she struggled to preserve her little flock in faith. And night after night the whores turned to rend them. Old Sister Mary told of St. Bernard of Clairvaux who, it seemed, had once in an inattentive moment, looked at a woman. Horrified at what he had done, he mortified the flesh by standing all night up to his neck in a freezing lake.

"What's she want to do that for?" The whores listened always with half an ear. "The things people do to get a thrill!"

How they giggled and nudged and, occasionally, scratched.

The old nun warned her younger Sisters against even raising their eyes to the guards...some were young and handsome ... they were in mortal danger...even to harbour the thought was sin...turn their eyes to the example of the saints ...

"Funny how some people have all the luck. I never met none of these saints. Though I'd seen it all. Such tricks people get up to. D'you remember the bishop?"

They remembered the bishop at length. The nuns blushed.

The woman called Victoria was, appearances proclaimed, a madam.

Sagging Victoria had somehow adapted her prison dress into something loose which positively frilled and frothed above the waist and fitted like bark below. Whether she had altered them or they had taken on her fearful personality was not clear.

"When I used to go for my weekly medical (prostitution was state-controlled) the police officer always picked me out of the line. Oh, I was quite something. Though you may laugh now. And that cop would take me along to the bishop's palace for the night. Old blackbeard! I'ad to wear trousers like a boy."

p119 The Pastor's Wife

They rather approved, it was felt, of the roguish bishop. Who paid well, and confirmed everyone's opinion of the world.

"Chastity," the old nun continued, smoothing one withered hand patiently against its neighbour, "is like a mirror. Even a breath can spot its surface. Never let an evil thought mar your mind ..."

She might have been carved from some hard durable wood. It was the durability that invited attack.

"You dunno much about your priests, do you?" One of the younger girls joined in the mocking game. "Now I was taken along to do it with some of them. Oh, they knew all about women. They never thought much about their souls. A mirror indeed!"

"And St. Thomas received the gift of chastity so greatly that an angel promised that never would he lose it again, never would he be tempted. Notwithstanding, he avoided looking at a woman in case the occasion for sin arose."

The whores were struck all of a heap with laughter. They shrieked and yelled and fell about in entanglements of flesh.

"Poor old guy! A nice promise! Not what he was praying for at all!" moaned Victoria, pressing one hand to her undisciplined stomach.

All shrieked again. Victoria wiped her eyes.

"Ah, we see through you!"

Whoever was being seen through, Sister Mary abandoned her lecture for something still more limpid. She said firmly:

"Let us say the rosary."

Together they murmured, "Hail Mary, full of grace ..."

And all the whores together made the sign of the cross. They mocked everything holy. But ceremonial, the making of signs, unnerved them. Or brought them to the beginnings of respect.

It takes some time to say the rosary, and they let it end. But could not let well alone. It was as if Mary had stared them in the face.

A younger girl, with crimped gingery hair like wire, began again. But this time it was to blasphemous words about the Virgin.

But at this such a shouting and protesting broke out among the other occupants of the hut that the alarmed prostitutes clustered cawing around the gingery blasphemer to succour and protect.

"We've had more than enough of you!" shouted Annie Stanescu. And slapped the gingery one in the face. She told her what she was, where she came from, where she might yet go.

"Some women," she further explained, "are just low."

p120 The Pastor's Wife

The whores considered doubtfully the degree of their lowness, quite quelled for the moment by this fury and indignation. On learning that this little spitfire was of their own profession they looked nonplussed.

Annie was not one to let religion interfere with her "work," nor was she on very familiar terms with the Gospel or God; but no one was going to insult the Virgin Mary in her presence. The Holy Virgin she understood and revered and would defend as her own mother.

Why is it that the Virgin inspires in so many, who are otherwise blind to God, this deep love?

The prostitutes took from life all moral standards; but nor could I agree with the nun's viewpoint, which simply contradicted life. There is potential good in evil.

I said that in Hebrew, the word ~kedesha~ has a root that means both prostitute and holy. Because holiness is to give yourself lovingly to anyone without distinction of race or creed; to give what is best in your soul.

St. Mary Magdalene was a ~kedesha~. But she changed. And now instead of passing from the arms of one man to the next, she gave freely of what was good in her soul to everyone.

There is a real love that can help others. It means that you live and die in the struggle to help them become higher beings. And there is a base means of giving love; to be attached to a bit of flesh like a cow. Flesh decays and is eaten by worms; spiritual love is everlasting.

As for the bishop whom the prostitutes had ridiculed, I knew him. For all his weaknesses, he could say to the Communists who arrested him: "I have not led a Christian life; I can die a Christian death." The sinner these women mocked was now a saint in heaven. He had died under torture.

Two girls who arrived with this group were of a different class. They were known to the street women but spoke little to them, and they found beds in a far corner of the room.

They were sisters, dark intense girls with good manners and quiet voices. But prostitutes, said their companions, swept up like the others to serve "administrative" sentences at the Canal.

An aura of sadness and mystery surrounded these sisters. No one knew much about their past. Though many poked and pried. Personal revelations were hoped for.

Victoria, while smoothing down her hair with water, or examining the development of her varicose veins, would say:

"Some girls just do not know how to mix. But we are all in the same boat, I say. If we cannot tell our troubles to our friends, then what are friends for, I should like to know?"

But Diana, who was nineteen years old, and seventeen-year-old Floarea did not tell her, although Victoria, perhaps from force of professional habit, continued to be solicitous towards the girls.

Such ingratitude made Victoria angry. She would tread about with her puffy, dainty feet on other people's property and persons and thoughts. And laugh at smutty stories. And smoke, messily. I'd seen women fight over a guard's discarded cigarette-end; but Victoria, it seemed, had her own sources of supply.

So the sisters slaved and slept and might have remained a mystery to me if Diana had not heard my name spelt out by a guard. She asked at once if I knew Richard Wurmbrand. I said I was his wife.

"Oh!" she said. Then, quickly, "What can you think of me?"

I asked her what she meant. She said her father was a lay preacher. He used to read to her from Richard's books, which he called his "spiritual food." He'd been sent to prison for his faith, leaving a sick wife and six children. Diana and Florea were the eldest. Both lost their factory jobs when their father went to jail. Soon the family faced starvation.

A youth called Silviu took her to the cinema one evening. He said he could get her a work permit. They went to a restaurant. After a meal with plenty of wine he made love to her.

Soon it happened again. Nothing more was said about work permits, but he gave her a money present. To help the family, she did not refuse it. And a week later he introduced a friend and left them together. When this man in turn tried to make love to her, she was angry. But he too produced badly needed money, and said he had only acted on Silviu's suggestion. She gave way.

Shame wore away under a stream of clients produced by Silviu. She grew accustomed to the life, even preferring it to factory drudgery.

I knew by the way she told the story that Diana was holding something back. She stopped and searched my face.

"I thought you'd be disgusted. Doesn't it upset you that I became a prostitute?"

I said, "You're not a prostitute, you're a prisoner. And nobody is a prostitute or a saint or even a cook or a carpenter all the time. Everyone is himself – the things you do are attributes of only a part of your being. They can change at any time. And I believe you've changed already in telling me about it."

But Diana was not comforted. She sat on the narrow bed in the bare hut, her hands clenched, her face taut with distress and guilt.

"If it was only me," she burst out at last. "It wouldn't be so bad, But I made my sister join me. Silviu suggested it, and said it wasn't fair that I should carry all the responsibility for the family. So in the end I introduced them and let him take her out."

Soon, Florea, too, had been initiated. And the main difficulty was how to keep their secret from their eldest brother, a boy of fifteen, who adored them both. Like his father, he was religious, with a keenly sensitive temperament, but no knowledge of the world. "He wouldn't like a fly to suffer," as Diana put it.

But the sisters' new way of life, their late hours and the money in the house soon told neighbours what was happening, and they told the boy. The shock drove him mad. He ended in a mental home.

Not long afterwards, the father was released. When he discovered the truth, he said: "I ask God for only one thing – that he will send me back to jail, so that I may not see."

Now the tears were flowing unchecked down Diana's face.

"He had his way. He began giving children Gospel lessons and was denounced to the police. The informer told me later that he had done it to get the old man out of the way of our trade. It was Silviu."

Before such a tragedy of betrayal, it was not easy to find words. I said at last:

"You feel shame over what you have done, and rightly. In a world of suffering, where even God is nailed to a cross, you can't allow his name, which you bear as a Christian, to be defiled. But this sense of pain and guilt will lead you to a shining righteousness. Remember, the soldiers not so much pierced Christ's side as "opened" it, that sinners might easily enter his heart and find forgiveness."

She thought, and replied slowly. "Shame, suffering. Yes, I've known them. But there is still something else to say. I didn't always hate the work I was doing. And now all the time bad thoughts come into my head. I can't keep them out. What shall I do? What can I do?"

Diana prayed for help, and it was given. They say that the more perfect a soul is, the more it feels pain. It was terrible to see how souls like hers asked in despair where they could find refuge now that this concupiscence had entered their hearts. Who is to judge Diana, one of many daughters of Christian martyrs? She sinned to get bread for her family. Perhaps the greater sin was that of Christians of the free world who did not trouble to send a piece of bread to save such as her.

p123 The Pastor's Wife

The spring days began to lengthen. Wonderful gold and crimson sunsets filled the sky at evening in the West, beyond the Danube. It became a joy to march to work. Clouds of nettles and pearly cow-parsley sprang from the ditches, smelling moist and green. The earth grew black and oozy. Trees dared to put out shiny young leaves. One longed to touch, they were so small.

The balmy air affected us all. Light, leaves, grass, the sun, everything was changing. We couldn't help changing a little, too. New friendships blossomed.

Maria sat twisting her hair into a schoolgirl's pigtail as she sat in a patch of early morning sunlight.

The teacher, Paula Vieru, who liked to think herself cynical and hard, helped her and talked of books. Maria, eyes alight with interest, asked questions about this writer and that.

Zenaida and Clara were thick as thieves, swapping stories of gowns worn at pre-war opera nights. Of parties attended by royalty, and controversies over hats and hemlines.

Everyone became more willing to love, less ready to wound. But one of the norm-checkers surprised me with an accusation:

"Wurmbrand keeps herself to herself. Doesn't make friends."

I said, "Everyone here is my friend."

The woman was angry.

"You and your clever talk."

I wondered if it was true. I tried to help others. Some women reacted in a very exaggerated way, as if I had been sent directly from heaven. Others were puzzled, and suspected me of some darker motive. It was widely believed in Rumania that there was a Jewish plot to destroy Christianity by infiltrating it. I was Jewish - perhaps I belonged to the plot!

But I did have one friend who was truly close.

It was not speech that first linked us together, but silence. When even the nuns were sighing and complaining, she was silent. It said more than her neighbours' chatter. My eyes would sometimes rest on her as she sat, trying to repair clothes by night. She would look up and meet my gaze calmly. Or working at the quarries I would sense that she was close. There existed between us a thread.

She was in her early thirties. Small and dark, with black eyes that were deep and kind.

"I was quite sure you were a Christian."

She smiled and looked at me with challenging eyes.

"I had wondered if you were perhaps one of us."

I laughed and felt almost gay.

"Have you many years to serve?"

"No, only twelve."

"Only. Then it doesn't worry you?"

"God can release us if he wills. And if he wishes me to stay here, I will stay."

Mrs. Djamil was the wife of a hodja. She had worked for an organization called "Help Crimea." It had tried to help people who had suffered during the Nazi occupation of that area. Fascist connections! She and her husband were arrested, then jailed.

The commandant of Camp K4 once asked her why she was there. She tried to explain. But the commandant had never heard of Crimea.

"You mean Korea, of course," she said. "You've been helping the South Koreans!"

Mrs. Djamil came from Ada-Kaleh, an island in the Danube, and she seemed undismayed at finding herself among so many Christians.

Catholics, Adventists, Jehovah Witnesses, Theosophists explained the errors of the Moslem faith, but Mrs. Djamil did not dispute.

"Mahomet is named ~al amin~, "the Faithful," so I trust what he says," she answered. She did not agree with the Lord's Prayer.

"To call God a Father brings too mild and human an idea to mind. For us God is the master."

Even in our condition, she washed all she ate, and would not touch soup if there was a suspicion that it had been prepared with pork fat. Orthodox Jewesses followed this rule.

"Superstitious prejudice!" said Paula. "Two thousand years ago perhaps there was a reason ..."

But the devotion of these women to their religion won them respect. Prisoners asked them, not Paula, to share out the food equally.

With so many different sects and religions, we had our share of religious argument. But the virulence of former days was gone, in great part. A new understanding arose, at least among the women. Outside, we could not share the world without quarrelling. Here, we shared a hut, a lavatory bucket, everything. We were sisters.

p125 The Pastor's Wife

THE BARAGAN PLAIN

An error had been made in planning the Canal. The smaller irrigation projects would be flooded by the Danube's waters unless banks were built higher and root crops planted to prevent soil erosion. So we moved from the quarries to the fields, to dig and hoe at the height of summer.

The August sun blazed down over the vast plain of the Baragan. We rose at 5 a.m. and hurried out for muster. Hoes and spades (most of them worn out) were issued.

Then the long serpent-column set off, trailing a cloud of white dust like a pillar of fire.

I worked beside Janetta, the daughter of a former merchant. She was to become one of my closest friends and collaborators in the Underground Church. (She is now one of its leading personalities.) She would fulfill the norm for me and others who could not work well. We discovered that we'd been born on the same day. On birthdays, by way of a present, we would exchange some raw potato.

A great field of parsley stretched away before us to the horizon. It grew hotter as the day wore on. The trees quivered in the shimmering air. Not a cart, no living soul appeared.

Only the line of 500 struggling women, strung out across the earth.

Behind us the guards barked, wearily.

"Shut your mouths!"

"Work faster!"

"Hey! This isn't an ass braying. It's a guard giving orders. Move!"

They passed up the line, croaking.

Janetta said, "How we used to long for summer!"

We worked dizzily in the scorching sun, in a waking dream of women hoeing on an empty plain. There was no scrap of shade.

I remembered the words of Job:

~The servant earnestly desireth the shadow.~

The schoolgirl Maria Tilea worked beside us, hacking with lean sunburnt arms at the dusty soil.

p126 The Pastor's Wife

"We can't keep up with you!" gasped Janetta.

"Try my hoe! It's better."

No, it'll just mean a different set of blisters."

"You try, Mrs. Wurmbrand."

So we argued, politely. The schoolgirl, the society woman and the pastor's wife.

The guards approached, shouting threats.

And passed on. Maria would have liked to hear of Janetta's gay life. The luncheons, the race meetings, the charity balls.

"I never think about all that now," said Janetta. "In solitary confinement I learnt that a kind smile is worth them all."

We hoed another hundred yards. Sweat ran down our faces, mingling with dust and dirt. Valeria seemed to wear an antique tragic mask.

"In solitary," she continued, "I had a dream. I saw one of our Communist torturers taking a bath in my bath tub. And other officers were queuing at the door of the bath room to do the same. I shouted at the naked man "Out of here. It is not your place." He answered, "I believe that you Christians have a pool in your hearts like that in Bethesda. Men enter in it dirty and leave it cleansed." He left the tub. His naked body was now whiter than snow. And he had a lovely face. It was no more the man who had beaten me. Then others undressed and entered the tub. With this I awoke. I had had a revelation in my sleep. When any man enters a Christian's life, even by torturing him, he finds there a place where his image is cleared, beautified. We understand him. He might be a criminal for others. For us he becomes a forever beloved being."

The story cheered us. And in that place it was a holy duty to keep up hope in others.

How slowly the hours passed in the big field. How the breath rasped in our throats and our tongues turned to felt. We hoed on, like pieces of machinery that can perform only one movement.

"Can you see it?"

A voice croaked, down the line.

"It must come soon."

But the water-truck did not come.

Even the guards, who carried water-bottles, gazed anxiously towards the horizon. It was late. Hoarse from yelling and marching up the line, they relaxed.

We could stretch our backs. The relief!

"I'll faint if we don't drink soon." Maria looked pale.

"Don't faint. They'll kick you."

The sun climbed higher.

As we worked, I thought of Mihai. I saw his small figure, thin-faced and tearful. Communism loves to steal youth, and they would steal him. What would they make of him, those men who didn't know what kindness is?

How many desperate prayers arose from mothers at that Canal!

I was brought back to reality by shouting down the line. A woman had fainted. The guards were beating her to make her stand. She flopped about in their arms like a fish.

Maria was afraid, and scratched faster at the dust.

"Maria look! The water-truck!"

A dark spot was moving down the road, far away.

The field buzzed with thirsty voices.

"Shut up! Get to work!" yelled the guards.

The truck was exposed to the sun all morning. The water would be far from refreshing by the time it reached us. We could see the old horse that pulled it, now.

We watched as if it were a mirage that might dissolve in the tremulous air.

"I'd like a dozen cool glasses of ice-water," said Zenaida. "A greasy pork chop and a mountain of fruit. Oranges, grapes..."

Cries of "Stop it!"

Prisoners were constantly dropping out to squat by the neld's edge, under the eyes of guards. Dysentery was rife in camp, which was alive with flies and bluebottles. Many were affected. Their limbs were thin as sticks, and their skin grey with the trouble.

We had not eaten or drunk since dawn. Now it was past midday, on that furnace-plain. Eight hours.

A guard walked up the road towards the advancing truck. Then stopped, and turned back.

"It's the food truck," Zenaida wailed. The women began to murmur, angrily.

The common-law prisoners, working near the road, flung down their tools. They began to shout.

The guards pulled out their guns.

A horde of shrieking women menaced them. One burst of automatic fire into that pack would kill scores. Maria buried her face in my shoulder.

For ten minutes the confrontation went on. The women refused to start work.

"Water!" they chanted. We want water!"

Guns were jammed into our ribs. We were herded into a group with the common-law prisoners. Ropes of arms and cold steel pressed back the furious mob. I caught Maria to me.

Now the food truck arrived on the spot. But the frightened driver, gaping at our rebellious swarms, was careless. The cart bounced over a rock, he pulled the wrong rein, the horse veered and for a moment the wagon tottered on its side. Guards yelled and tried to save it. The horse reared.

Over went the canisters.

Half a hundredweight of boiled macaroni tumbled soggily in the dust.

A howl of rage went up. Water, guards, the heat were forgotten.

The food, the precious food was down in the dust!

The women charged the cordon, broke it, and fell on the macaroni.

They snatched sticky handfuls and pushed it into their mouths. They pushed and shoved and fought.

Other women looked on in horror at the fearful show.

Janetta began to laugh, a terrible Homeric laughter, that shook her thin body.

"Luncheon is served!" she gasped. And put her hands to her head.

The guards were content. Danger was past.

An hour later, whistles shrilled and we went back to work.

No water came that day.

In the afternoon two more truckloads of security militia arrived.

As I worked, veils of darkness moved before my eyes. My tongue seemed enormous. I remembered the last words of Jesus on the cross:

~I thirst.~

There is no water in hell.

I remembered the ~pizzicato~ at the start of "I thirst" in Haydn's oratorio, ~The Seven Last Words on the Cross~. He wished to convey an illusion of the crucified Christ, who seemed to feel on His lips drops of falling rain. I was envious, not having even the illusion.

At last, towards sunset, we formed up on the road for the march back. A mile short of the camp gates we passed some puddles of water in a swampy hollow.

Woman after woman fell on hands and knees to lap the muddy stagnant liquid.

A guard was posted at the spot to prevent them.

The next day an inquiry began in camp. Our 'rebellion' earned us some hours of extra punishment work on Sunday.

"This isn't a health resort!" said the commandant.

"Friends, the class struggle is reaching a climax!" Paula had captured our attention. "There are only two classes left in Rumania: optimists and pessimists. Optimists think all Rumanians will be transported to Siberia. Pessimists say they will have to walk."

But now few of us felt like laughing. Women collapsed every day in the fields. At night, in the stifling heat of the hut, they lay half-naked on their beds, in attitudes of utter exhaustion. We seemed scarcely to have lain down before the clanging steel rail sounded reveille. A night's unbroken sleep was rare.

Once I was woken by Paula shaking my arm.

"They've beaten up Diana! Come quickly, she's badly hurt."

The girl was lying, unconscious but breathing heavily, on the bare floor. Blood ran from her nose, and a patch of her hair was matted and sticky. Her lips were swollen. We loosened her clothes and found her body cruelly bruised.

"What kind of game have they been playing, these guards!"

Paula was trembling. Diana moaned and stirred. Her eyes opened.

"It's all right...I didn't let them," she whispered.

We made her drink. When she'd recovered a little, she explained that two of the prostitutes had lured her from the hut to where some guards were waiting. She was nineteen, pretty, and her modesty provoked them. She would not submit. Finally, they threw her into the nearest hut and ran off.

We spread both our blankets over her, for even in that stuffy shed she was shivering. Paula and I sat beside her until daybreak, talking in whispers.

"She has an intelligent face. She might have been a teacher." Paula was always looking for fellow spirits. She'd been a student and then a teacher all her life.

"I dream about taking class," she often said. "I see rows of faces waiting for me to speak. I see myself walk through the pillared entrance, I hear all the sounds of school."

She had written stories, which had earned her a place in the Writers' Union. She marched in their ranks on August 23rd, in the "liberation day" celebrations. She knew some of Rumania's famous authors: the poet Mihai Beniuc, novelists – approved writers who turned out books glorifying Communism and denigrating the West. Agitprop saw to it that everything she wrote contributed to "furthering Socialism." One produced straight propaganda, or one wrote about topics that were remote from the contemporary world.

Paula agreed that hymns praising 'full-of-genius' Stalin were silly. "But all those battle-hymns addressed to God are not so different!"

I said, "The difference is that one praises the Creator of all living things, and the other lauds a sick creature who's killed millions."

I asked why she'd been arrested.

"I made an unwise remark about falsifications in history textbooks. They were choosing people to re-write things as the Russians wanted."

"All the muses are in chains."

"Oh, but writers are very well-treated. We had special privileges and high pay and holiday centres ..."

"But the high pay - which is only high for Rumania - is simply an insurance against your writing anything they dislike. Art and religion are equally persecuted. They survive only underground..."

So we argued the night away. The prisoners murmured and grimaced in their sleep. Names were muttered, or cried aloud; of children, fathers, lovers, friends. But most often, the word "Mother!" Age and class had lost all meaning as they dreamt, and the soul in distress whispered from its depths the old cry.

It went deeper than a simple appeal to one's own parent. It was a cry for the eternal female tenderness and motherly care which exists for us in heaven. I remembered the vision of St. John the Evangelist, to whom the crucified Lord had entrusted his holy mother. It was given to him to see a great wonder in heaven - a woman clothed with the sun and with the moon under her feet.

I was brought before the deputy camp commandant, a red-faced woman with heavy broiled forearms and large, splendid teeth. Her uniform seemed to encumber her movements like chain-mail.

"You've been preaching about God to the prisoners. It must stop!" she warned.

I said that nothing could stop it. Furiously, she raised her fist to strike me.

Then stopped, and stared.

"What are you smiling about?" she demanded, her face quite blotchy with rage.

I said, "If I am smiling, it is because of what I see in your eyes."

"And what's that?"

"Myself. Anyone who comes close to another person can see themselves in her. I was impulsive, too. I used to rage and strike out. Until I learnt what it really means to love. That is to be one who can sacrifice self for truth. Since then, my hands do not clench into fists."

Her hand dropped.

p131 The Pastor's Wife

"If you look into my eyes, you'll see yourself as God could make you!"

She seemed turned to stone.

She said quietly, "Go away."

I have wondered often if Pilate did not look into Jesus' eye and see the ruler he might have been in the "king of the Jews" whom his own wife represented to him as innocent and just. The two names have come down the centuries bound together: "Christ...suffered under Pontius Pilate," say Christians everywhere.

I continued to witness for Christ among the prisoners. The deputy commandant did not interfere.

As we hoed in the fields, Maria worked her way towards me along the row, changing places with her neighbour. Once the guard almost caught her. But at last she was beside me, offering help.

The guards spotted us whispering.

"Get to work!"

We hoed, vigorously. But that morning I was also feeling ill. Dizzy spells made me halt often, and each time I dared straighten my back, the guards would shout:

"You're for the carcer tonight!"

Waves of darkness washed over me. Maria's voice seemed to come from a great distance as she chattered, trying to make me forget how I felt.

I managed to stay on my feet until midday. I drank the cup of rank, watery soup and nibbled at the bread. But in the afternoon I collapsed.

The blazing sun seemed to spin round the sky. Then I saw Maria's face above me, her mouth moving, seeming to shout silently from a well of darkness.

Guards dragged me to my feet. Water was poured down my throat until I choked.

"She's all right."

They swore at Maria: Don't stand gaping. Get to work!" Then straddled off, bobbing through the trembling air.

"You frightened me!" she said.

I had frightened myself. There is something specially frightening for a believer in fainting. You return to yourself, and realize that you have had a complete black-out. It makes you doubt the existence of the soul as a separate entity - a thought more frightening than the thought of death. Only in time could I convince myself that it meant no more than a dreamless sleep. Why should the soul always be self-conscious, always saying to itself,

p132 The Pastor's Wife

"I am"? It is a poor existence if one must constantly tell oneself that one exists.

We went back to work, hacking at the tight-rooted weeds. The merciless sun sapped all our strength. I could barely hold the hoe.

Late in the afternoon, storm clouds piled up on the horizon.

When whistles blew for the end of work, the sky was low and heavy. It hadn't rained for weeks, and we longed for it.

We were working far from camp, and battered lorries waited on the road to take us back. As we crowded in - unable to sit, but at least unable to fall - there was a flash of lightning, and the first warm drops touched our upturned faces.

Then the rain came, moving across the plain like a wall. In seconds we were drenched.

Maria cried, "Lovely, lovely water!"

But the lovely water continued to descend as if tipped from a giant tub. Bellows of thunder split the sky. A bolt of lightning made the women scream.

The truck skidded and stopped. Its back wheels were sunk deep in liquid mud.

"Everyone out! Quickly!"

The guards conferred.

"Fetch wood," they decided. But there was no wood.

In the torrential downpour, up to our knees in water, we women put our backs to the truck and heaved, while the men looked on.

The wheels spun, sending mud flying.

The truck stayed where it was. For an hour we worked in vain, until the sergeant ordered us to march back to camp. Boots squelching, clothes clinging, we tramped through the rain.

The guards struck out at women who stumbled.

At last the ragged column of grey ghosts reached the gates.

"Reporting back with sixty-two bandits, Comrade Commander!" shouted the sergeant.

The damp bandits struggled to their huts. Some were at once put on kitchen fatigues. The rest tried to dry their clothes and fell asleep.

How queer the human mind is. Just before dropping off, there came into my head a joke Richard had told once. A man decided that to complain was futile: he decided that he would in future make the best of things. Just at that moment a wheel came off his cart. "Never mind," he said. "Cabs have only two wheels. I have three. "I'm rich." Then a second wheel came off. "Why worry," he said. "A wheelbarrow has only one wheel. I have two." A third wheel came off. "Well, sleighs have no wheels at all and they still get along," he said. Then he lost the last wheel. "I always wanted to be a sleigh-driver," he exclaimed joyfully.

I fell asleep smiling.

Time stood still. Slavery was our whole life, the Canal our world. We were worn down into a hopeless acceptance of our lot. Even the news from outside never changed. Hunger, queues and oppression. And the eternal, "The Americans are coming, they won't let you remain slaves."

Despondency meant that work levels fell, and strange tricks were played in an attempt to raise them.

At a meeting, twenty women were picked out of the ranks, and told: "You have been the hardest workers here. For this you will be released."

The Commandant made a speech.

"So it's farewell and thanks, Comrades. Together we have struggled to build Communism and now the time has come to share the fruits of our labour! Now you are free! As a parting gift we give you an extra loaf of bread each!"

The twenty heroines leaned out of the back of the truck, waving Red flags and singing the International.

Again a deception. Ten miles down the Canal road, at the next labour colony, they stopped and were put back to work.

The effect on work norms at Camp K4 was electric. But this trick was performed in other camps, and soon we learnt the truth.

p134 The Pastor's Wife

THE TRAIN

One morning directly after reveille the guards crashed in. " Everyone to be ready to move within the hour!"

This wasn't a matter of two or three detachments. The whole camp was being alerted. Hundreds of women were preparing their bundles, rushing about like chickens, trying to embrace friends they might never see again. The guards added to the tension with their own unease. They knew no more than we.

The Americans had broken through the Iron Curtain! The Russians had occupied West Berlin! We were being taken to be shot!

"Not actually boots!" cried Zenaida's clear voice. Our first issue of footwear was in progress. They were being thrown out of a cart by the hut-leader without reference to size or aim. I won a pair three sizes too large.

When all was ready, the cases and bundles piled, the women lined up in ragged rows, the waiting began. What were we waiting for? No one knew. Where were we going? Everyone "knew" something different. Prison life is one enormous wait, and this time we hung about until almost dark before boarding the trucks. We were driven to the marshalling yards.

No riots at K4. The sidings were deserted except for a few railwaymen. They'd seen it all before. The train was made up of goods wagons and a string of long, black prison carriages. Each of them was self-contained, with a heavy sliding door and a few small windows high up, covered by metal grilles. In appearance, a luggage van.

"Move! Everyone in!" The train guards specialized in this work. Sloppy-looking men on an "easy number." They let the K4 men shove us into the wagons, which took time. There was barely room to stand.

"We can't take anymore here!"

"My God, we'll suffocate!"

But more and more women were pushed in, until we were eighty-four in a carriage intended for forty. The big sliding door at last smashed shut and the bar was secured. The couplings clanged as the train jolted into life throwing us all together.

Our carriage contained some benches. One, it was revealed, concealed a W.C. - waterless, of course, and paperless, but no one thought of complaining about that. And it had a lid!

Women were settling down for the night, or quarrelling, or weeping - for what, they were not sure. The windy huts of Camp K4 had become home. And the unknown threatened. The rumour-merchants were predicting our mass execution. We were to be machine-gunned and thrown into the grave we ourselves had dug. And we would be better off that way, mumbled some of the simpler minds.

But no, assured a woman from Ploesti, in tones of authority: we were bound for Ghencea transit camp and an early release. She'd heard that Ana Pauker's clique had fallen from power and the Party line was being revised.

The wagon buzzed with surmise. That the horrid Ana should taste a little of her own poison! Few really believed it, but everyone seemed cheered.

A joke was told. "What's the difference between a zebra and a Communist?" "With zebras the lines are on the animal; with the Party the animals have to stay on the line."

It was hard to find a space to sit, impossible to stretch out. We dozed in snatches and were woken often by the grinding of brakes, announcing yet another mysterious halt. Outside the narrow windows there was only darkness.

Slowly the autumn landscape was revealed. Cows grazed peacefully in the fields. The very sight of these homely beasts gave hope, after the long empty plains of the Baragan. And trees: leafless already, but holding their black branches to the sky as if in supplication. Then some peasants, free men and women, spreading dung over the dark earth. Three little girls waved and waved, never knowing that they had caused a hundred women to weep.

The train puffed and lurched across Rumania, always northwards. After an hour it stopped at a junction. We heard the sound of doors sliding back and bars rattling. Some buckets of water were handed in by the guards, while others stood by with machine-guns.

But the surly peasant youth in uniform was used to watering beasts and knew one did not answer their cries. And there was, anyway, no bread.

As the train moved on, speculation began again. The gypsies were babbling incomprehensibly among themselves, as always.

p136 The Pastor's Wife

The peasant women from the collectives had already given way to remembering and mourning lost cattle and children.

Only a few old acquaintances were in the carriage. Helena Coliu, the girl who still believed in Communism despite her beatings; Annie Stanescu, the cheerful little prostitute, and Maria Tilea were there. But no Zenaida, no Clara Strauss, no Granny Apostol, no Cornelia Marinescu. I didn't even know if they were on the train.

Amateur politicians near me were discussing the American elections. We knew they were to take place that winter. Truman had served his four years and Eisenhower - who had been Supreme Commander in Europe for so long - was going to save us.

"Of course he'll be elected," cried the well-informed lady from Ploesti. "My information is that he'll ask special powers as President to free the captive countries of Eastern Europe."

Sensation! And since the woman had passed through Ghencea transit camp only a month earlier she was believed beyond the dictates of her listeners' need for comfort.

I wanted to say that this same Eisenhower had handed hundreds of thousands of refugees from Communism at the end of the war to "Uncle Joe," as Roosevelt called Stalin. Some committed suicide, some were hanged, some perished in Siberian camps. But I kept quiet. Why dispel illusions, when people needed them as a thirsty man needs water?

How slowly the train crept through the damp countryside. It groaned and grated over the points. It stopped and started. It stood for long hours in nameless sidings. Women took turns to crowd around the small windows, savouring the sight of farmhouses, of smouldering bonfires tended by silent peasants; tasting the first nip of frost in the autumn air.

The excitement of being on the move had worn off, the panic of being crammed into that rocking, lurching black tube turned to discomfort, and soon, with so many women ill, to misery. Despite numerous draughts, the wagon achieved a smelly airlessness.

There were many literary women there: writers, journalists, poets - published and otherwise - even some novelists. Gaunt, dark-haired Marina Capoianu, who'd taught English and French literature at Cluj, displayed an astonishing gift as a story-teller, recounting with a wealth of incident the classic novels she had once urged on unwilling pupils. At dramatic moments her strong, reach-to-the-back-of-the-classroom voice would boom out with Bill Sykes' curses on Nancy or Madame Bovary's passionate cries: "L,on L,on! Till Thursday, till Thursday!"

One of the most popular of her stories was the melodramatic

p137 The Pastor's Wife

"Portrait of Dorian Gray." Wilde's novel of crime and punishment, told over three hours while we were stuck in a silent and deserted siding that evening, was a howling success. In the murder scene, she slapped a clenched fist repeatedly into the palm of her hand as Dorian Gray stabbed and stabbed again. Her audience almost burst into applause. (Oscar Wilde complained of the prison conditions of his time. If he'd seen these women, travelling like cattle, what would he have said?)

"Isn't it wonderful, education!" The peasants were astonished and amused. "To be able to say all that without the book!" The intellectuals had been no less absorbed, but now began to run down poor Oscar for frivolity, or snobbishness and more febrile failings. In the argument, Janetta said that Wilde had put an allegorical meaning into a book of deep religious feeling. In Dorian Gray, the painter represents Christ, who paints his image in the heart of every man. But as Dorian's innocence is corrupted, the image of Christ becomes more and more distorted until Dorian can no longer bear to look at it. He puts it away from him as all men do. Then one day the painter knocks at the door and asks to see the picture. But Dorian cannot bear that it should be seen. He made it what it is. So people do what Dorian Gray did: he killed the painter - Christ is killed - and in the moment he does, he kills the sense of his own life.

It is an allegory of Deicide, the greatest of crimes, but also that which at last brings pardon for all things and renewal. The blood shed on Golgotha saved even Christ's murderers. Wilde's symbolism of the painter continues here: he knew that death would be his fate if he asked to see the painting; yet he came. By his sacrifice the picture of Dorian Gray was restored to its original beauty.

Now it was Marina's turn to look startled. "Utterly far-fetched!" she cried. "It's really an unconscious portrait of Wilde's own psychology. ~He~ was the fat, hideous, bloated portrait, and Dorian Gray represents his boyhood which he so longed for that he was prepared to kill his genius - represented by the painter - in order to restore it. Which, of course, is what he later did."

Others eagerly interpreted the book in terms of the class struggle (that poor, cast-off waif and the downfall of the idle rich).

It was plainly a parable, said Mrs. Capoianu, ambiguous and many-sided like all good art. "But not a very ~English~ book; quite Russian, in some ways." So eighty women, trundling by train across Rumania, forgot fears of execution for a while and were entertained by Oscar Wilde.

At one stop the doors were wrenched open and a bag of rations was thrown in. The loaves of black bread were newly-baked and smelled delicious; but had to be carefully portioned out among the groups. We gobbled it all down at once. At any moment we might arrive. Food saved up is food lost - it was the rule of prison life. For a moment the trainload of women forgot how their poor skins rubbed and fretted against the wood, how their bodies ached and itched and tormented them.

For two days we rattled on, with stops and starts, through this limbo. But on the third, though the halts grew longer, neither water nor bread came. Until late in the evening the doors were opened and the dishevelled sergeant in person was revealed. He had been drinking. Tzuica – sticky Rumanian plum brandy no doubt. His boots crunched on the flints as he rocked on his heels, watching the surly escort throw in the bag of bread.

"You women are lucky tonight." Our silence was solidly doubtful. "There's a spoonful of jam each to go with the bread."

Perhaps the Tzuica would induce further condescensions. Maria asked boldly: "How much further to go, Sergeant-major?"

Flattered, the sergeant said: "Another day."

"And where are we headed?"

He hiccuped. "To be shot, of course!" And roared with laughter.

The sliding doors crashed shut. And the carriage broke into noisy argument. Those who had not begun to weep and wail were again asking each other questions: Could it be true? But he was drunk. That was just why you could believe him! Sobbing Jewish women began to clasp one another and exchange kisses of farewell. To have escaped the Nazi camps, and now this!

The train moved on, with painful slowness. And stopped after an hour. And moved on again.

Mrs. Capoianu, who had been lost in a waking dream beside me, asked suddenly: "Sabina, are we all simply the victims of a madman? What does it all mean? They say he sits behind locked steel doors, terrified, ordering more and more deaths. And when the foreign Ambassadors come, he never speaks, but draws and draws with a red pencil on a scrap of paper. Over and over again, drawings of women in postures of torture." She shivered convulsively. "And they all speak of him so, as if he were a god. 'Full-of-genius Stalin!' 'Father Stalin!'"

I said: "It wouldn't be the first time men had become victims of a dictator who tried to sit on God's throne. They accuse Him, and try to take His place. When I think of Stalin, I always remember Pharaoh. The slave-labour, the pogroms, the terror here it is all over again. A man has tried to steal God's place. You know how Pharaoh ordered all male children of the Jews thrown into the Nile. And then Pharaoh brought up as one of his own

p139 The Pastor's Wife

family the man who was to carry out God's plan against him. It's said, in the 2nd Psalm, that God laughs sometimes." (After many years I thought I heard God's laughter again: Stalin's daughter, a convert of the underground Church in Russia!)

"I know he can't last forever," Mrs. Capoianu said. "But what makes a man into a fiend like that?"

"Often circumstances." I said. "They don't explain everything, but they explain a lot." He was the illegitimate son of a police officer. His mother had to work as a servant in his house, and so she became pregnant with the future Stalin. His legal father was a drunkard who knew the boy was not his and he beat him mercilessly. Then Stalin entered an Orthodox seminary where the boys were more prisoners than scholars, and there was the aggravating circumstance that he was a Georgian at a time when the Russians had closed down and oppressed the Georgian Orthodox Church. So he became a revolutionary. Now we see how such revolutionaries are made.

It was a night of dread. At every halt we feared that the crunching boots would stop, the doors be opened and women dragged out to their deaths. For hours the Christian prisoners tried to calm and comfort the rest. Yet nothing happened that day, or the next. At sunset the peaks of distant mountains were seen, touched with gold. As darkness fell again, the women sank into a stupor of exhaustion and misery.

"Out! Everyone OUT!"

The bolts were drawn back to reveal a night as black as pitch. There was no station, no siding, even. Dear God, was it true, were they really going to massacre us all? Crying, screaming, swearing, the women leapt or fell out onto the flinty tracks. There were no steps down and I fell painfully on my knees. Several others were helped down – but not by the guards, who stood waving machine-guns and shouting like lunatics at the terrified prisoners. Probably a long wait in the cold and wet was to blame for their mood. But to us they seemed devils out of hell.

Women were punched in the face, flung aside, slapped, struck with gun-butts. We had not the faintest notion of what we were supposed to do.

"Line up, line up! Keep near the sergeant!" But there was nowhere to line up to. Women slipped and tumbled down a muddy embankment into a wire fence. One young guard assumed they were trying to escape and lashed out with his fists. Mrs. Capoianu caught a swinging blow and staggered into her neighbours.

After an hour of utter confusion, several hundred of us were herded into fields beside the track.

"Everyone down! Lie down on your bellies! Get down!"

p140 The Pastor's Wife

We were forced to lie face down in the mud. A ring of swearing guards encircled us.

"Oh God, oh God, they're going to shoot us!" the woman next to me murmured over and over. "Don't let it happen, don't let it happen. I'll never complain again." She gabbled prayers and pleas. I think we all did.

"On the road! Bandits, are you all deaf?"

We marched very quickly through the darkness, spurred on by threats and blows. Struggling with our bundles. Falling, skidding, gasping for breath. Stunned with shock after four days of stiff-backed inactivity.

"Hold it! Get them into that field! Everyone down!"

Down we went on our faces or knees again. Half the column was lost, and we had to wait for it to catch up.

How long we marched, I don't know. It seemed hours before we saw the high walls of a new prison, long stretches of pallid blankness under the glare of electric lamps. The heavy steel and wood gates opened and we passed through in straggly rows of fives.

In the courtyard word went round: this was Tirgusor.

A new name, new guards. The same curses. The same routine

The checking of names and numbers began. It was long past midnight when we reached our cells.

Why here? Why Tirgusor? everyone asked. It was a maximum security prison where murderers convicted of violent crimes were held. The name was famous in Rumania. What a mystery! What could it mean?

"That they have no other prisons left," murmured Mrs. Capoianu.

But no one was comforted.

p141 The Pastor's Wife

TIRGUSOR

I was put to work in the sewing shop at Tirgusor. Women worked round the clock in twelve-hour shifts, sitting at benches in a big high room with barred windows near the ceiling.

The sewing machines appeared to date from the last century and broke down at least once a day. I soon ceased to share Richard's pride about Singer, the Jew who invented sewing machines.

We stitched thick thread into prison mattresses. The heavy material had to be turned and twisted constantly, while the sewing-machine pedals were pumped by foot.

The night-shift women regularly fell asleep over their machines. (You couldn't sleep by day because of the prison noise). So warders patrolled the rows, dealing out slaps and punches. Not a few women wondered, in the small hours of morning, if life had not been better at the Canal.

Tirgusor contained the country's most hardened criminals. Murderers, sex offenders, swindlers, sadists - some clearly insane.

On the machine next to me sat a hysterical woman. She had stabbed a doctor to death with a pair of scissors. Several times a day she borrowed the scissors shared by the whole bench. She seemed not to notice the nervous glances of her neighbours as she snipped away. Often she would stare at the scissors before putting them aside.

Poor "Mad Anna" lived in a world of fantasy. She believed she'd had intimate relations with the doctor she had killed. Now she wrote, with a needle on soap, letters to herself from imaginary lovers. They were numerous, and had distinct characters. Peter's letters were high-flown. John's were passionate. Henry's were homely. All were read aloud to her startled cell companions.

Anna had occasional fits of hysterical weeping, but for most of the day lived happily in her illusory world. In prison or out, it made small difference to her.

How many tearful recognition scenes I saw in prisons: when the cell door opened it seemed to be always to admit the mother or sister or cousin of one already there. They had each thought the other was free, and looking after the children. With that hope gone, their grief was terrible to see.

We saw some very odd meetings, too. One morning a new arrival announced herself: "I'm Mrs. Cornilescu from Cluj."

That was a coincidence. We already had one Mrs. Cornilescu from Cluj. Heads emerged from bunks to watch the confrontation. It seemed that both the Mr. Cornilescus were called Emil. And both were former Iron Guards. But the first was tall and dark. A charming man, so well-bred. The second Mrs. Cornilescu paled. Her Emil was also tall and dark. With such lovely manners.

"Pardon me," said my neighbour. "But in Cell 3 I happen to know there is a third Mrs. Cornilescu. Her husband also fits this description!"

Neither of our Mrs. Cornilescus could be called beautiful. One was small and sly with brown teeth, the other tall and haggard with legs thin as sticks. Both had snapped up the offer of marriage.

A furious argument began. The first Mrs. C. slapped her rival's face. The second pulled the first's hair. Guards rushed in to part them.

"My dear, it's an old story," said my neighbour. "The man's on the run from the Secret Police like all the old Iron Guards. He's got no home, no papers, no money. He lives off one woman after another, marrying them or promising to. Then the wives are arrested and meet in jail. I've seen some frightful fights in my time."

Meetings between relatives also came about because entire families had been arrested for helping fugitives in the mountains. The resistance leader, Colonel Arsenescu, was a popular figure and hundreds of people were arrested for helping his men. His wife was in prison. She was told, by stool-pigeons, that her husband had been shot: the lie was fed to her in a bid to break her spirit.

We heard that General Eisenhower had been elected President of the U.S.A. Then, that several Communist leaders had been overthrown and purged from the Party. Was it the start of liberalization?

"What do such puppets count?" said Silvia, a woman journalist. "Russia controls everything. Nothing will change until Stalin goes."

But a rumour began to spread throughout Rumania: the Canal was to be abandoned. The great labour colonies were to be shut down. The basic plan was at fault.

Rumour hardened into a fact. An eye-witness from Camp K4 told us that the camp was closing. Officers were being arrested. The Canal engineers were to be tried as criminals for "stealing State funds."

The thought was in every mind: what use would they have now for these tens of thousands of prisoners? Would they set us free?

A young woman from Ana Pauker's ministry was put in our cell. She upset everyone with her bitter tirades. We were the bandits, she the suffering innocent. Jenny Silvestru couldn't believe it had happened.

"I'm a victim of injustice!" she declared, several times a day.

"For injustice, read Communism," Mrs. Iliescu, wife of an Iron Guard officer told her.

"The Party should shoot the likes of you. You're treated too well!"

"My dear girl, I was in prison under Antonescu. I was freed for a few months before the Communists put me back. This is my sixth year in jail. Your threats mean nothing to me."

Mrs. Iliescu was as troublesome as Jenny. Her contempt for the Communists was boundless.

"We must show our superiority to these scum by working above their wretched norms. Under Communism or not, what we do will benefit the Fatherland!"

She worked so hard in the sweatshop that the norms were raised and everyone suffered. It was a stupid and revolting attitude. Yet it was hard not to respect her. She had suffered so much. She had such courage.

One of her often-repeated stories was of a woman interrogator who had a sadistic taste for torturing men prisoners. She landed in Jilava after the first Party purge. "Women whose husbands and sons had borne pain and indignity at her hands fell on her," said Mrs. Iliescu. "They threw a blanket over her head and beat her black and blue."

Even when such unspeakable hatreds existed, reconciliation was still possible. There is a huge power in the word of God. Once, when asked, I refused to lead prayers in the cell so long as there were women present who would not make peace. I quoted Matthew 5:23 [MTT 5:23]:

> "Therefore if thou bring thy gift to the altar, and there rememberest that thy brother hath ought against thee; leave there thy gift, and go thy way; first be reconciled to thy brother and then come and offer thy gift."

Men and women were persuaded to end long and bitter quarrels with these words. Their lives were changed. As an apocryphal word of Jesus has it: "You will never be happy until you look on your brother with love."

But an atmosphere of intense fear and suspicion reigned throughout Tirgusor. We had no wall-tapping grapevine. The Communists were trying to use such things for their own purposes. In every cell stool-pigeons spied and tapped out false messages. The answers obtained from unsuspecting new arrivals were used in the intense interrogations then in progress.

The Communists in prison were sure they would be shot. They had been ruthless, ruthlessness would be returned.

In the meantime the loving and the lovable were executed.

A happening in Jilava.

The daughter of a high Communist official, herself a Christian, learnt one evening that she must face the firing squad at midnight. Executions were frequent, and death sentences were passed on paltry pretexts, often for revenge.

This girl, before going to meet "the midnight bride" - as execution was known - held a last supper of oat-gruel and water with her cell companions. Calmly she lifted the earthenware vessel which had contained the food.

"Soon I shall be earth again," she said. "Of the same stuff as this vessel. Who knows what it was before? Perhaps the handsome body of a young man. Soon out of my body grass will grow. But there is more to death than this, and it is for this that we are on earth, to tend our souls regally while we live."

As the girl was taken out, she raised her voice in the Creed. Passing through the vaulted gallery, it echoed from wall to wall. The words were those we say in church. But it was a different Creed, because she meant every word. She went to death for the one God, and was received into life everlasting.

Weeks passed. Twice daily at Tirgusor, we were counted. But few guards could count. Fewer still could add the front ranks to the rear. The business took hours. Then came cell checks. The bars were tested with wooden truncheons. It was very cold in the yard and we used to pray each morning that there would not be too many miscounts.

One day the count passed with amazing speed. And immediately after came the ominous call:

"Gather all your things!"

We were on the move.

p145 The Pastor's Wife

THE PIG FARM

In open trucks we drove towards the collective farm of Ferma Rosie. We started work at once in the fields. We had no cover vines with earth to save them from the cold. But the earth was like iron and the poor plants were long since frozen dry. The work had been left too late. There would be no vineyard next year. And no one seemed to care. It was not their business. They made a play of carrying out the useless work and sent in their report.

This vineyard had been one of the most famous in Rumania. Its owner was now in prison. But the victims of forcible collectivization were by no means only big landlords. Small farmers and peasants were the hardest hit. Their attempts to revolt against the system were ruthlessly crushed and they became sullen and indifferent. They worked as little as possible. Then, for "failing to discharge their obligations to the State" they were jailed by the thousand. The land remained untilled. The former "granary of Europe" faced famine. And the State's answer was to send prisoners as slave labour on the collectives.

It was the same everywhere: the fields were cultivated so badly that little grew. The guards put to watch over us were often peasants themselves. One told how he had been ordered to shoot the first man he saw in a village. Then the villagers were gathered and invited to join the collective of their own free will.

Officials searched the homes of unwilling farmers. Always they found that they were 'hiding arms' – guns the police had planted.

Farmers' wives told how the collectivization teams had taken everything they owned, cattle, carts, farming tools.

Mrs. Manuila, a big-boned peasant woman who worked beside me, said: "When everything was gone, my husband said, 'Our hymn book remains. Let us sing to the Lord and thank him for the greater possessions we have in heaven.'"

Mrs. Manuila possessed a favourite cow. She spoke of it tenderly. How she embraced its neck on cold-mornings. How its warmth had spread through her body.

p146 The Pastor's Wife

"Cows don't give good milk unless you love them," she said. "Now it's just a beast like other beasts."

On the collectives, nothing was done with love: there was no blessing from God.

While working in the fields one morning, I collapsed. The sweatshop, the collectives, had ended my resistance. Guards put me on an improvised stretcher. I was carried to the truck and taken to Vacaresti prison hospital. On the way my head had swollen until I guessed it must have taken the shape of a melon.

I knew the prison well. Richard had preached there in the old days. I'd come at Christmas with parcels, to help prepare a tree. Instead of a hospital ward I was put in an isolated cell in which there was nothing except a dirty bucket in the corner. I slept on the bare concrete.

Next morning, looking out through the window, I saw male prisoners taking their exercise. When they passed my window I asked if they had heard anything about Richard Wurmbrand. The first and second man shook their head. The guard was taking a nap. The third, when he heard my request said: " Wurmbrand? The Pastor?" "Yes," I replied, "he is my husband."

He bowed to the earth as the Orthodox do in church. "I met him," he whispered. "I do not regret my ten years in prison. They were worthwhile because the pastor brought me to Christ. And now I meet his wife!" He had to pass on, but he had not told me if Richard still lived.

He went around the yard, head down, hands behind his back. When he passed near the window again, he added: "I met him in Tirgul-Ocna. He was in the cell for the dying. He always spoke about Christ."

On his next trip round the yard I found my new friend was a school teacher. The guard yawned. His nap was over and he ordered the prisoners back to their cells. But I knew that Richard continued to be Richard, to exalt Christ, to win souls. Or was he referring to a past long ago?

As to the mark of high respect, I was not surprised. Rumanians generally had a deep respect for those who brought them to Christ.

I remained another day in the cell, no doctor calling to examine me, but I was happy to remain there, hoping to see the teacher again. I did not believe that Richard was dead. I cannot say why. But a verse from the Bible came like music to my mind. It concerned Jacob's son, Reuben, which is Richard's Hebrew name: "Let Reuben live and not die." [DEU 33:6] It was to me a promise.

p147 The Pastor's Wife

After forty-eight hours the hospital authorities remembered I had been admitted as an urgent case. I was put in a bed with sheets and blankets.

A woman doctor in clean white coat walked the wards.

"Now you must eat everything you're given she said. The kindness of her voice brought tears to my eyes.

Dr. Maria Cresin was fresh from medical school. With courage and patience, she worked in understaffed, overcrowded Vacaresti, adored by her patients.

I had an ugly skin trouble. A kind of scurvy, she said, resulting from malnutrition. I must eat: it was the only cure. She gave me injections, and the trouble began to fade. Sores and scabs on my body began to heal. The colitis and diarrhea ceased. I could even see more clearly: lack of vitamins plays tricks with the eyesight, and many prisoners were blind by night.

In the next bed was a once-wealthy woman. She wasn't too upset at being in prison. She was sure she'd be free soon. Wasn't Eisenhower America's President? And Winston Churchill Britain's Prime Minister? Two great soldiers would not let East Europe remain in slavery.

"When the Americans come, they'll make the Russians pay war compensation. Taking into account my former income, I shall ask 5,000 lei a day for the six months I've been in prison. That is one million lei! I shall be secure for the rest of my life."

I suggested that she might as well ask for 10,000 lei a day. Then she'd have two millions.

"What a good idea," she said. "You Jews are clever people!"

The other prisoners called her "The Millionairess."

We played games in the ward, which often ended in tears. We tried to imagine how life would be when we were deaf old women. A word was passed from one end of a row to the other. Each patient distorted it a little, so that it emerged as something different. But the laughter and the excitement upset us. And once it had changed to weeping the ward was caught up in a crisis of grief. Many were young, and they saw their youth passing away. The game would become reality.

Vacaresti was supervised by a political officer. (Medicine, like everything else, had to be practised in the spirit of the class struggle.) One evening he came into the ward with some uniformed colleagues and made a pompous speech about the joys of Communism. When such fine hospitals as this were freely available, who needed God? he asked.

I said, "Lieutenant, as long as there will be people on earth, we will need God and we will need Jesus, who gives life and

He was outraged. How did I dare to interrupt? How could I go on believing such stuff?

I said, "Everyone who lives in a house knows it has been built by an architect, just as everyone who attends a banquet knows it was prepared by a cook. We are all invited to the banquet of this world, which is so full of wonderful things, the sun, the moon, stars and rain and fruits of all kinds; and we know that the one who has prepared this is God."

The political officer laughed and scoffed and walked out with his friends, banging the door.

Next morning a guard came and told me to pack. The same day I was sent back to the labour colonies.

This time it was a State pig farm, where fifty women tended several hundred swine. The years had been hard, but this was the hardest of all. Food was at starvation level. We dragged ourselves from our beds at 5 a.m., still wearing the filthy rags in which we had lain down, and went out into the cold and darkness to feed the pigs.

The sties were ankle-deep in liquid filth - the one substance that never froze. A vile, nauseating stench hung over the place and penetrated every angle of our huts. It hung about the body and hair. The very skilly we slopped up with our wooden spoons savoured of it. We were better off than the prodigal son; we filled our bellies with the husks that the swine did eat.

The meaning fell away from things. Death stared me in the face. The whole world was made of tears and despair as never before and a cry rose from my heart: "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" [PSA 22:1, MRK 15:34]

Trying to clean their sties was as hopeless as trying to clean the world. Each day we started afresh, wet, hungry and half-dead, to cart away in barrows the mountains of filth.

I knew there was no hope for me, nor for the world, and expected only to die.

And perhaps, in a psychological condition such as this, I should not have survived for long. But happily it did not last for many weeks. I am convinced that the Lord heard my prayers and took me out according to his plan. I had only to learn a very deep lesson, to drink the cup to its bitterest dregs; and now I am thankful that I passed through this hard school, which teaches you the highest love, love towards God, even when He gives nothing but suffering.

From the back of an open truck I watched the pig farm receding, a dark huddle of huts in the white landscape. The wind was like a cold, steel hand. It tugged at the flaps of our clothes and sent fine skeins of snow skittering across the land. No one knew or asked or greatly cared where we were headed. One collective was identical with the next.

But unexpectedly we came to Ghencea, the transit camp from which, over two years ago, I had set out for the Canal.

"What crowds of women! The place is busier than ever," we whispered among ourselves as we waited to be checked and numbered. "What's going on?"

It was after dark before they'd finished with us and we could be marched off to the huts. The circulation returned to our stiff limbs. Inside, in the comparative warmth, hope began to seep through us like a thaw. The hundreds of women who packed this and every other hut in Ghencea came from camps all over Rumania. Either they planned some big new slave labour scheme, or ...

But no one dared to voice the hope. We'd been through too much, we'd gulled ourselves too often.

On the second day a rumour spread; in the offices at Ghencea ten men from Security H.Q. were working on dossiers. Our dossiers! They'd arrived from Bucharest two days ago. Could it really mean freedom?

I looked around the hut. Under the dim, unshaded lights, scarecrow-women sat and talked in low voices, turning over the rumour, pulling it inside out, talking, talking - and all the while our minds were planning for the future. The smell of sour food and sour bodies hung like a miasma in the air. Loudspeakers had been added to the camp equipment. From time to time they gave forth vast, crackling sounds, like amplified frying eggs, and roared out incomprehensible distorted messages. When the first sensation had passed you saw women sitting blank-eyed for hours at a time, waiting. No, they didn't believe they would leave it behind - ever.

Some of the gypsy girls I'd known at Cernavoda were there. And one day I heard my name called.

"Sabina, Sabina!" It was Zenaida, who had queened it in pre-war Bucharest, from K4. She had done a round of collectives, too. We tried to clasp each others hands, then stopped. For all our fingers were swollen and cracked with chilblains.

We laughed and told our stories, or as much of them as we could bear. She insisted that I take a pair of men's trousers and a warm jacket which she'd scrounged from somewhere. I did so gratefully.

p150 The Pastor's Wife

"It's Charlie Chaplin to the life!" The others stood back to take in the effect. "Even her boots have tabs on the back!"

Soon enough, we came around to discussion of the vital topic.

"How much longer?"

"Does it mean what we think it means?"

Then guards began to take us for questioning at the camp offices. Zenaida was in one of the early groups. She told me:

"It was just like any old interrogation, really, only very polite. And instead of asking about you, they asked what ~we~ thought about them!"

The customary three officers in uniform sat behind desks covered with papers, Zenaida said. After a few questions about her health, and how we were enjoying our stay and did we have relatives outside, things took a more unusual turn.

They asked: Do you know how wrong you were to oppose the building of Socialism? What do you think of your re-education in prison? Do you understand that the State was right to give you this chance to reform? That nothing and no one will be able to turn back the tide of Communism?

"Naturally, I told them I'd enjoyed every minute," said Zenaida. "What a pompous ass in charge. Ranting on about national achievements and our fine farms and splendid camps. To ~me~, dear, after three years and nine months of it!"

Like most prisoners, she did her best to give the impression that she had seen the error of her ways, and was now eager to work for a place in society.

Before the month was out, small groups of women began to leave Ghencea. As always, we didn't know where they might be headed. Lists of names were read out, parties were marched to the camp offices, then driven off in trucks. But it was one more small, hopeful sign.

Eventually, my turn came. The major behind the desk was stout and pink as a baby. He had hands like fat little bunches of sausages and with them he kept clearing the objects on his desk while he talked, as if he might need to jump up on it later to round off his speech.

There were a few special questions reserved for religious prisoners.

"In this place, Mrs. Wurmbrand (Mrs.!) you must know that I am more powerful than God. At least, he has not so far made any interventions in this office." He took as his due the appreciative smiles of the two assistants. "But have you really accepted this? Have you really seen through the sham of religion? Have you realized that in a Communist society, God is superfluous? That you don't need him any more? If you are ever released from here you'll be astonished at the achievements of recent years, and we are only beginning!"

The gold braid on his epaulettes was new and glittering. Under his sausage-hand was a buff file stuffed with papers which might be mine.

I said: "I see that you are powerful. And probably you have papers and documents there about me that I've never seen and can decide my fate. But God keeps records, too, and neither you nor I would have life without him. So whether he keeps me here or sets me free, I'll accept that as best for me."

The major banged both fists on the desk, as if it were something he could hurt. "Ungrateful, Mrs. Wurmbrand, ungrateful! I'm sorry to see that you've failed to learn your lesson, and I shall make a report to that effect." He shouted in mock-rage for a few minutes.

But three days later my name was read out. Higher authorities than the major were, indeed, deciding my future.

We stood waiting in the snow-covered yard outside the camp offices with our poor bundles. Even now we weren't at all sure that we'd be freed. It was only when we'd been marched out through the gates of twanging barbed-wire and stood shivering in the road that the guard began the long process of handing out slips of paper.

The wind carried his hoarse voice away.

"Wurmbrand, Sabina, born Cernauti 1913...resident at ..."

I took the document ordering my release. "Certificate of Liberation," was the heading, but it was growing too dark to read. The last bars of copper showed in the sky as we piled into a truck and drove off. Ghencea is only a few miles from Bucharest, but we were dropped well outside the outskirts of the town.

I walked with my greasy, smelly bundle through the suburbs. For the first time in nearly three years I saw people, hurrying home after work, shopping for their families.

"Home!" That was where I was heading. If it existed.

If anything existed. Homes, friends, family – I didn't know what had happened to any of them. Mihai would be fourteen now. What had the years done to him? I was almost frightened of finding out; and longed to see him at the same time.

How the lights dazzled my eyes, and the smells of food from restaurants shocked my senses! I wanted to cover my ears against the screeching metal of the trams, to cower from their plumes of falling blue sparks. As the stream of people hustled past indifferently a sense of dismay came over me. I looked for the No. 7 tram stop. Perhaps it didn't exist any longer. Yes, there it was.

I suppressed my panic and climbed aboard, then realized I had no money.

I said loudly: Could someone be so kind as to pay my fare!

All heads turned to see who made this unusual request. And a glance was enough to know why it was made. A dozen people immediately offered to pay for me. They crowded around, their eyes full of sympathy. This kind of thing was a part of life now. Everyone there, it seemed, had a relative or friend in prison. They asked no questions – only mentioned names of their dear ones whom I might know.

We passed near Victory Street with sad memories of the police station where I'd first been held. Nothing had changed. The gigantic portraits of mankind's four geniuses – Marx, Engels, Lenin, Stalin – still stared down on the crowds who tramped through the slush. I left the tram near a block of flats I knew and climbed the stairs. The door was opened by a friend.

"Sabina!" She put her hands to her mouth and stepped back. "Is it possible?" We embraced. "I feel quite faint," she said. And began to cry.

Someone ran to fetch Mihai. My heart seemed to stop as I saw him come through the door. He was tall and pale. And so thin.

But a young man, now.

As we embraced, the tears began to flow down my cheeks at last. He wiped them away with his hands.

"Don't cry too much, Mother," he said.

At that moment it seemed to me that all my troubles were over and that I would never need to cry again.

HOME AGAIN

We walked together next day in Bucharest's big park, Cishmigiu. I had to discover my son again. I didn't know him any more. When Mihai was very young, we almost feared for him. He seemed consumed by religious feelings. He put such searching questions. He was precocious, a keen evangelist at the age of five. When he was seven he brought to Christ a professor who became a member of our congregation.

Would the good in him have been destroyed in our absence by the Communists - by men who did not know what kindness was?

I rejoiced to find in him at once fine traits of character. We spoke of my years of imprisonment and forced labour. He said, "We don't criticize nature for the fact that it contains both day and night, light and darkness. So I accept the badness of men. Let us try not to call them brutes."

I, still wondering, told him about the Way of the Cross. He listened attentively, until his eye was caught on our walk by a fruit tree bursting into bud. It was one of those heavenly spring days that come before their time, as if the fine weather can't wait to be born. Snowdrops were breaking through the neglected beds. Hyacinths were unfolding.

When I was done, he said: "You, Mother, and Father, too, have chosen the way of the Cross as the best way to serve God. I don't know if I would choose it, too. I feel nearest to God in a place like this. Somewhere there is beauty. Not suffering and shame."

He'd had so few of life's pleasures and he valued the little joys at hand. God's lilies cost no money to look at. He said: "Why not just stay in a garden, smell the flowers and love God in that way?"

I replied: "You know that when Jesus was crucified it is said that there was a garden nearby. What would you do if, being in a garden, you heard the shrieks of an innocent man being crucified? The jails of Vacaresti and Jilava are not far. People are being tortured in them as we look at the flowers, and in the Ministry of the Interior across the way."

He asked, quietly: "Was it very hard for you, Mother?"

I answered: "Mihai, we are Hebrew and we are children of God. What oppressed us most was not the physical side. It was that we were put to labour for the illusory world and were taken away from the spiritual. The story of the Canal shows how illusory this physical labour can be if God is not behind it.

"The Canal came to nothing in the end. So did the Roman empire, the Greek republics, the first Jewish state, the Egyptian and Chinese civilizations. Now the British Empire is going, too. All belonged to the world of illusions.

"So this was our greatest suffering. To have to live in an illusory world - not in our own Hebrew spiritual one of "those who come from the other side," which is etymologically the sense of the name."

One evening he came to my room and read to me from Plutarch's ~Life of Cato~. It said that the tyrant Sulla's palace was nothing more than a place of execution, so many were tortured there and put to death. Cato was then in his fourteenth year, the same age as Mihai now. And when he saw the heads of illustrious persons carried out and observed that men sighed in secret at these sights, Cato inquired why someone did not kill Sulla. His preceptor replied that the people feared him even more than they hated him. Cato then said, "Give me a sword that I may kill the man and deliver my country."

Mihai put down the book.

"It's true. I feel a bit like that. I'd like just to enjoy life, but sometimes I wonder why so many young people don't do something. Just one boy like me could rid the country of a tyrant. That's what all the Old Testament is about. Is it not from God?"

I said I thought it wouldn't help in modern circumstances. And it wasn't the best way. We should try to kill the tyranny, not the tyrant. We should hate the sin, but love the sinner.

Mihai replied: "Mother, that will be the hardest thing."

In those first few days I was like a woman back from the dead. I was free! For so many years in prison, all problems had seemed trifling beside that. Blithely we said, "If I could get out of here, I'd live happily on bread and water for the rest of my days. You'd never hear a word of complaint." And live on bread and water most of us did.

Now the real problems began. The worries, large and small.

It was a shock to see the abject need and hunger all around. The people I called on were reduced to almost nothing. Worn blankets on beds, but no sheets and pillowcases. On many days they couldn't afford to buy black bread or use a little electricity to warm the place.

"We've had to sell everything," a friend explained. "Cutlery, linen, carpets. Even our books. No! Don't sit on that chair! The leg's broken."

Most of the money had been used to buy precious medicines for her father, who lived with the family in that tiny flat.

"Sabina, do be careful what you tell people," she begged. "There are informers everywhere! The church is riddled with them."

A stream of friends and strangers came to see me, all begging in the most heart-breaking way for news of relatives in jail. Only rarely could I help them or answer their question: Was it an amnesty? A thaw? A new policy? Why had I been released? Who should they apply to?

I quickly learnt all about "applying" to officialdom. The queues at Government offices were worse than at the food stores. I needed a ration card. Without one, I couldn't even buy bread. I waited in line four hours one morning. When I reached the small window, the girl snapped:

"Where's your work card? Without that you can't get a ration card."

"But I'm an ex-prisoner."

"I can't help that. No work card and number, no ration book."

So I had to survive on the charity of others.

For a time we shared a room with a woman friend. But Mihai was a young man now. It wasn't possible for us all to live jammed together. I began a long, long search for another room.

Our old home had been confiscated. So had all its contents, furniture, bedding, books. But friends lived in the house where our flat had been once. They said there was a small attic free. Small it certainly was: one room was four yards by five, the other three by two.

After days of queuing and form-filling I was allowed to occupy this "accommodation space." The only furniture was some rickety old beds with broken springs. No water, no toilet. In winter it was bitterly cold, in summer too hot. The window looked out on to a blank brick wall.

Here we lived and cooked and slept. Mihai and I moved in. Janetta, when released, came to stay with us. We had no beds so we shared a sofa. Then there was Marietta.

She came to our door one day. And stood there, smiling girlishly, timidly, with dark blue rings under her eyes, in a mangy-looking black coat. She held out a little parcel tied with string.

"It's nothing really," she said. "Two French pastries." Which she had queued two hours to buy. And which were not very French.

Marietta was an old member of our congregation. She was a sweet, good-natured girl, but not too bright. People were a little afraid of her. She suffered from epileptic fits.

I was happy to see her. She had a quality of innocence that was always a delight.

"Come in and sit down, Marietta." I stepped back to let her enter and the door banged against the end of Mihai's bed. "We haven't been in long and we're very untidy."

She squeezed past and sat down on one of the rickety chairs we had acquired. The back fell off. Mihai went to help Marietta.

"How cozy you are here?" she said, looking round at the stove on which I was frying potatoes in cheap fat.

"Pity about the roof," said Mihai. The sloping ceiling was marked by big patches of damp on which a dark mossy fungus grew every day. Whenever one of us moved, we all had to move to make way.

Marietta shared our fried potatoes. Later, when Mihai had gone off into his bedroom to study, she told me that she had nobody in the world now and after a week would have no roof over her head. The family she stayed with had asked her to leave. Relatives were coming from Cluj, they needed the bed ...

"Well, Marietta, as you see, this isn't a flat. It's just the old box-room we used to keep junk in when we lived downstairs. But if you like we could squeeze another bed in here. I expect we can find a mattress somewhere."

Her face lit up with joy. "Really? Are you sure the boy won't mind? I have a few things - blankets and some plates and cutlery. I'd so much like to be with you!"

So Marietta came to live with us in Olteni Street.

It was a week or so after my release. The air was sparkling, the tram cars seemed to swirl along as if in a funfair, the drab grey people moved in the streets with a lighter step. It had been a ferocious winter, one of the worst in thirty years. Now the mild, warm sunshine melted even our hearts.

Suddenly, church bells began to toll. How many years it was since I'd heard that sound. A deep, solemn note of mourning, that came first from the cathedral, then from St. Spiridion's, then from all the other churches in Bucharest which remained open.

The city has many bells. (Rumania in the Middle Ages was a bastion of Christendom against the Turks and the country is filled with monasteries and churches.) Now they all sounded together. But the lovely noise was also frightening. People stopped in the streets and asked each other what had happened. Despite the police ban on public gatherings, small crowds gathered in the squares and whispered together.

Then the loudspeakers on Victory Street crackled into life:

"Dear Comrades and Friends! Workers of the Rumanian People's Republic! The Praesidium of the Supreme Soviet of the USSR. informs the Party and all Rumanian workers with deep sorrow that on March 5th, 1953, the Chairman of the Council of Ministers of the Soviet Union and Secretary of the Central Committee of the Communist Party, Josef Vissarionovich Stalin, died after a grave illness. The life of the wise leader and teacher of the People, Lenin's comrade and faithful disciple, is over." The speakers blared martial, funeral music.

The sound of bells meant not death, but the dawn of new hope to most of us. "But why are they doing it?" everyone asked. Especially when they heard that religious services had been ordered to mark the demise of the President of the World Atheists' Organization, who had devoted so much effort to destroying Christianity.

Rumours spread that Stalin, in terror on his death-bed, had asked for the last rites and begged to be buried with a cross. The shadow of his millions of victims (the Soviet author Ilya Ehrenburg wrote later that if he'd spent his lifetime simply writing their names, he would not have had time to finish the list) fell across his bed, and he asked all Christians to pray for him. So it was whispered.

Schools and shops closed down. Mihai came home with the special edition of ~Scintea~. Our one and only newspaper, the Party organ, contained of course nothing but columns of eulogy. All the vast slogans and banners in streets and cinemas and cafes hymned Soviet-Rumanian friendship. The radio trumpeted the same tune.

At great risk we could listen to foreign broadcasts. From one of these stations we heard a reading of Isaiah Chapter 14 - a terrible chapter which describes the death of an oppressor. He goes down into hell, where he is mocked and told:

"Art thou also become weak as we? Art thou become like unto us? The worms cover thee...how art thou cut down to the ground, which didst weaken the nations!" [ISA 14:10-12] The chapter is triumphant and vengeful.

"What do you think of that?" asked Mihai, as it ended.

I said I didn't feel that way. In a man's last moments, as he sees death before him, great changes can happen. I recalled that Stalin's mother was a good and devout woman. How she must have prayed for him! A bishop told St. Monica [mother of St. Augustine], who wept over her son's sinfulness, "The son of such tears cannot be lost."

p158 The Pastor's Wife

And now we have the testimony of his daughter, who turned Christian in spite of all his teaching and escaped to the West. Who knows what the dying Stalin meant by that " incomprehensible and awesome gesture" Svetlana describes when "he suddenly lifted his left hand as though pointing up to something...the next moment the spirit wrenched itself free of the flesh"? The Pope said a Mass for Stalin's soul. Should Jesus have loved Stalin's soul less than the Pope?

The other side of the coin was joy at the start of what we hoped would be a new era, the end of slave labour camps and projects like the Canal. For all the rumours were coming true: the Canal was really being abandoned. After four years the scheme was dropped, with only a seventh of the work completed. More than 200,000 men and women had slaved there. No one knows how many thousands died. Billions were thrown away and the country's economy was wrecked. For nothing.

In ~Scintea~ we read that the State was now switching over from construction of major social works to producing consumer goods. Living standards must be raised. But the fact was that the Canal was a failure. It could never have worked. A final great survey was made by engineers. Some say they discovered that the Baragan plain would be flooded. Others that there would never be enough water to supply both Canal and irrigation projects.

What is certain is that the chief engineers and planners were arrested. Death sentences for "economic sabotage" were passed. At least two men were executed on the spot. Another thirty received sentences of up to twenty-five years each.

I said to myself the Passover Prayer: "We were slaves with Pharaoh in Egypt, and the Lord with a mighty hand freed us." Again, it was true. Barracks and labour colonies were closed down. The huts crumbled away. Grass and weeds burst through the concrete. The huge, empty plain was given back to the wilderness.

It is a wild and lonely place today. Snakes rustle through the undergrowth, no longer hunted for food. And no one now lays out crumbs for migrant birds. Rusting equipment lies in the deserted vegetable fields and the cold wind from the Black Sea erodes the last traces of what was to be a wonder of the world.

Little by little I regained my health and some of my old strength. The ribs that had been broken when I was thrown into the Danube hurt me, but the doctor said that was only because they were not yet fully healed. He advised some weeks in bed.

p159 The Pastor's Wife

And said it was a miracle that I had survived. But there was too much waiting to be done.

Walking one morning in Olteni Street, I saw a shabby little man with thinning hair. He stared at me hard as we passed. When next I put my hand into a coat pocket, I found a little, folded leaflet. He had slipped it in without my noticing, then disappeared.

"And it shall come to pass that the Lord shall give thee rest from sorrow, and from thy fear, and from the hard bondage wherein thou wast made to serve ..." [ISA 14:3]

I read the text, and I knew that the fight continued. Perhaps it was not on show, but everywhere around me was the love of God. In passing faces that betrayed nothing. In hearts that no Stalin could touch.

A new happiness flowed through me. I was a member of the Underground Church.

You won't find its title in directories, or its buildings in the cities of Eastern Europe. It has no cathedrals. Its priests are in worn working suits. They have no theological training. They know little of sectarian squabbles. The Underground Church has no name even behind the Iron Curtain. Only after we reached the West did I come to know that we were referred to by this title among the few people abroad who knew what we were doing. If I'd been asked earlier, "Have you an Underground Church in Rumania?" I wouldn't have understood the question. Like Moliere's Monsieur Jourdain, who'd been speaking prose all his life without knowing it. We simply did our Christian duty. We paid no heed to Communist laws. And we did not need to give our attitude a name.

For the next twelve years this was to be my life.

At first I'd been distressed by the plight of churchgoers. They were persecuted by the police, harried by informers. Through radio, schools, cinema, theatre and press the campaign to stamp out belief was relentlessly pursued. The old could worship, with difficulty, and under observation. But the young might not believe.

I saw how many former friends, afraid of losing their jobs, didn't dare come near our house. Others wouldn't even admit they had once worshipped beside us.

Passing the university, I saw a teacher we'd known well and went to greet him. He was with a colleague.

"You're making a mistake, Madam. I don't you." He turned away, unable to look me in the face.

People were so frightened, while they were "free." In prison, even at the worst times, we'd seen God's hand at work. We came to know that although we suffered he would not leave us. We could trust him. So a vital part of work in our Underground Church was to teach people this. And, with a prison background, it was easier to win their trust.

I also had to keep myself in my place. Our church was now run by two young Lutheran pastors. But it was embarrassing to find so many of their people knocking at my door to ask advice or tell their troubles. Believers who had suffered for their faith were treated with something like idolatry by other Christians. Everything we said was "gospel."

It's a dangerous idea. Martyrs don't make the truth. The Truth makes the martyr. I had to be very firm and stop people from treating me with exaggerated reverence.

Keeping my opinions to myself wasn't easy, either. The two young pastors did their best, but they could only teach what they had learnt from Lutheran professors and from books often based on other books, written many centuries ago, in a world which did not look like ours. I didn't have as much respect for these ideas as I used to have. Not everything the books taught fitted the lessons I had learnt in prison.

Communist methods of brainwashing and indoctrination were new. They needed new answers. And these were found, by the Underground Church, as time went by.

"Mother, I've finished with school."

Mihai came home early one day, with bright eyes and set mouth.

"What do you mean, finished?"

"I'm not going back."

"But you must go on with your studies."

"Not there!"

I got the story from him by degrees. The Communist Youth Movement was being built up and the best pupils were given the privilege of wearing a red tie. The children were told to propose a candidate for the honour. And they proposed Mihai who refused. He said, "I won't wear the red tie. It's the sign of the Party that keeps my father in prison."

Consternation! The teacher, a Jewish girl, didn't know what to say. But she had to play the Communist. She scolded Mihai and sent him home.

But the fact was that the teachers, almost all of them, hated what they had to do and the people who made them do it. Next day Mihai's teacher smuggled him back into class and gave him a hug.

p161 The Pastor's Wife

Home Again 161

From that day on, he was the most protected boy in the school. Atheistic propaganda began in the classroom and time after time Mihai would stand up to argue with his instructors. He sometimes lost the arguments, because he couldn't follow their twists and turns, but he stood up just the same. And the teachers, knowing he was the son of a political prisoner, loved him for this. Rumania is not a Communist country, but a country oppressed by the Communists.

While I was in prison, Mihai had been cared for by our old friend Alice, a Sunday school mistress. Once she had been head of a department in an important Ministry, but when she refused to join the Party she was thrown out. She eked a living teaching French and coaching for examinations. After I'd been taken off, Mihai simply went to his "Auntie Alice" and said: "You'll be my mummy, now."

She was very poor and also had to look after an elderly father. All three of them lived in a single room. Since there was simply no space for other children she wanted to take in, she helped them with love and such pennies as she could spare. They would have gone hungry but for Christian brethren who sacrificed for them.

Thanks to Alice, Mihai could resist all the blows which rained on him between the ages of nine and thirteen, and still tell me when I came back: "Mother, I'm on your side and I love the Lord."

But the propaganda in the schools was intense. With films and lectures the teachers had to work hard to prove that God didn't exist. So Mihai asked me often for proofs that He did.

I remembered what Richard had said that nobody asks for proof that nature exists. It is there, and we're part of it. And spiritual things are just as self-evident as material things. A genius says he has been inspired – by what? By something higher than himself. A spiritual experience, a closeness with God.

In every school there was a "godless corner" with pictures and books deriding the clergy. And Mihai knew that some of the stories were true. He had known pastors who behaved badly, who betrayed their brothers.

I tried to show him that the Church has a human as well as a divine side. And that every Christian has this dual nature.

Day after day, he'd come home with examples he'd been given of the Church's errors or the failings of priests.

I would say, "But they never tell you about the remorse a pastor feels when he does wrong. They just show you the sinful side. They hide the good. Anyone can go wrong. It's when we're sorry for it that we show what is divine in us." So I dispelled his doubts. Until the next onslaught.

Every Christian mother had this struggle. Life was a battlefield, and every evening we made up the ground gained by the Communists during the day.

"Our professor says Joseph was a grain speculator."

"Why did King David want to marry Uriah's wife?"

I replied, "The Bible does not hide the truth. It tells of men who can sin and make mistakes. But when you read these stories for yourself, you see it's the Communists who are lying and distorting."

In this struggle for youth, they seemed to have all the weapons: the schools, the radio, the press. But Mihai had always had before him the example of Christianity in action.

When I was at the Canal in 1951, people from our church risked their liberty to help him. An elderly couple spent two days travelling - by roundabout routes to avoid detection - and put a large slice of their savings in the hands of someone who could help Alice.

Old Mrs. Mihailovici, who'd also been like an aunt to Mihai, came hundreds of miles from her village after my arrest with a bag of potatoes, all she had to offer. Her visit was reported by informers, who always watch relatives of political prisoners. When she got home she was summoned by the militia and so badly beaten that she never recovered her health.

In spite of such treatment, the people of the Underground Church never forgot their duty to the children of those in jails.

Sometimes we lost a battle.

I remember a woman who came to me in tears.

"My child is working for the Secret Police," she said. "He's meeting a man regularly who asks him about everyone who comes to the house. I don't know what to do."

She couldn't turn her son out. She couldn't let him betray Christians who came to see them. I advised her to break contact with us for some time.

Sometimes late at night a man - or more often his wife - came to my attic and confessed that they were informing. "We're in a trap," one woman told me. "We love the Lord. We love you and Mihai - but we can't resist all these threats and menaces. My husband will lose his job or be sent to prison. We have to report on everyone who attends church and what they say. We try to tell them only what'll do you no harm - but you must beware!"

Others left Bucharest and moved from town to town to avoid these weekly summonses to the Secret Police.

Your home under Communism is always divided. If they can't find a child or a relative to tell how much bread you're buying, what you cook and who visits you, there's always a neighbour or a colleague who will. Girls are questioned about boys they go out with. And everything goes down in the file, to be used in one way or another against you.

From this system arises the phenomenon of thousands and thousands of secret Christians who wear the red tie or the Party badge. Some even hold high State posts while belonging to the Underground Church. They call a priest to baptize a child by night. They travel to a remote town to be secretly married by a pastor. And many informers came to me to tell of all they had to do and seek forgiveness for their betrayals.

I'd say to them, "Prove the sincerity of your repentance by telling us now about how we're spied on. Let's have the names of the officers you took orders from. Tell us when and where you meet."

If they were in the habit of handing over their information at a certain street corner, one of us would sit in a cafe nearby to take a snapshot of the Secret Policeman concerned. Then we'd follow him to see whom he met next. If their meetings took place, as often happened, in a "safe" house of the Secret Police, we'd watch the place and photograph those who came and went.

It was risky work, but we were able by these methods to list most of the informers, including Colonel Shircanu, who headed police spywork against the Church. We watched him as closely as he watched us. We pinned down his chief informers.

Some we succeeded in bringing to repentance. Others had to be dealt with by sterner means. In these ways we defended the Underground Church and enabled it to continue its work.

I was lucky in having Mihai. My son was more than faithful. He was at a very difficult age for boys and we gave him the hardest tasks. On top of his own problems he had to be constantly on the watch. He had to take decisions that might land us both in prison. Yet we could often laugh together at the absurd things his teachers were obliged to say, and the strange things that happened.

One evening a few months after she'd come to live with us, Marietta came in much later than usual and all evening said scarcely a word. I'd noticed that she'd been late several times in recent weeks. And that she seemed not happier - because she was a happy girl - but calmer, more self-assured.

All of a sudden, she said: "There's something...I don't quite know how to tell you...Well, I have a boy I'm very fond of."

She had met him on a hospital visit to a cousin. He was a cripple. The whole left side of his body had been paralyzed in a factory accident, and this had affected his speech. For months he'd been completely dumb, and unable to move without a wheelchair.

"But now he's ever so much better and can get about with his sticks very slowly. He's not good at speaking, though. I understand, but other people can't at first."

Next evening the young man came to see us. Laboriously, he climbed three flights of stairs. As Marietta said, it was difficult to understand him, and that night we had several friends from another town staying, sleeping on the floor. But it did emerge that Peter, too, had nowhere to go. He'd been sleeping in someone's cellar since he came out of hospital, and now he'd lost even that.

The epileptic Marietta married the dumb cripple and Peter came to live with us. Now we were four, not counting the almost nightly guests who stayed in our tiny flat: wives of pastors who'd been arrested, Christians who didn't dare make contact with an ex-prisoner by daylight.

One of these was a youth who worked as cook in a police barracks. They never ran short of food there, and he often brought us his bread.

THE UNDERGROUND CHURCH

Mihai came home with a story which he certainly had not been taught in his history class. Hitler, Napoleon and Alexander the Great took the day off from hell to watch a parade in Moscow's Red Square. As the columns of tanks rolled by Hitler said, "If I'd known the Red Army was so powerful, I'd never have attacked Russia." Alexander commented, "If I'd had an army like this I could have conquered the world." Napoleon, studying a Russian newspaper, looked up to say, "If only I'd a newspaper as obedient as ~Pravda~ the world would not have known about Waterloo."

Mihai was collecting jokes about Communism. Having finished his elementary schooling, he could go no further. No higher education was permitted to the children of political prisoners and he had time on his hands as he looked for a job. Then an old friend of Richard's heard him play the piano and offered him work.

"I look after the instruments at the State Opera House," he said. "I need an apprentice with fine fingers and a good ear."

To get this job, Mihai had to fill up a sixteen-page questionnaire. He had to supply, among much else, the addresses of two neighbours in every street and town he'd lived in "over the last twenty years." He was fifteen.

"And you'd better be sure they know what to say when the Secret Police come round," warned the tuner.

After receiving the form, Mihai went round to the personnel officer and said he'd spoilt it with ink blots - could he have another? Then he filled in the two copies, one to keep so that he could check on what he'd written in years to come. The questionnaire would follow him from job to job for many years, and if he contradicted it in any way there would be trouble.

There was a question: Has your father ever been arrested? He simply wrote "NO," saying to himself: "He was kidnapped in the street. That is not an arrest." Was he wrong?

He was taken on, at a salary of œ8 a month. It was a very big sum to us. And he had the ration card allowing him to buy bread.

p166 The Pastor's Wife

The tuner found that Mihai had an excellent ear and could identify pitch and sound easily. "He's better at it than me, and I've been doing this job for forty years."

And he became expert at repairing every kind of musical instrument. So that when, after 18 months, he was discovered to be the son of a political prisoner after all, he had a small clientele of his own among Bucharest's musicians. In this way, though he lost his job he was able to earn a little for tuition and bought books to study at home.

I took on all sorts of strange jobs to keep the family going.

First there was the Silkworm Rearing Co-operative.

Marietta read about it in a magazine. "Rear silkworms at home. Supplement your income and help build Socialism."

Mihai grinned. "Marietta sees herself in a swishy evening gown all made from home-grown silk."

"No, seriously," said Marietta. "Silk is worth a lot of money."

Mihai reached for the magazine. "Ah, but you have to take anything you produce to the State Co-operative. What do you suppose they'll give you for it? Anyway, where could we put them? If you think I'm going to eat my meals with a box of dirty old silkworms in the middle of the table you're wrong."

"You could keep it under your bed."

"Under your bed."

"What do silkworms eat?"

"Mulberry leaves, stupid, everyone knows that!"

"Mihai, remember when you lived with Aunt Alice, and on the next corner was the hospital and across the street, facing the house, was the cemetery?"

"Yes. It really used to cheer me up."

"But that cemetery was full of mulberry trees. At least we could always feed these silkworms."

So we set up shop with a box containing 100 of the little grubs and a leaflet of instructions from the Silkworm Rearing Co- operative.

Mihai read out passages. "'When the silkworm is ready to change into a moth, it spins around itself a cocoon made of matter from its own body.' I say, I never knew they turned into moths. You'd better be careful, Mother. One day you'll take the lid off and they'll fly away." He studied the leaflet. "'When the cocoon is unwound it gives a silk thread many hundreds of yards long.' That's going to be a bit awkward in here, isn't it?"

We peered into the cardboard box, in which Mihai had pierced air-holes. The caterpillars were not exactly handsome, being of an ashy-grey hue and about three inches long. And they were voracious eaters. The life of silkworms seems to be one continuous communal meal; at the end of which they roll themselves up in a cocoon made of their own silk thread. This you can wind on to a reel.

At first Mihai helped himself freely to mulberry leaves from the cemetery. But soon the caretaker spotted him and chased him out.

"We'll have to make a raid under cover of darkness!" Mihai said.

Next evening, armed with paper bags, he climbed the cemetery fence and came back triumphantly with several days' supply.

"The dead don't need them," Mihai said.

I recalled that the Book of Revelation says that in the heavenly Jerusalem the leaves of the tree of life are used for healing. [REV 22:2]

"I'm glad," Marietta said. "Because that goes to prove that very sick souls can also have a place there."

Silkworm larvae are fussy creatures, having been artificially cultivated for 4000 years. They don't like temperatures of more than 78øF, or less than 62ø. They like light, but not too much. When they are moulting, which happens every few days, they must not be disturbed.

"Ssh!" whispered Mihai, quoting the leaflet: "'The larvae must be kept free from noise during each period of change!'"

After about a month, and repeated raids on the cemetery, we had 100 little cocoons. These were taken to the Co-operative - and we were paid enough to buy two days' food. Well, two days' food was welcome. I took home another 100 newly-hatched grubs.

"Oh, no!" groaned Mihai.

But for several months our silkworm farm thrived.

Until one day I found the grubs looking pale and swollen, as if they might be about to burst. Mihai whistled Chopin's Funeral March, and went off to the library to check up in a book on silkworm cultivation he'd found.

"Yes," he reported. "It's quite common - they call it ~grasserie~. It comes from letting the poor things stand in a draught."

I said, "But grasserie only means fatness."

"That's right, it said in the book - 'a form of dropsy.'"

Jesus healed a woman sick of the dropsy, but there was no sign that he would repeat the miracle for my silkworms. So we had to throw them out.

I turned to other cottage industry ventures like sewing and knitting jerseys. And so between the small sums I could earn and the money gained by Mihai, we survived.

That was the year of the International Youth Festival. Young Communists and sympathizers from many parts of the world came to Bucharest; and for three months before it began there was nothing, nothing in the shops. Queues for bread and anything edible were huge. Just once in a while, after endless waiting, you found a scrap of butter or a few ounces of flour.

Then the Festival began. And the shops were crammed with goods. For three wonderful weeks we saw a host of things that hadn't been seen in Rumania since before the war. Mihai would come in: "I saw boxes of dates in the State Grocery! And there are chocolates wrapped in gold paper, too!"

Then the Festival ended. For months after, the shortages were worse than ever. They had squandered all the reserves on this prodigal display to deceive foreign visitors.

Mihai said that these young Communists from abroad were just as infected with the blight of spying as our own youth. Many Rumanians who made unwise remarks to youngsters from France or Italy were reported to the Secret Police. An acquaintance of Mihai's was arrested.

It was all so wrong and false and ugly! When I heard such things, I hated this evil system which had destroyed decent thought and life over one third of the world. Peasants forced to steal from land that was once theirs. Workers terrorized in the factories and deprived of their rights. The corruption went all through life from top to bottom. The managers of the big State stores were leaders of a black market in their own goods which was worth millions. Lies and spies filled our lives. It fell often to ex-prisoners, just those who had suffered most, to teach people that hatred towards the Communists was negative and wrong. Only understanding and love could triumph.

Mihai told a story that shows how the Communists were hated.

Two friends meet in a bus. In a whisper one asks the other, "What do you think about the Prime Minister, Georghiu-Dej?" His neighbour puts a finger to his lips: "Are you mad?" he mutters. "People listen." They get off the bus and walk through a park. "Really," insists the first man. "What's your opinion?" Some strangers are sitting about 500 yards off. "Hush," says the neighbour. "They may hear." At last they reach a wholly isolated place with no one in sight. "So now, tell me what you think of Georghiu-Dej," says the first man. The neighbour replies, "I have the highest opinion about him."

The subterfuges and the way we scraped a living were not the truly important thing. That was to gather and keep in a life of prayer and trust our Christian brethren, and the wives and children of prisoners. This was Janetta's and my real work over the years while Richard was in prison.

p169 The Pastor's Wife

Since so many honest and good pastors were by now arrested, it fell more and more upon their wives to build up the Underground Church. Dozens of us became self-taught "Ministers"; through talking to people we learned to preach. Women came from every part of the country to Bucharest to ask advice and report on how the church fared with them. Soon we found that early all our time went to this work.

The West is still arguing about whether women should be ordained. In the East this problem has found its own solution. For wherever, under Communism, pastors are imprisoned, their wives become pastors in their place, ordained by Jesus' pierced hands.

The Underground Church had innumerable secret meeting places in the city. Often in cellars and attics like our own. On dark nights a light would show in a window and people would flit up the stairs and give a special knock on the door. We crammed into spaces so hot and close that there wasn't enough air for the flame of the lamp by the window. It guttered, and the room was in half-darkness.

The ideas of using the tactics of the Communist cell against the Party arose in conversation with pastor Grecu, who sometimes joined us late at night. He was a minister of the approved church, and they allowed him some licence because he was known to drink. Drunken priests made good Communist propaganda. They did not know that he drank in order to stay on, and only as much as was needed to throw dust in their eyes.

Pastor Grecu's heart was with us. He was of enormous help. He carried on a secret ministry which went far beyond the limits imposed by the State. Many priests did this: there was no clear dividing line between the Show-Church and the Underground Church. They were interwoven.

Under persecution, sectarian barriers fell more and more: Catholic or Orthodox or Lutheran, we came down to the pure elements of faith. It was like the church of the first centuries.

Pastor Grecu and I had many discussions on tactics. Janetta had now become a pillar of our church. We'd both read Lenin's ~What is to be done?~, in which he set out his plan to conquer the world. It was written in 1903, when all the Bolsheviks in existence could be seated on one sofa - in fact, there's a picture of them doing so. One of Lenin's first principles is to infiltrate rival organizations - this, at least, is a rule that works. After the Communists took power in Rumania we found they had long insinuated themselves into both "bourgeois' Ministries and the leadership of anti-Communist bodies. Seminaries and the priesthood itself were infiltrated.

p170 The Pastor's Wife

Now the roles must be reversed. They were the bosses. And we saw that the Underground Church could not work unless we infiltrated the Communist organizations which were trying to destroy us.

It seemed at first to be against our principles. But Pastor Grecu had an answer pat:

"Christ called the temple a den of robbers, but the Apostles deliberately worked there after his death and resurrection. Strange circumstances call for unusual actions. ~A voleur, voleur et demi~ - to catch a thief you have to be a thief and a half."

Still, I was hesitant. "Many of our brothers and sisters are going to have moral scruples. If they join Communist bodies they'll be asked to do so much that's wrong. People with Church backgrounds are bound to give themselves away. They'd be weeded out in a month."

Pastor Grecu said: "Some of them may be good actors. The younger people will find it much easier. No trouble in getting them into the Communist Youth. And from there into the militia. And then into the Secret Police and the Party."

I agreed that we must take a lesson from the Russians. And apply it with the aid of those who came to our secret meetings.

The people who came to these services were all enthusiastic and eager to help, but as I went among them I mentally divided them into two groups.

Most would shrink from playing a false role. I knew what they would answer if I proposed infiltrating the Communists. They would reason that it would need a great deal of deception which could not be justified.

A second, much smaller group, would think like St. Paul, the great soul-winner. He made himself Jew with the Jew and Greek with the Greeks thus winning both. Even in this group, only a chosen few were admitted into our confidence. They agreed at once that they could not leave the Underground Church unprotected to preserve their own integrity. The selfish end, to be personally righteous, does not justify allowing innumerable Christians to go to prison. Only one in a hundred of our members knew what we were doing. That was our way of safety.

Pastor Grecu wondered whether parents would not object if they thought their children were taking on dangerous tasks.

I said: "When I was at school they used to tell us about King Stephen the Great. Once he was wounded and came to the gates of his castle. His mother said, "Who's there?" He said, "It's your son, Stephen." She replied 'You can't be my son. He would not leave the field while his army was still there. He stays and fights.

I know no other son.' Many mothers I know have been brought up in this tradition."

"They must be dedicated women."

"I know how they feel, the mothers who come here. If the Communists were to prove to me now that Richard had died in prison, I wouldn't be simply sad. I'd be proud too. This spirit is spreading day by day. If one can be proud of a son who dies for his country how much more one could be proud of a son who was a martyr for Christ."

Pastor Grecu smiled, a shade bitterly. "Dying is at least a quick process. There are other martyrdoms."

Janetta said, "Yes, there are many. And it may be a higher thing to sacrifice one's integrity in the cause than it is to sacrifice liberty, or even perhaps life."

He stood up to leave and brushed some crumbs from his shabby suit. "How curious it must be to live in a world where one is called on to give up none of these things."

Marietta had a friend, a pretty girl from a country town whom I shall call Trudi. She was eighteen, with dark, fluffy hair and sparkling eyes. When she'd visited us several times, I said: "In prison the guard used to tell us before we got a beating, 'You wanted to be martyrs, so now suffer!' And we did. But even at the worst times there was the joy of knowing that it was for Jesus. Like early Christians. But now there is something that goes further. And, Trudi, you can help us here."

She looked at me with her brown eyes. Trudi was a quiet, intelligent girl. She wasn't frightened by work. Her large, but shapely limbs, the deliberate way she handed you a plate or closed a door, encouraged you to believe that here was someone who wouldn't easily break. She was the eldest girl of a large family. For years, she had been their nurse and guardian spirit.

I explained that I'd been watching her, and how we were looking for girls to join the Communist Youth.

"Now something new has come up. It may be a wonderful opportunity. A Colonel Shircanu, who works for the Secret Police, has been asking his sergeant if he knows a girl to help in the house. They have a big place in one of the best quarters of the city. His wife seems rather extravagant and silly, but kind enough. If you were to apply for this job through their special employment office you might find out a lot that would help us."

She didn't speak and her face didn't change. But the brown eyes gleamed. I went on: "They wouldn't suspect anything. The sergeant has asked his wife to ask her friends, and one of then comes to our services. Nobody knows she's a Christian."

"What would I have to do?"

"Nothing, at first. Get the feel of the house. Get to know everyone. I've noticed that people enjoy telling you their troubles. Look how old Mrs. Tomaziu was showing you her varicose veins yesterday."

Trudi laughed.

"As if you were a nurse."

She thought about it for a while. Then she accepted.

One evening Pastor Grecu told me he'd found a curious passage in the Gospel of St. John which hinted at some kind of infiltration of the high priest's court by the disciples.

"It says that one of the disciples was known to the high priest Caiaphas – so well known, in fact, that on the very night that Christ was on trial, this disciple could enter the temple precincts and even get Peter in, too." [JHN 18:15-16]

He suggested it was something to tell young people starting on this secret work of ours, if they objected. But few of the youth did.

I sent a few girls to join the Communist Youth, but I did not let Pastor Grecu know their names. The clergy of the official church were under constant pressure to inform on congregations. It was best for him not to know.

We'd seen such tragedies caused by this endless spying. Once in our rooms Mihai's "Aunt Alice" asked: "In the Bible it says that "all things work together for the good" [ROM 8:28] – but what good, I'd like to know, is served by informers? I'm afraid to open my mouth these days."

At first I had no answer. I could think only of the terrible harm they did. But the question worried me. Lying in bed that night, I saw that there was spiritual significance even in this. Informers taught us that while we live we are constantly surveyed. Angels watch all we do and say; but they are invisible, so we do not care. These informers reminded us that our every action counts.

I had my own detecting system. Police agents came to our rooms to spy, pretending to be believers. The first time it happened I suspected the man at once.

He stopped me in Olteni Street.

"Excuse me – you ~are~ Sister Wurmbrand?"

"Yes, but I'm afraid I don't remember where ..."

His raincoat was rather too new, and he was a little too anxious. The eyes were furtive. In his early thirties.

"At Cernavoda. I was in Gang 4. I used to see you some days for a month before I was moved to Cape Midia. You were a great help to us - people you've never met still talk about your speaking out for Christ!"

He paid some fulsome compliments. As we walked along, I asked a few questions about his time at the Canal. His answers were vague. I was sure he'd never been there. But I couldn't catch him out.

He asked where I lived, what I did, how I made a living, and so on.

He said, "I'm a believer, you know. I was converted in prison." He told a rambling story about a Christian who persuaded him at the Canal to return to the faith of his childhood.

The upshot was that he invited himself to our rooms. I let him come up the dingy staircase and said: "Welcome to our home."

He began asking questions about my political feelings and those of my friends which only a provocateur would have put. So I asked a question of my own.

"Do you read the Bible much?

"Yes, yes. Very often."

"Perhaps you'd like to read something to us, then." And I gave him my Bible. Mihai, Janetta, Marietta, Peter and a woman visitor were there.

He read something from the Psalms, and even managed to add a few sanctimonious words of his own.

"Now let us pray," I said. "Will you lead us in prayer?"

And we knelt around him, and waited for him to start.

He muttered a few words and stopped. He coloured, and there was a long silence. He couldn't find anything to say. He knew we all were aware of his job now.

It was Janetta who finally spoke. "What you are doing is very wrong!" she said, angrily. "You'd do yourself a favour if you dropped it."

Richard gave me a Bible in 1938, the year of my conversion. Every other page was left blank for notes. And as often as we came together to read and study it in the early years, I wrote down thoughts, comments and spiritual experiences; so that after a time I had a whole book of precious words and memories, which brought in friends living and dead from every part of the country.

Many of my notes were in a private code, making it doubly an article of suspicion. But even after my own arrest Mihai was able to rescue it and keep it safe.

When I opened and read so many thoughts of Richard I had noted in the past, it was as if he stood in the room with me. I had the strongest sense of his presence, leaning over me, encouraging and comforting. I noted these visits down in my shorthand. And when I open my Bible now I live these years again. It has become worn and tattered over thirty years, but it is always with me; for it is the sum total of my wealth. A courier of our Mission smuggled it out.

Bibles were rare in Rumania (then as now), and many came to our rooms to hear readings. I could not go easily to Underground Church meetings elsewhere. I was watched and not allowed to leave the town.

But Mihai could attend both secret and open meetings. They were held under the guise of parties. As many as thirty young people would turn up at the home of whoever had the biggest flat. They'd greet each other noisily at the door. Then the record player would be turned up. A pop tune blared out and passersby could see them dancing. After a time, the record-player was switched off. Someone would speak about the gospel. There were prayers. Then they'd play a few more records, and make party noises for the neighbours' benefit.

"Emil's had three birthdays already this year," Mihai laughed. "And his sister's had two wedding anniversaries. Next time we're going on a picnic."

And they took the record-player with them into the countryside for Sunday excursions - which became a prayer meeting. Lookouts were posted at all paths approaching the spot. If anyone came near, they'd give a warning sign.

All this gave great intensity to the services. Every detail was planned in advance: the place, the hour, the password. Those who went knew they might never come back. It was very unlike a service in the free world. And every preacher spoke his sermon as if it were his last: the words could mean prison and death, and there was weight in them.

Most of our pastors were members of the official church. Faced with controls that made a mockery of "religious freedom," they carried on a secret ministry. It was the only way they could reach the young, the only way they could preach freely about Christ. Every word they said in church was liable to be reported.

Mihai told us the latest joke: "The Housing Ministry has ordered that all new blocks of flats are to be built with specially thin walls so that neighbours can spy on each other."

But was it just a joke?

At meetings, I was often asked about my life in prison and at the Canal. At first I couldn't talk much about it. I couldn't find the words.

Little by little, Mihai got me to talk. When he learnt how we'd been beaten, or forced to eat grass to stay alive, he asked: "How could you bear all this without giving way and denying Christ?"

I answered by telling him of a peculiarity in the Hebrew language. In Hebrew, amazingly, some future events are described in the perfect tense. Now the perfect tense is so called because it refers to actions completed, perfected, at the time of speaking. So, in the great 53rd chapter of Isaiah [ISA 53] which foretells the coming of the Messiah and his sufferings, the writer speaks of these events as belonging to the past, not the future. Yet the words were written 800 years before the coming of Christ.

When Jesus read the prediction of his heavy sufferings, they had already begun. He was then rejected and despised of men. It was his present, and his future. But he read of them in Hebrew as if they'd happened in the past.

Now that is exactly how I felt in the midst of suffering. I tried to explain: Joy is the everlasting present of the Christian spirit. I was in a heavenly place from which no one could move me. Where was the affliction through which I passed? To that most inviolable part of my mind, it belonged to the past. I lived the suffering long ago, while the present reality was delight in the closeness of the Lord.

This certainty that it had already happened saved me. Catastrophes come to us all, but once they're over, they're done with. That is taught in this oddity of Hebrew. We experience now past dramas.

Years later, I discussed this with Richard. In solitary confinement he said, he had felt the same thing in exactly the same way. I wondered if it wasn't another example of communication in the spirit between us.

A month after Trudi had installed herself in Col. Shircanu's home, after interviews with Secret Police officers and much form-filling, she sent me an urgent message. She came to our rooms no longer, but left information at a certain house. Miss Landauer, a teacher, passed it on.

The news was bad. She had heard Shircanu mention the name of Pastor N., who often came to our meetings, on the telephone. "I'm sure he'll help," he said.

Challenged, the pastor told us he had been threatened with long prison sentence. His health was failing. He could not face it. A few days earlier he had promised to "co-operate" with Shircanu. But he had done nothing for him yet.

p176 The Pastor's Wife

Deeply ashamed, Pastor N. left Bucharest for a provincial town. Then Trudi gave us the name of a girl student whom Shircanu had mentioned in similar terms.

At first she denied everything. I put my hand on hers.

"Please, be truthful. We know well the kind of pressure they'll have used on you. Many people have told us before - of their own free will - how they're forced to inform. You owe it to your real friends to let them know what happened."

She broke down and knelt beside me.

"I was just walking in the street," she sobbed, "when a car drew up and two men said, "We're police. Get in." They didn't take me anywhere, just drove me around for hours. They kept telling me I had to report every week about everything that was said and done in your house and in the church. If I didn't, they said, awful things would happen to my family."

So she agreed. But swore to me that she had reported nothing very damaging. I could only hope not.

Again and again, Trudi turned up valuable information. But her most spectacular coup was to turn the colonel's home into a secret refuge for the very people he was trying to hunt down.

Now that he'd "arrived" in the Communist hierarchy, Shircanu began to enjoy its privileges. He took his family off on leisurely holidays to the mountains or the sea. The trusted Trudi was left in charge as caretaker. Mrs. Shircanu caller her, "My little treasure."

One day a message came through Miss Landauer: "Why not have a meeting here, in the Shircanus' home? They're away for several days and it's a big house with several exits. No one will suspect."

And, indeed, who could suspect that Christians would hold a secret meeting in the home of the man who headed the spy work against them? I thought it was worth trying. Rather nervously, half a dozen leaders of the Underground Church arrived on the appointed evening, one by one, at spaced intervals. We were received by a smiling Trudi. Everything went off perfectly.

From then on, we met quite regularly at Shircanu's house whenever the colonel was away.

Trudi played her double role well. As time passed, more and more of our people learned to do the same. They had to sing Red songs and the Party's praises. Most of them succeeded. Several rose high in the ranks.

We learnt from the experience of the Underground Church in Russia, which had survived thirty years of persecution. Brethren from Bessarabia, a province stolen from us during the war by the Soviets, told how Christians resisted there. So we knew how to act in similar conditions.

We had our failures, inevitably. For some workers the strain of a double life proved too heavy. Others became too bold and paid the price.

One of our men was manager of the State book store, a huge place of several floors. He had, of course, no Bibles for sale, but he did have large stocks of anti-God textbooks, which contained a great treasury of texts and verses from the Bible. These were accompanied by comments holding them up to ridicule, but most readers simply laughed at the criticisms. Many were sold.

It was this success, perhaps, which stimulated the manager to go too far.

On August 23rd, "Freedom Day," his window display drew appreciative crowds. But when people continued to gather around it, smiling and even clapping, the Secret Police grew curious. It was Colonel Shircanu, Trudi told us later, who solved the riddle. Pushing his way to the front of the crowd in Victory Street, he inspected the portraits of Marx, Engels, Lenin and Stalin which took up most of the window space. Nothing to smile at there. Then he noticed that under the pictures was a poster advertising a cheap edition of Victor Hugo's masterpiece. Two words stood out in large black letters: LES MISERABLES.

He had the manager arrested and sent to a labour camp where he was put to cutting reeds - another State project of the day - at the mouth of the Danube.

p178 The Pastor's Wife

FIGHTING BACK

Up the dank staircase some months after my release came an official from the Ministry of the Interior. A fat man with a booming voice and black hair parted in the middle. He carried a briefease, bursting at the seams, full of papers.

Was I a mother? he wanted to know. I was? But what sort of mother could I be? Didn't I care for my child at all? Didn't I want to see him get the very best in education? Didn't I want to see him placed in jobs with good pay and state pensions and ration cards? Of course I did, so WHY DIDN'T I CHANGE MY NAME? HOW DARED I CALL MYSELF A MOTHER!

He shouted and ranted in this vein for several minutes. I sat silent and looked at him. The less I said, the sooner he would get to the point. And I knew what it was.

Divorce. What possible use, he said at last, was it to remain tied to my husband? A counter-revolutionary whom I should never see again? It was only a question of commonsense for an intelligent young woman like myself to get a divorce from an enemy of the State. If I didn't do so now, I certainly would later. How long did I think I could stand up against the State in this blind, stupid disobedience?

So he bullied and cajoled and painted heartbreaking pictures -If our ultimate fate. Love, he jeered, ~love~! It was all rubbish, didn't exist. What I needed was a new husband and father for my children. There was no love for counter-revolutionaries.

I thought: You dare say this to me in my home.

But my best defence was to be silent.

"I didn't marry my husband only for happy times. We were united for ever, and whatever may come I will not divorce him."

He argued and urged for another half-hour and in that time I answered nothing. Even God cannot contradict someone who remains silent. Finally the man retreated, shaking his round head.

"Sooner or later you'll come to us," he said. "They all do, you know."

I heard him go noisily down the stairs. Off to his next victim. With whom, as likely as not, he would have more luck.

p179 The Pastor's Wife

Every effort was made to force prisoners' wives to ask for a divorce. Firstly, a prisoner's will to resist, even to live, was often shattered when he heard he had been abandoned. Secondly, it helped to get the wives involved in the Communist way of life. Once the divorce was accomplished, women were anxious to forget their husbands and the easiest way to do this was to swallow the Party line. I knew scores of divorced women who parroted slogans mocking political prisoners - the men they had loved and whose children they had borne. Thirdly, the fatherless children were at the mercy of the State, to be indoctrinated from the earliest age.

Only one word was needed to make the break. You said "Yes" when the official called. He would see to all the rest.

A few days later, the husband would be informed before his cell companions: "Your wife has decided to divorce you."

The man would think: "Who cares about me now? I'm a fool not to give in and sign whatever nonsense they want, and so go free." But even if he did sign, he might not be released for several years, and meanwhile his wife had children by another man. So homes and families were destroyed. One book couldn't hold the many tragedies of this kind which I found after my release.

In prison, women used to say, "How stupid I was, quarrelling with my husband over nothing. What a good, loving wife I'll be – if ever we get out!"

But outside, they often changed their tune. "Why shouldn't I divorce him, if that's what they want? He may remain in prison all his life. How can I feed the children without ration cards, how can I get work? He didn't really care ..." So they would talk themselves into saying "Yes' to the Ministry.

I told women like this that we must love men as they are, not for what we think they should be. I advised them to think of the happy moments of their married life, and use them to overcome temptation.

All too often, I failed. The pressures were too severe.

But sometimes I could help people to see matrimonial troubles in a new light with a simple joke. I remembered an old Jewish story. A bewildered husband came to a rabbi complaining that his wife had given birth to a child three months after their marriage. "She must have betrayed me!" he said. The rabbi answered, "Not at all. You have lived with your wife three months. She has lived with you three months. You have lived together three months. This makes a total of nine months. Everything is in perfect order."

Often I had recourse to compromises a little bit like this in attempting to patch up a marriage.

p180 The Pastor's Wife

Or when women came to me saying that they meant to divorce a husband in prison, I would tell them the beautiful story of how it is with the Malagasy, the people of Madagascar. There, when a couple wish to divorce they come separately before the judge who inquires in great detail about how they have lived. He writes from this two declarations and when the day comes for judgement the judge says that a divorce is possible, but first the couple must read what he has written.

The wife reads: "My beloved – On this day when we must divorce I remember the beauty of the day when we first met. How I longed to be in your arms, how I longed to become your husband! I couldn't wait for work to end so that I could be near you. Do you remember our first kiss ..." And so he describes all the happiest moments and memories of a shared life. Meanwhile the husband is reading a similar declaration made up of his wife's memories of the marriage, which ends with deep thanks for all the good times, despite the present conflict. More often than not the couple end up in tears, and they go home in peace.

You never reach the end of marriage or the break-up of a friendship when you recall the beautiful things that happened. But too often we don't remember.

Janetta and I knew an attractive young woman, Maura Dalea, with two young children, and a husband in jail. A political prisoner. For seven years she heard nothing. She became involved with another man. The children grew up, filled with Communist propaganda.

Then, at last, a postcard came from prison. She sent him a parcel. But said nothing of her affair.

After eleven years, he was released. He traced his family. The children, a boy and a girl, were now twelve and thirteen.

"We don't know who you are," they said, cruelly. "Father? We've got a father already!"

He tried to win Maura back. But it was too late. She divorced him and married the other man.

It broke the husband. I saw him sometimes in the street, with his terrible, wounded face. But he avoided me. A few years later, crushed by years of prison and disappointment, he died.

Janetta said: "What is happening in the prisons is the lesser part of the tragedy. Hundreds of thousands of people, this whole generation and the generation conceived in these years, will bear the marks of what Communism has done to us."

Sometimes I could help people escape from these troubles, because I knew them myself. More than once I was tempted during Richard's fourteen years in prison.

The most serious occasion was about a year after my release

p181 The Pastor's Wife

A man who came to our meetings fell in love with me. I was then aged forty-three, alone, with a son to help through the most difficult stage of adolescence when boys need a father. The years were flashing by at alarming speed. And of Richard there was no word, no news.

He was a bachelor of about my age, a solid, steady man of whom Mihai was very fond. A Jewish Christian, he lived in a single room with his elderly parents. We exchanged visits and sometimes he'd take Mihai to the cinema or help him with his studies. Mihai was working very hard over his books at home now.

He was a kind and gentle man, who knew how to make me laugh. The thought crossed my mind: here is someone with whom a woman could live in love and trust. Sometimes he caught hold of my hand while he talked, and looked into my eyes with such longing. I couldn't take my hand away. It never came to what the church or the law would call adultery. But it was adultery in God's eyes. And in my heart.

Luckily, Pastor Grecu saw what was happening and spoke to me as I wish all who see a friend about to fall into such trouble would do.

"You know how much I love and appreciate you," he said. "And that couldn't change, whatever happened."

He spoke with rare emotion and sincerity.

"I've known both you and Richard for many years. And I hope you know that whether you sin or you don't, whether you lose faith or keep it, I would still care for you in the same way. Because of what I know you are, not what you do.

"So forgive me if I ask – how is it between you and Paul?"

For a moment I was silent.

He went on: "Don't imagine that I haven't had such trials, too. Please answer my question."

"He's in love with me."

"And are you in love with him?"

"I don't know. Perhaps."

He said: "I remember something Richard used to say: "No passion resists before the bar of reason. If you delay, if you give yourself time to think, you see all the harm you could do to your husband or your wife, to your children, too." I want you to make a hard decision – the hardest there is. Don't see this man again."

I knew that he was right. With some difficulty, I avoided Paul week after week. Then he stopped trying to see me. Later I learnt that Pastor Grecu had spoken to him, too, reminding him of Richard, in prison. Only then did I see how close I'd come to betraying all the years of waiting and trust. I knelt and prayed.

There were other temptations. Fourteen years is a long time. Sometimes I came near to yielding. Sometimes it was merely a passing weakness of the flesh. Sexuality is a remorseless driving force and one must, at times, not accuse oneself too harshly. One can remember to have understanding for one's own weaknesses as well as for those of others.

One morning I was in church, scrubbing the floor, when Marietta rushed in, waving a postcard.

Tears ran down her cheeks. "I think - I think it's from ..."

She could not continue, but knelt on the damp boards beside me, breathless.

I turned the cheap little card over. It was signed "Vasile Georgescu" - but Richard's handwriting, large and irregular and beautiful, was unmistakable. My eyes hazed over.

I knew that political prisoners might write only ten censored lines. What could he say, after so many years, not knowing if his wife and family lived? I looked.

This dear, long dreamed-of message began: "Time and distance quench a small love, but make a great love grow stronger ..." And he asked me to come and see him on a certain date in Tirgul-Ocna, the prison hospital.

Soon the news spread through the Underground Church. The message was learnt by heart by people all over the country. It became a talisman of faith.

In prison, they had taken away even Richard's name. He was "Vasile Georgescu." The guards weren't allowed to know his identity. If the secret leaked out, questions might be asked abroad. He had to vanish without trace. But that was in 1948.

Now Khrushchev was working his way towards supreme power in Russia and there were signs of great changes to come. Throughout 1954, after Stalin's death, we hoped the West would do something for us. But with 1955 came the Geneva Summit conference, then Rumania's entry into the United Nations. We were shocked at the news. Tens of thousands of political prisoners filled the country's jails. No one imagined that Rumania could be welcomed to U.N. membership before they were set free.

But if the U.N. charter binding members to religious and political freedom was ignored, the summit conference brought some improvements in the prisons. We heard that food was better and medicine available. There were rumours of an amnesty. More visits were allowed.

Richard's postcard was the best news I could have had. But I, who so longed to see him, couldn't go. Every week I had to present myself at the police station. They refused to revoke the ban on my leaving Bucharest. So Mihai had to take my place.

Tirgul-Ocna is a small town far to the north, on the other side of the Carpathians. The train makes a journey of several hundred miles around the mountains. I arranged with "Aunt Alice" to go with Mihai. Not that she could meet Richard - the only visitors permitted were wife and child.

I waited behind. They were away two days, and all the time the worries went through my head: Would they see him? (I remembered how Mihai had travelled so far to visit me at the Canal, and then been turned back.) Would Richard be allowed to receive the few warm clothes and food I'd packed? Since he was in a prison sanatorium, he must be very sick. Would he be able to stand, or even talk to Mihai?

They came back, late on a December evening. We heard them climbing the stairs.

"We saw him! We saw him!" Alice called before she was through the door. Following it up with, "He's alive. He's up and about!"

They came in with snow on their shoulders.

"Mihai!"

"Mother! Daddy's well and he says to tell you that he knows he'll come back to us soon. If God can perform one miracle and let him see me, he said, then he can perform two and bring us all together."

Soon we were all in tears. And then we made them something hot to drink, and they told the story. Marietta and Peter were there. We became quite gay. To be a dumb cripple, an epileptic, a prisoner's wife and son, are no hindrances to joy. Alice's cheeks coloured and her thin hands fluttered with excitement as she talked.

"We had to wait hours and hours in the snow. They let us in through the main gateway, then we stood about in a wired-off compound away from the sanatorium buildings. The prisoners had to cross an open space to get to a big tin hut where they received their visitors. It was terrible to see them. Frightening! Gangs of muffled shapes against the dazzling snow. Like grey ghosts. And among them, going along, I saw Richard. You couldn't miss him, he's so tall. I waved like a mad thing, but he couldn't pick me out. We were all in a huddle, and everyone waving. Only Mihai was allowed to speak with him."

When at last they got away there was no train back, and they stayed with peasant friends in the little town.

Mihai had been so overcome at seeing his father that at first I couldn't get much from him. But I was too happy to mind. He'd been allowed to leave the food and clothes.

Only later did I realize what a shock it must have been for him. To see the father he loved and respected behind bars, shaven-headed, skeleton-thin.

Mihai had burst out immediately with the words he'd been preparing: "Mummy says not to be afraid, because if we don't meet again on earth we will in heaven." Comforting words! Richard smiled and asked, "Have you enough to eat?" Mihai replied, "Oh yes, Our Father looks after us!" The political officer of the jail, who was listening, grinned at this. He thought it meant that I had married again.

In such conditions they could say little. Richard's last words were: "Mihai, the only gift I can give you as a father is to tell you this: always seek the highest of Christian virtues, which is to keep the right measure in all things."

I put Richard's postcard between the pages of my Bible. Now and then I went to look at it, and read for the hundredth time. In prison he became a master at writing these minuscule letters. He told me later that others came to him for help because he could squeeze in so much meaning. They also asked each other what he'd said, and Richard's words went around. The result was that dozens of prisoners began their postcards: "Time and distance quench a small love, but make a great love stronger." So messages of love and hope were going out far and wide.

The year 1956 began with the whole Communist bloc in rebellious mood. "Five Year Plans" had got nowhere. Food was as short as ever. Wages were kept low. All the hopes raised after Stalin's death had faded.

Then, in February, at the Twentieth Congress of the Communist Party, Khrushchev made his secret speech denouncing Stalin and his works. The Russians never published it, but before long in every country of Eastern Europe people felt the warm breeze of the thaw from Moscow.

Faster and faster came the signs of de-stalinization. The huge forces of militia and Secret Police were reduced in size. Million-dollar trade contracts were negotiated with Western countries to rescue the economy. Collectivization was relaxed. Struggles began in several Communist bloc countries for the Party leadership. And most wonderful of all, hundreds of political prisoners were being freed under an amnesty each day.

I didn't dare to hope that Richard would be among them. We had no hint, no news. He had still almost twelve years to serve.

One lovely morning in June 1956 I went out to visit friends

p185 The Pastor's Wife

And when I returned, there he was. He put his arms around me.

It was an evening of laughter and tears and greetings to friends who came from all over Bucharest. Long after midnight, we borrowed a mattress from a neighbour and made up a bed. Richard is so tall we had to put a cushion on a chair for his feet.

He didn't sleep. I know because Janetta and I couldn't sleep. In the small hours he got up and walked quietly to look for a long time at Mihai as if to make sure that he was really there.

Richard had suffered beating and doping in prison. He had eighteen torture scars on his wasted body, but had not talked. Doctors found that his lungs were covered with the healed scars of tuberculosis. They simply couldn't believe he had survived eight and a half years (almost three of them in solitary confinement in an underground cell) virtually untreated. He was now given the best bed in a hospital ward. All released prisoners were treated with kindness and generosity by the people wherever they went. They were the most privileged group in Rumania, which infuriated the Communists.

Richard had to move continually. Brethren gathered from all over the country to see him. So he had to go from one hospital to another to avoid attracting the Secret Police.

Soon after he got better we celebrated our twentieth wedding anniversary. Richard hadn't a penny to buy me a present. But he obtained a pretty, bound notebook and in it, every evening he wrote verses, love-poems, addressed to me. Mihai and other close friends also wrote little messages in it. And on the day of our anniversary, he gave it to me. But this lovely gift was not mine for long.

In the first flush of the political thaw, Richard was allowed a licence to preach. Persecution had brought the churches much closer, and he was invited first to speak in the Orthodox cathedral at Sibiu, where the priest was an old friend.

"The only trouble is that I've the Metropolitan to think about," he said. "You'll be expected to make the sign of the cross and so forth."

Richard said: "I'll make however many signs are prescribed in Orthodox ritual so long as I can speak about His cross.

I went to Sibiu with him. He was still weak and they had to find something for him to sit on while he spoke. They decided to bring out the Metropolitan's throne. And when this was seen the rumour went around that the Metropolitan himself was to preach. And instead there came this man. Who was, people said, a Jew.

Richard not only made the sign of the cross, he preached about the cross, and its meaning. It was a sermon without political content, on the surface. Nevertheless informers in the church reported every word, and the Secret Police understood its hidden meaning, sometimes better than some Christians.

When next Richard spoke, giving a series of talks to students at Cluj University, one of the top men from the Ministry of Cults was sent to listen. This man reported that Richard's lectures were a "torrent of sedition." The sedition consisted in the fact that he answered one after another all the Marxist arguments against religion and defeated them. The Lutheran bishop was pressured, unwillingly, into depriving Richard of his right to preach in Rumania. He had possessed it for six weeks.

The representative of the Ministry of Cults said at the next meeting of Lutheran pastors, with hatred in his voice "Wurmbrand is finished, finished!" And walked from the building.

A few minutes later there was a screech of brakes and a terrible crash. The man had been knocked down and crushed against the wall by a car that inexplicably mounted the pavement.

Richard went on preaching in secret. He sped from place to place. He spoke briefly in small churches and at underground meetings and left at once before anyone could report to the local police. He left the house without telling even me where he was going, and I lived in constant fear.

Mihai called him "The Phantom Preacher," but knew it was not much of a joke. At any moment he might be arrested.

Before the year was out the risings in Poland and Hungary blazed briefly and were stamped out. The "thaw" had been short-lived.

But in the four months between Richard's release and the October revolutions, we had a respite. A small theological seminary at Sibiu was allowed to train a few new pastors. Mihai decided he would join.

He was now eighteen, and had a character of steel. He bore little resemblance to the boy Richard had left behind so many years ago. He had gone through intense spiritual struggles as well as physical hardship in that time. But, through all the doubts and in spite of indoctrination, he remained a Christian.

Richard helped now to strengthen his belief. But from the start he said, "Father, I love and respect you, but you're you and I'm me. We don't think alike on everything. I've a personality of my own!"

Mihai had passed all his high school examinations without a day's schooling after the age of fifteen. Now he was set on entering the ministry.

p187 The Pastor's Wife

Richard said, "Are you sure you want to go to this seminary? I seriously don't recommend it. For any young man."

"Why ever not?"

"Because the way seminaries teach in these days is mostly destructive. You won't be taught love towards God, or to the Bible, or the best way to follow the saints. You'll dissect the Bible, you'll pick away at the word of God. It could be poison to your soul. Some of the professors are saints, others are far from being so."

But Mihai had decided.

When he came home for the Christmas holidays I had a bad shock. At family prayer, Richard read something from the Gospels in which Jesus quotes the Old Testament.

"Oh," said Mihai later. "I don't think it means that. Anyway, Jesus didn't have the knowledge and background needed for a correct interpretation of the Old Testament by scientific standards."

"He didn't?" I said, wanting to burst into tears. "Let us be thankful for that."

Mihai overcame this early brashness. We talked to him, and in the end he opposed the Communist-inspired teachings of his professors. Which got him into much trouble.

His ideal was to become a missionary in India at that time. He studied Indian religions and Hindu practices. I was a little afraid when I saw him standing on his head for several minutes, according to the rules of Hata-Yoga. I asked: "Don't you think God made the legs to stand on?"

For his thesis he began work on a study of British nonconformist preachers, Booth and Spurgeon, men who cared little about official theological studies.

The Communists wished to keep the school open to impress the West (Rumania had just entered the World Council of Churches) but with as few students as possible. When 400 applied to join, the authorities were alarmed. They let the boys know that if they insisted, their fathers might lose their jobs. So many withdrew, "voluntarily." By 1965 the Lutheran seminary in Cluj had only five students left. There were six students in the Baptist seminary of Bucharest.

But for three years Mihai managed to carry on his studies at Sibiu. There was a fine library and some of the professors were excellent men. So he was not at home when they came to arrest his father for the second time.

We knew it was coming. The new wave of terror began in 1958. And we all saw now how we'd been tricked. Many really thought the Communists were interested in coming to some kind of terms with the West. That they would mellow. People had lived through all the deceit of the past yet even now they did not realize the depth of the lie.

In July 1958 a series of laws was enacted tougher than anything yet seen in the satellite countries. The death penalty was ordered for scores of minor offences, and was being liberally applied by the autumn. Mass arrests returned. Thousands were sent to new slave labour projects, such as the clearing of the Danube Delta marshes. All juvenile delinquents (i.e. young people who criticized the Government) were sent "to the reeds."

A new purge began in official ranks. All those of socially doubtful origin who had found jobs in the "thaw" were now sacked. A rule forbade them, and their children, from working for any branch of the public services.

The fight against religion was renewed. On Khrushchev's orders churches were closed and priests arrested throughout Eastern Europe as part of a seven-year drive "to eradicate the vestiges of superstition."

Our attic was now more than ever a center for the Underground Church. It could not escape attention for much longer. Every evening Richard prayed: "God, if you know some prisoner to whom I could be of use, send me back to jail." To this prayer, I said a hesitant Amen.

One Tuesday evening in January, 1959, a woman from our church arrived in tears. The week before she had borrowed some copies of Richard's sermons. Hundreds of these, cyclostyled, were circulating throughout Rumania. It was strictly against the law. Now the police had raided the woman's flat and taken off the copies.

We also learnt through an informant in the Party that Richard had been denounced by a young pastor who claimed to be his friend. He may have been blackmailed - made to sign the denunciation under threat of prison. Anyhow, he did this and it is not for me to judge his motives. We were fond of him, and it is better simply to continue to love.

On Wednesday, January 15th, at 1 a.m., the police battered on the door and burst into our attic before we could get out of bed. The light came on.

"You're Richard Wurmbrand? Get into the other room. And stay there."

Our tiny flat was full of men opening cupboards, turning out drawers, throwing papers on the floor. On Richard's desk, where he wrote, they found pages of notes, typewritten sermons, worn Bibles. All were seized.

Then they found my anniversary gift, the notebook in which Richard and Mihai had written verses to me.

p189 The Pastor's Wife

"Please don't take that. It's a personal thing, a present. It's of no use to you."

They took it.

The captain in charge brought Richard out of the other room. He had been handcuffed.

I said, "Aren't you ashamed to treat innocent people like this?

Richard moved towards me. They caught his arms. He warned "I shan't leave this house without a struggle unless you allow me to embrace my wife."

"Let him go," said the captain.

We knelt together in prayer, with the Secret Police standing around us. Then we sang the hymn, "The Church's one foundation is Jesus Christ, her Lord."

A hand fell on Richard's shoulder. We've got to get going. It's nearly 5 a.m.," the Captain said. But he spoke quietly and his eyes glistened.

I went after them down the staircase. Richard turned his head to say, "Give all my love to Mihai and the pastor who denounced me." They pushed him into a van.

When it started up, I began to cry out, "Richard! Richard!"

I ran after the van, calling out and weeping. Along the icy street. Then it vanished around a corner. I had to stop, breathless, confused.

Back at the attic the door stood open. Weeping, I fell on the floor.

I cried out, "Lord, I give my husband into your hands. I can do nothing, but you can pass through locked doors. You can put angels around him. You can bring him back!"

I sat in the darkness, praying. Until the new day arrived. Then I began to remember what I still had to do. Alice came to see me. I told her, "Again they have stolen my Richard."

p190 The Pastor's Wife

THE NEW TERROR

First, Mihai had to be told. It wouldn't be easy. He'd been through so many tragedies. And the news had to be kept from informers at the university, or he would be expelled. So I couldn't go myself to Sibiu. They knew me there.

Early next morning Alice took the train, and waited in a small park near the theological faculty for Mihai to pass. She dared not ask the other students. If they reported her visit (and it was an offence not to do so) the news would come out.

She could only hope that Mihai would pass that way. It was bitterly cold in the park. Snow clung to the branches of trees and lay thick on the benches. Towards evening, he came.

"Yes," he said. "I've been expecting it. Tell Mother I'll come home at once. They may take her, too."

"But your studies," said Suzanne. "Nearly three years you've worked ..."

"What does it matter? It's sometimes the pastors with degrees who betray and destroy what the real "fishers of men" have built. Better without a degree. I'll be thrown out soon, anyway. When they feel like it."

It was very late when Alice returned to the attic, and told me all they'd said.

I did see Richard once more before he vanished for another six years. There was a trial. Relatives could attend. The Party had grown a little more formal since the heady days of 1948. We don't jail men for nothing, they said to the world; we have our tribunals, our judges.

There they sat, five of them, on a raised platform under a red banner which read: JUSTICE FOR THE PEOPLE IN THE SERVICE OF THE PEOPLE. Above this were portraits of Gheorghiu-Dej and other well-fed Party faces.

Enemies of the People came through one door and went out of another - case heard, defence offered, sentence given within minutes. Priests, peasants, gypsies, journalists moved through as if on a conveyor belt.

p191 The Pastor's Wife

A sweeper had got drunk and shouted, "Gheorghiu-Dej is an old idiot. He ought to go back to driving his puff-puff!" (Dej was a former railwayman). This insult was tossed about the court until the sweeper's lawyer asked for clemency. "Two years," said the President. Out went the sweeper. And in came Richard.

I did not hear one word of what followed, and nor did he. We simply looked at each other. For the last time, it might have been.

Mihai told me afterwards that it was a re-hearing of his old, secret trial, which took place in 1951. The amnesty was cancelled, the old sentence restored. And as he went out he turned his head and gave us a last, cheerful smile. It had taken a couple of minutes.

The clerk, a small, exhausted man, came and handed me a piece of paper. It said that Wurmbrand, R., born 1909 etc., etc., was sentenced to twenty-five years. An increase of five years.

Later we discovered that the sentence also included a heavy fine, plus "legal expenses." And all our property was once more confiscated; this happened to every political prisoner's family. We had no money, so two officials from the tax office came and wrangled about it. They went off with the few precious things we'd collected since my release in 1953.

They left us the beds, a table and two chairs. We thought ourselves quite lucky. But over the next six years they came again and again, demanding money, confiscating. Winter and summer, I battled with bureaucracy over our few poor sticks.

It was a time of frantic fear. Every day friends were arrested. Nearly all our dear ones were back in jail. Night and day ceased to exist for us. People came from every part of the country with stories of terror, of churches closed and menfolk kidnapped.

While all this was happening to us, Khrushchev paid his "ice-breaking" visit to the U.S.A. and there was talk of a major Summit meeting in Paris for May 1960.

We were discussing the prospects in Miss Landauer's flat.

"You'll see, Sabina," she said. "After this conference your husband will be freed. They'll come to an agreement. The prison doors will open!"

Then the telephone rang – a neighbour to say that the police were in our attic.

"Don't come back tonight! You'll be arrested for certain. They've already taken Alice.

Alice was perhaps the most unselfish, generous woman I know. All she had she gave to others. She cared for the children of political prisoners. Children who were literally turned out on to the street. This was her crime.

p192 The Pastor's Wife

Because she refused to inform on friends during her interrogation she was terribly beaten up. Her teeth were kicked out, bones broken. Then she was sentenced to eight years imprisonment.

The police searched our attic for two hours that night. Besides Alice they arrested a girl who happened to call in – a common practice.

We came back later to the wrecked flat. Clothes and papers were strewn about. The beds upended. Even the mattresses slashed.

Mihai said, "D'you know what they've taken? The Great Rheumatism Cure!"

Old Mrs. Tomaziu had copied out by hand pages and pages from a book by a German doctor which gave a rather dubious course of treatment for rheumatism. She'd insisted on lending them to me. "It's a very rare book, dear. I could only borrow it for a day. So don't lose my notes, whatever you do." I had a hard time explaining to her that they had been seized by the Secret Police. I don't think she was ever fully convinced.

Hours and days were spent in trying to get news from the police of Alice and other friends who were arrested every day. Success was rare. They'd vanished into the bottomless well of prison. Perhaps, one day, we'd hear of them again. (It was a long time after Alice's arrest that we discovered what had happened to her.)

All our closest friends seemed to be going.

Elderly Mr. Trifu, who had been like a grandfather to Mihai. He was a poet in the mould of W. H. Davies – without a formal education, a countryman who wrote lyrics of heavenly simplicity and depth. Mihai was, so to speak, brought up in his lap.

And Nailescu, perhaps the greatest composer of religious music in the country. He left a wife and four children, who were turned out of their home on to the street.

And Pastor Armeanu. I've told people in the West his story. They think I'm joking. He was sentenced to twenty years for preaching on the text: "Cast your nets on the right side ..."

"Aha!" they said. "Why not on the left side? Imperialist propaganda!"

An informer reported this sermon. It was made the pretext for his arrest.

Pastor Armeanu left behind a wife and five young children. They were deported to a desert place, the Baragan. One day, Mrs. Armeanu came to our door, exhausted and sick. We took her in. She was no trouble. On the contrary, her sweet nature, which bore everything without complaint, helped us all. But now we were five.

p193 The Pastor's Wife

The man we all suspected of denouncing Pastor Armeanu came to an Underground Church meeting.

Mrs. Armeanu whispered: "Leave him be. He was forced to do it." She wanted to forgive and forget.

But I didn't. I taxed him: Why had he done it?

He blustered. "They pestered me for months. Anyway, I didn't say anything that wasn't the truth. He did say the things I reported and even if I agreed with them, they were counter- revolutionary. I did my duty, as I saw it."

"But then you're on the side of a regime that stops at nothing? That kills and arrests innocent men, that poisons children with atheism?"

He shifted uneasily. "Oh no. Of course not."

"Then why didn't you inform them that you yourself are against the regime, instead of saying that your brother is?"

There was bitterness in my heart. I knew that pastors and friends and even a bishop had some guilt for Richard's arrest. They loved themselves more than the principles they preached. I fought with myself, feeling hatred enter me towards those who had taken my husband. And so many husbands. I prayed, but could not find peace.

Then Marietta cut from somewhere a picture of Christ on the cross, by one of the Italian masters. Often my eyes strayed to where it was pinned on the attic wall. And each time I remembered His last words: Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do. And also: I thirst.

How they thirsted, the betrayers, for forgiveness! Which I would not give them. Which in my bitterness I withheld.

And with that thought something changed in me. I knew that even for saints a time may come when self-love is stronger than love of God. The Lutheran bishop Mueller, a good friend, used to say that those whom others call a traitor might be seen by God as a weak saint. He said it not minding at all that others might consider him a weak bishop for this. I resolved to give love and expect nothing in return.

In the winter of 1960 snow came early. The streets were deep in it and no one went out if they could avoid it. A pane of glass had gone from the window. Mihai nailed a piece of old carpet over the hole, but nothing stops a determined wind. It whined mournfully under the door.

"We might as well be sitting outside," Marietta said. "It isn't a bit warmer in here."

The carpet blocked the light and in spite of the draught our leaky little attic was horribly stuffy at night, with five people in it.

When I wasn't busy with the Underground Church I tramped the streets from Government office to office, trying to win a respite over the fine imposed on Richard. Unless so much was paid within a certain time, they would come and take all we had left. I waited on benches in draughty halls to see officials, and filled in dozens of complicated forms.

It didn't do us any good.

One day two tax department officials hammered on the door. Mihai opened it and called to me. They wanted more money. I couldn't pay? Too bad. They'd make a list of all furnishings and household goods, so that I might reclaim them when I found the cash.

I said, "That won't take you long."

They noted down chairs, tables, cutlery, the cabinet of an old gramophone with its works missing (a relic of Mihai's musical repair days). The beds we could keep. They were, anyhow, too broken to move.

"Carpet, brown, small," said the first man, and gave it a tug. It came away from the window, letting in an icy, hissing wind.

"No. Better count that as part of the window," he said. "They've got people sleeping here." And they put it back.

I thanked them. But that was a mistake. They were reminded of their duty.

"You've got three days to pay. Otherwise you've had it."

And off they went.

I spent the next morning trying to see the correct functionary. At last my turn came. He sat in a cubicle with pasteboard walls.

"You mean they haven't cleared you out yet!" He was furious. "What business is it of mine what you do next? The court instructions are clear. Either you pay immediately, and pay it all, or your property's confiscated. You can't pay? That's it. They'll be round tomorrow, first thing."

I walked down the stairs. I couldn't stop the tears running down my cheeks. Shivering and coughing, I paused in the big hall a moment before taking the plunge into the icy street. Then someone touched my arm.

A tall, bespectacled man in a dark suit had followed me down. I supposed he was another official, with some new threat. He glanced quickly round.

"I know your case," he said. "Here. Take this."

And he vanished, hurrying back the way he had come.

I looked at the folded notes he'd slipped into my hand. Enough to stall them off for weeks!

Walking home, I didn't notice my sodden shoes, my frozen hands, my exhaustion. My heart was filled with glowing calm. That kind, that generous man, who had shown me a sign of God's love. Who could he be?

Mihai made discreet inquiries and found he was from a department of the tax office. One of the many friends of the Underground Church. We could not meet – it was too dangerous but every month from then on, as long as Richard was in prison he sent a sum out of his small salary.

Mihai had been duly expelled from his seminary. Our friend Bishop Mueller did all he could to keep him in. Dr. Mueller was despised by many of his Lutheran flock because of his open collaboration with the Communists, who even honoured him with decorations. They did not know that he reported to the Underground Church every discussion with high officials. He also secretly protected and helped families of Christian martyrs. I can say this now openly, because he is dead.

Mihai managed to make his way into the engineering and construction faculty of the university. Not admitting, of course, that he was the son of a political prisoner.

"They'll find out in a few months or so," he said. "Then I'll be thrown out and can join something else."

I was trying to earn a little money by working at home. I'd found an old knitting machine, designed to turn out jerseys and pullovers. The trouble was that when I wanted to work, the machine didn't.

The friend who had given it to me soon discovered that he'd given himself as well. He was a mechanic, and hardly a day passed without my calling on him for some repair.

At last he said, "Bearings have gone."

"What does that mean?"

"It means we throw it out. Scrap it. I can't get spares."

"Oh dear." My pullovers, if sometimes a little unusual in shape, had sold well.

"I'll look around. Perhaps I can get you another cheap."

A week later he arrived with a pair of simpler machines for making socks. Now Mrs. Armeanu and I were busy. Needles were the problem. They broke often, and replacements were simply unobtainable in the new Rumania. All supplies went into the factories. The mechanic tried to take a few from his place of work. But employees were searched as they left. I couldn't let him risk imprisonment for a needle. So sock production often stopped for months at a time.

We had a socks black-market. Since no one could sell goods without State permission (it was illegal to make them privately, come to that) our friends sold them at factory gates. Or in the flea market. Or at bus stations. Anywhere that offered the safety of a crowd.

Finally, we gave it up. In the sixties, economic barriers with the West were eased. Rumania got Western machinery and know-how. When nylon socks appeared, mine had to disappear. I was quite happy about it.

After this, I kept my money-making ventures to language-teaching.

"Comrade Sabina Wurmbrand?"

A young man in a dark raincoat had come to the door after dark.

"I am Mrs. Wurmbrand."

"Tomorrow at 9 a.m. you're to report to the Ministry of the Interior. You'll show this card to the guards and ask for the room indicated on it." He gave me a cold stare. "Good night!" And clattered down the stairs.

There was no more frightening summons. Visitors to the Ministry usually became guests for an indefinite spell. Had someone denounced me? We were a sad little family in the attic that night.

Early next morning I packed a small bag with toilet things and warm clothes. I said goodbye to them all, and set off.

The office was rather grand, with a carpet and curtains and pretty girl secretaries. The portraits of Lenin and Co. were in colour and well-framed. Behind a desk the size of a grand piano sat a plump man in civilian clothes, about forty years old.

"Sit down, Comrade Wurmbrand." He waved to an armchair. "We've asked you to come here because we're taking an interest in your case. Tell me about yourself and your family. Don't worry! Nothing will go beyond these walls. You have a son (he glanced at the papers on his desk) Mihai...How are his studies proceeding...?"

I'd caught the drift. It was another attempt to persuade me into divorce. Politeness would be applied where pressure had failed.

He was suave and confident, leaning back expansively in his chair.

I answered, "I love my husband, and whatever happens I shall stay married to him. We are united for ever."

"Well now, let me make a little proposal. You want your child to complete his education. You want the right to work, to live your own life. You can have all this, very simply. Just leave your identity card with me. And in forty-eight hours we'll send it round to you endorsed in your own name. Forget about big words like divorce. This is just a simple formality the State asks of you. Isn't it the intelligent thing to do?" He paused playing with a pencil. "Of course, if you don't co- operate, there are other ways. When we want something, we get it..."

I looked at the political officer. Into his eyes.

"Suppose one day ~you~ are in prison, like so many other officials? Would you want your wife to divorce you?"

At this he sat up with a jerk. Then he exploded.

"Don't you know where you are, who I am? How dare you put questions to me!" He flung the pencil into the fireplace. "Now get out, get out! And don't forget what I've told you! Understand?"

I picked up the little bag and went to the door without answering.

"Understand?"

But he had understood, too, for that was their last attempt to make me divorce Richard.

Instead, they told me: he is dead.

It happened on two occasions.

First, a couple of haggard young men came to the door saying they were ex-prisoners. I believe they were. But they couldn't look me in the eyes. When they began to describe seeing Richard in jail, I knew at once that I was dealing with provocateurs.

"Poor Pastor Wurmbrand," said the bolder of the two. "We don't know exactly what happened to him. He became very moody before the end. Wouldn't talk to anyone. Or so we heard in Gherla prison."

"What are you trying to tell me? That he committed suicide?"

"You can never be sure. But we know he was taken first. And who could blame him if he did?"

He tried to be cunning. But could not have chosen a stupider lie.

"Poor Pastor Wurmbrand. A real saint, he was. Everyone said so."

"Please go, now." I couldn't find anything else to say.

"We want to say, Mrs. Wurmbrand, how sorry ..."

"Please go."

They looked horribly guilty and ashamed. Probably they did it just for the sake of a ration card, or the promise of a job. The second time, it was officially stated that Richard was dead. But not directly to me. A plain-clothes man called at a friend's house. They didn't want to break the sad news to Mrs. Wurmbrand personally. Would the friend oblige? Then just say Pastor Wurmbrand had died after some weeks' of illness and was buried in prison.

I was glad to be spared another sickening interview.

But they didn't stop there. Richard's name was by now being whispered all over the country. He was becoming a legend. Children would not go to bed without praying for his safety. To put an end to it released prisoners were sent to Christian homes in several of the bigger towns to persuade people that he had died in prison by his own hand. Nobody believed them.

Then Mihai was expelled from his faculty. He had refused categorically to comply with Communist teachings and practices. Now he discovered that they knew all about him: his hours, his friends. They kept files on every Christian. You had to be a virtuoso of underground work, which few of us were, to keep things hidden from the Secret Police. We knew people informed on us. It was an inevitable part of life. But Mihai said the church had been too deeply infiltrated.

"Mother, I hate to say it, but you're too soft-hearted. You let all these people come to the flat: they've only got to say 'Praise the Lord!' and they're in. But we've got to be hard with these informers."

I would have liked to argue, but he went on: "I'm frightened they'll arrest you again, Mother. And me. They know I'm up to the neck in your secret work. But it isn't just people like us, who at least know the risks and have a purpose in life. I'm thinking about the boys I used to know in Sibiu who got taken in twice a week and beaten up until they promised to inform. About the kids in Brasov who tried to form a freedom party. It was a childish game. They even kept a diary and records of their meetings. But the Communists like to play, too. They're all in jail now. Perhaps being beaten to death."

I thought of Alice. That sweet, gentle woman. Stretched out on a bench with her feet and hands tied and her teeth kicked in. Richard had been horribly tortured, too, on his first arrest. Though he never spoke of it. What was he suffering now?

We knew that although several Underground Church meetings had recently been broken up by the police, others had been left alone. Deliberately, so that informers could work in peace. Now we made a new effort against them.

Our meetings were increasing in size. Up to fifty or sixty people at a time. We had to be specially careful if someone at a meeting had rank - a university professor, or a Party member.

p199 The Pastor's Wife

They would be watching him. Then we kept numbers down to half a dozen trusted friends.

One way of spotting informers was to plant false news. Word was passed to a suspect that a gathering was to be held at the address of a friend. If an unusual number of plain-clothes snoopers were seen near the house, then we knew he was guilty.

Generally, we kept our knowledge from him. Sorry the house was empty, we smiled. We had to change the address at the last minute - didn't have time to tell you.

A known informer is valuable. You can mislead him. If you drive him out of the church, he's replaced at once by one you don't know. So the rule was: keep friendly.

Sometimes we traced informers through information from arrested men. The questions which interrogators didn't ask them were often more important to us than those they did.

One of our members had been secretly printing Russian gospels. Yet he was never asked about it during interrogation. We guessed why - his fellow-printer was the informer. He was a Christian - caught in the net of blackmail and threats.

He still worked and prayed with us in love; and yet was their agent, out of fear.

So it went on. On the one hand the struggle to keep out wind and rain, tax-collectors and Secret Police; on the other the battle to hold together the Underground Church. We lived dangerously. And were never bored.

In November I made a trip to Cluj. A show trial had been arranged there for leaders of the Army of the Lord, the forbidden religious organization which Richard had done much to help. I heard that a close friend of ours, a teacher, was among them.

The Army is made up mostly of country folk and hundreds of them came to Cluj on the day of the trial. They stood in a silent mass outside the gates of the military tribunal. It was raining heavily.

They'd come from all over Rumania, in spite of the dangers of being noted and denounced, to show their loyalty to those who were to be court-martialled for their faith.

When the prison vans arrived, the crowd surged forward to catch a glimpse of their dear ones. In dirty, coarse prison clothes the accused men and women were hustled into the court.

Wives and families called out to them, clutching bundles of warm clothes and food.

"Get back! Get back!" The militia brandished their rifles. A couple of younger soldiers, rattled made as if to shoot. There was a moment of panic.

An officer was shouting to someone in the building, "Phone for reinforcements!" Using their guns as staves, the guards pushed the crowd out of the yard, into the street, men, women and children, then tried to close the gates. The cry went up: ~Take us, too. We are their brethren. We believe like them!~

At the end of the street a car appeared, full of police with threatening guns. People ran and scattered into doorways. But the moment the car passed, they churned out again and pressed against the gates.

In the end the police, who were totally unprepared for such a demonstration, agreed to let in close relatives only. A handful of wives and children were admitted. The rest stood all day outside the gates, trying to persuade the guards to let them in. Late at night the crowd was as big as ever.

The court was trying to avoid further trouble by rushing through all the trials at a single sitting.

At dusk the prisoners were led out, back to their cells. An officer emerged to say that sentences would not be known until next day. Those who'd come from out of town were found beds for the night by the local people who sympathized with them. Most of us were in tears. None of the wives had a chance to say a last word to their husbands or to give them the precious bundles.

I was taken to the home of an Underground Church member, with half a dozen wives of arrested men. We decided to spend the night in prayer for them.

"Announce it or not tomorrow," sighed one wife, "it will be heavy."

It wasn't the first trial for Army of the Lord followers. Far from it. From twenty-year-olds to people in their sixties, they had been hunted down for years.

Next morning I went to the courts. A list had been nailed to the gates, which were locked, and a sad group stood around it. My friend's sentence was eight years.

I walked to the railway station in the rain and sat down to wait for the train back to Bucharest.

I was asked to come urgently to the house of a secret Christian. Trudi was there. Not the smiling, capable Trudi who welcomed us to Colonel Shircanu's house and eavesdropped on his telephone, but a crumpled, woebegone girl. For a moment I thought they had found her out.

"What is it?" I asked. The others were out and we could talk freely.

It was about her fiance, a young man of the same age. They had not yet money to set up a home and in any case Trudi felt that she must keep to her post of danger, at least for the time being. Now the boy was pressing for proof of her affections. "If you really loved me," he said at every meeting, "you would not hold me off like this." She was desperately afraid of losing him. What could she do?

So with Trudi, as with so many other girls, the problem of purity arose. To touch, or not to touch? Now, looking back over thirty years towards the question I'd faced as a girl in Paris, and having seen so much, and had so long to think about it in prison and while waiting for Richard, I knew the answer.

To ask ~Why purity?~ is as wrong as to ask ~Why life?~ It is one of the great gifts of nature. Since life began, the ideal put before man in the great religions everywhere, in China, in the Greek mysteries, has been purity: the dream of a pure woman. The Gospel begins with the story of a virgin, as opposed to the Messalinas of that time. Joan of Arc had to be a virgin to save France. Reading the life of St. Therese of Lisieux, you love her for that virtue. Would Spinoza or Beethoven have produced such exalted work if they had not been pure?

To ask, "Why be pure?" is like asking, "Why be honest?" Ask, and you reveal a little of your soul.

In all the world of literature I have two favourite characters: Solveig in ~Peer Gynt~ and Gretchen in Goethe's ~Faust~.

Peer Gynt was a scoundrel and a drunkard, but he met on his way one pure and devout girl. Peer was sure she would wait for him. Decades passed, in which Peer went from bad to worse, but he always remembered that he had known a pure girl. Her image was continually before his eyes. When he returned to her he was old, but she had been the means of his salvation.

Gretchen was seen by Faust walking to church and she, too would not lift her eyes to him. In a moment of madness, tempted by Mephistopheles, she fell into sin with him, but she atoned for it in prison (which she called a holy place) and won back her purity. She longed for Faust in heaven, and the thought of her put him on the way to salvation.

Why should a girl keep herself pure? Because in this way she can inspire mankind and lead humanity higher. I saw the value of purity in jail, where the purest women could most deeply help others.

We live as it were in the cellar of this world far from God. Every time we expose our soul to His light and love, it may grow.

But we must have understanding for human failure (in ourselves as well as in others). The Talmud says that God is longsuffering towards every sin except unchastity. The rabbi who thought this did not know God. Just the contrary is the truth.

p202 The Pastor's Wife

There is no sin which Jesus so easily forgave as this. Jesus knew the almost irresistible drive of sexuality. Therefore he did not condemn the adulteress. He tells us to do our utmost to beware of this sin, but keeps us at his loving bosom if we do commit it, notwithstanding. We might succeed later where we have failed today. There is no limit to the long-suffering of God and there is no sin for which the Church does not have full understanding and forgiveness.

I could give young people like Trudi one piece of practical advice. When you strive to get rid of erotic thoughts or sinful sexuality, the results are often the contrary of what you expect. Concupiscence is a huge power. Struggles to escape it only tighten the bonds.

It is the indirect way that succeeds. Don't try to eliminate thoughts which you abhor. They will not go. They have come to stay. But fill your mind with beautiful and pure ideas. Throw yourself into whole-hearted, time and energy-absorbing religious, social, political, philanthropic or educational work. The taking upon yourself of Christ's responsibilities in some field will make you Christlike in time.

New ideals have this great expulsive force. But if you fall, remember that there is no limit to forgiveness. Nobody becomes a saint in three days. It took St. Anthony thirty years.

In 1962 a warmer wind began to blow from Moscow. We sniffed it cautiously. There was talk of a new "thaw." We received more letters from abroad. Rumours spread that Rumania was trying to break away from Comecon, the Soviet-controlled common market. There were even rumours of an amnesty.

People joked more freely:

Khrushchev: Mr. Kennedy, what can I do: I've tried brainwashing, I've tried prison but these stupid Christians still go church. How can I stop them?

Kennedy: Try replacing the ikons in the churches with your portrait.

TO FREEDOM

On every Communist festival we listened intently to the radio, hoping for some announcement about a release of prisoners. I couldn't sleep at night for thinking about it.

May 1st, 1962, Labour Day. Nothing.

August 23rd, Freedom Day. Nothing.

November 7th. Russian Revolution Day. A few hundred criminal convicts were set free. No news of the politicals.

And yet, the small signs continued to multiply. A huge trade deal was made with Yugoslavia. The "Institute for Russian Studies" became a lesser part of the "Institute for Foreign Languages." The "Russian Bookshop" - a big State store became the "Universal Bookshop."

In August, 1963, jamming of Rumanian language broadcasts from the West stopped.

How breathlessly we sat by the radio that August 23rd, longing for news. There was none.

Early in 1964, without an announcement, a handful of politicals were released. A few were our friends.

We asked them: What does it mean?

They didn't know. "The guard came in and read out a list of names, and that was that!" How many names? About eighty.

Eighty! So many! Now we were sure that an amnesty was on the way. It had happened just like this in 1956. Would it be on May 1st?

But there was no news that day.

One morning I was in my attic when Marietta rushed in, out of breath:

"Alice is home!" After four years! We snatched up our coats and ran outside and jumped on a tram.

There she was, thin and worn and smiling. How many things she had to say! But she had nothing, nothing. Just the patched rags on her back.

"Tomorrow we'll bring you some things," I promised.

"But I know you haven't anything yourself," she said.

p204 The Pastor's Wife

"Oh, but we live in the lap of luxury," laughed Mihai. "You should see our penthouse flat."

"Carpets on the walls," said Marietta.

"On the windows, too!"

"Running water."

"Straight through the ceiling!"

How lucky we were, I thought, compared with so many other women. We were surrounded with love. Everywhere it was working for us, running secretly like sap in the great tree of the Underground Church.

All night I couldn't close my eyes. In the morning we gathered a few things and took them to Alice, to the cousin's flat where she had slept.

Now, indeed, we had reason to hope that our dear ones would come home. But weeks passed, and months.

Every few weeks a friend named Marcia came running to the attic.

"The amnesty! It's coming next week! This time it's really true."

Soon she was nicknamed Sister Amnesty. Marcia worked hard for the church, and she had a husband in an official post. So her rumours were taken more seriously.

The real amnesty, when it came, took us all unawares.

I'd risen early and gone out shopping for the family. It was a Wednesday in June, warm and blue. When I came home I found the daily paper waiting for me. A friend had brought it on his way to work.

In a modest space on page 1 was the news: AMNESTY.

It was not for every political prisoner. In fact, it was not clear who it was for at all. I read and re-read it. The announcement was hedged about with protective phrases. They couldn't admit that thousands of people, having been unjustly locked up for years, would now be freed. It made them look too silly. And Moscow was watching.

I hurried round to a friend's room. A little group had already gathered to discuss the news.

"Oh, it'll be like last year. Criminals only!" said Miss Landauer.

But Sister Amnesty was there, too.

"No, no! Haven't I told you so often! Let us pray and thank God, and you'll see!"

So we prayed, and returned home. I hadn't been back five minutes when a neighbour came running. A telephone call had come from an old friend who'd been released that morning from Gherla.

p205 The Pastor's Wife

"He says your husband was on the list for today! He saw him waiting in the yard! He's coming!"

When she'd gone, I tried to peel the potatoes. But my heart was beating so fast I had to sit down. Hours passed.

Another knock on the door. Mr. Ionescu, an old friend who lived on the floor below and had a telephone, stood there smiling.

He took my hand, and said: "It's someone calling you from out of town."

So I went down and picked up the receiver and on the other end was Richard. When I heard his voice, I couldn't speak. I felt myself falling, falling, and a noise roared in my ears like the sea and then darkness poured over me.

I opened my eyes again on worried faces staring down.

"She's all right!"

"You fainted!"

They'd brought Mihai down now. He was laughing and talking on the telephone. Richard was in the home of friends in Cluj.

"I didn't know if I still had a wife and children," he said. "I thought I'd better find out!" He was well, and free. He was coming home as soon as he could. Gherla was hundreds of miles away in the western provinces. He'd catch a train from Cluj, the nearest railway point. But not today. His first underground meeting had already been arranged there that evening.

During the afternoon other friends came home, from prisons all over the country. A score of us, wives and friends, waited and talked in the attic, anxious, hopeful. There was a commotion on the staircase. A telegram. I tore it open.

"Richard says he's coming on the overnight train. He'll be here at 8.30 tomorrow morning!"

With a moan, Sister Amnesty slipped to the floor. This time she had fainted! They crowded round, slapping her cheeks, sprinkling cold water.

Of course we had no sleep that night. Every hour news came of fresh releases. Men and women we hadn't seen for ten, fifteen years walked in through the door. As if back from the dead. The whole house was full of people greeting each other, remembering, making plans in a fever of talk. Flowers kept arriving. Big bunches of summer roses that had cost the earth. From friends who could not come themselves, because of the danger.

They couldn't be seen at the station, these people - so we took their flowers instead, to show their love. I hadn't realized there were so many. Sister Amnesty had her arms full of gladioli. Marietta carried roses. Mrs. Armeanu and Alice had big white michaelmas daisies. The sun shone down with the lovely freshness of early morning light.

p206 The Pastor's Wife

Crowds of anxious, expectant people were meeting every train. Hoping against hope that their prisoners would come. They had no news.

Then the train arrived. The big, droning diesel engine slipped past and my eyes searched the carriages. A loudspeaker announcement blared. The crowd churned round, pushing and jostling.

I saw Richard before he saw me. He was leaning from a carriage window. Thin and pale, with a shaven head.

God had given him back to me.

His clothes were very shabby. His boots had no laces they weren't allowed - and they were too big. He came towards me, walking so slowly, tall and smiling, swimming about in his boots, and embraced Mihai and me. The station rocked with the noise of shouts and greetings. Someone with a camera lined the three of us up for a photograph.

People crowded round asking Richard for news of their friends and relatives, the ones who had not come back on that train.

Then I remembered how many had not come back, and never would, for they had died in prison.

"Don't speak," Richard said. "Let me just look at you."

Day and night the attic was packed with friends and strangers who came from all over the country to see Richard again. Standing, sitting, squeezing in the ever-open door - everyone had to have a word with him. The Secret Police didn't try to break it up, because they could only have done so with a machine gun. They watched and made their little notes in the background.

Richard was thin as a stick and weighed about seven stone. He'd survived beating and brainwashing. He had to go into hospital at once. But even there, people continued to flock in to see him, until the director said apologetically he'd have to move. The Secret Police were complaining. He went from hospital to hospital, and finally landed in the sanatorium at Sinaia, one of the most beautiful mountain towns, where the Royal summer palace was once. But still people came, by motor-cycle and bicycle and bus. The Secret Police sent another warning. He decided to leave. There was nothing else to do.

In Bucharest, things were chaotic. Tens of thousands of political prisoners were freed that year. They sought jobs and wives and children, and they tried - sometimes with terrible results - to fit into a life they hadn't known for fifteen or twenty years. There were tragedies in hearts and homes and on the streets.

The police couldn't cope with all the confusion. And so Richard seized the chance to preach, secretly, in any church where the pastor would have him. And we were able to help many friends.

p207 The Pastor's Wife

We sent Mrs. Armeanu down to Constanza for a Black Sea holiday. Her husband had not been released.

Richard even managed to obtain a licence to preach. But it was limited to a church in the village of Orsova, which had an officially restricted congregation of thirty-six members.

"If there's one more," the Secret Police warned, "there'll be trouble. We know you, and we're watching you."

Richard told me, "I don't think I can speak there. Other people are bound to turn up when the word gets round that I'm preaching. We'll only harm the people at Orsova."

So we decided for the time being not to go. In any case, the Underground Church work in Bucharest was keeping us too busy to permit it. In secret gatherings here and there - because meetings in houses were illegal - Richard brought hundreds of souls to Christ. But still he didn't seem to think that he was doing enough and we didn't know how long he would be able to keep out of police hands. When I asked him what his plans were for the future, he said:

"Ideally, I'd like to be a recluse, to retire into a desert place like the hermits of old and spend the rest of my life in contemplation of God and in meditation. But things are very far from ideal."

Once more he saw how little freedom the church had, how it was infested with informers – from the highest bishops to the humblest members of the congregation. Priests told him that if they failed to report on their flocks, their churches would be closed. Children and young people were indoctrinated with atheism more fiercely than ever.

But what disturbed Richard most deeply was to learn how ignorant and how naively credulous, people were in the West over Communism and its attempts to destroy religion.

At this time I began to have contact with certain high dignitaries of the Russian Church, by means which I cannot disclose. Many were Party tools, and they told us so openly and with sorrow. They had no choice, they said.

Other prelates from behind the Iron Curtain who went to international conferences, men chosen by the Party and playing the role ascribed to them by the Communists, were in fact working for the Underground Church.

When they got back, we were given their impressions. They were horrified to find what dupes some of the British and American delegates to these conferences are. "They believe absolutely anything they're told," they said. "Some are more enthusiastic about Communism than any real Communist."

What could be done about it?

p208 The Pastor's Wife

Leaders of the Underground Church met and decided that Richard should make the attempt to reach the West. His task would be to make people understand the reality of what was happening to us – and what might happen to them.

Since 1948 Rumania had been selling Jews to Israel. Our hopes of leaving were pinned on this traffic. Thousands upon thousands of Jews were still trying to get out. Long lines of them waited at militia H.Q. for application forms. The exodus had already offended Arab nations and the Government was cautious, but official scruples could be overcome on payment of a large sum to the authorities.

Negotiations were long and tedious for us. And all they produced was a tip from a high official that our dossiers were stamped NEVER TO LEAVE. But we didn't give up. Friends suggested Mihai should go ahead of us. At that time he seemed to be in the greatest danger. Others said I should try to leave alone and raise money in the West to "bail us out."

Now that the first confusion of the mass release was over, oppressive measures returned. Richard was watched everywhere. He could not enter a church without its pastor being warned or threatened.

Our own former church was closed and turned into a cartoon-film studio. Pews and altar were torn out, windows blocked. In one way it was a blessing in disguise: it made our attic on the top floor of the block very difficult to watch closely. Studio technicians, musicians, secretaries and so on came and went all day and couldn't be distinguished easily from our brethren.

Through secret channels we got word to our friend Anutza in Norway. She set to work raising money towards our ransom. Our families abroad also did their best. But it was through Anutza more than anyone that we were finally able to leave. She persuaded the Norwegians to grant us visas. She raised $7,000 from the Norwegian Israel Mission and the Hebrew Christian Alliance (to which I express here my thankfulness). Another source supplied $3,000. My family also contributed and helped in many ways. They were all love.

Our first visitors from the West, the Rev. Stuart Harris, chairman of the British Mission to the Communist World and American Pastor John Moseley arrived secretly by night bringing the first relief for needy families. Mihai spotted police outside. We'd been informed on! The visitors stayed with us until 1 a.m. By then the agents, believing that it had been a false alarm, had left. Next day we collected some Bibles from the two men in a park. We were spied on even here. An informer came later to the flat asking insinuating questions. Harris and Moseley were also permitted to hand out Bibles next day at the Baptist seminary. They heard afterwards from me that the students were obliged to return them all the day after Harris and Moseley left.

Our next visitors came out of the blue, some Americans and a Swiss. They didn't even know Richard's address. So they went to an official church organization to inquire.

Pastor Wurmbrand? Goodness gracious yes, they knew Pastor Wurmbrand. They'd send one of their men along as a guide. Oh, no trouble at all, pleased to help. So this man came along with them to the attic. Obviously, he'd go straight back and inform on all we said.

But the meeting took a comic turn. The guide spoke French but no English. So Richard talked to the visitors in English and I had to translate for the informer.

"Now my husband explains what liberty the church has here, and now he speaks about the great possibilities for tourism and now about the weather ..."

Richard meanwhile was talking like a runaway train about everything that happened to us and the real condition of the church. He was lively and brilliant and made them laugh with his account of things which had not been so funny at the time.

Then one of the Americans said, "Well, this is very interesting, Mister, but our time's short and we'd like before going to have a word with Pastor Wurmbrand."

"But I am Pastor Wurmbrand!"

"Impossible!"

"But true!"

"If you say so, it must be. But after fourteen years in prison! We expected to meet someone in the last stages of depression. And instead, we find a happy man."

At last, after more than a year's work and pressure from friends in the West, we were told: ~Your exit visas will be granted, the dollars have been received.~

Richard was called for a last encounter with the Secret Police. They told him: "Now you can leave. Preach all you like abroad. But speak against us - and you'll be silenced."

We have had evidence since then that the threat has not been forgotten.

I, too, had a last meeting with officialdom. It was the bailiff, knocking on the door, a list of property to be confiscated in his hand. "This is absolutely your last chance to pay!"

"Come tomorrow," I said. "And you can take everything."

Brethren and sisters came from far-off villages and towns to say farewell. Friends in Bucharest arrived every hour to wish us well.

Early next morning we were at the airport.

It was December 6th, the feast of St. Nicholas, patron of prisoners in the Rumanian Orthodox calendar. A damp mist seemed to dissolve the buildings and the grey aircraft out on the runway.

Ours was an old DC-7 and there were sixty of us, all ransomed, and nearly all Jews. We'd been there since dawn, and a warm sense of oneness, of deep gratitude at our good fortune in escaping from Communism, and of deeper grief for those whom we left behind in its grip, held us together. The officials, the passport men, the girls in uniform with lists in their hands, looked at us with envious eyes. We were going to live in the West. In the West!

They had tried to stop a crowd gathering at the airport. But a crowd had come to see us off just the same. Looking back, waving towards them through sheets of plate-glass, we trooped out over the wet, grey asphalt. The mist was lifting.

We boarded the plane. Mihai found himself next to the only foreign passenger, an Italian businessman, who at once began to talk. Cheerfully, he asked Mihai a score of questions. He hadn't thought it was as bad as they said. All those stories one heard about life under Communism. He'd had some very good meals at the Athen,e Palace (Bucharest's most luxurious hotel, dating from pre-war days).

Mihai was silent.

They went down the steps together at Rome airport.

Mihai asked: "This is really Rome? Not East Berlin or somewhere?"

"Sure, sure!" laughed the businessman. "See that sign over there: ~Bevete Coca-Cola~. You're on Italian soil."

"So. Then I am a free man." And he began to weep.

Finally, he said, "Now, if you like, I'll tell you how it really is in Rumania, but I don't know if I could ever make you, or anyone else, understand."

And with that, we advanced towards the customs. My brother and sister-in-law waited for us at the airport. Love had urged them to come specially from Paris.

EPILOGUE

From Rome we flew to Oslo. Richard would have liked to stop at Geneva, to report on the persecution in Rumania. But a secretary of the Lutheran World Federation begged Richard over the telephone not to come, "because the Russians will know it." I wondered why someone should fear the Russians at the World Council of Churches, when we had not feared them where they ruled.

In Norway, the lovely country which offered us a home, we were met by members of the Israel Mission which had paid part of the ransom, and by other church officials. But first and foremost by Anutza. She had worked fifteen years for this reunion. Nor had we been forgotten by Pastor Hedenquist, head of the Swedish Israel Mission. He came specially from Stockholm. Over the years he had prayed for us every day. The Hebrew Christian Alliance, which had paid another part of the ransom, inquired immediately about our needs.

Then we went to Britain. Here our friend Stuart Harris opened to us the doors of universities and a multitude of churches of all denominations. People heard at last about the martyrs and victories of the Underground Church, which had been almost unknown until then. British Christians were not aware of the facts: the persecution of their brethren in the third of the world under Communist domination had been barely mentioned to them. In most places my husband spoke; in some, I did. An awakening took place in Great Britain.

As they made acquaintance with the unknown world of "God's Underground," we made acquaintance here, and later in America, with the Anglo-Saxon world. We could understand, now, Pope Gregory the Great. As a youthful deacon he noticed the fair faces and white bodies of some young people standing bound in the slave-market of Rome, and asked: "From what country are they?" He was told that they were English (~Angles~ in Latin). "Angels," he said, "not ~Angles~. Their faces are so angel-like. What is the name of their king?" The reply was "Aella" Cregory said, "Alleluia shall be sung in Aella's land." When he became head of the church, he saw to this. Now we heard the Alleluias sung by thousands who showed towards the Underground Church an angel-like love. The first mission to the Communist world was founded.

Friends made in Oslo, Pastors Sturdy and Knutson, saw to it that we should go to America. Richard and I spoke again in churches, at big rallies, seminaries, ladies' guilds.

Richard was called to testify before committees of the U.S Senate and later of Congress. I sat near him when he spoke. Not only senators, but representatives of newspapers and radio stations around the world were there. Batteries of T.V. cameras were turned on him as he spoke about the suffering of the Underground Church:

"One third of the world is entitled to one third of your prayers, of your concerns, of your gifts...In prison I saw men with 50 lb. chains at their feet, praying for America. But in America you seldom hear in a church a prayer for those in chains in Communist prisons."

Asked by a senator if he bore any marks of torture, he stripped himself to the waist and showed eighteen scars on his body. People wept at his words, "I don't boast of these scars. I show the tortured body of my church and my country. I speak for the heroes and saints who cannot speak for themselves: Protestants, Catholics, Orthodox and Jews who died under torture for their religion."

Tears flowed down my face as I sat near him. I had before my eyes the farm women, the nuns, the many young girls, the Protestants and the Catholics, the Zionist ladies who slaved over new Pharaonic works because they had wished to see God's promise to the Jewish people fulfilled. I remembered those who had died. I knew that by death they had passed into the loving hands of the One who made lilies and carnations. But still I could not stop weeping.

Richard said later, "Your tears made a greater impression than all my words. Tears undermine the strongest walls."

Richard dictated his first book, ~Today's Martyred Church Tortured for Christ~. I listened, sitting on a sofa, trying to knit. He wept. I wept, too. It was a very simple book. But written not with ink, rather with the tears and blood of martyrs. Unexpectedly, it became a best-seller in a score of languages. This book and our visits to different countries and continents became the starting point for the creation of nineteen missions in the free nations of Europe and Asia, in Australia and America. They work together to bring to the Underground Church Christian literature, radio broadcasts in their language and relief for families of martyrs.

p213 The Pastor's Wife

One book after another came from Richard's pen. He was tireless in preaching, but didn't simply talk - he created efficient organizations to work secretly in the Red camp. Some questioned his methods, but their criticisms came always too late. Richard acted, considering that there would be time enough for justifications later.

We were happy among all peoples, in every country we saw. We felt at home with our German Brethren. Between the German and the Jewish people there are rivers of blood. But perhaps it was not by accident that the sea which God parted for the Jews was called the Red Sea. Those who love can come through even a sea of blood. Only those who persist in hatred are drowned in it. We were happy with Australasians, with our Maori brethren, with white, black and Indians in Africa. We had meetings without apartheid in South Africa. Intermingled Christians of all races and colours of skin listened in tears to the message of Christ as taught in the Underground Church.

I remembered a sad reflection of Mihai's, made years before: "Even if Father returns, he will be no more the man we knew, but a ghost, incapable of serving anybody." In Africa, a newspaper wrote of our visit: "We were hit by a hurricane called Richard."

Richard's teaching, "Hate Communism, but love and win the Communists for Christ" was accepted by millions everywhere. There is now prayer, concern and active help for the Underground Church. Its oppressors are embraced in Christian love, though a fight against their evil conduct goes on. In this fight, Richard attacks also church leaders who compromise with Communism, or even become its stooges.

Richard is Richard and I am I. For me, his fighting against so many people is too much. I would like him to be quieter. I tell him sometimes, "In the Song of Solomon, Christ is compared with a flower. The flower is plucked, or it withers, having done nothing in all its life other than to delight onlookers with its perfume and splendour. It does not oppose those who wish to kill it. This, I think, is the ideal Christian life."

Richard replies, "If we don't fight Communism and its infiltration of the churches, the oppressors will defeat us." I wonder why he worried about this. Wasn't the church born crucified, defeated? Was it not more beautiful in the catacombs than sharing the throne with emperors? Did not our underground services compare favourably with those in Western cathedrals, where no one wept when the passion of the Lord was mentioned, nor shouted with joy on hearing of his resurrection?

My husband couldn't be reached by such arguments. He asked, "To what flower is Jesus compared in the Song of Songs? Mystified, I said, "To a rose." He answered promptly, "The rose has thorns. Don't touch her, She will prick you."

I have known him for thirty years. I will not change him. So I chose the quieter part. I organize the affairs of couriers of our mission who go to Communist countries and return. You have to instruct them, to gather information about the state of the church from them, to provide them with Bibles, literature and tapes, with money for relief.

Hundreds of thousands of Christians are in Communist prisons. In Rumania, many of our friends are there. And news of what people are suffering elsewhere daily makes me live again the past. In June 1969, the Soviet press boasted of arresting, for their faith, a man named Rabinchuk and all his five sons. I could not take my mind off Mrs. Rabinchuk. How terribly she must suffer in her empty house. In Albania, clergy have been rolled through streets in barrels and thrown into the sea. In North Korea, forty-five Christians were killed in one day in 1969. The families of these people, and innumerable others, are starving; and everywhere thirsty souls ask for the Word of God.

Taking many precautionary measures, I meet couriers and hear these things from them personally. The work has been going on for four years now, but not one of our couriers, nor any of their contacts in Communist countries, has yet been arrested.

I had also other people to meet. Clergy come to the free world, to conferences of the World Council of Churches, to Baptist and Orthodox conferences, or simply to preach and to deceive the West about non-existent religious liberties in the Communist camp. They are a special breed of men, these leaders of the official churches in the Red camp. Richard calls them "traitors." I would not call them so. Who am I to judge? They are unhappy beings. They are Red puppets. But what choice did they have? Some waited decades in the hope of seeing their countries freed. Much was promised by U.S. Presidents, but not performed.

Despairing of help from the West, they have learned to live with the regime. Their brethren chose the martyrdom of prison. They have chosen the martyrdom of the conscious lie in order to keep a few churches open, to be able to perform a few baptisms, marriages, burials. They travel around the free world telling of the full liberty they enjoy in the Soviet Union, hoping that be neath their forced cries of enthusiasm Christians in the West will perceive how bad things really are. (Do British or American Christians go around the world asserting that they have liberty?) But Western church leaders cannot look into hearts. They are unaware of the tragedy, and propagate what they hear: "There is liberty in the Communist camp!" That these unhappy creatures must denounce to the police those whom they know to be faithful is not known. It is part of the Communist "morality," which the West seems unable to understand.

With many of these official church leaders from the East I and certain other women friends of mine meet, usually by night in their hotel rooms. I am no longer young. But the Communist agents who spy continuously on these delegates assume that bishops with beards and robes cannot be choosers. So they interpret our visits in their own way.

We pray with them. Some become very helpful. The Communists cannot guess who has been won over to our side. It could be the bishop. It could be the K.G.B. agent sent to watch him. It could be the Soviet Ambassador. Or even the member of the Government to whom one of these reports. An Underground Church that has won Svetlana Stalina, Mrs. Kosygin and the greatest contemporary Russian writer, Solzhenitsyn, has proved that it knows how to work.

Our personal life has also changed a great deal. Richard had been for years a prisoner treated with contempt, accustomed to mockery, and beatings. Now he is given adulation which might turn another man's head. But Richard has passed through the fiery furnace. He knows that the applause is not his due, that glory belongs only to God. The publicity helps those who have few other spokesmen. Fame, as well as shame, can be borne humbly.

At first I feared the great wealth around us in the United States. Though in the beginning ours was the poorest house in a Californian suburb, it was palatial after the attic in Bucharest. Some furniture was bought. We received a car as a gift. I worried about these "luxuries." But Richard quoted the German mystic, Meister Eckhardt: "If you despise money, try to be rich, because you will be able to use your possessions well. Why not be rich? The Bible says, "The Lord was with Joseph and he was a prosperous man." Let us just have, knowing that what we have is not ours but the Lord's. And he allows us to give not only to others, but also to ourselves. Whence is the stupid idea that God created the bees to produce honey only for sinners? Saints have also the right to enjoy dainties. We have known how to be abased: let us know how to abound."

I love the asceticism of chosen souls like St. Therese of Lisieux. I think about Russian brethren in the town of Nijnaia-Tagila, who have fasted uninterruptedly for a whole week, praying to be spared payment of heavy fines (already to pay such fines they have sold furniture, tools, homes). The food stays in your throat when you remember them. Richard cares for many like them in every practical way he can. In prison there was a time when he fasted four days a week.

But, knowing Richard as I do, I see in him also what I have seen in everyone who has passed through terrible years of torture. The inevitable laws of reaction come into play, and after such deprivation of life, of even simple sunlight, you have a fierce impulse to taste at once every joy there is. I wasn't afraid: God is not unrighteous, he doesn't forget old sacrifices. Richard is aware of the danger. And every danger of which you are aware ceases to be a real danger.

I told him this much: "I'm pleased to hear you despise money - mind you don't stop when you've made the first million." (There is no danger of this for the moment.)

We have the help of Mihai and his young wife Judith in our mission work. What a consolation they are for us. They had been friends in Bucharest, when he was sixteen and she was ten. Her parents took her to Israel, where she was converted by a woman whom Richard had brought to Christ thirty years before. After we reached the West, Judith came to visit us. Mihai said to her on the first day, "Is it not so that you will stay with me for ever?" She answered, "Of course." And so it happened.

We have had great joys. We have also had our anxieties. Within the past year, six men from Iron Curtain countries who have fought against Communism in the West have been killed. Four in Germany, one in Italy, one in Spain. A Catholic prelate, Mgr. Draganovic, has been kidnapped from Trieste and is now held in a Yugoslav prison. Documents forged by the Communists have been put out to show that others have been in prison not for their faith, but for embezzling church money or homosexuality. Whenever I am away from Richard I feel fear. But if it is dangerous to do God's work, how much more dangerous it is to leave it undone. No man can stop a hurricane. Neither can I stop Richard from exposing more and more the cruelties and subtle infiltrations of Communism, so rousing the fury of Communist leaders and their tools in the church. May the angels of God protect him.

Those whom Richard attacks certainly don't remain passive; they put barriers in his path. If they had studied his character first, they might realize it was hopeless! The higher the barrier, the greater his leap. He started his Christian life facing grave external obstacles, and turned them into assets.

My travels on behalf of the mission led me also to Israel. I saw there the holy places. I saw many of our former congregation, my family and my cousin who had told me on the day of my arrest: "Leshanah habe-Jerushalaim!" (Next year in Jerusalem!) Nearly twenty years had passed.

In Israel men walk on holy ground. There is a seemliness that stops you from saying what you experience when you worship where the cross of Christ once stood. Magdalene wept silently here; never did she tell anyone what she had felt then. I surely cannot compare myself with her. But I also prefer to be silent.

I was grieved to see that part of the chapel belonged to one denomination (word that sounds to me a little like "damnation"!) and part to another. I have my evangelical faith, but it will never make me quarrel with a Christian of another conviction. Roses spread their fragrance in every country, though they are called by different names. So do Christians.

I left a free Israel, free though surrounded by enemies. Czechoslovakia had a mighty "friend" near it, but it is in chains. Which should teach me to value the enemies of our work: they make it prosper. The dream of Zionists has been fulfilled and my Jewish prison friends had not suffered in vain. Their dream is my dream too - I feel one with them, for Christianity has taught me to love my own people more and to work for their good.

What these friends did not know was that in a different country God was performing another mighty work through the Jewish people. Boris Pasternak risked his all, and just he, a Jew, brought Jesus back into Russian literature, from which He had been banished since the Communist revolution. Daniel and Ginzburg, Jewish writers, and Litvinov, a Jewish political fighter, went to prison for Russian liberty. There Jews lead the struggle against Communism. Two Orthodox priests (both of Jewish descent) dared to protest against the Patriarchy's collaboration with the Soviet Government. The greatest hero of the Rumanian Underground Church is a Jew, Milan Haimovici. He passed through seven years of prison and torture. How often I spent nights with his wife Monica, talking of our lost husbands. Now the Lutheran Church has rewarded him. He is caretaker of a church building in West Germany. He was considered one of the best pastors and preachers in Rumania. But in a German pulpit he could be "dangerous": he might expose the atrocities of Communism. He had to be silenced.

God gave Israel back to the Jews. He will give them also great men dedicated to Christ, King of the Jews.

And now I am back at work. The work of a smuggler. Not a nice word, except that the smuggled goods are Bibles. The work of helping the families of Christian martyrs and underground pastors. The work of fighting the Communist poison in Western youth.

This work grows every day. The names of martyrs are known now throughout the whole world and children go to bed remembering them in their prayers. Will not these prayers be heard?

As the pastor's wife, I have often told youngsters a story of the boy who stood on the shore and waved to a ship at sea. A man beside him said, "Don't be silly. The steamer will not change its course because you wave." But the ship turned, came to shore and picked up the boy. From the bridge he shouted, "Sir, I'm not a fool. The captain is my father!"

We also know that he who steers the universe on its course is our Father and that he hears our prayers.

Introduction

In ~Zohar~ (The Light), main book of the Kabbalah, a work which contains the Jewish mystical tradition, it is written:

The Song of Songs is superior to all songs that preceded it, for those which were sung by Solomon's predecessors ascended only to join with the songs chanted by the company of angels; as for instance, the "Song of Degrees to David" [the literal translation of the Hebrew ~le David~], which means "The song which celestial grades sing to David" to solicit nourishment from him ... But when Solomon came, he sang a song that is higher even than David's song, one that is the very same as that sung by the great ones of the realms above, the pillars of the universe, in honour of the Supernal King who is the Lord in all peace and harmony. Other men send up praises by means of lower chariots, but King Solomon by means of higher chariots ...

On the day when this song was revealed the ~Shekinah~ (God's glory) descended to earth, as it is written, "And the priests could not stand to minister because of the cloud." Why? Because "the glory of the Lord had filled the house of the Lord" (1KI 8:11). On that day this hymn was revealed, and Solomon sang this song in the power of the Holy Spirit, wherein is to be found the summary of the whole Law of Moses, the whole work of creation, the mystery of the Patriarchs, the story of the Egyptian exile, and the Exodus therefrom, and the Song of the Sea. It is the quintessence of the Decalogue of the Sinaitic covenant, of the significance of Israel's wanderings through the desert until their arrival in the Promised Land and the building of the Temple. It contains the crowning of the Holy Name with love and joy, the prophecy of Israel's exile among the nations, of their redemption, of the resurrection of the dead, and all else until that day which is "Sabbath to the Lord." All that was, and shall be, is contained in it; and, indeed, even that which will take place on the "Seventh Day," which will be the "Lord's Sabbath," is indicated in this song.

It is a song in which those who are above and those who are below participate; a song formed in the likeness of the world above, which is the supernal Sabbath, a song through which the supernal Holy Name is crowned. Therefore it is holy of holies. Why so? Because all its words are full of love and joy.

In the ~Babylonian Talmud~ (another sacred book of the Jewish people) the following words spoken by Rabbi Akiba are recorded: "No day in the history of the world is so precious as the day on which the Song of Songs was given to Israel; for all the other Scriptures are holy, but the Song of Songs is holiest of all." By the same token, we could say that the lives of all those who really deserve the name of "Christian" are holy. We are all sanctified by faith, by the blood shed for us, because that blood was Divine. But there are lives which are holiest of all - the lives of the persecuted Church, the lives of those who suffer in jail or in psychiatric asylums, in chains and in hunger, deprived of their loved ones, because they follow faithfully in the footsteps of the Master.

This book will be a kind of commentary upon Solomon's Song. It will be a unique commentary - or rather, a new translation of the Song. It will be a translation of it into the lives of saints and martyrs, most of them from our own times, who belong to the Underground Church in the Communist countries.

page 9 The Sweetest Song

The decision about which Jewish books should be included in, and which excluded from the Old Testament was taken by the Synod of Jabneh. The Synod debated very heatedly over the inclusion of the Song of Songs as a sacred book. It was accused of being a worldly book, because it spoke with simplicity about love between a man and woman, and sometimes it employed sexual imagery. But in the end the Song's opponents were overruled.

In this book, as in many other parts of the Bible, the images of relationships such as those between bridegroom and bride are only poetic devices to represent the union of the believing soul and God, of the chosen people and their Master. The author of Solomon's Song is a mystic: he expresses himself in the normal language of mysticism.

If the inclusion of the Song in the Bible was a matter for heated debate, it is no wonder that the Underground Church in Communist countries is also hotly debated. Some prelates and theologians consider it to be a bunch of fanatics without any justification.

It is alleged that those who are imprisoned for Christ's sake in Communist countries suffer from masochistic tendencies, that they want to suffer, that they have a "martyr complex." It is said that they are not reasonable. They refuse to make the compromise demanded by life and by a dictatorship - compromises which would result in liberty to worship within the limits prescribed by the atheist government.

Not all souls are the same. Some rivers flow quietly between their banks; others overflow. There exist choice souls, whose love of God cannot be confined to the narrow limits of what is considered a normal faith. Their cup runs over. Their love of God burns.

Solomon's Song answers to the desires of such hearts. Only men such as these are found in the Underground Church.

Rabia of Basra, a Moslem mystic, used to pray: "O Lord, in public I invoke You in the way one invokes his master. In public I say, "O my God," but when we are alone I say, "O my Beloved." She also said: "O Lord, if I adore You because I fear hell, let me burn in hell; and if I adore You because I hope for paradise, exclude me from paradise. But if I adore You for what You Yourself are, do not deprive me of the vision of Your eternal beauty." She said to God, "I do not desire from You either this world or the one to come. You are enough for me."

Solomon's Song is written for such hearts. It is a poem of love between Israel and his Saviour.

Spiritual greed

There is a burning spiritual desire which might well be called 'spiritual greed" by sceptics, because it is outwardly very similar to fleshly greed.

A beggar once said to an emperor who wished to give him charity, "Give me anything you like; but I will impose a condition."

The emperor was intrigued. He had never met such a beggar. "And what is that condition?" he asked.

"You must fill my bowl up completely."

The emperor laughed. "I can certainly do that," he replied. "I can even fill your bowl with diamonds!"

He called for diamonds to be poured into the beggar's bowl. As they fell in, they disappeared.

The emperor roared in fury. "I will not be shamed by this beggar, even if my whole kingdom disappears!"

But no precious stones that were poured into the bowl ever stayed there; they always disappeared.

Finally the emperor swallowed his pride and asked the beggar to tell him the secret of the bowl.

"It is made out of human selfishness," he explained. "It covets all things, yet it remains always empty, always hungry, never satisfied."

Luxurious cars, big bank accounts, fine houses, high position and reputation - they are only challenges to the ego, serving only to whet its appetite for more. This, then is fleshly greed.

Spiritual greed exists too. Some of the disciples asked Jesus, "Grant unto us that we may sit, one on Your right hand, and the other on Your left, in Your glory" (MRK 10:37). They did not know what they were asking for.

In spiritual matters, the only real glory is in the renunciation of glory. The jewels of personal glory and self-aggrandizement will be swallowed up by the beggar's bowl, even if they are jewels of the spirit. The bowl is never satisfied. It is never filled.

Solomon's Song belongs to those who have made the greatest renunciation of all: the renunciation of themselves. For them, only the Beloved counts.

Singing the Jesus Song

The famous pianist Rubinstein was in the company of a large number of music-lovers who were discussing the works of Chopin. One of them asked, "How would Chopin himself have played his compositions?" Rubinstein sat down at the piano and began to play. When he finished, there were tears in his listeners' eyes as they said, "Now we have heard Chopin himself."

Comment upon what King Solomon sang to the praise of the Saviour in his rare moments of spiritual exultation must be made in the same state of the spirit as Solomon's when he composed his Song. When reading a commentary upon the Song of Songs, the reader should feel that he has heard Solomon himself at his best.

It is said that when David was a young boy at the court of King Saul, he asked permission to play on a beautiful harp that was lying unused in the throneroom. The king said, "It's useless - I have been cheated. I paid a great deal for that harp, because it was spoken of highly. But the best harpists have tried it, and it was painful to hear the ugly sounds it produced. It's the worst harp that you could imagine."

But David persisted, and because the king loved him greatly, permission was granted. When he played, the music was so beautiful that when it ended, all the court wept. They had been moved to the depths of their hearts.

"How is it," demanded the king, "that so many tried to play this harp, and only you succeeded?"

David replied, "All the others tried to play their own songs, and the harp refused to yield to their wishes. I played to the harp its own song. You saw its joy when I reminded it of the days when it was a young tree in the forest. I told it about sunbeams playing in its branches, about chirping birds, and about lovers embracing each other in its shadow. The harp was glad to remember those days.

"Then I told the story of the evil men who came and felled the innocent tree. It was a sad day. Its life as a tree had finished. But I told the harp that death cannot triumph over life. The tree has died as a tree, but its wood has become a harp which can sing forever the glories of the eternal God. And the harp, which had wept when I told about her death, now rejoiced, made jubilant again.

"When the Messiah comes, many will try to play their own songs on his harp. The results will be tragically dissonant. On the Messiah's harp, you must play his own song - the song of his eternal glory with God, the song of his humiliation as a babe in a manger, the song of a life in sorrow, opposition and poverty on earth, the song of his being whipped and crucified and buried. But then also the song of his resurrection, ascension and enthronement in heaven.

"Then the harp will give a beautiful sound. Then his congregation will shine like a sun."

In writing this book, I have no song of my own to sing. I sing the Song of Jesus and of His bride as Solomon sang it; and to make the song resound more beautifully than ever, I illustrate it with lives of saints and martyrs. Let us sing for him with the same burning love and adoration with which the angels sang in Bethlehem at Jesus' birth.

A great sinner's song

There is something remarkable in the title of the book, The Song of Songs which is Solomon's. God arranged that the holiest book of the Bible should be written by one of its worst characters.

There was much that was positive in King Solomon's reign over Israel. He secured the nation a long period of peace, but in his personal life he was beneath contempt.

He had a large number of wives and concubines. Every one of them lived in palaces and was provided with luxuries. He indulged in all the pleasures which fleshly life can provide. This cost enormous amounts of money which had to be raised by slave labour. He frequently flogged men into complying with the demands of his debauchery.

In the light of all this, many theologians have expressed doubts as to whether Solomon has any part in God's salvation. Happily, God does not always agree with the theologians: he saves whom he wishes. Salvation is all by grace and condescension. To demonstrate this, he gave the inspiration to write his most beautiful book to one whose moral achievements were very few.

Miracles are signs of the presence of God. Divine inspiration of this book is proved by the miracle that such a bad man wrote it. You would not have thought he was capable of it. The only man we know for sure is in paradise (because Jesus confirmed it) is a man who had been a robber all of his adult life and only in his very last moments said a few words expressing faith. One of the foremost apostles, Saint Paul, had been a murderer. Mary Magdalene had been a loose woman. One of the most moral and profound of love stories, ~The Happy Prince~ was written by Oscar Wilde, a man convicted for debauchery. There are many other similar instances. So we should not be surprised that the most beautiful song in the Bible was composed by a great sinner.

Think of Richard Wagner. He is described as ungrateful in love and irresponsible in politics. He was conceited and suffered from senile erotomania; he was also a fierce anti-Semite. But this in no way diminishes the value of his music.

We must learn to distinguish the value of a work from the value of the man who is behind it. The fact is that God sometimes uses very bad men for very good deeds, and that sometimes very good men do poor work.

All the "types" or foreshadowings of Jesus in the Old Testament were men who had committed many bad deeds. We could not expect it to be otherwise; the type is always inferior to the typified.

Only one thing counts

One of the greatest accusations of the Soviet press against the Underground Church is that many of its leaders are former thieves, murderers and even war criminals whose hands are stained with blood. This would not discredit those church leaders in our sight, even if the things being said against them were true.

The Russian poet, Tiutchev, wrote: "You can't understand Russia with your mind. You can't measure it with the usual yardstick. Russia is something unique; you can only have confidence in it." These words are even truer when applied to the most beautiful part of the Russian nation – its Christians gathered in the Underground Church.

Where unique events happen, as in biblical times, very bad characters can be inspired with the most beautiful thoughts; robbers and murderers become illustrious saints. The children of God can rejoice about this.

The following is one of the oldest sermon illustrations used in the Christian Church. It is also a good test of one's understanding of what Christianity is about.

There once lived a dwarf who was also a hunchback and very, very ugly. Nobody ever invited him to a party; nobody showed him love, or even attention. He became disillusioned with life and decided to climb a mountain and throw himself from its peak into the abyss.

When he ascended the mountain, he met a very beautiful girl. He talked to her and discovered that she was climbing the mountain for the same purpose. Her suffering was at the other extreme. She had everybody's attention and love, but the one whom she loved and who had loved her too had forsaken her for another girl, because the other was rich. She felt life had no meaning for her any more. They decided to make the ascent together.

While they continued to climb, they met a man who introduced himself as a police officer in search of a very dangerous bandit who had robbed and murdered many people. The king had promised a large reward to the person who captured him. The police officer was very confident: "I will catch him because I know he has a feature by which he can be recognized. He has six fingers on his right hand. The police have been looking for him for years. For the last two or three, nothing has been heard from him, but he has to pay for a multitude of crimes in the past."

mm, The three climbed the mountain. Near its peak was a monastery. Its abbot, although he had become a monk only recently, had quickly attained great renown for saintliness. When they entered the monastery, he came to meet them. You could see the glory of God in his face. As the girl bowed to kiss his right hand, she saw he had six fingers. With this, the story ends.

Those who hear this story are perplexed; it can't finish like this! What happened to the dwarf, the girl, the policeman; and was the criminal caught?

The beauty of the story is that it does finish here. Something beautiful has happened: a criminal hunted because of his many robberies and murders has become a great saint, renowned for his godly life. All the rest is of no further interest. The great miracle has been performed. Christ has been born in the heart of a man of very low character.

The Hebrew language has no superlative. It says "vanity of vanities" for "the most worthless vanity" or "the heaven of heavens" for "the highest heaven." With God everything is possible: the Song of Songs (which means in Hebrew, "the superlative song") is written by a superlative sinner.

Because of this, the heights of Solomon's song are accessible to every one of us, whatever our past has been and however deep we may have fallen in sin.

÷ Chapter 1 ÷

Only his kiss

The bride says, "Let him kiss me with the kisses of his mouth: for your love is better than wine" (SOS 1:2).

The ~Zohar~ says that at Mount Sinai, when the Law was given, every individual Israelite was asked by God if he would accept him and all his commandments, to which the reply came, "Yes." He was asked again, "Will you accept me and all the penalties attached to my Law?" And again he answered, "Yes." Then he was kissed on the mouth. Similarly, the bride in Solomon's Song says, "Let him kiss me with the kisses of his mouth." The ~Zohar~ continues:

"No other love is like unto the ecstasy of the moment when spirit cleaves to spirit in a kiss, more especially a kiss on the mouth, which is the well of the spirit and its medium. When mouth meets mouth, spirits unite one with the other and become one - one love."

The Hebrew word for "love" is written A H B H. The ~Zohar~ says, "First comes the letter Aleph (our A). Then comes the letter H which unites itself with the Aleph in love. From these two other letters issue and spirits are interlocked with spirits of love."

Let us compare these words with the boring, prosaic, annoying prayers which we say usually and we will realize the distance between us and the soul enamoured with God - a soul which has a burning love like that of the ideal bride. She knows no peace nor rest until she finds God himself. Every other being, every other thing, only increases her desire, her thirst to see him. She is never satisfied with anybody or anything except himself. She has drunk enough of the water of this world and she has remained thirsty. Now she desires him, saying: "Let ~him~ kiss me with the kisses of ~his~ mouth."

A believer is attached to his spiritual leader - to his pastor. But if the pastor is aware of his responsibilities, he must strive to make the believer more and more independent of him. A psychiatrist, having solved the complexes of his patient, has a duty to free him also from the complex of dependence upon the physician which has arisen during the treatment.

A pastor must be like a matchmaker, who persuades a girl to marry somebody else. He must be very careful that the girl does not fall in love with himself, the matchmaker. The pastor must be a guide enabling the believer to reach the bridegroom. He must ignite a love for the bridegroom in the hearts of the believers, so that after hearing one of his sermons the congregation should not say, "How beautifully he has preached" but "How wonderful Jesus is!" Remaining attached to the pastor and not passing through him to the Saviour about whom he preaches can be a deadly danger for the believer. Pastors are men and have all the temptations of men. Some of them are very, very weak.

The movement called "Christian Endeavour" within the reformed churches is forbidden in Communist Rumania, but exists underground. A girl belonging to this movement was beaten and tortured to force her to make accusing statements against her pastor. She remained faithful to Christ and refused. But to her surprise, when she was brought before a court that same pastor came as a prosecution witness against her. He had yielded to pressure without much resistance. His testimony against her contributed to her being sentenced, but her love for Christ did not depend upon the attitudes and behaviour of the pastor who had brought her to salvation. She had been freed from that attachment to him. She continued to remain faithful, and she never said one bitter word about the pastor who had been so treacherous.

This was a soul who had a right to receive the kisses of Jesus himself. When you are in his embrace, disappointments with pastors don't count anymore. The soul which burns with love for Christ is not satisfied with his messengers, even his finest messengers. They don't answer the deep need of the soul. Their presence serves only to irritate. The duty of a pastor is only to reveal to men how unhappy they are without Jesus. Then he must tell them how he has found Jesus, and how they can find him too.

For the bride, the simple fact that she is surrounded by messengers of the bridegroom is a proof of the sad fact that the bridegroom himself is absent. She desires him, only him. None of his messengers can adequately represent him. None of them can take his place. The most gifted preachers can only stutter about him. She has one desire: "Let him kiss me with the kisses of his mouth." She longs for him, and yearns that his presence should show itself through a kiss. In biblical times people kissed the hand of the king, and even this was considered a privilege. Until quite recently, everyone who approached the Pope had to kiss his foot. The faithful Christian soul desires a kiss from Jesus' mouth.

The relationship between God and the faithful soul is really like the relationship between a bridegroom and a bride. Both desire kisses. The heavenly Father, who knows the desires of Jesus, in Psalm 2:12 [PSA 2:12] commands us to "Kiss the Son." Jesus reproves a Pharisee, telling him, "You gave me no kiss" (LUK 7:45). He could make this reproach to many of us. We gave him many words; we gave him our energy and our time; we put our money in the collection boxes of the church. But we did not give him the one, supreme thing for which he longs - a kiss. The faithful soul's desire is the same as his. She sighs, "Let him kiss me with the kisses of his mouth."

This reciprocal desire has been frequently satisfied. Mary Magdalene kissed the feet of Jesus. After her, many penitents have done likewise, and many prodigal sons who have returned to the Father have seen him coming to meet them, embracing them and kissing them repeatedly.

Only those who have ever received such a kiss can know the sweetness of Jesus. Only the person who has humbled himself for his sins or entrusted himself to God in great dangers can say how dear are his promises: that now there is peace between him and God, that God loves him and will protect him.

We have to be careful that the kiss should be Jesus' kiss. Souls in sorrow seek comfort, and accept it readily from wherever it comes. But not so the true Bride of Christ. There is only one object of her love. She does not even consider it necessary to say whose kisses she receives. She doesn't name him. For example, Mary Magdalene, seeing the empty tomb of Jesus, tells the man whom she supposed to be the gardener, "They have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid him." (JHN 20:13). Who is the Lord about whom she speaks? Does she have to pronounce his name? She thinks that on]y one can be "the Lord."

For the Bride, only one person exists. She assumes that others feel the same. She does not profane the Holy Name by pronouncing it too often. The elect of God will understand. The Beloved can't be anybody else but Jesus.

Young brides

Souls who have such an intimate knowledge of Jesus adopt unique attitudes. One such soul is Leonas Sileikis. When a seventh grade pupil at school, he was summoned to a meeting of the school administration where his faith was to be considered. Leonas' father came to the meeting uninvited. Leonas was asked whether he had read the atheistic books his teacher had given him. He had - six of them in all.

"What do you think of these books?" they asked him.

"They're lies and slander," Leonas replied.

After a long discourse against religion, the teacher, Miss Misiuniene, asked Leonas, "Do you renounce your faith?"

"I believe, and I will continue to believe," was the reply.

The teacher then explained to the father how religion supposedly damages children. "Nowadays, very few people go to church, so one must go along with the majority," she said.

To this, Leonas replied, "Only a dead body is carried along with the current. A live person can always swim against the stream."

Leonas will have to suffer for his faith. But he has known the kiss of Jesus, and so the adversity of the world does not count for him.

In Rumania, you cannot study in a university without being a member of the Communist youth organization. You must render lip service to its God-hating doctrines. Lydia C. had been the first in all grades of high school. Now a university education was guaranteed. As an exceptional student she would also receive an allowance for her further education. She had only to deliver a speech at the inauguration of the year of study. The big shots of the Communist Party were there.

She praised Communism, all right. She got great applause. But she finished with the words: "These things one has to say, if you wish to advance in our society. But I don't believe one word of what I just said. I believe in God and will follow him."

With this, she had ruined her whole future. Instead of becoming a doctor as she had desired, she became a seamstress. But souls who have received Jesus' kiss cannot compromise. They can praise only him.

Where can you get his kiss?

It is not difficult to receive his kiss. This was no problem for the Virgin Mary. Her Saviour was her obedient child. She could receive his caresses whenever she desired. Mary Magdalene and even Judas could kiss him. And there is no doubt that he reciprocated their kisses.

Christ lives with every believer as much as he lived in his mother's home, (though as a diamond yet unearthed, enclosed within the ground), because we are his image, members of his body. The Virgin Mary kissed Jesus' lips, and his hair, his hands and his breast. She could kiss his physical body. But Jesus is the only person who has two bodies: that of the Jewish carpenter who lived 2,000 years ago, which is seated now in heaven, and that of the Church. So we can kiss him when we kiss our brothers and sisters, and in the same way we can receive his kisses.

Jesus said, "Blessed are the pure in heart: for they shall see God" (MTT 5:8). They will see him not only in the next world. They will see him in every brother - yes, in every human being. Those who sentenced to death St. Stephen, the first martyr of Christianity, "looking steadfastly on him, saw his face as it had been the face of an angel" (ACT 6:15). They could see the angel in their victim. Let us at least learn from them how to look upon our brethren. Then we will be able to receive as many holy kisses as the Virgin Mary was able to obtain from Jesus.

Jesus taught also that anyone who feeds the hungry, gives drink to the thirsty, takes in strangers, clothes the naked or visits the sick and the prisoners does this to him (MTT 25:35-40). He identifies himself with the sufferers. The kiss of a person starving, oppressed or longing after love is his kiss.

For example, I know of a Christian prisoner in a Communist prison camp. He was near to death; his wasted body lay on the floor. Then he saw what seemed to be a girl bathed in glory. She looked like a nun. In her hand she held the living bread, and put it to his parched mouth. I know, too, of a sister in the USA. She had a vision in which she saw herself in a Communist prison, putting bread to a prisoner's mouth.

No walls separate the persecuted Church from that which enjoys freedom. The most amazing letter I ever received came from Canada. It was from a man who had been in jail for robbery. As a punishment for misbehaviour he had been put into solitary confinement. There he sought God, but had difficulty finding him. Then he heard an inner voice speaking to him, comforting him and giving him counsel. He was converted. Once out of jail, he joined a church. In a bookshop he found a book that caught his interest. It was my book, ~Sermons in Solitary Confinement~. He recognized the sermons. It had been my voice that had spoken to him. We had been in solitary confinement at the same time - he in Canada, I in Rumania. Angels carried my words to him. Prison walls, two continents and an ocean had been no barriers to them.

The kisses of his glorified body

The Bride desires Jesus' kisses. She wants her mouth to be touched. Jeremiah says, "The Lord put forth his hand and touched my mouth" (JER 1:9). Isaiah says, "Then flew one of the seraphim unto me, having a live coal in his hand, which he had taken with the tongs from off the altar:

and he laid it upon my mouth" (ISA 6:6-7). Thus the iniquity of Isaiah was removed. The church fathers saw in this burning coal a symbol of the Son of God incarnate. In Christian Syriac poetry, Jesus is called ~Kemurta Denura~, which means "the burning coal." He must touch our lips, so that we can praise him with fire.

I can be kissed by those who belong to his body on earth, but is it possible to kiss Jesus who is in heaven? Can the lips of his glorified body touch our lips? How can I know if my prayer has been heard? How can I know if I have received that kiss which I desire?

Some prominent saints have had this privilege. Saint Anthony held Jesus at his breast. According to a legend, Hermann Joseph presented an apple to an image of the child Jesus;Jesus put aside his sceptre, descended from the image and took the apple.

Henry Suso asked the Virgin Mary to show him the baby and to allow him to kiss Jesus. He took Jesus into his arms; he held in his arms the small baby who is bigger than the universe. One minute of such an experience transforms wolves into meek men, angry people into quiet people, the proud into the humble.

To St. Mechtild, Henry's sister, the Child said, "When I was born into the world I was immediately wrapped in swaddling clothes in which I could not move; it demonstrated that I and all that I brought with me have been given into the hands of men, who may dispose of us as they wish. The bound man has no might. He cannot defend himself. You can take from him what he has. When I left the world I was nailed to a cross. I could not move. It was a sign that I left all men the good I had done for them."

Saint Birgit of Sweden saw Jesus' birth. He was born painlessly, in a moment, looking towards the east, while the Virgin knelt in prayer. He lay naked and shining on the ground, more radiant than the sun. When Mary realized that he was born, she adored the child with great reverence. "Welcome, my Lord and my son," she said.

Therese of Lisieux became Jesus' toy. Charles de Foucauld received at Bethlehem the illuminating revelation that he ought always to take the least significant place, in order to be small and helpless like his Master at his birth.

But what should we others do, who are not capable of such mystic elevations?

Sanctified imagination

We all know the plague of erotic fantasies. In prison, sexual obsession is one of the greatest sufferings of saints, especially the younger ones. Many of them never saw their girlfriends or their wives. I myself saw virtually no women or girls for fourteen years. You sat on concrete in a common cell with hands on knees, and you were forbidden to move. You never had a book; you were not allowed to speak, even whisper, to your cellmate; sometimes you were on your own; you could do nothing but fantasize or think. For hours, erotic images paraded before the Christians' eyes. The more they were suppressed, the more powerful they became.

Sometimes the Communist jails are very refined. They used to parade girls in miniskirts in front of the sexually hungry prisoners. They took prisoners to the beaches and showed them girls in bikinis. They told them, "This is what you can have if you deny your faith."

When Milan Haimovici, a Rumanian Hebrew Christian pastor, was in prison they brought a prostitute into his solitary cell and forced him to share his bed with her, night after night, when for years he had been isolated from the world. The wardens spied through the peephole, watching to see if anything happened. They had cameras ready to photograph him embracing her, so that they could disgrace him.

Girls or men whom you see only in your imagination, when you kiss, embrace or mate in your sexual fantasy, might not be physically present, but they are very real - so real that they can drive you mad.

The only defence against erotic obsession is to spiritualize it, to see in every erotic image (as Solomon teaches us) an image of our intimate love as brides of Christ for our Bridegroom. Everybody can become a bride of Christ, through faith. A male who is converted becomes not a bridegroom, but a bride. (It was Jung who identified a female element in men which he called the ~anima~, just as in women there is a male element, the ~animus~). Through assiduous spiritual exercises we can train our imaginations. We can adopt the posture of the bride longing for the Bridegroom, desiring and receiving the kisses of the holy Lover and finding our full joy in him. Like many other visions of the saints, this can become a spiritual reality in our lives. By dreaming about an ardent union of his soul with Jesus, Pastor Milan Haimovici overcame the temptations of the prostitute.

Souls who know the spiritual realities no more doubt such kisses than one doubts a kiss received from an earthly lover.

Saint Therese of Avila writes, "As those who love each other do not allow themselves to be disturbed, those who have received this kiss despise all the things of the world, according them very small worth. Having seen the vanity of material things they despise them." The person who has received the kiss knows he has received it. Then he desires to be kissed more and more, and to be left undisturbed by anybody or anything, in sweet fellowship with Jesus.

Don't try to fight erotic fantasies head-on. Use the expulsive power of sanctified imagination. You can't stop a little girl playing with dolls. No educator's theories can achieve that. But there comes a time when the girl grows up. She acquires new interests, and these displace from her heart the pleasure of playing with dolls. In the same way, if you let sexual imaginings alone, and if every moment you are free of them you cultivate more and more spiritual imaginings, in time the spiritual fantasy will expel the mind's erotic obsessions.

In ~Nash Sovremennik~, a Soviet magazine, the writer J. Kasakov wrote in 1977 that he sometimes observed his baby smiling in his dreams. His mother interpreted this to mean that angels were playing with the child. (They were Communists, who had not been taught about angels.) Kasakov wrote, "What is the smile? What does a babe know that is concealed from grown-ups?"

Another Soviet writer, L. Vorobiov, tells of a father and daughter eating in a monastery in Russia, which the Communists had transformed into a restaurant. The daughter said reproachfully, "We drink beer and become gluttons, where once monks ate their meals in piety."

The father replied that the monks also drank.

She upbraided him for condemning monks for hypocrisy, when the Communists today were no better. Then she told him that she wanted to enter a convent.

"I suggest that you read some pornography," he answered

"I have," she said. "I am bored by it."

On the way back home, travelling by boat, the father had a mystical experience in which he saw the golden cupola of a cathedral advancing towards him. This happened in 1976 in Moscow.

If the Communists can spontaneously experience spiritual imaginings, how much more can the bride of Christ, versed in Scripture, consciously bring before her imagination the heavenly things. She can rejoice in them with jubilation, and expel much of the harm of erotic fantasies.

I will not, however, gloss over one difficulty. Many who, over decades of imprisonment, have conquered erotic obsessions, cannot so easily master themselves when, freed, they see real females again. It is the same for Christian women when they were released. Instincts, long restrained, took their revenge. Even with the best of brides, the struggle never ends. But they can be finally victorious, if they never give up. They can come to rejoice in the embraces of Christ.

The mouth which is covered by kisses only momentarily breaks free to speak words of love to the beloved, which will indicate more kissing. When one has received the heavenly kiss of unspeakable sweetness one falls silent. One lady for years told everybody about her experiences with Jesus. Then one day she had a real experience with him. From that time on, she kept quiet. Sometimes those who receive the heavenly kiss do not know the Bible well, and cannot speak in biblical language; but they too can know the Bridegroom's embraces.

The Christian Mission to the Communist World has often been threatened by terrorists. Its Swiss branch, called "Relief Action for the Martyr Church," received a threatening letter from a group called the Red Army Faction. The Swiss Christians remained unafraid and continued their work, for which they were rewarded by the Lord. One day they received a letter from a terrorist. "l had an experience with Jesus and hesitate between terrorism and God," it read. "I am out of balance, please advise." Anyone who has been kissed by someone previously unknown but very lovable will know how he felt.

The Christians established contact with him immediately. Soon they received a second letter: "Since the age of seventeen I have been a terrorist. Now I have surrendered my heart to Christ. It was terrible when I realized how huge my sins were, they were higher than the Himalayas. I was also an adorer of Satan. Now I would not like to be the sort of Christian who only prays a little and reads the Bible rarely, but rather a fighter in the front line."

His two natures

"Let him kiss me with the kisses of his mouth," says the bride at the beginning of Solomon's Song, "for your love is better than wine." It is as if the bride is speaking about two different persons: "Let him kiss me ... for your love ..." The bride is thinking about the two natures which combine in the person of Jesus - the human nature and the divine.

The love of Jesus' human nature is better than wine, better than all the pleasures this world can offer. But the bride wants more. She wishes to see the glorified Son of God in all his splendour, and she desires the kisses of his divine nature.

Some Christians' lives and deaths are far more painful than our own. Equatorial Guinea was for many years under the oppression of the dictator Macias Nguema, who was supported by Soviet, Cuban and East German advisers. At the time, refugees fleeing to Gabon from there told of thirty-six Christians who were buried up to the neck in the forest. The next day only two heads were still moving. They were disfigured by insect bites and the eyes had been eaten. In another incident, a prisoner had his feet hacked off; in another, a girl who refused the sexual advances made by her guards was tortured unspeakably with a burning torch. [Reported in ~Deutschland Magazine~, July 1978]

Lukewarm Christians cannot endure such things. The privilege of bearing such a heavy cross and remaining faithful and hopeful is the monopoly of those who have received the holy kiss of his divine nature, though they may not have thought about or even heard of this biblical phrase.

Bonaventure was the first Superior of the Franciscan Order after the death of its founder. He was once asked by Saint Thomas Aquinas where all his extensive knowledge came from. He pointed to the crucifix on his desk. "That is the source of all my knowledge," he said. "I study only Jesus Christ, and him crucified." Bonaventure had received the holy kiss of the divine nature of Jesus.

The savour of his ointments

In the Orient, perfumed wood was sometimes used in the building of mosques. It is like hearing sermons preached in a church in which incense is burned or in one decorated with sweet-smelling flowers. But I have heard the Word preached or recited in Communist prison cells, in which sometimes 200 prisoners were crammed together, in indescribable squalor. Some of us were unable to wash for years. Our clothes were filthy. Water was scarce, and so was soap. Overflowing barrels in the cell served as lavatories for 200 people. Faeces and urine filled one corner. Many of the prisoners simply suffocated. The windows were shuttered so that air could not enter. Men would lie down on the floor so as to breathe the draught from the tiny gap at the bottom of the door.

In that situation there were some believers who dwelt not only in these terrible earthly surroundings, but at the same time in heavenly places. Scarcely breathing, like asthmatics, they talked among themselves and with others about the sweet savour of sacrifices brought to God and of fragrances like those of heaven. They quoted scriptures about frankincense and myrrh, about roses and lilies.

The Jewish ~Talmud~ states that every meal at which the conversation is about something other than the Word of God is an idolatrous meal. When Christians were in the Rumanian prison of Piteshti, they tried to think about the Word of God while they ate, and to speak to each other about it. However, their torturers then decided to make them eat their own bodily waste. In Piteshti eating excrement and drinking urine was a daily routine. But while they did this, they thought of the Bible's words about the savour of God's good ointments. They meditated upon the perfumes described in the Word of God. So in prison one is made aware of how independent the spiritual life is from the life of the flesh.

A Russian priest, Nikiforov-Volghin, tells in his book ~Dust on the Road~ of the following story, told to him by a Christian he met in prison:

> One day I arrived home and heard somebody cry out. I found my wife, stabbed in the heart by somebody we knew. The murderer fell at my feet, begging my forgiveness. I said to him, "Go, and do not do so anymore." I went to the police and accepted responsibility for the crime. I was sentenced. Then in Krasnoyarsk prison one prisoner murdered another. For that, too, I accepted the blame. Now I am sentenced to life imprisonment. I could not do other than I did.

Loving God, I look on all men as I look upon angels.
My only prayer is, "I am yours and you are mine - have mercy on me." If you had not been a priest
I would not have told you these things. You asked me why I am here, and you are entitled to the truth.

When this prisoner died it was as though heaven had opened. His last words were, "Lord, I would like to continue to suffer for others; but thy will be done." Those who are present at such a death, though prison squalor surrounds them, sometimes detect a heavenly fragrance. It is the odour of the high places in which the bride of Christ lives.

page 32 The Sweetest Song

What is in his name?

In Shakespeare's ~Romeo and Juliet~, the girl thought of her lover's name. The two belonged to warring families. He was a Montague, she a Capulet. Her family would never have consented to their marriage. So she advised him to change his name. "What's in a name?" she asked. "A rose by any other name would smell as sweet." She was right about roses. A rose is called a "rose" only in the English language; in other languages it has different names. And she was probably right about Romeo as well. She could have loved him even if his name had been Sebastian or Antonio.

I do not rule out the possibility that some love Jesus by another name. They have never heard the name "Jesus" but they love Love. They love self-sacrifice, they love forgiveness and goodness. They love Divinity coming down to earth, and earthly beings uniting with Divinity. They love the poor and oppressed, those who represent Jesus on earth. You can love Jesus without knowing his name.

Many who call in prayer upon Krishna, Buddha or some other name may perhaps in reality mean "Jesus."

But with Jesus his name is important. In Hebrew it is ~Yeshua~, which means "salvation." His very name proclaims what he stands for! You say "Jesus," and it is like the pouring-out of ointment. Because of that name you know that there is salvation for you and for all people. Another of his names, "Immanuel," means "God is with us."

Only the bride can say to the Saviour, "Your name is an ointment poured forth." Jesus did not have a good name in the world. He was called a glutton, a winebibber, a Samaritan (which at that time was the same as calling him a heretic); he was called a deceiver, they said that he had a devil, and so on. To this evil talk about Jesus the bride is deaf.

Souls who truly believe in Jesus are also widely slandered. In the Soviet press faithful pastors are called "scoundrels, hooligans and villains." They call Solzhenitsyn, the distinguished Nobel prizewinner, a traitor.

Concerning the finest Christians of all, the Communists spread the rumour that they are stool-pigeons of the Communist authorities and secret agents of the police. As a result they are beaten up by their fellow-prisoners. However, they know that in the eyes of their Bridegroom, their name is good.

Holy love

The bride says, "No wonder the virgins love you!" (SOS 1:3), and there is no jealousy in what she says. This is what distinguishes holy love from worldly love: not merely that we who love him are not jealous, but that we want many other souls to love him as well, and we desire him to pour out on them his caresses and his kisses.

In Australia a Christian lady stopped a young girl in the street. "You look so sad! You are crying. I am a Christian. Could I be of help? Could I share your sorrow?"

"Thank you for your kindness," replied the girl, "but nobody can help me. The man I love has left me."

Our sister said, "Don't worry. I have a beautiful Bridegroom. I will give him to you."

The girl, thinking she was being made fun of, said "Why are you mocking my grief?"

Then our sister spoke to her about her heavenly Bridegroom - about Jesus. She explained that he can share his love with many, and yet to every one of them he gives all his love. The girl was brought to Christ.

Those who preach Jesus are not in competition with one another. They are fellow-workers. So if a soul that was attached to one flock moves to join another, there is no need for sadness. It simply means that the spiritual atmosphere of the first flock did not suit that particular soul. No Christian teacher can claim that he is equally helpful to every individual.

It is not absolutely necessary that somebody should be a member of my church. Let him go to any church where he can grow spiritually, and I will accompany him there with my prayers.

"Draw me"

The bride says, "Draw me, we will run after you. The king has brought me into his chambers; we will be glad and rejoice in you, we will remember your love more than wine; the upright love you" (SOS 1:4). She prays, "Draw me." She prays like this because she knows that she is still very far from him. "Whilst we are at home in the body, we are absent from the Lord" (2CO 5:6). She prays like this because she longs to arrive at union with him.

It is not enough that he should draw her by convincing her. She does not have the moral power to follow her convictions. He must draw her with supernatural grace. He has to give her the will to come to him and the means to fulfill that will. He has said it himself: "No man can come to me except the Father who has sent me draw him" (JHN 6:44). Nobody can come to Jesus by his own will.

Looking to the ascended Jesus, my prayer is "Draw me." What could hinder the fulfillment of this prayer? The way of ascension is open for everyone. Elijah was a man who had the same weaknesses as we all have, and he ascended into heaven. Everyone who consents to ride in a chariot of fire, as Elijah did, can ascend like him. Jesus said, "He that shall humble himself shall be exalted" (MTT 23:12).

We can come to where Jesus is; we can sit with him on his throne (REV 3:21). But we have to follow the way he went, "Who, being in the form of God ... made himself of no reputation and took upon him the form of a servant and was made in the likeness of men; and being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself and became obedient unto death, even the death of the Cross. Wherefore God has also highly exalted him and given him a name which is above every name." (PHP 2:6-9).

God is not only the Father of the Lord Jesus, but also our Father; and we can all ascend to him if we follow the way of Jesus. He lived for thirty-four years on earth in misery, poverty and unmeasured sorrows. Let us beware of wealth and exalted situations as of a burning fire, and our prayer to be drawn by him will be fulfilled.

Running after him

The bride says, "Draw me, we will run after you." We have not to walk after the Lord, but to run. The apostle Paul tells the believers, "Let us ~run~ with patience" (HEB 12:1), "So ~run~ that you may obtain the prize" (1CO 9:24); "I therefore so ~run~, not as uncertainly" (1CO 9:26). Only running can symbolize a living longing for God and a vigorous faith in him. PSA 119:32 says, "I will ~run~ the way of your commandments."

It is written of the children of Israel that when they worshipped the golden calf, they "sat down to eat and to drink" (EXO 32:6). While Joseph was sitting, his brothers conferred as to how to sell him. (GEN 37:25) It is a great catastrophe when the people of God sit down; they must run - run with all their heart, not listening to whispers or shouts from different sides, but violently rejecting any hindrance to their running. We have to run with our bodies stretched forward to seize the prize, before our feet arrive at our goal.

We have to run with extreme speed. Jesus told us we are lights. Light has greater speed than anything else in the natural world. In telling us that we are lights, Jesus told us to run with the speed of light. It is not the case that souls who run slower don't arrive in the end, but they do lose the prize reserved for those who arrive first.

In the bride's words, "Draw ~me~, ~we~ will run after ~you~," we observe the sudden passing from the singular to the plural in the midst of the sentence. The bride is saying, "Jesus should draw ~me~ alone; then ~we~ - many of us - will run after him. You, Jesus, take care of me, drawing me with all your might, that I might influence others." King David, too, says, "Restore unto me the joy of your salvation, and uphold me with your free spirit, then I will teach transgressors your ways; and sinners shall be converted unto you." (PSA 51:12-13).

Let the words, "We will run" stay in our minds. Are we believers who are running? This is easy to find out. The one who runs quickly covers a great distance in a short time. How great a distance have you covered since you came to God?

Communists who found Christ

Communists hate not only Christians, Jews, Moslems, patriots and those belonging to other political parties; they also hate one another. It once happened that five Russian Communists were in a prison cell, sentenced to death by their own comrades. While awaiting execution, one of them paced up and down in the cell, singing over and over, ~Safe in the arms of Jesus.~ Just those few words. The others asked him what he meant, but he did not know. He only knew that his mother had sung a song that began with those words. His mother died when he was young. What had remained fixed in his memory was that there is a place where one is safe. This place is called "In the arms of Jesus."

Another of the Communists said, "I once saw an ikon of Jesus with his arms stretched out on a cross." Now they knew two things - that Jesus died on a cross and that, in his arms, you are safe. A third said, "In Russia, even now, we call the first day of the week ~Voskresenie~ (Resurrection). Is the one who was resurrected the same one who stretched out his arms on the cross? Is this what gives us safety, even in death?"

From these fragments of knowledge the Communists reconstructed the essence of the gospel. They went to their deaths singing, ~Safe in the arms of Jesus.~

That is the speed at which the light was spread in death row. In no time at all, one had been drawn by Christ; and all the others followed him. You may not know very much about Jesus. But share quickly the little that you do know with others. There could be great consequences.

In Red China, where Christians were fiercely persecuted, somebody wrote on a wall, ~God loves every man~. The next day he found more writing below: ~even the Communists~. These words were probably written by a Red Guard who had found assurance that God loved him, too. The light had passed quickly from one soul to another.

The responsibility of soul-winners

The bride says, "Draw me, we will run after you" (SOS 1:4). The faithful soul wins other people for Christ. By so doing, it takes upon itself a huge responsibility. In the Free World a soul-winner does not readily perceive this.

The man he wins for Christ will become a church member, sing in the choir, marry a nice Christian girl and lead a quiet Christian life. But to be a soul-winner in a Communist country - to be an evangelist in the Underground Church - burdens you with heavy problems.

When St. Paul preached in Rome he knew that those who responded to his message could be thrown to the wild beasts and devoured in the circus arena. They could be crucified or burnt on stakes. Should he preach, in such circumstances? Or would it be better for him to remain silent? Is it right to propagate an idea if it will bring men to prison, to torture and to death? How many unbelieving wives, parents and children must have cursed Paul, because his preaching brought such sorrow to their families? But when you are drawn by Jesus, you must make others run after him.

I was in jail with a man whom Traian Dorz, the famous Rumanian poet, had brought to Christ. He was sentenced for his faith, and he had left a wife and six children at home. I asked him, "Are you resentful towards Dorz, for taking you out of your life of tranquility and setting you upon this dangerous path?" He said, "I can't thank him enough."

During World War II, Mrs. Roosevelt, the wife of the President of the USA, carried in her purse this prayer:

Dear Lord,
Lest I continue
My complacent way,
Help me to remember
Somewhere out there
A man died for me today.
As long as this fight continues,
I then must ask and answer - Am I worth dying for?

Every ruler and every officer who sends soldiers to die - yes, every conscientious citizen - must ask himself or herself the same question.

In the Underground Church the pastor gives assignments to his church members which might result in their death. He asks them to organize secret printing presses, to secretly transport Christian literature from place to place. If they are caught these people will go to prison. Because of those printing presses, many people have died.

The Christian Mission to the Communist World has sent couriers into Communist countries to smuggle holy books in. One of these, Wang-Shin-Mei, was beaten to death in China. Two others, Tom White and Mel Bailey, were caught in Cuba; they received prison sentences of twenty-three years each. Others were wounded while taking Bibles into Communist Mozambique.

A soul-winner in the Underground Church is not allowed to be complacent. He must remember that his brothers and sisters may die for what he has told them to believe and to do.

In the Free World, Christians must be taught to carry crosses and to learn to renounce. The soul-winner must know and practise this himself, before he teaches it to others.

In the king's chambers

The bride prayed, "Draw me," and the prayer was granted immediately. The king brought her into his chambers.

We read of Blessed Ann Marie Taigi (1769-1837), a woman of simple background and mother of seven children, that she saw a mysterious sun suspended before her, a little above head height. By its light she saw all the visible and invisible things of earth. She penetrated also into the depths of the abyss and into the high places of heaven, just as St. Paul rose to the third heaven (2CO 12:2). With great clarity she observed the fates of diverse men and the secrets of nature and grace.

She could discern the secret thoughts of people near at hand and far away.

For her, there was no time; she could see men and events in the past and the future. Everything happened in that single moment, in the mystical sun. In one glance she perceived a multitude of things, with perfect knowledge and in complete detail.

Ignatius of Loyola saw, in a rapture, divine things. While sitting near a river and allowing his eyes to rest on the water, his sight was opened and he understood many things - secrets of faith and revelations from the realm of natural science - with such an overwhelming clarity that he had no doubt it was a revelation from God.

These were people who had been in the King's chambers. I have myself known men who have been there. In jail, I was thrown together with a Christian sentenced to death. He sang songs which he had composed. He told us, "Death does not scare me. I sing here; I will do the same after I am shot. Only the songs will be different. Here, my hymns somehow center around myself, telling of my longings, how sinful I have been, how I was saved, although the Lord taught us in his prayer to pray without using the word "I." Heavenly songs are different. The angels sing that God is thrice holy, and that the earth is filled with his glory. They rejoice over it, and they have nothing to ask. About themselves they say nothing, neither good nor bad. At Christ's birth they sang "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth, peace to men on whom his favour rests." There was no petition for personal needs."

My Christian cellmate went to his execution singing one of the new songs which he had learned in the chambers of Jesus. In his spirit, he had been in heavenly Jerusalem, the city far away, before his physical death. We are all meant to visit the chambers of Jesus and to learn these new songs.

"We will be glad"

The bride says, "The king has brought me into his chambers: we will be glad and rejoice in you" (SOS 1:4). The grace given her affects many others. Once again she passes from the singular case to the plural: "The king has brought ~me~ into his chambers; ~we~ will rejoice." It is enough that one single soul should be in right fellowship with God, and the whole Church of which he is a part will be blessed, and will have joy and gladness.

There are no useless words in the Bible. It is written, "We will be glad and rejoice," and it might seem that this is repetitious. But there is a progression here from inner joy to outward gladness. Gladness can be faked. It must be united to a joy in the heart which makes it genuine.

Many people display gladness even though their stony hearts have been long incapable of knowing true joy. God continually insists that joy and gladness must go together; there should be neither laughter without the heart's participation, nor a joy in the heart too miserly to show itself outwardly and thus gladden others. The archangel Gabriel said to Zacharias the priest, "You shall have joy and gladness" (LUK 1:14). The prodigal son's father said to his other son, "It was meet that we should make merry, and be glad: for this your brother was dead, and is alive again" (LUK 15:32). Jesus tells us to "rejoice ... and leap for joy" (LUK 6:23). So rejoicing should be accompanied by outward signs of jubilation.

Loving unto death

The bride says, "We will remember your love more than wine" (SOS 1:4). The wine represents the king's gifts, as distinguished from his person. That he himself unites with us is of more value to humanity than all the things he gives to us.

"The upright [literally, "uprighteousnesses"] love you." They love Jesus even unto death. Bishop Seraphim of Phanarion in Greece was martyred, on 4 December 1601. He had been falsely accused of plotting and rebelling against the Turks. They shouted at him, "Rebel and subverter of our authority! Behold, thou hast come into our hands, and thou wilt receive that which is thy due – unless, perchance, thou shouldst wish to abandon thy faith and become a Moslem. Then we would forgive thee, and honour thee greatly, for by this we would know that thou hadst repented and become as one with us."

The saint was an upright man who loved Jesus. He desired martyrdom for Christ and did not become in the least fainthearted. He said to them with a clear and serene countenance, "I will never agree in any circumstances to forsake my faith, so that I might be spared my death. I will never forsake my most sweet Jesus, my God and my Creator.

"Now, because I suffer unjustly, I have the more hope on that account that I shall receive from my Master even greater honour. I would never deny my faith; nor shall I ever be separated from my sweetest Master and God, Jesus Christ. Though I shall die ten thousand deaths for his holy name, I would count it all joy and gladness. O, Ruler! Be it slaughter or mutilation, do whatsoever is within thy power."

The ruler, Hamouza Bey, then ordered him to be flogged and his nose to be cut into small pieces. This upright man loved Jesus. He endured all these torments as if they were happening to somebody else, thanking God and blessing him.

The next morning he appeared before Hamouza Bey again, and his attitude was the same. "I will never abandon my Lord Jesus, my Creator who shaped me, only to believe in a mortal man - an illiterate - an enemy and blasphemer of my Christ!"

They tore him to pieces. But even his merciless executioners marvelled to see that he endured it all with thanksgiving, and that his face was bright and joyous as if he were at a feast. In the end he was impaled.

Legends often arise around such great saints. It is said that his head and those of others condemned as criminals were placed on spears and arranged in a row facing west. This was done each evening, and by morning the heads would be as they had left them, except for that of Seraphim: his head would be found looking toward the east, towards Jerusalem, the Holy City.

The Kenyan periodical ~Target~ reported that the Anglican Bishop of Uganda, Janani Luwum, was shot in front of President Amin because he refused to kneel and beg for mercy. The same demonic spirit seems to be at work in Communist Cuba as well. Fidel Castro attended the execution by firing squad of a Christian. As his hands were tied behind his back, Castro urged him, "Kneel, and beg for your life." The Christian shouted back "I kneel for no man!" A sharp-shooter put a bullet first through one knee, then the other. Castro exulted: "See! We have made you kneel!" The man was finished off slowly by being shot through the non-vital parts of the body, so that the agony was prolonged. This incident is described by John Martino in his book ~I Was Castro's Prisoner~.

The devil himself works through these anti-Christian dictators. We are reminded of the words he addressed to the Lord: "All these things will I give you, if you will fall down and worship me" (MTT 4:9).

Christians such as these I have described are each one a personification of "uprighteousness." Therefore the Hebrew text says, "Uprighteousnesses love you."

"Black and comely"

The bride says," I am black [but] comely, O you daughters of Jerusalem," (SOS 1:5). An important emendation to the translation is needed here in the Authorized Version. We read, "I am black but comely." This gives the impression that black people are usually ugly, and that Solomon's bride was an exception, comely despite her blackness. There is no trace of this idea in the Hebrew original, which reads simply, "I am black and comely." There are as many beautiful black girls as beautiful white girls or yellow girls. There is no hint of racism in this verse.

Blackness is absence of light, and it is in this sense that the Bible uses the term. The Church is black because some believers do not obey God; but she is beautiful because of her saints and perfect Christians. She is black in the eyes of men, because those whose souls are blind cannot perceive the beauty of the kingdom of God within us, but she is beautiful before God.

We are black because of our own weakness, but beautiful and strong through God's grace, which is ours in abundance. A man can be black because he is guilty of many sins, but beautiful in God's eyes from the very moment he puts his joyful trust in Jesus, the Saviour of sinners, who forgives him and will change his soul.

Today's decayed Church can be black on account of her deeds, but she is beautiful on account of those who have gone before in faith. She is beloved because of the first generation of Christians who were aflame with gentle love, just as Israel, even though it rejected Jesus, remains beloved because of the Jewish patriarchs. Though she may be blackened by persecution, the Church is beautiful through her penitence. She may be weak, but the words of Psalm 45 apply to her: "The king's daughter is all glorious within" (PSA 45:13).

Never be afraid when you discover your weakness and sinfulness, when you discover the lack of light or blackness. You are only one in a large flock. A small part of a body can be affected by disease while the body as a whole remains healthy. Similarly you are "healthy" or beautiful by virtue of the Church to which you belong, which possesses the beautiful characters of the saints. Their beauty reflects upon you.

In Red China, a wedding took place at an execution ground. Zhou Wen Yong and Chen Tie-Zhun had been workers together in the Underground Church and had both been sentenced to death. They were in love. At the place of execution Zhou asked Chen, "Will you be my wife?" She consented. He declared "So we are married before God! Let the Communist bullet be the seal of our wedding. We will feast our marriage in paradise."

A Soviet prisoner wrote from jail: "I bow my head in humility before our mother, the Church. I thank God for the education she gave me. The Church of Christ has many sufferings, but also an overflow of joy. In the Siberian cold, we warmed the icy winter's embraces with the Word of God."

Let us thank God that we belong to this Church which has such saints as members, even if we ourselves are unworthy. We are black and beautiful.

Every believer is tempted at some time to think, "You, who are so black - how can you speak about the Lord?" Every preacher at some time thinks, "How can I, who am so wicked, even climb into the pulpit?" Our courage evaporates when we consider what state we are in.

But look at the apostle Peter. He, who had denied Christ with oaths and curses, stood in the Jerusalem marketplace and rebuked the people: "~You~ denied the Holy One and the Just" (ACT 3:14). He who had himself committed this very sin, in the most heinous manner, rebuked others for the same sin, though they were much less guilty. He could do this because he knew that he was not only black but beautiful - not only sinful, but also forgiven and beloved by God. The darkness in him did not make Peter despair. He knew he was wicked, but he also knew that when he preached, it was not him speaking but Christ, who lived in him.

The night is black, but it gives rest to the earth. Black bread is very nutritious. A pastor who by his own deeds is in darkness but is beautiful by the grace he receives from God, can feed a hungry flock. I trust Jesus' taste more than my own! I see myself as black, he sees me as beautiful. He sees himself mirrored in us. He sees us as we shall be.

The bride compares her blackness to that of the tents of Kedar and the curtains of Solomon (SOS 1:5). Kedar was a district of Arabia inhabited by Bedouins. They made their tents from black goat hair. The curtains at Solomon's palace were also said to be black. Black curtains keep out the light from a room. This image means that great care was necessary to ensure that the many sins committed by the bride should not come to light.

Do not be critical

The bride admonishes, "Look not upon me as being blackish" [the meaning of the Hebrew word] "because the sun has looked upon me" (SOS 1:6). She had described herself as "black" (shechorah), but now, pondering the fact that she is also beautiful, she no longer calls herself "black" She is only "blackish" (shecharchoret). Men should not even regard her as that. They should learn to see her beautiful side.

The believer should regard nobody as "black"; he should be careful not to slander even his weakest brother. The apostle Peter says, "God has shown me that I should not call any man common or unclean" (ACT 10:28). The bride is blackish, but listen to her defence! "I am blackish because the sun has looked upon me. My mother's children were angry with me; they made me the keeper of the vineyards." If my brother has sinned, the reason may be the many sufferings, temptations and persecutions which he has endured. When the Spirit of God does his work, my brother will confess his sins himself, like the bride in Solomon's Song.

To explain how she came to be "blackish," she reviews her past life. "My mother's children" - that is, the members of the Church, which is the believer's mother - "were angry with me; they made me the keeper of the vineyards" - an occupation in which you get heavily sunburnt. "I have been given great assignments," the bride complains. "I have been appointed a pastor, a teacher of the brethren." Other believers might well envy her situation, but it was in that situation that she was burned by the sun and became blackish.

Christians, don't compete for the honour of being leaders in the Church. It is a calling that should make you tremble. Saint James writes, "My brethren, be not many masters, knowing that we shall receive the greater condemnation" (JMS 3:1). Christians, don't judge. Coventry Cathedral in England was destroyed by German bombs during World War II. When it was rebuilt two charred logs from the old building were made into a cross bearing the inscription, "Father, forgive." There was no "them" at the end. The British knew that they too needed to be forgiven.

Terrorists sin. So do all Arabs who do not love Zionists.

And Zionists have committed sins towards Arabs. Communists sin. Christians in Communist countries sin too, because they are not being holy and zealous enough to prevent men from becoming Communists. The best of pastors sin more than all of these. God gives them a vision, but they neglect many of their duties.

For all of us, our only hope is the Lord's sacrifice on Good Friday; the Easter event, his resurrection, is our only source of peace. So do not misuse your mouth by criticizing, and especially by criticizing the bride of Christ.

The dangers of the pastorate

Be very cautious before you accept the office of pastor, a keeper in God's vineyard. The believer's preference is for a hidden life with God. Listen to a biblical parable:

Once, the trees went forth to anoint a king over them. And they said to the olive tree, "Reign over us." But the olive tree said unto them, "Should I leave my fatness wherewith by me they honour God and man, and go to be promoted over the trees?"

And the trees said to the fig tree, "You come and reign over us." But the fig tree said unto them, "Should I forsake my sweetness, and my good fruit, and go to be promoted over the trees?"

Then said the trees unto the vine, "You come and reign over us." And the vine said to them, "Should I leave my wine, which cheers God and man, and go to be promoted over the trees?"

Then said all the trees unto the bramble, "You come and reign over us."

And the bramble said unto the trees, "If in truth you anoint me king over you, then come and put your trust in my shadow. And if not, let fire come out of the thistle and devour the cedars of Lebanon (JDG 9:8-17).

Only valueless Christians long for important positions in the Church of God and rejoice when they are given them. They are misguided, because important positions in the Church leave no time for maintaining the beauty of your own vineyard. You become so concerned with caring for others that you don't care about yourself. You will be in danger of the same catastrophe which overcame ancient Israel, to whom the apostle Paul wrote: "You therefore who teach another, do you not teach yourself? You who preach that a man should not steal, do you steal? You who say that a man should not commit adultery, do you commit adultery? You who abhor idols, do you commit sacrilege?" (ROM 2:21-22).

The only man who should become a pastor or a missionary is the man who cannot be anything else. He who can say with the prophet Jeremiah, "His word was in my heart as a burning fire shut up in my bones, and I was weary with forebearing, and I could not stay" (JER 20:9). Young converts, don't push yourselves forward for leading positions in the churches and in missions! Don't begin preaching at the earliest opportunity out of a sense of obligation! It is better to keep the beauty of your own vineyard.

Where can he be found?

The bride says, "Tell me, O you whom my soul loves, where you feed, where you make your flock to rest at noon: for why should I be as one that turns aside by the flocks of your companions?" (SOS 1:7). She gives Jesus a beautiful name, "You Whom My Soul Loves" . The Church is the beloved of God's soul, and God is the Beloved of our souls.

The bride wants to know the exact place where her Beloved is. She wants to go to the place where he rests, where he feeds his flock, because in her diffidence she does not want to distract him from his preoccupations by asking him to come to her. She will go to him, and will be able to speak with him while helping him in his work. She will not abuse his time. But she must know exactly where he is. She does not want to wander around among his companions' flocks. She does not want to find herself among the flocks of the other founders of religions, who are not like him.

Jesus has given us an exact address where we can find him. It is written that on the day of the Last Judgement, men will hear these words from him: "I was in prison and you came to me," or these: "I was in prison, and you visited me not" (MTT 25:36, 43). And then he will explain: "Verily I say unto you, inasmuch as you have done it ... [or] did it not to one of the least of these my brethren, you have done it ... [or] did it not unto me" (MTT 25:40, 45). Whoever wishes to meet Jesus must meet him in places where brothers and sisters of Jesus are hungry, thirsty, naked, unwanted, sick or in prison. Whoever keeps himself distant from these places remains distant from Jesus.

In his book ~The Unmasking~, G. Dumitrescu - a former jail inmate in Communist Rumania - writes:

> Prisoners were so tortured that nobody dared to use a hand for making the sign of the Cross. We did it with our tongues. We had to stay the whole day with hands lifted, even when at toilet. We had to put the dish with food on the floor, kneel near it, and lick the food without using the hands. We were animals. The food burned our lips. We were beaten with sticks on the > shinbones, but could not rub our feet. The hands had to stay unmoved. Every prisoner was asked to beat his best friend, his brother in faith. If he refused, the brethren were tortured until they agreed to beat him with truncheons on the soles.

> The prisoner, Nuti Patrashcanu, had become a sadistic torturer of his friends. Then they tortured him almost to death. Twelve of them sat on his body; he excreted and was made to eat his own excrement.

The Patrashcanu mentioned above later shared a prison cell with me, and God gave me the grace to bring him to Christ. His bride, who was free, was also converted. He later died in jail.

The last words of the Christian Sherban Gheorge, who was killed in an atrocious manner in Piteshti, still echo in our ears: "The Communists' crimes are too horrible. I can't pray for them to God from a distance. I must go to him to speak on their behalf. Do not avenge my death."

Jesus' companions

The bride says, "Why should I be as one that turns aside by the flocks of your companions?" (SOS 1:7). In this verse the founders of other religions are called the companions of Jesus, not his competitors. Jesus has no competition. He is not threatened by all those who have inscribed high thoughts about God in the Vedas of the Indians and in the holy books of other nations; he is not threatened by Confucius, Lao-Tzu, Buddha, Muhammed and other founders of religion who, in the measure of the light which they had, tried to bring men to better ways.

The bride's question as to where the Beloved sleeps arises from a legitimate desire to see his face; but it does not receive a direct answer. On the last evening, Thomas asked the Lord, "We know not where you are going: and how can we know the way?" (JHN 14:5). But Jesus had already replied: "Where I go you know, and the way you know" (JHN 14:4). He concedes to no man the possibility that he would not know what his duty is, that somebody sincerely seeking the King of Kings would not be able to distinguish between him and one of his companions or a deceiver, that he would not know how to distinguish between the lilies with which he feeds his flock and the simple grass of the others. That would be to despair of human thought. Jesus believes that men are capable of thinking correctly.

Only love Jesus with a perfect love, from your whole heart, and you will know where he feeds his flock as surely as every man who loves drugs or alcohol knows where to find them. "What man is he that fears the Lord? Him shall he teach in the way that he shall choose" (PSA 25:12). The difficulty is not lack of knowledge, but a moral weakness. His bride cannot make the decision to go to the place of deep suffering, which is the surest place of encounter with the greatly-Beloved.

Would you like to know where Jesus feeds his flock? Deny yourself and take up your cross. Then you can be sure of following him. Would you like to know where he rests at noon? Once, he rested in the bosom of the Father; now he rests in the heart of every believer who gives him room. But he is pre-eminently resting in the hearts of the believers who are undergoing suffering; in the hearts of those who have purified themselves from attachment to created things, so that they may remain entirely indwelling in the Creator.

I remember a Good Friday in a cell in the Rumanian jail, Jilava. We were all very hungry, but that day when the bowl of gruel was brought we refused to eat. We fasted. Good Friday is the only fast-day described by the Lord himself: "The days will come, when the bridegroom shall be taken from them, and then they shall fast" (MTT 9:15). Days of fasting, with deep repentance for our past sins, are the greatest gifts anybody can give to the Underground Church and the missions which help it.

As a punishment for refusing the food on Good Friday we were made to stand to attention for the whole of Easter morning. That provided a captive audience for a sermon! If anybody had desired to be with Jesus on that day, he should have travelled in spirit to be in fellowship with us. Jesus was in jail with his disciples on that day. Prison is one of the places where we should look for him. I wonder at the numbers of Christians from the Free World who visit Communist countries but never ask permission to visit a jail and encourage their brothers and sisters in pain.

In Solomon's Song Jesus did not say directly where he feeds his flock. He wants us to think for ourselves. But on the Day of Judgement we will be reproached or approved, according to whether or not we have been among this world's sufferers.

By the footsteps of the flock

In the Song, Jesus' reply to the bride's question is: "If you do not know yourself" - so the Hebrew reads - "O you fairest among women, go your way forth by the footsteps of the flock, and feed your kids by the shepherds' tents" (SOS 1:8). The Bridegroom calls her, "The fairest among women." Nothing is more beautiful in God's sight than a believing soul. He is blind to its weaknesses.

The Bridegroom shows us a simple way to find him. If she wishes with all her heart to come to where he is, the bride must "go by the footsteps of the flock." In this world there are men who bear the visible sign of being Jesus' sheep. Go after them; imitate their example. Do as they do. They are in fellowship with Jesus. If you follow in their footsteps you will come into fellowship with him too.

When in Central Africa the first pygmy came to believe in Jesus, another pygmy, Kiwebulaya, who could not understand what his friend was talking about, decided to follow him to find out the secret of his changed life. One day he saw him leave the village. He went after him, unobserved, into the jungle. He watched his friend kneel in the grass, fold his hands, and speak with his new invisible friend Jesus.

Now Kiwebulaya knew what he had to do. After his friend had finished praying and departed, he went to the same place, knelt in the depressions in the grass left by his friend, folded his hands as he had done and said, "Jesus, you who made my friend happy, make me happy too."

A voice replied: "Come unto me, you pygmy who labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." Kiwebulaya said, "I would come to you, Jesus, but I don't know how." He received a reply again: "I will be with you always." When he rose from his praying, Kiwebulaya's face shone with happiness just as his friend's face shone. He had come to where Jesus was by following in the footsteps of one of his sheep.

But be very careful that those whom you follow are really Jesus' sheep. To use another animal analogy, hunters sometimes have useless dogs. They run after the real hunting dogs, and if they were persistent they would arrive at the kill with the others. But instead they stop at every bush and every curiosity. The hunting dogs we should follow are the real ones, which go through fire and water.

The Bible says, "Walk in the way of good men, and keep the paths of the righteous" (PRO 2:20). Paul says, "Be followers of me, even as I also am of Christ" 1CO 11:1). He also says, "Be not slothful, but followers of them who through faith and patience inherit the promises" (HEB 6:12). The best way of advancing in the life of faith is to take as our examples the most worthy believers of the Church's history, not those who have the latest fanciful doctrines. In art galleries one can see many young painters copying the masterpieces of painters of the past. Young believers must copy the outstanding saints of the past.

When the Communists took over Angola, they began to threaten and persecute the Christians. Those who were true believers remained unafraid. One Sunday morning the Communist soldiers entered the Evangelical Church in the town of Chiasso. They drove cattle into the church, slaughtered them and mounted the animals' heads on the pulpit and the communion table. A sign on the pulpit announced, "These are the gods you now worship."

The believers were given a choice: either to die, or to deny their faith. The pastor, Aurelio Chicanha, and 150 church members remained steadfast and were murdered there and then. The mission compound was turned into a military base. Similar killings and appropriations of churches have happened in Chissamba, Dondi, Bungue and Elemde.

These believers were real sheep, whose example we can follow. Not all of us are called to die a martyr's death, but all of us are called to have the same spirit of self-sacrifice and love to the very end as these martyrs had.

My former fellow-prisoner Ion Stanescu, a Rumanian Orthodox deacon, died from tortures suffered in prison. He once told me the following story.

Colonel Albon, the director of the slave labour camp where Stanescu was imprisoned, was informed that someone had dared to preach in Stanescu's cell. He entered carrying a cane and demanded to know the culprit. When nobody answered, he said, "Well then, everybody will be flogged. Unbutton!"

He started at one end of the cell, and there was the usual yelling and tears. When he came to Stanescu, he said, "Not ready yet? Strip this minute!" Stanescu replied, "Neither I nor the others will be beaten any more. There is a God in heaven, and he will judge you."

With that the fate of Stanescu appeared to be sealed. Surely he would be beaten to death! But just at that moment, a guard entered the cell and said, "Colonel, you are wanted urgently in the office. Some generals have come from the Ministry." Albon left, saying to Stanescu, "We will see each other again soon."

However, the generals arrested the colonel (Communists hate and jail one another for no apparent reason) and, after an hour, Albon was back in the cell, this time as a prisoner. Many of the inmates jumped to lynch him. But Stanescu defended his defeated enemy with his own body, taking many blows himself as he protected the torturer from the beaten prisoners.

Stanescu was a real priest. We have to follow in the footsteps of men like this, loving our enemies but also resisting their evil deeds.

It is easy to walk "by the footsteps of the flock" because sheep follow only beaten tracks, and will never take even one step to the right or to the left away from it. But again, let us be careful to walk only by the path of Jesus' sheep. Not all sheep have virtues to be imitated. Some can be very cruel. Any farmer will tell you about sheep who, by withholding milk, let their lambs die of starvation. Sometimes they even smash the lambs' heads against a wall. Also, certain sheep of different breeds hate one another; those of the Hampshire breed cannot tolerate those of the Suffolk breed. Avoid Christian sheep of this kind.

Where to feed our kids

The Bridegroom tells the bride, "Feed your kids beside the shepherds' tents." The meaning of these words is clarified by this Jewish proverb: "If you wish to smell pleasant, stand near those who sell perfumes." The nearer a faithful soul is to his pastor, the more he will make his valuable teachings his own and the clearer he will see the face of Jesus.

Saint Basil the Great said, "When you are sick, you don't go to any physician but the best. Neither should you listen to sermons at random. Seek the pastor who prepares conscientiously the best food for your souls." The leaders of the Church must take care that only men of spiritual maturity and great abilities preach. These words of the Bridegroom are also a challenge to pastors. The believer will have to feed his kids beside the shepherds' tents. Can somebody feed the kids near you? Are you like Jesus, a good man on the bosom of whom others are able to rest?

We can take as an example Gheorge Calciu, the Rumanian Underground priest. He is Orthodox, but had warm brotherly relations with the persecuted Protestants. He was at one time a fellow-prisoner of mine. Arrested at the age of twenty-one, he spent twenty-two years in jail for belonging to a patriotic organization. In jail he suffered the worst torture. He was one of those forced to eat his own excrement and to drink his own urine. One could escape these atrocities by claiming to have been re-educated in the Communist spirit and proving it by torturing one's friends. Calciu cracked for a while under the pressure, but he received grace from God and he was converted. Freed, he became an Orthodox priest and a heroic one. All fear to which he had yielded for a while was gone. From great depths of sin he rebounded to the heights of holiness. Seminary students and other young people flocked to hear him preach. When the Communists locked the door of the seminary to prevent students from going to hear him, the students jumped in through the windows. The Communists locked the church; Calciu preached on its steps. He protested about the tearing-down of Orthodox churches in Bucharest and in the provincial towns, though he was warned that in Communist countries priests must be on the side of the atheists who are in power.

He continued his stand despite threats of detention in a lunatic asylum. Later he was sentenced to ten years in prison. Calciu valued courage, the rare gift of God, like a precious stone. From his story we can see that a man who has sinned can become a good pastor, near whose tents brides of Christ can feed their kids.

Pharaoh's chariots

The Bridegroom says to the bride, "I have compared you, O my love, to a company of horses in Pharaoh's chariots." With these words he rebukes the numerous believers who ignore the advice that they should follow in the footsteps of the flock. On first reading the comparison is hard to understand. How could he compare his beloved, "the most beautiful among women," to horses?

Solomon's Song is an ancient book, written in a time when people thought about animals differently to us today. Julius Caesar erected a marble effigy of his horse in a temple. The Emperor Nero nominated his horse to be a senator. The Emperor Caligula made his horse a consul and invited the animal to dinner and waited upon him.

In the Bible we find these words "The Lord of Hosts has visited his flock, the house of Judah, and has made them as his goodly horse in the battle" (ZEC 10:3). The patriarch Jacob pays his son a compliment by saying, "Issachar is a strong ass" (GEN 49:14). Jesus calls his believers "sheep."

There is nothing insulting in comparing a human being to an animal. Ancient Egypt was famous for its horses, which were the finest in the world, so the Bridegroom compared his beloved girl to a horse. But these words also contain a rebuke. Huge possibilities of spiritual victories lie ahead. He wishes to lead us in ~his~ chariot of trials. Seated there, we can conquer all fears, temptations and sins. But instead of accepting his invitation, we allow ourselves to be harnessed to the chariot of Pharaoh. We do not sit with him in the chariot. We have to pull it, and in it Pharaoh sits alone.

Why should we sweat in his service? Why should we draw his cart? Why should we be harnessed to the chariot of sin? Why be yoked in an uncomfortable yoke with unbelievers? Why does a believing soul need to stoop to dirty politics - even dirty ecclesiastical politics? You might only be a horse pulling the chariot of some unbelieving president or prime minister who cares nothing for you. What good are dishonest transactions and ugly amusements to you? Don't let yourself be harnessed to Pharaoh's chariot. Ride with the noblemen in Jesus' chariot of triumph.

Being harnessed to Pharaoh's chariot is not pleasant. Drawings from ancient bas-reliefs in the Nile region show that the ancient Egyptians did not understand the anatomy of the horse, nor the correct way to harness it. They attached the reins to the horse's throat, almost suffocating it. Instead of allowing its neck to be extended in the normal way, they held the head in line with its chest, sometimes pulled even back further. Just as the ancient Egyptians did not know the horse's anatomy, neither do Pharaohs know the intimate structure of a believer's soul. They harness these souls in a way that torments them.

It is sad that the Bridegroom must so rebuke his bride. There are Christians who support the terrorist Palestine Liberation Organization [PLO]. There are Jewish Christians in Israel supporting the anti-Arab measures of their government. There are Christians who support the Communist guerrilla movements in the Third World. Other Christians defend the Soviet persecutors of the Church or other dictatorships. Many believers are involved in unjust transactions, and extramarital relationships and in the world of amusement are in places where they should not be. It is sad that brides of Christ should be harnessed to Pharaoh's chariots!

How to rebuke

But even as he rebukes, the Bridegroom uses words of gentleness. He says, "I compare you, O my love, to a company of horses in Pharaoh's chariots." She who causes him sadness is addressed, "O my love." Let us also learn to sweeten our reproofs with good words. Praise must go hand in hand with rebuke.

In his Epistles St. Paul sometimes rebukes believers with great harshness, but his rebukes were accepted because they never arrived unaccompanied. They came with gentle words, expressing appreciation of the good qualities in the believers. Before rebuking them, he writes to the Romans, "First, I thank my God through Jesus Christ for you all, that your faith is spoken of throughout the whole world" (ROM 1:8); to the Philippians, "I thank my God upon every remembrance of you" (PHP 1:3); to the Thessalonians, "We give thanks to God always for you all, making mention of you in our prayers" (1TH 1:2). This is how one removes the bitterness of rebuke.

Antonina was the abbess of the women's convent in the town of Kizliar in the Soviet Caucasus. In the early days of the Revolution, when the plundering of monasteries was a common occurrence, a mob of Bolshevik bandits broke into the convent. They looted and destroyed, and shot dead several nuns who resisted them. The abbess Antonina fled to the convent of Vladikavkas; but posters were displayed locally offering a reward of 3,000 rubles to anybody reporting the whereabouts of the former abbess of Kizliar. The Communists could not trace her, though they suspected that she was concealed in another convent.

Time passed. Then a young girl arrived at the convent. With many tears she begged the abbess of Vladikavkas to take her in, saying that her father and mother had been killed and their estate burgled. She played the part so well that she succeeded in winning the confidence of the abbess who, out of sympathy, not only took the girl in and was kind to her but soon even confided to her the secret that Antonina was in hiding there.

Soon after this the girl disappeared. She had been an agent of the secret police, looking for Antonina. That night the militia surrounded the convent. Nobody could escape. They broke in to search, demanding that the abbess should be given up. When the two cell attendants went upstairs to tell Antonina what was happening, she said, "Well, what can I do? If it pleases the Lord that they find me, let it be so. But if it is not his will, he will close people's eyes; they, seeing me, will not see me. Come, we will go out in front of them."

The nuns put a sheepskin coat on her, and the three women went down the stairs and simply walked out of the convent gate, before the very eyes of all the Red Army soldiers. They had not gone far when they heard the commander shouting. "Who just went out of the gate? Who was let out?"

"We saw nobody," answered the soldiers.

"What do you mean?" retorted the angry commander. "Someone just left in a white sheepskin coat, accompanied by two nuns."

Before her martyr death several years later, Antonina met the girl who had informed on her. She did not start with words of rebuke, but said to her, "I valued very much the tears you shed when asking to be received as a nun in the convent. It is very difficult to fake tears. They must have come from a heart in whose depths there is a spark of genuine love for Christ. You have been misused. You were young, you did not know what you were doing. But God did not only see you denounce me. He heard those prayers which you said, in which not all was falsehood. There may have been an occasional note of sincerity. God will pity your soul; only repent." There was so much friendliness, spiritual beauty and complete lack of resentment in the words of Abbess Antonina that the girl's heart was pierced. She became a real believer in Christ. Let us also learn to rebuke like this.

Holy nonsense

The Bridegroom says, "Your cheeks are comely with rows of jewels, your neck with chains of gold" (SOS 1:10). The words "of jewels" and "of gold" have been added by the translators to make sense of the Hebrew text. They are not in the original. The authors of the ~Septuagint~, who were the first to translate the Old Testament into Greek, also tried to make sense of the text and wrote, "How beautiful are your cheeks as the turtledove's." But doves have no cheeks! The ~Targum~ - the Aramaic translation - renders it, "Your cheeks are comely with bridles." What does all this mean?

We are prejudiced. We think that everything in the Bible must make sense. If we don't find a meaning we invent one. But not all the Bible consists of logical, reasonable, purposeful thoughts. Much of it is the expression of a wide gamut of feelings, of reactions to events, or of impulse. Not all the Bible makes sense, and life and the human mind have their nonsensical features also. Nobody who fails to give nonsense a place can mirror the whole of reality in his religious writings. Depths of emotion cause lovers to talk a great deal of nonsense. How much of it there is in the conversation of Romeo and Juliet!

The simplest explanation is that Solomon wished to compliment his bride; saying, "Your cheeks are comely." They were so comely that instead of comparing them to something he just kissed them. But then he wanted to convey something more. He used the word ~batorim~, which can mean "turtledoves" or possibly "bridles." And then, instead of explaining himself further, he bestowed further kisses.

Then he said, "Your neck is chains." What would he have added? "Of gold"? Or did he, perhaps, imagine his bride with iron chains on her neck, bound to the poles or stakes on which she was to be sacrificed by her captors? Or did he see her chained like those unfortunate women who were driven from Africa to America in slavery, with iron chains round their necks? In any event, he did not continue. Her neck was too comely for him to think of it being so abused. He preferred to kiss it.

No life is complete without its nonsensical side. Let us sanctify it.

God's jewels

The Bridegroom promises the bride, "We will make you borders of gold with studs of silver" (SOS 1:11). God is a lover of beauty. He made his heavenly city of pure gold; its gates of pearls; its foundations of costly stones. The places where believers gathered for worship were to be beautiful also, the religious services solemn. The individual believer's soul must also have beauty, and this we can obtain through faith. The human soul cannot ornament herself. God is the one who ornaments and perfects her. God the Father, God the Son and God the Holy Spirit work at this; therefore the plural is used here: "~We~ will make ..."

God's jewels are unusual. Golden objects are normally given studs of costly stones or platinum, which increase their value. God gives them studs of silver, which decrease it. He gives us spiritual truth - which is gold - in the shape of simple human words, because otherwise we could not wear it. He made the Eternal Word, his Son, to have the body of an obedient servant, so that he could live among us. He puts studs of the silver of humility in the golden chains of the truth.

It is not always the most celebrated Christians - those who have studs of diamonds in their chains of gold - who are the best Christians. One of the best-known American evangelists published a "Ten-point plan for happiness." He started with "Love and be loved," forgetting that Jesus said, "You shall be hated for My name's sake." The evangelist went on: "Guard your health." How can you do that when you belong to the 60% of the world that is undernourished? He said: "Keep a sense of humour." How can those who are being tortured for their faith keep their sense of humour? Again: "Appreciate nature." This advice is given when many Christians are in underground jails where they never see the sun.

But there are other, humble Christians whose chains of gold have modest studs, perhaps of even less value than silver ones. Their names are not well known in the world, but they have proved to be heroes in times of great tribulation.

It is reported from China that a Christian in Manchuria protested at the Communists' indiscriminate killings. He was dragged into a people's court and accused of crimes against the people. Then the judge ordered those watching to march past him, beating him with clubs until he died. But the people refused, declaring, "He is a good man."

Changing tactics, the judge promised the man freedom if he would renounce Jesus. "Which do you choose," he demanded, "Jesus Christ - or Communism?"

"Jesus, Jesus, Jesus!" the Christian shouted back.

Then they took him to the riverbank for execution, and on the way he sang "Jesus loves me" and the twenty-third Psalm [PSA 23] set to Chinese music. He was shot in the back, but instead of falling forward on his face to grovel in the dust as victims usually do, he fell backwards, as if falling into the arms of Jesus. Reportedly the entire community was stirred by his testimony. [Jay and Emma Hefley, ~By Their Blood~, Mott Media Publishing House]

The name of this martyr is unknown in the Free World. He had lived in humility, and that is how he died. God so ordered it that the beauty of his soul should not become the object of human praise; but he is highly valued by God.

"My spikenard"

The bride says, "While the king sits at his table, my spikenard sends forth the smell thereof" (SOS 1:12). When the King enters the soul, the bride, like Mary of old, anoints the feet of the Bridegroom with a pure nard of gratefulness and adoration, and the world is filled with the perfume of the nard.

Nard or spikenard is made from a very small and despised plant. The fragrance from this plant comes from its root being trodden on or otherwise bruised. So, in the Church, the spiritual nard spreads its perfume only when it is bruised under the burden of the Cross.

The bride's spikenard sends forth its aroma only as long as the King sits at his table. As soon as Jesus ceases to be in your soul, the nard's fragrance disappears and the believer can no longer bring the good aroma of God to the world.

A Russian Orthodox priest named Dudko had been in jail for eleven years because he had preached what is in the Bible. His enemies nearly succeeded in killing him in a faked car accident. He continued without fear.

A Russian Christian named Orlov was imprisoned for his faith. He was fed on salted herrings and so would become very thirsty. But his captors would allow him a drink only eight hours later. Also he was not allowed to go to the lavatory when he needed it. I myself have spent fourteen years in Communist prisons, so I know what terrible torture this is. Treat yourself as he was treated, for a few hours. Then you will know what your brothers and sisters suffer.

The Russian Orthodox priest, Dudko, was re-arrested, after a period of liberty. This time he cracked and denied his convictions publicly on television. Orlov remained steadfast. Yet not only Orlov, but Dudko also served Christ! His sermons, and the books he wrote before he broke, have remained; and they continue to spread the perfume of Christ.

"A bundle of myrrh"

The bride says, "A bundle of myrrh is my well-beloved unto me; he shall lie all night betwixt my breasts" (SOS 1:13). Every word in this verse is full of significance. The Saviour is called, "my well-beloved." It has sometimes been asked whether Christianity is compatible with one political doctrine or another. Christianity is compatible with nothing! For Juliet, nothing else counted except Romeo. She never talked about anything else. He was the Beloved, the only one. So, too, Jesus should be our only Beloved.

It is remarkable that the bride says, "A bundle of myrrh is my beloved ~unto me~." No matter what Jesus might be for others, the bride says what he is for her. The apostle Thomas calls him "~My~ Lord and ~my~ God." No matter what he might be for others, for me he is Lord and God.

On one occasion the disciples told Jesus what men were saying about him - that he was John the Baptist, Elias, Jeremias or one of the prophets. But then Simon Peter added what Jesus was for him: "You are the Christ, the Son of the living God" (MTT 16:14-16).

The bride calls Jesus "a bundle of myrrh" - a bundle rather than a single stalk, because she found in him a multitude of qualities. There is no word in Hebrew for the English "face" in the singular. You can only say ~panim~, which means "faces." When the Bible says "Seek the face of God," it does so only in our translations. How easily believers of different Christian confessions would come to peace with one another if they would only realize that each believer has seen just one of the many faces of God, and that his brother has seen a different face! That is how they arrived at different convictions. The convictions do not exclude one another. Jesus is a bundle of myrrh; and it may be that the different confessions have each seen a different stalk.

In Communist countries Christians of many confessions suffer persecution. In Rumania the Orthodox priest, Calciu, Pitaru, a Christian from the Brethren assembly, Traian Dorz, from the Army of the Lord, the Pentecostal, Shamu, the Seventh-Day Adventist, Dragomir and the Catholic priest Godo all suffered in prisons and psychiatric asylums. They did not quarrel with one another there. They knew that Jesus is for them a bundle of myrrh.

The bundle which the bride keeps between her breasts is of myrrh, a plant with a bitter taste. Even if he brings her through fears and difficulties, she makes a place for him between her breasts. In the Orient women used to carry little bags of perfume there. The bride has replaced this bag with the sufferings he allows her to experience. They are dear to her. Theirs is the fragrance she likes best.

Between her breasts

She considers that the best place for the bundle of myrrh is between her breasts. Well-educated men do not usually speak or write easily about women's breasts. Some people have been offended because this book uses erotic imagery. Because of its erotic vocabulary the Song of Songs has been greatly misused. Rabbi Akiba, who died around 135 AD, cursed those who sang this song in taverns. It must have been a common happening, or he would not have needed to pronounce the curse. The Syrian theologian, Theodore of Mopsuestia in Cilicia (350-428), considered the Song of Solomon a worldly, obscene poem without dignity, allegedly written by King Solomon to defend his marriage to an Egyptian. But the Fifth Ecumenical Synod of 553 condemned Theodore and all his writings. Later the humanist theologian, Sebastian Castellio (1515-1563), was forced to leave Geneva because he had called Solomon's Song a worldly work. However, the Church has always insisted that it is a holy book, and has explained it allegorically.

We should not be offended at the mention of women's breasts. I can see no reason why the Creator of the breasts of women should not inspire a biblical author to write about them! The breasts are the prominent part of a woman's body. Jesus finds his rest between a believer's most prominent virtues. He expects all his disciples to be prominent in some way. He asks them, "What do you do more than others?" (MTT 5:47). Millions said of the works of Jesus, "Never have such things been seen." "Never man spoke like this man" (JHN 7:46). It should be possible to say the same of us. We must be prominent through fearless self-sacrifice, offering our own lives for the salvation even of our worst enemies. We must risk our lives even for the wicked, we must put them at stake in order to do any good at all.

We will see at the end of the Song the concern expressed by the believers over the fact that they have a little sister who has no breasts. They ask themselves, "What shall we do for our sister?" (SOS 8:8). Pastors of churches must be preoccupied about souls that do not become prominent through a gift. God speaks with satisfaction of the virgin of Israel, saying of her, "Your breasts are fashioned" (EZE 16:7). This means, in spiritual language, "You have become remarkable through exceptional deeds." Exceptional deeds are a pleasant resting place for God in a human soul.

The words "all night" in verse 13 [SOS 1:13] in the Authorized Version do not exist in the Hebrew. The correct text is, "He shall lie between my breasts" - period. Read it again - it could not say "all night." Where he is, there is no night.

"A cluster of camphire"

The bride says, "My beloved is unto me as a cluster of camphire in the vineyards of En-gedi" (SOS 1:14). Camphire is a kind of perfume reminiscent of the perfume of the grapes of En-gedi. It is interesting that the name of the plant, ~kopher~, is also the Hebrew word for "atonement." The Jews used to give the name "cluster" to men who possessed all the virtues and all the excellences.

The Jewish teachers in ancient times divided the first word in the expression, ~Eshkol kopher~, "a cluster of camphire," so arriving at ~Ish kol koper~, "a man who covers all," or "atones for all" - a fitting name for the Messiah. The most costly perfume which Jesus spreads about him is the fragrance of atonement for all sins through his sacrifice.

The author of the Song of Songs, contemplating the Saviour, remembers the vineyards of the En-gedi region. In Hebrew En-gedi means "the source of the goats." The region was so called because many wild goats lived in it. It was the region to which Solomon's father, King David, took flight when fleeing from his rival Saul, who pursued him to En-gedi but fell into the hands of David. It would have been easy for the latter to have taken revenge, but he forgave his adversary. When Solomon, David's talented son, reached maturity, a sentiment of piety led him to visit various historic scenes of his father's miraculous rise from the position of a shepherd to that of a glorious king of Israel.

A serpentine route descends with difficulty from the Judean deserts to this land through rocks and stones, eventually arriving at a little river which makes its way to the Dead Sea amidst rich vegetation and beautiful vineyards. David the fugitive would have refreshed himself with these grapes. Recalling his visit there, Solomon puts in the mouth of the bride a comparison between the Saviour and a grape of En-gedi. He also refreshes and gladdens the heart, and gives new life to the oppressed and persecuted of this world.

Jesus warned his disciples, "They will persecute you" (JHN 16:20). In this respect we all share King David's fate and we all need the comfort of the Saviour. Fifteen Roman emperors strove to eradicate the Christian faith from the world, using torture to intimidate the believers. Tender maidens and children received atrocious treatment.

Saint Agnes and Saint Priscilla, both thirteen years old, were torn by metal hooks, roasted on grills and crowned with red-hot helmets. In the persecution by Diocletian, 17,000 Christians were slain in a single month. In Egypt alone 144,000 of them were put to death and another 700,000 sent into exile. The total death toll reached 11,000,000, which means 30,000 a day.

But the extent of the slaughter did not bring panic to those Christians who survived, because they had the comfort of the vineyards of En-gedi, just as persecuted David had. Amidst the torment they retained their joy and their calm, so that Augustine wrote, "Every one of them seemed to be two people - one, somebody who suffers greatly, and also somebody who speaks words of gladness, of wisdom and of praising the Lord." This is why the blood of the martyrs became the seed of the Church; it caused the Church to grow.

In the sixteenth century hundreds of Christians in Japan died for their faith. Some were roasted over slow fires or cut to pieces. Others had their flesh torn with pincers. The necks of some were sawed through, little by little, over a period of a week, until they finally died. Others were buried alive or were frozen to death. But all these, too, enjoyed the grapes of the mystical vineyards of En-gedi.

While she was being buried alive, the Japanese Christian Tecla, held a three-year-old girl in her arms and encouraged her to meet death with the hope of paradise. A boy of nine opened his collar himself to offer his neck to the guillotine. A boy of five, woken from sleep by the executioner's henchmen, proudly dressed in his finest clothes and was carried in the executioner's arms to the place of death; he also offered his head to the beheading block.

page 72 The Sweetest Song

No Christian is alone during his tribulation; no one is left without comfort. Just before Betty and John Stam were captured to face martyrdom at the hands of Communist soldiers in the Anwhei Province of Red China, John Stam wrote to his father: "We're now in dangerous territory, but we're not afraid. The enclosed poem exactly expresses our feelings." The poem was by E.U.G. Hamilton, written at the time of the martyrdom in China of the missionary Vinson:

~Afraid? Of what?
To feel the spirit's glad release?
To pass from strain to perfect peace,
The strife and strain of life to cease?
Afraid - of that?

Afraid? Of what?
Afraid to see the Saviour's face,
To hear His welcome, and to trace,
The glory beam from wounds of grace?

Afraid – of that?

Afraid? Of what?
A flash - a crash - a pierced heart;
Darkness – light – Oh, Heaven's art!
A wound of His a counterpart!
Afraid – of that?~

The Bridegroom says, "Behold, you are fair, my love, you are fair; you have doves' eyes" (SOS 1:15). How strange is our relationship with our Bridegroom. Usually brides think of themselves as beautiful. Not the bride of Jesus. She says about herself, "I am black, I did not keep the vineyards of my beauty." In our union, it is the Bridegroom who convinces us that we are beautiful. He tells us, "Behold, you are fair, my love; behold, you are fair."

If he considers my soul to be beautiful, why should I worry about him ever rejecting me? We are beloved by him for our beauty. Holiness is always beautiful. Because of it we are beloved, even when we are greatly tempted, even if for a time we fall. Even if all men forsake us, we will be loved by him to the very end. He says, "Behold, you are fair." The bride is inclined to brood upon her blackness. He wishes us to know ourselves as he sees us – as beautiful. Humility is good only if it is a balanced humility. To overcome any doubt in us, he repeats himself: "You are fair ... you are fair."

The attributes in us which especially attract Jesus are our doves' eyes. He said, "~If~... your eye is clear, your whole body shall be full of light" (MTT 6:22). Whoever has clean eyes will be beloved by Jesus. The eyes should not even look towards evil; they should not be attracted by sin. They should betray no lust; they should not see the straw in someone else's eyes. They should be open to the glory of God and to the heavenly beauties. The bride has doves' eyes. Doves are chaste and faithful to their mates.

Oleg Miliutin, a Russian Orthodox, was six times committed to psychiatric institutions for openly declaring his Christian faith. He was gagged and beaten and put in a straightjacket. He did not yield.

Khrapov, of the underground Soviet Baptist Church, resumed his evangelistic work after twenty years' confinement. A second eight-year term of imprisonment followed and then another. He died in jail, as an unbroken child of God, having spent a total of thirty-four years suffering for Christ. For a time he had led the underground Baptist Church while in hiding. Then he wrote a book which has the amazing title, ~The Happiness of a Sacrificed Life.~

He had doves' eyes. He had no bitter words for torturers or traitors. He looked on life with good eyes. There are so many beautiful things to think about, and his book speaks about them. Christ loves such souls great]y.

Not only the eyes but also the whole nature of the faithful soul is that of a dove. A dove will not sit on the green branch, will not drink fresh water, will not seek shade and will avoid the company of other birds until it finds its companion. So also is the bride of Christ, so long as she is separated from her Bridegroom.

On the green bed or in the house

The bride says, "Behold, you are fair, my beloved, yea, pleasant: also our bed is green." The Bridegroom replies, "The beams of our house are cedar, and our rafters of fir" (SOS 1:16-17). The bride, inebriated with happiness because of the loving words which have been spoken to her, says, "You are fair, my beloved, yea, pleasant." He is fair and pleasant. Many males are handsome but not pleasant; many are pleasant but not handsome. Jesus has both qualities.

Then she invites him, saying, "Our bed is green." In the midst of nature, among the blooming of lilies and the chirping of birds, upon the green grass which is a witness to the care of God towards his creatures, there the faithful soul wishes to give Jesus her love. She calls the bed, "our bed," and he will call the house, "our house." Between the bride and Jesus there is a community of goods - everything which is hers is his; everything which is his is hers.

The people of Israel knew Solomon's Song, but when Jesus once commanded them to sit on the grass, they did not remember the Scripture. They ate on the grass; their hunger was satisfied; but they did not give him their love. At picnics today on the green grass there's plenty to eat and drink and we too fail to give him our love.

The Bridegroom puts forward an alternative to the green bed. The house of cedar wood is durable and does not rot. The rafters there are of fir, a fine wood used in palaces. In the Sermon on the Mount Jesus invites those who belong to him to enter into the closet (MTT 6:6). There, in quiet, we shall enjoy the love of God.

Christians can enjoy communion with him not only in nice homes, but also in prison cells. A Soviet prisoner wrote:

> When I entered jail, in mockery I was given gigantic shoes and clothes twice my size. The sleeves reached my knees. I looked like a clown or scarecrow. When I entered the barracks, the criminals, incited by the camp commander, greeted me with laughter and ridicule.
>
> A prisoner bowed, in fake piety. "I greet you, holy Father; you are the ambassador of Christ Himself. Do you represent the interests of heaven?"
>
> The mocking words gave me courage. Forgetting how I looked, I told them I indeed represented heaven, for which the atheists imprisoned me. While preaching to those despising sinners, the sermon affected me too. I wanted to embrace them for having reminded me of my high calling.
>
> Many fear suffering. In the past I, too, feared. But the presence of the Lord in jail has given me so many happy experiences that I would not have changed them for years of easy living in freedom.

This man has known the discreet embraces of Jesus not in a house of cedar wood, but in a Communist prison cell.

÷ Chapter 2 ÷

Before going on to the second chapter, there are a few general considerations to be made concerning Solomon's Song. Origen, who died around 253 AD, really began the Christian allegorical interpretation of this book. Later a Mariological interpretation was devised by Ambrose (339-397), in which the bride of the Song was considered to be prophetic of Mary. From then on, commentaries either chose between these two possibilities or combined them.

As I have already said, the Church took very harsh action against those who considered the Song of Songs to be an ordinary worldly book. The Song contains not only religious teaching but also a very simple human message. Any young man who cannot love a girl wholeheartedly, and any girl who cannot love a man passionately, is not yet ready to be a marriage partner. And with such an attitude they will not be able to properly love their friends, their parents or their children.

The Song teaches a healthy attitude towards sex. Whoever is ashamed to think about sex ought also to be ashamed of the woman who gave him or her birth or of the child whom he fathers or the babe to whom she gives birth. Most of all, such people ought to be ashamed of their own sexuality. There is nothing wrong in sexual life, just as there is nothing wrong in any bodily function. Jesus had a body with all the organs and instincts we have, only he was never dominated by sin. God has ordained sexual life; he wills that there should be love between the sexes. The ~Zohar~ says: "Sexual pleasure with your wife is a religious pleasure, and one which gives joy to God, too. Performed with gladness, the religious duty of conjugal intercourse, in the presence of God's glory [the ~Shekinah~], gladdens your wife for the sake of the honour of the heavenly partner."

We should not be offended that there is so much carnal love in the Song of Solomon. The body as well as the soul is created after the image of God. Our creed says that the body will be resurrected as well as the soul. Orthodox mystics speak about "the holy flesh," because the flesh will have a part in resurrection. Jesus loved not only the souls of men, but their flesh too. Why should he not speak of the bodily charms of his bride? Justin the Martyr wrote, "If the flesh were to be useless, why did Christ heal it? Why did He resurrect the dead? When He resurrected Lazarus and the young man in Nain and the young girl, He resurrected them soul and body."

Solomon wrote 1,005 songs (1KI 5:12). Only one has remained; it is probably the most beautiful. Film actors often perform before the cameras for six or seven hours a day to produce only two or three minutes of film. Very little of what we produce in life is of high value and will endure, but it is worthwhile to write a thousand songs in order that one might be a masterpiece. We witness to many about Christ; we do many works for his kingdom. Very few of these activities have any lasting result. But those few are worth all the effort.

A carpenter witnessed to me about Christ. He died knowing that he had brought only my wife and me to faith. But we brought others to Christ; those, again, brought others; those again, others. The result is that there are now Hebrew Christian churches in Haifa, Tel-Aviv and Jerusalem which have as their true founder that carpenter. He witnessed to many without result, but he brought one to Christ who brought others, and those others brought others. Some of them became interested in helping the persecuted Christians in Communist countries. That is how a Christian mission to the Communist world began.

A little-known preacher, Mordecai Ham, brought to Christ a young boy whose name was Billy Graham. Billy Graham in his turn brought thousands upon thousands to Christ. Mordecai Ham may have witnessed to many people. He may not have had big results. But one of those won by him was exceptional. He was Ham's Song of Songs. I would encourage you to write many songs. One of them will be your Song of Songs.

Finally, we should note that in the Song, the Bridegroom is sometimes called a king, and the bride a queen. Sometimes he is a shepherd; sometimes they are workers in the vineyard. Sometimes they are in a palace; sometimes in the field. This teaches that people of all social classes are called to participate in spiritual life at the highest level.

"I am the rose of Sharon" (SOS 2:1)

Jewish commentators agree that the subject of these words is God's chosen people. Christian commentators are divided; some attribute them to the Saviour, others to the Church. What good does the debate achieve?

Only one reality exists: Godhead, which for the sake of expediency we divide into a "He" and an "I." Pronouns have no place in real religious life. They are only for everyday usage. Jeremiah writes, "This is his name whereby ~he~ shall be called, ~The Lord~ Our Righteousness" (JER 23:6). But he also writes, "And this is the name wherewith ~she~ shall be called, The ~Lord~ Our Righteousness" (JER 33:16). Who is "Jehovah our Righteousness?" Is it God? Is it his Church? Foolish questions. When we sit with the Father and the Son on His throne as it is promised to us (REV 3:21), who will be able to make a distinction then?

Nothing in the Hebrew corresponds to the "am" in the words "I am." The verb "to be" is little used in Hebrew. To understand what that means, one has to try to read the Song of Songs omitting words such as "have," "has," "am," "is," and "are."

Nothing "is"; everything changes. Heraclitus said, "Nobody can bathe twice in the same river." Neither can anybody say of Jesus what he is. "He has no form" (ISA 53:2). The rose of Sharon evokes him - but so do a lamb, a shepherd, the lion of Judah, a piece of bread in Communion. He is king, judge, high priest, victim, bridegroom, vine, brother.

The removal of the word "is" from one's religious vocabulary saves one from the sin of judging. Nobody is ~only~ a bad man or a criminal, just as nobody is ~only~ a dentist. The dentist is also a father or mother; a Briton or Indian; a twentieth-century person; a Christian or Buddhist; a Socialist or Conservative; a virtuous or bad man, and so on. The word "is" fixes a person to a single attribute. Life is not like that. No crook is ~only~ a crook. He can also be a man full of remorse, an incipient saint. No apostle is ~only~ an apostle; he can also be a lover of money, a trait which will transform him into a Judas. Hebrew, the language of Solomon's Song teaches us to think without the verb "to be."

The flowers

"I am the rose of Sharon and the lily of the valleys" (SOS 2:1) Jesus compares himself to flowers. He also compares his bride to a lily (SOS 2:2). He says that he is like a rose. The rose is distinguished from all other flowers by the fact that it blooms in different climates and different soils. So

is present in many countries, in many climates, in liberty and in persecution, in poverty and in abundance, in sickness and in health.

Roses exist in a great many colours - white, pink, purple, violet, black. The souls who reflect Jesus are also very different, and belong to different religious denominations. Only blue roses, having the colour of heaven, do not exist. So we do not have to be excessively sad about the fact that we are not yet fully heavenly! There has never yet been a blue rose. Let us strive onward, without despairing because of our weakness.

To the Greeks, the rose was a plant of love, consecrated to the goddess Venus. Comparing himself to just such a rose, Jesus is telling us that he is a lover.

The Hebrew word translated "lily" is ~havatzelet~. This is a particular flower called by botanists ~colchicum autumnale~ or ~filius ante patrem~ ("the son before the father") because it has the distinctive characteristic of blossoming before its leaves appear. The ~havatzelet~ is a symbol of men whose character is the opposite of those Jesus meant when he cursed the fig tree which had rich foliage but no fruit. Those men are hypocrites, having much self-advertisement and an appearance of religion, but without its love and joy. Jesus is ~filius ante patrem~. With him, and with those who belong to him, the fruits come first and the leaves afterwards.

~Havatzelet~ is a flower which you find in Israel at every step; a flower without much outward beauty; a fitting symbol for the one who came into this world having divested himself of his divinity, living as a humble servant. The saints of God are also humble like Jesus, without added ornamentation. They are also like ~havatzelet~.

The Christian Mission to the Communist World operates in Red China. Its co-workers there accept only used clothing and minimal salaries. They explain: "Otherwise, we might become attached to things." One of them spent many years in jail working ten hours a day barefoot in an iron mine, because she had written music for the Gospel of Luke. I heard a tape of her first song after she was released from jail. It was like hearing an angel's song. Now she gathers 300 ladies together every Sunday. The leader of the Underground Church in that region sometimes covers 800 miles by bicycle to visit all the groups. But these Christians do not wish their names to be made known, and they refuse every small amenity of life. They accept only the simplest things.

~Shir-Hashirim-Rabba~, an old Jewish commentary on the Song of Songs, explains Jesus' comparison of himself with a lily of the valleys thus: "As the lily withers when it is burned by the sun, but flourishes when it is wetted by the dew, the same Israel withers, as long as it lives in the shadow of Esau; but in the future world when the shadow of Esau will have disappeared, it will be full of sap." Hosea writes, "I will be as the dew unto Israel: he shall grow as the lily" (HOS 14:5).

Pliny says of the lily, "It has a weak body which is not adequate to bear the weight of the head." In the same way, the Church is slender and weak. Christ is too big for her. He has to bend like the head of the lily because of this.

Jesus tells us he is "the lily ~of the valleys~." I myself have had a beautiful encounter with him in the deep valleys of suffering. When I was in solitary confinement in a Communist prison, without a Bible, I prayed that the Lord might speak to me directly. Then I heard his voice asking me, "What is your name?" I had always known that my name was Richard. But I could not say this to Jesus, because I knew about another man who had borne this name.

Saint Richard was a Christian who lived in times of persecution. He was sentenced to death for his faith. When he was on the gallows, the hangman had some difficulty fixing the noose of the rope. Richard bowed. "I am a farmer, and skilled in these matters," he said gently. "Please allow me to help you." The hangman responded courteously and allowed Richard to attend to it.

After fixing the noose he thanked the executioner for his kindness, assured him that he bore him no grudge, and so died.

I did not have the courage to tell Jesus I bore the name of such a saint, because I was so unlike him.

We all bear beautiful names, names as Mary, Paul or John, of which we are not worthy because we are not immaculate, zealous or loving like those who bore those names before us. So I bowed before Jesus and said, "I have no name. I long to bear yours." To renounce the self and allow Christ to be your personality is the secret of a victorious life.

Jesus does not put such questions to you, nor does he stir you up to see their seriousness, except in deep valleys; and it is only in deep valleys that he unites himself with you to take your place, so that you in your turn might become a lily, even as he is.

Thorns and daughters

The Bridegroom says, "As the lily among thorns, so is my love among the daughters" (SOS 2:2). God and his people pay each other the most beautiful compliments. Israel tells his Creator: "Who is like unto you, O Lord, among the gods? Who is like you, glorious in holiness, fearful in praises, doing wonders?" (EXO 15:11). Here God tells Israel that in his eyes she is a beautiful flower. He does not compare her to the rose which has thorns, but only to the lily which has none. Most souls are like thorns, without value or use. They prick, like the thorns in Jesus' crown. In the end, they will be burned. But not all souls persist in evil; amid the thorns there are roses.

The Bridegroom has among the girls one who is his own beloved; and, just as when he was crucified on Golgotha near a garden, the flowers remained faithful to him, sending their perfume to the cross to refresh him, so now the lily-shaped soul of his bride is his comfort and his source of strength.

Beautiful as lilies

Jesus teaches us to look closely at spiritual believers, and learn from them. He said in the Sermon on the Mount, "Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin: and yet I say unto you, that even Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these" (MTT 6:28-29). Those who have the happiness of finding teachers whom God sends, grow beautifully; the teachers' own secret consists of "feeding the kids beside the shepherds' tents" (SOS 1:8). The Scripture says that Jesus has given some to be our bishops; others, pastors; others, evangelists; others, teachers who will help us to grow in all respects. They give us to be "in Jesus" . In Him, the whole building of the Church grows to become a holy temple of God.

Christians who suffer in Communist prisons for the Holy Faith are examples of how we ought to live and are good teachers for us. A Christian named V. Petkus, was tried in a Communist court in Soviet Lithuania. No friend was allowed to attend. Petkus refused to take any part in the trial. Guards had to drag him forcibly into the courtroom. He would not accept an attorney and would not speak a single word in his own defence (neither would I, when I stood trial). The charge which was manufactured against him was a base one. Like Joseph in the Old Testament who was, though innocent, sent to jail under the accusation of attempted rape, so Petkus was charged with homosexuality because he gathered young men together in his home to teach them the faith.

We have not become like the lilies yet; therefore we protest loudly whenever the slightest harsh word is said against us. On the other hand, Petkus was happy because Jesus loved him, Jesus knew him, Jesus appreciated him. He did not say one single word to prove that what was said about him by evil men was untrue.

It is a habit of the Communists to invent numerous charges against believers. Sister Arbutenko was charged with ritual murder; Solzhenitsyn, with incest; the Bulgarian Pentecostal pastors Ladin and Haralan Popov, with counter-revolutionary spying activities and the arrest of Communists under the old regime. The Hungarian Cardinal Mindszenty had allegedly speculated in foreign currency - I, too, was accused of similar crimes. A group of Baptists in Russia received jail sentences because it was claimed that they had plotted to spread disease among the population by baptizing people in the same river, giving Communion with the same cup and giving each other the holy kiss.

Although fools may have believed such accusations spread by evil men, the lily-shaped saints did not defend themselves. Their purity spoke for itself. Those who knew Brother Petkus said as much before the court: "We know him to be a good Christian and an honest man. We have nothing else to declare. We believe like him, and have done the same things. If they are considered wrong, we too should be prisoners like him." They answered no questions. Outside, many young people sang for hours in the street. Petkus was sentenced to ten years of prison, plus five years of deprivation.

Under his shadow

The bride says, "As the apple tree among the trees of the wood, so is my beloved among the sons. I sat down under his shadow with great delight, and his fruit was sweet to my taste" (SOS 2:3). We desire to sit down under his shadow. When it is very hot, one finds great comfort in sitting in the shadow of a tree. The angel told the virgin, "the power of the Highest shall overshadow thee" (LUK 1:35). She, too must have sat in this shadow with great delight. At the time of the apostles, it was a great privilege for men that the shadow of Peter should pass over them because they were healed by it. Similarly it is happiness for us to sit in the shadow of Jesus, especially in the shadow of Golgotha, where he obtained for us the forgiveness of our sins by dying for us.

It is said of St. Jerome that he always studied and wrote in the shadow of a large cross. Once he was asked why he did so. He replied, "This tree of life gives me a shadow which shades me from all evil; it gives me fruit to strengthen me in everything which is good. I desire to spend my whole life in its shadow, and I long that its fruit should always nourish my soul."

The important thing is that one should not push oneself to the fore. The Virgin, when overshadowed by the Holy Spirit, remained in the shadows. Most martyrs for Christ remain in the shadows. They are anonymous. Their names will never be known on earth.

~Frankfurter Allgemeine~, the West German newspaper, announced on 17 October 1978 that in Ethiopia, Communists sew up the eyes of Christian prisoners or gouge them out. It might well be expected that in such extremities of terror, every Christian activity would cease. In the Free World, the slightest setback is sometimes enough to discourage us from church activity. How much more then, in situations of fear, where the flesh recoils before the prospect of appalling pain or death under torture, might one expect the Christians to give up.

However, in Ethiopia just the reverse happened. Christians whose names are unknown to anybody in the Free World - who remain in the shadows so that Jesus might shine - are busy with Bible distribution as never before. They spread the Scriptures, knowing that they might be dipped in burning oil as a result of doing so.

Let us, also, sit down in the shadow of the apple tree. There we will see that its fruit which represents the Word of God, is sweet to our taste. As PSA 119:103 says, "How sweet are thy words unto my taste! Yea, sweeter than honey to my mouth!"

The banqueting house

The bride says, "He brought me to the banqueting house, and his banner over me was love" (SOS 2:4). The Church is a banqueting house. God brings us into this happy place, into which we would not otherwise have come. The soul which was satisfied to sit quietly in his shadow is now brought to greater joys. In his banqueting house we will know what it means to become inebriated with his love. He has prepared for us not merely meals but banquets, with meat, milk and wines available without payment.

The great mystics and saints can be our guides towards this banqueting house. Their examples teach us that, when the Holy Spirit enters into a heart and there for the first time ignites the fire of love, that fire gives birth to an insatiable thirst. Then the believer says, "As the hart pants after the water brooks, so pants my soul after thee, O God" (PSA 42:1). As the hart's thirst is even greater when pursued, so is the believer's thirst for God under temptation. The thirsty hart plunges his whole body into the water and drinks his fill; we must eat and drink our fill in God's banqueting house.

St. John of the Cross wrote, "May we forget about ourselves. When we are intoxicated by his presence, we will feel that we can do miracles, that we can pass through fire and water, and that we can remain unafraid when thousands of swords are drawn against us. By his grace, we won't fear anymore - neither life nor death, joy nor sorrow. We will be drunk with faith.

This is called "jubilation." Sometimes you smile, sometimes you weep, and sometimes you sing. Those rational people who have no idea what the Holy Spirit does with those who belong to him ask, "How can you be so mad?" Our reply is, "God has permitted us to drink in his banqueting house!" But they cannot understand such a thing. The soul who has been in God's banqueting house knows unspeakable joy. He rejoices even for the pain he must endure. Whatever is done to him, however well or ill he fares, he is always peaceful and joyous. Rivers of living water flow from his heart." Saint John of the Cross sang:

I drank from my well-beloved and when I walked out,
I knew nothing more of this whole field;
and I had lost the flock which I had followed before.

My soul has put itself,
with all its resources,
into His service.
Now I have no flock anymore;
I have no duties anymore
Because my whole duty consists in loving.

The banner of love

As conquerors hoist their flag over conquered cities, Jesus hoists his flag over the souls he has conquered. It is a unique flag, a flag of love. "His banner over us is love." It is a persistent, unvarying love. He longs to see this love expressed in the way we behave towards one another.

The famous Egyptian hermit, St. Macarius, once asked God what degree of holiness he had attained after several years of fasting, prayer, solitude and sacrifice. He fell asleep, and an angel appeared to him and told him that he was still far from having reached the degree of holiness which had been attained by a certain pair of women, and that he should learn from them a better way.

Macarius went into town and found the women. They were not nuns; just ordinary housewives. "What is the secret of your holiness?" he asked them. They wondered at the question. They were very busy caring for their husbands and their several children. They had little time to pray. Because of the amount of work they had to do, they often missed church. They were illiterate and so could not read Holy Scripture. They were simple-minded and could not meditate much. They were as they described themselves: "poor wives amidst constant worldly cares."

Macarius continued to make enquiries about them and discovered that they were married to two brothers. They lived together under the same roof, not once quarrelling, or permitting harsh words to pass between them. From this St. Macarius learned that living together in love, passing through all frictions without ever saying a harsh word or throwing a harsh look, can be more graceworthy in the eyes of God than a great deal of fasting and prayer. The banner over us is love.

In the Jilava prison in Rumania, several prisoners were put naked into a cell without beds, without blankets and without a barrel to serve as a lavatory. They were never allowed to leave their cell to fulfill their bodily needs. Imagine passing the night, completely naked, in such a stinking cell.

One of the prisoners was sick with pulmonary tuberculosis. Late one night, he could not bear to stand on his feet any longer. He fell, and would have frozen to death on the cold concrete, had not the Christian Mircea Vulcanescu, used all his powers of persuasion to convince the sick man that he, Vulcanescu, was perfectly healthy. Therefore he would stretch himself out on the concrete and the sick man would then be able to seat himself on his body and have the protection of his bodily warmth.

Vulcanescu's insistence was so great that the sick man could not resist indefinitely, and he accepted. Vulcanescu remained stretched out naked on the concrete while the sick man slept for a few hours. He too fell asleep. When they awoke, Vulcanescu was almost frozen. The other prisoners had spent the entire night moving around without sitting on the concrete. Vulcanescu contracted pulmonary tuberculosis himself. Soon after this he died, but he demonstrated that the Saviour's banner over us is love.

In Florence, in Italy, the Red Brigade leader Furbelone planned a bank robbery - what the Brigade terms an "expropriation." Two revolutionaries disguised as policemen stood at the entrance to the building, while two others entered to force the teller to give up the money. A car with a false licence number waited in front of the bank to ensure the escape. Furbelone himself, disguised as a beggar, sat on the steps of the Santa Maria Church opposite the bank, from which post he was to give the signals controlling the operation.

Just as he was about to signal the start of the robbery, a little girl at her mother's side, on her way to school, ascended the steps for a short prayer. Seeing the beggar, she took her lunch out of her bag, broke off a part for herself, and gave him the remainder.

Irritated by this interruption in his plans, Furbelone intended to push the girl aside. But all at once he was struck by the thought: This is a human being who looks upon me with love, who considers me honest and worthy of esteem. Instead of giving the signal to start the robbery, the notorious terrorist took the sandwich from the smiling girl and entered the church with her. His criminal life was over.

A man does not lack possessions if he gives to the poor. This little girl obtained the double blessing of bringing a soul to Christ and of stopping a serious crime.

"Comfort me"

The bride says, "Stay me with flagons, comfort me with apples: for I am sick of love" (SOS 2:5). The bride must be strengthened to bear the embraces of the Bridegroom. The archangel Gabriel said to the Holy Virgin, "The power of the Highest shall overshadow you" (LUK 1:35), in order that she might bear the descent of the Holy Spirit upon her. It is written of John the Baptist that he would walk before the Saviour in the Spirit and in the power of Elijah. So we can see that we must be empowered to bear spiritual love. Showers of blessing are not easily borne.

Ezekiel says, "The Spirit entered into me and set me upon my feet" (EZE 3:24). Saint Ephrem knew such jubilation that he cried, "God, take your hand away from me for a little, because my heart is too weak to bear such a joy." Saint Peter, when he saw Jesus work a miracle, fell at his feet saying, "Depart from me; for I am a sinful man, O Lord" (LUK 5:8). A sinful man has not the power to witness the beautiful magnificence of the Lord. We who know his embraces need power. Those who pass through great suffering for his sake need power too.

In Maputo in Mozambique many Christians were jailed. Some were natives, others were from Zimbabwe, South Africa, Portugal and America. The torturer Karonga used to torment the prisoners in the following way: He ordered his soldiers to tie the hands of the prisoner tightly behind his back with string. His arms were wrenched up to the height of his chest, and then tied in such a way that if he moved at all the string would cut cruelly into his flesh. For a few minutes the prisoner sat in agony, and then the soldiers poured water into his gaping wounds and rubbed salt into them. The prisoner would roll about on the ground in absolute torment. The other prisoners were forced to sit nearby and watch. No one was allowed to go to the victim's aid.

Prisoners were almost eaten alive by mosquitoes, lice and bedbugs. They had to work as slaves in labour camps with only three or four hours for proper sleep. Girls were raped. Sometimes prisoners were unable to wash for a month. When they insisted on being allowed to wash they were taken to a river that was full of crocodiles. There the Communists forced some of the men into the water.

In the prisons of Mozambique, we have brothers and sisters who are spread-eagled on the ground and beaten, or hung from trees by their feet. Many die from exhaustion, tetanus and snake bites. Without strength from God, they could not bear these tortures for his sake. Without strength from on high, they could not bear his embraces either.

The bride is sick of love. Her love is passionate. In the Orient, the sickness of love is much more widespread than in Europe or America. It is written of David's son, Amnon, that "he fell sick for his sister Tamar" (2SM 13:2). Men can die from this sickness. The bride asks to be stayed with flagons, a kind of pie made of the grapes which have had the juice pressed out of them. These flagons were usually brought as offerings to Ishtar, the Babylonian goddess of love. The bride also asks to be strengthened with apples. But she will soon discover that the sickness of love cannot be cured with pressed grapes or apples. It can only be cured by the presence of the Most Beloved. Our thirst for Jesus is not quenched but merely soothed by his gifts which are a foretaste of the happiness we will possess in his presence in heaven.

Don't envy the bride

We become jealous when we hear of somebody having such love as the bride's, which is so passionate that it even makes her ill. But not everyone has to have such a richness of feeling, with which also comes great responsibilities. Men are of different types. With some, the power of reasoning predominates; with others, the imaginative faculty. One will have little judgement but rich imaginative powers; another, the gift of penetrating intellect but cold emotions. It is wrong to envy what another possesses. We must consecrate to God the gifts that we possess. The Lord accepts various attitudes.

Pastor Son was imprisoned in Korea during the Japanese occupation. A guard wanted to help him, and told the prosecutor, who was questioning the pastor, "He performs the rites at the Shinto shrines faithfully." (The Japanese had imposed on the Korean people the obligation to bow before the image of the emperor at these shrines; they considered him to be the god of all the earth.)

If Pastor Son had only kept silent, he would have been freed. But he contradicted the guard. "That is not so," he said. "I have never taken part in shrine worship."

The prosecutor was perplexed. "It has been nearly three years since you've seen your family. Don't you want to see them? Will you not give up your obstinate ideas?"

Pastor Son replied, "I can't give up my faith."

"Haven't three years of suffering made any difference to you at all?"

"A Christian faith grows stronger through suffering," replied the pastor. "So it has done me good to be in prison. I do not mind what happens. If I return home, Christ will be with me; and if I stay in prison, he will still be with me." Pastor Son's was one possible attitude in the circumstances - the attitude of a perfect lover of Jesus. On the other hand, other Christians used their reasoning powers and by giving clever answers tried to escape suffering if possible.

During World War II, Protestant Christians were greatly persecuted in Rumania, which was under Nazi domination. A preacher was brought before the police inspector. "Do you preach love?" he asked.

The Christian replied, "I do."

"Do you also preach that one should love one's enemies?"

"Indeed I do. That is the teaching of Jesus."

And now came the big question. "Then do you also love the soldiers of the Soviet army?"

The preacher knew that if he answered "Yes," when the Soviet army was fighting against Rumania, it would mean certain imprisonment. So he answered: "How can you ask me whether I love the Soviet army? Our country is at war with them."

The police inspector was very pleased. He said, "You are a real patriot."

During the War the services of Baptists, Adventists, Pentecostals and other denominations were forbidden in Rumania. A Christian was asked by a police inspector, "Do you still gather for worship?" He replied, "Christian gatherings are forbidden now."

The inspector shook him by the hand, saying "I am happy that you are a law-abiding citizen."

Such Christians had not stood up clearly for the truth; neither had they told a lie. They simply used a trick, and they succeeded. Some used stratagems determined by reason, whereas the attitudes of some were dictated only by passionate love. In no circumstances would the latter compromise.

Passionate love is not the only possible attitude towards Christ. He receives also those who are attached to him instead by their reasoning powers.

His embrace

The bride says, "His left hand is under my head, and his right hand does embrace me" (SOS 2:6).

In Solomon's Song, the loving bride is also wise. She knows that, according to biblical symbolism, the left side is the side of God's rigour, while the right side is the side of compassion. Therefore she lies down to the left of her Beloved, among the sinners. Putting her head upon his left arm, she immobilizes this side, she incapacitates his severity, and he has only his right hand free - the caressing hand of love.

There is great variety in the experiences of believers. The Carmelite nun, Anne of St. Bartholemew (1549-1626), companion of Teresa of Avila, wrote in her biography:

> Christ the Lord appeared to me in the shape in which He walked on this earth. He was exceedingly handsome, though He seemed very sad. Approaching me, He put His right hand on my left shoulder with an unspeakable weight, which I could never explain to anybody. Thus He caused His pain and suffering to enter into my heart, and He said to me, "Behold the souls I lose." He challenged me to work for the salvation of souls, and showed me all France so impressively and so clearly that it was as though I were present in every place; and I saw how many millions of souls are lost. This happened in a single moment, and if it had lasted any longer I feel my life would have ended.

Christ put his hand on her to make her share his pain. It was different with the bride in the Song. He used his right hand only to embrace her.

Being thus reassured, the bride can fall asleep with his left hand under her head. Her soul is in sweet communion with Jesus; angels watch around them.

An army of roes

Her last words before falling asleep are, "I charge you, O you daughters of Jerusalem, by the roes, and by the hinds of the field, that you stir not up, nor awake my love, till he please" (SOS 2:7). The oath is made by the roes and the hinds of the field because they are symbolic of the Beloved, and because they are timid creatures which must not be troubled when their time of love comes.

The Hebrew word for "roes" is ~sabaot~. One of God's names is ~Jehovah Sabaot~, which means "The Lord of Hosts." So ~Sabaot~ means both "roes" and "hosts," which is very strange. It shows that God's army is an army apart. Roes are shy, timid creatures which attack nobody. They have conquered the hearts of many nature lovers, poets and painters by their beauty. God's army is like an army of roes.

But what of the many military exploits of the Jewish army under Moses, Joshua and David? Consider the Salvation Army of today. It speaks in military language. Its magazine is called ~The War Cry~. The Army is composed of corps instead of churches. Instead of preachers it has officers. In its beginning, its vocabulary was entirely military. It boasted that it had "assaulted" places of sin, that it had "taken prisoners," and so on. The Salvation Army fights in order to bring people to peace with God.

The army of Israel is also meant to be an army of peace, but this is a phenomenon so unique that there are no words to describe its battles. It has to speak of its works of peace in the language of men of war, in much the same way that modern microphysics continually uses the language of classical physics, even though the scientists know that that language does not describe the facts of microphysics. The physicists have not yet had time to develop a new vocabulary.

So when we read in the Bible of "the sword of the Lord," of armed and bloodthirsty angels, of a carnage prepared by God himself, we must understand that the exploits of God's roes – unarmed, shy, loving creatures, who would rather die than attack anybody – are spoken of in military terms only because humans have no other appropriate language.

The sleep of faith

Taken literally, we have here a demand to the friends of the bride that they must not disturb the nuptial joy of the young pair during the seven days of the wedding feast. It is an unkind act to wake somebody from sleep for no good important reason. It is even worse to trouble a believing soul sleeping the quiet sleep of faith, in the protecting arms of Jesus. That soul is in communion with the Lord, and whoever prods him will get his punishment, whoever he might be.

What a wonderful sleep this is! Scripture teaches us that for the soul who sleeps trustfully, believing in the One who considers the sinner to be just, his faith; his quiet sleep is accounted as righteousness. God delights in this quiet loving sleep of faith. There is no activity which he prefers to it. Nobody is allowed to disturb the ecstasy of love. The soul must not be stirred up or awakened.

To stir up and to awake are two different things. The one who awakes only calls the sleeper, who then has to conquer sleep himself. The one who stirs him up makes a better job of it; he forces him to come out of sleep. Both are forbidden when somebody sleeps in the arms of Jesus.

Many things trouble the quiet sleep of Christian faith. In Communist countries it is troubled by the stooges of the Communists among the clergy. Bingh, the Catholic bishop of Saigon (now Ho Chi Minhville) and a Communist stooge, published the following statement in the Communist newspaper ~Humanit,~: "Previously, Catholics have had strong prejudices against revolutionaries. The propaganda of the former regime presented the Communists as the destroyers of all religions. Now we have seen the reality. Our church is the victim of no persecution." But he surely knew about the mass graves filled with the bodies of thousands of people killed by the Viet Cong in Hue and Quang Tri. He knew that his parishioners were forced to denounce one another, or else face imprisonment. He knew about the parents who had killed their children to keep them from falling into the hands of godless Communists.

Bishop Bingh knew what had happened to his own Catholics. The convents in Thu Duc were closed. Clergymen were arrested; all the monks in Mossard and the Trappists in Phuoc-Son and Phuoc-ly were jailed. They all fell asleep quietly in their prison cells, trusting in Jesus, and keeping their faith in him. It was wrong of the bishop to trouble their quiet sleep.

The Jesuit priest, H. Stephenson, after visiting China, described the Communist Chinese as "exemplary anonymous Christians whose examples should be emulated by Western Christians. They value people above things." It did not disturb this Jesuit that the murderers whom he calls "anonymous Christians" have jailed or killed absolutely all the Jesuits of Red China, and many other innocent Catholics and Evangelicals besides. The bishop Kung Pin and the Protestant pastor Wan-Min-Dao have been in jail for twenty-five years.

Similar betrayals happen amongst Protestants. Pastor

V. Rumatshik, of the Soviet Baptist Underground Church, wrote:

> Unfortunately, we also have some believers who work together with the Communist authorities. This gives them the possibility of travelling abroad in order to lead foreign Christians astray in the matter of religious liberty. These preachers render the atheists a great service by hiding from the public the real situation. They make the world believe that we have much freedom without chains and oppressions. These men behave so, because they love this world; and they receive their reward on earth.

The prisoners spend their years in the quiet embrace of Jesus, sleeping faithfully on his bosom. They ought not to be troubled by such lies uttered by men of the clergy.

Do not awake love

The demand addressed to the daughters of Jerusalem also has another meaning. We must not awaken artificially the love that is in us. We must wait until it is given to us by God. God's heart must encounter our hearts. Even the false faith of another person should not be corrected by force before the time is right. That would do them more harm than leaving them temporarily in their erroneous beliefs. Allow time to do its work.

A Moslem in a Russian jail asked a Christian pastor, "If Christianity is so great, will we have this faith after we die? Where will Muhammad, our prophet, be then?"

The pastor replied, "Muhammad, like everyone else, will receive there according to his deeds. I do not believe God will reject him. God loves everyone."

"Our religious leaders say that only Moslems will be saved, and that Christians and Jews will go to the devil."

"Are you married?" asked the pastor.

"Yes, and I have children."

The pastor continued: "If you had three children, and two were blind, would you think of all of them as yours?"

"Of course," answered the Moslem. "And I would love the blind ones more than the other."

"Similarly," concluded the pastor, "God loves men of all faiths. Compared to his love, ours is like a piece of ice compared to the sun. God sends nobody to hell because he belongs to another religion." Soon the Moslem was baptized, and received appropriate instruction in the Christian faith.

Stirring up love, using brutal means to bring somebody to the true faith and exercising coercion, produce great catastrophes. There are enough evils in this world. We do not need another - artificial, unnatural, faked love.

It is terrible to awaken needs that don't exist. Why don't we wait until the needs come? Why do we stir up feelings by artificial techniques? How often this great crime is committed by religious leaders. All manner of means are employed to attract the masses!

So it comes about that men fill the churches, not because they love the Saviour, but because they are under some kind of physical or psychological compulsion. When persecution comes, it becomes obvious that these souls did not have a real love for God. Our love towards Christ must be authentic, bridal love.

Bridal love

The secret police had come to search the house of Antonii, the Orthodox bishop of Arkhangelsk. Finding the vessel used for Holy Communion, they threw it on the floor and trampled on it. The bishop threw himself across it, trying to protect it with his body. He lost consciousness. When he awoke he was in jail.

They asked his opinion about the future of the Russian Church, and wanted to know if he desired the overthrow of the Soviets. He answered that the Church would be glorified through the suffering of its martyrs, as it was in the first centuries, and that he prayed daily that the Soviet government would not shed blood and would be forgiven for its sins.

First he was threatened with death, then was promised freedom if he would become an informer for the police. The bishop was not frightened, and could not be bought. He was put in a small cell together with five others. They endured bitter cold, and received only two glasses of water a day and nothing else. They could not wash or change their clothes, and lived in their own stench. They lost their teeth. The bishop became so weak that he could not clean the invading bugs and lice out of his beard. When he felt death near he chanted his own funeral service. He died with prayers on his lips. He was an authentic bride of Christ.

Leaping upon the mountains

The bride says, "The voice of my beloved! behold, he comes leaping upon the mountains, skipping upon the hills. My beloved is like a roe or a young hart; behold, he stands behind our wall, he looks forth at the windows, showing himself through the lattice" (SOS 2:8-9). He comes leaping upon the mountains. Difficulties mean nothing to him. He does not know discouragement. He bears for us the curse, the burden, of death on the cross; he fights the powers of darkness. He leaps over our bad deeds as well; he leaps over them as if they had never existed.

Some people doubt that our salvation can be very near, because not all the biblical prophecies about the last times have yet been fulfilled. But when Jesus returns, he will not worry about our calculations. He leaps upon the mountains.

"He stands behind our wall"

Only a wall separates us from him. This knowledge was a great comfort to prisoners in a Communist camp who were compelled to stand facing a wall for weeks.

~Midrash Rabba~, a rabbinical commentary on the Song, says that what is meant here is the Wailing Wall in Jerusalem, a wall from which the glory of God never departs. But we recall Job's words: "I know that my Redeemer lives, and that he shall stand at the latter day upon the earth" (JOB 19:25). Our flesh, our body, is the wall which separates the bride from the Bridegroom. He is behind this wall. After death we will be face to face with him.

For the time being he looks through the windows; sometimes one, sometimes another. He examines one side of our character, then another side, to know what stage of spiritual maturity we have reached. We, too, must be attentive to what is going on in our souls. Knowing this, St Blandine, a slave girl from Lyon, went to her death before the wild animals "radiant with joy as if she had been invited to a wedding feast." Saint Ignatius, bishop of Antioch, wrote, "Let me be the fodder of the beasts, by which I might find God. Let me imitate the example of my God." Also Origen, another celebrated teacher of the Church, said in a sermon, "I do not doubt that in this assembly there are men known to God alone, who are already martyrs for him by the testimony of their conscience; because they are ready even now, if asked, to shed their blood for the name of Jesus Christ."

The winter is past

Here the most beautiful part of Solomon's Song begins. What follows are words appropriate for those convicted of sin; and they are a great source of comfort for the saints when they have passed through a period of depression. They are also fitting words for the time of a believer's death: "My beloved answered and said unto me, 'Rise up, my love, my fair one, and come away. For lo, the winter is past, the rain is over and gone; the flowers appear on the earth; the time of the singing birds is come, and the voice of the turtle is heard in our land; the fig tree puts forth her green figs, and the vines with the tender grape give a good smell. Arise, my love, my fair one, and come away. O my dove, that art in the clefts of the rock, in the secret places of the stairs, let me see your countenance, let me hear your voice; for sweet is your voice, and your countenance is comely'" (SOS 2:10-14). The bride hears the voice of her much-beloved. She does not see him, but she recognizes his voice, and is overcome by an unspoken joy.

The bride says, "My beloved answered and said unto me" (this is the precise translation of the Hebrew). We often find this expression used elsewhere about the Lord; he is said to have answered when nobody has asked him anything. He responds to the unspoken anxieties of the heart. We should practise not only vocal but also mental prayer. Let our unspoken thoughts and affections rise up to him!

The word ~anah~ used here means "to answer" and "to sing," or, rather, "to chant," as they do in synagogues, Orthodox churches and mosques. Solomon's Song, like the whole Hebrew Bible, contains not only text but also musical notation, indicating how it should be chanted. The ~Zohar~ says, "the tonal accents were also delivered to Moses on Sinai." This applies to the Law of Moses and also to the other books of the Old Testament. Anybody who does not know the tonal accents does not know the entire revelation of God. The same words sung in different keys stir up different feelings. This book has in truth been given to us as a song. In fact, Solomon has been described as the first composer of opera.

"In the clefts of the rock"

Believers are strong and unyielding towards sin. That is why it is written, "Judah is like a lion's cub." But in their relationship with God, they are like innocent and inoffensive doves, loving quiet and serenity. Like doves, they are faithful to their mate, the Bridegroom.

This dove is in its right place - in the clefts of the rock which is Christ. If she is with him, a cleft of a rock is as good as the King's chamber, a prison cell as good as a comfortable house. Jesus encourages her to have communion with Him: "Let me hear your voice; for sweet is your voice, and your countenance is comely." How sweet is the voice of the believer in Jesus! A Jewish commentator asks why the wives of the patriarchs Abraham, Isaac and Jacob were barren. It was because God loved their prayers, their words and their voices. God allowed them to be barren so that they would need to pray for healing from barrenness. Why do believers undergo troubles? Because to God, their voices are sweet. He desires that they should lift their voices in prayer and in song to him.

Some believers have been known to produce tremendous effects with their voices. A Christian, released not long before from a Lithuanian prison, wrote:

> My outward appearance is not attractive. In the slave labour camp, I worked underground. There was an accident which left me a hunchback. Once a boy stopped me on the street and asked, "Uncle, what do you have on your back?" I was sure that mockery would follow, but I still replied, "A hump."
>
> "No!" said the child. "God is love, He gives deformities to nobody. You do not have a hump, but a box below your shoulders. Inside, angel's wings are hidden. One day the box will open; and with those wings you will fly to heaven."
>
> I began to cry with joy; I am crying now, even as I write.

Such was the achievement of one Christian child's voice. Because his voice was rightly modulated, he could make a hunchback happy. Therefore the Bridegroom says, "Let me hear your voice, for sweet is your voice."

Cederholm, a Finnish prisoner in the USSR who eventually got free because he was a foreigner, says that in Leningrad he was put in a cell reserved for men under sentence of death. There he found, among many other inscriptions written by those who had been awaiting execution, the following words: "In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, Archimandrite Anthony, of Alexandro-Nevsky monastery, is to be shot tonight for refusing to burden his conscience with a grievous sin. Forgive them, Lord, for they know not what they do. Good people, tell my brethren I leave this world with peace in my soul." The inscriptions on the walls alternated with inscribed crosses, under which were names and dates. In the corner of the cell was an image of St. Seraphim of Sarov, drawn in indelible pencil. The image was poignantly drawn by an untrained hand, but all the details were carefully done, and it was signed thus: "Ecaterina, the servant of God, drew this image, thinking of her little children who are praying to the just God for their Mama." How beautiful are the voices of those who speak like this!

"Sweet is your voice"

Saint Augustine wrote, "Whoever praises God in song praises Him twice – in the words, and in the music." Much depends on the spirit in which we sing. In the Soviet Union, there were Christians who have not owned a hymnal for decades. In Red China the same is true. With what exuberant joy they sing when hymnals are smuggled to China for them! We should sing with the same joy.

In Communist prisons, naked Christians were thrown crosswise over narrow tables. Their legs dangled from one side; from the others, the head and arms. The legs were tied to the arms with straps. One either side, Communists stood with whips and beat the prisoners until they bled. Before being beaten, they were told to sing. They could have refused, and paid for their refusal with a more savage beating. But why should they not sing, when hymns like ~O Sacred Head now wounded, with grief and shame weighed down~ were demanded from them?

One of those who underwent this ordeal was a Hebrew Christian. He knew the story of Rabbi Akiba, who sang while being combed with red-hot iron combs and died a martyr's death under the ordeal. Akiba's disciples asked him, "How can you sing when you are suffering so greatly?"

He replied, "All my life I have desired to love God with all my heart and all my soul, but I was always distracted by worldly things. Now for the first time I can praise God with all my heart."

It was a rare privilege for that Hebrew Christian to sing such a song just before being flogged until he bled.

Let the reader imagine himself in such a situation. Let him visualize the scene, and try to sing those words himself:

~O Sacred Head now wounded, with grief and shame weighed down,
Now scornfully surrounded with thorns, Thine only crown.
O Sacred Head, what glory, what bliss till now was Thine
Yet though despised and gory, I joy to call Thee mine.~

Sometimes Christians were ordered to sing "A mighty fortress is our God," in the certain knowledge that after a few minutes they would be tortured. Nevertheless they sang that God is a trusty shield and weapon, that "He helps us free from every need that has us now overtaken." The Communists mocked them. "Do you really believe that God will help you free from this need?" they said. Catholics sang the song, ~Hail, Mary, full of grace.~

I personally went through the extremes of temptation and doubt when I passed through similar situations. I was forced to sing Psalm 121 [PSA 121], "...My help comes from the Lord. He will not suffer your foot to be moved ... He that keeps Israel shall neither slumber nor sleep. The Lord is your keeper." We asked ourselves then "What is the value of such words when they don't correspond in any way to the reality in which we are living?" And in that situation I had a revelation, which forever pacified my mind, however terrible the circumstances.

I thought, "To whom are such promises made?" There was only one possible answer: "To me, and to the "me" of every believer." But who is this "me"? A "me" only has existence as an abstraction, just as pure gold or uranium are abstractions. In nature we only find ores. These have to be melted down in a furnace in order to extract one little bit of uranium or gold from huge quantities. The case is similar with the "me" in every believer. In a soul there are so many elements which do not belong to the "me." They are the influences of heredity, of a poor education and of all kinds of demonic evil. Only very little of us forms the "me," what St. Teresa of Avila called "the inner castle."

My real personality - my uniqueness - is an image of God; it is my sanctified being, united with Christ; it is what St. Peter calls "the hidden man of the heart" (1PE 3:4). The promises that nothing will hurt us, that we will be protected from all harm, do not apply to the whole ore. In order that the real me should live in perfect cleanliness and holiness, the ore has to pass through cleansing fire. I know that the inner castle will not be harmed, that the God of Israel watches over it. The only part of me that matters can be at peace. No enemy will ever reach it.

Let us sing in this spirit; and then we too will hear the Bridegroom say, "Let us hear your voice; for sweet is your voice, and your countenance is comely." The word used in the Hebrew is actually a plural word – "countenances." The relaxed, serene face of a Christian at ease; the joyful face of one having a good time; the distorted face of one in pain; the marred face of one who is enduring torture; the radiant face of one in ecstasy – they are all comely in his sight.

"The little forces"

The Bridegroom tells the bride, "Take us the foxes, the little foxes, that spoil the vines; for our vines have tender grapes" (SOS 2:15). He does not say, "take me," but "take us." Both Bridegroom and bride desire to enjoy the fruit of the vine. It is their common interest to eradicate the foxes which spoil it. All who wish to help in this task, and are capable of it, are included in this calling.

What is meant by these foxes? Firstly, they are our corruptions. Those things in us which hinder the flourishing of godly life must be set aside. Foxes are animals which often turn their heads and look back. They are usually portrayed in that attitude. It is a characteristic in us also, and one which must be reformed. Whosoever has put his hand to the plough of the Kingdom and looks back, is not worthy of Jesus. The fox is also a byword for cunning. A believer should not be devious.

Our battle is not only against major sins but also against minor ones. It is possible for the sun in all its greatness to be reflected in a mirror, even though the sun is so much larger than the earth; yet the tiniest object that interposes itself between the mirror and the sun obscures it. So our little hearts can mirror the great God; but the slightest thing can hide our hearts from him. Thomas More wrote:

> Alas, how light a cause may move
> Dissension between hearts that love.
> Hearts that the world in vain has tried

In sorrow, but more closely tied
Which stood the storm when waves were rough
Yet in a sunny hour fell off
Like ships that have gone down at sea
When heaven was all tranquillity.

We should never underestimate the harm a small sin can do. Think what damage a tiny microbe or an invisible virus can do; they can bring about your death. So it is with sin. Little flies and ants destroy animal carcasses with astonishing speed. A swarm of ants can devour a horse's corpse as quickly as can a lion. Our vineyards are not yet in fruit; because even if they have reached great excellence, our earthly virtues are only blossoms. The fruit will not be seen until the life to come. For the time being, the vineyard is in bloom. And we must beware of foxes – even little foxes.

Let us remember that just as the soul can be devastated not only by gross sins but also by a multitude of neglected minor sins, so the life of holiness in its turn is not only composed of great heroic deeds, but also of a multitude of small actions and brief words. It is not only the miracles and the martyr deaths which have significance, but also the small deeds. It is not only the lightning which counts, but also the sunbeam; not only the powerful torrents and roaring waterfalls, but also the quiet pools of Siloam.

It matters that we should avoid small evils, refrain from little sins and minor inconsistencies and weaknesses. We should avoid foolishness and not fall into some small indiscretion or imprudence. It matters that we should resist making concessions to our self, to our earthly nature. We need to beware those fleeting moments of laziness and indecision and those small acts of cowardice. An important element of the holy life is the rejection of these things.

When the United States first launched its space shuttle, it was announced that the failure of a tiny piece of plastic, worth mere cents, had resulted in a million-dollar delay in America's space programme. A brief quarrel with a marriage partner over a trifling matter can destroy a Christian marriage, wreck the children's personalities and bring the gospel into disrepute in the neighbourhood.

Two women went to a monastery to worship. One had her conscience burdened with a great sin. The other did not regard herself as a sinner, because she had been guilty only of small things. The abbot listened to their confessions, and then sent them both to a field. He ordered the great sinner to bring the largest stone she could find. The one with only small sins was told to bring only little stones. This they did. After they had brought the stones to the abbot he said, "Now put them back, each in the exact place you found it."

The woman who had brought the small stones hesitated. The abbot asked her why. She answered, "It is difficult, because there are so many, and I can't remember where they all came from."

Then the abbot told her, "Remember, your companion has committed just one, big, evil deed. But she remembers it, regrets it, and washes it with her tears. She knows the place from which the stone was taken. But you, with your small and unimportant sins, just like the little foxes in Solomon's Song, which spoil the vines, can't remember how or when or to whom you did wrong. And because your sins are small and numerous you may not even be able to repair them. They remain a burden on your soul, just as these little stones remain in your apron."

Hearing these words, the woman bowed her head and acknowledged that she was no purer than her sister. She understood that she, who had committed only small sins, also needed to repent of them and be forgiven in order to purify her soul. Let us take heed of small sins.

Once two men built a wall. When one of them was placing a brick, he noticed that it was thicker in one place than another. "Throw it away," said his friend, "and get another. Otherwise the results will be unsatisfactory."

"Leave me alone," the first man retorted. "How can such a little thing, which nobody is going to notice, do any harm? You take things too seriously." He continued putting one brick upon another until evening, when they finished their work and went home.

What did they see when they came to work the next day? Because of that one uneven brick, the wall had not been vertical. Because of the way it had been built, it had leaned further and further over. As a consequence it had collapsed during the night, and the work had to be done all over again. So it is with every small sin or little untruth in our hearts. A very small lie will grow and grow in us, until it brings us shame and reproach. Don't regard little sins as unimportant.

Our universe is made up of things so tiny that they cannot be seen even through the most powerful of microscopes. The diameter of the dome of St. Peter's basilica in Rome is about the same measurement as the height of a fourteen-storey house. Imagine a dust particle in it. As the size of the dust particle is to that of the basilica, so (approximately) is the size of an electron compared to that of an atom. And if everything were to be increased in size so that a baseball became the size of the planet earth, then the atoms of the baseball would become the size of grapes. When the electrons and protons function normally, they sustain our lives. When they are tampered with, a town like Nagasaki disappears. It is of the greatest importance that the smallest of things should function correctly. Beware of little foxes!

Children's sins

Often we are not serious in drawing the attention of children to their sins, because they are so small. But small sins can poison a child's life. On the other hand, children who have repented of their small sins and have been purified by the blood of Christ are capable of great things for him.

In a small village school in Communist Hungary there were children who had fought their small sins and now had great faith. A new teacher arrived - a militant atheist whose objective was to root out religion from the hearts of the children.

One day she summoned little Angela - a very pious girl - and asked her, "What do you do if your parents call you?"

"I come immediately."

"What happens if your parents call somebody else?"

"They come, too."

"Well," said the teacher, "they all come, and you come, because you really exist. But suppose your parents called your grandparents, who have been dead a long time. Would they come?"

"Surely not!"

"And if they were to call Red Riding Hood or Snow White - would they come?"

"Surely not, because they are just imaginary."

"You see, children," said the teacher triumphantly, "only living beings, which actually exist, can respond to a call. If somebody doesn't come when called, he is not alive. Is that clear?"

"Yes," replied the whole class.

The teacher sent Angela out of the classroom and told her to stand by the door. Then she said to the other children, "Call her!" The children shouted, "Angela! Angela!" Angela immediately entered the room.

"Now, everything is clear," declared the teacher. "You have all been brought up to believe in Jesus. You believe that he exists, that he is alive, and that he hears you when you speak to him. Is that so?"

"Yes."

"Now, we will try an experiment. Angela entered the classroom when we called her. So, everybody, on the count of three shout as loudly as you can, "Come, Lord Jesus; come, Lord Jesus!" One, two, three - begin to call!"

Nobody dared to shout. The teacher laughed. "There you have the proof. You don't even dare to call him, because you know he would not come. He could not come, because he is just as imaginary as Red Riding Hood or Snow White."

Then something unexpected happened. Angela turned to the children and said, "We will call Jesus! All together - Come, Lord Jesus!"

With hands folded and a deep yearning in their hearts, with total confidence, the children began to chant, "Come, Lord Jesus! Come, Lord Jesus!" Angela prompted them again and again: "Come, Lord Jesus!" They shouted so loudly that it seemed as if the walls would crumble.

What happened next, according to the children's later account, was that they saw the door opening; then a great light shone through; and then standing bathed in that light was a beautiful child, smiling at them. At the same time they heard their teacher's despairing cry. "He has come! He has come!"

She rushed from the room, slamming the door behind her. She had to be put into an asylum; she had gone mad.

The children were rigorously cross-examined by pastors. Their accounts of what had happened did not contradict one another. This is an authentic story.

Little children can do great things for the Lord, if they forsake their little sins!

"I am not"

The bride says, "My beloved is mine, and I am his" (SOS 2:16). Baalshem-Tov, the founder of the Hassidic sect within Judaism, fainted whenever he read these words. For a believer, they are too much to contemplate.

But there is something even better than this peak of beauty. Male love is often selfish and ambitious to possess for itself, but our love for Jesus is of the female type - free of selfishness, persisting only in the ambition to give itself completely.

The believing soul is continually growing. Its first word is an exclamation of triumph. The soul possesses the beloved, and exclaims, "My beloved is mine, and I am his." When she has grown, she does not put herself first anymore, but modestly says, "I am my beloved's, and my beloved is mine"

(SOS 6:3). The order of the words is changed. When she has grown even more, she is satisfied in giving herself without asking for anything in return: "I am my beloved's, and his desire is toward me" (SOS 7:10).

The Hebrew word for "his" is ~lo~, but the same word also means "not" in spoken Hebrew (there is a difference in the way the word is written, but the oral form came first and is more significant here). The verse, when only spoken, could quite accurately be translated, "My beloved is mine, and I am not." He is everything in the believer's life. No place remains for a "me."

Those rare souls who have really attained to the truth, that the Beloved is theirs and they "are not" anymore, have unique experiences.

By those who "are not" I mean those who have come to the height of heights, those who in prison have known not only heavenly raptures but raptures to the heaven of heavens (1KI 8:27); those who - eluding all enquiry, withdrawn from all knowing - have come to that place from which one looks down to heaven. It is that part of the temple above of which God says, "Behold, there is a place by me" (EXO 33:21).

Almost all these believers died in prison or shortly after their release, like Bishop Hirtsa and Mgr Ghicay. I have had the privilege of sharing a prison cell with such a man. He did not say much. From the little he did say, I gathered that he saw what St. John of the Cross and Teresa of Avila tried to describe.

He discovered that you can know things better by looking to the God in whom they have their being, life and movement than by looking at those things themselves. All things are dark. Even physical light is dark. Only he throws a light on them. Therefore the Psalmist said, "In your light we see light" (PSA 36:9). Others come to know God by looking at the things he has created. The mystics know the reality of creation by looking at the Creator.

Such prisoners did not see him face to face. God is veiled, and anybody who sees God without a veil has not seen the whole reality of Godhead. The veils are part of it. If you see a man without his skin you do not see him properly, because the skin is part of who he is. It veils his inner parts, which should be veiled.

Ten doctorates and a lifetime lasting thousands of years would not teach a man what those believers saw in a single moment of such rapture.

What I have written above is an educated guess as to what they would have said, if what they knew could have been expressed in words. When they came back from this rapture, they returned as people who had seen men, events and things as God sees them. They did not say a great deal, and what they did say they said to very few. But their faces and their eyes spoke for them.

I was reminded of these, my former fellow-inmates, when I read of the manner of the conversion of Rosario Rivera, the Peruvian terrorist. She chanced to attend an evangelistic meeting led by the well-known Latin American preacher Luis Palau. Afterwards, she wrote:

> He [Luis Palau] put Rosario Rivera, who had come as an eminent member of the Peruvian Communist Party, before her own eyes in all her crude inner reality. Not even Che Guevara [her chief, and model of terrorism] could see what I was like inside, though I had been at his side for four months. But this man described my life, and brought to light the things that were deep inside me. I bit my tongue; I did not know what to do. He told me the things I had done, how I had robbed, killed, perverted young people, abused my home, trafficked in drugs, and much more besides. I saw myself stripped naked.

Luis Palau had seen her with God's eyes. But he saw her also as very beloved by God and brought her to salvation. Such is the privilege of those who "are not."

Mary, the mother of the Lord, is an example of how far a human being can rise if one effaces oneself before God. Jacob of Saroug, a Syrian bishop in the fifth century who composed Christian hymns, wrote in a hymn to her:

> She is highly blessed because the limits of her body have contained the Unlimited, who fills the heavens without their being able to circumscribe Him. She is most blessed, because she gave breast to the One who rules over the waves of the sea. She is most blessed, because she carried the powerful giant who carries the world. She has embraced Him and covered Him with kisses. She is most blessed, because her lips touched the One whose burning love causes angels of fire to withdraw. She is most blessed because she has nourished with her milk the One who gives life to all the world.

"My beloved is mine and I am not." What has happened to me, when I am no more and only he remains? The aim of my life has then been fulfilled. Basil of Caesarea wrote, "Every spiritual being is, by his nature, a temple of God created to receive in himself the glory of God." When my Beloved is mine, and I "am not," what is visible of me continues. But each of us has two natures: the visible and the invisible. If I have submitted to divine will, the invisible part of me has united with God.

Saint Gregory of Nyssa said that man is simultaneously a micro-cosmos and a micro-God. In the life of the bride, the micro-cosmos decreases in importance, and God, in the literal sense of the word, is magnified. Pascal wrote, "Man is infinitely more than man." In his own life he was able to make a reality of Jesus' words, "You are gods" (JHN 10:34). When God makes his dwelling in us, we have more than mere biological, sociological and psychological possibilities within us. The sun and the moon are called "light" in the Bible. In the same way we are called "the light of the world." Our possibilities are immense. Saint Gregory wrote, "When you turn to watch him, you become what he is." We have the aptitude for it; let us not waste it. It is for this that we were created in God's image. Let us follow the bride's passionate decision to be his. God can do everything, except compel somebody to love him. That decision must come from us.

But take care! There are beautiful compliments addressed to the people of Israel in the Bible, who were God's beloved. But, after a time, the people turned to sin, and God's opinion of them changed. We cannot simply rely on beautiful loving words addressed to us by God in the past. We must take care to abide in his love.

Feeding among lilies

The bride says, "He feeds among the lilies" (SOS 2:6). He has said that his brides are his lilies. We, his flock, feed with him among the lilies, who already are the saints of the past and present. The example of their lives nourishes us.

A Rumanian Christian, Lydia Arsenescou, had been sentenced to death for her faith. She was a young girl of eighteen or nineteen, and she was very beautiful. Her last evening had come. The execution always took place promptly at midnight, and for this reason the Christians called the firing squad "the midnight bride."

Wardens had brought some gruel in pottery vessels into the cell. It was the evening meal. All the prisoners were hungry but none cared to eat. All the other women pitied the young and beautiful girl who had to die that night.

But suddenly her face began to shine. She lifted the pottery dish and said, "I have a boyfriend. I love him greatly, and he loves me. He hoped that one day this my body would be in his embrace. But it will not be so; tonight I will be shot. And after a few years, what was my body will have become clay, just like the clay from which this pot was made. And, after a few more years, some other potter will make a vessel out of what was once my body. Who knows what is in this vessel? Perhaps what was once the beaming eye of a lover! My body will decay, but I will not die.

"Jesus said, 'Whosoever lives and believes in me will never die.' And I believe these words of Jesus more than the rifles which will be pointed at me tonight. I believe them more than the bullets that will pierce my chest tonight. I believe them more than the open grave which is already waiting for me.

"I am not my body. I am an eternal spirit. Tonight I shall not die. Jesus is a gentleman; he will keep his word. Tonight, by his grace, I will enter through gates of pearl into the golden city. I will see and hear angels playing on their harps. I will be with the saints and the finest men of all the centuries, and above all, I will rest on Jesus' bosom, and there I will wait for my boyfriend to come too."

They came for her a few minutes before midnight. As she passed through the vaulted corridors of the underground prison, her voice could still be heard, reflected from wall to wall. She recited the Creed – the same Creed we all recite in church – but in her mouth, it had an entirely new significance. When she said, "I believe in one God, maker of heaven and earth," she really meant it. She knew; there really is a heaven. The proof was that she forsook earth for it. When she said, "I believe in the one Lord, Jesus Christ," the words rang true. Jesus really was her Lord. She was ready to give up her youth for him. And then they heard her last words: "I believe in the resurrection of the body, and in life everlasting." After this a few shots were heard. The poor Communists believed that they had killed her. They did not know that they had sent her to the embraces of the most beautiful Bridegroom of all.

On such examples, Jesus feeds us. He feeds his flock among the lilies. He has other saints as well, whose mentality is completely different to that of Christians of this century. The Church considers as saints believers such as Simon the Stylite, who remained on top of a column in the Egyptian desert for thirty years. When he was too weak to remain there, he had a post erected and chained himself to that. Many others followed his example, and stood in the burning heat of the day and the cold of the night. By doing so, they were trying to annihilate the part of them that lusted after sin.

Saint Etheldreda also believed that the flesh is evil and dirty. She refused to cleanse it, and walked about unwashed. So did the man whom Church history records as St. Anthony the Great, who is remembered for his stand with St. Athanasius in the great fight against the Arian heresy.

We would not enjoy being in the company of such people. But when a reed is bent, the only way to straighten it is to bend it in the opposite direction. In a world in which so many die from hunger and others spend their money on useless creams and costly perfumes, it is good that here and there individuals exist who demonstrate, by extreme attitudes, the vanity of our way of life. They too are lilies, among whom Jesus feeds his flock.

Christians were prevented from washing for weeks, months and sometimes years in Communist prisons, and they became full of lice, loathsome to themselves and others. It was a very great help to them, and a reinforcement of their faith, to remember that there were once saints who adopted this burden voluntarily.

Jesus feeds his sheep among lilies. No other shepherd can do that.

The sending away of the Beloved

The bride says, "Until the day break, and the shadows flee away, turn, my beloved, and be like a roe or a young hart upon the mountains of Bether" (SOS 2:17). I know of a Christian who was in solitary confinement for years, in much hunger and pain. Sometimes he was aware of Jesus asking him, "Is it too difficult for you? Shall I ease your lot?" Again and again he replied, "Please, Jesus, see to others. I can bear it; I'm all right."

This is the mentality of the bride. She tells Jesus to follow his calling as a king. She can carry the cross allotted to her in the hope that, when the evening comes, he will return to her. She is reluctant to make continual demands upon him.

When the apostle Peter realized who Jesus was, he said to him, "Depart from me; for I am a sinful man" (LUK 5:8). Peter was very grateful that Jesus had increased his catch to an exceptionally great multitude of fish. But he also knew that a being like Jesus could do greater things than merely provide a fisherman with a miraculous haul. Like the bride in the Song, he wanted him to go away and do his more marvelous work. Peter was prepared to be content with a normal-sized catch.

The bride sends the Bridegroom away to the mountains of Bether (SOS 2:17). The word ~bether~ means "separation." She believes it is possible to exist without him, to be separate from him. This thought brings us to the third chapter of the Song of Songs, a book so important that Origen, one of the distinguished teachers of the Church in the third century, wrote twelve volumes about it. Saint Bernard of Clairvaux delivered eighty-six sermons on the first two chapters alone. The great German writer, Goethe, called it "the most divine of all love songs." Herder said of it, "The song is written as though from paradise." It is a book which repays thorough study.

Seeking the Bridegroom

The bride says: "By night on my bed I sought him whom my soul loves: I sought him, but I found him not. I will rise now, and go about the city in the streets, and in the broad ways I will seek him whom my soul loves: I sought him, but I found him not" (SOS 3:1-2). Theologians will tell you, "It is difficult to find God; wherewith will you find him?" Dionysius the Areopagite wrote:

> If it should happen that somebody should see God and understand what he sees, then he has not seen God Himself... for He surpasses any intelligence and any essence. He exists only to the degree to which He is totally unknown ...
>
> Thus we say that the Universal Cause situated beyond the whole universe is neither matter nor body.
>
> It has no face. It has no shape, no form, no quality, no mass. It is in no place, it cannot be apprehended by our senses ... Ascending higher, we say now that this Cause has no soul and no intelligence ... It cannot be expressed, nor conceived.
>
> It has no number, no order, no grandeur, no smallness, no equality, no similitude, no dissimilitude. It does not rest unmoved; neither does it move. It is neither power nor light. It does not live and is not life.
>
> It is not essence, nor perpetuity, nor time. It has no knowledge, no truth, no wisdom. It is not one, nor > unity, nor divinity, nor good; neither spirit nor affiliation nor paternity, in the sense we use this word.

But the bride mistrusts philosophy - even religious philosophy. She seeks him diligently, night after night (the Hebrew word in verse 1 [SOS 3:1] means "nights"). She has been promised that, provided she does not seek the living among the dead, she will not seek in vain: "Whoever seeks, shall find" (LUK 11:10). She deceived herself when she imagined she could live separated from him; now she seeks him.

You cannot find him from a bed of ease, lying quietly in comfort. You have to strive. The bride realizes that her sighing, and demanding and others' intervention do not bring her the Beloved. The soul must become active; it must practise spiritual exercises.

Exposing herself to all the risks which any girl runs who walks alone at night-time, the bride walks on darkened streets, seeking her Beloved. She travels all kinds of roads. There is no place where she does not seek him. She looks in the face of every passer-by, to see if she can can glean information from anybody about the one she loves.

But the Beloved is not a man of public places. Righteous men usually shun such places, because there one can expect to find mostly evil. Jesus too lived, for the most part, a private life. When He was twelve years old, his parents lost him. They looked for him in the wrong place; in the caravan, where he never is. So he asked them, when they found him, "How is it that you sought me?" He told them where he always is, where he can readily be found by anybody: at "My Father's business" (LUK 2:49). That is the only place where he may legitimately be sought.

Jesus said these words not only to Mary, but also to his adoptive father, Joseph. What we must understand from this is that the child had already made up his mind. His supreme ambition was not to be an assistant in Joseph's workshop. He had another Father, a heavenly Father; and he was going to be in his service.

The watchmen of the city

The bride says, "The watchmen that go about the city found me: to whom I said, "Saw you him whom my soul loves?" It was but a little that I passed from them, but I found him whom my soul loves: I held him, and would not let him go, until I had brought him into my mother's house, and into the chamber of her that conceived me" (SOS 3:3-4). The watchmen of the city are the bishops, priests, pastors, preachers, rabbis and mullahs of different religions. Some brides fall in love with them and with their ornate services and beautiful sermons, and because of these they forget to go on seeking the Bridegroom himself, whom you can find only when you go on from them. You find Jesus only when you have left every creature behind.

In practice it is difficult to distinguish the ambitions of such as Horeb, Datan and Abiram (who in the Old Testament rebelled against Moses, the God-appointed authority over the people) from those of the brides who, because of their unlimited love for Jesus, leave the watchmen behind without despising them. But it is not for us to judge others. We trust that everyone does the best of which he is capable.

In the end, the bride finds the Beloved outside the city, at night. And what energy she shows then! She takes hold of him, and says to him - as Jacob once said to an angel - "I will not leave you until you bless me." [GEN 32:26] She took hold of him and would not let him go. Simply to find Jesus, is not enough. You must also know how to keep him.

The bride brings him into the house of her mother, the Church. Saint Cyprian said, "Whosoever has God as his Father, has the Church as his mother." The worth of a church service consists only in the fact that the worshippers, the brides, have come to the service bringing Jesus with them.

There are some very bad church leaders. Many Protestant and Catholic church leaders have remained silent about the closure of tens of thousands of churches in Russia, China, North Korea, and Albania. Even worse than that, some Catholic and Protestant church leaders praise the persecutors, describing them as nice people. Other church leaders, while probably being worthy individuals, are not truly ready to die for what they believe.

In the Rumanian prison of Piteshti, prisoners were forced to actively deny their faith by gross blasphemy of the Eucharist. They were made to scream sacred melodies, in which filthy words replaced those of the hymns. They were made to gesture degradingly with their genitals. They were made to eat excrement. This obscene parody of the Eucharist was intended to transform the worship into a demonic drama of evil and hatred.

The result was minds in chaos. The brainwashers thereby achieved mastery of the prisoners, who identified with their new masters and so felt loyalty to them. Then the prisoners were expected to prove that loyalty by inflicting torment on another group of inmates. Should one of these "re-educated" prisoners be observed to be lenient in his beating of others or careless in depriving them of sleep, such mercy was interpreted as a breach of his new loyalty. He would then be put through the agony again himself.

Sometimes Christians who, after unspeakable tortures, had turned Communist in prison were asked to conceal their new loyalty. They invented a so-called fake Christian organization and enlisted teenage prisoners. Those teenagers believed that they had found "watchmen" who could tell them about the Bridegroom. Imagine the shock in the hearts of those young people when the very teachers who had brought them to Christ at a pre-arranged signal produced cudgels and beat them viciously. They were assaulted until they denied Christ, whose adoration their persecutors had previously taught.
[A. Ratziu, ~Stolen Church~]

In Guyana, "Reverend" Jim Jones, leader of the People's Temple, ordered the suicide of all his followers and the slaughter of their children. In all 920 people died. Jones was a "watchman" who had mixed Marxism with Christianity, a mixture in which the latter always perishes, leaving only murders and Marxism.

Horrors such as this and the atrocities at Piteshti were happening at a time when Communism was well spoken of by some church leaders in the East and the West. Obviously, a bride has to leave such "watchmen" behind, if she is to find Christ himself.

But there are also some very trustworthy church leaders. The late Rumanian Bishop Hossu, who spent twenty-two years in prison, said, "You cannot know how painful the suffering of a bishop is, over the sad destiny of his church and his nation. It can only be compared to the torment of Jesus in Gethsemane and on the cross, when He foresaw all the persecutions that would be unleashed through the centuries, by the enemies of the church." Another trustworthy leader was the Russian Adventist Shtshelkov, who died in prison aged eighty-four, after twenty-four years in jail, standing firm for what he believed. Sadly, such leaders are few and far between.

But the bride does not need to stop at pastors. We are not limited to hearing the Word only from them. The bride in Solomon's Song finds Jesus when she leaves the watchmen behind. She finds sweetness even in barbed wire thorns. In Siberian snows, among ferocious prison guards, brides of Christ detect the fragrance of the Rose of Sharon and the Lily of the Valleys in the smells, sights and sounds of the concentration camps.

In Golgothaean Christianity, personal meetings with Jesus are frequently described. Saint Bernard of Clairvaux wrote:

> I never knew the precise moment of the coming of the Word. I felt His presence. I remember He was with me.

> I sometimes had a presentiment that He would come, but I sensed neither His coming nor His going. I do not know where He went after leaving me, nor by what means He came and went.
> You will ask me how I know that He was present, if His coming was incomprehensible. I will reply that He is alive and full of energy. Immediately upon entering me, He awoke my sleeping soul. He aroused and softened and taught my heart, which had been as hard as stone. He began uprooting and pulling down, planting and building, watering the dry places and lightening the dark ones.

There have been some visions of angels and of Christ in the prisons, but these are not the norm. More often one can tell that the bride has seized hold of Christ by the profound change in the attitude of the Christian prisoners.

The beautiful daughter of the Lutheran pastor, Traube, worked in the office of a Soviet Collective. The local Communist Party secretary offered her the choice of becoming his lover or seeing her father arrested and his church closed. After a long resistance she yielded. She became pregnant, hanged herself, and left a letter in her pocket explaining why she had done so.

A comrade found the letter and brought it to the guilty Communist, who destroyed it and forged another in her handwriting. It claimed that her father had raped her and that she could not bear the shame. As a result the father was sentenced and the church was closed.

Sex offenders in jail are attacked by other prisoners. Though falsely accused, Pastor Traube suffered a great deal at the hands of his fellow-inmates. He tried to pray, in vain. He could not say the words, "Forgive them Father, for they know not what they do." He could not forgive the wicked wrong done to him by the Communists. He became ill.

One day, a new prisoner was put in the cell. It was the man responsible for his daughter's death, the closure of his church and all the torment he had undergone. The Communist had been jailed for embezzlement.

When Traube realized the misery that this criminal was experiencing – overburdened by guilt, jailed by his own comrades, lacking any knowledge of the Saviour – he drowned his own sufferings in the much deeper ones of the Communist. On his deathbed, the pastor finally said the Lord's Prayer right through. He forgave. He died with a look of radiance on his face. He had the soul of a bride who has sought the Beloved, and at the end had seized hold of him. He had had a personal meeting with Jesus.

Christ, known in personal experiences in exceptional circumstances such as these, can be brought to the mother's house, the Church. The Church will be greatly blessed by our encounters with Christ.

The bride ascends from the desert

The bride says, "Who is this that comes out of the wilderness like pillars of smoke, perfumed with myrrh and frankincense, with all the powders of the merchant? Behold his [palanquin], which is Solomon's" (SOS 3:6-7). The bride has passed out of the city into the desert, and she has learned a great deal there. The desert is not in fact as arid as people believe. Thousands of different plants thrive there. What characterizes them all is great adaptability. Without it, in a region with little rain and a summer temperature above 120 degrees, they would be lost. The bride could not survive either, were she not adaptable to different social structures and political regimes.

The saguaro is a cactus of the Arizona desert. Its roots, seeking out every drop of moisture, can spread as far as a hundred feet. During rainfall it takes in reserves of water like a camel, in preparation for dry periods which can last for years. It literally grows fat with water. Its girth can increase by half, or even more. One saguaro was found to contain more than thirty tons of liquid, "an engineering feat which probably has no parallel in any artificial structure in existence." Similarly, in the spiritual desert the bride learns to be deeply rooted in the Kingdom and to provide herself abundantly with the water of life.

When she was seven, my daughter Amely was not much of an eater. She only wanted to eat desserts. Once I chided her about this. She said to me, "I eat as it says in the Bible! It says there that God wants us to live on desserts only." She showed me the verse: "God led his people forty years through the desert." She was not wholly wrong. Life in the desert is a delicacy, a dessert reserved for God's beloved.

What a marvelous sight it must have been when the people of Israel came from the desert to the country of Canaan, or when they returned to their own country from the Babylonian captivity. It is the same when a soul returns to God from the desert of this world and cleaves to Jesus. Thereby it enters into a state of grace, and the bride is brought to the Bridegroom.

Should we be frugal in anointing Jesus with myrrh? It was Judas Iscariot who criticized the woman who anointed Jesus before his arrest.

The valiant men

The bride says, "Threescore valiant men are about [Solomon's bed], of the valiant of Israel. They all hold swords, being expert in war: every man has his sword upon his thigh because of fear in the night" (SOS 3:7-8). The Church has never lacked valiant men. On 15 August 1714, the Rumanian king Constantin Brincoveanu died a martyr death. For the twenty-five years of his reign he had been a valiant defender of the Christian world against Islam. On Good Friday 1714 he and his whole household were arrested by the Turkish sultan's men and taken to Constantinople, where they were put in the notorious Yedikuleh prison. On his sixtieth birthday, Brincoveanu was sentenced to death together with his four sons.

Before the executioner raised his axe, the sultan said, "I will pardon you, if you tell me where the wealth of your country is, and if you will deny the Christian faith and convert to Islam."

Brincoveanu replied, "I will never abandon the Christian faith. I was born in it, have lived in it and will die in it. I have filled my country with churches, monasteries and hospitals. I will not worship in your mosques, neither I nor my children." Then he turned to his sons. "My beloved, be strong in faith. We have lost all things. Let us not lose our souls as well."

The sultan ordered that the sons should die first. Young Constantin prayed and quietly put his head on the block. As he was beheaded, his father sighed. "God, your will be done." The next two sons followed. Then Matthew, who was only sixteen, wavered at the sight of the blood and hid himself near his mother. "Follow your brothers," urged Brincoveanu. "Do not deny Christ." The youngster put his head on the block and said to the executioner, "Strike."

The king followed them. Kneeling, he prayed with many tears. "God, accept our sacrifice. For the blood of our martyrdom, I desire that the Rumanian principates should remain Christian. Amen."

In the seventeenth century, in what is now Massachusetts, a law was passed declaring that all Quakers entering the British colony should be whipped, imprisoned and put to forced labour. Every exiled Quaker who returned was to be hanged. The "crime" of the Quakers was their belief in an inner illumination, a direct communion with God without the intermediary of clergy or ritual.

Mary Dyer, though she had been whipped and threatened with death, came again and again to the colony from Rhode Island to visit her brethren in jail. Finally Mary and two others were sentenced to hang. She attended the execution of the other two, then her hands were tied and a black sack was put over her head. But at the last moment she was reprieved and deported.

She returned again. She was risking public flagellation, and having her tongue pierced with a red hot iron. At her trial she declared, "If you do not revoke your unjust laws, the Lord will send other witnesses of the truth after my death. Compared with liberty and truth, my life does not matter." For this she died, valiant Christian. There is a statue honouring her in Boston.

Nowadays, Christians who would behave towards imprisoned believers in Communist prisons as she did towards the suffering brethren of that time are rare. God has valiant men and women, but they are few.

William Booth, a Hebrew Christian, founded the Salvation Army. His followers called him "General," which made him a laughing stock. His motto was, "Go for souls and go for the worst." Today he would have said, "Go for Communist torturers and murderers."

He went about with men he called "godly daredevils," a mob of uneducated but converted men chosen from saloons, brothels and gambling houses. The owners of such places counterattacked. Salvation Army preachers were drenched with the contents of chamberpots. Booth did not care. He ordered his Army to charge into saloons and drag drunkards out for conversion.

Today the Army is active in 92 countries. It preaches in 111 languages and operates 900 schools in non-Christian lands. In many countries it has influenced social legislation. Booth was another valiant man around Solomon's bed. Even today we have such valiant men.

Some of the special tortures devised by Communists for Christians are described by the Rumanian Communist writer Paul Goma [in ~Gherla~, Gallimard, France]. One prisoner was "baptized" daily by having his head stuck in the barrel which served as a communal lavatory, while other prisoners were made to sing the baptismal service.

During festivals, and especially Lent, blasphemous masses were organized. One prisoner was dressed in an excrement-smeared robe. Round his neck, in place of the cross, was hung a phallus made of a mixture of bread, soap and DDT. All the prisoners were forced to kiss it and pronounce the sacred Orthodox formula, "Christ is resurrected."

What do these indignities have to do with Socialism and the interests of the proletariat? They are nothing more than satanic orgies. Some valiant Christians refused to participate, and as a consequence they died under torture.

When Christians have to bear crosses they make roses blossom in them. The life and death of the Lutheran pastor Joseph Jurash of Czechoslovakia will illustrate what I mean. He had been invited to become a collaborator, but had refused. So the Communists sentenced him to thirteen years of imprisonment. They inserted sharp objects under his fingernails and toenails and pierced his body with needles. Soon after his release from prison he died. A fellow prisoner wrote of him, "His personality glowed in a special way." [~Lutheran Witness~, October 1972]

In the Soviet Union, over a hundred people gathered in a single room at the house of Brother Kozorezov when he returned from prison. He preached to them from MTT 5:10: "Blessed are they which are persecuted for righteousness' sake, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven." Flowers were presented to him. A nun named Sister Alia spoke of her recent arrest, and the surprise of the Secret Police officer when she told him she had to pray first before answering his questions. She knelt in his presence and did the same when the interrogation was over. A major watching was impressed and helped her to rise from her knees. (All our discussions would be more peaceful if we practised the same habit in our daily lives. In Korea I have seen brethren praying first when they entered one another's houses, and only then conversing.)

A tape of this meeting in the USSR was sent to us. On it, police can be heard shouting, "Finish! Disperse! To hell with you!"

Kozorezov can be heard answering, "We preach the love of Christ."

A police officer: "What do I care? It's forbidden here. Disperse while we're still speaking politely to you."

Kozorezov replies. "We are servants of love. Whence comes the evil?"

The police officer retorts, "I know nothing of that. I want no sermons. You are not allowed to gather here."

As the tape finishes, the choir begins to sing.

Such as these are today's valiant men around the Bridegroom's bed. In the Hebrew it says of them, "They are held by the sword." It will not let them go. They are the slaves of the sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God.

Solomon" s palanquin

The bride says, "King Solomon made himself a chariot [= palanquin] of the wood of Lebanon. He made the pillars thereof of silver, the bottom thereof of gold, the covering of it of purple, the midst thereof being paved with love, for the daughters of Jerusalem" (SOS 3:9-10). There are still many things that are wrong in the bride's heart, but she is in Solomon's palanquin the pillars of which are of silver. In the Bible the Word of God is described as silver cleansed in the furnace. So the palanquin is based on God's Word. The covering is of purple, which means that the bride is covered by the blood of Jesus, shed for her.

The interior of the palanquin is paved with love shown by the daughters of Zion. Love is belittled in our world, as mere sentimentalism or time-wasting. In reality it works very efficiently. Mary Magdalene, when sitting at Jesus' feet, seemed to be doing nothing. In fact, she was doing the most important thing of all - she was loving. While she appeared to be quietly sitting, her love was weaving beautiful ornaments for Solomon's bed, in which she herself would later rest. It is not our service that Jesus seeks, but our love. Only a faith that engenders love has value in his eyes.

There is a love that forgives all things. In his book, ~It Was Not the Black Cat~, the former Rumanian Zionist prisoner T. Lavi describes how prisoners were mockingly called "parrots," and were forced to spend hours shouting brief sentences deriding their creed. They could either repeat, "Jesus is not the Son of God" or utter obscenities about the Virgin. Jewish prisoners likewise were forced to say ugly things about their religion. Before having to declaim their blasphemous sentences, they had to run for whole nights around their cells, being whipped if they ran too slowly. The Hungarian Cardinal Mindszenty was one who endured such treatment. The alternative to uttering blasphemy was to face being beaten to a pulp.

Many were weak. Nobody should be taken in by the notion that all who are in prison for their faith are men of heroism, full of virtues and endurance. It is not so. Many Christians who suffered there were frail. Many gave in and said words that no Christian ought to pronounce. And then followed the self-justifications: "After all, I am only a man!" ... "What does it matter if I say these things? God does not worry about it" ... "Surely God would rather I live, than die for refusing to say a few words - anyway, the words are nonsense."

Some went to the other extreme. In their consciences they heard not voices of self-justification, but accusations which drove them to despair. In Red China, many who had denied Christ, or betrayed secrets of the Underground Church under torture, hanged themselves or threw themselves out of windows.

The true bride of Christ does not need to go to either extreme. The Word of God gives her comfort and teaches her about forgiveness. Even when her fall has been a heavy one, she knows she can rest in the palanquin of Solomon. We who are free, and have sinned greatly, can do so as well.

The mother's merit

The bride says, "Go forth, O daughters of Zion, and behold King Solomon with the crown wherewith his mother crowned him in the day of his espousals, and in the day of the gladness of his heart" (SOS 3:11). In this passage Solomon, the wise and rich king - the builder of the Temple of God - is a type of the Saviour Jesus, for whom the name of Solomon is also fitting. In Hebrew it means "peace." The mother of Solomon is a type of Jesus' mother. There is still a custom in the Oriental Orthodox Church that the bridegroom's mother puts a crown on his head.

Christ has possessed glorious crowns from all eternity - the crown of the eternal Sonship of God, the crown of love, of goodness, and of wisdom - but he owes one crown to his mother. She gave him something that he had never had before: a human nature. She made him man as well as God. It was her gift to him, at the wedding of the godly and the human that was his conception. God had always known the life of all men, but from the outside, so to speak; from the perspective of Godhead. Now he knew it from the inside.

Under the Communist regimes, many former judges and prosecutors in the old capitalist system were jailed. Having now experienced prison for themselves they regretted the harsh sentences they had passed earlier. A few years of prison may not sound very much in the mouth of the judge, they realized, but those same few years of jail meant great suffering to the sentenced prisoner. "Every minute spent in prison is a bitter pill like no other," one judge said. "Had I known this, I would have been less harsh in my judgements."

Because of the obedience of Mary, by whom he became man, God was able to experience human life and know it from the inside. He was tempted in all things, just like us. He experienced the inner struggles we experience, and because of this, we have in him a merciful and faithful

High Priest (HEB 2:17). That is why all nations call Mary "blessed."

Onute Vitkauskaite, a Lithuanian Christian prisoner, wrote this letter to her mother on Mother's Day:

> There is so much to think about and remember. But let's leave all that in the care of our beloved mother Mary. She taught our mothers love, sacrifice and kindness. May the humiliation and scorn that we suffer be as a prayer of thanksgiving for that! But I would also like it to be a form of atonement for those so-called mothers, who, without the least twinge of conscience, murder not only the bodies but also the souls of infants. Having scorned the Mother of Love, they have lost the source from which they could draw love, kindness and strength on the road of maternal sacrifice. In the labour camp I have come to discover how terrible is man's life without God, without eternal love.

Another Lithuanian prisoner, Julius Sasnaukas, wrote to his family on the same Mother's Day:

> My best wishes to Mother and Grandmother. It is > difficult to find the right words for this occasion. Here by my bunk I have a tiny Leonardo Madonna on a postage stamp and it seems that life, love and eternal spring seep into this dismal abode.

It can help us all to think frequently of the beautiful example of the virgin Mary.

÷ Chapter 4 ÷

The bride with no veil

The Bridegroom says:

> Behold, you are fair, my love; you are fair; you have doves' eyes within your locks: your hair is as a flock of goats, that appear from Mount Gilead.
>
> Your teeth are like a flock of sheep that are even shorn, which came up from the washing; whereof every one bears twins, and none is barren among them.
>
> Your lips are like a thread of scarlet, and your speech is comely; your temples are like a piece of pomegranate within your locks.

Your neck is like the tower of David built for an armoury, whereon hang a thousand bucklers, all shields of mighty men.
Your two breasts are like two young roes that are twins, which feed among the lilies.
(SOS 4:1-5)

In those days (and even today in some Moslem countries), girls in the Orient walked with their faces veiled. The bridegroom sees the bride unveiled for the first time only after the wedding ceremony. Then he sees the beauties which were hidden from him until that moment. When our Bridegroom comes, we will be like him, and he will discover in us unspeakable splendours; and we will give them to him, to give him pleasure.

The greatest beauties, in the case of this bride, are her "doves' eyes." Like those of God, they are so clean that they cannot even see evil, and cannot look upon unrighteousness. The two rows of her teeth represent her faith and meditation, by which the soul feeds upon Jesus. They are white as shorn sheep when they come up from the washing. Her faith is white and pure, not faked.

Her teeth are strong; strength is a characteristic of this bride. The teeth are covered by lips - usually they are not seen. So, the bride has a hidden faith in her clean conscience, not a self-advertising faith which shouts in the marketplaces. And, just as the teeth chew the food for the whole body, not for themselves, the souls of brides spend themselves in the service of others, keeping back nothing for themselves. Each sheep bears twins. Christians, like twins, share identical attitudes, because they are of one heart and of one soul.

Her lips are like a thread of scarlet. That shows that she is healthy. Her temples are like half a pomegranate, a fruit with red seeds which are easily seen when it is cut. This reminds us of a pure girl, blushing in humility at the remembrance of her sin and unworthiness. This modesty makes the bride attractive in the Bridegroom's eyes.

The neck is what joins the body to the head. The Church is the body; Jesus its head. What unites them is faith. The faith of the bride is strong, therefore, the Bridegroom tells her, "Your neck is like the tower of David built for an armoury." In antiquity, towers were adorned with shields or bucklers. So the tower of David - representing the faith of the bride - has a thousand shields hanging on it, all shields of mighty men. They are reminders of the battles of the saints of old, who have defeated the devil, the world and sinful nature.

The way the name "David" is written here is unusual. When it first appears in the Bible, "David" is written ~DVD~. When David commits great sins, as when he took the wife of one of his soldiers, it is written like that. But David had beautiful moments in his life as well. At such times a ~Y~, the first letter of God's name, is added, and it is written ~DVYD~. That is how his name is written at the end of his life's story. He had his wanderings, but he finished the course well. And now, in the Hebrew text of the Song, David's name is not only written ~DVYD~, to emphasize the godly side of his character, but above it is inscribed a circle, showing that because his son has written a song such as this, David has reached the highest point of union with God.

The breasts of the bride look like a meadow full of lilies on which two young roes graze. Souls who have wept for Jerusalem will drink the milk of its comforts.

The mountain of myrrh

The bride, having heard so many words of comfort from the Bridegroom, makes him this promise:
"Until the day break, and the shadows flee away, I will get me to the mountain of myrrh, and to the hill of frankincense" (SOS 4:6). There she will stay until the miseries of this life pass away,.

The mountain of myrrh recalls Mount Moriah, on which the Temple was built, and in which so much incense mixed with spices was burnt daily to the glory of God that (so says the ~Talmud~) the daughters of Jerusalem did not need to perfume themselves. There the bride will retire for prayer.

We can be sure that our Lord, as he sees the brides who suffer for him today in Communist and Islamic prisons, has the same words of admiration and wonder for them as he has for the bride of Solomon's Song.

The Lithuanian Christian prisoner, Mrs. Ona Pranskunaite, describes in a letter how she was transported from

prison to labour camp in a railway wagon divided into tiny cells. From a nearby cell, the Christian Lapienis comforted her with words from Scripture, and from Thomas … Kempis' ~The Imitation of Christ~: He said, "Onute, let us try to fulfill our assignment from God, so as to serve his glory in the honour of our nation." Ona wrote:

> I will march with strength, eyes toward heaven, wherever the torments of life lead me. Everyone has a treasure worthy of being protected. Trusting in the grace of the Lord and in your prayers, I am sure to find the strength to bear all difficulties. I fear only one thing - that I might do evil.
>
> Do not worry about me. I find comfort and joy in prayer, in sacrifice, and in trying to help my comrades in suffering. Here we work fourteen to fifteen hours a day.
> Brethren and sisters in Christ, do not fear the tempests of our times. God permits suffering but also gives us strength to bear it. The believers who sold their consciences for a plate of lentils, and became our persecutors, need penitence. So do we.

Cardinal Mindszenty of Hungary wrote from his insect-ridden cell, "We are small; but we can grow. The saints always reached heights when they descended into the most profound depths of human suffering. Lord, grant me only a morsel of the strength of saints." During the civil war following their revolution, Russian Communists tortured the Orthodox priest George Snesarev of Voronesh. Nails were driven under his fingernails and toenails. He was wounded sixty-three times. Seven nuns of the Protection Convent were boiled in a cauldron of tar. Their crime? They had been praying for anti-Communists. The monk, Nektary Ivanov, was made to drink "communion wine" made with molten pewter.
[From: ~Orthodox Life~, No. 78]

In all such atrocities many Christians remained faithful to their Bridegroom. Their deeds and their beauty are outstanding, like the breasts of the bride.

All fair

The Bridegroom says, "You are all fair, my love; there is no spot in you. Look from the top of Amana, from the top of Shenir and Hermon, from the lions' dens, from the mountains of the leopards" (SOS 4:7-8). The decision of the bride to give herself to prayer makes her even more attractive in the Bridegroom's eyes. He calls her "all fair ... without a spot." (This is, incidentally, a good example of how husbands should regard their wives. The apostle Paul says, "Husbands, love your wives, even as Christ also loved the church, and gave himself for it" (EPH 5:25). He, loving his Church, saw her to be all fair and without a spot. We must have doves' eyes like him.)

He calls her "bride" for the first time. How did she come to bear the proud title of the bride of God's Son? It is because she gave herself for him in persecution, just as he gave himself for her.

A Rumanian Christian named Babutz had much to tell when he arrived in America. He told how prisoners were systematically beaten on the kidneys, after sandbags had been placed on their bodies to prevent marks.

Together with thousands of others he had been sent to a slave labour camp. His job was to clean the weeds from the River Danube, by hand. Many prisoners, standing waist-deep in the icy water in winter, died. Coming and going, the prisoners had to look at the swollen corpses of their friends exhibited at the entrance to the camp. They were told, "That will be your fate as well, if you do not meet your quota."

In winter, their thick clothing was taken from them. They were told, "The cold will make you work harder." Prisoners went hungry when the rats ate what little they received. One hid a slice of bread in his shirt, saving it for the next day. In the night mice chewed through his shirt and ate the bread.

Another, forced to work in the fields, stole 20 onions to share with his friends. He was caught. He was made to choose between eating them all at once or getting twenty-five lashes on the soles of his feet. To avoid the excruciating pain of the flogging he began to eat the onions. Soon he collapsed, his eyes swollen from their sockets, like a frog's eyes.

Yet another caught a serpent and tried to roast it on the guards' fire. When caught he was made to eat the serpent raw. Once an almost blind prisoner came to Babutz joyously, wanting to share with him some crumbs of maize cake he had found. Babutz told him, "It is not maize cake.

It is mouse droppings." The other exclaimed, "Get away with your dirty jokes!" and ate the droppings. For months they were given no salt with their food. Then suddenly it was saturated with salt. Many fell sick.

Babutz's daughter was told that she could only be accepted for college if she denounced her father for "compelling her to be a believer," a charge which would mean he would be sentenced again.

But if you want to see happy people, you should look at men like Babutz, and the others who have suffered in Rumanian jails. They have taken a course in happiness; they drown their sorrows in the deep ocean of Jesus' tears for the sins of the world and the sufferings of his flock. Their own pain counts little beside his.

Let us try to do the same. We may be degraded. We may be frustrated. But we surely never ate mouse droppings. Let us take up our crosses joyfully. Then we too will hear the words of the Bridegroom, "Come with me from Lebanon, my spouse; come from the lions' dens."

Come from Lebanon

Lebanon is a range of mountains separating Syria, a heathen country, from the Holy Land. We have left heathendom; but we have not yet arrived in the Promised Land. We are still in the Lebanese mountains, "the mountains of leopards," full of savage beasts. But from the mountains of Lebanon one can see Israel, the heavenly fatherland, where we will be with the Most Beloved. Even the mountains over which we must pass are full of beauty.

"Look from the top of Amana" says the Bridegroom. It is from here that the rivers Amana and Parpar flow - rivers of which Naaman the Syrian spoke when he said, "Their waters are better than all the waters of Israel." On top of Mount Amana, we are not yet in the Promised Land, but here we experience joys, some of which we shall not even know in heaven. It is a joy to win souls for the heavenly kingdom. That joy we can only know on earth - and how intense a joy it is!

Only here can we know the joy of faith. In heaven there will be no faith, only sight. There are other joys awaiting us, but we will be deprived of the joy of faith. We who for the present know only these joys, value them. And we also are tempted to say that the rivers which flow from Amana are better than all the waters of Israel.

"Look ... from the top of Shenir." The ~Targum of Jerusalem~, an ancient Aramaic translation of the Bible, says that on this mountain so much fruit grows that it cannot all be harvested, and much of it rots. Here the bride learns to bring her fullness of harvest to the Bridegroom.

It is interesting to observe that the "lions' dens," the dens of those lions which desire to consume believers, are situated on the heights of Amana. Amana shares the same root as the Hebrew word for "faith," Emunah. Nowhere is one exposed to the devil's attacks so much as on these peaks. Where you bring most fruit, you attract his worst fury.

Those who have not themselves passed through the lions' dens, who have always lived in comfortable places and never on the mountains of leopards, who do not ascend the peaks of faith and prayer, are often apathetic towards the sufferings of their brothers and sisters in Christ.

In the Soviet Union the Orthodox priest Yakunin sheltered Christians of every denomination for fifteen years. When he was arrested, I received a smuggled letter from another Orthodox in Russia, describing these past activities of Yakunin the priest. He said they were convinced that the authorities would never touch him; Yakunin was well-known, and so they would be afraid of the uproar his imprisonment would arouse in the West. However, the letter continued:

> No vociferous complaints, no mass demonstrations followed his arrest. No voice which could have awakened the western public was raised in time.
>
> It seems that even the Soviet authorities were surprised that the arrest of a well-known priest and defender of religious freedom should arouse such a minimal reaction in the West. Because they now knew there would be no protest, very soon afterwards the Communists arrested the renowned Hebrew Christian historian, Regelson; and then came the Soviet attack upon Afghanistan.
>
> Afterwards another witness for Christ, the priest Dudko, ascended the Golgotha prepared for him a long time ago. [Dudko and Regelson later recanted under duress.] The Adventist leader, Shtshelkov, who suffered > greatly for his Christian faith, died at the age of eighty-four in Yakutia prison camp.

>
> So it will continue if we remain silent and forget the sufferers. We must appeal to men of good will throughout the entire world. I have no words to express my despair and my feelings of powerlessness.

One is reminded of this passage in Isaiah:

"None calls for justice, nor any pleads for truth ... [The Lord] saw that there was no man, and wondered that there was no intercessor" [ISA 59:4] [ISA 59:16].

But those who have been in the lions' den provide examples of spiritual beauty. A prisoner in Cuba wrote to his wife, "The Holy Spirit brings your love and prayers to me daily. Even if I don't receive your letters, angels keep us a united, happy and contented family which rests in the arms of the King, Jesus." This should be a lesson to those who have their marriage partners close to them and yet have not learned happiness.

In Communist countries there is not only a dreadful oppression, but also a Christian resistance to it. When you read of it, your spirit rejoices. There are heroes in our time. When one lives in tragic circumstances miracles become everyday events. "He who has not suffered has not seen God. We will not see Him from satellites, but in the lives of those who are not afraid of suffering." So wrote Dudko before his arrest and downfall. Others who suffered even more under the Communists did not crack.

The Soviet professor, Tatiana Shtshipkova, wrote,

> I refused even to talk to the officials of the secret police. To talk to them is the first step towards collaboration. I was driven from my job as teacher of Roman history at the university, because I spoke of my faith. I showed the Bible to students who had never seen one before. My son and his girlfriend were expelled from the Institute also.
>
> My daughter Liuba, a non-believer, was expelled from the Communist youth organization because she had not denounced me as a Christian. After this, Liuba became a believer.
>
> A group of policemen behaved in an unseemly way towards us. I slapped one of them. I expect a one-year sentence for this.

Ogorodnikov is sentenced for one year. He has turned from Marxism to a deep Christian faith.

Ermolaev, nineteen years old, is imprisoned because in the subway he expressed his opinion about the Communist Party.

We have no aggressive intentions. We cause no upheavals, we print no leaflets, we do not preach insurrection. We wish to live as Christ taught, which means, we want to live and pray together, help each other, witness to our faith and speak of Christ to those who want to listen. Are we dangerous? Surely so; the proof lies with the persecutors.

The well-deserved slap which Shtshipkova gave the policeman for his obscene gesture reminds us of Archbishop Luke of Tashkent. He shook the ladders on which the Communist workmen were climbing in order to tear down the crosses from the cupola of his cathedral. Then, because he was also a doctor, he took care of their bruises.

Many Christians have given their lives for Christ. Six Soviet Baptists who were sent to Afghanistan as soldiers were executed there, because they refused to shoot Afghan freedom fighters. They rightly judged that the Soviet Army had no business to be in a peaceful neighbouring country. It is right to defend a free fatherland, but it is wrong to fight in the name of a God-hating, murderous regime. They came from Lebanon, from the lions' dens, from the mountains of leopards, and are now in the embrace of Jesus.

They knew the biblical way of happiness: "You have loved righteousness, and hated iniquity; therefore God, even your God, has anointed you with gladness above your fellows" (HEB 1:9). They loved the righteous commandment, "Do not kill." They hated the iniquity of Soviet rule and died for their convictions. Now they know the unsurpassed happiness of heaven. In addition, they experienced hours of jubilation before their execution, just as Jesus went singing toward Gethsemane (MTT 26:30).

The value of our looking

The Bridegroom says:

> You have ravished my heart, my sister, my spouse, you have ravished my heart with one of your eyes, with one chain of your neck.
>
> How fair is your love, my sister, my spouse! how much better is your love than wine! and the smell of your ointments than all spices!
>
> Your lips, O my spouse, drop as the honeycomb: honey and milk are under your tongue; and the smell of your garments is as the smell of Lebanon.
> [SOS 4:9-11]

Jesus calls the believing soul "sister" and "spouse" - concepts which are normally mutually exclusive, because it is an abomination to have your sister as your spouse. But the unique relationship between Jesus and a believing soul is typified in the Old Testament by the fact that Abraham took as his wife a girl who was also his half-sister.

The relationship between Jesus and the Christian can take many forms. Sometimes it is that of an older brother advising a younger sister; at other times it is the passionate love of a bridegroom towards a bride. One analogy on its own would be inadequate to express the variety of the relationship.

Even in the Old Testament, God speaking to Israel sometimes calls himself a father, sometimes a comforting mother and at other times a bridegroom, a husband or a friend. One and the same God - and so many analogies!

Jesus tells the bride, "You have ravished my heart." There is really no satisfactory translation of the Hebrew expression in the European languages. The nearest we could come would be to say something like, "My love for you drove me out of my mind." The Hebrew word for "love" used here is a plural form - "loves." The bride loves him with intellectual love, with rational love and with passionate love.

The Son of God acknowledges that through love, he has become our prisoner. How does this happen? Then, as sometimes now, oriental girls veiled their faces. To be flirtatious they would lower their veil just a fraction, showing one eye, if they were near somebody in whom they had an interest. So the believing soul ravishes the heart of the Saviour with one of her eyes, with one of her glances.

It is written in the Old Testament that the Jews, bitten by serpents in the wilderness, had only to look at the brazen serpent erected by Moses in order to be healed. One look at Jesus is sufficient to bring a soul to salvation and to make him an heir of the eternal life.

How can a mere look have such huge results? It is because we ravish his heart. We take from his mind everything but ourselves. Through a single look, we inflame him with love. So great is the power of a loving look! God can thereby become ours.

Happy is the soul that loves. It takes God prisoner, and God listens to it in all things. You cannot obtain from God by mighty deeds what you can obtain from him by a single loving look.

A farmer was seen to spend many hours in church before the altar, but he never seemed to pray. When he was asked what he was doing, he said, "I just kneel and look at God." So it is that one single quality of the bride – one single loving look – secures God's whole heart. Let us likewise love men for a single quality we perceive in them, and close our eyes to all the rest which might be inadequate.

In the Old Testament the caresses of the truly faithful soul were more pleasant to God than all the incense which was offered to him in the Temple of Jerusalem.

The Bridegroom also tells the bride, "honey and milk are under your tongue." The Jews endured forty years of hardship, to finally see the Promised Land flowing with milk and honey. After conquering Canaan, they fought hard to keep it. But all those years they already had the joyous realms of "honey and milk" – right under their tongues. We all have the Promised Land the moment we stop looking for it in the far distance. It is there, in the power of our tongue. Our own bitter words bring us to hell. But confessing with the mouth that Jesus Christ is our Lord, brings us salvation.

A garden enclosed

The Bridegroom says:

> A garden enclosed is my sister, my spouse; a spring shut up, a fountain sealed.
>
> Your plants are an orchard of pomegranates, with pleasant fruits; camphire with spikenard,
>
> Spikenard and saffron; calumus and cinnamon, with all trees of frankincense; myrrh and aloes, with all the chief spices;
>
> A fountain of gardens, a well of living waters, and streams from Lebanon.
> [SOS 4:12-15]

Jeremiah predicted a time when the souls of Israel would be well-watered gardens. For the bride this is already accomplished; she is a well-defended and enclosed garden. Using these images, Jesus praises her chastity. Nobody can enter a closed garden or draw water from a sealed fountain except the owner. When he does not come to visit her, the garden of the bride is locked. She knows that, just as a perfume bottle does not lose its fragrance if it is kept closed, neither does the soul which tends only to God lose the warmth of love and the power of virtue.

It is said of the resurrection Lord that he came to his disciples when the doors of their rooms were kept shut for fear of the Jews (JHN 20:19). If they kept their doors shut against those who could only kill them in this world, how much more should we be like locked doors for fear of the demons who can destroy our eternal life! To keep the doors locked - to be an enclosed garden - to be separated from the world - that is the proper state of your heart, if you wish Jesus to show himself to you.

We have to be wary and lock our doors against influences which are harmful to our souls. Spiritual enemies can quench the Spirit in us. They take God from us and spoil our intimacy with him, the divine solace and eternal life. Why should you be an open fountain, at everybody's disposal, so that men can spit in it or throw their garbage in? Is there anything that pleases you more than the presence of the Holy Spirit?

Our inner castle, where God's kingdom thrives, must be kept locked against the images of the outside world. We must ensure that the world remains outside, that it finds no foothold in us, so that we shall not be destroyed. Our imagination and our fantasies must be as beautiful as a locked garden. Certain things may be allowed to enter and others must be forbidden. God and the devil come with their gifts to the gate of this garden. God's gifts must be accepted, the devil's rejected.

God said to Cain, "If you do not well, sin lies at the door. And unto you shall be his desire" (GEN 4: 7). In REV 3:20 Jesus says, "Behold, I stand at the door, and knock: if any man hear my voice, and open the door, I will come in to him, and will sup with him, and he with me."

The faithful soul desires that only the Lord shall enter. But the devil, knowing this, disguises himself as an angel of light. How can we distinguish between them? What must we do? We must keep our doors locked. We need to be an enclosed garden. The fact that our doors are locked is no hindrance to Jesus. He knows how to pass through locked doors.

Nobody has to be more righteous, more loving, than the bride in the Song of Solomon. She is alert when she lies on her bed: she hears the voice of the Beloved: "Open to me, my sister, my love, my dove, my undefiled" (SOS 5:2). But she also knows that the devil can imitate the voice of Jesus. The many compliments make her especially suspicious.

Then she - who is sick of love for him, who has sought him for many nights, walking the lonely streets and marketplaces seeking the Beloved - now, when she hears the voice at the door, refuses to open it: "I have put off my coat; how shall I put it on? I have washed my feet; how shall I defile them?" (SOS 5:3).

Jesus is pleased with her wise refusal, and exclaims in admiration, "A garden enclosed is my sister, my spouse; a spring shut up, a fountain sealed" (SOS 4:12). The Jesus she refused is the true Jesus, because he does not become angry. He knows us. He sees us. He searches our hearts, and knows we are with him. He knows for what good motives we refuse him.

He also knows why we cannot be gardens forever closed. He knows our commitment brings us into contact with many sins, many cultures, many false religions and denials of God to which we would not be exposed if we remained permanently enclosed gardens. We cannot share our faith with others without also hearing their stories of wickedness in their lives and their arguments for other beliefs. It is unavoidable that some of this should seem alluring. There have been cases of missionaries falling into sin with those they were to bring to holiness.

The best thing is to avoid extremes. We must avoid being so enclosed that others will die because, like black holes, we emit no light. And we must avoid being so outgoing that we forget that without times of withdrawing into a quiet garden we cannot have a love-life with Jesus.

page 152 The Sweetest Song

He praises the enclosed garden. The flowers and fruits mentioned are mostly exotic in Israel, and as such are types of the rare pleasures that the bride offers to the Bridegroom. She is a garden full of them. Originally the word for garden was ~pardes~, a Persian word from which we derive "paradise." For him to come near the bride was the same happiness that we shall receive when we enter paradise, because the Church produces the most exquisite fruits for him. Where aloes grow, all the air is perfumed. The Church fills the air with the choice perfume of Jesus.

The bride is called "a fountain of gardens, a well of living waters, and streams from Lebanon." The rivers flowing out of Lebanon are very fast-flowing and crystal clear. So is the source of wisdom, which continually flows from the mouth of the bride. So are the rivers of living water, coming from her heart, which has become a temple of the Holy Spirit.

Only keep your heart as an enclosed garden, and Jesus will enter it with his burning love.

The privilege of enclosed gardens

Every 8th October the Russian Orthodox Church celebrates the birth of the seventeenth century saint, Tryphon of Viatsk. His enemies stripped him of his clothes, bound him and threw him in the snow. When they later went to retrieve the frozen corpse, they found instead a living body which was unusually warm. The snow around him had melted. In Rumanian prisons it was said that the same thing happened when they threw the Christian, Budu, naked into the snow. I myself have known many who were put into refrigerated cells at freezing temperatures and survived. Jesus entered through the locked doors of the cells, and the Christians filled them with songs of praise.

Freezing circumstances in your own life will not freeze you, if you are close to the burning fire of Godhead.

I once attended an evensong celebrated by Seraphim, the archbishop of the underground True Orthodox Church in the Soviet Union. He has led his church for thirty years, yet the Communists never discovered his whereabouts.

At that evensong, after he had chanted the first words - "In the name of the Father, and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost" - the whole congregation was already in tears. I had heard and said those words thousands of times. But as Seraphim said them I realized as never before the dramatic truth that all we have of God is his name to call upon. During the fourteen years of my imprisonment, "Father" was only a name to my son. He was deprived of the reality of a father-son relationship. We are in the same position with the heavenly Father, but we have the comfort of knowing that he is a loving Father. His Son died for us; his Holy Spirit guides us. The whole message was revealed to me in the way Seraphim chanted the words. Several people in the congregation asserted that they could see a luminous being conducting the service with him, although he was alone. I believe that anyone who commits his soul to the act of imparting the gospel (1TH 2:8) has angels at his side at the altar.

This is the privilege of men who live in enclosed gardens; who allow none to enter their intimacy; who shun all influence. The right influence, the Bridegroom himself, can leap over hindrances.

Awake, winds

The bride says:

> "Awake, O north wind; and come, south; blow upon my garden, that the spices thereof may flow out. Let my > beloved come into his garden, and eat his pleasant fruits." The Bridegroom replies: "I am come into my garden, my sister, my spouse; I have gathered my myrrh with my spice, I have eaten my honeycomb with my honey; I have drunk my wine with my milk: eat, O friends, drink, yea, drink abundantly, O beloved"

> (SOS 4:16-5:1).

Though she is so appreciated by him the bride whispers into his ear that she still needs to make preparations before presenting herself to him. The girls who had to enter the presence of the earthly king Ahasuerus first had to beautify themselves for twelve months: six months with oil of myrrh and six with sweet odours (EST 1:12). How much more so should girls who must present themselves before the heavenly king beautify themselves. Therefore the bride calls the winds.

The north wind represents the punishments of God. The south wind, opening the pores of the leaves to allow them to exhale their sweet fragrance, represents the comforts of God. Both are signs of his love, and both are needed so that the garden of the bride may spread her perfume.

The Church has a rich share of punishments and comforts. Above all, it has the privilege of being blown upon by the wind of the Holy Spirit, which descended upon the disciples at Pentecost. That was a fulfillment of the bride's prayer.

The north wind blows with unprecedented fierceness upon the Christians in Communist countries, whose rulers have a long record of crime. In Addis Ababa, the capital of Communist Ethiopia, the prisons are filled with Christians and Moslems. The torturers use Cuban-made manacles which can be rapidly tightened until the bones break. A prisoner in the Andijane jail in Uzbekistan, USSR, reported: "The inmates are beaten to death or put in straightjackets. The chief torturer is Umayukulov. Those who suffer for their convictions are put in cells together with bandits, who sodomize them."

In Czechoslovakia 3,000 nuns were prisoners in their convents, which had been made into slave labour camps. The number of priests and monks who have had to endure the same fate is not known. Since books with a religious content cannot be printed legally in Czechoslovakia, secret printing presses have been set up at enormous risk. Such presses are also run in Russia, China and other Communist countries. When they are discovered the printers go to prison.

Tito, the late president of Yugoslavia, was the murderer of one in seven of the country's priests, and of countless residents of convents. Also on his conscience is the death of Cardinal Stepinac, who personally protected 7,000 children and defended Jews and Serbians during World War II.

At the end of that war the Soviet army occupying East Germany killed the priests Sonsalla, Demczak and Goerlich. Innumerable girls were raped. Some of them were nuns. Brutes of the same quality still control the Communist countries.

All these crimes have been surpassed by the holocaust in Cambodia. Around two million people were killed by the Communists. Men with university degrees were eradicated. The wearing of spectacles was made a crime punishable by death, because it indicated the ability to read. Of 500 physicians, only 57 are still alive. The children of undesirables were chained together and buried alive. Scarcely any children below the age of five remained. In the beginning, no local men had the strength to unload the relief parcels from abroad.

Yakunin, the Russian Orthodox priest, was imprisoned for protesting against church leaders who compromised with Communism, that is, brides of Christ who are in bed with his enemies. He wrote: "Authority in the church belongs to Christ alone who obtained it by shedding His precious blood. The church is His holy spouse, His living body. Whoever permits power-seekers to interfere with the eternal life of the church, abandons Christ's bride to corruption."

Men like this would be able to agree with these words of Hudson Taylor, founder of the China Inland Mission:

> I was envied by some, despised by many, hated perhaps by others, often blamed for things I had nothing to do with; an innovator of what have become established rules of missionary practice, working in many respects without precedence and with few experienced helpers; often sick in body as well as perplexed in mind, and embarrassed by circumstance.
> Had not the Lord been especially gracious to me, had not my mind been sustained by the conviction that the work is His and He is with me, I must have fainted and broken down. But the battle is the Lord's - and He will conquer.

In Gardenas, in Byelorussia, USSR, Communists have destroyed a fourteenth-century Gothic church. The same thing happened with the splendid temple of Vidzial. In Varanavas, women tried to prevent demolition of the church by throwing themselves in front of the bulldozers. Such devotion to the very end is the highest pleasure that you can give to Jesus. The bride of Christ under persecution gives him that pleasure in the worst possible circumstances. She has only one purpose: To make Jesus joyous.

Holy fantasy

She calls upon the Bridegroom to enter into her soul: "Let my beloved come into his garden, and eat his pleasant fruits." When she called upon the Lord, he replied, "Here I am." His response was immediate. He came in to her and she spent a splendid bridal night with him. He found his delight in her, and remembers her caresses now with joy; "I have come into my garden, my sister, my spouse, I have gathered my myrrh and my spice; I have eaten my honeycomb with my honey; I have drunk my wine with my milk." These are all different descriptions of the pleasure she has given him. Jesus, having known his bride, soars on peaks of joy, because those delights were so richly varied and full of beauty.

Normally, people do not eat the comb with the honey; neither do they drink a mixture of wine and milk. But the delights which Christ finds in the Church are unique delights. She does "more than others" (MTT 5:47).

And the bridegroom calls his friends: "Eat, O friends; drink, yes, drink abundantly, O beloved." These men are not like the bride. They do not know the joys of intimate fellowship with Jesus, but only participate, through his benevolence, in others' privileges.

When you are invited to a meal, those who invite you do not always wish you well. There may be small-talk at their meals, and backbiting afterwards. But the invitation which Jesus extends is sincere and comes whole-heartedly. Jesus calls us all to his banquet, to the joy of seeing sinners converted, and he calls us to attend the wedding feast of the Bridegroom and the bride. Blessed are those invited to this banquet! God commands the guests to eat and drink abundantly. Only one greater happiness exists, and that is to be part of the Body of the bride herself.

Atheists reject the wedding feast as fantasy. A courier who smuggled Bibles into a Communist country was told, "We don't accept books like these; they are fairy tales." The courier replied, "Don't you have fairy tale books in your country?" To this, the customs officer had no reply.

The courier then said to him, "There is nothing wrong in works of fantasy, if the fantasy is sanctified and is only employed in the embellishment of true facts."

The union between Christ and the believer is such a true fact. We can embellish it. Fantasy is a beautiful gift of God. In the first Greek translation of Zechariah, it is written "The Lord made fantasy" (ZEC 10:1). It is a product of imaginative creation.

Christian hymns are the product of saintly fantasy. For example, consider "There is a fountain filled with blood, drawn from Emmanuel's veins." The blood of Jesus coagulated in his hands and feet when he was crucified. Otherwise he would have bled to death within minutes. Only trickles of blood oozed from his wounds. But fantasy enriches reality. The sinner sees before him a deep fountain of cleansing blood into which he can plunge. There is more spiritual reality in the fantasy than in the strict historic event.

Without fantasies, there would be no achievement in life. Technology, medicine and art would all wither away. Science fiction anticipated science fact. Flights of fantasy preceded flights into space. Each step forward begins as a step of fantasy which later becomes a reality.

The pleasures of the union between bride and Bridegroom, and the final wedding feast, are surely the product of fantasy; but when the reality takes place, they will be seen as a fantastic description of a real event. Christians believe in this invitation to the wedding feast of the Lamb. They believe in the inebriating joys of drinking abundantly at his feast. Therefore they gladly bear their crosses.

In the village of Martuk in the Aktiubinskaia region of the Soviet republic of Kazakh, the school director - a man called Goroh - threatened a fourteen-year-old Christian girl, Arganessa Tissen. He said that if she continued to win souls to Christ, he would authorize children to put a rope round her neck and hang her on the spot. He compelled Christian children to crawl on all fours, in a travesty of kneeling at prayer. He called them "Fascists."

The Baptist Anatoli Y. Khailo was imprisoned on a false charge of raping and beating a girl, even though somebody else has already confessed to this crime. The girl's mother has also admitted that the prosecutor instructed her to give false evidence against Khailo. Just like Joseph in the Old Testament, who was imprisoned on a charge of attempted rape even though he was holy and refused to sin, Khailo must suffer.

This ugly side of life can distress us. But we know about the wedding feast to which we are all invited. We do not look merely on the rain, but on their iridescent rainbow.

The Baptist Church in Belgorod, after enumerating many facts about the persecution, writes: "We thank God that He found us worthy of such an honour. We pray that He will give us all the strength not to be shaken, because the hour of the Lord's coming is near. May the Lord bless us, and teach us to understand the shrewd methods of His enemies."

The Christians of Belgorod are looking forward to the coming wedding feast. Though the banquet is a product of holy fantasy, it is a picture of future reality.

In Solomon's Song even erotic fantasy is sanctified. By that means he describes the coming drunkenness of love which the bride will experience in the embrace of the heavenly Bridegroom. This holy fantasy has helped many Christians to win through in Communist prisons.

Many people are attracted to so much that is ugly, to things worse than reality. We who are Christians are attracted to the beautiful, to the righteous, to the real, expressed in the most gorgeous images.

÷ Chapter 5 ÷

A sad chapter in the life of the bride

The bride says:

> I sleep, but my heart wakes: it is the voice of my beloved that knocks, saying, "Open to me, my sister, my love, my dove, my undefiled: for my head is filled with dew, and my locks with drops of the night."
>
> I have put off my coat; how shall I put it on? I have washed my feet; how shall I defile them?
>
> My beloved put in his hand by the hole of the door, and my bowels were moved for him.

> I rose up to open to my beloved; and my hands dropped with myrrh, and my fingers with sweet smelling myrrh, upon the handles of the lock.
> I open to my beloved; but my beloved had withdrawn himself, and was gone: my soul failed when he spoke: I sought him but I could not find him; I called him, but he gave me no answer.
> (SOS 5:2-6)

She sleeps; but he who is in her heart never sleeps nor slumbers. Just when the bride has fallen asleep, the word was fulfilled: "Behold, I stand at the door and knock." She hears the Beloved's voice.

Those who are awake must seek Jesus; but he comes himself to the one who is asleep. There is not the slightest rebuke in his words, no anger at finding her asleep. He says only, "Open to me, my sister, my dove, my undefiled." The ~Talmud~ says, "Open to God a door as big as the point of a needle, and He will enter with a cart full of blessings." How can one not let in someone who begs you, "Open to me, sleeper with beautiful eyelids"? How can one refuse entry to somebody who says not one angry word, though such words would be justified, but only says that he, the ruler of heaven and earth, has nowhere to lay his head? Where will he rest, if his bride does not call him? His hair is filled with dew because he has spent the night in the fields, without a roof over his head.

However, the bride prevaricates. She will not open to him at once: "I have put off my coat ... I have washed my feet," she says. But if she has put her coat off, she can either receive Jesus naked, or she can make haste to clothe herself again. If she has put off the garment of sin, she should never put it on again; but as for other garments, she can put them on in no time. And what sort of reply is this, that she has washed her feet and fears to defile them again? She knows that Jesus washed his disciples' feet. He will do it for her also. She is merely prevaricating.

And then he puts his hand by the hole of the door. When we offer excuses, the grace of God tries to force the entrance. But even he cannot open the door of the heart. That door can only be opened from the inside.

It was only then that pity moved her. If you can't manage any other sentiment for Jesus, at least have pity for one who has been hurt so much.

When she rose to open to the Beloved, her hands dripped with myrrh, which was on the handles of the lock. Oriental keyholes are usually very large, and he must have poured perfume on the handles from outside, out of a bottle he had brought for her. When she put her fingers on the handle, this perfume dripped from them.

She opens to the Beloved; but he has gone. He has withdrawn himself. She did not open at the first knock, and now he cannot be found. How many reasons for sadness we give ourselves, when we neglect opportunities that God offers!

She remembers now how sweet his voice was. Her soul had failed when he spoke. The Vulgate, the first Latin translation of the Bible, says here, "My soul melted when he spoke." That is how one can tell that it is the Lord who is speaking. Disciples of Jesus who talked with him after the Resurrection said to each other, "Did not our hearts burn within us, while he talked with us along the way, and while he opened to us the Scriptures?" (LUK 24:32). It is always a thrilling event when the Lord speaks to his souls.

But human beings are strange. The bride fainted when she heard him; but she did not open the door. Afterwards she seeks him and does not find him. She calls for him, but he does not answer. It would all have been unnecessary, had she opened the door at once. There are times in the life of a man or woman when answers from Jesus cannot be obtained anymore. Why did they delay in answering the door? Was it because they had put off their clothes? The clothes of righteousness should never be put off.

A young man was married to a girl by a priest of the outlawed Uniate Catholic Church of the Ukraine. The Communists arrested her, and told her husband that his new wife would be raped by scores of soldiers if he did not denounce the priest. At that moment he should have opened his heart to Jesus, the Saviour who was ready to suffer for God's glory. Opening his heart at that moment of tragic dilemma, the young Christian would have known the simple truth that a Christian is never a denunciator, no matter what the circumstances. But he did not. He gave in. He denounced the priest who was in hiding. When his wife heard of this she tried to commit suicide. His mother died of a broken heart, and the priest went to prison. The husband later confessed his guilt, and died after valiantly protecting an innocent thirteen-year-old girl from the Communists.

Others who have allowed Jesus to enter their hearts have acquired his courage. In Vietnam, everyone must have a permit to leave his quarters. Permits are not available to pastors. But they do leave their quarters, to answer calls from sick parishioners or simply to preach the gospel elsewhere. When caught, some were punished by being made to kneel in front of their doors for a whole week. So they knelt, and kneeling, they made plans about how they would propagate the gospel when they were allowed to rise to their feet. If they were caught again they risked new punishments, perhaps prison or even death. The pastors Nguyen van Thang and Nguyen van Nam died in Vietnamese jails.

All church property has been confiscated: schools, seminaries, universities and orphanages. However, God's children continue their work.

The Communists demanded that nuns working in hospitals should perform abortions. They refused, and so had to leave their work.

Since May 1975, 247 Catholic priests have been killed, and hundreds more have been sent to re-education camps, from which not all returned. The Evangelical clergy met the same fate.

In Uganda under the dictator Idi Amin, Christians, as well as political opponents of the regime and common criminals, were imprisoned in the concentration camps Mabira and Namamve. These prisoners were not fed at all. They lived by the law of the jungle; the strong ate the weak. Obviously, the Christians were among those eaten. It is an old African custom that such victims are not killed before being eaten; one piece after another is stripped from the living body. This information is taken from the records of an International Commission of Jurists at the United Nations.

Christians bore this with faithfulness. In their suffering, many must have cried to him and had the same experience as the bride In Solomon's Song: "I called to him but he gave no answer." Great faith is tested by long periods of waiting. But in the end, there is no such thing as an unanswered prayer. The answer will surely come. It might not be the answer that we desired, but it will surely be the best answer for us.

Bad pastors

The bride complains: "The watchmen that went about the city found me, they smote me, they wounded me; the keepers of the walls took away my veil from me" (SOS 5:7). The watchmen of the city represent the pastors of the Church. Instead of helping the bride to find her Beloved, they beat her and wound her and take away her veil. Jesus foresaw that some of his pastors would begin to persecute his servants. They would care only about eating and drinking and enjoying themselves. In olden times many great persecutions against believers were unleashed by priests who, under the pretext of defending the Church, mistreated the children of God who were meek and spiritual.

The priest Eli rebuked holy Anna for drunkenness [1SM 1:14-15], but he had not one word of reproach for his wicked sons. Many pastors have grieved the hearts of the righteous. Even good pastors commit this sin. So the bride walks about, saddened by her own conscience and now by her pastors.

Prisoners in Communist prisons do not only suffer from the persecutor; they suffer also from betrayal by the leadership of their denominations. At the exact time that Pentecostalists in Rumania were being beaten by the police, the official leaders of the Pentecostal Union of Rumania, who are received as brethren at conferences in the Free World, congratulated the Rumanian government in the columns of the Communist press for the "full liberty" it bestows. They sent a letter to all the churches, obliging them to refrain from preaching about God's judgement, because the Communists do not like to hear this subject spoken about.

In Red China during the Cultural Revolution, opponents of the regime (and all Christians were automatically defined as such) had to kneel for ten minutes of self-examination in front of a portrait of Mao, and slap themselves on the face ten times each morning before entering their workplace, and again in the evening before they left. They were singled out to clean the lavatories. With heads shaved, they were tied up and dragged away for physical punishment.

At that time some Christian leaders in the West were praising the Maoist regime as a fulfillment of God's kingdom. Later, the Chinese Communists themselves discovered the crimes committed under Mao. However, some pastors had covered them up.

Sick of love

The bride says, "I charge you, O daughters of Jerusalem, if you find my beloved, that you tell him, that I am sick of love" (SOS 5:8). Beaten by the watchmen on the walls, the bride is unable to continue her search. She demands of others that they should pray for her. She uses third parties as intercessors on her behalf. The lover uses all means possible to make contact with the Beloved.

"If you find my beloved" - she does not name him. A powerful love always supposes that everybody else loves the Beloved as well. She gives them a command: "Tell him that I am sick of love." You can tell when someone is sick from love, when that person cannot be dissuaded further from doing and suffering all things for the Beloved. It is written, "You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart, and with all your soul, and with all your might" (DEU 6:5). Have you known what it is like to be love-sick?

You may well know what sea-sickness is. There is also such a thing as love-sickness. Do you know it? Do you know what it is to love to madness, to love to a paroxysm of love? This is love which, instead of drawing on its own large resources, demands even more love. It is better to have this dissatisfied love for Jesus, than a satisfied love for the world. This is the message that her messengers are to bring to him: that though she has been neglected, she still loves.

She does not ask him to come. She only tells him her pain. Here we are taught that prayers should only mention one's needs without making explicit demands; then he, knowing our needs, will do what he thinks best. There are many such prayers in the Bible. For example, Martha's prayer: "Behold, he whom you love is sick" (JHN 11:3). This prayer only speaks of the need. The mother of our Lord at the wedding in Cana says only this much: "They have no wine" (JHN 2:3).

Prayers which only express the need have a unique beauty. He is the Master. You tell him only the situation. He knows better than we do what needs to be done in such circumstances. He feels more pity when he sees the beloved soul suffering with resignation, selflessly. Only speak your sorrow, without demanding what you think is necessary. The bride sends messages to tell him only, "I am sick of love."

We have many examples of this sort of love in the persecuted Church in the Communist world today. Valya was a twelve-year-old Russian girl. One day the director of her school decided that she should become a member of the Communist children's movement known as the Pioneers. She refused. Her refusal was invalid, because the director had legal rights over her such as only parents have in the Free World.

Enrolment day arrived. The chosen candidates stood before a table on which lay three-pointed Pioneer scarves. One by one the girls stepped forward to don the scarf and take the oath.

"Valya Vastchenko," called the director. "Valya, step forward. Take the oath."

Valya's mouth stayed tightly shut.

"Say the oath, Valya! ... Very well. I will read it in your name." The director pointed to two other girls. "Place the scarf around her neck as I read."

He began. "I, Valya, pioneer of the USSR, promise before my comrade-patriots who decide the question of my admission to the organization, that I will stand firmly for the cause of Lenin and the victory of Communism. I promise ..."

His next words were drowned as Valya burst out in prayer to God and began to sing a hymn: "~We will stand firmly for the Faith, for Christ, following His example.~"

That child knew from the experience of many others that she had destroyed her future career for the rest of her life. She knew she might be put into an atheistic boarding school. She knew that her parents might be put into prison and might even die there, but she did not rationalize. She loved Jesus to a paroxysm, so she could not do other than what she did.

Thomas Aquinas was discussing the Song of Solomon when he died. On his death, the song that he wrote entitled, ~I adore You~, expressing his love and desire for Jesus, became especially relevant:

> Jesus, whom for the present, veiled I see,
> What I so long for, Oh! vouchsafe to me;
> That I may see Your beauteous face unfolding
> And may be blessed, Your glory in beholding.

The bride is sick of love, which means that she suffers. We have to defend our faith against the heresy of a Christianity without suffering, without a cross. Let me quote from typical sermons as preached frequently on American television.

"If a man can stand totally in the presence of Almighty God, he will never be sick." Thousands are sick of tuberculosis contracted through hunger in Communist prisons. Others were maimed by torture. Others went mad.

"The grace of God brings about his blessings in the spiritual and the material realm." Prisoners in the Communist camps shiver in the cold, their families are fired from their jobs and have no money to buy bread for their children. Their goods are confiscated. Where is the material blessing?

"As his children, it is not our place to be in the maelstrom of the storm that swirls around us. We do not have to be buffetted around by all the torments that afflict the world. Even when trouble comes, the sunlight of God is shining and there is peace upon us." This celebrated preacher doesn't seem to have heard about the dark night of the soul through which well-known saints have passed. I dispute the claim that Christians are at peace in all circumstances.

The bride in Solomon's Song knows deep peace, but she also knows grave torments and sickness.

What does our beloved have more than others?

The bride is asked: "What is your beloved more than another beloved, O fairest among women? what is your beloved more than another beloved, that you so charge us?" She replies:

> My beloved is white and ruddy, the chiefest among ten thousand.
> His head is as the most fine gold, his locks are bushy, and black as a raven.
> His eyes are as the eyes of doves by the rivers of waters, washed with milk, and fitly set.
> His cheeks are as a bed of spices, as sweet flowers; his lips like lilies, dropping sweet smelling myrrh.

His hands are as gold rings set with the beryl: his belly is as bright ivory overlaid with sapphires.
His legs are as pillars of marble, set upon sockets of fine gold: his countenance is as Lebanon, excellent as the cedars.
His palate is sweetness and all desires: yes, he is altogether lovely. This is my beloved, and this is my friend, O daughters of Jerusalem.
(SOS 5:9-16)

The world does not know the beauty of the Bridegroom, but I can see the beauty of the bride, of the Church. She really is the "fairest among women." The world wonders about her love for Jesus,and asks her, "What does your Beloved have more than others?" Rabbi Solomon Iarchi, a celebrated commentator, writes: "Thus the nations ask the Israelites: What is your God more than all gods, that you are burned up with hunger for him like this?"

She answers with a model sermon. It is a sermon preached by a soul that loves to a paroxysm. It is not a boring exposition of bible verses; it is a description of what the beloved is. Isaiah preached in the same way [ISA 53:3-11]:

He is despised and rejected of men; a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief: and we hid as it were our faces from him; he was despised, and we esteemed him not.
Surely he has borne our griefs, and carried our sorrows: yet we did esteem him stricken, smitten of God, and afflicted.
But he was wounded for our transgressions, he was bruised for our iniquities: the chastisement of our peace was upon him; and with his stripes we are healed.
All we like sheep have gone astray; we have turned every one to his own way; and the Lord has laid on him the iniquity of us all.
He was oppressed, and he was afflicted, yet he opened not his mouth: he is brought as a lamb to the slaughter, and as a sheep before the shearers is dumb, so he opened not his mouth.

He was taken from prison and from judgement: and who shall declare his generation? For he was cut off out of > the land of the living; for the transgression of my people he was stricken.

>
> And he made his grave with the wicked, and with the rich in his death; because he had done no violence, neither was there any deceit in his mouth.
>
> Yet it pleased the Lord to bruise him; he has put him to grief; when he shall make his soul an offering for sin, he shall see his seed, he shall prolong his days, and the pleasure of the Lord shall prosper in his hand.
>
> He shall see the travail of his soul, and shall be satisfied; by his knowledge shall my righteous servant justify many; for he shall bear their iniquities.
>
> (ISA 53:3-11)

So also did the apostle John preach:

> And so in the midst of the seven candlesticks [I saw] one like unto the Son of Man, clothed with a garment down to the foot, and girt about the paps with a golden girdle.
>
> His head and his hairs were white like wool, as white as snow; and his eyes were as a flame of fire;
>
> And his feet like unto fine brass, as if they burned in a furnace; and his voice as the sound of many waters.
>
> And he had in his right hand seven stars: and out of his mouth went a sharp two-edged sword: and his countenance was as the sun shines in his strength.
> (REV 1:13-16)

With Isaiah we find Jesus' state of humility described; with John the Evangelist, a description of His glory. The bride describes his beauty. She has had his body lying near her, she has caressed it, she knows it.

Yet the description of the Bridegroom is very far from reality. The body is too shiny. The beauty of the young man seems more that of a gilded statue than that of a human being. It is probable that she is comparing him to a work of Egyptian art. Ancient Egyptian sculpture was colorfully painted, and the flesh of males was painted red. Therefore she calls him "ruddy." (In SOS 7:2 we find concerning the bride the words, "Your belly is like an heap of wheat set about with lilies"; this image is explained by the fact that female sculptures were always painted yellow, the colour of wheat.)

The Egyptians also made bronze figures inlaid with gold, silver and copper. Surely we are reminded of this when the legs are described as columns of alabaster and the feet as gold. It was a common device in Egyptian statues. To the bride, these features represent stability and grandeur.

Here the young man's legs are described in their entirety; in SOS 7:1, only the feet of the girl are mentioned. In old Egyptian art, the legs of males were unclothed, whereas the legs of females were never revealed except in the cases of children, dancers or dolls.

What is said here about the Messiah has a deeper spiritual significance. He is white because he is God and, though a man, without sin. He is red from the many whippings and sufferings he has endured. He is white, to show sinners that their sins too, can become white. But the red also warns them of the coming vengeance of God against sinners.

"His eyes are as the eyes of doves." In jail I had the opportunity to observe the lives of doves. They nested in the prison walls. I never saw fierceness nor fury in their eyes. They were always loving. This verse reminds me of them.

Of the Bridegroom's hands, the bride says (according to the Authorized Version), "they are as golden rings set with the beryl" - a precious stone. The Hebrew says, "set in Tarshish." This is a strange word, for in the Bible it can mean either a personal name, a kind of ship or a country. Nobody knows for sure where the place called Tarshish was.

Here the use of this word teaches us to see God's loving hand in what is achieved by human hands, in material objects and in great events involving whole nations.

Modest brides do not describe their beloved's belly to their girlfriends. The bride sets aside the normal conventions of decency and does so. She wants to suggest to every soul that Jesus can be known in the most intimate embraces. What needs to be concealed? His naked body was displayed in public on the Cross.

She ends her description by saying, "He is altogether lovely" or, "He is all desires." Every desire of a bride can find fulfillment in him. "This is my beloved, and this is my friend." She is sure he is her beloved, though for a time he left her.

We see how beautiful Jesus is in the eyes of his bride, by the description of him in Christian poetry, and by the works of the great sculptors and painters. We also see his beauty in the heavenly music composed in his honour by renowned composers.

The persecuted Christians know his beauty. The pupil Atkociunaite told her teacher in Soviet Lithuania, "I don't care what you do to me. On the eve of Easter I will remain the whole night in adoration in the church." If he were not beautiful, nobody would spend a whole night looking at him in adoration!

In a book published secretly by the Orthodox Underground Church, the author writes:

> A man travelled on the shores of the Azov sea. He saw fishermen at work. The thought came to him, "If the sea contained no fish, nobody would be fishing. Nobody goes to a well that has no water. If there were no grace in the church, nobody would go there.
>
> A fool can go into a cellar and proclaim that there is no sun in the universe. Truly, for those in cellars there is none. So, there is no God, for those who are in the darkness of God-denial and evil."

Living under fierce persecution, this author writes, "God is richness, fullness of life, love. All beauty, all power, all good, is only in God." He writes thus, a member of a church whose people are jailed, tortured and killed.

The Orthodox priest Nicholas Ivassiuk was assassinated in Tchardjow, Turkmenia, on 5 December 1978. Six men in police uniforms entered his house. Next morning Ivassiuk was found dead. His eyes had been gouged out (just as happened with the Baptist Victor Sedletskii), and his body had been burned by cigarettes and red-hot irons. There were also numerous lacerations. He had been finished off with two bullets through the head. Such things belong to the ritual of Satanist sects. The crime was perpetrated on the eve of the Feast of St. Nicholas, whose name the priest bore, as a calculated mockery of the saint. Ivassiuk left five daughters.

And yet from such a place of cruelty and sorrow, the Orthodox Underground Church publishes writings full of joy, jubilation and adoration of the beauty of Jesus! They know what that beauty is. They have seen him.

Michaela, a Rumanian Orthodox nun, like all Orthodox and Catholic Christians, believed that the Communion bread and wine really are the body and blood of our Lord. Every time she looked at the Sacrament, she saw his intoxicating beauty. When the police took over the Vladimireshti convent, she protected the altar with her own body. For this she was thrown into prison and mistreated beyond description. But from her solitary cell she tapped out the gospel in Morse code through the wall to her fellow-prisoners until she died. She had seen his beauty, and would not give up sharing her love for him.

÷ Chapter 6 ÷

"Whither is your beloved gone?"

The bride is asked, "Whither is your beloved gone, O fairest among women? Whither is your beloved turned aside? That we may seek him with you." She replies, "My beloved is gone down into his garden, to the beds of spices, to feed in the gardens, and to gather lilies" (SOS 6:1-2). Now that the girls have heard from her what makes her Beloved greater than any other, they also seek him. It is enough that one soul should seek Jesus in utter sincerity; then others will join in the search for him. Thus the girls now ask, "Whither is your beloved gone?"

The bride knows that she is going to have to give good directions to those who ask. She is inspired; she gives a remarkable reply: "My beloved is gone down." For anyone who does not know Jesus, these are incomprehensible words. The celebrated Rabbi ben Ezra wrote this commentary on the text: "This - of the One who ascended on high? He is said to gather lilies, because He dwells with the angels who are the righteous ones." In the same way, most believers who have lost Jesus do not find him, because they think that now that they have fallen, he is far above them. But he did not ascend. He went down. He descended far below the level to which they have fallen, so as to be able to meet them in their misery. The bride who fell into sin by refusing to receive him in her home when he knocked on the door, now knows that "He has gone down."

In the beginning, God created man after his own image. When we lost that image, God came down and took upon himself the image of of man. He became incarnate, in a body like that of sinners. That is the way he always deals with us. If we cannot ascend to him, he descends to us. As ours sins increase, so does his grace. Because we cannot be saints, he puts himself on the same level as the sinners.

That is the only way in which continual fellowship with him is made possible.

Encounters with Communists do not only create heroes of the faith. Many believers fall away. In Rhodesia, Communist terrorists kidnapped Simon Chengeta, a black Member of Parliament and a Christian. They forced his son, Steven, to beat him to death. The son, who bears the name of Christianity's first martyr, could have refused. Probably the result would have been that they would have hacked him to death alongside his father, using somebody else to do the deed. But Steven did not want to die. So he fell away from the faith and became a parricide.

It is a privilege to become a hero by choosing to suffer instead of making the Son of God bleed. Those who make the right choice have the joy of loving and forgiving even their torturers. But not all make the right choice.

In Addis Ababa, the Communists arrested a couple with their older children. The children under six were left behind in their home. Nobody dared to bring them even a crust of bread. That might have been considered a crime punishable by death. Christ teaches us to help, even when the circumstances put our lives at risk. I have known German Christians who helped Jews, and Jewish Christians who later helped Germans, when they were persecuted by the Soviets, even though the punishment for such acts of love was death. In the case of that Ethiopian family, Christians opted to fall away from the law of love and from Christ. The children died of hunger. That falling away was absolute for those who believed that the pure Jesus is far above the fallen or backsliding sinner. But those who believed that Jesus had come down, found the way back to him.

Once I shared a cell with two Uniate bishops. Under torture they had "confessed" to being spies, black marketeers, and collaborators with the pre-revolutionary police. They "confessed" that they had denounced Communists and had caused their arrest. Their tears never ceased. (It is said of the apostle Peter, that to the end of his days he wept whenever a cock crowed.)

The bishops constantly reproached themselves for their lack of heroism. They did not know how heroic their "confessions" were. It was not the heroism of those who never give in, but heroism it was; a heroism of the fallen who know that though they are brought low, Christ went lower still, down to utter despair. So they found the courage to acknowledge their sinfulness - something rare among church leaders.

In Rumania, the Communists killed a Baptist pastor. At first a promising teacher, he later became an informer for the Secret Police. One of the pieces of information he passed on to the police concerned a secret meeting I had with a French Christian in Rumania. Everyone was suspicious of him. The brethren shunned him. He had no peace in his heart: he know that what he was doing was wrong.

He was astonished to find himself invited to the Lausanne Conference on Evangelism. After all, he was widely known to be a Communist agent. Once arrived in Switzerland, he criticized the true Christians in Rumania as lawbreakers; but all the time he could not understand why the pastors from the Free World, who had no obligations to the Secret Police, did not contradict him. Why were neither he nor the other Judases blamed?

In an attempt to ease his conscience, he confessed to a Western Christian publisher that he was working for the Communist Secret Police. The publisher smelt a good story and offered him an advance on a book. He was disappointed; he had hoped that this fellow-Christian would set him back on the right path.

He had to return to Rumania in the end. He was determined to repent. Soon he broke off all relations with the Police. They retaliated by staging a car "accident" in which he was killed.

But he had understood that Jesus has gone down, far below the depths to which he himself had sunk. He died at peace with the Lord, thanks to the prayers, love and forgiveness of the Underground Church.

A faithful Bridegroom

The bride says, "My beloved is gone down into his garden, to the beds of spices, to feed in the gardens, and to gather lilies. I am my beloved's, and my beloved is mine: he feeds among the lilies" (SOS 6:2-3). He who loves gardens and flowers has gone down into his garden to the bed of spices, which typify the various denominations. He picks lilies (spiritual believers) from them all. These keep their trust in him. They say, "I am my beloved's, and my beloved is mine." The bride retained this trust even though for a time he forsook her. God has sworn that he will be faithful. He will not lie to the disciples of David's Son. Our Bridegroom is always faithful.

Ion Cazacu was one of my best friends. During the Nazi occupation of Rumania he risked his life by "stealing" Jewish children from the ghettoes. The Jewish Christians in Iashi were in danger of death. Already, 11,000 Jews had been killed. The rest were not allowed to leave the city. Then a friendly official was persuaded at my request to issue warrants of arrest against all Hebrew Christians. As a result they were able to travel in comfortable train compartments as "prisoners," guarded by Cazacu, who was armed. Once they arrived safely in Bucharest, the order of arrest was torn up and the prisoners were brought to my house.

Cazacu and his wife were also the only people who succeeded in entering heavily guarded prisons with carloads of food for the hungry Christians in detention there. That is the sort of life lived by men who know that Christ is always faithful.

In Rhodesia, Communist guerrillas killed forty Catholic, Pentecostal and Salvationist missionaries, along with their families. The victims - a three-week-old baby among them - were beaten to death with hammers, bayonets and axes. Mrs. Pickering, the mother of one of the dead, said: "We have prayed that God may forgive our enemies. There is no bitterness in our hearts."

Tremendous things are happening in Poland. Those fed by Jesus among lilies organized, for the first time in world history, a strike of 600,000 workers brandishing such weapons as prayers, Christian hymns, and Holy Communion. They occupied the factories, but there were no violent words or deeds. The leaders were motivated by a Christian spirit. Their chief demands were full religious liberty, the Church's right to time on television and radio and the right to publish. The striking workers made it possible for the anti-Communist Cardinal Wyszinsky to preach on television after thirty years of prohibition.

A new phase of world history was opened by the Christian Lech Walesa, the Polish strike leader. A man powerful because of God's deep peace, he risked his life and his liberty. He did not remain an obscure private soldier in the Christian struggle. He realized that officers and generals were needed. He developed the necessary spiritual qualities, and God promoted him to a high rank.

Jesus is the only shepherd who feeds his flock in gardens, among lilies. That is something no other shepherd would do! But we expect the unusual from him.

Beautiful as Tirzah

The Bridegroom says:

> You are beautiful, my love, as Tirzah, comely as Jerusalem, terrible as an army with banners.
>
> Turn away your eyes from me, for they have overcome me: your hair is as a flock of goats that appear from Gilead.
>
> Your teeth are as a flock of sheep that go up from washing, whereof every one bears twins, and there is not one barren among them.
>
> As a piece of pomegranate are your temples within your locks.
> (SOS 6:4-7)

The Bridegroom compares his bride with the capitals of the two Jewish kingdoms: Tirzah - which means in Hebrew, "the pleasant" - was the capital of Israel until Omri built Samaria; and Jerusalem was the capital of Judah.

Faithful souls are sometimes sad, and ask themselves, "Do I deserve to become an inhabitant of the heavenly Jerusalem?" What a senseless question! In the eyes of the Bridegroom we are as pleasant and beautiful as Jerusalem itself. Therefore, naturally, that is where we should be.

The beauty of the bride makes her "terrible as an army," with the banners under which it advances to victory. We overcome the world by faith; and with our beauty, we overcome God as once he was overcome by Jacob, who wrestled with him.

The image of the army shows that by his "bride" not one individual is meant but the whole Church. The Church is "terrible for God" through the irresistible power of the attraction it has for him. We advance victoriously towards God. God wishes one thing; we, in prayer, express another wish, and so we can be conquerors. The Bridegroom pleads with the Church, "Turn away your eyes from me, for they have overcome me." God declares himself defeated. We defeat him, with our doves' eyes.

In Exodus we read that God had decided to destroy Israel after it had sinned by making the golden calf. But Moses defeated that plan of God. He made him change his mind (EXO 32). Every spiritual believer can do the same.

When the bride is with him, and he looks into her great pure, penetrating eyes, he lowers his own. The charm of her eyes is unbearable to him. The Bridegroom says, "Your eyes have overcome me." Rabbi ben Ezra translates this as, "They are stronger than me." The Septuagint renders it, "They have caused me to flee." Such can be our victory in prayer, through one loving look. Christians are called "more than conquerors." They are the conquerors of him who has overcome all.

When the apostles watched Jesus ascend into heaven, two angels came and stood by, and asked them, "You men of Galilee, why stand you gazing up into heaven?" (ACT 1:10-11). If they had continued looking, perhaps Jesus would have been unable to separate himself from the earth. He could not have ascended. Their eyes would have impressed him so much that they would have persuaded him to fulfill their longing that he should remain with them.

We have God's command: "Look unto me and be you saved, all the ends of the earth" (ISA 45:22). And in Solomon's Song we also have the command to the contrary: "Turn away your eyes from me." The latter verse serves as a warning to prying eyes, seeking out of curiosity to search mysteries which God has reserved only for himself.

The Bridegroom's words, "Your teeth are as a flock of sheep ... as a piece of pomegranate are your temples" are an almost verbatim repetition of the compliment which he pays the bride in chapter 4. Before she refused him access, he praised her. Now he pays her the same compliment, to show her that he has the same love for her after as before her fall. Even if his people are full of weakness, Jesus loves them. In the eyes of the king, the bride is as beautiful after her fall as she was on the day she was first presented to him. His love knows no alteration.

It is not necessary that the eyes of Christians be physically beautiful, for the bridegroom to be impressed. A Christian who has undergone torture is not a pretty sight.

A former Rumanian prisoner, R. Radina, describes his experiences in jail [in ~Testaments from the Death House~]:

> Religious poems were being recited when, all at once, a man with his head red with blood entered the cell. Maddened with pain, he could not speak, but only howled like an animal. The prison director had beaten his face with a stone.
>
> An imprisoned Christian child, Mihica, was beaten with a stick on his head and on his lame leg. His crime was that he had shared his bread with other sufferers. He had considered a slice of bread too sumptuous a meal to eat all by himself.

In Cambodia, women were tortured with poisonous spiders. In Sarsar Sdam, children were torn to pieces and old women nailed to the doors before their houses were set on fire. Prisoners were hanged on trees after their bellies were ripped open.

Pure souls whose eyes are swollen, ringed with dark circles, bleeding, lift up a loving look to the Bridegroom. He has suffered for us as the Son of God, for whom goodness and love were the norms. These souls, though sinners, have loved him. Having to conquer their own nature in order to be able to love at all, when they look at him in adoration they are unconquerable. The prayers of martyrs are not rejected.

Radina also tells the story of the Rumanian Uniate priest, Onofrei Pompei. He was abused and hanged in the loft of his house. When the assassins departed the rope broke, and the priest came back to consciousness. God can save a person. even when it seems that all hope is gone. After that experience, Onofrei spent years in Communist prisons. Radina says of him, "His expression radiated a strange light. He seemed a true saint." This is the look which conquers even God.

His harem

The Bridegroom says, "There are threescore queens, and fourscore concubines, and virgins without number. My dove, my undefiled, is but one; she is the only one of her mother, she is the choice one of she that bare her. The daughters saw her and blessed her; yes, the queens and the concubines, and they praised her" (SOS 6:8-9). Towards the end of his life Solomon had some 700 princesses as wives and 300 concubines. When he wrote the Song of Songs, they were fewer.

In the spiritual sense these words show us that all souls of believers are God's, that all the Christian churches are his. But we are not all equally loved. Only one is his dove, his undefiled, "the only one of her mother." There is one holy and apostolic Church, and it is made up of all the children of God. This Church is one, just as Noah's Ark in the period of the flood was one.

That does not mean, however, that those who are not members of it physically are excluded from the kingdom of God, or cannot be Jesus' sheep. There are some sheep which have to be brought into the true fold (JHN 10:16). The heart of Jesus embraces everybody in its love. But it is specially drawn to this choice dove, just as David, who had many wives, desired only Michal. Jesus longs for souls who belong to the only true Church with all their hearts.

In Communist lands, Jesus has his queens in every denomination. After eight years in prison I had grown accustomed to the routine. But one day a group of recently-arrested Orthodox priests were jailed. It was for them the very first day of the ordeal. It was winter; we sat on the bare concrete. From time to time, drunken guards would bawl "All priests out!" The priests were taken from the cells and were severely beaten. I had known one of them for many years, and I asked him: "Brother, are you grieved?" He answered, "I know only of one grief, that of not being a saint." In such circumstances, the words vividly showed the beauty of that soul, and made a lasting impression upon me.

Seventh-Day Adventists courageously stand up for their faith in Russia. Anatolii Miller, Karpenko Boris, Kovaltchuk and Galetskii are names of some of the Adventists who belong to Jesus and were jailed for their beliefs. The child, Michael Kozak, was kidnapped by the Communists from his parents, because they taught him the Adventist faith. When the child, who was interned in an atheistic boarding school, insisted on going back to his parents, he was put in a psychiatric asylum to be "healed" of this desire. In spite of such things, the Adventists remain faithful to their Saviour.

In Cernanti in the Soviet Union, the Sedletztzy family received the sealed coffin of their son, who had refused to give up his faith while serving in the army. The officers demanded an immediate burial, but the family opened the coffin. They found the youth's face distorted from beatings, the eyes gouged out, the tongue torn out, the fingers cut off. He was a Baptist, faithful unto death.

In Rumania it seemed that St. Basil the Great was alive again, because his words were on the lips of saints under interrogation. When a pastor was threatened with deportation, his reply was: "Where can you exile me? I will be in my Father's world wherever you send me."

To the threat of property confiscation, the reply was: "That's all right by me, but you will need a very long ladder. I have gathered my treasures in heaven."

"We will kill you!"

"We Christians do not fear death. It means passing over to a better life."

"You are fools. We will not kill you, but keep you all in a prison cell behind locked doors and iron bars. We will not allow anybody to visit you."

"We have a friend who can pass through locked doors and iron bars. We cannot be separated from the love of Christ."

Christians are those who have promised faithfulness to God unto death. God keeps his promise. He never breaks it. Neither should we.

A Catholic seminarian, Ion Budu, died near me in a Communist prison. His greatest wish had been to be a missionary in India or Japan. His last words to us who were with him were these: "If any of you ever go to Asia, tell the people there that I love them. May I die serving them through my longing for them, so that my death will be a sacrifice on their behalf." I am the only survivor of that prison ward of dying men. When I went to Asia I saw how deeply moved the people were, as I told them how they had been loved for Christ's sake by a prisoner who had died a martyr death.

Jesus has many queens in every denomination, but also he has concubines. Concubines are girls or women who have illegitimate relationships with men. The only consistent attitude towards the Communist authorities is the Underground Church. The official churches, which have compromised with Communism, are anti-churches. Some of their pastors or bishops are real believers, but they are believers who waver between two masters, - Christ and Communism. They serve Communism, but stealthily slip away from it to say words of love to Christ. When he was on earth, too, Jesus had his secret believers. There are now secret believers in Christ among the members of the Communist Party, and even among the officers of the Communist Secret Police. However, they do not want to lose their livings and their positions. What they are doing is wrong, but Jesus accepts them as his concubines.

The glory of the Church

> Who is she that looks forth as the morning, fair as the moon, clear as the sun, and terrible as an army with banners?
>
> I went down to the garden of nuts to see the fruits of the valley, and to see whether the vine flourished, and the pomegranates budded.
>
> Before ever I was aware, my soul made me like the chariots of Ammi-nadib.
>
> Return, return, O Shulamite; return, return, that we may look upon you. What will you see in the Shulamite? As it were the company of two armies.
>
> (SOS 6:10-13)

The description of the Church in chapter 6 is very like that in REV 12:1: "A woman clothed with the sun, and the moon under her feet." It is written in the Zohar:

> Israel's light will come little by little, until they will become strong. God will illumine them forever. All then will ask, "Who is she that looks forth like the dawn," this being a reference to the first tiny streak of the dawn; then "Fair as the moon," the light of the moon being stronger than that of the dawn, and then "clear as the sun," that is a still stronger light; and finally "terrible as an army with banners," expressive of the light in its full strength.

> For, just as when the dawn emerges from darkness its light at first is faint, but gradually brightens until full daylight is reached, so when God bestirs Himself to shine upon the Community of Israel, He will first shed on them a streak of light like that of the daybreak which is still black, then increase it to make it "fair as the moon," then "clear as the sun," until it will be "tremendous as an army with banners."

She shines so intensely because she has followed Jesus' example. He has gone down (SOS 6:2). The bride too has gone down. Jesus said to Zaccheus, "Make haste and come down." Whoever belongs to Jesus must humble himself.

The bride says, "I went down into the garden of nuts." There she has learned something important! A believing soul is like a nut. It might be dirty and muddy outwardly, but the dirt never reaches the kernel. It is the same with the Christian when he is polluted by living in this world.

Because she has humbled herself and gone down, the Bridegroom takes her up, in the chariot of Ammi-nadib. Some commentators believe Aminadib to have been the name of one of Solomon's celebrated chariot drivers. The speed of his driving would be symbolic of the swift response of the Saviour to the call of love. But the old Jewish interpreters divided the world thus: Ammi-nadib. This means, "the chariots of my willing, or princely, people."

Return, O Shulamite

Seeing her thus glorified, the other girls call out to her. They shout what the average man, for centuries, has shouted to those who sit near to Jesus in his chariot of of trials: "Return, return, O Shulamite; return, return!" The world is very demanding; it wants to draw us back to its own level.

At a jail in a Communist country, young officers would take girls out of the cells and invite them to go to restaurants with them. The girls, who had no fresh air in cells crammed with a hundred other unwashed people, were offered ice-cream and the cozy surroundings of a cinema, where they were shown erotic films. Most believers refused. One girl accepted. The Communists had been nice to her; she had to be nice too. The voice had been too insidious: "Return, O Shulamite. Love me. You probably do not know the blessedness of the love of a man. I'll reveal it to you. My kisses will warm you." She did not answer "I belong to God," as she should have done. Everything else followed.

When she was freed, she accepted an invitation to speak to her fellow-inmates, attacking the faith. As she spoke against Jehovah, tears rolled down her face. She had returned to the world, while the others, the true brides, had remained steadfast.

Oleg Berdyuk, a Ukrainian writer in jail, has described how he came to accept the faith. He was a child when an artificial famine engineered by the Communists killed six million Ukrainians. He went to visit a relative, but she had starved to death. In an open Bible on her table, he read Magdalene's words, "They have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid him." Turning round, she saw Jesus, who asked her, "Woman, why do you weep?" The one she had considered dead was alive! (JHN 20:13-15).

That impressed him, but the Church disgusted him. Once he heard a priest chanting in the sanctuary, "God, grant a long life to Stalin, God's chosen one, devout Christian and leader." That was how religious stooges referred to the murderer of millions of innocents. This left him open to the call of the world: "Return, O Shulamite." He became an atheist.

But then he dreamed two dreams. In one, he saw Christ with an incredible weight on his shoulders, blood streaming down his body, his eyes sorrowful yet hopeful. In another dream, Christ, wearing a crown of thorns, showed him raging torrents, high mountains and cliffs, and said, "Follow the path." He asked, "Why?" Christ replied only "Go."

Then one day he seemed to feel the presence of Christ while he was awake. It was not a thought about Christ. It was Christ himself. Oleg knelt and said the only words that hallow God: "I accept all that fate brings." These words are similar to those of the virgin Mary: "Be it unto me according to your word." [LUK 1:38]

And now, for the first time, we discover the name of the bride. It is "Shulamite"; the Shulamite is the same person as the Shunamite. The bride's name is a reference to Abishag the Shunamite, one of David's concubines.

In Hebrew the word ~shulamite~ means "peacemaker." It is a name like ~Solomon~ which means "peace." The bride is a female Solomon. Jesus is the Prince of Peace (ISA 9:6), and the Church is the princess of peace, the Shulamite. Those who look at her can only think she is beautiful, accompanying angels in their dance.

The persecuted Church in truth "looks forth as the morning" and is "fair as the moon, clear as the sun." The Orthodox monk Michael Ershov was in jail for forty-five years. While in prison he has healed many possessed, lame and blind people. What reason could have have for complaining or grumbling against Christianity? Instead of doing so, he used even his life in prison for doing good.

Kiwanukas, a trustee of the Jesus to the Communist World Mission in Uganda, died in 1977. Together with fourteen other Christians, he was murdered by a hammer-blow to the head. His head was then cut off and taken to president Amin's house. His body was thrown into a lake.

Bishop Luwumba was asked by Amin whether he had any weapons. The Bishop showed him the Bible. Amin shot him first in the mouth, then in the chest. This murderer of Christians drank his blood and ate a piece of the victim's flesh. His advisers assisted him.

Despite such sufferings, the bride of Christ continues to spread the knowledge of his beauty in dark Uganda. She in truth looks forth as the morning and is fair as the moon, clear as the sun.

What a beautiful soul is the Russian believer Ghenadii Shimanov! Because he was an active believer who sought to win souls for Christ, he was put into a psychiatric asylum. There, Dr. Shafran argued with him: "Why won't you abandon your way of life, and hold on to your life, your freedom, and the happiness of your family? You could also keep the core of your faith intact. All you have to do is to give up propagating it. It only brings you sorrow. The odds are against you. You have the whole State opposed to you. In this sort of situation, every fight becomes an act of suicide. And what does your religion say about suicide? It forbids it. So, you see...

"One of my neighbours is a priest. We live in the same house. He is high in the Moscow patriarchy, an educated, intelligent man. One day he said to me, 'Religion and life are two completely separate things which shouldn't be allowed to mix.' A highly intelligent man! He can help you to reach decisions of which you are not capable on your own. Or do you prefer the martyr's crown?"

  Shimanov replied briefly to the psychiatrist. "The devil is smart."
  Shafran demanded, "Am I the devil?"
  "Oh, no. What ideas you have! I wasn't speaking about you. I am speaking about the devil. The real one."
  Shimanov refused to abandon his Christian activities. He remained in the asylum. He had to endure gagging and straightjackets. But he looked forth as the morning. He was fair as the moon, clear as the sun.
  The end of verse 13 [SOS 6:13] would be better translated, "two companies of ~mahanaim~," a category of angels which specializes in sacred dancing. When God the king entered into his sanctuary, "Singers went before, the players on instruments followed after; among them were the damsels playing with timbrels" (PSA 68:24-25). So it happens when the Shulamite meets her Bridegroom. In GEN 32:1-2 it is written, "Jacob went on his way, and the angels of God met him. And when Jacob saw them, he said, "This is God's host": and he called the name of that place ~Mahanaim~."

÷ Chapter 7 ÷

The holy dance

The Bridegroom says:

> "How beautiful are your feet with shoes, O prince's daughter! the joints of your thighs are like jewels, the work of the hands of a cunning workman.
> Your navel is like a round goblet, which wants not liquor: your belly is like a heap of wheat set about with lilies.
> Your two breasts are like two young roes that are twins.
> Your neck is as a tower of ivory; your eyes like the fishpools in Heshbon, by the gate of Beth-rabbim: your nose is as the tower of Lebanon which looks toward Damascus.
> Your head upon you is like Carmel, and the hair of your head like purple; the king is held in the galleries."

(SOS 7:1-5)

The bride is here described as a dancer. People have always danced to the glory of their God. After they passed through the Red Sea, the Israelite women "went out after [Miriam the prophetess] with timbrels and with dances" (EXO 15:20). When David returned from his victory over Goliath, "women came out of all the cities of Israel, singing and dancing, to meet King Saul" (1SM 18:6). David danced mightily before God; Ecclesiastes says that there is a time to dance (ECC 3:4). Jephthah's daughter came to meet him with timbrels and dances (JDG 11:34). Jeremiah prophesied that girls would rejoice with dancing when Jacob was ransomed. And when the prodigal son returned to his father, there was music and dancing.

The Shulamite also dances. She dances gracefully, like a true princess. Again her beauty is described to us, but with different imagery to that used before, because no earthly analogy alone ii adequate to portray all the splendour of a faithful soul.

The description of the bride at this stage of her spiritual growth - after she has fallen into the sin of refusing to receive him - reveals her as more beautiful than she was immediately after the wedding. The sinner who repents is more beautiful in God's eyes than the righteous person; therefore the angels find greater joy in looking upon such a person.

One realizes, reading these verses, that the Bridegroom cannot find enough words to show his love to the bride who returns to him. He borrows images of oriental sensuality, and gives such free rein to his imagination that the translator is tempted to water down the vividness of the original. Solomon uses language which nobody in the West would dare to use, except to describe a woman abandoning herself totally, without reservation. It is the language which Solomon used to speak of the dancers in his harem. The Bridegroom praises even the most intimate charms of his bride. He praises her beauties, and she praises his. He honours us; we honour him.

His first word of praise is, "How beautiful are your feet with shoes." She has shod her feet with the preparation of the gospel of peace (EPH 6:15). Hers are the shoes of messengers bringing good news, telling of peace and salvation.

"The joints of your thighs are like jewels, the work of the hands of a cunning workman." Saint Paul says that the Body of Christ - the Church - gets its nourishment by the joints (COL 2:19). This is an image of those pastors who lead their flocks well and teach them. Such pastors are jewels in the eyes of God.

The bride dances naked before the king, or wrapped in flimsy veils. Fascinated by her dance and her body, he exclaims, "Your navel is like a round goblet, which wants not liquor; your belly is like a heap of wheat set about with lilies." The belly is the organ from which food is distributed to the whole body. So it is also the secret castle, that which gives the bride a choice wine mixed with spices, which animates all her spiritual life. (The word translated as "liquor" means in Hebrew "mixture," indicating the variety of blessings she receives.)

Her two breasts are like "two young roes that are twins." This means that both Old and New Testaments are a delight to her.

Her neck is like "a tower of ivory." The neck, uniting the head and the body, is a symbol of faith. This means that her faith cannot be strangled.

Her nose is like the tower of Lebanon, one of the towers built by David in the north of Palestine to serve as an observation post against the Syrians.

It is important that believers have a keen sense of smell. They must discern the spirits. As from the tower of Lebanon one could see enemy armies from afar, so the bride scents heresy which is far off.

Our intellect prefers to see the similarities between doctrines rather than the differences between them. Consequently it gives vague information. We need a nose like the bride's, capable of discerning the spirits. Pastors in the Underground Church need such a nose to discover Communist infiltrators.

The tower looks towards Damascus, the capital of Syria, always Israel's enemy. To her enemies she is "terrible as an army with banners."

Her head is "like Carmel," a hill full of rich vegetation. She has a beautiful abundance of red hair. The Nazirites were a kind of monk living at that time. No razor ever passed over their heads. It was believed that the secret of their power lay in their hair. The bride's power of attraction also resides in the richness of her hair, those locks that bind the King of Kings.

There are not enough words to describe the beauty of the bride of Christ under persecution today. In Guinea in Africa, under the dictator Sekou Toure, Cardinal Tchidimbo and other Christians were kept for up to eight days without food or water in the tropical heat, in cells full of rats, lice and insects. The cables which bound them cut into their flesh. They were flogged and called "Christian dirt." Three hundred prisoners were locked into a single unventilated room, where they suffocated.

Others were given electric shocks while their hands were tied to iron bars placed so high that only the tips of their toes reached the floor. For days the full weight of their bodies was taken by their tied hands.

Some were forced to kneel on sharp stones. Their skin was flayed and pepper was poured on their open wounds. Hot pepper was introduced into the rectum; this is a torture which produces unspeakable pain. All the time they were told, "If you denounce others, we will give you water."

Some died; they did not become Judases. The Cardinal survived, and, after his release, he wrote in Rome a splendid book demonstrating how suffering has purified him and made him love the Bridegroom more.

In South Africa, the Communist-backed terrorists, supported by the leftist World Council of Churches, hacked pregnant women to death. They slit the throats of babies. They peeled the skin from an old man's face, and left him to die in the blazing sun, impaled on a barbed-wire fence. They cut off lips. They gouged out eyes. But the bride of Christ in South Africa remains unafraid.

One of the strangest verses in the whole book follows the praise of the bride: "The king is held in the galleries." The Hebrew word translated as "held" is ~asar~ which also means "imprisoned with chains and fetters." The word ~rahat~ which the Authorized Version here renders as "gallery" is in GEN 30:38,41 translated as "gutters."

All Jewish commentators agree that the king spoken of here is the Messiah. The ~Kabbalah~ says that he does not come yet, because God keeps him bound in heaven in golden chains. Others believe that he is bound there with locks of women's hair, which are like eddies of water in water troughs. Hence this image. He ardently wishes to come, but God restrains him in this way.

We cannot accept these fancies. The Messiah has come. Jesus is his name. The explanation of the verse is much simpler than those above. The king has found himself a bride in the world's gutter. Publicans, crooks, loose women, murderers, those of us with more "respectable" sins - all of us are lost. When we are converted he admires the beauties of our souls, described in detail in the preceding verses. His love for his bride binds him to her as if with fetters.

Jesus admires his bride

The Bridegroom says:

> "How fair and how pleasant are you, O love, for delights!
> This your stature is like to a palm tree, and your breasts to clusters of grapes.
> I said, I will go up to the palm tree, I will take hold of the boughs thereof: now also your breasts shall be as clusters of the vine, and the smell of your nose like apples.
> And the roof of your mouth like the best wine for my beloved, that goes down sweetly, causing the lips of those that are asleep to speak."
> (SOS 7:6-9)

There will never be anything more delightful than love which bears all things, believes all things and hopes and endures all; love which is extended even to enemies and beyond the grave; love which gives its life for the beloved.

Love is the wisest thing. That is why the Syriac translation calls this book, ~The Wisdom of the Wise~.

Jesus speaks to the bride in the language of admiration. We must not be surprised at this. Faithfulness was a part of Jesus' nature. For him it was natural to be faithful. He came from heaven. But faithfulness is practised also by many downtrodden, wronged men of this earth, who do not understand the reason for their suffering. They still maintain their faithful, pure love for God, and that is something for which God himself has admiration.

I knew a railway worker who was a Christian. His only daughter, whom he loved very much, died when she was fourteen. She was drowned head-downwards in a ditch full of sewage. The man did not torment himself with doubts, but continued in his love for God, and was prepared to suffer imprisonment for his sake. God made our souls pleasant and beautiful, and he admires us as an artist admires his work.

The stature of the bride is like that of a palm tree - straight, powerful, high and gracious. The palm tree was an emblem of Israel. A medal was struck for the Roman Emperor Titus, who destroyed the Jewish state. It bore the figure of a grieving woman seated beneath a palm tree. The inscription read, ~Judea capta~ - "Judaea is taken." She might be a captive, but Israel was still a palm tree, standing erect, refusing to bow to heathen idolatry.

The Bridegroom says to himself, "I will go up to the palm tree, I will take hold of the boughs thereof." He is expressing his desire to be strongly united with the believing soul. Let us take heed of the words "I will go up." There are believers towards whom Jesus "goes up." He said that there are some who will do greater works than his (JHN 14:12). Towards those disciples, he ascends. He will grasp the boughs of these palm trees. When he does so, it will be seen whether they are strong and resistant or not. A palm tree which he embraces becomes sanctified.

Not only in Solomon's temple, but also in Ezekiel's ideal temple, there were figures of palm trees as well as cherubim.

The use of the palm tree as a symbol for a bride is emphasized by the Hebrew text in these passages, since the word used for "palm tree" is not the usual ~tamar~, but its female form, ~timmorah~. [1KI 6; 1KI 7; EZE 40; EZE 41]

The bride's breasts "shall be as clusters of the vine." Just as grapes refresh a man, so Jesus is refreshed by our fruitfulness, by our work for him. One of the characteristics of oriental love is that it takes pleasure in anticipating its joys beforehand. So Jesus exults beforehand, in the joy which he will receive from faithful souls.

In the entire Soviet Republic of Moldavia, there were only two Catholic churches. One of them, in Sloboda-Rashkovo, was bulldozed to the ground by the police. They are mindless. They destroyed the physical building, yet the church is now more beautiful than it was before.

The Catholics, weeping, lifted from the mud the church's Communion wafers, which they believed to be the real body of Christ. They ate them with reverence. Walls had been torn down, but the Christians' reverence for God had increased. Jesus "goes up" toward such believers.

In the Soviet Union the police frequently raid meetings of the Baptist Underground Church, confiscating Bibles, hymnbooks, and the private purses of some of the believers. They kick Christians in the belly and in the chests. The Communists are mad. Usually the believers, while they are being beaten, pray and sing. Such music has a spiritual beauty of its own. To these believers, Jesus says, "How fair and pleasant are you, O love, for delights!" These are the Christians likened by him to palm trees, to whom he goes up.

The Communists do not know the words of Gregory of Palama: "The Christian's life is outside, beyond, and higher than its physical self." "Truth," wrote Luther, "becomes more triumphant when attacked, more glorious when oppressed."

"Come, my beloved"

The bride says: "Come, my beloved, let us go forth into the field; let us lodge in the villages. Let us go up early to the vineyards; let us see if the vines flourish, whether the tender grapes appear, and the pomegranates bud forth: there I will give you my loves" (SOS 7:11-12).

We are the object of two desires. God says to Cain," Sin lies at the door. And its desire is for you" (GEN 4:7). In Psalm 45 it is written, "Harken, O daughter, and consider, and incline your ear; forget also your own people, and your father's house; so shall the king greatly desire your beauty" (PSA 45:10-11). Two powers compete for our love.

And now she who has chosen Jesus will demonstrate how greatly she desires him. She says, "Come, my beloved, let us go forth into the field; let us lodge in the villages." Faithful souls hate towns full of sin and noise. It is difficult to serve the Lord if things continually distract you. Isaac went out into the field to meditate quietly (GEN 24:63). Jesus advises us, "When you pray, enter into your closet, and when you have shut your door, pray to your Father" (MTT 6:6). The bride does not seek amusement in noisy places. She desires solitude. She doesn't want Jesus to judge the Church with the same judgement that will be meted out to the spoilt residents of the town. Jesus will see the reality of her faith in a quiet, rural environment. In company with him, she will go early to the vineyard to see if the vines are flourishing and whether the tender grapes have appeared. They will examine souls, to see whether they have grown in grace and truthfulness.

Wang-Min-Dao, a hero of the faith in China, broke under torture and acknowledged before a large crowd, "I am an anti-revolutionary criminal. I am grateful to the government for pardoning me and saving me from the depths of my sins." But he repented later. He went to the police station with his wife and said, "I am a Judas. I have betrayed my Lord. Imprison me." He sat in jail for over twenty years. Now he is free in Red China.

If the Bridegroom and the bride go up to the vineyards of Red China, they will find that the vine has flourished, and the tender grape has appeared.

In Omsk, in Russia, the Baptist Church was celebrating Easter. Its members had gathered at the home of Sister Helen Siusa. Thirty policemen, mostly drunk, rushed in and jumped upon the believers. They ruthlessly beat up everybody, including old people, women and children.

When the police tried to arrest the preachers, men who had already been in prison, the children cried, "We will not give up our fathers!" Their tears were heartrending, but the police did not think so. They kicked them with their boots and shouted: "You are enemies of the people! You should have no work and no food! There is no law to protect you!"

The Christians, however, were unafraid. That same afternoon they held their worship service again in the same house.

A Russian Pentecostal believer, Vashtshenko, had been twice in prison. His four sons carried on his work. One of them, Hariton, became a Pentecostal bishop. His children were asked to deny Christ and to blaspheme in school. They refused to comply. They were taken away from their parents and put into an atheistic boarding school. Their mother was forbidden to visit them. This is what they wrote to their parents: "We weep at night. The boys beat us. But do not worry, Papa and Mama, for God is our protection. We weep because we are not allowed to come home."

Their daughter, Valia, refused to eat without saying grace. She was mocked but with other Christian children, she continued to thank God for her food. She wrote: "The director shouts at us and this is good; the bigger our sorrow, the nearer we are to God. By God's will I shall remain a believer. I do not want to learn anything in this atheistic school."

An Orthodox priest, Talantov, and his son were killed by the Communists. His other son, Boris, continued to witness openly for Christ. For this he also was put into prison, where he died.

The Baptist preacher Peter Vins died in prison for his faith. His wife too was in prison for three years. Their son George, General Secretary of the Baptist Union of the USSR, also went to jail.

The bride can quietly call the heavenly Bridegroom to get up early to go with her to the vineyard. They will see the vine flourish and the tender grapes appear. Christianity in Communist countries bears rich fruit for God.

A pleasant perfume

The bride says, "The mandrakes give a smell, and at our gates are all manner of pleasant fruits, new and old, which I have laid up for you, O beloved" (SOS 7:13).

The precise identification of the mandrake is unknown. It could be the cantaloupe. This has a pleasant perfume, which typifies the perfume spread in this world by believers; especially by young believers who have been born into a family of the faithful and have not known the life of sin.

In antiquity the fruit and roots of the mandrake were thought to have aphrodisiac qualities. Leah gave mandrake to Rachel. [GEN 30:14-16] The fragrance we spread in the world stimulates the faculty of love in others.

Unlike the evil workers in the vineyard who have withheld their harvest from the master, the bride has laid up fruits at the gate. He is not greedy; he is not in a hurry to collect them; he allows them to mature.

We know how to keep the fruits which were not picked by the master, just as women know how to preserve fruit. The bride has kept new and old fruit for her master." Every scribe who is instructed unto the kingdom of heaven is like unto a man that is a householder, who brings forth out of his treasure things new and old" (MTT 13:52)

÷ Chapter 8 ÷

"If you were my brother"

The bride says:

"O that you were as my brother, that sucked the breasts of my mother! When I should find you without, I would kiss you; yes, I should not be despised.

I would lead you, and bring you into my mother's house, who would instruct me: I would cause you to drink of spiced wine of the juice of my pomegranate.

His left hand should be under my head, and his right hand should embrace me.

I charge you, O daughters of Jerusalem, that you stir not up, nor awake my love, until he please.

Who is this that comes up from the wilderness, leaning upon her beloved?

I raised you up under the apple tree. there your mother brought you forth: there she brought you forth that bore you.

Set me as a seal upon your heart, as a seal upon your arm: for love is strong as death; jealousy is cruel as the grave: the coals thereof are coals of fire, which has a most vehement flame.

Many waters cannot quench love, neither can the floods drown it: if a man would give all the substance of his house for love, it would be utterly condemned."

(SOS 8:1-7)

The most intimate of relationships with Jesus cannot be expressed in public. Before the world, we may only have the relationship between brother and sister, in which kisses are considered respectable.

The Shulamite is modest. She knows how far she is from what a wife should be. She still has to learn. So, she says that if she should find him, she would lead him into her mother's house, the Church.

What daring words she uses! We are accustomed to think he leads us as king, shepherd and teacher. But we can also lead him - by prevailing love and prevailing prayer. In fact a contest is taking place. He wishes to lead us to the mansions he has prepared for us in his Father's house: we insist on first taking him to the house of our mother (we shall speak further of this). There, the bride will learn to give him spiced wine, the juice of her pomegranate. The mother, the Church, has long experience of the kind of adoration which pleases him. We all have to learn from her.

The bride's friends ask, "Who is this that comes up from the wilderness leaning upon her beloved?" First it was the Jewish people. Now, it is the Church and every individual believing soul. Every "coming out" from the wilderness is a "coming up."

The wilderness is exhausting. You cannot come out of it in your own strength, but only by leaning upon the Beloved. The literal translation is, "her arm under his arm-pit" - an expression of great familiarity.

She says, "I raised you up under the apple tree." We believers raise up the Saviour through our prayer. The disciples woke him up repeatedly during a storm: "Awake! why do you sleep? Awake!" This is also the frequent prayer of the Psalmist.

She prays that she might keep his love: "Set me as a jewel upon your heart, as a seal upon your arm." Men in the Orient sometimes wear, on their breast or on their arm, jewels with the portrait or the name of their bride engraved on them. She wants the Beloved to have such a jewel. She would like to be a seal on his heart, so that nothing else might enter. The soul wants to know for certain that it will remain in God's love.

The bride's prayer has been fulfilled. John's Gospel tells us that Jesus said on the Cross the word which is rendered in Greek as ~tetelestai~ - "It is finished." In the New Testament all Jesus' words are translated, for he spoke in Aramaic. The word he must have actually used is ~kalah~. It has two meanings. One is "It has been accomplished" or "finished." The other is, "bride." It is possible that his very last word before death was a loving sigh for his bride.

Of some souls God has said, "I have engraved you upon my hand." God says to a believer who has reached this spiritual state, as he said to Zerubbabel, "I will take you O Zerubbabel and will make you as a signet; for I have chosen you" (HAG 2:23). But before this is fulfilled, terrible things must happen.

What God says to Zerubbabel is: "I will overthrow the throne of kingdoms, and I will destroy the strength of the kingdoms of the heathen; and I will overthrow the chariots, and those that ride in them; and the horses and their riders shall come down, every one by the sword of his brother. In that day ... will I take you ... as a seal (the same word as is translated "signet" in HAG 2:23).

Sometimes we pray foolishly. We are like doctors who would like to destroy tuberculosis but object to the destruction of the microbes that cause it. We want the kingdom of God, the only state in which we will know in perfection what it is like to be near the Beloved; but as often as something happens that signals the destruction of Satan's kingdom, we make intercession: "Don't let anything be destroyed!" The churches storm heaven with their prayers.

That is what I alluded to when I compared the desire of the Bridegroom, who wants to lead us into his Father's mansions, to that of the bride, who wants to lead him to her mother's house. We will come to be a seal on his heart only when our prayers quieten down, to "Hallowed be thy name, thy kingdom come, thy will be done" - though know that this will involve the perishing of all those who, despite having had a better light offered to them, oppose it.

Even when you have arrived at this place, vigilance is necessary. The assurance that one is in the favour of God can only be maintained by patience, goodness and righteousness.

Love is like death

Now the bride brings arguments to show why she has such pretensions, and why she makes such demands.

Death and love have many common features. Just as nothing can resist death or avoid it, and in the end everything must come under the law of death, so it is with love. He whom death assails, must die; he whom love assails, must love. The phenomenon of death makes man understand that there are limits to human power.

However, I cannot resist telling a joke in this context. A pastor was once delivering a thundering sermon about sin and hell. "One thing is certain!" he said. "Every man, woman and child in this parish will die one day. There is no escape!"

A boy in the front seat began to laugh.

"Every person in the parish will one day die!" the pastor reiterated.

The boy continued to laugh.

"What are you laughing at?" demanded the pastor angrily.

"I'm not from this parish!" said the boy.

Death happens of necessity. There is no point in dissipating energy in struggling against it. It can be postponed for a time, but not escaped. So with love. You cannot decide with whom you will fall in love. There are two people destined for each other: when they meet, the barriers fall. Because of love, Edward VIII of Britain gave up the throne of an empire, for a divorced woman; King Charles II of Rumania did the same. The elect bride can do no other than love Jesus ardently. He can do no other than love her.

It seems at first glance strange that the bride could not have found more appropriate images of love than death and the grave. The ~Zohar~ asks the question whether God's words when he finishes the creation - "And behold, it was very good" (GEN 1:31) - included in their meaning the Angel of Death. The ~Zohar~ concludes:

> Concerning this mystery, R. Simeon gave us the following explanation: "And behold it was good" refers to the Angel of Life; "very" to the Angel of Death, for he is of greater importance. And why? When the Holy One, blessed be He, created the world, all was prepared for the coming of man, who is the king of this world. Man was fashioned to walk in the straight way, as it is written: "God has made man upright, but they have sought out many inventions" (ECC 7:29). He made man upright, but he gave himself over to corruption and was therefore driven out of the Garden of Eden. This garden was planted by the Holy One, blessed be He, on the earth, and made an exact likeness of its prototype, the Paradise above, and all supernal forms were fashioned and shaped in it, and the cherubs were there - not those carved in gold or any material that could be fashioned by human hands, but of supernal light, fashioned and broidered through the agency of the perfect Name of the Holy One. All the images and forms of all things in this world were there fashioned, all having the similitude of the things in this world. And this place is the abode of holy spirits, both of those that have come into this world, and also of those that have not yet come into this world.

> Those that are about to come are invested with garments and with faces and bodies like those in this world, and they gaze upon the glory of their Lord until the time comes for them to appear in the world. When they leave > the Garden for that purpose, these spirits put off their celestial bodies and garments and take on the bodies and garments of this world; they henceforth make their abode in this world in the garments and bodies fashioned from the seed of procreation. So when the time comes for the spirit to leave this world again, it cannot do so until the Angel of Death has taken off the garment of this body. When that has been done, he again puts on that other garment in the Garden of Eden of which he had had to divest himself when he entered this world. And the whole joy of the spirit is in that celestial body. In it he rests and moves, and contemplates continually the supernatural mysteries which, when he was in the earthly body, he could neither grasp nor understand. When the soul clothes herself with the garments of that world, what delights, what joys, she experiences! And who caused the body to be inhabited by the spirit? Why, he who took off the garment of flesh, the Angel of Death!

The bride sees nothing wrong in death, which brings her into his embrace. For her, it is natural to compare love to death.

In the fourth century AD, in Sebaste in Armenia, forty young Christians were sentenced to death by freezing. In winter they were forced to go naked into a river. They were told that if they denied their faith, they would be allowed to come out and warm themselves at a fire that was ready on the shore. The mother of one of them helped her son to enter the vehicle in which they were to be taken to the river. She did not weep, but said, "Go, walk with your brethren. Don't linger. Do not arrive in the Lord's presence after them."

One of them did recant. But then a soldier watching on the shore saw an angel descend from heaven, with forty crowns in his hand. He placed a crown on every head, but was left with one over; the youth for whom it was intended had fled the Angel of Death, the harbinger of the final triumph.

The soldier immediately stripped off his clothes and plunged into the cold water, shouting, "I am coming, Angel!" He died with the rest. That is how brides feel and act.

Just as death is impressed by nothing, and cannot be bribed or persuaded not to act, so is love. Love for God, just like death, takes away from man the desire for transitory things. Just as death never releases its prey, neither does love.

Surely, this is what the love of God towards us is like. For his beloved bride, he puts aside his glory, his righteousness, his law, his divinity, his eternity. For her he becomes a slave. He dies on a cross - for her. His love is a love to the end.

His jealousy is cruel as the grave. It is love's legitimate reaction against any insults brought to it by the beloved. He is jealous when we fall into idolatry. We, for our part, have to be jealous and intolerant of the things that belong to our lower nature. Our prayer is, "Lord, be jealous of me; and do not give me into the hand of anything else."

A book without the word "God"

The bride says, "The coals [of jealousy] are coals of fire, which has a most vehement flame." The Authorized Version here translates exactly what is in the Masoretic Hebrew text. However, some Jewish copyists wondered how it was that this biblical book contains no mention of God. Therefore, in some manuscripts they divided the last word of this verse, shalhebetiah ("vehement flame"), into shalhebet-Jah - "flame of the Lord" (Jah being the older form of Jehovah). The same is found in several English translations.

This is acceptable but superfluous. God resonates in every verse in this book. God is love. Where bride and Bridegroom show burning, loyal feelings towards each other, when you have said "love" you have said "God." In this Song, mutual love and the giving of self to each other, and to the One to whom they less directly belong, is religion itself. There is no need to dress it up with religious phraseology. Solomon's Song does not include the word "God." But it is an eloquent proof of his existence.

The philosopher, Immanuel Kant, said that the moral law demands that men be rewarded in proportion to their virtues. Since in everyday life evil men often fare better than those who are good, it follows that there must be another existence, and there must be a God who gives rewards in eternity. Brides like the one in Solomon's Song surely do not get their rewards on earth.

Vincent Van Gogh was a preacher in a squalid mining village in Belgium. He became more humble than the humble, and renounced everything: house, clothes and food. He overwhelmed his hearers with his evangelical fervour. During a typhoid epidemic he gave away as bandages even the few rags that he wore. Then he discovered his talent for painting. Now, over ninety years later, his paintings sell for millions. But Van Gogh himself never made any money from his art. He continued to live in the darkest misery, creating master-works.

Chinese Christians have always endured suffering with fortitude. During the Boxer Rebellion, when killers entered the house of sister Ming, she asked them to allow her the favour of changing her dress. She then put on her bridal gown and most beautiful ornaments. For her, death was a wedding feast. And so she died.

Prisoners brought to the Wronski jail in Poland were asked, "Who among you is a believing Christian?" All stepped forward.

"We have kneeling chairs for you," they were told.

The prisoners were then made to kneel on ordinary stools. "Pray aloud!" they were ordered. "And take your shoes off!" During their prayers, blows fell on their bare feet. The Christians all had difficulty walking next day.

In Wronski, the cells are cold. Many windows are broken. Christmas dinner consisted of plain bread and overcooked potatoes, yet the prisoners had to work at felling trees. Whoever stayed in the toilet more than five minutes received truncheon blows.

"Many waters cannot quench love, neither can the floods drown it." God, loving the little Israel, did not forsake it for the cause of some mighty empire. On the contrary, he gave other nations as a ransom for Israel. The love of God for the faithful soul will last forever. This is the summary of this whole book, and its moral. The love magnified in this book is true love, which does not lose heart when faced with great danger. It is a love which inspires courage and sacrifice, preferring voluntary poverty to servile richness; a love which hates with vigour everything which is false and mean; a love which matures into calmness and faithfulness.

Priceless love

"If a man would give the substance of his house for love, it would utterly be condemned." Such love is not for sale. Like wisdom, it cannot be bartered for gold. It cannot be bought with silver.

It is written in the Bible, "Buy truth." (PRO 23:23) Jesus said, "I counsel you to buy of me gold tried in the fire, that you may be rich; and white raiment, that you may be clothed" (REV 3:18). Interpreting words like these, upon which he had not meditated very profoundly, Simon the sorcerer offered money to the apostles, and said to them, "Give me also this power, that on whomsoever I lay hands, he may receive the Holy Ghost" (ACT 8:19). His fault was that he did not understand spiritual things. God's gifts cannot be bought with money. Isaiah says, "Buy wine and milk without money and without price" (ISA 55:1).

The commandment is strict: it is forbidden to pay for God's gifts with money.

To simply give everything is the responsibility of all Christians. Simon sinned by the fact that he still had money, and he offered it to the disciples in exchange for something. The first Christians gave everything at the time of their conversion.

The gifts of God can be bought, but it is through the renunciation of sin and vanity. Moreover, riches are incompatible with love; the believer must consistently refuse the hope of riches. As Jesus refuses our money and seeks us, so the bride must seek not his gifts, but Jesus himself.

A missionary, captured by the Chinese Communists some years ago, was about to be beheaded. Suddenly she began to laugh. Her captors asked, "What is so funny about being beheaded?"

"I was just thinking," she replied, "how ridiculous my head would look rolling down the hill!" They let her go. With this sister, love was as strong as death.

After the Russian Revolution a civil war raged for many years between the conservative population and their foes, the Communists. At that time an Orthodox priest, walking down the street, saw five soldiers of the conservative White Army tie a Communist soldier to a tree and prepare to execute him. On seeing the priest, the officer who led the firing squad greeted him with the usual Russian greeting, "Bless us, father."

"I can't bless a killing," answered the priest.

Moved, the officers freed their prisoner.

A few weeks later a woman called that priest to administer the last rites to her dying son. As he entered the house, the priest heard the son yell to his mother, "Why did you call a priest? All those villains must be killed! I am a Communist. I can't stand priests."

But then, recognizing the priest, he exclaimed, "You are the one who saved me from being shot. You said, "I can't bless a killing." Do you see the big knife on the table? My assignment was to kill you with it. If you had known that, would you still have stopped my execution?"

"Even in that case," replied the priest, "I would not have blessed the killing, because God has forgiving love for us all. God has sent me a second time to save you."

A minute later, the man was dead, but all the hatred had disappeared from his face. The love of that priest was also stronger than death.

In the Soviet Union, there still are brothers and sisters in psychiatric asylums. A letter smuggled out told of Sitchovka, a prisoner in an asylum, who was shown a straitjacket by a Secret Police officer posing as a doctor. He said, "Don't worry - we won't use it on you. We've got something better; the chemical straitjacket."

The prisoner was led into a room where cats, under the influence of an alkaloid drug, were unable to move even when threatened, pinched or when a flame was brought near their whiskers. When an officer tried to push a cat forward, it displayed every sign of stupor. Another cat stood motionless, with its hind legs on a chair and its front legs on the floor. In the room were cats, mice, apes and birds, all drugged by some poison, standing petrified like statues.

The officer laughingly said to the believer, "One of your brethren mentioned the prophecy that when Jesus returns, wolves will dwell with lambs. We don't need Jesus. We do it ourselves! We have our own saviour,

and we will break you with it. You can't withstand this."

Our Christian brother added in his letter, "The magicians at Pharaoh's court also imitated the miracles that Moses did. But Moses remained God's man."

The love of such Christians, who know these horrors await them if they remain faithful and who continue to serve the Church, is not only as strong as death but stronger still. It is stronger than the fear of being deprived of your mind for ever.

A little sister

The bride says:

> "We have a little sister, and she has no breasts; what shall we do for our sister in the day when she will be spoken for?
> If she be a wall, we will build upon her a palace of silver: and if she be a door, we will enclose her with boards of cedar.
> I am a wall, and my breasts are like towers; then was I in his eyes as one that found favour."
> (SOS 8:8-10)

Here we have a supplement to the Song of Songs. Once she is sure of the unlimited love of God, the bride has her mind at rest and can turn to the problem of her sister. Jesus and the bride, united in full reciprocal love, discuss what is to be done with the younger sister who has no breasts yet, which means that she has no prominent qualities in her body; she has done no exceptional deeds in the service of God.
Jesus assures the bride that the Holy Trinity will do everything for her. If she be a wall - which means, if she is a person who cannot fall under temptation, if she is strong as iron, if she can resist - then God will do her great honour. But if she is a door, which can easily be opened - if she falls easily in sin, if her virtue is not solid - she will be enclosed with walls of cedar, a strong and durable wood. The weak believer is guarded in a special way, though even believers who are able to resist sin are not left unwatched, because strong castles can also fall.

The bride is assured of what God will do for her small sister, remembering the miracles he did for her who is like a wall and who has breasts like twin roes, typifying unconquerable virtues. She has found favour with him. The Shulamite, the princess of peace, has found ~shalom~ (peace) with Solomon, the Prince of Peace.

Some Christians are strong. All seductions rebound off them. On such strong walls, Jesus can build castles of silver. I am reminded of Hannington, the Anglican bishop of Uganda, who was eaten by cannibals. He went to his death reciting the Lord's words, "Love your enemies, bless them that curse you." On that wall, God built a splendid castle. Hannington's sons became missionaries and baptized their father's murderers. Those converted cannibals told the story.

Some twenty Russian girls were novices in a secret convent. When it was discovered, they were all sent to Siberia. The last advice of the abbess to the girls was to stay together if possible, and to say as soon as they met anybody - be it friend or enemy, policeman or fellow-prisoner - that they belonged to Christ.

They were sent to forced labour, and had to fell trees. One night, a group of other prisoners who were common criminals came to the girls' barracks. The girls were frightened, but the men told them, "You have spoken about your faith. So, explain to us about God. We have not seen a priest for thirty years. We need a word from God." From that night the barracks became a mission centre.

Even the guards sympathized. Many people were converted, and the novices baptized them. The former criminals helped the girls fulfill their work quotas so that they could have time for prayer.

These are the brides of Christ, with great and strong breasts.

Solomon's vineyard

The bride says:

> "Solomon had a vineyard at Baalhamon; he let out the vineyard unto keepers; every one for the fruit thereof was to bring a thousand pieces of silver.
>
> My vineyard, which is mine, is before me: you, O Solomon, must have a thousand, and those that keep the fruit thereof two hundred.

You who dwell in the gardens, the companions hearken to your voice: cause me to hear it.
Make haste, my beloved, and be like to a roe or to a young hart upon the mountains of spices."
(SOS 8:11-14)

In Hebrew ~hamon~ means "a great, noisy crowd." Solomon had a vineyard in Baalhamon. Jesus has his vineyard, his Church, in the midst of a noisy multitude.

The bride discusses with him what fruit their vineyards must produce. She says to him, "My vineyard, which is mine, is before me." Before, she did not look after her vineyard. Now she has decided to care for it, so that God will be able to build a palace of silver upon her testimony. She promises Solomon one thousand pieces of silver from the profits of her vineyard, and allows two hundred for the workers who tend it.

The ~Zohar~ rightly says, "Wherever the name of Solomon is mentioned in Solomon's Song it is holy, except in the words 'A thousand unto you, O Solomon.'" The author has descended from celestial heights down to financial dealing. He could not help revealing that the Word of God has passed through human hands.

Rembrandt painted a splendid picture of the good Samaritan. In front of the inn where the wounded man was brought, he painted a dog relieving itself. This is the most prosaic thing in life. In the middle of his most tragic tirade, Shakespeare's King Lear speaks to the Fool in bawdy language. No work of art or religion is exempted from at least a token acknowledgement of the meanness of human nature.

But there is also an important lesson in this verse. The bulk of a church's finances must go towards the propagation of the gospel. Ministers must be provided for, but not luxuriously. It is a scandal that some ministers in the USA have large salaries, when those in the Third World often live at poverty level. And as for those under Communist persecution, who thinks of them?

Now it is time for the Bridegroom to depart. He goes into the mountains: the bride remains in the gardens below. His last words are, "You who dwell in the gardens, the companions [the angels, the glorified saints] hearken to your voice: cause me to hear it." He asks her to pray. Thus this beautiful book comes to an end.

Towards the close of his life, Solomon was disappointed in the Shulamite to whom he had dedicated his Song. In the beginning her love was passionate, but it finished with who knows what tragedy. When he was old, the king wrote, "I did not find a woman." Will our soul also disappoint the Prince of Peace? When the Son of Man comes, will he find faith on earth?

The bride's love is great, but great love needs to be tended to remain great. If you put a single gram of radium in a vault and leave it untouched, after a certain period it will only be half a gram of radium and after a further period it will only be one quarter of a gram. Radium disintegrates. Love disintegrates, too. It must be kept warm, and must be made to grow through frequent meditation and contemplation of the Beloved. The love described in the Song of Solomon, where the bride gives the Bridegroom a thousand pieces of silver, is not a hopeless ideal. It really exists.

Igor Ogurtsov, an Orthodox believer, was sentenced to twenty years in prison for his Christian activities. Converted by his grandmother, he was one of the organizers of the Social Christian Union for the Liberation of the Russian People. For a time he had been detained in a psychiatric asylum, for being too religious.

A fellow-prisoner describes him as a man of pathos. All who drew near him felt that Ogurtsov was far ahead of his contemporaries. He declared that his aim was the Christianization of politics, economics and culture. After ten years of prison and torture, he was still strong enough to write:

> There is only one choice before mankind: a free return to God and acceptance of His love, whereupon all the powers and beauty of man will flourish; or departure from God, whereupon we will have a Satanocracy and a twisted conscience, as a result of losing the true aim and purpose of life. Capitalism and its sick child, Communism, can be conquered only by the Christianization of the whole social order.

At forty he had lost all his teeth in jail. He suffered from avitaminosis and hypertonicity. He could hardly stand on his feet, but he still had to do slave labour. Neither the world nor the churches mention him, but he offered a great feast to Christ. He paid to him his full due: a thousand pieces of silver.

Petras Plumpa, a Catholic, is serving a five-year sentence. He writes from prison:

> Wherever we live, the most important problem is the salvation of souls. If the King of souls has sown us in the field of sorrows, let us bloom in sorrow; if in solitude, then in solitude let us bloom. The Creator sows the most beautiful flowers in inaccessible places among mountain tracts, and, though no man sees them, they have their own value. The anguish of a soul, though unseen, can be plucked and offered like a flower to the Saviour. This is the most beautiful decoration in the altar of Jesus. Lacking such decoration, even the finest churches have sad faces.

For the sake of souls like this, our Beloved, who is now like a roe or a young hart upon the mountains of spices, will return. The bride who dwells in the garden of faith amidst sorrows waits for him.

÷ Last Considerations ÷

Arriving at the end of this book, we wonder. Everything written in it, even the most intimate sexual details, is about the love of a faithful soul for a Bridegroom she has never seen. She speaks of kisses, of caresses, of embraces, although she has never touched him, nor even perceived him with her senses.

It is so. But in a similar way, our universe is mostly hydrogen, and no-one has ever seen a hydrogen atom. Millions of them would fit on a pinhead. The hydrogen atom is a speculation in our minds. Yet the whole of our physics and chemistry is based on unseen atoms. We can even construct atomic bombs, using atoms which we cannot see. Space and time are only mental constructs. But that does not stop us from living comfortably in space and in time.

A heavenly Bridegroom does not have to be touchable to be loved or to be such that one finds one's complete delight in him. It is good that he cannot be understood. Instead of trying to understand him we need to draw nearer and nearer to him, in order to know him.

When an electron jumps from the outer shell of an atom to the inner shell, light is emitted. Similarly, whoever does not remain outside the Godhead, but runs to his embraces, becomes an emitter of light. The words of Jesus, "You are the light of the world," [MTT 5:14] become a reality.

There are some things which are completely absent from the Song. For example, the word "truth." Why is this?

When scrutinized, many accepted beliefs are seen to be inadequate. At best they prove to be partially true - true for the left side of the brain. Our brains are divided in two. Only the left operates logically, and declares what is true and what is not. The right side is as important as the other, but is usually left out in the search for truth. It is irrational, lyrical, prompted by impulse, feeling and emotions. A "truth" examined only by the left side of the brain cannot be entirely true. It ignores half of reality.

What is normally termed "truth" brings things to a halt. Therefore Solomon never uses the word. For him, the only thing that comprehends the whole of reality, that unites the two halves of the brain's experience, is love like that between the heavenly Bridegroom and his bride. Only belief in love to the uttermost can pass every test.

Another curious omission from the Song is any mention of good deeds done by the bride. The reason is that - as Kant said - nothing can be called good without some qualification. We all have access to the state of being a chosen bride. Some of us, because of natural disadvantages or the possession of a niggardly nature, lack the power to do good deeds. But even such people can shine like jewels, if they only have ardent love and good will. Fruitfulness would not add to their value, nor fruitlessness diminish it. "To him that works not, but believes on him that justifies the ungodly, his faith is counted for righteousness" (ROM 4:5). The ~Zohar~ says, "Blessed is he that nourishes good thoughts towards his Lord; for even if he cannot put them into practice, the Holy One takes the will for the deed." It is not good deeds which qualify you to be a bride of Christ.

This Song shows how right St. Augustine was when he said, "Love - and do what you like," or St. Paul, when he taught, "Love is the fulfillment of all the law." [ROM 13:10] When we experience holy, supreme love, the moral law which defers to deeds stands mute in adoration.

One final thing is lacking in Solomon's Song - a biography of the bride. What is her story? How did she live before becoming a believer? Was she a decent girl or a loose one? What sins had she committed, and how many? Humans have biographies. But she is more than human. She partakes of the divine nature.

Darwin looked in vain for the connecting link between ape and man. But we know the link between the entire creation and the Creator. It is the bride. She is the highest point that creation can reach. She met the One who came down to the lowest level to which Godhead can ever descend, and they united. She is a queen; and she is the servant. She is as tiny as a worm; and she is a god. She is outside the sphere of beings who have biographies.

Most of us are not yet truly human. We are still in an embryonic stage, living in mankind's pre-history. Jesus' teaching, "You are gods," [JHN 10:34] sounds oddly in our ears. So we find the nature of the bride hard to grasp. We would enquire about her past; for Jesus, she is simply the bride.

Jesus never gave us his own biography. The evangelists are silent about his life between the ages of twelve and thirty. She does not ask him his life's story. He rewarded her discretion by not asking questions about hers. Today they are Bridegroom and bride. Like the high priest Melchisedec of old, they appear "having neither beginning of days, nor end of life" (HEB 7:3).

Adam must have been created as a man of a certain age. Like him, the bride does not have a past. She and the Bridegroom know only an eternal "today" of love.

Handel composed his ~Messiah~ while enraptured, in ecstasy. For twenty-three days, he hardly ate. When he completed the second part with the Hallelujah Chorus, his servant found him sitting at his desk with tears running down his cheeks. He said, "I saw paradise truly, and the great God himself." Solomon must have composed the Song in such a state of mind.

Therefore the prayers of the bride are innocent as spring mornings, clear as mountain streams. She does not utter prayers for forgiveness, for they are what sinners need. She has passed beyond this. Christ has finished his work with her. All she can do is sing hymns. Earth and heaven ring with her hallelujahs.

But she does not isolate herself on the peaks. She prefers not to be called a "saint." Dorothy Day said, "That's how people try to dismiss you. If you're a saint you must be impractical and Utopian and nobody has to pay any attention to you." Brides are in close fellowship with Jesus. But they also seek such fellowship with us.

I must finish with an apology. I could not make words convey what happens between the Bridegroom and the bride, for the same reason that you cannot weigh granite columns in pharmaceutical scales. Solomon could not do it, so I most certainly cannot.

We all retain primitive concepts from our early religious training. When we climb unknown spiritual mountains, to describe the unknown, we use the language of the known. There is nothing else we can do.

It is the same in science. In any chunk of ordinary matter you have 100,000,000,000,000,000,000,000 atoms, made up of who knows how many billions of billions of elementary particles. It is unimaginable and inexpressible. Science therefore uses primitive pictures. It uses models of atoms, though it knows well enough that no atom conforms to the model. Reality puts shivers up one's spine. It cannot even be described.

But for believers, there is a way to know the quality of the relationship between the Bridegroom and the bride. Become a bride yourself; and then you will personally experience that relationship.

But when you become a bride, do not become blind in one eye, seeing only the celestial, without concern for the earthly. Both belong to God. Be a great saint, but be a human saint! Remember that Solomon's Song is only one of many books in the Bible.

The End of "THE SWEETEST SONG"

The Total Blessing

Richard Wurmbrand

1 The Total Blessing"

Joseph received a blessing far beyond what his father Jacob imparted to him. We might call it the total blessing: "The Almighty shall bless thee with blessings of heaven above and blessings of the deep that lie beneath" (GEN 49:25). This is the blessing in its fullness reserved for the people of God. "The Lord had blessed Abraham in all things" (GEN 24: 1) - not only in material or spiritual matters, but in ~all~ things.

There is a state of consciousness reserved for the elect of God which will lead only to right actions. This is made possible by becoming a being apart. Samuel said to Saul, "The spirit of the Lord will come upon thee, and thou shalt be ... turned into another man" (1SM 10:6). This "new man" receives a blank cheque from God. "Do as occasion serve thee, for God is with thee" (1SM 10:7). Saul could do what he liked because "God gave him another heart" (1SM 10:9).

In the Hebrew Masoretic text, after the word "man" referring to Saul (1SM 10:22), a large open space is left, because an individual with such privileges from God can hardly be considered simply a man like everyone else. Has he not become something more than human, something approaching a higher, angelic species, in which another ethic and a different sort of relationship with God rule? He is a man blessed in ~ all~ he does. He has not only the blessings of heaven, but also those of the deep.

Through their new birth, a person becomes rooted in the highest Source, which is eternal, and thus raise into heavenly realms everything they touch. With self forgotten, they partake of the divine nature. Passions and evil habits are forsaken, and the way is opened to be blessed in ~everything~.

The following story illustrates what is meant by this total blessing. A man played the lottery and won a million. The man who sold him the ticket asked him, "How did it happen that you chose just the right number?" He replied, "Well, I am Jewish." "What difference did that make?" "It was decisive," replied the winner. "Being Jewish I knew that the number seven must win, because it is the holy number in our books. The seventh day is the Sabbath. There are seven great religious feasts. You find seven all over the Bible. Seven times seven makes 48. So I chose seven hundred and forty eight and became a millionaire."

The salesman in the shop where he had bought the ticket said, "But Sir, seven times seven makes 49, not 48."

The winner answered, "God knows that I am bad at mathematics. He knows what mistakes I would make in multiplication. He willed it that the wrong number I calculated should be just the number I needed to become rich."

God can give a blessing that makes not only all things work together for good, but all things, even the things that you consider the worst imaginable. In the Old Testament, Joseph was sold by his brothers to be a slave. This resulted in him becoming prime minister and the saviour of his family in which he had been despised.

You can have this blessing, and you can give such blessings to others.

But human beings can impart curses, too. If someone steals some wheat, grinds it, bakes it, and then says a benediction over it, they blaspheme. God said to the priests, "If ye will not hear, and if ye will not lay it to heart to give glory unto my name, I will even send a curse upon you, and I will curse your blessings" {MAL 2:2). There are religious services from which it would be wise to flee before the blessing is given.

As for yourself, be cleansed, blessed in ~all~ you do, blessed with blessings from above and from the deep. Go to church at least for the blessing. Seek the blessings of righteous people. You will thereby receive a precious reality.

Then share your blessings with others.

---End.

2 God Speaking in Dreams"

Brother Lawrence wrote, "The barque of the Spirit goes forward even in sleep." We read in Job 33:15-16: "In a dream, in a vision of the night, when deep sleep falls upon men, in slumberings upon the bed: then [God] opens the ears of men, and seals their instruction."

Therefore a Christian never sleeps fully. Solomon's bride said, "I sleep, but my heart wakes." It is while she sleeps that she hears the voice of her beloved saying, "Open to me, my sister" (SOS 5:2). I personally never go to bed without paper and pen near me, which I use to note all my dreams. Occasionally I have dreamt whole sermons and articles, which have often been judged my best. The same was said about Spurgeon.

Why don't more Christians pay attention to their dreams? The practice is very useful, but I must say that in most instances it is not a very pleasant experience.

In Scripture, the second recorded appearance of God in a dream was to Abimelech, king of Gerar (GEN 20:2). God said to him, "Behold, thou art but a dead man" - not a message many would be eager to hear. At the same time God informed Abimelech that Abraham, the man who lied to him and endangered his life, was "a prophet, and he shall pray for thee, and thou shalt live" (GEN 20:7). In his dream-speaking to us, God sometimes contravenes our moral and religious standards.

The first recorded appearance of God in a dream was to Abraham: "A deep sleep fell upon Abraham; and lo, an horror of darkness fell upon him" (GEN 15:12). How many of us would be ready to hear God speaking in dreams if the experience were accompanied by feelings of horror? Furthermore, God gave Abraham unpleasant news: "Know of a surety that thy seed shall be a stranger in a land that is not theirs, and shall serve them: and they shall afflict them four hundred years" (GEN 15:13).

Would you be willing to accept revelations from God about prolonged suffering for your descendants lasting centuries? Yet such nightmares can be revelations from God.

An angel of the Lord appeared to New Testament Joseph in a dream and told him, "Arise, and take the young child and his mother, and flee into Egypt, and be thou there until I bring thee word: for Herod will seek the young child to destroy him" (MTT 2:13). If Joseph had not acted on God's revelations in a dream, the infant Jesus would not have survived. The condition for hearing God's voice in dreams is to be open not only to good news, but to all of God's plans, though some might seem strange and terrible to our human understanding.

We have become accustomed to the notion of having God as a personal Saviour. The expression is not biblical. As a matter of fact, very few people are capable of receiving personal revelations from God. History and biography indicate that God has led his people to victory through dramatic upheavals. And sometimes God's revelations anticipate these dramas. The walk with God involves more than caresses and expressions of love. Anyone who cannot bear the foreknowledge of such dramas should content themselves with the corporate knowledge of the Church.

It is not necessary for everyone to have personal communications. In fact, few can bear them. If we do not have an openness to revelations that may involve great suffering, what we call the guidance of a personal Saviour or of the Holy Spirit may be simple illusion.

Dreams from God can be nightmares, as in the book of Daniel. They can also take the form of erotic imaginings, as in Solomon's Song. Such imagery can be the symbol for capturing something of the inexpressible love relationship existing between the faithful and our God.

If the authors of the Bible had not used such thought-forms, the Song of Solomon would never have become part of the canon of Scripture. Today, those same theologians and scholars who consider the Bible infallibly inspired would doubtless reject any prompting to prepare a sermon clothed in erotic language or undergirded with dire predictions for the families of the faithful. Yet drama and nightmares and eroticism can all be the means by which God communicates with us.

Through the prophet Joel God promised that in the last days "Your old men shall dream dreams, and your young men shall see visions" (JOE 2:28).

---End.

3 What is Truth"

The biblical assertion that Jesus is the truth makes the reason rebel. The classical definition of truth is "conformity between judgements and reality." Now, Jesus might be a man or the Son of God or both, but he is in no case an abstraction like "truth" used in this sense. He is more than the conformity between things and assertions.

To have truth we must go beyond the strict boundaries of reason. As soon as we leave the sphere of the material objects with which we interact daily, we realize how difficult it is to apprehend truth, firstly because the objects of our inquiry do not show themselves to us as they are. It took us thousands of years of intellectual development to discover that both the universe and our bodies are made up of atoms. The atom still hides its mystery from us. So does every person we encounter, not because of any bad intention on their part, but simply because we are all enigmas to ourselves.

Things and persons are "ex-sistent." In Latin this word means "to be outside themselves." The prodigal son of Jesus' parable who deserted his father, used up his inheritance and ended up herding swine, "came to himself" (LUK 15:17). Up to this point, he was outside his real self, a toy used and discarded by the world he sought to conquer. Whoever had known him up to that point would not have known the real person, because it was not within himself. It was an object in the hands of others who led him into evil. His real being was divorced from his self. To know him, one would have had to meet him outside of what he appeared to be for a time.

Original sin practically assures that one's first encounter with reality is in the area of "non-truth." It is only by virtue of the divine, embodied in Jesus, that we find our rightful place within the sphere of his marvellous creation, rather than as observers of a mirage that presents itself as reality. Jesus enables us to love and appreciate the world as God loved it when he gave his Son for it. This love causes us to apprehend it in truth.

Because individuals can hide their real nature, we may fail to understand them. But like everything in creation, including even hidden objects, they have one common attribute: the very fact of being. They ~are~. There are not only good and bad times, there are simply times. And there exists the simple "there are." We usually pay attention to accidents and neglect this essential.

Jesus comes from God, whose name is "I am what I am" (EXO 3:14). He is the essential Being who exists above transitory accidents. Jesus, his message to mankind, is the truth, above the great non-truth and the small bits of truth on which we live.

When you have Jesus, the truth, you have everything - the whole truth.

Francis of Assisi was once asked, while hoeing his garden, "What would you do if you knew you would die today?"

He replied, "I would hoe my garden."

He had the truth. He was above the world of change and decay; he was within the sphere of reality, where Jesus reigns.

---End.

4 Self-denial"

Jesus said, "If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross" (LUK 9:23). The first thing a Christian has to do is to deny himself. Everything else follows afterwards. If you take up your cross - even if you suffer prison and torture for his name - and have not denied yourself, the sacrifice you bring will only lend to magnify you, make you proud, and destroy your soul.

There is a legend about a dove that, pursued by an eagle, took refuge in Moses' bosom. The eagle demanded the surrender of its prey, arguing that God himself ordained that one creature should live by the sacrifice of another. Moved by its argument but concerned for the dove, Moses gave an equivalent amount of flesh from his own bosom, then freed the dove.

Now, Moses did not tell the story; it is not found in Scripture. Neither are many of his own acts of kindness found in the Pentateuch, which he authored. The self had been denied.

What we perceive as the self is the sum of our performances in life. Some individuals are elated by all the good things they feel they have done; others are depressed by the many sins they have committed; most perceive a mixture of both in their lives.

We have to abolish this image of the self. I am not simply what I perform.

David took Uriah's wife and had Uriah murdered. But he was not what he did. He was "a man after God's own heart" (ACT 13:22).

Saul of Tarsus persecuted Christians viciously. But he was not what he did. He was one of God's elect, chosen to be an apostle. This election had taken place before the foundation of the world. His life-experiences before his conversion were the developmental steps of an embryonic apostle.

Judas Iscariot went about preaching and healing, after having forsaken all his possessions, as did the other eleven disciples, for Christ's sake. But he too was not what he did. He was the betrayer whose name stands even today for infamy.

A butterfly while in the cocoon looks like a worm. It is not a worm, but a butterfly in process.

The self which has to be denied is the false image we have about our person. There was a Pharisee who really fasted twice a week, gave tithe of all he possessed, and did many other good things. But he was something other than his actions. He was a hypocrite. A publican who extorted from people felt he had good cause not to lift up so much as his eyes to heaven. But God knew him better. He was not what he had done. He was a man justified before God (LUK 18:10-14).

When Jacob and Esau, the children of Rebecca, were not yet born, " neither having done any good or evil" (ROM 9:11), Jacob was loved and Esau hated by God. They were regarded for what they were, not what they had done.

Do not let your mind be elated by good deeds or driven to despair by irreparable sins. It is wrong to consider the self a resume of the deeds one has done while playing in the game of life. We become outstanding only when we deny these self-portraits and allow ourselves to be designed and shaped by God.

God does not call himself "I am what I do." He does different things, some of which might not be considered lovable. He sends plagues over a country and destroys whole cities. Rather, he says, "I am what I am" (EXO 3:14), independently of the outer play of events. Scripture says simply, "God is love." Therefore we love him.

Paul, too, says of himself, "I am what I am" (1CO 15:10). I am what I am, even if sometimes, driven by forces over which I have no control, I do things contrary to what you might expect.

Once you adopt this attitude, no self remains. Paul could say about himself that it was not he who lived, but Christ lived in him (GAL 2:20). The Father will reveal the Son of God in you, too, if you grant him access (GAL 1:16). You will live having him as your self. Then your cross will not crush you, nor will your bearing it make you proud. You will be his disciple indeed.

---End.

5 The Conscious and the Unconscious"

Groping for answers, modern psychology has suddenly discovered what Jesus taught two thousand years ago: the necessity of self-denial. The self is our conscious, a small island in the ocean of our unconscious. This little self is not satisfied to be king but acts as if the great unconscious did not even exist. The latter avenges itself for this indignity by emerging in neuroses. Jung formulates Jesus' teaching in other words: "We must re-centre our personality at a point midway between the conscious and the unconscious" (Two Essays in Analytic Psychology).

The conscious self has a dilemma which is at the root of our perplexities, strains, and stresses. It knows it appeared at a certain point in time and will have to disappear sooner or later. Every birth and death is a reminder of this fact.

The unconscious is simply undisturbed by such matters, because it reflects on nothing. It manifests itself in the involuntary fantasy, which contains elements whose existence one had never before suspected. The unconscious is, according to Jung, the invisible player that pushes the conscious personality about like a figure on a chessboard. The unconscious plays, and the conscious worries about things over which it has no control.

A sane self allows the whole entity to speak out as the Bible teaches: " Love God with ~all~ your heart, with ~all~ your soul, with ~all~ your mind," not only with the rational, conscious part.

The self is not a unity but a contradictory multiplicity of complexes. A good analogy is the Bible itself, in which are found cold historical facts, genealogies, statistics, geographical data, fiction, poetry, puns, myths, fables, parables, dreams, doubts, utter love and confidence in God, questioning of God's ways, and even blasphemous words written by devout believers. Every part of the soul, even the most hidden, the physically erotic, and the most sublimated love, is manifest in the Bible. God revealed himself to all parts of our psyche, in which there is no distaste for saying unseemly things or reserve for the most holy secrets. Man does not live on bread alone, nor do we live on the rational, the decent, and the moral alone.

Consonant with the very varied needs of the complex self, the Bible offers us all kinds of notions of God: from the God of revenge to the God of love; from the God of the Jews to the Lord of the whole universe; a God who fills meadows with fragrant flowers and who sends plagues, fire, and sulphur from heaven; a God who pities all and who will send the majority of mankind into the bottomless pit. Behind all the images is the God who forbids us to make to ourselves any images of him. He says, "I am what I am," not what you fancy me to be.

When you have thus forsaken the narrow self, when the whole of you participates in your religion, when you have brought all your sins and vices to be cleansed and all your righteousness and virtues to be attributed to the Creator, then you can die in peace. You die to your opinions, the right ones and the wrong ones, to your preferences, including the preference for religion, to your tastes and will. You die to the world, to its censure or applause. You die also to the judgement of the Church about you. The Church has not only condemned sins but has also burned saints at the stake. You did to the censure and approval of your friends and brethren. Watchman Nee, China's renowned evangelist who died a martyr's death in a Communist prison, was a man ex-communicated by the Church.

You desire to be approved only by God. The self has been denied. You have the freedom and joy to be able to bear a cross.

Peter, though taught by Jesus to deny himself, had not done so. Thus, he came to the point where, instead, he denied the Lord he loved.

Everyone has only this choice: to deny yourself or to deny your Master. Be sure you make the right choice!

6 What Truth Is Jesus?"

Aristotle in his ~Metaphysics~ put forth different concepts of truth: aletheuein, which means "nothing forgotten" or "nothing veiled," and homoiosin, which means "concordance."

St John's Gospel uses the first person for Jesus' assertion, "I am the truth." Our thoughts and words will never be more than thoughts and words. These can only conform to a reality that consists of other elements. Jesus is the representation of this reality in human life, in all its fullness, without forgetting or veiling any part of it. A person who lives in darkness cannot see this reality. But Jesus places us in the light, and at once reality becomes open to our awareness and discernment and available to us for exploration. Gradually we can know it more and more.

Baron Muenchausen in the children's story told a lie when he said that he pulled himself out of the mire by his own hair. Likewise, we who are caught in darkness cannot save ourselves from it. Jesus saves us by bringing light, which is the realm of truth.

John lay on the breast of Jesus. Mary Magdalene abandoned herself in expressions of love when she kissed his feet and on at least one occasion sat quietly to listen to him. For the Christian, then, truth is not an intellectual construction, but the abandonment in love to a Person who withholds nothing good from us. Lie quietly in the sun and it will tan you. Lie quietly on Jesus' bosom and truth will envelop and warm you.

All our partial perceptions and fragmented knowledge are non-truth because they do not apprehend the essence of things. With our senses we perceive only the surface of objects. Telescopes and microscopes put us in touch with the surface of normally invisible things, but again only superficially. Partial truth shows us a thing that is. Jesus, the essence of truth, shows us the "is" of a thing.

The word "is," one of the most common and unremarkable words of our language, comes from the Sanskrit ~asm~ - "to breathe." Through it the world becomes animated. The word is so sacred that the Hebrews did not use it, as they did not use the name of God. Jesus says, "I am" (JHN 19: 5, 6), and all the soldiers fall to the ground before him. Jesus is the "is" which is. Therefore he is the truth.

Without Jesus, error is not mere accident, an occasional falling into the mire, but a permanent state. With Jesus you live in the essence of things. Without him you live perforce in the counter-essence. You don' t have to tell lies. "All men are liars" (Psalm 116:11). Without Jesus, you seek to discover true politics, or true science, or true philosophy, without knowing what truth is. How would you recognize it if you met it? It's like seeking a treasure without a map, compass, tools, instructions, or even a description.

When you have Jesus, the Son of the omnipotent God, you do not have to adjust your mind to reality. Reality will conform itself to your mind. Truth for you will become ~aletheia~ - unveiled.

You are Jesus' beloved. He will lift the veil from your eyes so that you will see truth in all its fullness in his loving eyes and will know it intimately in his tender embrace.

---End.

7 Prayers"

When we invoke the sacred name of Jesus, there should be neither the self alone nor Jesus alone, but their union through invocation. All limitations of thought should be transcended.

A person who prays so that prayer becomes the only reality, and the worshipper and the worshipped are no more separate entities, becomes a being who transcends life and death. Every prayer should unite the one who prays and the One to whom he or she prays, so that prayer alone remains. Prayer without this aim is a weak substitute.

Cultures are different. An Oriental Chinese mind is not like a European mind, nor a Gentile like a Jewish mind. For some people, emotions and sentiments make logical reasoning almost impossible, whereas others stoically repudiate emotionalism. But the summit towards which all believers strive is this union in prayer.

Don't allow your sins to be a handicap in your prayers. Jesus did all the good deeds you were intended to do. God sees them as if they were yours. Don't let yourself be troubled if biblical verses seem to indicate, or even an angel of God were to assure you, that you are not among those to whom divine favour is given. Even if you were the most wicked person in the world, call upon the holy name of Jesus and you will be saved. If you call upon him only once after a lifetime full of sin, heaven will be yours.

I know that there are many teachings in the Bible and in the dogmas of the Church that do not make things so easy, but remember that sick people in the early stages can eat almost everything, whereas when they are dying they can hardly sip a few drops of water. The virtues of the first Christians, in the flush of their first love, are no longer the norm for the whole Church. We live in the time of the end when the love of many has waxed cold. God knows the difference and asks only the invocation of the holy name: "Whoever calls on the name of the Lord shall be saved" (ACT 2:21).

In the hundreds of denominations that exist today, dogmas are many and varied. There is scarcely a layperson who can distinguish the right ones. No one today knows all the commandments and injunctions, nor do we have the power to fulfill them. Call upon the name of the One who said, "Father, I will that they also, whom Thou hast given Me, be with Me where I am" (JHN 17:24). Invoke the holy name of Jesus, relying on the fact that the Father will fulfill his wish.

The Christ who vowed never to cast out a sinner who comes to him, however bad they might be, has guaranteed eternal life to all who call upon him. But do so with the earnestness of one crying, "SOS! Lord, save me!" Yet don't despair if your prayer has not been so earnest. You have called upon his name. The Bible puts no condition that this call must be wholehearted.

While doing your best to ensure that the worshipper, the prayer, and the worshipped become one, believe nevertheless that the simple calling on his name has saving power.

---End.

8 The Simplicity of Moral Problems"

Moral problems are really not complicated. The first Christians knew the answers. Pliny, a Roman governor in the second century, reported their standards to the emperor: "They blind themselves by an oath ... that they should never commit theft, robbery, or adultery, that they would never break their word, and that they would never deny a trust when called to give it up."

But it is not enough to do good. The good must also be well done. Therese of Lisieux is beloved among Christians not only for any great deed but [also] for the fact that she did ordinary things in a grand manner.

To do a good thing well, imitate the sun, that simply shines without waiting to be asked to impart light and warmth. You too should do good as opportunity presents itself, without depending on another to challenge or command you. The good that confronts you is God's thought. It is the reason for your existence. Why do you delay?

What is the good you should do? Whatever flows naturally from the new heart you received at conversion. You cannot find the rule for your attitudes in generalities. It is not located in anything that can be set next to the self and viewed objectively.

Jesus said, "I am the truth." The truth, while ultimate, is not a generality. It cannot be anything but an "I." It is your "I" if you are Christlike.

It is well to have confidence in the new creature within, for then your life will consist in doing in the best manner the good works for which you have been predestined by the Father. Therefore, without any delay, be yourself.

A burglar was caught rifling a safe while the alarm was clanging. His captors asked him why he had not fled. He replied that he was hard of hearing.

Life is short. Don't allow yourself to become deaf or blind to the needs around you. While you must be moral, general rules of morality are not always helpful because you are a unique creation intended to fulfill unique purposes. There is a specific role just for you even at this very moment. Listen to the inner voice and follow its leading.

Jeremiah predicted that God would make a new covenant with his people.

It specified that his law would be written in their minds and hearts (JER 31:33).

Tamerlane, savage fourteenth-century conqueror, said, "Do you think I am only a man? I am the wrath of God." This is how he viewed himself and this is how he acted. We know we are children of God, whose name is Love. Therefore, act accordingly.

There are ultrasonic generators that are supposed to chase rats from a house through their unpleasant "sounds." Likewise the conscience of a child of God rids us of the evil that presses around us.

A problem recognized and defined is a problem half solved. Learn from your mistakes by analyzing where you go wrong. Stop for just a few seconds before you act. The pause is part of the music of life, which is a constant flow of good deeds. Six seconds can make an incredible difference. Remember that you are called to be like Christ, who could say, "I am the truth."

Be the truth, since you have been created for truth. Lie detectors and truth serum can detect the deep-seated indicators which reveal the fact that one is lying. Such apparatus reveals that adherence to truth and revulsion at lying are deeply rooted in human nature. In modern times we have proved with our technology that truth is part of our creation by God and lying is from the devil, "the father of lies" (JHN 8:44).

To be truly moral, withdraw yourself from evil influences. Herod was a king in Christ's day whom God had entrusted with a kingdom. Yet he was ready to give away half of it for a dancer. Instead, he killed a prophet because he allowed his wife to influence the dancer, her daughter, who thus became an accomplice in the murder of John the Baptist. How right was Jesus when he said, "He who loves father or mother ... son or daughter more than Me is not worthy of Me" (MTT 10:37).

To be a hero for Christ, you need not go to a mission field. Your family, factory, school, or office can be your mission field. You can be grand in small things.

We know there exist sins of excess. Therefore the Bible says, "Be not righteous overmuch" (ECC 7:14). There are also sins of omission. Many will go to perdition for neglecting to help the poor and visit prisoners.

The musical sign for atonement, for forgiveness, is the "natural" sign. A note that has been raised with a "sharp" sign or lowered with a "flat" returns to this original pitch by virtue of the natural, which cancels everything else. Likewise, when atonement intervenes, your sins of excess or default are cancelled, as if they had never been committed.

To obtain atonement for your sins from an infinite God and thus receive the promise of eternal life is the supreme sign of morality.

---End.

9 The Sin of Consistency"

An individual need not be consistent with what he or she has said, written or done in times past, otherwise no growth would be possible, nor could a person adjust to the demands of changing circumstances. The only consistency required is the proper attitude towards what one considers true, righteous and loving today.

The apostle Paul gives us examples of holy inconsistency. One is the circumcision of his disciple Timothy. Travelling around with an uncircumcised Gentile convert would have hampered the work of evangelization. The Jews who opposed him would have had one more reason to denounce him as a traitor to the religion of his fathers. So foresight and caution were necessary. Paul was dealing with people ready to murder him, as he learned when they wrongly suggested he had taken a Greek into the temple (ACT 21:29; ACT 22:22).

But the same apostle adamantly refused to circumcise Titus (GAL 2:3) when the danger of theological confusion existed. He was concerned lest others conclude that man is justified before God by rituals of the Jewish law and not by faith alone.

Even the Jewish Christians considered Peter's eating with an uncircumcised man (ACT 11:3) as a serious violation of religious duty. Jesus himself said that he had come only "to the lost sheep of the house of Israel" (MTT 15:24), and yet all at once the door was opened wide to the uncircumcised, without asking of them even this token of holy alliance.

The Jewish Christians had become Christians believing that faith in Jesus was the holiest form of Judaism and nothing more. They realized that if circumcision were abolished, the Christian religion would become universal and in time its Jewishness would be absorbed.

Paul was given by God the task to make the Church universal and therefore would not yield to pressure to have Titus circumcised.

In the case of Timothy, Paul accommodated himself prudently to circumstances without endangering the establishment of a universal Church in which Jews and Gentiles were alike. In the case of Titus, a principle was at stake. To concede that Titus must be circumcised would have been an acknowledgement that the sacrifice of Christ alone profits nothing unless the Gentiles fulfilled Jewish ceremonies.

Paul had to assert the principle that in the Christian Church "there is neither Greek nor Jew, circumcision nor uncircumcision, barbarian, Scythian, bond nor free, but that Christ is all in all" (COL 3:11).

If Paul had not been stubborn in certain circumstances, neither slavery nor the caste system would ever have been abolished.

The same desire that made Paul stiff-necked in the case of Titus made him pliable in the case of Timothy. The apostle who wrote: "I testify to every man that is circumcised ... Christ is become of no effect to you" (GAL 5:3,4) nevertheless circumcised a disciple.

Paul was not guilty of the grave sin of consistency with his own beliefs at all times and in all circumstances.

Therefore, be careful of consistency at the expense of adaptability, stubborness at the expense of flexibility. Be consistent only in your desire for truth at all times, but practising it with the least possible harm to others.

10 The Commandment To Be One"

The structure of the English language makes an exact translation of Genesis 1:9 (GEN 1:9) impossible. A verbatim approximation would be as follows: "Let gather together [these three English words are one word in Hebrew] the waters under the heaven." Even before saying what is involved, the commandment is, "Let them be gathered together."

Our twentieth-century thinking is quite different. We begin first by listing the things to be united. But the simple act of naming them discourages us from gathering them, and so we abandon our intention altogether.

God's command is, "Let gather together." Once all the diverse elements are gathered, it is much simpler to deal with them.

The waters under the heavens were gathered with a certain purpose: to form one sea. (Incidentally, how did Moses, who recorded this information, know that all the waters formed one single sea? We learned this only when Magellan made his discoveries.) Everything was gathered to serve this purpose.

Today there are many stratagems and endeavors to unify Christendom. We fail to succeed because it has not yet been established for what purpose we want to be one.

Jesus long ago designated the overriding reason for unity: "May they be one that the world may believe" (JHN 17:21). Too many of us live very comfortably even though the world is made up of unbelievers. Their salvation is not our passion. Therefore our plans for unity fail.

Once a little girl got lost in a huge wheat field, where the wheat was taller than her. Her parents called all the neighbors to help in the search, but in vain, though they shouted and used torches. For two days and nights they hunted. Finally, on the third day the father said to the townspeople, "Let's all join hands and go through the field in a line." In no time the child was found. Behind the operation was an anxious father and a common purpose: the child had to be found.

Do we love the world with all our hearts? Would we be very unhappy if all but a few were lost? Of what denomination were the people this father gathered to seek his child? It would be foolish even to ask the question. He gathered all who shared his burden and were willing to help. This is what Jesus meant by being one.

An Israeli army unit risked its life to save the Jews hijacked in a plane that was forced down in Entebbe (Uganda). When the rescue plane was on its way home, soldiers and passengers alike sang together in Hebrew Psalm 13:3 (PSA 13:3): "Behold, how good and pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity." What were the religious convictions of the rescuers? Who knows? They belonged to a nation that had experienced the loss of very many innocent victims and were united in their determination to prevent the killing of more Jews. They had a single purpose. Therefore unity was established.

Untold millions - billions - have gone to the grave without salvation because of our divisiveness. This should no longer happen. Think in these terms and your unity with all those who desire to see souls saved will be established.

Several men sitting in a boat observed one of their number boring a hole beneath his seat. "Why are you doing that?" one of his companions inquired. "It's none of your business," he replied. "I'm boring the hole under my seat."

He was wrong, of course. The water entering through "his" hole would swamp the whole boat with all its passengers.

Unity would be greatly served if Christians realized what obsolete and often petty questions divided them. In 1845, 293 Baptists from the Southern states of the USA severed ties with the Northern Baptists in protest over the Yankees' refusal to allow a slaveholder to become a missionary. Slavery has long since been abolished. But today there are 13 million Sothern Baptists who continue to be divided from their brethren. As a result of migration, there are now Southern Baptist churches in Alaska near the North Pole, but they are separated from their Northern brethren. Does this make sense?

There is no place for freelancers and "my-taste" churches in Christendom. Those who love God and mankind need to become one in heart today. The only condition is that unity must be according to God's holy Word, or there can be no peace. God's Word should never be abandoned for unity's sake. But if we are one in Christ, this unity will be revealed in our relationship with others.

---End.

11 About Being Narrow-minded and Broad-minded"

Narrow-mindedness is the object of much scorn. When this takes the form of a joke, it may be acceptable. It is said there was a sign in front of a motel in one of the southern states of America that read, "Rooms cost $50 a day. For Baptists there is a reduction: they pay only $25." A traveller, indignant, protested: "In times past there was racial discrimination; now there is denominational discrimination. Why should Baptists pay only half?" The manager of the motel answered, "You know, in the South the Baptists are so narrow, they sleep two in one bed."

When we pass from jokes to reality, narrow-mindedness becomes a virtue. In fact, the Bible endorses it. Paul was so convinced that the gospel he preached was sacrosanct that he wrote: "Though we, or an angel from heaven, preach any other Gospel to you than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed" (GAL 1:8). He would not have joined ecumenical councils with those who thought differently in theological matters. He would consider them "accursed." Today, believers are far removed from this narrow thinking. Most consider broad-mindedness a virtue to be praised.

John the Evangelist knew he had ~the~ doctrine, besides which there was no other. Therefore he wrote, "If there come any unto you and bring not ~this doctrine~ [of Christ], receive him not into your house, neither bid him God speed" (2JN 10). He even adds [2JN 11], "He that bids him God speed is partaker of his evil deeds." He left little room for an ecumenical council. It is told that Cerinthus, a heretic, once entered the house where John was bathing, and the latter left his bath naked and fled, not wishing to be under one roof with a man of another doctrine.

Luther warned, "The peacock has the garb of an angel and the song of a devil. He is the true picture of a heretic. All heretics can look pious, even angelic." He was so narrow-minded that he refused to shake hands with Zwingli, with whom he differed about the real presence of Christ in holy communion.

God is all-embracing, but his messengers have always been one-sided. Rarely have they been capable of teamwork. It could scarcely be otherwise, because they have stood alone. Steel columns need no wooden props. God's messengers are pillars in his Church, supporting but unsupported. They can afford to be narrow-minded because they need no one's approval.

Narrow-mindedness does have its negative side, however. Christians are taught to be hospitable. We should be hospitable toward ideas, too, not only toward people, because truth can never be the possession of a single individual. The Church embraces all kinds of individuals, with all sorts of experiences, in many diverse cultures, throughout the centuries. It is obvious they cannot all think alike in every detail.

But we proceed at our peril if we avoid narrow-mindedness when we seek to pass through a strait gate and walk on a narrow way. On the other hand, narrow-mindedness can also hurt the truth.

It is wrong to be narrow-minded and also wrong to be broad-minded. The "I" that asserts itself should not be. I have to deny myself, denying also the "I" that denies. As a person embraced by their beloved is no longer conscious of an "I" and a "you," so the being embraced by God is neither narrow- nor broad-minded. We lose our "mindedness" in the holy embrace in which the Eternal and the believer have become one. Here all distinctions between broad- and narrow-mindedness lose their significance, along with the distinction between selfishness and unselfishness.

Why should we not be selfish when our self is God? Why should we not be unselfish when nothing remains of our former self, so that we have nothing to lose?

The one true doctrine, the one true gospel on which Paul and John insisted was this doctrine of oneness with God. Away with the speculations of righteous men about a God outside themselves! These speculations, of narrow-minded bigot or broad-minded liberal, will be false if there is no union with God, in whom problems and divergences disappear.

Therefore don't be narrow-minded, and don't be broad-minded either. Don't be! Blessed is the person whose epitaph is like that of a saint of old: "Hic jacet nemo." (Here lies no one.) Christ is all.

---End.

12 The Little We Know About God"

The French say, "Un dieu defini est un dieu fini." (A God whom you have defined is a God with whom you have finished.) God cannot be defined or reduced to finite descriptions. To say he is creator is to ignore the fact that he is also sustainer and destroyer. He gives life, but he also kills (1SM 2:6). God is love, but he is also a righteous judge and the God who avenges himself (REV 19:2).

It is impossible to describe the fullness of God, because human beings have no frame of reference within which to compare God as he really is with the God we encompass in words. We need to be aware of this difference, even when we say something as simple as "God is love." Love is a sentiment common to humans and even some animals. Does any believer consider God a sentiment? To rely on mere words for an understanding of God is like clutching a piece of carbon and calling it a diamond, or scratching a shoe when the foot itches.

Speculations about God can be very hazardous. He is called the Father. His Hebrew name ~El~ is masculine. But the feminine form ~Elah~ also occurs in Scripture (1SM 17:9)[?]. God compares himself with a woman in ISA 49:15: "Can a woman forget her sucking child, that she should have no compassion on the son of her womb? Yea, they may forget, yet I will not forget thee."

Jesus said, "He who has seen me has seen the Father" {JHN 14:9). Was the Father seen in all the circumstances of Jesus' life? How about his unprovoked outbursts of anger? On one occasion, a Pharisee who had invited Jesus to dinner wondered why he was not washing his hands before eating. But he marvelled without saying anything critical. Jesus, knowing his thoughts, used the occasion to condemn all Pharisees, calling them "hypocrites." A lawyer tried to appease him, and he turned on lawyers, accusing them, with the Pharisees, of "the blood of all the prophets ... from the blood of Abel to the blood of Zechariah" (LUK 11: 37-52). Surely they were innocent; in fact, there were no lawyers and Pharisees when Abel was killed.

Now, such behavior on the part of Jesus is questionable at best. But a little thought will indicate that it makes sense. He came to this earth to die for humankind. He wanted to be crucified, because the cross was the only way to achieve their salvation from sin. In order to be crucified, he had to be hated. He apparently worked consciously at this. Otherwise why did he heal chronic diseases on the Sabbath when any day of the week would have sufficed? Why cure a man paralyzed for thirty-eight years on the day that would incur the wrath of the priests and

Pharisees? [JHN 5:5-10, not cited in the book; added by Dido]

Why were his rebukes so unsparing, so harsh, even if justified? Would not mild rebukes have been more effective? Or did he constantly have in mind a cruel death that presupposed bitter hatred among those who killed him?

To return to the original question, did Jesus represent the Father by hardening the hearts of men against himself? Scripture often records that God hardened the hearts of sinners. Does he actually want to be hated by some? Was his being despised and rejected a continual sacrifice, ultimately beneficial to mankind?

Does God want us to emulate Jesus' attitudes on all occasions? Meister Eckhart wrote, "God can no more do without us than we can do without him. " Would God's children be more useful to him if they were despised and abhorred rather than successful and admired? There are many questions to ponder.

We have to confess we know little about God, but knowing he exists frees us. We can resign as general managers of the universe.

He has created us and our universe, and even if we don't always feel his presence, we can enjoy what he has given us: air, earth, sky, his creatures. Every ray of sunshine, every wind, every drop of dew, every leaf and flower all speak of him. And so also do love and sorrow, discoveries and failures, agonies and ecstacies, knowledge and the hope to understand later what is obscure for us today.

---End.

13 We and Our Enemies"

It is almost impossible for consistent Christians not to have enemies. Because they love the sheep, they shout against the wolves that would destroy them. Sometimes in their zeal to protect the sheep they prefer shooting to shouting, destroying to denouncing. This is how they gain enemies.

We should not avoid having enemies at any cost, but we should not make them unnecessarily. It is foolish to make adversaries of those who could be friends. Some unwisely enter into controversy even with their partners in faith. Even saints know only in part (1CO 13:12), which means that each might see a different part. Therefore divergences arise.
It is important not to cultivate a talent for controversy in matters in which both parties might be right. At such times it is more useful to mend than to meddle.

There are a few psychological observations that need to be considered. First, that creative artists do not readily accept one another. They are lonely peaks. The same is true of great religious personalities. Luther would not shake hands with Zwingli, and he despised Erasmus of Rotterdam. Wesley could not go along with Whitefield. But not to go along with someone else does not oblige one to be at loggerheads with them.

The impressionist painters, Monet, Renoir, and Cezanne were called mad, loathsome. The public spat at their pictures. They did not appreciate the fact that these new artists painted washerwomen instead of royalty, haystacks instead of palaces. The artists rarely sold a painting. Today their canvasses fetch millions. What catastrophe it would have been if they had spent their time answering their critics! Instead, they painted. There was no weather rough enough to keep Monet from painting outside. He painted on the ice of the Seine, warming his fingers with water from a bottle.

Last century's greatest preacher, Charles Spurgeon, was criticized by the leaders of the Baptist Union of Britain because he was big and they were dwarfs. But he quietly gathered scores of thousands for Christ. We are makers of saints, not wrestlers. A worker for Christ should accept such conflicts without elaborating on them or entering into useless disputes.

On the other hand, if you have to contend with wolves that seek to ravage the flock, then do battle confidently. If you are on God's side, your triumph is sure. You can be wounded by the foe, you cannot be destroyed. Your triumph is sure if you counter the depths of weakness with the wings of faith.

Your triumph is sure if you value the slander against you that resembles truth as your shadow resembles you. At least the contours are real. Slander can serve a good purpose by warning you against the real sins to which you may be exposed.

Your triumph is sure if you don't stoop to using the strategies of your adversaries. Never be hateful like them. Find excuses for them in an attempt to understand the "why" of their positions. Never exploit their personal sins in order to demean their stand on matters of principle. Remember that you have your own failings before God. If salvation depended on merit, who would escape the pit?

It is said that Conan Doyle sent the following cable to twenty people in public life: "Everything known; disappear." All disappeared. Would you have escaped? Then don't uphold sins against others; uphold others, even your adversaries, against their sins.

Armed with such thoughts, you are free to fight for the word of God and for the sheep of his pasture. You will conquer.

14 The Matter of Compromise"

Shall we compromise? This is an everyday problem for individual Christians and churches.

Matteo Ricci went to China, mastered classical Chinese, dressed in the garb of a mandarin, and presented Christianity as the fulfillment of Confucianism, whose traditions he allowed to continue. The Jesuits went so far as to use the character ~tsi~, the Chinese description of the ceremonies of ancestor-worship, to translate the word "mass" in their catechism. The formidable power of the non-Christian religions renders any other approach difficult and almost impossible.

William Lucas, Anglican Bishop of Masasi (Tanzania) from 1926 to 1944, rejected the old view that the religious systems of "savages" were the work of the devil and regarded them rather as a preparation for their eventual fulfillment in Christ. The majority of evangelical missionaries, however, have been at the opposite pole. They proclaimed essentially that "to walk with Christ means to behave like a white man."

There is something to be said for compromise. Galileo declared on his knees before his inquisitors that he was wrong in claiming the earth moved around the sun. The sun[?] continued to do so in spite of his recantation, and he was able to continue his scientific work for years. Giodanbo Bruno, on the other hand, remained firm and died for his scientific convictions, which he had no time to work out. Who was right?

If you can conquer through compromise, by all means do so. Don't allow the enemy to turn you easily into a martyr.

Joseph could not have been prime minister of Egypt or Daniel of Babylon without some sort of compromise. Both accepted rule of a country in which there existed idolatry and injustice under absolute monarchs. The lions' den into which Daniel was thrown was surely used for others, who may have been innocent victims like himself. He must have had to acquiesce to, or at least overlook, many practices abhorrent to his belief in God and his knowledge of God's requirements for his earthly kingdom.

Much good can get lost in search of unrealizable, ideal solutions. Daniel could not bring about God's kingdom on earth, whereas by standing in high places near the ruling tyrant he could save from death at least a few innocents. More than that, he was able to speak about God to the mighty Nebuchadnezzar, architect of the famous hanging gardens of Babylon (DAN 4).

Jesus was told about a cruel act of the Roman governor Pontius Pilate, who had killed innocent Galileans who had come to worship in the Temple. To condemn Pilate's crime publicly would not have restored the victims to life and would have put a premature end to the Saviour's ministry. So he chose to respond with a general teaching that all men are sinners and will perish if they don't repent.

No human being or institution can escape the need for occasional compromise, but let us also be aware of its dangers. In 1933, German Christians had a national convention in the presence of Goehring, Hitler's aide. The purpose of the gathering was to purify the Church of Jewish elements and the Old Testament of "immoral Jewish stories."

To its shame, the Church compromised with Nazism. In every such situation there arises in the minds of believers the question whether such deviations from the truth have not happened in past centuries as well. A Church that takes a firm, clear-cut stand is surely more reliable.

As individuals and as churches we are faced with having to choose, at turning-points in our lives, the right course to follow. Abraham, while blessed of God, was not always obliged to make the heroic choice, nor on the other hand the devious way of accommodation. He was free to choose as occasion demanded. Occasionally his choices were wrong, as when he compromised Sarah in Egypt. But his underlying choice was always for God.

"Once to every man and nation comes the moment to decide, in the strife of truth with falsehood, for the good or evil side," wrote the poet James Russell Lowell. When the alternatives present themselves, the choice has to be made. Let us made it under the guidance of the Holy Spirit and choose the side of good, of God.

15 The Search for Truth"

We begin the search for truth without the slightest proof that such an entity has ever existed or still exists. We might imagine that if there was a truth it must have been killed long ago. Jesus asserted, "I am the truth," and he was crucified.

I once dreamt that some men were quarrelling for a white horse that represented the truth. One man cut it in pieces, which meant it ceased to exist. Then they quarrelled for the pieces of the dead horse. I received the head and was proud until I realized it was the head of a corpse. At that point I awoke.

Nothing is easier than to deceive searchers for truth. At the University of California, an actor was once engaged to deliver a lecture on medicine, a subject about which he knew nothing. The bogus professor was highly appreciated when he spoke eloquently about "zen-sum" areas and the usefulness of the opera ~Tosca~ for the study of medicine. Even after the audience was told about the hoax people continued to believe they had learned a lot. We can be seduced by the music of what we hear even if the content is sheer nonsense.

The best and most scholarly sermon may fail to convict if the preacher has an unpleasant voice, is unkempt, or has a stain on his cassock, all of which can distract his hearers' attention.

Who can tell the whole truth? One can never expect exactness from lovers describing the beloved nor an accurate description of truth from one whom it critizes. You cannot objectively describe someone who hit you in the face when you're seeing stars before your eyes and your ears tingle. The great events of life, whether pleasant or unpleasant, cannot be the object of protocol. The differences in the Gospels simply show how overwhelmed the Evangelists were by their encounter with Jesus.

Often, individuals err because they are not attentive to the difference between truth and fact.

The title of Psalm 52 says it was written by David when a certain Doeg told Saul that David, a fugitive from the king, had been received by the high priest Ahimelech*, who provided him with food. Doeg had denounced a man who was unrighteously persecuted, and his denunciation led to the killing of many innocents by an enraged Saul. In verse 3 [PSA 52:3] the psalmist says to Doeg, "Thou lovest lying rather than to speak righteousness." We would have said that Doeg had told King Saul "the truth," since he recounted what had actually taken place, but a truth that is harmful to God's elect is a lie, according to the Bible.

The wise man compares truth with "apples of gold" (PRO 25:11). Better than seeking the truth is seeking reality about which the truth speaks. A golden apple can be only an ornament. If you are hungry you must sell it in order to have something to eat. We must sell words, even truthful words, in order to have the reality they express.

If we do so, we will recognize that we cannot depend on our good pleasure to know truth. Truth is not the object that we as subject must seek. There exists an eternal truth whose object we ourselves are. We were created by Christ, who is the truth. Before the foundation of the world he chose who would be possessors of truth. He, the truth, has come to seek those lost to the truth. We should not be subjects of the searching, but objects, awaiting the divine seeking.

In the beginning was the Word, not any word, but the one true, reliable Word, and this Word was with God, and this Word was God. This Word became flesh in the person of Jesus Christ, who communicates with us of his own free will. He is love, and love infuses truth in us. It becomes ours by faith and not by intellectual search and investigation.

After that, other advances await us. At primary school children are taught to print letters. But if they continue to write like that as teenagers, they would be considered backward.

In the beginning, you have to establish who is the subject and who [is] the object in the search for truth. You will come to know what an enemy the intellect is, that discriminates subject from object. It is a distinction that the conscious mind makes, but the conscious is only a part of our spiritual being. We have to explore the unconscious as well to achieve completeness. In the unconscious, subject and object are one, and only this oneness can possess the truth.

Notes: * The book reads "Abimelech" with a "b"; the KJV says "Ahimelech" - with an "h".

The article below is from http://ourworld.compuserve.com/homepages/YesLord/marklsn3.htm Start--->
Again, FYI, and lest you panic. Yes, the passage in I Samuel says the priest's name was Ahimelech and Jesus called the priest, ABIATHAR. What s going on? , you ask. Why this difference? Well, A.T. Robertson explains this for us on page 273 of Word Pictures in the New Testament - Volume I - Mark . He says, as he explains this passage in I Samuel:

When Abiathar was high priest (epi Abiathar archierreos). ...There was a confusion in the Massoretic text and in the LXX about the difference between Ahimelech (Abimelech) and Abiathar (2SM 8:17), Ahimelech s son and successor (1SM 21:2; 22:20). Apparently Ahimelech, not Abiathar was high priest at this time. It is possible that both father and son bore both names (1SM 22:20; 2SM 8:17; 1CH 18:16), Abiathar mentioned though both involved. Epi may so mean in the passage about Abiathar. Or we may leave it unexplained. They had the most elaborate rules for the preparation of the shewbread ..., the loaves of presentation, the loaves of the face or presence of God. It was renewed on the commencement of the Sabbath and the old bread deposited on the golden table in the porch of the Sanctuary. This old bread was eaten by the priests as they came and went. This is what David ate.

Therefore, regardless of the name of the High Priest, it is the point that Jesus is trying to get across which is important.

16 About Suffering"
http://www.egroups.com/docvault/wurmbrand/TTB-16.TXT

Don't despair when the stars set. It is a sign that the sun will soon rise. Don't despair when devastating winds blow. Storms pass over the garden of Christ only to spread its perfume. Dante wrote about "the good suffering that remarries us to God." When Shakespeare lost love, friendship and health, he wrote "The Tempest." Humankind would have been poorer without it.

In times of suffering, it is best just to keep quiet. When Jephthah told his daughter that he had promised to sacrifice her to God, her answer was, "If thou hast opened thy mouth unto the Lord, do to me according to that which has proceeded out of thy mouth" (JDG 11:36).

When your heavenly Father decides to sacrifice you, your joy, your health, your liberty, your position, for some mysterious purpose of his, be like Jephthah's daughter even if you do not understand his purposes. Remember that from the burning ovens of Auschwitz, where Jews suffered, and from Communist and Muslim jails, in which Christians still suffer for their faith, beacons of warning and hope shine.

Remain quiet during the time of deepest suffering, when a loved one dies. Jesus said to his disciples on the occasion of the Last Supper, " It is expedient for you that I go away" (JHN 16:7). These words might be said about everyone who dies.

God loves you. Why would he allow you to lose someone precious if it were not for your good and theirs? Those who live in the invisible world of the spirit view the death of a friend as a release, not as a separation. Those who die pass from shadows and images to truth. Even those in hell finally know the truth.

When John Chrysostom arrived after a three-month journey at Comana, the place to which he had been deported, Basilicus, who had been martyred there, appeared to him in vision saying, "Courage, brother, tomorrow we will be together." He died the next day saying as his last words, " Glory to God, Amen." In psychological depths inaccessible to our consciousness, the dead whom we mourn might have had a similar vision.

Face everything quietly. When the stars set, the sun rises.

17 The Angels of Suffering"

"The Lord sent fiery serpents among the people" (NUM 21:6). What does this Bible verse mean? Fiery serpents as such do not exist. In fact, the Hebrew original has no such expression. Instead, we read, ~Nahashim seraphim~. Nahashim means "serpents," and seraphim is the word for a special class of angels. So the serpents that bit the Jews were in reality embodiments of angels of God. John in Revelation describes four beasts, one like a lion, the second like a calf, the third like an eagle, and the fourth like a man (REV 4:6-8). So angels can have the forms of animals. Why not the shape of a serpent? The psalmist says, "The angel of the Lord encamps round about them that fear him" (PSA 34:7). Only if he has the shape of a serpent can he do this.

The serpents that hurt the Jews were either angels of God or beings directed by them. From this we learn to see our friends the angels behind even serious troubles.

God writes straight on crooked lines. The most adverse happenings in the lives of his children work together for good. Not every Christian is ready to break his bottle of perfume to anoint Jesus, as did Mary Magdalene. If angels did not break our bottles by giving us suffering, the fragrance would not be released.

Therefore, don't murmur and complain when a cross is given to you. Atrocious suffering defies explanation. Rather, ask what is the purpose of the cross. Is it not to make us angel-like? A cross can be a splendid opportunity. When Jesus was crucified, he hung between two thieves. One asked to be taken down from the cross, the other to be taken up. Suffering provides us with the same choice.

Those who wish to be taken up do not denounce those who have done mischief to them; they don't even wonder about the hardships of life. They know we are a sentenced race. God said to Adam, "In sorrow you shall eat of the ground all the days of your life" (GEN 3:17). We should be thankful for the few days without hardship.

The person who "goes up" when suffering asks, "Do I deserve better? Have I fulfilled the commandments that are connected to blessings?" They say what the repentant thief said to the unrepentant who cursed: " Do you not fear God, seeing you are in the same condemnation? And we indeed justly, for we receive the due reward of our deeds, but this man [ Jesus] has done nothing amiss" (LUK 23:41).

The Christian is free from the curse of sin through the atoning sacrifice of Christ. The evils we encounter are unfinished good. Whenever we weep a tear, a gem is added to our crown.

The suffering saints are the jewels of the Church. In a dream I once saw myself in a chapel. All those at the altar and in the front rows wore plain clothes. Only the sick and the poor in the rear wore priestly ornaments. The suffering saints are the teachers, those at ease the learners.

Don't be afraid to suffer.

18 Sharing His Divinity"

Jesus should not be an unknown person remote from us. To bring him nearer, we should love everyone, whatever their defects, as if they were Jesus; listen to every word, even if it is sinful and blasphemous, as if it were prayer, in consideration of the suffering and ignorance from which it springs, and behave in every place as if it were heaven.

Remember first of all that Jesus lived the life of a man from an oppressed class in an oppressed nation, that he therefore has close ties with all the oppressed and sees in those who hunger, thirst, are naked, imprisoned, and injured his little brothers and sisters. This will familiarize you with Jesus.

The Holy Spirit is compared in Scripture to rivers of living water. We can swim ~in~ them as in the ocean, because these rivers are accessible to everyone. But if we have the wrong attitude, we can swim ~through~ them like submarines in the sea, sealed off from their healing influence and encased in our own atmosphere.

The Roman philosopher of antiquity Cato said long ago, "The soul of a lover lives in another's body." Jesus is the supreme lover. You don't have to seek him far. He lives within you, as you live in him, if you are his.

The oneness with him gives a person the sense of utter freedom from another's judgments. What do the opinions of others count if Jesus' contemporaries called him a devil, a madman, a being with an unclean spirit?

Belief in him also unites you in fellowship with other believers throughout the whole world, even if they differ from you. They might not witness openly for the faith as you do, but this does not make them inferior. Jesus had his hidden disciples who, while hiding their faith, were still considered his. Nicodemus and Joseph of Arimathea were among them. The apostle John could not have trumpeted his faith in Jerusalem or he would never have been in such good standing with the high priest Caiaphas that he was allowed to enter the heavily guarded temple with his friend Peter during Jesus' trial. Such a privilege was granted only to those considered reliable by the high priest. Under the circumstances, a known disciple of Jesus would not have been admitted.

You will have the friendship not only of those who say they are Christians, but also of those who do not make this public confession. You will have the fellowship of people of other persuasions who also love Jesus. A blind man healed by the Saviour was asked, "What do you say of him that has opened your eyes?" His only answer was, "He is a prophet" (JHN 9:17). Reformed Jews, Unitarians, and Muslims could subscribe to this statement. The healed blind man did not believe in Jesus according to the Athanasian creed, but neither did anyone else in the first centuries of the Christian Church. Yet they were disciples and were received by God as such. Those who may not understand the development of Christology in the Church will be your friends, too.

The blind man's intuition about who Jesus was might have been deficient, but he had the right spirit. He expressed only thankfulness to God for having been healed, without reproaching his Creator for his previous blindness.

What reproaches can a lover bring against the beloved? Desdemona did not rebuke Othello even for killing her, but continued to love him. This is the logic of romance, and no romance could ever equal that between the believing soul and the Man of Calvary.

All are called to become his brides. He excludes no one but those who exclude themselves. Our sinfulness is no hindrance, since our guilt has been transferred to the Son of God. To make us clean, He declared himself guilty for what we have done. There is no barrier between us.

An identification between Christ and the individual takes place. God said to Abraham, "In thee shall all families of the earth be blessed" (GEN 12:3). The Messiah, Abraham's descendant, is here intended, but the Bible makes no distinction between him and his ancestor. When you are blessed in Jesus, you are blessed in Abraham and vice versa. The first Christians had a proverb: "Whoever sees a brother sees God."

Jesus is ever willing to share his divinity with humanity. In fact, he often speaks about himself in the third person. When we do so, we are using his own language, though it is best to think about him as our "I."

In loving him, we love the best that is in us. Incredibly, the weaker our love and the greater the danger that we might lose it altogether, the more saving grace is granted, until we become one with him, as he and the Father are one.

---End.

19 Attitude Towards Law"

There are two kinds of law: those made by people, and those for which people are made. The latter come from God and must take precedence.

Such commandments are, however, individualized. The Lord said to John, "Write the things which thou hast seen" (REV 1:19). Paul, on the other hand, heard in heaven "unspeakable words, which it is not lawful for a man to utter" (2CO 12:4). We can only hint at the main characteristics of such forbidden words: they always have a dual character.

One and the same biblical word expressed the plus and the minus, the positive and the negative. For instance, the Greek word ~afes~, used in the Lord's Prayer for "forgive us our trespasses," means also "to leave." Thus we have two sides within us: one desires to keep sins because they are sweet; another wants to get rid of them. When you recite the " Our Father" in the original Greek, both sides of your personality have had their say: "Leave us our trespasses" and "Forgive us ..." Such words are difficult for the nonspiritual to comprehend.

God's laws have a dual character. On one side is the law of love. Since we live in a doomed world, mutual understanding is in the supreme interest of the whole of mankind. We must unite and love each other even where union seems illogical. Two enemies on a sinking ship should at least unite their efforts so that they can survive to continue their quarrel.

Whoever stands for love between races, nations, religions, parties, classes, generations or individuals, and suffers for this cause resembles Christ, regardless of their convictions in matters of faith.

Love is in our best interest even if it brings suffering, first of all because love is more beautiful than hatred. It is good to give to the poor, not only for the sake of the poor but because wealth destroys character and often denies one entrance into heaven.

If several individuals plot to slander you, go along with them. No one believes the self-accusations of a person who claims to be evil. Jesus said, "Agree with your adversary quickly, while you are on the way with him" (MTT 5:25).

Love your enemies, too. If you cannot forgive them for Christ's sake, then do so for the sake of your gallbladder and stomach. Kindness is never wasted. At the very least it profits the giver. Anyone who does not forgive burns the bridge over which they will have to pass. None of us can enter heaven except as forgiven sinners.

Know yourself and acknowledge that if it is difficult for you to forgive an enemy's mistake, the reason could be that your enemy has witnessed your own.

Love is the law for which we were made.

This is one aspect of what you hear in heaven. There exists another side to the matter.

Only fools are honest with the dishonest. A policeman who made it a principle to deal honestly with terrorists, spies, and drug-smugglers would never catch a criminal. There cannot exist one general rule of behavior towards all men. With some we have to use cunning.

The Lord teaches us to be as wise as serpents (MTT 10:16). The New Testament employs here the same word used in the Septuagint for the devil in Genesis 3:1 [GEN 3:1]. He meant that we should at least equal the devils in wisdom, though of another quality.

Wisdom will sometimes make us add to the common law. God told Adam not to eat of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil (GEN 2:17). Apparently Adam then instructed weaker Eve, "You shall not eat of it, neither shall you touch it" (GEN 3:1). This is how we have to instruct those who are young in the faith. We raise a fence around the commandments and add other restrictions.

Wisdom occasionally obliges us to enlarge the possibilities of action. One need not feel guilty for telling an untruth in favor of the persecuted. Undue sympathy for criminals can become a crime in itself by encouraging their behavior. There can be no peace in a state without putting down rebellion.

"The Lord raised unto the children of Israel a deliverer, Ehud" (JDG 3: 15). This man, a left-handed Benjaminite, used deceit to kill their oppressor. To judge his deed, we have to remember that he was raised up as a deliverer by God. Origen says the very name of Ehud means "glory," and Ehud is the male form of Jehudah, the name of God's land.

Ehud killed the tyrant Eglon with his left hand. He had hidden his dagger upon his right thigh, where it would have passed unobserved. In the biblical Greek the word for "left" is ~aristeros~, which means "the noblest" side. The infirmity of Ehud became an instrument of God. To obtain a private audience with the king, he said, "I have a message from God unto thee" (JDG 33:20). Eglon arose from his seat to show respect when he heard the name "God," and in that moment he was killed.

Origen, one of the famous teachers of the Church, praises the prevarications of Ehud. St. Basil the Great also considers Ehud's lie justified. The law of God has a dual character. A state of war frees one from the obligation of trutfulness. This rule stands as well for the war in which the Church is engaged in countries with religious persecution.

Mahatma Gandhi said he would not tell a lie even if by so doing they could save the souls of the whole world. This is wrong. Love is better than truth. The law of love is two-sided.

---End.

20 Not Acting"

The predominant question in the minds of many believers is simply: What is the right course of action to follow? The right course may very well be not to act.

Jesus might have asked the Father this question when he received the reply, "Sit thou at my right hand, until I make thine enemies thy footstool" (PSA 110:1). This did not mean sitting quietly for a short period but for thousands of years while the enemies continued to poison humankind with lying doctrines, destroy millions of believers, and bring unspeakable suffering upon the whole creation.

What should one do when confronted with a drama of such proportions? Before expecting an answer to such a question, ask yourself if it is legitimate, if it is proper, to do anything. God is not always impressed with our doings. His advice is "Sit."

This is a teaching, not a law. The Hebrew word ~Torah~, the name for the five books of Moses, means "teaching." It has been falsely translated as "law" in the Greek version of the Old Testament known as the Septuagint. Generally, the Bible does not impose commandments; rather, it gives counsel about the best way to follow God's desires. It even provides several options.

Patience must not mean passiveness. If the psalmist says "Sit," it does not mean you should do nothing. Many good works can be done with a relaxed spirit and relaxed muscles, just as one sits.

Do what you need to do, but do so remaining comfortable, at ease, not worrying if others will approve your actions. To reach an objective you might have to apply methods some people will not appreciate. The main test is whether you bring home your trophy.

Before asking yourself what you should do, decide whether you can do it with peace of mind. God kept the Sabbath. A person who believes that he can do anything useful without keeping the Sabbath fools himself. When God created the world and organized it, he knew that Adam and Eve were in great danger, because the serpent was in Eden. Notwithstanding, he rested. You can do the same.

You may say you are in great shape and need no rest. But what if the Sabbath needs you? The Talmud says that the days of the week once put their case to God. Sunday had Monday as a friend, Tuesday had Wednesday, Thursday was on good terms with Friday. Only Saturday was alone. So God gave his holy people to be the Sabbath's friend. You might not need rest, but rest needs you. Rest not for your own sake, but in order that rest, repose, and quietness might not feel rejected and abandoned. The Sabbath will reward your love and will make the smallest deeds fruitful.

Because we do not rest properly, we improvise. Abraham was in a hurry to fulfill God's promise and so procreated a son by Hagar instead of waiting for God's timing - and the world even today is paying the price. But God keeps his promises and can provide an heir in old age. Right actions can wait. We can take our time.

It is better not to attempt too many different enterprises, but rather to do one good thing over and over until we can do it really well. John Wesley as a boy was not good at mathematics. Once he asked his mother the same question twenty times. His father got angry at her: "Stop repeating the same thing. You have already given the answer nineteen times." His mother replied, "Isn't it better to say it twenty times, instead of allowing the nineteen efforts to be lost?"

Don't look into any textbook or code to inspire you to right actions. Saul was the king, so Doeg was loyal to him. He told the king the truth about David and his companions and added that they had been fed at the house of Abimelech [should be "Ahimelech"? 1SM 22:9; PSA 52:1 - Dido], the high priest. But the inspired writer calls him a liar and a lover of evil. In God's eyes it is a lie to make a truthful denunciation to the legitimate king if he is a tyrant rejected by God.

God promises you a new heart. If you don't feel entitled to one, then take it from him by force. The Lord says, "The kingdom of heaven suffers violence, and the violent take it by force" (MTT 11:12). Once the kingdom of heaven is within, you will need no textbooks to guide you.

Know that even in the Bible some commandments are given in irony, such as "Fill up the measure of your fathers" (MTT 23:32). Go after your new character, not after verses.

A word of caution is in order. Be aware of the fact that as often as you do something amiss, Jesus is asked, "Why do thy disciples transgress? " (MTT 15:2). This question is posed even now in heaven. Don't put him in an embarrassing situation.

Don't spend a lot of time trying to decide what to do. Jesus says, " Take the fish that first comes up" (MTT 17:27). You might find it difficult just to sit still. But if you can, it will be your first opportunity to do quietly something that is the right action for you.

---End.

21 Right Actions"

If you have good intentions, it is advisable not to try and implement them immediately with good deeds. These may be premature.

A tin soldier once wanted to change the world so that everyone would be happy, but he forgot he was made of cheap metal. As soon as he entered the fire of battle, he melted. Changing yourself is more difficult than changing the world. To do so you must be made of very resistant material.

First, you must be a new person who has repented of your sins. The author of the rabbinical book ~Levitic Rabba~ writes,

> Whence is it derived that if one repents > it is imputed to him as if he had gone up > to Jerusalem, built the Temple, erected > an altar, and offered upon it all the > sacrifices enumerated in the Law? From the > text, "The sacrifices of God are a broken > spirit" (PSA 51:17).

Then, begin by offering to God the sacrifices of a broken spirit.

The German philosopher Karl Jaspers said, "Crucial for man is his attitude toward failure, because the way in which man approaches his failure determines what he will become."

Before starting to perform any good deed, acknowledge that past actions have been wrong. Repent of them and believe what Jesus' sacrifice has erased them and all their evil consequences. Then you are ready to proceed. But always remember that even the new creature is only human, limited not only by the flow of external circumstances, but also by an inner stream with a predetermined bed, the only channel in which it can flow.

The French have an expression "violon d'Ingres." Ingres was a gifted painter, whose few creations are in the Louvre. They are few because he believed himself to be a violinist. The tragedy iss that when he played the instrument, all the neighbors had to plug their ears, so unbearable was his musicianship. Ingres was a man who did not know his talent.

It is important that you know what is possible for you and what is not.

Eisenhower told Khruschchev, "In our country we are all equal. Anyone can become president." The dictator pointed to a man who was just sweeping the garden in front of the White House and asked, "Can you really assert that such a person can become president?" Eisenhower replied, "Not this man; he sweeps against the wind."

Every human being has certain possibilities, certain doors to which he has the key. Other doors are completely closed to him. Jesus says again and again, "Go ~your~ way!" Your way is the only one in which you can be successful.

Don't try to change your behavior. Actions are the shadow cast by a personality. Spend all such endeavors in changing your personality.

Work at this quietly. There is no hurry. There is no great distance to traverse. Even if you have committed atrocious crimes you are not far from God. Jesus tells us about a son who forsook his father "and took his journey into a far country" (LUK 15:13). Such a journey is possible on earth, but which country or state of soul is far from the heavenly Father?

We are called to enter a place we never left. The return is easy. When the prodigal son "came to himself" (LUK 15:17), very soon he also found himself in his father's arms. What you really need to know is that "the kingdom of heaven is at hand" (MTT 3:2).

Once this realization is clear, you don't have to worry yourself interminably about which actions are right. Whether working in a factory or in a kitchen, you can do the will of Christ by giving a cup of water to a thirsty soul. No exceptional deeds are required.

To offer some cool water to a child is a very good Christian action. Why do we ask ourselves complicated questions about what deeds are acceptable?

You cannot keep life alive without letting it live. Let things happen. Don't try to control the universe. Serve the little world around you. A child happens to enter your home. Caress the little one before discussing your business with his parents. You might be a waitress in a restaurant. Serve the customers well. Smile at them. No more right actions are needed.

In whatever you do, keep the great hope. We are not what we are but what we are becoming. We are preparing in menial tasks for a greater calling, to "serve him day and night in his temple" (REV 7:15).

Prepare yourself decidedly for this. In Christ there exists only an " either/or," never an "as well as."

We live in a doomed world. We travel in a sinking ship. Don't analyze the chemical constituents of the water pouring in. Remain quietly on board, fulfilling faithfully your sailor's duty, and prepare for the last swim to the other shore.

Love all those around you, who are so terribly endangered. No one is accepted unless the worst in them is accepted. Love all people just as they are and don't worry about what good deeds to perform. St. Augustine wrote, "Love and go what you like."

It requires great discipline to be simple. The simplest action is the right one."

22 Having Jesus at His Best"

The Evangelists record that Jesus healed a man possessed by demons. They say not one word about how he had come to be possessed by unclean spirits. For them, only his encounter with Jesus is important. He is presented as a man without biography. We know nothing about his past or his family, nor are we informed about what he did after his brief hour with Jesus.

Perhaps in heaven only the minutes we have spent in intimate contact with Jesus will count.

Come to Jesus, and you will discover that you have fulfilled the aim of your life. Come, accepting all he did and does, all he said and says, all he promised, threatened, commanded, and attested by his life.

The manner in which you come will show your intent. Men came to the Garden of Gethsemane with lanterns and torches (JHN 18:3), which were needed to prevent a false arrest. Today, some approach him with the lights of reason and science, which are indispensable in preventing in errors in judgment. But lovers prefer darkness. They come to him without torches, which reveal only the outer man. A lover seeks the real person. Only lovers can know him as he really is.

And what if in the darkness of night they embrace another by mistake? It matters not, because they were destined from the beginning to love not only him but all beings.

The Lord forbade people on several occasions to spread the news that he was the Messiah, because he knew his time had not come. But at a deeper level, he wanted to teach his disciples that men and women can be with him not only when they know they have Jesus with them. They could be with him [also] when in the company of any poor, oppressed, or holy being.

Angelus Silesius wrote, "Man, if you love something, you love nothing. God is not this and that; therefore, leave the 'something'." St. John of the Cross also worried: "If you stop at something, you are no more committed to the whole."

Only lovers can explain the enigma. Is Jesus in truth the same yesterday, today, and forever? In the past, he could not bear to see men who might faint because they had nothing to eat, and so he fed them miraculously. Today millions starve. It is not that they faint; they die. Why does he not come to their aid?

Jesus always has the same answer to social problems. The disciples asked him, "Where can we find bread here in the wilderness for thousands of people?" His reply was, "How many loaves do you have?" (MRK 8:4,5). If the disciples had had more than the minimum required for life, the hunger of others would have been their fault. They had less than the minimum: seven loaves and a few small fish for thirteen men, including Jesus. But they practiced self-renunciation, asceticism. Satisfied with their poverty, Jesus performed the miracle of multiplying the food, with much to spare.

Let today's Christians deny themselves and become poor. Then they will see that Jesus has remained the same.

During Jesus' earthly life, there were places where he could not perform mighty works (MRK 6:37). Can it be that through our greed we have created such places in our day?

Come to Jesus, forsaking all. Then you can have him at his best.

23 Influence God"

Like every well-organized brain, that of God also has a mechanism for forgetting and remembering. He says, "Behold, I, even I, will utterly forget you" (JER 23:39). "I will also forget thy children" (HOS 4:6). "I will not remember thy sins" (ISA 43:25).

On the other hand, the groaning of the children of Israel caused him to remember his covenant (EXO 6:5). The sense of prayer is to bring to God's remembrance things he has known from time immemorial.

Like every unselfish being, the one he forgets most is himself. Therefore our prayers should begin with the words, "Hallowed by thy name." Usually they start with the request "Do something for me," which is not right. He needs most to be reminded of himself and of his Kingdom.

There are privileged people who obtain from God everything they desire. It is written, "The Lord did according to the word of Moses" (EXO 8:13). More than others, such individuals should say to God, "Not my will, but Thy will be done." In the embrace of love we should forget ourselves, as he forgets himself. We need not worry, there will be others to remind him of our existence.

Luther prayed:
O Lord and good Father, I don't wish to be or not to be, to live or to die, to know or not to know, to have or to lack.
Your will be done; I don't wish what is Yours. I wish Yourself.
You are not more beloved by me what I have it well, and not less when I have it evil.

God's glory should be our supreme desire in prayer.

The Jews had fled from Egypt in a hurry. They must have left behind many possessions, but not their timbrels. With these they were able to praise God (EXO 15:20). We may be assured that we can also bring before him our diverse petitions. We can even be very insistent in them. When the children of Israel were in great danger, Moses said soothing words to them, while to God he cried (EXO 14:13-15). Jesus, too, "offered up prayers and supplications with strong crying and tears" (HEB 5:7).

We are all what we are as a result of influences that impinge upon us. When God requires us to pray, he is essentially asking us to influence him. In this respect he is like us. Let us with determination influence him in favor of the cause to which he calls us.

If prayer moves him, it also influences those for whom we pray. When we kneel in prayer for someone else, we kneel not only before God but also before those for whom we are praying, entreating them thus to follow the right way.

Our prayers influence both God and others.

24 God Who Evolves"

Pascal wrote, "Nature has some perfect ions to show that she is the image of God and some defects to show she is only an image."

~Mona Lisa~ could not exist without a model, about whom we know nothing. Leonardo da Vinci's painting proves that real women who sometimes smile wonderfully must exist. Without them we would never have had this admirable image.

Nature is only an image. Therefore an original must exist.

I believe that the ontological argument for the existence of God brought by Anselm of Canterbury (1033-1109) still stands: We have an idea of a perfect being. Existence is an attribute of perfection; therefore a perfect being must exist. This is God.

If everyone's "I" is incommunicable, how much more is his! Jesus said, "No one knows the Father except the Son" (MTT 11:27). When we write about God, therefore, we write about an unknown Being. "If any man thinks that he knows anything, he knows nothing yet as he ought to know" (1CO 8:2). We know only a few, a very few, words of God. He is brief, and our knowledge is scanty. Our sermons and books about him must be brief too.

God is known from the Bible under different names. Thomas Aquinas raised the question whether the names predicated about God are synonymous. In his book ~Sentences~, he uses for the first time in church history the expression "attributes of God." He teaches that the names attributed to God all signify one and the same thing but under many distinctions of reason. We call him by different names only because we apprehend him in manifold ways, but he is one.

This one God has revealed about himself in Scripture not only his almightiness, but also some of his limitations; he is love and cannot love less than to the uttermost. He is immortal. He is invisible. He cannot lie. He cannot get wrathful except with our consent. He said to Moses, "Let me alone that my wrath may wax hot against the Jewish people" (EXO 22:24). Because Moses did not let him alone, he did not exterminate the people as he might have otherwise.

There is one attribute of God that makes every quarrel with him appear as senseless as the quarrels with men. God is what he is (EXO 3:14). He is not what we or he himself would like him to be. he decides all things. He never decided to be the only one to decide all things. He is God. He did not choose to be God, as you did not choose to be a human being, of a certain sex and race, with a certain heredity, born in certain circumstances that will shape your destiny for life. He simply exists.

To him the same words apply that Paul used for himself, "I am what I am" (1CO 15:10). God is what he is by nature. Paul was what he was by God's grace. God is the perfect example of a being self-existent, without inner conflict, accepting all his characteristic features, not quarreling with himself, not desiring the impossible for himself.

For him, too, being means evolving, becoming. The literal translation of the words spoken to Moses "Ani ehyeh asher ehyeh" is "I become what I become," not "what I am." He knows what he will become. With the qualities he possesses, he could not become less than all in all.

He is basically the same always, but he evolves. A Jewish child of five passing near a church with his father once said, "Papa, let us enter to see what is new with God." This is why we should go to church - to receive good news. A pastor who tells only what God was two thousand years ago is not very helpful, since God "becomes what he becomes." There is no absolutely changeless object of knowledge and no unchangeable knower, and there is therefore no unchangeable knowledge.

An unknown, an invisible God, a God who evolves - I cannot comprehend this. When you cannot catch a butterfly with empty hands, you have understood its nature. Knowledge is always only partial and therefore hinders intimacy. "The Lord said that he would dwell in the thick darkness" (1KI 8:12). It is only in darkness that he can be embraced.

If you do not wish a God like this, it would be better to avoid him. Be happy he does not walk with you, because he consumes stiff-necked people in the way (EXO 33:3).

But if you accept him as he is, then love him with all your heart and with all your soul. This is the first commandment. Everything else comes afterwards.

25 Are You Ready to Die?"

Jesus said, "Whosoever shall confess me before men, him will I confess also before my Father who is in heaven" (MTT 10:32).

When the Communists took over Cambodia, they entered a church during the Sunday service. Taking the Bible from the pulpit, an officer put it on the threshold. As his men stood by with rifles ready, he ordered the people to leave the building one by one and spit on the Bible. "Whoever does so will be free to go home," he said. "Whoever does not will be shot on the spot."

Imagine for a moment that you were a member of the congregation. What would you have done under the circumstances?

As one who has passed through similar situations, I know the thoughts that flash through the mind when put to such a test: "I have a bride. Her heart would break if I were to die. My time has not yet come ... I have old parents who are invalids. They depend on me for support. They are doomed if I die. Love obliges me to spit ... So what if I spit? Jesus knows that I have done so under duress. He forgave Peter, who denied him without being in such danger as this. He understands human weakness. In any case, I will spit only a little bit."

These were people who had come to church to worship God and study his word, but they had never decided to die for Christ. One by one, Christians, who ten minutes before had praised Christ in song, left the church and spat on the Bible. Then came a girl of sixteen. When challenged at gunpoint to spit, she began to weep and said, "I cannot do it. I love God. The Bible is his letter to us. No child spits on his father's letter." She knelt down and wiped away the spittle from the cover of the Bible - and fell dead over the holy book, shot in the head.

What would you have done? Many of us have answered a call forward to the altar. The altar in Jerusalem was a place where creatures died. Lambs, rams, doves, whatever came upon the altar died. Did you understand your response to the altar call in these terms?

We are not all put in the same situation. Not everyone is forced to lay their life on the line. However, every Christian chose death at his conversion, if it was genuine.

Rabbinical commentaries have said that the key to the Bible lies in the words, "This is the law, when a man dies ..." (NUM 19:14). If a person does not die for the law, they have never really considered it to be the law of God. This is how Christians think, too. A Christian is someone, "dead to sin" and "dead with Christ" (ROM 6:2,8). To respond to an altar call means to die to the world. If you have understood this rightly and lived in this spirit, you will make the right choice in times of crisis.

Few of us may be asked to spit on the Bible literally, but to spit or not to spit is a choice we make daily when we are tempted. It means spitting on the Bible, indeed, on Christ, if we willfully and consciously prefer a sin to his commandments.

Let us choose rather to wipe away the spittle with which others have soiled his holy word and to be faithful at all times.

26 One Trinitarian God"

To Jews and Muslims, the greatest stone of offence in the Christian religion is the belief that the one God is a trinity. Jesus is the first to give a Trinitarian formula to the Godhead. He says, "Baptize in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost" (MTT 28:19).

The Church teaches us to worship the unity in the Trinity and the Trinity in the unity. We are not commanded to understand it. In fact, we do many things without understanding them. How many of us comprehend the technicalities of electricity, of cars, of jets, of our household gadgets, of the medicines we use?

Curiously, the early church never said there were three persons in the Godhead. "Person" is a word used for a whole being. The church fathers who fixed the dogma spoke about three ~hypostases~ in the Godhead. Etymologically, ~hypostasis~ means "inferior" (hypo) and "stand" (stasis). Only the three together, Father, Son and Holy Ghost constitutes a whole being. There exists no wholeness outside the totality of the Godhead.

Two main accusations are brought against the Trinitarian teaching of the Bible.
1. It contradicts mathematics, which is a discipline that never permits two different series of computation. One plus one plus one can yield only three. Another solution, that one plus one plus one should equal one, is out of the question.
Three persons can surely not be one person, but it does not contradict mathematics to say that three ~hypostases~, whatever this word means, or that a divine Father, a divine Son, and a divine Spirit should be one Godhead. Three different entities like body, soul and spirit form one person. Many trees form one forest.
2. It contradicts the biblical teaching that God is one.
Deep biblical truth demands vigorous mental effort and much knowledge.

Those who cannot discipline themselves to attain such knowledge are like the fox in Aesop's fable. Unable to breach the fence guarding the vineyard, he said, "I would never eat such grapes anyway. They are sour. "

Those who have studied know that the Old Testament never speaks about God being absolutely one. The Hebrews have two expressions for the notion "one" - ~echad~ and ~yachid~. Yachid stands for perfect unity. " I have one only son" would be in Hebrew ~yesh li ben yachid~. Echad stands for composed unity, as in the expression, ~Vaihi erev vaihi boker yom echad~ (It was evening and it was morning, one day) (GEN 1:5).

God says that man and wife "shall be one (echad) flesh" (GEN 2:24). This shows that the word "one" is not taken in the Bible in the absolute sense.

~Elohim~, one of the most frequent appelations for God in the Old Testament, is a plural. It could be translated "Gods," but in GEN 35:7 and other places, the verb after the subject ~Elohim~ is in the singular.

After hearing the two distinct dreams of Pharaoh, Joseph says, "The dream of Pharaoh is one (echad)" (GEN 41:25). He does not even say, " The two dreams are one." The two dreams are simply one dream. Many two' s can be one. May God grant that we may understand it.

Many Jewish theologians have seen they cannot defend the absolute unity of the Godhead.

The renowned eleventh-century rabbi Gabriol distinguishes between God, his will and his activity in the world, which is something other than his real being, about which we can know nothing. He makes the same distinction that Christian theology makes between ~Deus absconditus~ (the hidden God) and ~Deus revelatus~ (God revealed), the same distinction which Hindus made thousands of years before Christ between Brahman Nirguna (God without attributes, that is, without qualities attributed to him by men, which therefore cannot express ultimate reality) and Brahman Saguna (God with attributes).

God can be philosophized about as "one" in the precise sense of the word only so long as he remains an object of speculation. Those who have a personal experience with God conceive of him as Creator, as Saviour from their sins, and as sone who sanctifies them and makes them God-like. The Trinity was experienced in the spiritual life before being fixed as dogma.

Let us adore the whole God, not only one aspect of him. In Hebrew the word for "face" (panim) does not exist in the singular. The Hebrew Bible speaks about the "faces" of God. We adore not only the majestic face of the serene Father Almighty, but also the face marred by sorrow of the God who suffered for us on Golgotha. We also adore what the Kabbalah calls "the little face" - the dovelike face that awakens our desire for innocence and goodness.

If we do not understand much, it does not matter. St. Augustine, walking along the seashore, reflected on a book about the Trinity that he wanted to write. Hearing a child's cry and fearing something may have happened, he investigated, only to be told, "I weep because I want to put the ocean in my bucket and can't succeed." Augustine learned not to expect too much from the reflections of his little mind about the great God.

Through deep thought we can know something of the fringes of the problem. May this suffice and may we be his adorers both in spirit and in truth.

---End.

27 A Few Thoughts about the Devil"

The Bible calls the devil "the king of terrors" (JOB 18:14) and "the firstborn of death" (JOB 18:13), among many other names. The demons who serve him are usually not given individual names. When asked, one of them said to the Lord, "My name is Legion" (MRK 5:9).

We know only two possible exceptions. One devil is called Apollyon, the angel of the bottomless pit (REV 9:11). The apocryphal book Tobit speaks about a demon whose name was Asmodee. It seems probable that one result of serving the devil is an obliteration of personality.

Demons perform many works on earth. The most insidious is probably that of sowing doubt. It was the devil's first ploy with Eve. Not content with deceiving the race, the devil dared to approach Jesus himself. The Father had said at his baptism, "~This is~ my beloved Son" (MTT 3:17). Every believer receives just such an assurance. After a few weeks, Satan tempted Jesus with the words, "~If thou be~ the Son of God" (MTT 4:3). He uses the same tactic with us.

But he uses even more insidious methods. The Spirit of the Father speaks in a believer (MTT 10:20), but not always. Satan can also influence a believer to such an extent that he is even able to speak through him. The Lord responded to certain of Peter's words by saying, " Get thee behind me, Satan" (MTT 16:23). Jesus discerned that the false thoughts expressed by Peter did not come from his own heart.

Knowing the devil's power, many believers seek some accommodation with him. Montaigne wrote, "I would burn one candle for God and one for the devil." This attitude is wrong. My prayer is, "God, help me every day to be an annoyance to the devil." We don't have to fear him, in spite of his seeming might. The Empire State Building is gigantic only when viewed from street level. Christians are seated in heavenly places (EPH 2:6). Seen from above, the devils are little creatures.

In MTT 12:25 and 26 Jesus suggests that the best tactic to use in dealing with demons: try to turn one against the other. Split them. The devil of self-satisfaction over one's religiosity can be turned against the devil of whoredom, the devil of thrift against that of gambling; the devil of fear (of being discovered and apprehended) against that of lying and theft.

In times of great demonic oppression and temptation, a simple change of your place of habitation is also effective. Devils are patriots (as were, to an unhealthy extreme, great Satanic personalities like Hitler and Stalin). If you move to another location, they do not always move together with you. A devil besought Jesus not to be sent out of the country (MRK 5:10).

On some occasions, the devil might give you a hard time if you fight him. When forced to leave an individual, he might throw him or her to the ground (MRK 9:20). But devils can be chased away. Subtlety can also be used successfuly to outwit them.

Just be aware that the devil (collectively) will plague you until the end of your earthly life. He attacked the innocent couple, the crown of creation, in paradise. He promised them a religious boon: to be like God. He also knew how to keep silent when the threat was too great. He did not contradict God when he was cursed but simply continued his work. He incited Cain and Abel to quarrel about religious matters to make a mockery of religion. He induces men to run after women only because they are beautiful, causing them to forget decency and virtue.

He often uses renowned personalities as tools. Lenin and Hitler both wrote books that shaped the political destinies of the twentieth century. Christianity has not produced many books with such an impact. While Hitler built gas chambers and ovens to kill millions of Jews, the Church failed to organize a missionary work to bring millions of Jews to conversion.

Hosea well said, "The revolters are profound to make slaughter" (HOS 5: 2). We are not profound. Therefore many Christians have been led astray, even to the point of helping Hitler and Lenin. Christians sometimes sacrifice to devils while believing they sacrifice to God.

When Jesus said, "Beware of men" (MTT 10:17), he meant to be taken seriously. He warns us that there are some people sown in this world by the devil (MTT 13:24, 25, 37, 38). These are not simply notorious figures like Hitler or Stalin, but ordinary people you might encounter in everyday life.

But don't panic. Remember, the devil will try hardest to make you disbelieve that you are a child of God. My answer to him is, "Then if I am a child of the devil, I will be an Absalom, a treacherous son to him. I will love God even if I am not his."

He will also try to make you believe that right is wrong and wrong is right. He will appear as an angel of light to deceive (2CO 11:14). Again, my reply is, "Though now I see through a glass darkly, I know whom I have believed and trust him to keep me from falling and to keep all I have committed to him even though my senses deceive me. I will love him even if I cannot see him" (2CO 13:12; 2TM 1:12).

Scorn the devil. He is a defeated foe, as he knows full well. Jesus conquered him and all his minions on Calvary, for all of us sinners. From the light of Golgotha you can look down on him. I repeat, he is a little creature.

---End.

28 Problems of Faith in God"

Darwin's most radical claim was that evidence is aimless and without inherent direction. His theory was a biological counterfeit of Adam Smith's ~laissez-faire~ economics. Smith had argued that a well-regulated, stable and harmonious economy would be the natural result of untrammelled interest actively pursued by all.

We live some two hundred years after the death of Adam Smith. There is no harmonious economic life. Nor could the order in nature result from uncontrolled struggle of all against all.

Why should and how could random evolution produce unselfishness and self-sacrifice - even in the animal world? In many flocks of birds, for example, the first bird that spots a predator utters a warning cry. The flock scatters. The bird has saved its mates by calling attention to itself, sacrificing its life for the good of the flock.

Nature cannot be explained without a Creator. To acknowledge him does not solve all the intellectual problems. There remains the great question mark: If the world was created by a rational Being, why the terrible suffering?

The question "Why?" addressed to God is as false as the question "What two even numbers added together yield seventeen?" The book of Lamentations ends with a question: "Wherefore dost thou forget us for ever, and forsake us so long time?" (LAM 5:20). We do not know the reasons for God's doings. We know that he does things that seem strange to us. But he is a God in whom we can trust without understanding him. If we can trust completely in surgeons without understanding what they do, should we not trust in God, the Creator of the surgeon?

I don't claim to understand God, but I know he can do wonders. He made it possible for Jesus to be born miraculously to a virgin. Yet every day he still performs the miracle of making a sperm recognize the ovum. What mechanism prevents the sperm from fusing with any other kind of cell it may encounter? Only the miracle of human conception as orchestrated by God. May this God of miracles do what seems good to him, not what seems efficient or right to me.

While I say this, I also know I have the liberty to pray to God to change his decree. He allows me to pray in the Spirit. The Son prayed in Gethsemane that a decree of the Father be altered. We can do so too.

In either case, we can trust God.

I trust God because he does not boast. He says that he created a heaven and an earth. Now, all earthly rulers praise themselves for the good things they do. But our God tells us about hell too. He could have kept it from us in order that we might love and trust him more. Instead, he tells the truth as it is. We can trust him.

He freed the Jews from the Egyptian bondage, proving he could deliver his people. He did not free the Jews from the Nazi holocaust. It was not that he lacked the power. He must have good reasons to proceed differently in each circumstance. In any case, he takes full responsibility for everything that happens.

All kinds of theological arguments can be given to explain the existence of so much evil in the world of a good God. These valuable explanations are like a finger pointing to the moon. But to see the moon you have to look beyond the finger. Then you become silent. Questions are no longer relevant. You realize that there are answers that only time will reveal and that the purpose of God will one day become obvious.

The unrighteous opium war waged by the British against China opened up the country to the inrush of missionaries. Access to inland China for evangelization was the result of the Arrow War in 1856. God nullified good counsel and allowed wrong decisions to be made (2SM 17:14) in order that David, his anointed, might return to his kingdom. Thus we learn not to accept all God's guidance. He gives the wicked guidance that will destroy them. Rather, we should do what the Bible teaches about how to be pleasing in his sight.

I admit that it is not easy to walk with this God. Sometimes he says very unpleasant things. He tells Adam that certain things are forbidden, Abraham that his descendants will be slaves in Egypt for four hundred years.

You will wonder about his words. Aristotle said, "Wonder is the starting point of philosophy." It is the starting point of religion too. From wonder we advance to an acknowledgement of our utter dependence upon God. We - humankind - cannot escape his will.

Nor should we try to escape his will. What we focus on determines our character. The more exalted the object about which we think, the more Godlike we become. It is good for humankind to think primarily about God.

Every concept is an image of an object. When the Father forms a notion, he thinks perfectly about his own divine nature. Thus this idea, the Word, expresses his nature completely. We know him as the Son. The two love each other perfectly. The Holy Spirit is this love. St Bernard of Clairvaux called the Holy Spirit the kiss between the Father and the Son.

Let us therefore bow before the Holy Trinity. Then let us add to their love our own. In love we will find the answer to our restless questionings.

---End.

29 In the Name of Jesus"

Whatever is said about Jesus in the Bible concerns every believer because Jesus identifies himself organically with believers. "Christ is the head of the body" (COL 1:18), and we are the members (1CO 12:12).

The Romans had a saying, "Actiones et passiones sunt suppositorum." (Actions and passions belong to the person.) It is not the hand that steals but the thief; not the hand that gives alms but the philanthropist; not the heart that loves or hates but the whole person. Likewise, every action and passion of Jesus is also mine, and vice versa.

Divine charity is not his alone; I possess it too, because the spirit that animates him belongs to me. There is no problem, no burden of mine that is not also his. My sins do not belong only to me; they are automatically his too and crucify him afresh (HEB 6:6).

We have everything in common. We are both twice born, but in reverse order. He was born first as the Son of God and then became man: I was born first as a human being and then as a child of God. This is the difference. Otherwise we are one body.

Human life has been given to me as a boat to cross the sea from nonexistence to heaven. This is the spiritual sense of the many episodes in the Gospels of the disciples' travelling by ship across the sea of Galilee. Jesus is the good navigator, who also stills contrary winds. To resist being totally and consciously a member of his body is like committing suicide.

We often begin or end personal prayers and public services with the words "In the name of Jesus," which means with a readiness for sacrifice after his example, or rather, together with him.

When we pray "Hallowed be thy name" to God, we are saying in effect, " Give me the grace of self-sacrifice that others, seeing its beauty and knowing that it arises out of love for you, might be drawn to adore you." The sacrifice is meant to be complete. Jesus said, "Greater love has no man than this, that a man lay down is life for his friends" (JHN 15: 13). This is the ultimate sacrifice for a man. Jesus went further: he died for sinners, for his enemies. Since God's children belong to a different order of being, their love has the same ultimacy as that of Jesus: self-sacrifice in the service of their foes.

Jesus would not elaborate on this teaching. He had taught people to love their enemies. They asked him how a man could be released from the heavy duty of loving his own wife. How far love must go belongs to the many things Jesus left unsaid because his disciples were not yet able to bear them.

He is so far beyond us that it is only natural for communication to be difficult. Doubts arise too in many things connected with him. There is nothing wrong in doubting. The wrong lies in sharing the doubts with anyone other than Jesus himself. Speak with him about them as the followers of John the Baptist did: "Art thou he that should come, or do we look for another?" (MTT 11:3).

He will teach you how to love to the uttermost and reveal to you the mystery of his doings. If you love like Jesus and become one with him, people will be offended by your deeds as they were offended by his commanding a Jew to carry a load on the Sabbath. In the case of that man, a natural law had been broken. He had been healed in a moment after thirty-eight years of paralysis and was able to carry a mat on his shoulders. The natural laws come from the same God who ordered us to keep the Sabbath. If the first were broken, why not the latter?

With Jesus, we are in a sphere that humans cannot judge; the realm of the supernatural. Christ's ministry engendered in Herod the reaction that he was John the Baptist come back from the dead, in the Pharisees that he was in a pact with the devil, in his relatives that he was beside himself (MRK 3:21), in Peter that he was "the Son of God." The qualities that called forth so many reactions must have been beyond the ordinary. We believe the only explanation is that he was - and is - God incarnate.

Spinoza wrote, "That God would assume human nature, I must confess seems to me as absurd as that a circle assumed the shape of a square." To which I would respond with the words of Tertullian: "I believe it because it is absurd." A child can take a piece of string and shape it like a circle, then reshape it like a square. We have to accept on faith the fact that God can do things that surpass the imagination or reason of the greatest genius.

The most intimate disciples of Christ do not understand everything yet. St. Ignatius, bishop of Antioch, before his martyrdom said, "I am burdened with chains, but I am only a beginner in the Church of Christ."

Faith tells us that Jesus is God. He is love to the uttermost, and he calls us to such love, even towards our enemies. He is one head and we are his body. We are one.

30 Reason and Sentiment"

Only one half of the human brain directs logical thinking. It is the left hemisphere where the treasury of words is located. The right hemisphere is the seat of pictures and dreams. Strangely, it is this half that more quickly provides a solution to the serious problems of life.

Reason is not reliable. The Romanian word for "mind" is "liar." A fox that once lost its tail in a trap tried to persuade the other animals that it was much better not to have a tail. We also tend to propose as objective truth ideas that would serve to justify our past biographies.

A multitude of depraved sentiments exert a detrimental influence on our reasoning. We all agree that two and two are four, that it is warm when the sun shines, and that the USA has a president - but only because these truths don't interfere with our own interests and passions.

Hobbes said, "Even the axioms of geometry would be disputed if men's passions were concerned in them." Lenin also wrote, "Men would contradict that two and two are four if it conflicted with their interests."

Truth can be very unpleasant when memory tells me, "You have sinned," and pride says, "It is not so." Pride almost always succeeds in convincing memory. Reason is at hand to offer powerful alibis. Francis Bacon said it in ~Novum Organum~: "The human understanding is no dry light, but receives an infusion from the will and affections, where proceed sciences which may be called 'sciences as one would.'"

People even become martyrs of a religion they embraced only because it happened to be the religion of their sweetheart. One of the top leaders of a terrorist gang in West Germany killed and went to prison because the boy she loved was a revolutionist. This was her only motive for embracing the most radical ideas.

Christ refuses faith in him engendered by such motives. He counsels those who plan to build a tower to sit down first and count the cost, and advises kings who intend to make war to consult first whether they are able to win (LUK 14:28-31). He endorses the wisdom of people who, in building a house, dig deep and lay the foundation on rock (LUK 6:48). In effect, he is saying they must make sure they have the right motives and serve the highest causes.

He urges us to follow him only if we have full proof that faith in him is right. He exempts those who don't have the evidence from the duty to hold this faith. "If I had not done among them the works which none other man did, they had not had sin," Jesus said (JHN 15:24). You are without excuse only if a clear revelation has been given you.

However, let us always remember that one part of our mind can apprehend the truth quickly without relying on the processes of reason. It is the same part that induces Romeo to consider Juliet the only girl worth living and dying for and makes Don Quixote forsake all for Dulcinea. God must be loved with all the heart. Therefore, this part of the mind has to convince the other half of its validity, while admitting the possibility of distortion due to emotional complexes of sympathy and antipathy, which block truth.

Reason can adduce proof that adultery is love, that theft is wise provision, that unbelief is intellectual honesty. "Every way of a man is right in his own eyes, but God weighs the heart" (PRO 21:2). Because we don't have a strong grip on truth, with hearts committed to the desire for truth alone, many churces are able to resort to the ways of the world with considerable success.

Before apprehending truth, your reason must become truthful. Without cleansing the mind of passion, you render the grasp of religious truth virtually impossible.

31 Why Evil in the World of a Good Father?"

Anyone who reads the Bible is invariably struck by the sheer volume of evil and suffering it recounts, in particular the suffering of the innocent. To many people this poses a grave problem.

The simplest answer to the question, "Why is there so much evil in a world created by a good God?" is, "We do not know."

Hayyim ibn Mussa (1390-1460), a Spanish rabbi, tells how he heard a renowned preacher attempting to explain why God acted as he did and speculating about his deeds. "Thereupon," the rabbi said, "misfortune came upon me in a great pogrom in Seville. I was beaten and wounded until my persecutors desisted because they thought I was dead. And here you are speculating about God and his decrees. I have greater faith in the sufferings which God imposes upon us than in your theories about them."

Is it not enough to endure pain and persecution and natural catastrophes? Must we endure philosophical explanations too?

Job, upon receiving news that he had lost all his property and that all his children had died, exclaimed, "The Lord gave, and the Lord has taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord" (JOB 1:21). When God gives, he gives in mercy; when he takes, he takes in mercy. About mercies we need to jubilate and not to speculate.

An evil can often be a blessing in disguise. Edison, thought to have an addled brain, was driven out of school. A train conductor who beat him made him deaf. This affliction closed him to external influences. He could draw from inner wells. As a result, we owe to him the electric light bulb. More than that, he earned a patent every fortnight.

Lincoln was grieve because of two bankruptcies. Through these God showed him that he was made for something better than commerce. He became one of the great presidents of America.

There have been many artists of unsound mind. Over seventy analytical papers have been written about the folly of Van Gogh alone. Yet would his art have been possible without this touch of madness? Neither the Romanian poet Eminescu nor the Hungarian Ady Endre could have created their masterpieces without the incipient folly in them.

Some artists have been aware of their weaknesses and loved their perilous handicaps. Edward Munch said, "I want to keep my weaknesses. They are a part of myself. I wouldn't want to miss suffering. I have to give much thanks to this suffering in my art."

I once saw a performance of an old classical Japanese dance. Its subject was a young king of such beauty that wherever he appeared all activity stopped. No one could do anything but hold their breath while gazing at the king's splendor. His appearance negated the possibility of a normal existence for anyone else. His subjects could no longer love one another because they compared their neighbors unfavorably with the beautiful king. For the good of his citizens, then, the young king had to wear an ugly mask.

Do you understand the significance of this story? Could human relations and falling in love and the world itself exist if we were able to see our God in all his majesty? He too had to wear an ugly mask by taking the form of sin-sick humanity. In the person of Jesus, God appeared among us with "no form nor comeliness." He had no beauty that we should desire him ... We esteemed him not" (ISA 53:2,3). Thus he made it possible for us to esteem one another's beauty and desire after the love of our fellows.

Think about this story. It might help you somewhat to make peace with the existence of evil in a world created by a good God.

---End.

32 God's Characteristics"

Men dress God in the garments of their age. He was described as a despot when the world was ruled by despots. He has been successively portrayed as a slaveholder and an English country-gentleman. Scientists conceived of him as a great geometrist, a great mechanic. Today some say he is a great revolutionist. In a male-dominated society, he surely must be male. Modern-day feminists call him "she."

These extrapolations are very much out of touch with God as described in the Bible. The last impression one retains after a lifetime of study is that God is an unfathomable mystery.

We have the assertion "God is love" (1JN 4:8), but it must be a love entirely apart, because he takes the responsibility for actions not normally performed by a loving being. God says, "I will corrupt your seed" - think only of the tragedy of having bad children - "and spread dung upon your faces" (MAL 2:3). For the sins of certain priests, whether a few or many, he puts the whole priesthood under a curse in the same chapter.

When village childre hear the song "There's a wideness in God's mercy like the wideness of the sea," they think only of the breadth of the millpond. But navigators accustomed to travelling the seven seas would understand better. Astronauts would doubtless think something wider than the universe, and that is the spiritual realm, in which God is not limited to our human concept of goodness.

We see God neither as he is nor as he would like to be. One of our impressions is that the God who created our universe is a sad God. Lucifer had just rebelled, drawing with him a third part of the "stars" of heaven (REV 12:4). The fall of man followed. We deal with a sad God who repents of having created our species and is grieved (GEN 6:6). Our God is also wearied. "Ye have wearied the Lord with your words" (MAL 2: 17). Jesus, "the express image of God" (HEB 1:3), was also "a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief" (ISA 53:3), and knew weariness while on earth. John's Gospel records that once he sat on a well in Samaria, " being wearied with his journey" (JHN 4:6). He had left Jerusalem upon hearing news about dissensions over his and John's baptism and was now among strangers. Bone-tired, hungry and thirsty, he was indeed a man of sorrows. If we don't realize this, his words will sometimes appear strange and incomprehensible.

But look! A woman comes to draw water, alone, in the heat of the day. She is despondent and weary of life. She has had six husbands, including one stolen from another's marriage. None of them could give her joy. But immediately the weary Son of God forgets his own sadness and becomes a comforter to her (JHN 4:4-42).

Let us not create images of God according to the mores of our society or our own status. Meeting the tired God, the one crucified every day afresh by his followers (HEB 6:6), let us forget our own deep sorrows and be a comfort to him.

May I add that the present meditation needs to be taken with a grain of salt. I too am a weary man who has known much sadness, and I show God as I see him. I paint him with somber hues, knowing that "now we see through a glass, darkly, but then" - praise God! - "face to face" (1CO 13:12). And I know that one day a happy God "will wipe away all tears from their eyes; and there shall be no more ... sorrow, nor crying" (REV 21:4).

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

The Rev. Richard Wurmbrand is an evangelical minister who spent fourteen years in Communist imprisonment and torture in his homeland of Rumania. He is one of Rumania' s most widely-known Christian leaders, authors and educators. Few names are better known in his homeland.

In 1945, when the Communists seized Rumania and attempted to control the churches for their purposes, Richard Wurmbrand immediately began an effective, vigorous "underground" ministry to his enslaved people and the invading Russian soldiers. He was eventually arrested in 1948, along with his wife Sabina. His wife was a slave-laborer for three years. Richard Wurmbrand spent three years in solitary confinement - seeing no one but his Communist torturers. After three years he was transferred to a mass cell for five years, where the torture continued.

Due to his international stature as a Christian leader, diplomats of foreign embassies asked the Communist government about his safety. They were told he had fled Rumania. Secret police, posing as released fellow-prisoners, told his wife of attending his burial in the prison cemetery. His family in Rumania and his friends abroad were told to forget him since he was now dead.

After eight years he was released and promptly resumed his work with the Underground Church. Two years later, in 1959, he was re-arrested and sentenced to twenty-five years in prison.

Mr. Wurmbrand was released in a general amnesty in 1964, and again continued his underground ministry. Realizing the great danger of a third imprisonment, Christians in Norway negotiated with the Communist authorities for his release from Rumania. The Communist government had begun "selling" their political prisoners. The "going price" for a prisoner was $1,900. Their price for Wurmbrand was $10,000.

    In May 1966 he testified in Washington before the Senate's Internal Security Subcommittee and stripped to the waist to show eighteen deep torture wounds covering his body. His story was carried across the world in newspapers in the U.S., Europe and Asia. Wurmbrand was warned in September 1966 that a decision had been made by the Communist regime of Rumania to assassinate him. Yet he was not silent in the face of these death threats. He has been called "the voice of the Underground Church." Christian leaders have called him "a living martyr" and "the Iron Curtain Paul."

INTRODUCTION

The history of the underground church that you will read reflects the continuing struggle in many parts of the world today where Christians meet in caves, basements, and prisons.
    Pastor Wurmbrand is the author of several books, translated into 68 languages throughout the world. Founder of the Christian mission - ~The Voice of the Martyrs~, he tries to smuggle relief to the families of imprisoned Christians in Arab nations, Communist Vietnam, China and other countries where Christians are persecuted for their faith. His message is, "Hate the evil systems, but love your persecutors. Love their souls, and try to win them for Christ."

CHAPTER 1 - THE RUSSIANS' AVID THIRST FOR CHRIST

An Atheist Finds Christ

I WAS brought up in a family in which no religion was recognized. In my childhood, I received no religious education. At the age of fourteen I was already a convinced, hardened atheist. This was the result of a bitter childhood. I had been an orphan from the first years of life, I had known poverty in the difficult years of the First World War. At fourteen, I was as convinced an atheist as the Communists are today. I had read atheist books and it was not that I did not believe in God or Christ ... I hated these notions, considering them harmful for the human mind. So I grew up in bitterness toward religion.

But as I understood afterward, I had the grace to be one of the chosen of God for reasons which I don't understand. These were reasons which did not belong to anything in my character, because my character was very bad.

Although I was an atheist, something which was unreasonable always attracted me to churches. I found it hard to pass a church and not enter it. However, I never understood what was happening in these churches. I listened to the sermons, but they didn't appeal to my heart. I was very sure that there was no God. I hated the notion of God as a master whom I should have to obey. I hated the wrong notion of God which I had in my mind. But I would have liked very much to know that a loving heart existed somewhere in the center of this universe. I had known few of the joys of childhood and youth. I longed that there should be somewhere a loving heart beating for me too.

I knew there was no God, but I was sad that such a God of love did not exist. Once, in my inner spiritual conflict, I entered a Catholic church; I saw people kneeling and saying something. I thought, I will kneel near them, I will catch what they say and I will repeat the prayers to see if something happens. They said a prayer to the holy virgin; "Hail Mary, full of grace." I repeated the words after them again and again, I looked at the statue of the Virgin Mary, but nothing happened. I was very sad about it.

One day, being a very convinced atheist, I prayed to God. My prayer was something like this: "God, I know surely that You do not exist. But if perchance You exist, which I contest, it is not my duty to believe in You; it is Your duty to reveal Yourself to me." I was an atheist, but atheism did not give peace to my heart.

At this time of inner turmoil – as I discovered afterward – in a village high up in the mountains of Rumania, an old carpenter prayed like this: "My God, I have served you on earth and I wish to have my reward on earth as well as in Heaven. And my reward should be that I should not die before I bring a Jew to Christ, because Jesus was from the Jewish people. But I am poor, old and sick. I cannot go around and seek a Jew. In my village there are none. Bring Thou a Jew into my village and I will do my best to bring him to Christ."

Something irresistible drew me to that village. I had nothing to do there. Rumania has twelve thousand villages. But I went to that village. Seeing I was a Jew, the carpenter courted me as never a beautiful girl had been courted. He saw in me the answer to his prayer and gave me the Bible to read. I had read the Bible out of cultural interest many times before. But the Bible he gave me was another kind of Bible. As he told me afterward, he prayed for ~hours~ together with his wife for my conversion and that of my wife. The Bible he gave me was written not so much in words, but in flames of love fired by his prayers. I could scarcely read it. I could only weep over it, comparing my bad life with the life of Jesus; my impurity; my hatred with His love; and He accepted me to be one of His own.

Soon after me, my wife was converted. She brought other souls to Christ. Those other souls brought still more souls to Christ and so a new Lutheran congregation arose in Rumania.

Then came the Nazi times. We had much to suffer. In Rumania, Nazism took the form of a dictatorship of extreme orthodox elements which persecuted Protestant groups as well as the Jews.

Even before my formal ordination and before I was prepared for the ministry, I was in reality the leader of this church, being the founder of it. I had the responsibility for it. My wife and I were arrested several times, beaten, and hauled before Nazi judges. The Nazi terror was great, but only a taste of that to come under the Communists. My son Mihai had to give a non-Jewish name to prevent his death.

But these Nazi times had one great advantage. They taught us that physical beatings could be endured, that the human spirit with God's help can survive horrible tortures. They taught us the technique of secret Christian work which was a preparation for a far worse ordeal to come-an ordeal which was just before us.

My Ministry to the Russians

Out of remorse for having been an atheist, I longed from the first day of my conversion to be able to witness to the Russians. The Russians are a people raised from childhood in atheism. My desire to reach Russians has been fulfilled. Its fulfillment began in Nazi times, because we had in Rumania many thousands of Russian war prisoners and we could do Christian work among them.

It was a dramatic, moving work. I will never forget my first encounter with a Russian prisoner. He told me he was an engineer. I asked him if he believed in God. If he had said "no," I would not have minded it much. It is the right of every man to believe or disbelieve. But when I asked him if he believed in God, he lifted his eyes toward me without understanding and said: "I have no such military order to believe. If I have an order I will believe."

Tears ran down my cheeks. I felt my heart rent in pieces. Here stood before me a man whose mind was dead, a man who had lost the greatest gift God has given to mankind - to be an individual. He was a brainwashed tool in the hands of the Communists, ready to believe or not on an order. He could not think any more on his own. This was a typical Russian after all these years of Communist domination! After the shock of seeing what communism had done to human beings, I promised God I would dedicate my life to these men, to give them back their personalities and to give them faith in God and Christ.

I did not have to go to Russia to reach the Russians.

Beginning August 23, 1944, one million Russian troops entered Rumania and, very soon after this, the Communists came to power in our country. Then began a nightmare which made suffering under Nazi times seem easy.

At that time in Rumania, which now has a population of nineteen million, the Communist party had only ten thousand members. But Vishinsky, the Foreign Secretary of the Soviet Union, stormed into the office of our much beloved King Michael I, pounded his fists on the table and said, "you must appoint Communists to the government." Our army and police were disarmed and so, by violence and hated by almost all, the Communists came to power. It was not without the cooperation of the American and British rulers of that time.

Men are responsible before God not only for their personal sins, but also for their national sins. The tragedy of all the captive nations is a responsibility on the hearts of American and British Christians. Americans must know that they have at times unwittingly assisted the Russians in imposing upon us a regime of murder and terror. Americans must atone for this by helping the captive peoples come to the light of Christ.

The Language of Love and the Language of Seduction Are the Same

Once the Communists came to power, they skillfully used the means of seduction toward the Church. The language of love and the language of seduction are the same. The one who wishes a girl for a wife and the one who wishes her for a night in order to throw her away afterward, both say,"I love you."Jesus has told us to distinguish the language of seduction from the language of love, and to know the wolves clad in sheepskin from the real sheep.

When the Communists came to power thousands of priests, pastors, and ministers did not know how to distinguish the two voices.

The Communists convened a congress of all Christian bodies in our parliament building. There were four thousand priests, pastors, and ministers of all denominations. These four thousand priests and pastors chose Joseph Stalin as honorary president of this congress. At the same time he was president of the World

page 16 Tortured for Christ

Movement of the Godless and a mass murderer of Christians. One after another, bishops and pastors arose in our parliament building and declared that Communism and Christianity are fundamentally the same and could coexist. One minister after another said words of praise toward communism and assured the new government of the loyalty of the Church.

My wife and I were present at this congress. My wife sat near me and told me: "Richard, stand up and wash away this shame from the face of Christ! They are spitting in His face." I said to my wife, "If I do so, you lose your husband." She said, "I don't wish to have a coward as a husband."

Then I arose and spoke to this congress, praising not the murderers of Christians, but Christ and God and said that our loyalty is due first to Him. The speeches at this congress were broadcast and the whole country could hear proclaimed from the rostrum of the Communist Parliament the message of Christ! Afterward I had to pay for this, but it had been worthwhile.

Orthodox and Protestant church leaders competed with each other in yielding to communism. An Orthodox bishop put the hammer and sickle on his robes and asked his priests not to call him any more "Your Grace," but "Comrade Bishop." I attended the Congress of the Baptists in the town of Resita - a congress under the Red flag, where the anthem of the Soviet Union had been sung with everybody standing. The president of the Baptists proclaimed that Stalin did nothing but fulfill the commandments of God. He praised Stalin as a great teacher of the Bible! Priests like Patrascoiu and Rosianu were more direct. They became officers of the secret police. Rapp, deputy bishop of the Lutheran church in Rumania, began to teach in the theological seminary that God had given three revelations: one through Moses, one through

Jesus and the third through Stalin, the last superseding the one before.

It must be understood that the true Baptists, whom I love very much, did not agree and were very faithful to Christ, suffering much. However, the Communists "elected" their leaders and the Baptists had no choice but to accept them. The same condition is true today of the very top religious "leadership."

Those who became servants of communism instead of Christ began to denounce the brethren who did not join them.

As the Russian Christians created an Underground Church after the Russian revolution, the coming to power of communism and the betrayal by many official church leaders compelled us to create in Rumania, too, an Underground Church: one faithful to evangelize, preach the Gospel, and reach children for Christ. The Communists forbade all this and the official church agreed.

Together with others, I began an underground work. I had outwardly a very respectable social position which had nothing to do with my real underground work and served as a cover. I was pastor of the Norwegian Lutheran Mission and at the same time I represented the World Council of Churches in Rumania. (In Rumania we had not the slightest idea that this organization would ever cooperate with the Communists. At that time in our country it did nothing but relief work.) These two titles gave me a very good standing before the authorities, who did not know of my underground work.

This had two branches.

The first was our secret ministry among the one million Russian soldiers.

The second branch was our underground ministry to the enslaved peoples of Rumania.

Russians - A People with Such "Thirsty" Souls

For me, to preach the Gospel to the Russians is heaven on earth. I have preached the Gospel to men of many nations, but I have never seen a people drink in the Gospel like the Russians. They have such thirsty souls.

An Orthodox priest, a friend of mine, telephoned me and told me that a Russian officer had come to him to confess. My friend did not know Russian. Knowing however that I speak Russian, he had given him my address. The next day this man came to me. He loved God, he longed after God, but he had never seen a Bible. He never attended religious services (churches in Russia are very scarce). He had no religious education. He loved God without the slightest knowledge of Him.

I read to him the Sermon on the Mount and the parables of Jesus. After hearing them, he danced around the room in rapturous joy proclaiming, "What a wonderful beauty! How could I live without knowing this Christ!" It was the first time that I saw someone so rapturously joyful in Christ.

Then I made a mistake. I read to him the passion and crucifixion of Christ, without having prepared him for this. He had not expected it and, when he heard how Christ was beaten, how He was crucified and that in the end He died, he fell in an armchair and began to weep bitterly. He had believed in a Savior and now his Savior was dead!

I looked at him and was ashamed that I had called myself a Christian and a pastor, a teacher of others. I had never shared the sufferings of Christ as this Russian officer now shared them. Looking at him, it was for me as seeing again Mary Magdalene weeping at the foot of the cross; faithfully weeping when Jesus was a corpse in the tomb.

Then I read to him the story of the resurrection. He had not known his Savior arose from the tomb. When he heard this wonderful news, he beat his knees and swore a very dirty, but, I think, a very "holy" swear. This was his crude manner of speech. Again he rejoiced. He shouted for joy: ~"He is alive! He is alive!"~ Again he danced around the room, overwhelmed with happiness!

I said to him, "Let us pray!" He did not know prayers. He did not know our holy phrases. He fell on his knees together with me and his words of prayer were: "O God, what a fine chap you are! If I were You and You were me, I would ~never~ have forgiven You your sins. But You are really a very nice chap! I love You from all my heart."

I think that all the angels in heaven stopped what they were doing to listen to this sublime prayer from a Russian officer. The man had been won for Christ!

In a shop, I met a Russian captain with a lady officer. They were buying all kinds of things and had difficulty speaking to the salesman, who did not understand Russian. I offered to translate for them and we became acquainted. I invited them to lunch at our house. Before beginning to eat, I told them: "You are in a Christian house and we have the habit of praying." I said the prayer in Russian. They put down forks and knives and were not interested in food any more. They asked question after question about God, Christ, and the Bible. They knew ~nothing~.

It was not easy to talk to them. I told them the parable of the man who had a hundred sheep and lost one. They did not understand. They asked: "How is it that he has a hundred sheep? Has not the Communist collective farm taken them away?" Then I said that Jesus is a king. They answered: "All the kings have been bad men who tyrannized the people and Jesus must also be a tyrant." When I told them the parables of the workers in the vineyard, they said, "Well, these did very well to rebel against the owner of the vineyard. The vineyard has to belong to the collective." Everything was new for them. When I told them about the birth of Jesus, they asked what in the mouth of a Westerner would seem a blasphemy: "Was Mary the wife of God?" In talking with them and many others I learned that to preach the Gospel to the Russians, after so many years of communism, we must use an entirely new language.

The missionaries who went to Central Africa had difficulty translating the word of Isaiah: "If your sins are red as scarlet they will become white as snow." Nobody in Central Africa has ever seen snow. They have no word for snow. They had to translate: "Your sins will become white as the kernel of the coconut."

So we had to translate the Gospel into the Marxist language and render it understandable to them. It was something we could not do by ourselves - but the Holy Spirit did his work through us.

The captain and the lady officer were converted that same day. Afterward, they helped us very much in our underground ministry to the Russians.

We printed secretly and distributed among Russians many thousands of Gospels and other Christian literature. Through the converted Russian soldiers, we could smuggle many Bibles and Bible portions into Russia.

We used another technique to get copies of God's Word into the hands of the Russians. The Russian soldiers had been fighting for many years and many of them had children back home whom they had not seen for all this time. (The Russians have a great fondness for children.) My son, Mihai, and other children under ten years of age would go to the Russian soldiers on the streets and in the parks, carrying many Bibles, Gospels and other literature in their pockets. The Russian soldiers would pat them on the head, talk to them lovingly, thinking of their own children they had not seen for many years. The soldiers would give them chocolate or candy and the children, in turn, would give the soldiers something – Bibles and Gospels which they eagerly accepted. Often what was too dangerous for us to do openly our children did in complete safety. They were "young missionaries" to the Russians. The results were excellent. Many Russian soldiers received the Gospel this way when there was no other way to give it to them.

Preaching in Russian Army Barracks

We worked among the Russians not only by individual witnessing. We were able to work in small group meetings as well.

The Russians were very fond of watches. They stole watches from everybody. They stopped you on the street and everybody had to hand them over. You could see Russians with several watches on every arm. You could see Russian women officers with alarm clocks hanging around their necks. They had never had watches before and could never get enough of them. Rumanians who wished to have a watch had to go to the barracks of the Soviet army to buy a stolen one, often buying back their own watch. So it was common for Rumanians to enter the Russian barracks. We of the Underground Church had a good pretext – that of buying watches – to go into them, too.

I chose for my first attempt to preach in a Russian barrack an Orthodox feast, the day of St. Paul and St. Peter. I went onto the military base pretending to buy a watch. I pretended that one was too expensive; another was too small; and another too big. Several soldiers crowded around me, everyone offering me something to buy. Jokingly I asked them: "Is any of you named Paul or Peter?" Some were. Then I said, "Do you know that today is the day when your Orthodox church honors St. Paul and St. Peter?" (Some of the older Russians knew it.) So I said, "Do you know who Paul and Peter were?" Nobody knew. I began to tell them about Paul and Peter. One of the older Russian soldiers interrupted me and said, "You have not come to buy watches. You have come to tell us about the faith. Sit down here with us and speak to us! But be very careful! We know about whom to beware. These around me are all good men. When I put my hand on your knee, you must talk only about watches. When I remove my hand, you may begin your message again."

Quite a great crowd of men was around me and I told them about Paul and Peter, about the Christ for whom Paul and Peter died. From time to time, somebody would come near in whom they had no confidence. The soldier would put his hand on my knee and I would talk about watches. When that man went away, I resumed preaching about Christ. This visit was repeated many, many times with the help of Russian Christian soldiers. Many of their comrades found Christ. Thousands of Gospels were given out secretly.

Many of our brothers and sisters of the Underground were caught and heavily beaten for this, but they didn't betray our organization.

During this work we had the joy of meeting brethren from the Underground Church in Russia and hearing about their experiences. First of all, we saw in them the makings of great saints. They had passed through so many years of Communist indoctrination. Some of them had been through Communist universities, but just as a fish lives in the salty waters and keeps its meat sweet, they passed through the Communist schools but had kept their souls clean and pure in Christ.

These Russian Christians had such beautiful souls! They said, "We know that the star with the hammer and sickle which we wear on our caps is the star of the anti-Christ." They said this with great sorrow. They helped us very much to spread the Gospel among other Russian soldiers.

I can say that they had all the Christian virtues, except the virtue of joy. This they had only at conversion. Then it disappeared. I wondered very much about it. Once I asked a Baptist: "How is it that you know no joy?" He answered, "How can I be joyful when I have to hide from the pastor of my church that I am an earnest Christian, that I lead a life of prayer, that I try to win souls? The pastor of the church is an informer of the secret police. We are spied on one after another and the shepherds are those who betray the flock. There exists ~very deep~ in our heart the joy of salvation, but this external gladness which you have - we cannot have it any more.

Christianity has become dramatic with us. When you, free Christians, win a soul for Christ, you win a member of a quietly living Church. But when we win a man, we know that he may well have to go to prison, that his children may become orphans. The joy of having brought somebody to Christ is always mixed with this feeling that there is a price that must be paid."

We had met an entirely new type of Christian - the Christian of the Underground Church.

Here we had many surprises.

As there are many who believe they are Christians and in reality are not, we found that among the Russians there are many who believe they are atheists, but in reality they are not.

I had before me a Russian couple, both sculptors. When I spoke to them about God, they answered, "No, God does not exist. We are 'Bezboshniki'- godless. But we will tell you something interesting which happened to us.

"Once we worked on a statue of Stalin. During the work my wife asked me, 'Husband, how about the thumb? If we could not oppose the thumb to the other fingers - if the fingers of the hands were like toes - we could not hold a hammer, a mallet, any tool, a book, a piece of bread. Human life would be impossible with out this little thumb. Now, who made the thumb? We both learned Marxism in school and know that heaven and earth exist by themselves. They are not created by God. So I have learned and so I believe. But if God did not create heaven and earth, if He created only the thumb, He would be praiseworthy for this little thing.

"We praise Edison and Bell and Stephenson who have invented the electric bulb, the telephone and railway and other things. But why should we not praise the one who has invented the thumb? If Edison had not had a thumb he would have invented nothing. It is only right to worship God who made the thumb.'"

The husband became very angry, as husbands very often do when their wives tell them wise things. "Don't speak stupidities! You have learned that there is no God. And you can never know if the house is not bugged and if we will not fall in trouble. Get into your mind ~once and for all~ that there is no God. In heaven there is ~nobody~!"

She replied, "This is an even greater wonder. If in heaven there were the Almighty God in whom in stupidity our forefathers believed, it would be only natural that we should have thumbs. An Almighty God can do everything, so He can make a thumb, too. But if in heaven there is nobody, I, from my side, am decided to worship from all my heart the 'Nobody' who has made the thumb."

So they became worshippers of the "Nobody"! Their faith in this "Nobody" increased with time, believing

Him to be creator not only of the thumb, but also of the stars, flowers, children, of everything beautiful in life.

It was just as in Athens in earlier times, when St. Paul met worshippers of the "unknown God."

This couple was unspeakably happy to hear from me that they had believed rightly, that in heaven there is really a "No - body," God who is Spirit: a spirit of love, wisdom, truth and power, who so loved them that He sent His only begotten Son to sacrifice Himself for them on the cross.

They had been believers in God not knowing that they were so. I had the great privilege of taking them one step further - to the experience of salvation and redemption.

Once I saw a Russian lady officer on the street. I approached her and apologized, "I know that it is impolite to accost an unknown lady on the street, but I am a pastor and my intentions are earnest. I wish to speak to you about Christ."

She asked me, "Do you love Christ?" I said, "Yes! From all my heart." She fell into my arms and kissed me again and again. It was a very embarrassing situation for a pastor, so I kissed her back, hoping people would think we were relatives. She exclaimed to me, "I love Christ, too!" I took her to our home. I discovered to my amazement that she knew nothing about Christ - absolutely nothing - except the name. And yet she loved Him. She did not know that He is the Saviour, nor what salvation means. She did not know where and how He lived and died. She did not know His teachings, His life or ministry. She was for me a psychological curiosity. How can you love somebody if you know only his name?

When I inquired, she explained, "As a child, I was taught to read by pictures. For an 'a' there was an apple, for a 'b' there was a bell, for a 'c' a cat and so on.

page 26 Tortured for Christ

When I went to high school, I was taught my holy duty to defend the Communist fatherland. I was taught about Communist morals. But I did not know what a 'holy duty' or a 'moral' looked like. I needed a picture for these. Now I knew that our forefathers had a picture for everything beautiful, praiseworthy and truthful in life. My grandmother always bowed before this picture, saying that it was the picture of one called 'Cristos' (Christ). And I loved this name by itself. This name became so real to me! Just to say this name gave one such joy."

Listening to her, I remembered what is written in Philippians that at His name every knee should bow. Perhaps, the anti-Christ will be able for a time to erase from the world the knowledge of God. But there is power in the simple Name of Christ and this will lead to the light.

She joyously found Christ in my home and now the One whose name she loved lived in her heart in person.

Every scene I lived with Russians was full of poetry and deep meaning.

A sister who spread the Gospel in railway stations gave an interested officer my address.

One evening he entered my house - a tall, handsome Russian lieutenant.

I asked him, "How can I serve you?"

He answered, "I have come for light."

I began to read him the most essential parts of Scripture. He put his hand upon mine and said, "I ask you from all my heart, don't lead me astray. I belong to a people kept in the dark. Tell me, please is this the ~sure~ word of God?" I assured him it was. He listened for hours - and accepted Christ.

Russians are never superficial or shallow in religious matters. If they fought against religion or if they were for it and sought Christ, they put their ~whole soul~ into it. That is why in Russia every Christian is a soul-winning missionary. That is why no country on earth is so ripe and fruitful for Gospel work. Russians are one of the most naturally religious peoples on the earth. The course of the world can be changed if we will aggressively give them the Gospel.

It is such a tragedy that this land of Russia and its peoples are the most hungry for the Word of God, yet it seems that almost all have written them off.

On a train, a Russian officer sat in front of me. I had spoken to him about Christ for only a few minutes, when he broke out with a wave of atheistic arguments. Marx, Stalin, Voltaire, Darwin, and other quotations against the Bible just flew from his mouth. He gave me no opportunity to contradict him. He spoke for nearly an hour to convince me that there is no God. When he had finished, I asked him: "If there is no God, why do you pray when you are in trouble?" Like a thief surprised while stealing, he replied, "How do you know that I pray?" I did not allow him to escape. "I asked my question first. I asked why you pray. Please answer!" He bowed his head and acknowledged, "On the front, when we were encircled by the Germans, we all prayed! We did not know how to do it. So we said, 'God and spirit of mother'" - which is surely a very good prayer in the sight of the One who looks to the heart.

Our ministry to the Russians has given much fruit.

I remember Piotr (Peter). No one knows in what Russian prison he died. He was so young! Perhaps twenty. He had come to Rumania with the Russian army. He was converted in an underground meeting and asked me to baptize him.

After baptism, I asked him to tell us what verse of the Bible had impressed him most and had influenced to come to Christ.

He said that he had listened attentively when, at one of our secret meetings, I had read Luke 24, the story of Jesus meeting the two disciples who went toward Emmaus. When they drew nigh unto the village, "He made as though He would have gone further." Piotr said: "I wondered why Jesus said this. He surely wanted to stay with His disciples. Why then did He say that He wished to go further?" My explanation was that Jesus is polite. He wished to be very sure that He was desired. When He saw that He was welcomed, He gladly entered the house with them. The Communists are impolite. They enter by violence into our hearts and minds. They oblige us from morning to late in the night to listen to them. They do it through their schools, radio, newspapers, posters, movie pictures, atheistic meetings and everywhere you turn. You have to listen continuously to their godless propaganda, whether you like it or dislike it. Jesus respects our freedom. He gently knocks at the door. "Jesus has won me by His politeness," said Piotr. This stark contrast between communism and Christ had convinced him.

He was not the only Russian to have been impressed by this feature in Jesus' character. (I, as a pastor, had never thought about it this way.)

After his conversion. Piotr risked his liberty and life again and again to smuggle Christian literature and help for the Underground Church in Rumania to Russia. In the end he was caught. I know that in 1959 he was still in prison. Has he died? Is he already in heaven or is he continuing the good fight on earth? I don't know. Only God knows where he is today.

Like them, many others were not only converted. We should never stop at having won a soul for Christ. By this, you have done only ~half~ the work. Every soul won for Christ must be made to be a soul-winner. The Russians were not only converted, but also became "missionaries" in the Underground Church. They were reckless and daring for Christ, always saying it was so little they could do for Christ who died for them.

Our Underground Ministry to an Enslaved Nation

The second branch of our work was our underground missionary work among Rumanians themselves.

Very soon the Communists dropped their masks. In the beginning, they used seduction to win Church leaders to their side, but then the terror began. Thousands were arrested. To win a soul for Christ began to be a dramatic thing for us, too, as it had long been for the Russians.

I myself was later in prison together with souls whom God had helped me to win for Christ. I was in the same cell with one who had left behind six children and who was now in prison for his Christian faith. His wife and children were starving. He might never see them again. I asked him, "Have you any resentment against me that I brought you to Christ and because of this your family is in such misery?" He said, "I have no words to express my thankfulness that you have brought me to the wonderful Savior. I would never have it another way."

The preaching of Christ in the new conditions was not easy. We succeeded in printing several Christian pamphlets, passing them through the severe censorship of the Communists. We presented to the Communist censor a booklet which had on its front page the picture of Karl Marx, the founder of Communism. The books were called ~Religion is the Opium of the People~ or other similar titles. He considered them to be Communist books and put the seal on them. In these books, after a few pages full of quotations from Marx, Lenin, and Stalin, which pleased the censor, we gave our message about Christ.

The Underground Church is only partially underground. Like an iceberg, a small part of its work is in the open. We went to the Communist demonstrations and distributed these "Communist" booklets. The Communists, seeing the picture of Marx, competed with each other to buy the book. By the time they reached page ten and found that it was all about God and Jesus, we were very far away.

Preaching in these new conditions was not easy. Our people were very oppressed. The Communists took away everything from everybody. From the farmer they took fields and sheep. From a barber or a tailor, they took his little shop. Not only the capitalists were expropriated. Very poor men also suffered much. Nearly every family had somebody in prison and the poverty was great. Men asked, "How is it that a God of love permits the triumph of evil?"

Neither would it have been very easy for the first apostles to preach Christ on Good Friday, when Jesus died on the cross pronouncing the words: "My God, My God, why hast Thou forsaken me?"

But the fact that the work was done proves that it was from God and not from us. The Christian faith has an answer to such questions.

Jesus told us about poor Lazarus, oppressed at that time as we were oppressed - dying, hungry, his wounds being licked by dogs - but in the end, angels took him to Abraham's bosom.

How the Underground Church Worked Partly in the Open

The Underground Church met in private houses, in woods, in basements - wherever it could. There, in secret, it often prepared its "open" work. Under the Communists, we devised a plan of having street preaching which in time became very risky, but by this means we reached many souls we could not reach otherwise. My wife was very active in this. Some Christians would quietly gather on a street corner and start to sing. People crowded around them to hear the beautiful singing and my wife would' deliver her message. We left the spot before the secret police arrived.

One afternoon, while I was active elsewhere, my wife delivered a message before thousands of workers, at the entrance of the great MALAXA factory, in the city of Bucharest. She spoke to the workers about God and about salvation. The next day, many workers in this factory were shot after rebelling against the injustices of the Communists. They had heard the message just in time!

We were an Underground Church but, like John the Baptist, we spoke openly to men and rulers about Christ.

Once, on the steps of one of our government buildings, two Christian brethren pushed their way to our prime minister Gheorghiu Dej. In the few moments they had, they witnessed to him about Christ, urging him to turn from his sins and persecution. He had them thrown into prison for their daring witness. Years later, when the same prime minister, Gheorghiu Dej, was very sick, the seed of the Gospel which they had planted years ago and for which they had suffered greatly, bore fruit. In his hour of need, the prime minister remembered the words which had been spoken to him. Those words were as the Bible says, "quick and powerful and sharper than any two-edged sword." They cut through the hardness of his heart and he surrendered his life to Christ. He confessed his sins, accepted the Saviour and began to serve Him in his sickness. Not long afterward he died, but went to his new-found Saviour all because two Christians were willing to pay the price. And they are typical of the courageous Christians in the Communist lands today.

Thus, the Underground Church worked not only in the secret meetings and clandestine activities, but in bold, open proclaiming of the Gospel on the Communist streets and to Communist leaders. There was a price. We were prepared to pay it. And the Underground Church is still prepared to pay it today.

The secret police persecuted the Underground Church very much, because they recognized in it the only effective resistance left. And just the kind of resistance, the spiritual resistance, which, if left unhindered, would undermine their atheistic power. They recognized, as only the devil can, an immediate threat to them. ~They knew if a man believed in Christ he would never be a mindless, willing subject. They knew they could imprison men, but they couldn't imprison faith in God.~ And so they fought very hard.

But the Underground Church also had also its sympathizers or members even in the Communist governments and in the secret police.

We instructed Christians to join the secret police and put on the most hated and despised uniform in our country, so they could report the activities of the secret police to the Underground Church. Several brethren of the Underground Church did this, keeping their faith hidden. It is not easy to be despised by your own family and friends for wearing the Communist uniform and not to tell them your true mission. Yet they did. So great was their love for Christ.

When I was kidnapped from the street and was kept for years in strictest secrecy, a Christian doctor actually became a member of the secret police to find out my whereabouts! As a secret police doctor, he had access to the cells of all prisoners and hoped to find me. All his friends shunned him, thinking he had become a Communist. To go around dressed in the uniform of the torturers is a much greater sacrifice for Christ than to wear the uniform of a prisoner.

The doctor found me in a deep, dark cell and sent out word that I was alive. He was the first friend during my first eight and a half years in prison to discover me! Due to him, word was spread that I was alive and, when prisoners were released during the Eisenhower-Khrushchev "thaw" in 1956, Christians clamored for my release too and I was freed for a short time.

If it had not been for this Christian doctor, who joined the secret police specifically to find me, I would never have been released. I would still be in prison (or in a grave) today.

Using their position in the secret police, these members of the Underground Church warned us many times and were of very great help. The Underground Church has men in the secret police today who protect and warn the Christians of impending danger. Some are high up in Communist circles, keeping their faith in Christ secret and helping us greatly. One day in heaven they can publicly proclaim Christ whom they secretly serve now.

Nevertheless, many members of the Underground Church were discovered and imprisoned. We had our "Judases" too, who told and reported to the secret police. By beating, drugging, threats and blackmail, the Communists tried to find ministers and laymen who would report on their brethren.

CHAPTER 2 - "GREATER LOVE HATH NO MAN..."

I worked in both an official and underground manner until February 29, 1948. It was a Sunday - a beautiful Sunday. On that Sunday, on my way to church, I was kidnapped from the street by the secret police.

Many times I had wondered what "manstealing" mentioned several times in the Bible, meant. Communism has taught us.

Many at that time were kidnapped like this. A van of the secret police stopped in front of me, four men jumped out and pushed me into the van. I was taken away for many years. For over eight years, no one knew if I was alive or dead. My wife was visited by the secret police who posed as released fellow-prisoners. They told her they had attended my burial. She was heart-broken.

Thousands from churches of all denominations went to prison at that time. Not only were clergymen put in jail, but also simple peasants, young boys and girls who witnessed for their faith. The prisons were full and in Rumania, as in all Communist countries, to be in prison means to be tortured.

Tortures were sometimes horrible. I prefer not to speak too much about those through which I have passed. When I do, I cannot sleep at night. It is too painful.

In another book, "In God's Underground," I recount with many details all our experiences with God in jail.

Unspeakable Tortures

A pastor by the name of Florescu was tortured with red-hot iron pokers and with knives. He was beaten very badly. Then starving rats were driven into his cell through a large pipe. He could not sleep, but had to defend himself all the time. If he rested a moment, the rats would attack him.

He was forced to stand for two weeks, day and night. The Communists wished to compel him to betray his brethren, but he resisted steadfastly. In the end, they brought his fourteen-year-old son and began to whip the boy in front of his father, saying that they would continue to beat him until the pastor said what they wished him to say. The poor man was half mad. He bore it as long as he could. When he could not stand it any more, he cried to his son: "Alexander, I must say what they want! I can't bear your beating any more!" The son answered, "Father, don't do me the injustice to have a traitor as a parent. Withstand! If they kill me, I will die with the words, 'Jesus and my fatherland.'" The Communists, enraged, fell upon the child and beat him to death, with blood spattered over the walls of the cell. He died praising God. Our dear brother Florescu was never the same after seeing this.

Handcuffs which had sharp nails on the insides were put on our wrists. If we were totally still, they didn't cut us. But in bitterly cold cells, when we shook with cold, our wrists would be torn by the nails.

Christians were hung upside down on ropes and beaten so severely that their bodies swung back and forth under the blows. Christians were put in ice box "refrigerator cells" which were so cold, frost and ice covered the inside. I was thrown into one with very little clothing on. Prison doctors would watch through an opening until they saw symptoms of freezing to death, then they would give a warning and guards would rush in to take us out and make us warm. When we were finally warmed, we would immediately be put back in the ice-box cells to freeze - over and over again! Thawing out, then freezing to within just one minute or two of death, then being thawed out again. It continued endlessly. Even today sometimes I can't bear to open a refrigerator.

We Christians were put in wooden boxes only slightly larger than we were. This left no room to move. Dozens of sharp nails were driven into every side of the box, with their razor-sharp points sticking into the box. While we stood perfectly still, it was all right. We were forced to stand in these boxes for endless hours. But when we became fatigued and swayed with tiredness, the nails would go into our bodies. If we moved or twitched a muscle - there were the horrible nails.

What the Communists have done to Christians surpasses any possibility of human understanding.

I have seen Communists torturing Christians and the faces of the torturers shone with rapturous joy. They cried out while torturing the Christians, "We are the devil."

We wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against the principalities and powers of evil. We saw that communism is not from men but from the devil. It is a spiritual force - a force of evil - and can only be countered by a greater spiritual force, the Spirit of God.

I often asked the torturers, "Don't you have pity in your hearts?" They usually answered with a quotation from Lenin that "you cannot make omelets without breaking the shells of eggs" and that "you cannot cut wood without making chips fly." I said again, "I know this quotation from Lenin. But there is a difference. When you cut a piece of wood it feels nothing. But here you are dealing with human beings. Every beating produces pain and there are mothers who weep." It was in vain. They are materialists. For them nothing besides matter exists and to them a man is like wood, like an egg-shell. With this belief they sink to unbelievable depths of cruelty.

The cruelty of atheism is hard to believe. When a man has no faith in the reward of good or the punishment of evil, there is no reason to be human. There is no restraint from the depths of evil which is in man. The Communist torturers often said, "There is no God, no hereafter, no punishment for evil. We can do what we wish." I heard one torturer say, "I thank God, in whom I don't believe, that I have lived to this hour when I can express all the evil in my heart." He expressed it in unbelievable brutality and torture inflicted on prisoners.

I am very sorry if a crocodile eats a man, but I can't reproach the crocodile. He is not a moral being. So no reproaches can be made to the Communists. Communism has destroyed any moral sense in them. They boasted they had no pity in their hearts.

I learned from them. As they allowed no place for Jesus in their hearts, I decided I would leave not the smallest place for Satan in mine.

I have testified before the Internal Security Subcommittee of the U.S. Senate. There I described awful things, such as Christians tied to crosses for four days and nights. The crosses were put on the door and hundreds of prisoners had to fulfill their bodily necessities over the faces and bodies of the crucified ones. Then the crosses were erected again and the Communists jeered and mocked: "~Look at your Christ! How beautiful he is!~ What fragrance he brings from Heaven!" I described how, after being driven nearly insane with tortures, a priest was forced to consecrate human excrement and urine and give Holy Communion to Christians in this form. This happened in the Rumanian prison of Piteshti. I asked the priest afterwards why he did not prefer to die rather than participate in this mockery. He answered, "Don't judge me please! I have suffered more than Christ!" All the Biblical descriptions of hell and the pains of Dante's Inferno are nothing in comparison with the tortures in Communist prisons.

This is only a very small part of what happened on one Sunday and on many other Sundays in the prison of Piteshti. Other things simply cannot be told. My heart would fail if I should tell them again and again. They are too terrible and obscene to put in writing. That is what your brothers in Christ went through and go through ~now~!

One of the really great heroes of the faith was pastor Milan Haimovici.

The prisons were overcrowded and the guards did not know us by name. They called out for those who had been sentenced to get twenty-five lashes with a whip for having broken some prison rule. Innumerable times, Pastor Milan Haimovici went to get the beating in the place of somebody else. By this he won the respect of other prisoners not only for himself, but also for Christ whom he represented.

If I were to continue to tell all the horrors of Communists and all the self-sacrifices of Christians, I would never finish. Not only the tortures were known. The heroic deeds were known, too. The heroic examples of those in prison greatly inspired the brethren who were still free.

One of our workers was a young girl of the Underground Church. The Communist police discovered that she secretly spread Gospels and taught children about Christ. They decided to arrest her. But to make the arrest more agonizing and as painful as they could, they decided to delay her arrest a few weeks, until the day she was to be married. On her wedding day the girl was dressed as a bride. The most wonderful, joyous day in a girl's life! Suddenly, the door was pushed open and the secret police rushed in.

When the bride saw the secret police, she held out her arms toward them to be handcuffed. They roughly put the manacles on her wrists. She looked toward her beloved, then kissed the chains and said, "~I thank my heavenly Bridegroom for the jewel He has presented to me on my marriage day. I thank Him that I am worthy to suffer for Him." She was dragged off, with weeping Christians and a weeping bridegroom left behind. They knew what happens to young Christian girls in the hands of Communist guards. After five years she was released - a destroyed, broken woman, looking thirty years older. Her bridegroom had waited for her. She said it was the least she could do for her Christ. Such beautiful Christians are in the Underground Church.

What Brainwashing I Like

Westerners have probably heard about the brainwashing in the Korean war and now in Vietnam. I have passed through brainwashing myself. It is the most horrible torture.

For years we had to sit for seventeen hours a day hearing:

~Communism is good!~
~Communism is good!~
~Communism is good!~
~Communism is good!~
~Christianity is stupid!~
~Christianity is stupid!~
~Christianity is stupid!~
~Give up!~
~Give up!~
~Give up!~
~Give up!~

For seventeen hours a day - for days, weeks and months.

Several Christians have asked me how we could resist brainwashing. There is only one method of resistance to brainwashing. This is "heartwashing." If the heart is cleansed by the love of Jesus Christ, and if the heart loves Him, you can resist all tortures. What would a loving bride not do for a loving bridegroom? What would a loving mother not do for her child? If you love Christ as Mary did, who had Christ as a baby in her arms, if you love Jesus as a bride loves her bridegroom, then you can resist such tortures.

God will judge us not according to how much we endured, but how much we could love. I am a witness for the Christians in Communist prisons that they could love. They could love God and men.

The tortures and brutality continued without interruption. When I lost consciousness or became too dazed to give the torturers any further hopes of confessions, I would be returned to my cell. There I would lie, untended and half dead, to regain a little strength so they could work on me again. Many died at this stage, but somehow my strength always managed to come back. In the ensuing years, in several different prisons, they broke four vertebrae in my back, and many other bones. They carved me in a dozen places. They burned and cut eighteen holes in my body.

Doctors in Oslo, seeing all this and the scars of the lung tuberculosis which I also had, declared that my being alive today is a pure miracle! According to their medical books, I should have been dead for years. I know myself it is a miracle. God is a God of miracles.

I believe God performed this wonder so that you could hear my voice crying out on behalf of the Underground Church behind the Iron Curtain. He allowed one to come out alive and cry aloud the message from your suffering, faithful brethren.

page 42 Tortured for Christ

Brief Freedom - then Re-Arrest

The year 1956 arrived. I had been in prison eight and a half years. I had lost much weight, gained ugly scars, had been brutally beaten and kicked, derided, starved, pressured, questioned ad nauseam, threatened and neglected. None of this had produced the results my captors were after. So, in discouragement, they turned me loose. Besides, they were still getting protests over my imprisonment.

I was allowed to return to my old position for just one week. I preached two sermons. Then they called me in and told me I could not preach any more, nor engage in any further religious activity. What had I said? I had counseled my parishioners to have "patience, patience and more patience." - "This means you are telling them to just be patient and the Americans will come and deliver them," the police shouted at me. I had also said that the wheel turns and times change. "You are telling them the Communists will not continue to rule! These are counter-revolutionary lies!" they screamed. So that was the end of my public ministry.

  Probably the authorities believed that I would be afraid to defy them and go back into the underground witnessing. That was where they were wrong. Secretly, I returned to the work I had been doing before. My family backed me up.
  Again I witnessed to hidden groups of the faithful, coming and going like a ghost under the aegis of those who could be trusted. This time I had scars to back up my message about the evil of the atheist viewpoint and to encourage faltering souls to trust God and be brave. I directed a secret network of evangelists, who helped each other spread the Gospel under providentially blinded Communist eyes. After all, if a man can be so blind as not to see the hand of God at work, perhaps he will not see that of an evangelist either.

  Finally, the ceaseless interest of the police in my activities and whereabouts paid off for them. Again I was discovered, again imprisoned. For some reason they did not imprison my family this time, perhaps because of all the publicity I had received. I had had eight and a half years of prison and then three years of relative freedom. Now I was to be imprisoned for five and a half years more.
  My second imprisonment, was in many ways, worse than the first. I knew well what to expect. My physical condition became very bad almost immediately. But we continued the ~underground~ work of the ~Underground~ church in ~underground~ Communist prisons.

We Made a Deal - We Preached and They Beat

  It was strictly forbidden to preach to other prisoners. It was understood that whoever was caught doing this received a severe beating. A number of us decided to pay the price for the privilege of preaching, so we accepted their terms. It was a deal: we preached and they beat us. We were happy preaching. They were happy beating us, so everyone was happy.
  The following scene happened more times than I can remember: A brother was preaching to the other prisoners when the guards suddenly burst in, surprising him half way through a phrase. They hauled him down the corridor to their "beating room." After what seemed an endless beating, they brought him back and threw him - bloody and bruised - on the prison floor. Slowly, he picked his battered body up, painfully straightened his clothing and said, "Now, brethren, where did I leave off when I was interrupted?" He continued his Gospel message!

I have seen beautiful things!

Sometimes the preachers were laymen. Simple men inspired by the Holy Spirit often preached beautifully. All their hearts were in their words, for to preach under such punitive circumstances was no trifling matter. Then the guards would come and take the preacher out and beat him half to death.

In the prison of Gherla, a Christian named Grecu was sentenced to be beaten to death. The process lasted a few weeks. He was beaten very slowly. He would be hit once at the bottom of the feet with a rubber club, and then left. After some minutes again a hit, after another few minutes again. He was beaten on the testicles. Then a doctor gave him an injection. He recovered and was given very good food to restore his strength, and then he was beaten again until he died under this slow, repeated beating. One who led this torture was a member of the Central Committee of the Communist Party, whose name was Reck.

Now, at a certain moment, Reck would say something which the Communists often said to Christians, "You know, ~I~ am God. I have power of life and death over you. The one who is in heaven cannot decide to keep you in life. Everything depends upon ~me~. If I wish, you live. If I wish, you are killed. ~I am God!~" So he mocked the Christian.

Brother Grecu, in this horrible situation, gave Reck a very interesting answer which I heard afterward from Reck himself. He said, "You don't know what a deep thing you have said. You are really a god. Every caterpillar is in reality a butterfly, if it develops rightly. You have not been created to be a torturer, a man who kills. You have been created to become a godlike being. Jesus said to the Jews of His time, 'Ye are gods.' The life of Godhead is in your heart. Many who have been like you, many persecutors, as the apostle Paul, have discovered at a certain moment that it is shameful for a man to commit atrocities, that they can do much better things. So they have become partakers of the divine nature. Believe me, Mr. Reck, your real calling is to be a god, godlike; not a torturer."

At that moment Reck did not pay much attention to the words of his victim, as Saul of Tarsus did not pay attention to the beautiful witness of Stephen being killed in his presence. But those words worked in his heart. And Reck later understood that ~this~ was his real calling.

One great lesson arose from all the beatings, tortures and butchery of the Communists: ~that the spirit is master of the body.~ Often, when tortured, we felt the tortures, but it seemed as something distant and far removed from the spirit which was lost in the glory of Christ and His presence with us.

When we were given one slice of bread a week and dirty soup every day, we decided we would faithfully "tithe" even then. Every tenth week we took the slice of bread and gave it to weaker brethren as our "tithe" to the Master.

A Christian was sentenced to death. Before being executed, he was allowed to see his wife. His last words to his wife were, ~"You must know that I die loving those who kill me. They don t know what they do and my last request of you is to love them, too. Don't have bitterness in your heart because they kill your beloved one. We will meet in heaven."~ These words impressed the officer of the secret police who attended the discussion between the two. Afterward he told me the story in prison, where he had been put for becoming a Christian.

In the prison of Tirgul-Ocna there was a very young prisoner called Matchevici. He had been put in prison at the age of eighteen. Because of the tortures, he was now very sick with tuberculosis. The family found out somehow that he was in this grave state of health and sent him one hundred bottles of streptomycin, which could make the difference between life and death. The political officer of the prison called him and showed him the parcel and said, "Here is the medicine which can save your life. But you are not allowed to receive parcels from your family. Personally, I would like to help you. You are young. I would not like you to die in prison. Help me to be able to help you! Give me information against your fellow prisoners and this will enable me to justify before my superiors why I gave you the parcel." Matchevici answered, "I don't wish to remain alive and be ashamed to look in a mirror because I will see the face of a traitor. I cannot accept such a condition. ~I prefer to die.~" The officer of the secret police shook his hand and said, "I congratulate you. I didn't expect any other answer from you. But I would like to make another proposal. Some of the prisoners have become our informers. They claim to be Communists and they are denouncing ~you~. They play a double role. We have no confidence in them. We would like to know in what measure they are sincere. Toward you they are traitors. They are doing you so much harm, informing us about your words and deeds. I understand that you don't want to betray your comrades. But give us information about those who oppose you so you will save your life!" Matchevici answered, as promptly as the first time, "I am a disciple of Christ and He has taught us to love even our enemies. The men who betray us do us very much harm but I cannot reward evil with evil. I cannot give information even against them. I pity them. I pray for them. I don't wish to have any connection with the Communists." Matchevici came back from the discussion with the political officer and died in the same cell I was in. I saw him die - ~he was praising God~. Love conquered even the natural thirst for life.

If a poor man is a great lover of music, he gives his last dollar to listen to a concert. He is then without money, but he does not feel frustrated. He has heard beautiful things.

I don't feel frustrated to have lost many years in prison. I have seen beautiful things. I myself have been among the weak and insignificant ones in prison, but have had the privilege to be in the same jail with great saints, heroes of faith who equalled the Christians of the first centuries. They went gladly to die for Christ. The spiritual beauty of such saints and heroes of faith can never be described.

The things which I say here are not exceptional. The supernatural things have become natural to Christians in the Underground Church.

The Underground Church is the church which has come back to the first love.

Before entering prison, I loved Christ very much. Now, after having seen the "Bride of Christ" - His spiritual Body - in prison, I would say that I love the Underground Church as much as I love Christ himself. I have seen her beauty, her spirit of sacrifice.

What Happened to My Wife and Son

I was taken away from my wife. I did not know what had happened to her. Only after many years I heard that she had been put in prison, too. Christian women suffer much more than men in prison. Girls have been raped by brutal guards. The mockery, the obscenity is horrible. The women were compelled to work at hard labor at a canal which had to be built, and they had to fulfill the same work load as men. They shoveled earth in winter. Prostitutes were made overseers and competed in torturing the faithful. My wife has eaten grass like cattle to stay alive. Rats and snakes were eaten at his canal by the hungry prisoners. One of the joys of the guards on Sundays was to throw women into the Danube and then fish them out, to laugh about them, to mock them when they saw their wet bodies, to throw them back and fish them out again. My wife was thrown in the Danube in this manner.

My son was left to wander on the street when his mother and father were taken away. Mihai had been from childhood very religious and very interested in matters of faith. At the age of nine, when his father and mother were taken away from him, he passed through a crisis in his Christian life. He had become bitter and questioned all his religion. He had problems which children usually don't have at this age. He had to think about earning his living.
It was a crime to help families of Christian martyrs. Two ladies who helped him were arrested and beaten so badly that they are crippled even now - after fifteen years. A lady who risked her life and took Mihai into her house was sentenced to eight years in prison for the crime of having helped families of prisoners. All her teeth were kicked out. Her bones were broken. She will never be able to work again. She, too, will be a cripple for life.

"Mihai, Believe in Jesus!"

At the age of eleven, Mihai began to earn his living as a regular worker. Suffering had produced a wavering in his faith. But after two years of my wife's imprisonment, he was allowed to see her. He went to the Communist prison and saw his mother behind iron bars. She was dirty, thin, with calloused hands, wearing the shabby uniform of a prisoner. He scarcely recognized her. Her first words were, ~"Mihai, believe in Jesus!"~ The guards, in a savage rage, pulled her away from Mihai and took her out. Mihai wept seeing his mother dragged away. This minute was the minute of his conversion. He knew that if Christ can be loved under such circumstances, He surely is the true Saviour. He said afterward: "If Christianity had no other arguments in its favor than the fact that my mother believes in it, ~this is enough for me.~ That was the day he fully accepted Christ.

In school, he had a continuous battle for existence. He was a good pupil and as a reward he was given a red necktie - a sign of membership in the Young Communist Pioneers. My son said, "I will never wear the necktie of those who put my father and mother in prison." He was expelled from school for this. After having lost a year, he entered school again, hiding the fact he was the son of a Christian prisoner.

Later, he had to write a thesis against the Bible. In this thesis he wrote: "The arguments against the Bible are weak and the quotations against the Bible are untrue. Surely the professor has not read the Bible. The Bible is in harmony with science." ~Again he was expelled.~ This time he had to lose two school years.

In the end he was allowed to study in the Seminary. Here he was taught "Marxist theology." Everything was explained according to the pattern of Karl Marx. Mihai protested publicly in class. Other students joined him. The result was that he was expelled and could not finish his theological studies.

Once in school when a professor delivered an atheist speech, my son rose and contradicted the professor him what responsibility he took upon himself by leading so many young men astray. The entire class took his side. It was necessary that one should have the courage to speak out first. Then all the others were on his side. To get an education he constantly tried to hide the fact that he was the son of Wurmbrand, the Christian prisoner. But often it was discovered and again there was the familiar scene of being called to the school director's office and being expelled.

Mihai also suffered much from hunger. The families of jailed Christians in Communist countries almost always nearly starve to death. It is a great crime to help them.

I will tell you just one case of suffering of a family that I know personally. A brother entered prison on account of his work in the Underground Church. He left behind a wife with six children. His older daughters of seventeen and nineteen could get no job. The only one that gives jobs in a Communist country is the state and it gives no jobs to children of "criminal" Christians. Please, don't judge this story according to moral standards! Just receive the facts! The two daughters of a Christian martyr - Christians themselves - became prostitutes to support their smaller brothers and sick mother. Their younger brother of fourteen became mad when he saw it and had to be put in an asylum. When, after years, the imprisoned father returned, his only prayer was, "God, take me again to prison. I cannot bear to see this." His prayer has been fulfilled and he is now in jail again for the crime of having witnessed for Christ to children. His daughters are no longer prostitutes. They have received jobs by complying with the demands of the secret police. They have become informers. As daughters of a Christian martyr, they are received with honor in every house. They listen and then they report everything they hear to the secret police. Don't just say that it is ugly and immoral - of course it is - ~but ask yourself if it is not also your sin that such tragedies occur~, that such Christian families are left alone, unhelped by you who are free.

CHAPTER 3 - RANSOM AND RELEASE FOR WORK IN THE WEST

A TOTAL of fourteen years in prison passed for me. During all this time I never saw a Bible or any other book. I had forgotten how to write. Because of the great hunger, doping and tortures, I had forgotten the Holy Scriptures. But on the day that I fulfilled fourteen years, out of oblivion came into my mind the verse: "Jacob worked for Rachel fourteen years and it seemed to him a ~little time~ because he loved her."

Very soon after this I was released through a general amnesty given in our country, very much under the influence of American public opinion.

I saw my wife again. She had waited faithfully for me for fourteen years.

We began a new life in extreme poverty, because if somebody is arrested ~everything~ is taken from him.

The priests and pastors who were released could get small churches. A church in the town of Orsova was given to me. The Communist Department of Cults told me it had thirty-five members in it and warned that it must never have thirty-six! I was also told I must be their agent and report to the secret police on every member and keep all youth away. This is how the Communists use churches as their "tool" of control.

I knew, if I preached, many would come to hear. So I never tried even to begin in the official church. I worked again in the Underground Church, sharing all the beauties and the dangers of this work.

During the years I was imprisoned God had moved wonderfully. The Underground Church was no longer abandoned and forgotten. Americans and other Christians had begun to help us and pray for us.

One afternoon I rested for a little bit in the house of a brother in a provincial town. He awoke me and said "Brethren from abroad have come." In the West there were Christians who had not forgotten or abandoned us.

Rank-and-file Christians had organized a secret work of relief for families of Christian martyrs and smuggling in of Christian literature and help.

In the other room I found six brethren who had come to do this work. They spoke much with me. After a long time they told me that they had heard that at this address there was somebody who had spent fourteen years in prison and they would like to see him. So I told them that I was the man. They said, "We expected to see somebody melancholic. You cannot be this person because you are full of joy." I assured them I was the imprisoned one and my joy was in knowing they had come and we were no longer forgotten. Steady, regular help began to come to the Underground Church. By secret channels we got many Bibles and other Christian literature and relief for families of Christian martyrs. Now, being helped by them, we of the Underground church could work much better.

It was not only that they gave us the Word of God, but we saw that we were beloved. They brought us a word of comfort.

During the years of brainwashing we had heard, "Nobody loves you any more, nobody loves you any more, nobody loves you any more." Now we saw American and English Christians who risked their lives to show us that they loved us. Taking advice from us, they developed a technique of secret work. They crept into houses surrounded by the secret police. The police did not know that they had entered.

The value of the Bibles smuggled in by these means cannot be understood by an American or an English Christian who "swims" in Bibles.

My family and I would not have survived without the material help I got from praying Christians abroad. The same with many other underground pastors and martyrs in Communist countries. I can testify out of my own experience about the material and even greater moral help which has been given to us by special missions formed for this purpose in the free world. For us, their men were like angels sent by God!

Because of the renewed work of the Underground Church, I was in very great danger of still another arrest. At this time, two Christian organizations - the Norwegian Mission to the Jews and the Hebrew Christian Alliance - paid a ransom of $10,000 for me. I could now leave Rumania.

Why I Left Communist Rumania

I would not have left - in spite of the dangers - if the leaders of the Underground Church had not commanded me to use this opportunity to leave the country, to be the "voice" of the Underground Church to the Free World. They wished me to speak to you of the Western world in their name, about their sufferings and their needs. I came to the West, but my heart remained with them. If I had not understood the great necessity for you to hear of the sufferings and the courageous work of the Underground Church, I would never have left Rumania. This is my mission.

Before leaving Rumania, I was called twice to the secret police. They told me that the money had been received for me. (Rumania sells its citizens for money, because of the difficult economic crisis to which communism has brought our country.) They told me, "Go to the West and preach Christ as much as you like, but don't touch us! Don't speak a word against us! We tell you frankly what we plan for you if you do tell what happened. First of all, for $1,000 we can find a gangster to liquidate you, or we can kidnap you. (I have been in the same cell with the Orthodox bishop, Vasile Leul, who had been kidnapped in Austria and brought to Rumania. All his fingernails were torn out. I have been with others from Berlin. Recently Rumanians have been kidnapped from Italy and Paris.) They told me further, "We can also destroy you morally by spreading a story about you with a girl, theft or some sin of your youth. The Westerners - especially Americans - are very easily deceived and duped."

Having threatened me they allowed me to come to the West. They had great confidence in the brainwashing through which I passed. In the West, there are now many who have passed through the same things as I, but who are silent. Some of them even praise communism after having been tortured by the Communists. The Communists were very sure that I, too, would be silent.

So in December 1965 my family and I could leave Rumania.

My last deed before leaving was to go to the grave of the colonel who had given the order for my arrest and who had ordered my years of torture. I put a flower on his grave. By doing this I dedicated myself to bringing the joys of Christ that I have to the Communists who are so empty spiritually.

I hate the Communist system but I love the men. I hate the sin but I love the sinner. I love the Communists with all my heart. Communists can kill Christians but they cannot kill their love toward even those who killed them. I have not the slightest bitterness or resentment against the Communists or my torturers.

CHAPTER 4 - DEFEATING COMMUNISM WITH THE LOVE SPIRIT OF CHRIST

THE JEWS have a legend that, when their forefathers were saved from Egypt and the Egyptians drowned in the Red Sea, the angels joined the songs of triumph sung by the Israelites. And God said to the angels, "The Jews are men and can rejoice about their escape. But from you I expect more understanding. Are the Egyptians not also my creatures? Do I not love them, too? How do you fail to feel my sorrow about their tragic fate?"

"When Joshua was by Jericho, he lifted up his eyes and looked and, behold, there stood a man over against him with his sword drawn in his hand; and Joshua went unto him, and said unto him, Art thou for us, or for our adversaries?" (JOS 5:13)

If the one met by Joshua had been only a man, the answer could have been "I am for you," or "I am for your adversaries" or, eventually, "I am neutral." These are the only possible human response to such a question. But the Being Whom Joshua met was from another sphere and, therefore, asked if he was for Israel or against it, gave an answer which is the most unexpected and difficult to understand: "Nay." What does this "Nay" mean?

He came from a sphere where beings are not for or against, but where everybody and everything is understood, looked upon with pity and compassion and loved with fire.

There is a human level. On this level, communism

page 56 Tortured for Christ

must be utterly fought against. On this level we have to fight against Communists, too, they being the supporters of this cruel, savage ideal.

But Christians are more than mere men; they are children of God, partakers of the Divine nature.

Therefore, tortures endured in Communist prisons have not made me hate Communists. They are God's creatures. How can I hate them? Neither can I be their friend. Friendship means one soul in two breasts. I am not one soul with the Communists. They hate the notion of God. I love God.

If I were asked, "Are you for the Communists or against them?" my answer would be a complex one. Communism is the greatest menace to mankind. I am utterly opposed to it and wish to fight it until it is overthrown. But, in the spirit, I am seated in heavenly places with Jesus. I am seated in the sphere of the "Nay," in which, notwithstanding all their crimes, the Communists are understood and loved, a sphere in which there are angelic beings trying to help everyone attain the goal of human life, which is to become Christlike. Therefore my aim is to spread the Gospel to the Communists, to give them the good news about Christ, who is my Lord, loves the Communists. He has said himself that He loves every man and that He would rather leave ninety-nine righteous sheep than allow the one who went astray to remain lost. His apostles and all the great teachers of Christianity have taught this universal love in His name. St. Macary said, "If a man loves all men passionately, but says only about one man that him he cannot love, the man who says this is no more a Christian, because his love is not all-embracing." St. Augustine teaches, "If all mankind had been righteous and only one man a sinner, Christ would have come to endure the same cross for this one man, he so loves every individual." The Christian teaching is clear. Communists are men and Christ loves them. So does every man who has the mind of Christ. We love the sinner even though we hate the sin.

We know about the love of Christ toward the Communists by our own love toward them.

I have seen Christians in Communist prisons with 50 pounds of chains on their feet, tortured with red-hot iron pokers, in whose throats spoonfuls of salt had been forced, being kept afterward without water, starving, whipped, suffering from cold, and praying with fervor for the Communists. This is humanly inexplicable! It is the love of Christ, which was shed into our hearts.

Afterward, the Communists who had tortured us came to prison, too. Under communism, Communists, and even Communist rulers, are put in prison almost as often as their adversaries. Now the tortured and the torturer were in the same cell. And while the non-Christians showed hatred toward their former inquisitors and beat them, Christians took their defense, even at the risk of being beaten themselves and accused of being accomplices with communism. I have seen Christians giving away their last slice of bread (we had at that time one slice a week) and the medicine which could save their lives to a sick Communist torturer, who was now a fellow-prisoner.

The last words of Iuliu Maniu the Christian former prime minister of Rumania who died in prison, were, "If the Communists are overthrown in our country, it will be the most holy duty of every Christian to go into the streets and at the risk of his own life defend the Communists from the righteous fury of the multitudes whom they have tyrannized."

In the first days after my conversion, I felt that I would not be able to live any longer. Walking on the street, I felt a physical pain for every man and woman who passed by. It was like a knife in the heart, so burning was the question of whether or not he or she were saved. If a member of the congregation sinned, I would weep for hours. The longing for the salvation of all souls has remained in my heart and the Communists are not excluded from it.

In solitary confinement, we could not pray any more as before. We were unimaginably hungry; we had been doped until we became as idiots. We were as weak as skeletons. The Lord's Prayer was much too long for us. We could not concentrate enough to say it. My only prayer repeated again and again, was "Jesus, I love Thee."

And then, one glorious day I got the answer from Jesus: "You love me? Now I will show you how I love you." At once, I felt a flame in my heart which burned like the coronal steamers of the sun. The disciples on the way from Emmaus said that their hearts burned when Jesus spoke with them. So it was with me. I knew the love of the One Who gave His life on the cross for us all. Such love cannot exclude the Communists, however grave their sins.

Communists have committed and still commit horrors but "many waters cannot quench love, neither can the floods drown it. Love is strong as death. Jealousy is as cruel as the grave." As the grave insists on having all - rich and poor, young and old, men of all races, nations and political convictions, saints and criminals - so love is all embracing. Christ, the Incarnate Love, will never cease until He wins the Communists too.

A minister was thrown into my cell. He was half dead. Blood streamed from his face and body. He had been horribly beaten. We washed him. Some prisoners cursed the Communists. Groaning, he said, "Please, don't curse them! Keep silent! I wish to pray for them."

page 59 Tortured for Christ

How We Could Be Joyful - Even in Prison

When I look back on the fourteen years of prison, it was sometimes a very happy time. Other prisoners and even the guards very often wondered at how happy Christians could be under most terrible circumstances. We could not be prevented from singing, although we were beaten for this. I imagine that nightingales too would sing, even if they knew that after finishing they would be killed for it. Christians in prison danced for joy. How could they be so happy under such tragic conditions?

I meditated often in prison about Jesus' words to His disciples, "Blessed are the eyes which see the things that ye see." The disciples had just come back from a tour through Palestine where they had seen horrors. Palestine was an oppressed country. Everywhere there was the terrible misery of a tyrannized people. The disciples met sickness, plagues, hunger, sorrow. They entered houses from which patriots had been taken to prison, leaving behind weeping parents or wives. It was not a beautiful world to look upon.

Still Jesus said, "Blessed are the eyes which see the things that ye see." That was because they had not seen only the suffering. They had also seen the Saviour of all, the Achiever of the last good, the Goal which mankind will attain. For the first time a few ugly worms, caterpillars which creep on leaves, understood that, after this miserable existence, there comes life as a beautiful, multicolored butterfly, able to fly from flower to flower. This happiness was ours, too.

Around me were Jobs, some much more afflicted than Job had been. But I knew the end of Job's story; how he received twice as much as he had had before. I had around me men like poor Lazarus, hungry and full of uncared-for boiLs. But I knew that angels would take them all to the bosom of Abraham. I saw them as they will be in the future. I saw in the shabby and dirty and weak martyr near me the splendidly crowned saint of tomorrow.

But looking at men like this - not as they are, but as they will be - I could discover also in persecutors like Saul of Tarsus future St. Pauls. And some have already become so. Officers of the secret police to whom we witnessed became Christians themselves and were happy to suffer afterward in prison for having found our Christ. In the jailors who whipped us we saw the possibilities of the jailor of Philippi who first whipped St. Paul and then became a convert. We dreamed that soon they would ask, "What shall I do to be saved?" In those who watched mocking when Christians, smeared with excrement, were tied to crosses, we saw the crowd of Golgotha who were soon to beat their breasts in fear of having sinned.

It was in prison that we found hope for the Communists, that they will be saved. It was there that we developed a sense of responsibility toward them. It was in being tortured by them that we learned to love them.

A great part of my family has been murdered. It was in my house that their murderer was converted. It was also the most suitable place. So in Communist prisons the idea of a Christian mission to the Communists was born.

God sees things otherwise than we see them, as we see otherwise than an ant. From the human point of view, to be tied to crosses besmeared with excrements is a horrible thing. Notwithstanding, the Bible calls the sufferings of martyrs "light afflictions." To pass fourteen years in prison was a long period for us. The Bible calls it "but a moment, which works for us a weight of glory." This gives us the right to suppose that the fierce crimes of the Communists, which are inexcusable for us, men, and against which we righteously have to fight to the utmost, are lighter in the eyes of God than they are in our eyes. Their tyranny, which has lasted already half a century, may be before God, for whom a thousand years are like one day, only a moment of erring astray. They still have the possibility of being saved.

Heavenly Jerusalem is a mother and loves like a mother.

The gates of heaven are not closed for the Communists. Neither is the light quenched for them. They can repent like everybody else. And we must call them to repentance.

Only love can change the Communists (a love which must be clearly distinguished from compliance with communism, practised by many church leaders). Hatred blinds. Hitler was an anti-Communist, but one who hated. therefore, instead of conquering them, he helped them win one third of the world.

With love we planned in prison a missionary work among the Communists.

And thereby we thought, first of all about the Communist rulers.

Some mission directors seem to have studied little church history. How was Norway won for Christ? By winning King Olaf. Russia first had the Gospel when its king, Vladimir; was won. Hungary was won by winning St. Stephen, its king. The same with Poland. In Africa, where the chief of the tribe has been won, the tribe follows. We set up missions to rank-and-file men who may become very fine Christians, but who have little influence and cannot change the state of things.

We must win rulers; political, economic, scientific, artistic personalities. They are the engineers of souls. They mold the souls of men. Winning them, you win the people they lead and influence.

From the missionary point of view, communism has an advantage which other social systems have not. It is more centralized.

If the President of the U.S.A. were converted to Mormonism, America would not become Mormon because of it. But if Mao Tse-tung is converted to Christianity - or Brezhnev or Ceaushescu - their whole country may be reached. So great is the impact of leaders.

But can a Communist leader be converted? Surely, because he is unhappy and insecure just like his victim. Nearly all the Communist rulers of Russia ended in prison or were shot by their own comrades. The same in China. Even the ministers of the interior like Iagoda, Yezhov, Beria, who seemed to have all power in hand, ended just like the last counter-revolutionary: a bullet in the neck and it was finished with them. Recently Shelepin, the Minister of the Interior of the Soviet Union, and Rankovic, the Minister of the Interior of Yugoslavia, have been thrown out like dirty rags.

How We Can Attack Communism Spiritually

The Communist regime makes nobody happy, not even its profiteers. Even they tremble that any night the van of the secret police may take them away because the party line has changed.

I have known many Communist leaders personally. They are heavily-laden men. Only Jesus can give them rest.

To win the Communist rulers for Christ may mean to save the world from nuclear destruction, to save mankind from hunger due to the fact that now so much of its revenues have to go to costly armaments. To win the Communist rulers may mean the end of international tension. To win the Communist rulers will mean to fill Christ and the angels with joy. It can mean the triumph of the Church. All the areas in which missionaries labor so hard, such as New Guinea or Madagascar, will follow simply if the Communist rulers are won, because this will give Christianity an entirely new impetus.

I have personally known converted Communists. I myself was a militant atheist in my youth. Converted atheists and Communists love Christ much, because they have sinned very much.

Strategic thought is needed in missionary work. From the point of view of salvation all souls are equal; from the point of view of missionary strategy they are not equal. It is more important to win a man of great influence, who can afterward win thousands, than to speak to a savage in the jungle assuring salvation only for him. Therefore Jesus chose to end His ministry not in some small village, but in Jerusalem, the spiritual headquarters of the world. For this same reason Paul strove so much to arrive in Rome.

The Bible says: "The seed of the woman will bruise the head of the serpent." We tickle the serpent on the belly, making him laugh. The head of the serpent is somewhere between Moscow and Peking, not in Tunis or Madagascar. The Communist world must be the chief concern of Church leaders and mission directors as well as of every thoughtful Christian.

We must give up routine work. "Cursed be he that doeth the work of the Lord deceitfully," it is written. A frontal, spiritual attack on communism by the Church is necessary.

Wars are won only by offensive, never by defensive strategy. Toward communism, the Church has been until now always on the defensive, losing one country after another in favor of communism.

This must change immediately in the Church as a whole. A Psalm says that God cuts the bars of iron asunder. The Iron Curtain is a little thing for Him.

The first Church worked secretly and illegally, and it triumphed. We must learn again to work in the same manner.

page 64 Tortured for Christ

Until the Communist time, I never understood why so many persons of the New Testament are called by nicknames: Simeon who was called Niger, John called Mark and so on. We use secret names in our work now in the Communist countries.

I never understood before why Jesus, wishing to have the last supper arranged, did not give an address but said, "Go into the town and look for a man who bears a pitcher." Now I understand. We also give such secret signs of recognition in the work of the Underground Church.

If we agree to work like this - to come back to the methods of early Christianity - we can work effectively for Christ in Communist countries.

But when I met some Church leaders of the West, instead of love toward the Communists, which would have led long since to the organization of a missionary work in the Communist countries, I found their policy on the side of the Communists. I did not find the compassion of the Good Samaritan toward the lost souls of the house of Karl Marx.

A man really believes not what he recites in his creed, but only the things he is ready to die for.

The Christians of the Underground Church have proved that they are ready to die for their faith. I continue now with a work which can mean for me a re-imprisonment in a Communist country, new tortures and death, because I lead a secret mission behind the Iron Curtain, taking upon myself all the risks. I believe the things I write.

I have the right to ask: Would the Church leaders of America who make friends with communism be ready to die for this their belief? Who prevents them from giving up their high positions in the West to become official pastors in the East, cooperating there - on the spot - with Communists? The proof of such a faith has not been given yet by any Western Church leader.

page 65 Tortured for Christ

Human words grow out of the need of men to understand each other in common hunting, fishing, and afterward in common production of the things necessary to life and to express their feelings toward one another. There are no human words to express in an adequate manner the mysteries of God and of the heights of spiritual life.

Likewise, there are no human words which can describe the depths of devilish cruelty. Can you express in words what a man felt who was about to be thrown into a furnace by the Nazis, or who saw his child thrown into this furnace?

So it is useless to try to describe what Christians have suffered and still suffer under the Communists.

I was in prison with Lucretiu Patrascanu, the man who brought communism to power in Rumania. His comrades rewarded him by putting him in jail. Though he was sane, they put him in a mental hospital with madmen, until he became mad too. They did the same to Ana Pauker, their former Secretary of State. Christians are often given this type of treatment too. They receive electric shocks. They are put in strait-jackets.

The world is horrified about what is happening on the Chinese streets. In view of everybody, the Red Guard exercises its terror. Now try to imagine what happens to some Christians in a Chinese jail, where nobody sees!

The last news was that, when a renowned Chinese Evangelical writer and other Christians refused to deny their faith, their captors cut off their ears, tongues and legs.

But the worst thing Communists do is not that they torture and kill the bodies of men. They hopelessly falsify the thoughts of men and poison the youth and the children. They have put their men into positions of leadership in the churches to lead the Christians and to destroy the churches. They teach youth not to believe in God and Christ, but to ~hate~ these names.

In what words can we express the tragedy of Christian martyrs, who, coming home after years in prison, are received with scorn by their children, who in the meantime have become militant atheists?

~This book is written not so much with ink, as with the blood of bleeding hearts.~

Except that, as in Daniel's time the three young men who were put in the furnace, after having been delivered from it, did not smell like fire; so the Christians who have been in Communist prisons don't smell like bitterness against the Communists.

A flower, if you bruise it under your feet, rewards you by giving you its perfume. Likewise Christians, tortured by the Communists, rewarded their torturers by love. We brought many of our jailors to Christ. And we are dominated by one desire: to give Communists who have made us suffer the best we have, the salvation which comes from our Lord Jesus Christ.

I had not the privilege, which many of my brethren in the faith had: to die a martyr's death in prison. I was released and could even come out of Rumania to the West.

In the West I found in many Church leaders just the contrary sentiment of that which is predominant in the Underground Church behind the Iron and Bamboo Curtains. Many Christians in the West have no love for the Communists. Proof of it is that they do nothing for the salvation of those in the Communist countries. They have missions to the Jews, missions to the Moslems, missions to the Buddhists. They have missions to persuade Christians of one denomination to change to another. But ~they have no mission to the Communists!~ They don't love them. Otherwise they would long since have created such a mission, just as Carey loving the Indians and Hudson Taylor the Chinese have created their respective missions.

But it is not enough that they do not love the Communists and do nothing to win them for Christ. By their complacency, by their neglect, and sometimes by acting as actual accomplices, some Western Church leaders strengthen the Communists in their infidelity. They help the Communist to intrude in western churches and to win leadership in the churches of the world. They make Christians unaware of the danger of communism.

Not loving the Communists and doing nothing to win them for Christ (under the pretext that they are not allowed to do so, as if the first Christians asked permission from Nero to spread the Gospel) they do not love their own flocks either. Because if we do not win the Communists for Christ, they will conquer the West and will uproot Christianity here too.

The Lessons of History Are Ignored

In the first centuries, there was a flourishing Christianity in North Africa. From there came St. Augustine and St. Cyprian and St. Athanasius and Tertullian. The Christians of North Africa neglected just one duty: to win the Mohammedans for Christ. The result was that the Mohammedans invaded North Africa and uprooted Christianity for centuries. North Africa belongs to the Moslems even now, and they are called by the Christian mission "the bloc of unconvertibles.

Let us learn something from history!

At the time of the Reformation, the religious interests of Huss, Luther and Calvin coincided with the interests of the European peoples to get rid of the yoke of the Papacy, which was then an oppressive political and economic power. Likewise today, the interests of the Underground Church in spreading the Gospel to both Communists and their victims coincide with the vital interest of all free peoples in continuing to live in freedom.

There is no political power that can overthrow communism. Communists have nuclear power. To attack them militarily would start a new world war with hundreds of millions of victims. Many western rulers are brainwashed and do not even wish to overthrow the Communist rulers. They have said so frequently. They wish that drug addiction, gangsterism, cancer and tuberculosis would disappear, but not communism, which has claimed far more victims than all these together.

Ilya Ehrenburg, the Soviet writer, says that if Stalin had done nothing else all his life than to write the names of his innocent victims, his life would not have been long enough to finish the job. Khrushchev said at the Twentieth Congress of the Communist Party, "Stalin liquidated thousands of honest and guiltless Communists ... Of a hundred and thirty-nine members and candidates of the Central Committee who were chosen at the seventeenth Congress, ninety-eight, that is seventy per cent, were later arrested and shot."

Now imagine what he did to the Christians!

Khrushchev disowned Stalin, but continued to do the same thing. Since 1959 half of the churches of Soviet Russia which were still open have been closed.

In China there is a new wave of barbarism worse than that of the Stalinist period. Open church life has ceased completely. In Russia and Rumania there are new arrests. (We have just now received word of mass arrests of Christians in Russia.)

With terror and deceit, in countries with one billion inhabitants, the whole generation of youth is brought up in hatred toward everything Western and especially toward Christianity.

It is not an unusual sight in Russia to see local officials stand in front of churches watching for children. Those who go to church are slapped and thrown out. The future destroyers of Western Christianity are carefully and systematically brought up!

There is only one force which can overthrow Communism. It is the same force which made Christian states take the place of the heathen Roman Empire, the force which made Christians of savage Teutons and Vikings, the force which overthrew the bloody Inquisition. This force is the power of the Gospel, represented by the Underground Church which works in all Communist countries.

To sustain this Church and to help her is not only a question of unity with suffering brethren. It means life or death for your country and for your churches. To sustain this Church is not only in the interests of free Christians, but should also be the policy of free governments.

The Underground Church has already won Communist rulers to Christ. Gheorghiu Dej, Rumania's prime minister, died a converted man after confessing his sin and changing his sinful life. In Communist countries there are Communist members of the government who are hidden Christians. This can spread. Then we will be able to expect a real change in the policy of some Communist governments - not changes like those of Tito and Gomulka, after which the same dictatorship of a cruel atheistic party continued - but a turn towards Christianity and freedom.

Exceptional opportunities exist now for this.

The Communists, who very often are as sincere in their beliefs as Christians are in theirs, are passing through a great crisis.

They had really believed that communism would create a brotherhood among nations. Now they see that Communist countries quarrel with each other like dogs.

page 70 Tortured for Christ

They had really believed that communism would create an earthly paradise, opposed to what they call the illusory paradise in heaven. And now their peoples are hungry. Wheat has to be imported from capitalist countries.

The Communists had believed in their leaders. Now they have read in their own newspapers that Stalin was a mass murderer and Khrushchev an idiot. The same with their national heroes like Rakosi, Gero, Ana Pauker, Rankovici and so on. The Communists no longer believe in the infallibility of their leaders. They are like Catholics without a Pope.

There is a void in the hearts of Communists. This void can be filled by Christ alone. The human heart by nature seeks after God. There is a spiritual vacuum in every man until it is filled by Christ. This is true also for the Communists. In the Gospel there is a power of love which can appeal to them, too. I have seen it happen. I know it can be done.

Christians - mocked and tortured by the Communists - have forgotten and forgiven what has been done to them personally and to their families. They do their best to help the Communists pass through the crisis and find the way to Christ. For this work they need our help.

And not only for this. Christian love is always universal. With Christians, there is no partiality.

Jesus said that the sun of God rises over the good and the evil. The same is true about Christian love.

Those Christian leaders in the West who show friendship to the Communists justify it by the teaching of Jesus that we must love even our enemies. But never did Jesus teach that we must love only our enemies, forgetting our brethren.

They show their love by wining and dining those whose hands are full of blood of Christians, not by giving them the good news of Christ. But those oppressed by the Communists are forgotten. They are not loved.

The Evangelical and Catholic churches of West Germany have in the last seven years given 125 million dollars for the hungry. American Christians give even more.

There are many hungry people, but I cannot imagine anybody hungrier than Christian martyrs or more entitled to help from free Christians. If German churches and the British and American and Scandinavian ones raise so much money for relief, it should go for everybody in need, ~but first for the Christian martyrs and their families.....~

Does it happen so now?

I was ransomed by Christian organizations, which proves that Christians can be ransomed. Notwithstanding, I am the only case of somebody ransomed from our country by Christians. And the fact of my ransom will accuse Christian organizations of the West of neglecting to fulfill their duty in other cases.

The first Christians asked themselves whether the new Church was only for the Jews, or for the Gentiles too. The question received the right answer. In another form, the problem has reappeared in the twentieth century. Christianity is not only for the West. Christ does not belong only to America, England and other democratic countries. When He was crucified, one of His hands was stretched out toward the west, the other toward the east. He wishes to be the King not only of the Jews, but also of the Gentiles; the King of the Communists too, not only of the Western world. Jesus said: "Go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature."

He gave His blood for all and all should hear and believe the Gospel.

What encourages us to preach the Gospel in Communist countries is that there those who become Christians are full of love and zeal. I never met one single luke-warm Russian Christian. Former young Communists can become exceptional disciples of Christ.

Christ loves the Communists and wishes to free them from communism, as He loves all sinners and desires to free them from sin. Some Western church leaders put instead of this only right attitude another one: complacency toward communism. They favor the sinful, they help communism to triumph and hinder the salvation of Communists, as well as of their victims.

What I Found When I Was Released

When, released from prison, I was again with my wife, she asked me what my plans were for the future. I answered, "the ideal which I have before me is the life of a spiritual recluse." My wife answered that she had had the same thought.

I had been a very dynamic type in my youth. But prison, and especially the years of solitary confinement, had transformed me into a meditative, contemplative man. All the storms in the heart had been stilled. I did not mind Communism. I did not even notice it. I was in the embraces of the heavenly Bridegroom. I prayed for those who tormented us and could love them with all my heart.

I had had very little hope of ever being released, but when from time to time it occurred to me to wonder what I would do in case I were released, I always considered that I would retire somewhere and continue the life of sweet union in the desert with the heavenly Bridegroom.

God is "the Truth." The Bible is the "truth about the Truth." Theology is the "truth about the truth about the Truth." Fundamentalism is the "truth about the truth about the truth about the Truth." Christian people live in these many truths about the Truth, and, because of them, have not "the Truth." Hungry, beaten and doped, we had forgotten theology and the Bible. We had forgotten the "truths about the Truth," therefore we lived in "the Truth." It is written, "The Son of man will come in the hour when you do not think and on a day you do not know." We could not think any more. In our darkest hours of torture the Son of man came to us, making the prison walls shine like diamonds and filling the cells with light. Somewhere, far away, were the torturers below us in the sphere of the body. But the spirit rejoiced in the Lord. We would not have given up this joy for that of kingly palaces.

To fight against somebody or something? Nothing was further from my mind than this. I did not wish to fight any wars, even just wars. I wished rather to build living temples to Christ. It was with the hope of quiet years of contemplation ahead that I left prison.

But, from the very day after my release, I was faced with aspects of communism more ugly than all the tortures of prison times had been. One after the other I met great preachers and pastors of the different churches, and even bishops, who simply confessed with great sorrow that they were informers for the secret police against their own flocks. I asked them if they were prepared to give up being informers, even at the risk of being imprisoned themselves. All answered "no," and explained that it was not fear for their own persons which restrained them. They told me of new developments in the churches, things which did not exist before my arrest – that to refuse to be an informer could mean the closing of a church.

In every town there is the representative of the government for control of "cults," a man of the secret Communist police. He has the right to call any priest or pastor whenever he likes and to ask him who has been in church, who takes frequent Communion, who is zealous in religion, who is a soul-winner, what people confess and so on. If you do not answer, you are dismissed and another "minister" is put in your stead who will say more than you do. Where the government representative has no such man (which nearly never happens), he simply closes the church.

Most ministers gave information to the secret police, with the difference that some did it reluctantly, trying to hide certain things, whereas others had got the habit and their consciences were hardened. Still others had acquired a passion for it and said more than was demanded of them.

I heard confessions from children of Christian martyrs who had been obliged to give information about the families in which they had been received with kindness. Otherwise they were threatened with not being able to continue their studies.

I went to the Baptist Congress, a congress under the token of the Red Flag; here the Communists had decided who should be the "elected leaders."

I knew that at the head of all the official churches were men nominated by the Communist party. Then I realized that I was seeing the abomination of desolation in the most Holy Place, about which Jesus speaks.

Always there have been good and bad pastors and preachers. But now, for the first time in Church history, the Central Committee of an avowed atheistic party, which has as its declared purpose the uprooting of religion, decides who leads the Church. To lead it for what purpose? Surely, to help in the uprooting of religion.

Lenin wrote: "Every religious idea, every idea of God, even flirting with the idea of God, is unutterable vileness of the most dangerous kind, contagion of the most abominable kind. Millions of sins, filthy deeds, acts of violence and physical contagion are far less dangerous than the subtle, spiritual idea of a God."

The Communist parties of all the Soviet area are Leninist. To them religion is worse than cancer, tuberculosis or syphilis. They decide who should be the religious leaders. The leaders of the official church cooperate, compromising more or less with them.

I have seen the poisoning of children and youth with atheism, the official churches having not the slightest possibility of counteracting it. In no church in our capital of Bucharest can you find a youth meeting or a Sunday school for children. The children of Christians are brought up in the school of hatred.

And then - seeing all this - I hated communism as I had not hated it under their tortures.

I hated not because of what it had done to me, but because of the wrong it does to the glory of God, to the name of Christ and to the souls of one billion men under its dominion.

Peasants from all over the country came to see me and told me how the collectivization was being conducted. They were now hungry slaves on their own former fields and vineyards. They had no bread. Their children had no milk, no fruit - and this in a country with natural riches which equal those of Canaan of old.

Brethren confessed to me that the Communist regime had made thieves and liars of them all. Out of hunger they had to steal from what was originally their own field, but now belonged to the collective. Then they had to lie to cover their theft.

Workers spoke to me about the terror in the factories and about an exploitation of work-power such as the capitalists never dreamed of. The workers had no right to strike.

Intellectuals had to teach that there is no God, against their inner convictions.

The whole life and thought of one-third of the world has been destroyed or falsified.

page 76 Tortured for Christ

Young girls come to complain that they had been called to the Communist Youth Organization and reproved and threatened because they kissed a boy who was a Christian; and the name of another was given to them whom they might kiss!

Everything was desperately false and ugly.

Then I met the fighters of the Underground Church - my comrades of long ago - some of whom have remained uncaught and others who have taken up the fight again after having been released from prison. They called on me to take up the fight with them. I attended their secret meetings at which they sang from hymnbooks written by hand.

I remembered St. Anthony the Great. He had been thirty years in the desert. He had left the world altogether, passing his whole life in fasting and prayer. But when he heard about the fight between St. Athanasius and Arius about the divinity of Christ, he left the contemplative life and came to Alexandria to help the truth to triumph. I remembered St. Bernard de Clairvaux. He was also a monk high up in the mountains. But he heard about the foolishness of the Crusades, about Christians killing Arabs and Jews and their brethren in faith of another confession, to win an empty tomb. He left his monastery and stepped down from his heights to preach against the Crusades.

I decided to do what all Christians have to do: to follow the examples of Christ, the apostle Paul and the great saints, to give up the thought of retiring and to take up the fight.

  What kind of fight would it be?
  Christians in prison have always prayed for their enemies and have given a beautiful witness to them. The desire of our heart was that they should be saved, and we rejoiced as often as it happened.
  But I hated the evil Communist system and I wished to strengthen the Underground Church, ~the only force which can overthrow this awful tyranny, by the power of the Gospel.~

  I did not think only about Rumania, but also about the entire Communist world.
  But I have met much unconcern in the West.
  Writers around the world protested when two Communist writers - Siniavski and Daniel - were sentenced by their own comrades to prison terms. But not even churches protest when Christians are put in prison for their faith.
  Who cares about Brother Kuzyck sentenced because he committed the crime of distributing "poisonous" Christian publications such as the devotional booklets of Torrey, and Bible portions? Who knows about Brother Prokofiev, sentenced for having distributed printed sermons? Who knows about the Hebrew Christian, Grunvald, sentenced for similar offenses in Russia and from whom the Communists took his little son for life? I know what I felt when I was taken away from my Mihai. And I suffer with Brother Grunvald, Ivanenko, Granny Shevehuk, Taisya Tkachenko, Ekaterina Vekazina, Georgi Vekazin, the couple Pilat in Latvia, and on and on - names of saints and heros of faith in the twentieth century! I bow to kiss their chains, as the first Christians kissed the chains of their fellow Christians when they were led to be thrown before the wild beasts.
  Some Western Church leaders don't care about them. The names of the martyrs are not on their prayer lists. While they were being tortured and sentenced, the Russian Baptist and Orthodox official leaders who had denounced and betrayed them were received with great honor at New Delhi, at Geneva, at other conferences. There they assured everybody that in Russia there is full religious liberty.
  A leader of the World Council of Churches kissed the bolshevik archbishop Nikodim when he gave this assurance. Then they banqueted together in the imposing name of the World Council of Churches, while the saints in prison ate cabbage with unwashed intestines, just as I had eaten in the name of Jesus Christ.

Things could not remain like this. The Underground Church decided that I should leave the country if the possibility were given, and inform you Christians about what is happening.

I have decided to denounce "communism," though I love the "Communists." I don't find it to be right to preach the Gospel without denouncing communism.

Some tell me "Preach the pure Gospel!" This reminds me that the Communist secret police also told me to preach Christ, but not to mention communism. Is it really so, that those who are for what is called "a pure Gospel" are inspired by the same spirit as those of the Communist secret police?

I don't know what this so-called pure Gospel is. Was the preaching of St. John the Baptist pure? He did not say only "Repent, for the Kingdom of heaven is near." He said also "You, Herod are bad." He was beheaded because he didn't confine himself to abstract teaching. Jesus did not preach only the "pure" Sermon on the Mount, but also what some actual church leaders would have called a negative sermon: "Woe unto you, Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites ... generation of vipers!" It is for such "unpure" preaching that He was crucified. The Pharisees would not have bothered about the Sermon on the Mount.

Sin must be called by its name. Communism is the most dangerous sin in the world today. Every Gospel which does not denounce it is not the pure Gospel. The Underground Church denounces it, risking liberty and life. The less have we to be silent in the West.

I have decided to denounce communism, not in the sense in which those who are usually called "anti-Communists" do it. Hitler was an anti-Communist and was notwithstanding a tyrant. We hate the sin and love the sinner.

Why I Suffer in the West

I suffer in the West more than I did in Communist lands.

My suffering consists first of all in the longing after the unspeakable beauties of the Underground Church, the church which fulfills the old Latin saying ~ Nudisnudum Christi sequi~ (naked, follow the naked Christ).

In the Communist camp, the Son of Man and those who are His have nowhere to lay their heads. Christians there don't build houses for themselves. To what good? They will be confiscated at their first arrest. Just the fact that you have a new house can be a greater motive for you to be imprisoned, the Communists wishing to have this house. There you don't bury your father, neither do you say farewell to your family before following Christ. Who is your mother, your brother, your sister? You are, in this respect, like Jesus. Mother and brother are for you only those who fulfill the will of God. As for the natural ties, can they count any more when it is a frequent occurrence that the bride denounces the bridegroom, children their parents, wives their husbands? It is more and more only the spiritual connection which remains.

The Underground Church is a poor and suffering church, but it has no lukewarm members.

A religious service in the Underground Church is like one nineteen hundred years ago in the Early Church. The preacher knows no elaborate theology. He knows no homiletic, as Peter did not know it. Every professor of theology would have given Peter a bad mark for his sermon on the day of Pentecost. The Bible verses are not well known in Communist countries, because Bibles are rare. Besides, the preacher has most likely been in prison for years, without a Bible.

When they express their faith in a Father it means much because there is a drama behind this assertion. In prison they have daily asked this almighty Father for bread and have received instead cabbage with unmentionable filth. Nevertheless they believe God to be the loving Father. They are like Job who said that he would believe in God even if He would slay him. They are like Jesus who called God, "Father," even when He was seemingly forsaken on the cross.

Whoever has known the spiritual beauty of the Underground Church cannot be satisfied any more with the emptiness of some Western churches.

I suffer in the West more than I suffered in a Communist jail because now I see with my own eyes the western civilization dying.

Oswald Spengler wrote in ~Decline of the West~:

"You are dying. I see in You all the characteristic stigma of decay. I can prove that your great wealth and your great poverty, your capitalism and your socialism, your wars and your revolutions, your atheism and your pessimism and your cynicism, your immorality, your broken-down marriages, your birth-control, that is bleeding you from the bottom and killing you off at the top in your brains - can prove to you that there are characteristic marks of the dying ages of ancient states - Alexandria and Greece and neurotic Rome."

This was written in 1926. Since then, democracy and civilization have died already in half of Europe and even as far as Cuba. The rest of the West sleeps.

But there is one force which does not sleep: that of the Communists. Whereas in the East Communists are disappointed and have lost their illusions, in the West communism has remained virulent. The western Communists simply do not believe all the bad reports about the cruelties and the misery and the persecution in the Communist countries. They spread their faith with tireless zeal everywhere, in the lounges of the upper classes, in the clubs of intellectuals, in colleges, in the slums and in the churches. We, Christians, are often half-heartedly on the side of the whole truth. They are whole-heartedly on the side of the lie.

Theologians of the West discuss trifles in the meantime.

It reminds me that, while the troops of Mahomet II surrounded Constantinople in 1493 and it had to be decided if the Balkans would be under Christian or Mohammedan dominion for centuries, a local church council in the besieged city discussed the following problems: What color had the eyes of the holy virgin? What sex have the angels? What happens if a fly falls in sanctified water? Is the fly sanctified or the water polluted? It may be only a legend, as concerns those times. But peruse Church periodicals of today and you will find that just questions like this are discussed. The menace of communism and the sufferings of the Underground Church are scarcely ever mentioned.

There are endless discussions about theological matters, about rituals, about nonessentials.

There was a party in a lounge. One asked: "If you were on a ship which sank and you could escape to an isolated island, having the chance to take with you only one book from the ship's library, which one would you choose?" One answered "the Bible," the other "Shakespeare." But a writer said the right thing: "I would choose a book which could teach me how to make a boat and to arrive on the shore. There I would be free to read whatever I liked."

To keep liberty for all denominations and all theologies and to regain it where it has been lost, because of the Communists persecution, is more important than to insist upon one certain theological opinion.

"The truth sets free," said Jesus. But, the same,

"freedom, only freedom can give the truth." And, instead of quarreling about nonessentials, we should unite in this fight for freedom against the tyranny of communism.

I suffer also, sharing the increasing suffering of the Church behind the Iron Curtain. Having passed through these sufferings I can visualize them.

In June 1966 the Soviet newspaper ~Izvestia~ and ~Dervenskais Jizn~ accused the Russian Baptists of teaching their members to kill children to atone for sins. It is the old accusation of ritual murder such as used to be raised against the Jews.

But I know what this means. I was in the prison of Cluj in Rumania in 1959 with the prisoner Lazarovici, accused of having killed a girl. He was only thirty years old, but his hair had turned white overnight under the tortures. He looked like an old man. He had no fingernails. They had been torn out to make him confess the crime which he had not committed. After a year of torture, his innocence was established and he was released, but freedom meant nothing to him any longer. He was a broken man forever.

Others read a newspaper article and can laugh about the stupid accusations in the Soviet Press against the Baptists. I know what they mean for the accused.

It is horrible to be in the West and to have such images constantly before your eyes.

Where now are the archbishop Yermogen of Kaluga

(USSR) and the other seven bishops who protested against the extremes of cooperation with the Soviet regime as practiced by the patriarch Alexei and the archbishop Nikodim, who are tools in the hands of the Communists? If I had not seen the bishops who protested in Rumania dying near me in prison, I would not be so concerned about these godly bishops.

The ministers Nikolai Eshliman and Gleb Yakunin were disciplined by the patriarch because they asked religious freedom for the church. The West knows this much. But I was in prison with Father Ioan of Vladimireshti, Rumania, to whom the same thing happened. On the surface there was only an ecclesiastical "disciplining." But our official church leaders, like all official church leaders of the Communist countries, work hand in hand with the secret police. Those put under discipline by them are also put under the more efficient"discipline" - tortures, beatings, drugging - of prison.

I tremble because of the sufferings of those persecuted in the Communist camp. I tremble thinking about the eternal destiny of their torturers. ~I tremble for Western Christians who don't help their persecuted brethren.~

In the depth of my heart, I would like to keep the beauty of my own vineyard and not be involved in such a huge fight. I would like so much to be somewhere in quietness and rest. But it is not possible. Communism is on the threshold. When the Communists invaded Tibet they put an end to those who were interested only in completely spiritual matters. In our country they put an end to all who removed themselves from reality. Churches and monasteries were dissolved, keeping only as much as was necessary to dupe foreigners. This quietness and rest for which I long would be an escape from reality and dangerous for my soul, too.

I must lead this fight although it is very dangerous for me personally. If I disappear you may be sure that it will be the Communists who have kidnapped me. They kidnapped me from the street in 1948 and put me in jail under a false name. Ana Pauker, our Secretary of State at that time, said to the Swedish ambassador, Sir Patrick von Reuterswaerde, "Oh, Wurmbrand is now taking walks on the streets of Copenhagen."

The Swedish minister had in his pocket my letter I had succeeded in smuggling out of prison, he knew that he had been told a lie. Such a thing can happen again. If I am killed, the killer will have been appointed by the Communists. Nobody else has any motive to kill me. If you hear rumors about my moral depravity, theft, homosexuality, adultery, political unreliableness, lying or anything else, it will be the fulfilling of the threat of the secret police: "We will destroy you morally."

A very well-informed source tells me that the Rumanian Communists have decided to kill me after the testimony I gave to the U.S. Senate. They will try to kill me bodily or to kill my reputation. They will try to blackmail me by terrorizing my friends in Rumania. They have powerful means.

But I cannot remain silent. And your duty is to examine quietly what I say. Even if you think that, after all I have passed through, I suffer from a persecution complex you must ask yourself what this dreadful power of communism is, which makes its citizens suffer from such complexes. What power is it that makes men from East Germany take a child in a bulldozer and pass through barbed wire at the risk of being shot with their whole family?

The West sleeps and has to be awakened!

Men who suffer seek a scapegoat, somebody on whom to put the guilt. To find such a one eases the burden much. I cannot do it.

I cannot put the guilt on some of the Church leaders of the West who compromise with communism. The evil comes not from them. It is much older. These leaders are themselves the victims of a much older evil. They did not create the mess in the Church. They found it.

Since being in the West, I have visited many theological seminaries. I heard there lectures about the history of bells and the history of liturgical songs, about canonical laws long since disused or about a church discipline which does not exist any more. I have seen students of theology learning that in the Bible the story of creation is not true, nor that of Adam, nor the Flood, nor the miracle of Moses; that the prophecies were written after their fulfillment; that the virgin birth is a myth, likewise the resurrection of Jesus; that His bones have remained somewhere in a grave; that the Epistles are not genuine; that Revelation is the book of a madman, but otherwise the Bible is a Holy Book! (This leaves a holy book in which there are allegedly more lies than in a Communist newspaper!)

That is what present Church leaders learned when they were in seminaries. That is the atmosphere in which they live. Why should they be faithful to a Master about Whom such strange things are said? Why should Church leaders be faithful to a Church in which it can be freely taught that God is dead?

They are leaders of the official Church, not of the Bride of Christ. They are leaders in a Church in which many have long since betrayed the Master. When they meet somebody of the underground, martyr, suffering Church, they look at him as at a strange being.

It is not right to judge men only for one part of their attitude. If we did so, we would be like the Pharisees for whom Jesus was bad. because he did not respect their rules about the Sabbath. They closed their eyes entirely to what would have been lovable in Jesus, even in their sight.

The same Church leaders who have a wrong attitude toward Communism may be right in many other things and may be personally sincere.

And even in what they are wrong, they may change.

I was once with an Orthodox metropolitan in Rumania. He was a man of the Communists, denouncing his own sheep. I took his hand between my hands and told him the parable of the prodigal son. It was on an evening, in his garden. I said, "See with what love God receives a sinner who returns. He receives gladly even a bishop if he repents." I sang him Christian songs. This man was converted.

I was in prison in the same cell with an Orthodox priest who, in the hope of being released, wrote atheistic lectures. I spoke to him and he tore to pieces what he had written, thus risking never to be released.

I can make a scapegoat of nobody and cannot in this manner ease the burden which I have upon my heart.

***

I have another pain. Even very close friends misunderstand me. Some accuse me of bitterness and resentment against the Communists, which I know not to be true.

The Mosaic writer Claude Montefiore said that Jesus' attitude toward Scribes and Pharisees, His public denunciation of them, are contrary to His command to love our enemies and bless those who curse us. And Dr. W. R. Matthews, recently retired Dean of St. Paul's in London, concluded that this is an incoherence and inconsistency in Jesus. He gives the excuse that Jesus was not an intellectual!

Montefiore's impression of Jesus was wrong. Jesus loved the Pharisees, although He denounced them publicly. And I love the Communists, as well as their tools in the Church, although I denounce them.

Constantly I am told: "Forget the Communists! Work only in spiritual things!"

I met with a Christian who had suffered under the Nazis. He told me that he is entirely on my side as long as I witness for Christ, but I should not say one word against communism. I asked him if Christians who fought against Hitlerism in Germany were wrong and if they should have been confined to speaking only from the Bible, without saying a word against the tyrant. The reply was, "But Hitler killed six million Jews! One had to speak against him." I replied, "Communism has killed thirty million Russians and millions of Chinese and others. And they have killed Jews, too. Must we protest only when Jews are killed, and not when Russians are killed?" The answer was, "This is quite another thing" I received no explanation.

I have been beaten by the police in Hitler's time and in Communist times and I could not see any difference. Both were very painful.

Christianity has to fight against many aspects of sin, not only against communism. We are not obsessed by just this one problem.

But communism is at present the greatest foe of Christianity and the most dangerous. Against it, we have to unite.

May I say it again! The goal of man is to become Christlike. To prevent this is the main aim of Communists. They are primarily anti-religious. They believe that after death man becomes salt and minerals, nothing else. They wish the whole life to be lived on the level of matter.

They know only the masses. Their word is that of the demon in the New Testament when asked what his name was: "We are legion." Personality - the greatest gift of God to mankind - has to be crushed. They have imprisoned a man because they found him with a book by Alfred Adler, ~Individual Psychology~. The officers of the secret police shouted, "Ah, individual - always individual! Why not collective?"

Jesus wishes us to be personalities. Therefore there is no possibility of compromise between us and communism. The Communists know it. ~Nauka i Religia~

page 88 Tortured for Christ

(Science and Religion), their magazine writes, "Religion is incompatible with communism. It is hostile to it ... The content of the programme of the Communist Party is a death blow to religion ... It is a programme for the creation of an atheistic society in which people will be rid forever of the religious bondage."

Can Christianity coexist with Communists? Here the Communists answer this question ... "Communism is a death blow to religion."

CHAPTER 5 - THE INVINCIBLE, WIDESPREAD, UNDERGROUND CHURCH

I WILL now speak again about the Underground Church.

It works under very difficult conditions. Atheism is the state religion in all the Communist countries. They give more or less liberty to the way old people believe, but children and youth ~must not believe~. Everything in these countries - radio, television, cinema, theatre, press, publishing houses - has the aim of stamping out belief in God.

The Underground Church has very little means of opposing the huge forces of the totalitarian state. The underground ministers in Russia have had no theological training. There are pastors who have never read a whole Bible.

I will tell you how many have been ordained. We met a young Russian who was a secret minister. I asked him who ordained him. He answered, "We had no real bishop to ordain us. The official bishop would ordain nobody who is not approved by the Communist Party. So ten of us young Christians went to the tomb of a bishop who died as a martyr. Two of us put our hands on his gravestone. The others formed a circle around us and we asked the Holy Spirit to ordain us. We are sure that we were ordained by the pierced hands of Jesus."

For me, this young man's ordination is valid before God!

Men with such ordination, and who have never had any theological training, and who very often know little of the Bible, carry on the work of Christ.

It is like the Church of the first centuries. What seminaries did those who turned the world upside down for Christ have? Did they all know how to read? And from where did they have Bibles? God spoke to them.

We of the Underground Church have no cathedrals. But is any cathedral more beautiful than the sky of heaven to which we looked when we gathered secretly in forests? The chirping of birds took the place of the organ. The fragrance of flowers was our incense. And the shabby suit of a martyr recently freed from prison was much more impressive than priestly robes. We had the moon and stars as candles. The angels were our acolytes who lit them.

~I can neither describe the beauty of this Church!~

Often, after a secret service, Christians are caught and sent to prison. There Christians wear chains with the gladness with which a bride wears a precious jewel received from her beloved. The waters in prison are still. You receive His kiss and His embraces and you would not change places with kings. I have found truly jubilant Christians only in the Bible, in the Underground Church and in prison.

The Underground Church is oppressed, but it also has many friends - even among the secret police; even among members of the government. Sometimes these secret believers protect the Underground Church.

Recently, Russian newspapers complained of the growing numbers of "outward nonbelievers." These, the Russian press explained, are countless men and women who work in the very echelons of Communist power - in government offices, in propaganda departments and everywhere - who outwardly are Communists, but inwardly are secret believers and members of the Underground Church.

The Communist press told the story of a young woman who worked in the Communist propaganda department. After work, they said, she would go to her apartment and meet her husband coming from his job. After dinner, she and her husband would gather a group of young people from other apartments in their building and have secret Bible studies and prayer meetings. ~This is happening throughout the Communist world.~ Tens of thousands of such "outward non-believers" exist in every Communist land. They feel it wiser not to attend the show-churches where they will be watched and hear only a watered-down Gospel. Instead, they stay in the positions of authority and responsibility they occupy and from there quietly and effectively witness for Christ.

The faithful Underground Church has thousands of members in such places. They have secret meetings in basements, attics, apartments and homes.

In Russia no one remembers any more the arguments for or against child or adult baptism, for or against papal infallibility. They are not pre- or post-millennialists. They cannot interpret prophecies and don't quarrel about them, but I wonder very often how well they could prove to atheists the existence of God.

Their answers to atheists are simple "If you were invited to a feast with all kinds of good meats, would you believe that there has been nobody to cook them? But nature is a banquet prepared for us! You have tomatoes and peaches and apples and milk and honey. Who has prepared all these things for mankind? Nature is blind. If you believe in no God, how can you explain that blind nature succeeded in preparing just the things which we need in such plenitude and variety?"

They can prove that eternal life exists. I heard one pleading with an atheist: "Suppose that we could speak with an embryo in his mother's womb and that you would tell him that the embryonic life is only a short one after which follows a real long life. What would the embryo answer? He would say just what you atheists answer to us, when we speak to you about paradise and hell. He would say that the life in the mother's womb is the only one and that everything else is religious foolishness. But if the embryo could think, he would say to himself, 'Here arms grow on me. I do not need them. I cannot even stretch them. Why do they grow? Probably for a future stage of my existence, in which I will have to work with them. Legs grow, but I have to keep them bent toward my breast. Why do they grow? Probably life in a large world follows, where I will have to walk. Eyes grow, although I am surrounded by perfect darkness and don't need them. Why do I get eyes? Probably a world with light and colors will follow.' So, if the embryo would reflect about his own development, he would know about a life outside his mother's womb, without having seen it. It is the same with us. As long as we are young, we have vigor, but no mind to use it aright. When, with the years, we have grown in knowledge and wisdom, the hearse waits to take us to the grave. Why was it necessary to grow in a knowledge and wisdom which we can use no more? Why do arms, legs and eyes grow to an embryo? ~It is for what follows.~ So it is with us here. We grow here in experience, knowledge, wisdom for what follows. We are prepared to serve on a higher level which follows death."

About Jesus, the official Communist doctrine is that He never existed. The workers of the Underground Church answer this easily: "What newspaper have you in your pocket? Is it the ~Pravda~ of today or yesterday? Let me have a look. Aha! January 4, 1964. 1964 counted from when? From the One who did not exist or played no role? You say He never existed, but you count the years from His birth. Time existed before Him. But when He came, it seemed to mankind that everything which had been before had been vain and that the real time began only now. Your Communist newspaper itself is a proof that Jesus is not a fiction."

Pastors in the West usually assume that those whom they have in church are really convinced about the main truths of Christianity, which they are not. You rarely hear a sermon proving the truth of our faith. But behind the Iron Curtain, men who have never learned to do it give their converts a very serious foundation.

There is no clear partition-wall by which you could say where the Underground Church, which is the main stronghold of Christianity, ends and the official Church begins. They are ~interwoven. Many pastors of the show-churches carry on a secret parallel ministry going far beyond the limitations put on them by the Communists.~

The official Church, the church of collaborators with the Communists, has a long history.

It began immediately after the Russian Socialist Revolution with the "Living Church," headed by a bishop called Sergius.

One of his collaborators declared that "Marxism is the gospel written with atheist letters." What nice theology.

We have had some such Sergius in every country.

In Hungary, among the Catholics, it was Father Balogh. He and some Protestant ministers helped the Communists take complete control of the state.

In Rumania, the Communists came to power with the help of an Orthodox priest called Burducea, a former Fascist, who had to make up to the Reds for his past sins by becoming even more "Red" than his bosses. This priest stood near Vishinski, the Soviet Secretary of State, and smiled in an approving manner when the latter declared at the installation of the new Communist government: "This government will build an earthly paradise and you will no longer need a heavenly one.

As to those like Nikodeme of Russia, it is on record that they are informers for the government. Major Deriabin, a defector from the Russian Secret Police, testified that Nikolai was their agent.

This is the situation in nearly all denominations. The present leadership of the Rumanian Baptists was imposed by force. It denounces the real Christians. In Russia the leadership of the Baptists does the same. The president of the Rumanian Adventists, Tachici, told me that he had been an informer of the Communist secret police from the very first day of their coming to power.

Rather than close every church - though they have closed many thousands - the Communists shrewdly decided to permit a few "token" official churches to remain open and use them as windows through which to observe, control and eventually destroy Christians and Christianity. They decided it would be better to let the structure of the Church remain and turn it into a Communist tool for the control of Christians and as a means to deceive visitors coming to their lands. I was offered such a church on the condition that I, as pastor, would report on my members to the secret police. It seems that Westerners, accustomed to all "blacks and whites" - all one way or all another - cannot understand this. But the Underground Church will never accept token, controlled churches as a substitute for meaningful, effective evangelism "to every creature" - including youth.

But in the official churches there is a real spiritual life in spite of many treacherous leaders. (I have the impression that in many churches of the West the situation is similar. The congregations are faithful sometimes not because of, but in spite of their top leaders.)

The Orthodox liturgy has remained unchanged, and it feeds the hearts of the members of this church, even if the sermons flatter the Communists. The Lutherans, Presbyterians and other Protestants sing the same old hymns. And then, even the sermons of the informers have to contain something of Scripture. People are converted under the influence of men whom they know to be traitors, about whom they know that they will tell the secret police their conversions, who have to hide their faith from the very one who gave them this faith by his corrupted sermon. This is the great miracle of God cited in LEV 11:37 in symbolic language: "If any part of a carcase (which is, according to the Mosaic law, defiled) fall upon any sowing seed which is to be sown, it shall be clean."

Faimess obliges us to say that not all the official Church leaders, not even all the official top leaders are men of the Communists.

Members of the Underground Church are also very prominent in the official churches, except for some who have to keep themselves hidden. And they see to it that Christianity is not wishy-washy, but a fighting faith. When the secret police came to close down the monastery of Vladimireshti in Rumania and others in many places in Russia, they had a hard time. Some Communists have paid with their lives for the crime of trying to forbid religion.

But the official churches are becoming fewer and fewer. I wonder if in the whole of the Soviet Union there are still five or six thousand churches. (The United States, with the same population, has some three hundred thousand.) And these "churches" are most often only tiny rooms - not a "church" as we picture it. Foreign visitors see a crowded church in Moscow - which is the only Protestant church in the city - and remark what freedom there is. "Even the churches are overflowing!" they joyously report. They do not see the tragedy of one Protestant church for seven million souls! And not even the one-room churches are within traveling distance of eighty per cent of the people of the Soviet Union. These multitudes must either be forgotten - or reached with underground methods of evangelism. There is no other choice.

The more communism dominates in a country, the more the Church will have to be underground.

In place of closed official churches come the meetings of the anti-religious organizations.

How the Underground Church "Feeds" on Atheist Literature

But the underground Church knows how to use these, too. First of all, it feeds upon the atheist literature, just as Elijah was fed by ravens. The atheists put much skill and zeal into ridiculing and criticizing Bible verses.

They published books called ~The Comical Bible~ and ~The Bible for Believers and Unbelievers~. They tried to show how stupid Bible verses are and, to do so, quoted many Bible verses. How we rejoiced over it! The criticism was so stupid that nobody took it seriously. But the book was printed in millions of copies and it was full of Bible verses which were unspeakably beautiful, even when the Communists ridiculed them. In the past, "heretics" burned by the Inquisition were taken to the stake in a procession, dressed in all kinds of ridiculous clothes with hell-flames and devils painted on them. And what saints were these heretics! So Bible verses remain true, even if the Devil quotes them.

The Communist publishing house was very glad to receive thousands of letters asking for reprints of atheist books, which quoted Bible verses to mock them. They did not know that these letters came from the Underground Church, which had no other opportunity of getting the Scriptures.

We also knew well how to use the atheistic meetings.

A professor of communism demonstrated at a meeting that Jesus was nothing but a magician. The professor had before him a pitcher of water. He put a powder in it and it became red. "This is the whole miracle," he explained. "Jesus had hidden in his sleeves a powder like this, and then pretended to have changed water into wine in a wonderful manner. But I can do even better than Jesus: I can change the wine into water again." And he put another powder in the liquid. It became white. Then another powder and it was red again.

A Christian stood up and said, "You have amazed us, comrade professor, by what you are able to do. We would ask only one thing more of you - drink a bottle of your wine!" The professor said, "This I cannot do. The powder was a poison." The Christian replied, "This is the whole difference between you and Jesus. He, with His wine, has given us joy for two thousand years, whereas you poison us with your wine." The Christian went to prison. But news of the incident spread very far and strengthened faith.

We are weak little Davids. But we are stronger than the Goliath of atheism, because God is on our side. The truth belongs to us.

On one occasion a Communist lecturer was giving a lecture in atheism. All workers in the factory were required to attend; among these workers were many Christians. They sat quietly hearing all the arguments against God and about the stupidity of believing in Christ. The lecturer proceeded to prove there is no spiritual world, no God, no Christ, no hereafter, man is only matter with no soul. He said over and over that only matter exists.

A Christian stood up and asked if he could say something. Permission was given. The Christian picked up his folding chair and threw it down. He paused, looking at it. He then walked up and slapped the Communist lecturer in the face. The lecturer was very angry. His face flushed red with indignation. He shouted obscenities and called for fellow-Communists to arrest the Christian. He demanded, "How did you dare to slap me? What is the reason?"

The Christian replied, "You have just proved yourself a liar. You said everything is matter ... nothing else. I picked up a chair and threw it down. It is truly matter. The chair did not become angry. It is only matter. When I slapped you, you did not react like the chair. You reacted differently. Matter does not get mad or angry, but you did. Therefore, comrade professor, you are wrong. Man is more than matter. We are spiritual beings!"

In countless such ways ordinary Christians of the Underground Church disproved elaborate atheistic arguments.

In prison, the political officer asked me harshly, "How long will you continue to keep your stupid religion?" I said to him, "I have seen innumerable atheists regretting on their deathbeds that they have been godless; they called on Christ. Can you imagine that a Christian could regret, when death is near, that he has been a Christian and call on Marx or Lenin to rescue him from his faith?" He began to laugh - "A clever answer." I continued, "When an engineer has built a bridge the fact that a cat can pass over the bridge is no proof that the bridge is good. A train must pass over it to prove its strength. The fact that you can be an atheist when everything goes well does not prove the truth of atheism. It does not hold up in moments of great crisis." I used Lenin's books to prove to him that, even after becoming prime minister of the Soviet Union, Lenin himself prayed when things went wrong.

We are quiet and can quietly await the development of events. It is the Communists who are unquiet and launch new anti-religious campaigns. By this they prove what St. Augustine said, "Uneasy is the heart until it rests in Thee."

Why Even Communists Can Be Won

The Underground Church, if helped by you, free Christians, will win the hearts of the Communists and will change the face of the world. It will win them, because it is unnatural to be a Communist. Even a dog wishes to have his own bone. The hearts of Communists rebel against the role they have to play and the absurdities they have to believe.

When individual Communists asserted that matter is everything, that we are a handful of chemicals organized in a certain fashion and that after death we will again be salt and minerals, it was enough to ask them, "How is it that Communists in so many countries have given their lives for their ideal? Does a 'handful of chemicals' have ideals? Can 'minerals' sacrifice themselves for the good of others?" To this they have no answer.

And then the brutality! Men were not created as brutes and cannot bear to be brutes for long. We have seen it in the collapse of Nazi rulers, some of whom committed suicide, while some repented and confessed their crimes.

There is something positive in the enormous amount of drunkenness in Communist countries. There is the longing for a wider life, which communism cannot give. The average Russian is a deep, great-hearted, generous person. Communism is shallow and superficial. He seeks the deep life and, finding it nowhere else, he seeks it in alcohol. He expresses in alcoholism his horror about the brutal and deceiving life he has to live. For a few moments alcohol sets him free, as truth would set him free forever if he could know it.

In Bucharest, during the Russian occupation, I once felt an irresistible impulse to enter a tavern. I called my wife to go with me. When I went inside I saw a Russian captain with a gun in his hand threatening everybody and asking for more to drink. This had been refused him, because he was already very drunk. People were in panic. I went to the owner - who knew me - and asked him to give liquor to the captain, promising that I would sit with him and see that he kept quiet. One bottle of wine after another was given to us. On the table were three glasses. The captain always politely filled all three ... and drank all three. My wife and I did not drink. Although he was very drunk, his mind worked. He was used to alcohol. I spoke to him about Christ and he listened with unexpected attention.

In the end, he said, "Now you have told me who you are, I will tell you who I am. I am an Orthodox priest who was among the first to deny my faith when the great persecution under Stalin began. I went from village to village to give lectures saying that there is no

God and that as a priest I had been a deceiver. 'I am a deceiver and so are all the other ministers,' I told them. I was very much appreciated for my zeal, so I became an officer of the secret police. My punishment from God was that with this hand I had to kill Christians, after having tortured them. And now I drink and drink to forget what I have done. But it does not work."

Many Communists commit suicide. So did their greatest poets Essenin and Maiakovski. So did their great writer Fadeev. He had just finished his novel called ~Happiness~ in which he had explained that happiness consists in working restlessly for communism. He was so happy about it that he shot himself after having finished the novel. It was too difficult for his soul to bear such a big lie. Joffe, Tomkin - great Communist leaders and fighters for communism in Czarist times - could not bear to see how communism looks in reality. They also ended in suicide.

Communists are unhappy. So are even their great dictators. How unhappy Stalin was! After having killed nearly all his old comrades, he was constantly in fear of being poisoned or killed himself. He had eight bedrooms which could be locked up like safes in a bank. Nobody ever knew in which of these bedrooms he slept on any given night. He never ate unless the cook tasted the food in his presence. Communism makes nobody happy, not even its dictators. They need Christ.

By overthrowing communism we would free not only the victims of communism, but the Communists themselves.

The Underground Church represents the deepest need of our enslaved peoples. Help her!

***

The distinctive feature of the Underground Church is its earnestness in faith.

A minister who disguises himself under the name of "George" tells in his book about God's Underground the following incident:

A Russian Army captain came to a minister in Hungary and asked to see him alone. The boy was very young and brash, and very conscious of his role as a conqueror. When he had been led to a small conference room and the door was closed, he nodded toward the cross that hung on the wall.

"You know that thing is a lie," he said to the minister. "It's just a piece of trickery you ministers use to delude the poor people to make it easier for the rich to keep them ignorant. Come now, we are alone! Admit to me that you never really believed that Jesus Christ was the Son of God!"

The minister smiled. "But, my poor young man, of course I believe it. It is true."

"I won't have you play these tricks on me!" cried the captain. "This is serious. Don't laugh at me!"

He drew out his revolver and held it close to the body of the minister.

"Unless you admit to me that it is a lie, I'll fire!"

"I cannot admit that, for it is not true. Our Lord is really and truly the Son of God," said the minister.

The captain flung his revolver on the floor and embraced the man of God. Tears sprang to his eyes.

"It is ~true~!" he cried. ~"It is true.~ I believe so too, but I could not be sure men would die for this belief until I found it out for myself. Oh, thank you! You have strengthened my faith. Now I too can die for Christ. You have shown me how."

I have known other such cases. When the Russians occupied Rumania, two armed Russian soldiers entered a church with their guns in their hands. They said, "We don't believe in your faith. Those who do not abandon it immediately will be shot at once! Those who abandon your faith move to the right!" Some moved to the right. These were ordered to leave the church and go home. They fled for their lives. When the Russians were alone with the remaining Christians, they embraced them and told them, "We too are Christians, but we wished to have fellowship only with those who consider the truth worth dying for."

Such men fight for the Gospel in our countries. And they fight not only for the Gospel. They are also the fighters for liberty.

In the homes of many western Christians hours are sometimes spent listening to worldly music. In our houses loud music can also be heard, but it is only to cover the talk about the Gospel and the underground work so that neighbors may not overhear it and inform the secret police.

How they rejoice when rarely they meet a serious Christian from the West!

The one who writes these lines is only an insignificant man. But I am the voice of those who are voiceless; of those who are muzzled and never represented in the West. In their name I ask great seriousness in faith and in handling the problems of Christianity. In their name I ask your prayers and practical help for the faithful, suffering Underground Church in Communist lands.

***

We ~shall~ win the Communists. First, because God is on our side.

Secondly, because our message corresponds to the deepest needs of the heart.

Communists who had been in prison under the Nazis confessed to me that they prayed in difficult hours. I have even seen Communist officers die with the words "Jesus, Jesus," on their lips.

We shall win because all the cultural inheritance of our people is on our side. The Russians can forbid all the writings of modern Christians. But there are the books of Tolstoy and Dostoievsky, and people find the light of Christ there. So it is with Goethe in Eastern Germany, Sienkiewicz in Poland, and others. The greatest Rumanian writer was Sadoveanu. The Communists have published his book ~The Lives of Saints~, under the title ~The Legend of Saints~. But even under this title the example of the lives of saints inspires.

They cannot exclude reproductions of Raphael, Michelangelo, Leonardo da Vinci from the history of the arts. These pictures speak of Christ.

When I speak with a Communist about Christ the deepest spiritual need in his heart is my ally - my helper. The greatest difficulty for him is not to answer my arguments. His great difficulty is to quiet down the voice of his own conscience, which is on my side.

I have personally known professors of Marxism who, before delivering an atheistic lecture, prayed to God that He might help them in this! I have known of Communists going to a secret meeting far away. When they were found out, they denied that they had been in an underground meeting. Then they wept, regretting that they had not had the courage to stand for the faith which compelled them to attend. They are men, too.

Once the individual has arrived at faith - even a very primitive faith - this faith develops and grows. We are sure that it will conquer because we of the Underground Church have seen it conquer again and again.

The Communists are loved by Christ. They can and must be won for Christ. They can be won only by the Underground Church behind the Iron Curtain. Whoever wishes to satisfy the longing of the heart of Jesus for the salvation of the souls of all mankind should sustain the Underground Church in her work. Jesus said, "teach all nations." He never said stop at the Iron Curtain. Faithfulness to God and the Great Commission compels us to reach beyond the Iron Curtain - to the one out of every three men enslaved under communism.

We can reach them by working with the Underground Church already there!

Three Groups Make Up the Underground Church:

First - Pastors and Ministers Removed by Communists

Three groups make up the Underground Church in Communist lands. The first group is the thousands upon thousands of former pastors and ministers who have been turned out of their churches and removed from their flocks because they would not compromise the Gospel. Many such former pastors and ministers have been imprisoned for years and tortured for their faith. They have been released ... and have promptly resumed their ministry - secretly and effectively ministering in the Underground Church. Though the Communists closed their churches or replaced them with more "reliable" ministers, they continue their ministry more effectively than ever by ministering secretly in underground meetings in barns, attics, basements, hay fields at night - or anywhere believers gather secretly. These men are "living martyrs" who will not cease their ministry and who risk more torture and re-arrest.

Second - the Lay Church

The second part of the Underground Church is the vast army of dedicated laymen and laywomen. It must be understood that there are no nominal, halfhearted, lukewarm Christians in Russia or China. The price Christians pay is far too great. The next point to remember is that persecution has always produced a better Christian - a witnessing Christian, a soul-winning Christian. Communist persecution has backfired and produced serious, dedicated Christians such as are rarely seen in free lands. These people cannot understand how anyone can be a Christian and not want to win every soul they meet.

The Red Star (the Russian Army newspaper) attacked the Russian Christians, saying, "the worshippers of Christ like to get their greedy claws on everyone." But their shining Christian lives win them the love and respect of their fellow villagers and neighbors. In any village or town, the Christians are the most liked, beloved residents. When a mother is too ill to care for her children, it is the Christian mother who comes over and looks after them. When a man is too ill to cut his firewood, it is the Christian man who does it for him. They "live" their Christianity - and when they begin to witness for Christ the people listen and believe - because they have seen Christ in their lives. Since no one but a licensed minister can speak up in a church, the millions of fervent, dedicated Christians in every corner of the Communist world win souls, witness and minister in market places, at the village water pumps - anywhere they go. Communist newspapers admit that Christian butchers slip Gospel tracts in the wrapping paper of the meat they sell. The Communist press admits that Christians working in places of authority in Communist printing houses slip back in late at night, start their presses up and run off a few thousand pieces of Christian literature - and lock up again before the sun rises. The Communist press also admits that Christian children in Moscow have received Gospels from "some source" and then copy portions by hand. The children then place the portions in the pockets of their teachers' overcoats which hang in school closets. The vast body of laymen and laywomen are a very powerful, effective, soul-winning missionary force already in every Communist land.

In Communist Cuba, former missionaries have stated that a secret "lay church" is emerging since all true ministers have been arrested or persecuted and replaced with Communist "ministers."

These millions of dedicated, true and fervent Believers in the lay church have been purified by the very fires of persecution which the Communists hoped would destroy them.

Third - Official Pastors and Ministers Who Will Not be Bridled or Silenced

The third vital part of the Underground Church is the large body of faithful pastors in the official, but bridled and silenced "churches." The Underground Church is not something completely separate from the official church. In many Communist lands, such as Yugoslavia, Poland and Hungary, many of the pastors of the official churches secretly work in the Underground

Church. In some countries there is an interweaving between the two. These pastors are not allowed to speak about Christ outside their tiny, one-room churches. They are not allowed to have children's meetings or youth meetings. Non-Christians are afraid to come. The pastors are not allowed to pray for ill church members in their homes. They are fenced in on every side by Communist regulations which make their "churches" all but meaningless. Very often these pastors, faced with controls which make mockery of "freedom of religion," courageously risk their liberty by carrying on a parallel secret ministry which goes far beyond the Communist limitations. These pastors carry on secret ministry to children and youth. They evangelize secretly in Christian homes and basements. They secretly receive and distribute Christian literature to hungry souls. They risk their freedom by secretly ignoring the official limitations and ministering to hungry souls all around them. Seemingly docile and obedient on the surface, they risk their lives to secretly spread the Word of God. Many such men as these were recently discovered and arrested in Russia. They received several years of imprisonment.

They are the vital parts of the Underground Church.

Former ministers - turned out and persecuted by the Communists; the lay church; official pastors who secretly carry on a much larger and extensive ministry than they are permitted - all these are working in the Underground Church. And the Underground Church will last until communism is defeated. In some lands, one part is more active than another - but all are there, working for Christ at a great risk.

A man who travels frequently in Communist lands and who is very interested in religious questions came back and wrote that he never met any Underground Church.

It is like traveling in Central Africa among uneducated tribes and coming back saying, "I inquired thoroughly. I asked them all if they speak prose. They all told me that they don't." The truth is that they all speak prose not knowing that what they speak is prose.

The Christians of the first decades did not know they were Christians. If you had asked them about their religion, they would have answered you that they were Jews, Israelites, believers in Jesus as Messiah, brethren, saints, children of God. The name "Christian" was applied to them by others much later, for the first time in Antioch.

None of the followers of Luther knew he was a Lutheran. Luther protested with energy against this name.

"Underground Church" is a name given by the Communists, as well as by Western researchers of the religious situation in the East to a secret organization which formed spontaneously in all Communist lands. The members of the Underground Church don't call their organization by this name. They call themselves Christians, believers, children of God. But they lead an underground work, they meet underground, they spread the Gospel in clandestine meetings, attended sometimes by the very foreigners who claim that they did not see the Underground Church. It is an adequate name given by the adversaries and by those who look lovingly from the outside to this wonderful secret organization.

You can travel years throughout the West never meeting a Soviet spy-net, which does not mean that this spy-net does not exist. It is not so stupid as to show itself to the curious travelers.

In the next chapter I quote some excerpts from the Soviet press proving the existence and growing importance of this courageous Underground Church.

page 109 Tortured for Christ

HOW CHRISTIANITY IS DEFEATING COMMUNISM

I HAVE told of our own experience in spreading Christ's message secretly in the Soviet army as well as in Communist Rumania.

I have appealed to you to help preach Christ to the Communists and to the people oppressed by them.

Is my challenge "visionary" and "unworkable"?

Is it realistic?

Does the Underground Church exist now in Russia and other lands? Is underground work still possible there now?

To these questions we can answer with very good news.

The Communists are celebrating half a century of Communist rule. But their victory is a defeat. Christianity has won - not communism. The Russian press, which our organization researches thoroughly, is full of information on the Underground Church. For the first time, the Underground Church has become so strong that it works even semi-publicly, frightening the Communists. And information which we have from other sources confirms the reports of the Communist press.

Remember, the Underground Church is like an iceberg! It is mostly below the surface, but a small part is often in the open.

In the following pages I give a short compilation of the most important news.

page 110 Tortured for Christ

The Tip of the Iceberg

On November 7, 1966, in Suhumi (Caucasus), the Underground Church held a great meeting under the open skies. Many Believers came from other cities to attend this meeting. After the altar-call, forty-seven young people accepted Christ and were baptized on the spot in the Black Sea, just as in Biblical times.

There was no period of instruction before. After fifty years of Communist dictatorship, having no Bibles or other Christian books and having no seminaries, the ministers of the Underground Church are not trained theologians. But neither was Philip, the deacon. And when a eunuch, with whom he had spoken perhaps only for an hour, asked him, "See, here is water, what hinders me to be baptized?" Philip said "If thou believest with all thine heart, thou mayest." So they immediately went down to the water and the convert was baptized. (ACT 8:36-38)

There is water enough in the Black Sea, and the Underground Church has begun again the practices of the Biblical time.

~Uchitelskaia Gazeta~ (The Teacher's Magazine) of August 23, 1966 gives the news that, in Rostov-on-Don Baptists who refuse to register their congregation according to the laws and to obey their so-called "leaders" appointed by the Communists, organized a demonstration in the streets.

It was on the first of May. As Jesus did his miracles on the Sabbath days to defy his Pharisaic opponents, the Underground Church chooses Communist celebration days for defying the Communist laws.

The first of May is a feast on which the Communists always have their great demonstrations, which everybody is compelled to attend. But this time, the second big force in Russia - the Underground Church - also appeared on the streets that day.

page 111 Tortured for Christ

Fifteen hundred Believers came. What impelled them was the love of God. They knew that they risked their liberty. They knew that in prison starvation and torture awaited them.

Every Believer in Russia knows the "Secret Manifesto" printed by the Evangelical Christians in Barnaul, in which it is described how sister Hmara, of the village of Kulunda, received the news that her husband had died in prison. Now she was a widow with four small children. When she received the corpse of her husband, she could see the prints of manacles on his hands. The hands, fingers, and the bottom of his feet were horribly burned. The lower part of the stomach had knife marks on it. The right foot was swollen. On both feet were signs of beating. The whole body was full of wounds from a horrible beating.

Every Believer who came to the public demonstration in Rostov-on-Don knew this could be his fate too. Still they came.

But they also knew that this martyr, who had given his life for God only three months after his conversion, was buried before a great crowd of Believers who had placards with the inscription:

"For me to live is Christ and to die is gain."

"Do not fear those who kill the body, but who cannot kill the soul!"

"I saw under the altar those killed for the Word of God."

The example of this martyr inspired those in Rostov-on-Don. They crowded around a little house. People were everywhere - some on the nearby roofs, others in the trees, like Zaccheus in times of old. Eighty people were converted, mostly young people. Out of this number, twenty-three were former Komsomols (members of the Communist Youth Organization)!

The Believers crossed the entire city walking toward the river Don, where the baptisms took place.

page 112 Tortured for Christ

Automobiles loaded with Communist police arrived and surrounded the Believers on the bank of the river. They wanted to arrest the brethren in charge. (They couldn't arrest all fifteen hundred!) The Believers immediately fell to their knees and, in a fervent prayer, prayed God to defend His people and permit them to have their service for that day. Then the brothers and sisters - standing shoulder to shoulder - surrounded the brethren leading the service, hoping to prevent the police from arresting them. The situation became very tense.

~UchiteLskaia Gazeta~ reports that the "illegal" Baptist organization in Rostov has an underground printing press. (The word "Baptist" in Russia includes Evangelicals and Pentecostals.) Publications are printed in which youth are called to stand for their faith. In one of these underground publications, Christian parents are asked to do what I also think is a very good thing: "to take their children to attend burials in order to learn not to worry about transitory things." Parents are asked also to give a Christian education to their children as an antidote against the atheism with which they are poisoned in Communist schools.

~Uchitelskaia Gazeta~ finishes the article by asking: "Why do teachers mix so timidly in the life of families in which children are ~idiotized~ (by religion)?"

This "Teachers Magazine" also describes what happened at the trial of the underground workers who had baptized secretly.

"The youthful believers called as witnesses were defiant and contemptuous of the Communist court. They behaved angrily and fanatically. Young women spectators gazed with ~admiration~ at the defendants and with disapproval at the atheistic public."

Members of the Underground Church have risked beatings and imprisonment to appeal for more freedom, in front of the Communist Party headquarters in Russia.

We possess a secret document by the "illegal" Committee of the Evangelical Baptist Churches of the Soviet Union, as opposed to the Communist-controlled "Baptist Union," led by the traitor Karev, who praises the humanity of the Communist mass-killers of Christians and magnifies the "liberty" reigning there in ~Soviet Life Today~ (No. 6, 1963). The document has been smuggled to the West by secret channels.

In it we are told about another heroic public demonstration, this time in Moscow itself.

I translate from this manifesto:

"~Urgent communication.~

"Beloved Brethren and Sisters, Blessings to you and peace from God our Father and our Lord Jesus Christ.

"We hasten to tell you that the delegates of the churches of Evangelical Baptist Christians, numbering five hundred, who traveled to Moscow on May 16, 1966 for intervention with the central organs of power, went to the building of the Central Committee for the Communist Party of the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics, with the request to be received and heard.

"We handed a petition addressed to the general secretary, Brezhnev."

In the manifesto it is said further that these five hundred men stood the whole day before the building. It was the first public demonstration in Moscow against communism. And it was made by the delegation of the Underground Church. At the end of the day they handed a second petition addressed to Brezhnev, in which they complained that a certain "comrade" Stroganov refused to transmit their request to Brezhnev, and threatened them.

The five hundred delegates remained on the streets the whole night. Cars drove by to throw dirt and mud on them and they were insulted. Although it rained and they were treated like this, they remained until morning in front of the building of the Communist Party!

On the next day it was proposed that the five hundred brethren should enter a building to meet some minor Communist officials, but "knowing that Believers who had visited the authorities were often beaten when they entered a building where there were no witnesses, the delegation refused unanimously and continued to wait to be received by Brezhnev."

Then the inevitable happened.

At 1:45 p.m., twenty-eight buses came and the brutal revenge against the Believers began. "We formed a ring and holding,each other's hand, we sang the hymn, ~The best days of our life are the days when we can bear a cross.~ The men of the secret police began to beat us, the young and old ones. They took men out of the row and beat them on the face, the head, and threw them on the asphalt. They dragged some of the brethren to the buses by the hair of their heads. When some tried to leave, they were beaten until they lost consciousness. After having filled the buses with Believers, they were taken to an unknown place. The songs of our brethren and sisters were heard from the secret police buses. All this happened in the sight of a multitude of men."

And now something more beautiful follows. After the five hundred were arrested and surely tortured, Brother G. Vins and another leading brother, Horev, (the real shepherds of Christ's flock) still had the courage to go to the same Central Committee of the Communist Party - just as after the arrest of St. John the Baptist, Jesus began His public preaching in the same place and with the same words for which John the Baptist suffered: "Repent, for the Kingdom of Heaven is at hand." (MTT 4:17)

Vins and Horev asked where the arrested delegation was and demanded their release. These two courageous brethren simply disappeared. Afterward, the news was received that they were put in Leftorovskaia prison.

Were these Christians of the Underground Church afraid? No! Others immediately risked their liberty again, publishing the manifesto which we have before us, telling the story of what happened, saying that to them, "For unto you is given in the behalf of Christ, not only to believe on him but also to suffer for his sake." (PHP 1:29) They exhort the brethren "that no man should be moved by these afflictions, for yourselves know that we are appointed thereunto." (1TH 3:3) They also quote HEB 12:2 and call the Believers to look "unto Jesus, the author and finisher of our faith, who for the joy that was set before him, endured the cross, despising the shame."

The Underground Church has openly opposed the atheistic poisoning of youth in Rostov, and in Moscow - and all across Russia. They are fighting against the Communist poison and against the treacherous leaders of the official church, about which they write in one of their secret manifestos: "In our day, Satan dictates and 'the church' accepts all the decisions which are contrary to the commandments of God." (Quoted in ~Pravda Ukraini~ of October 4, 1966.)

~Pravda Vostoka~ published the trial against the brethren Alexei Neverov, Boris Garmashov and Axen Zubov, who organized groups to listen to Gospel broadcasts from America. They recorded these messages on tapes, which they circulated afterwards.

They were also accused of having organized secret Gospel meetings under the forms of "excursions" and "artistic circles." Thus the Underground Church works - just as the Early Church worked in the catacombs of Rome.

~Sovietskaia Moldavia~ of September 15, 1966, also complains that the Underground Church mimeographs booklets. They gather together in public places, although this is forbidden by law, and go from place to place to witness for Christ.

This same newspaper recounts that in the train from Reni to Chisinau, three young boys and four girls sang a Christian hymn "Let us dedicate our youth to Christ." The reporter professed himself revolted, because these Believers preach "on the streets, in stations, in trains, buses and even in state institutions." Again this is the Underground Church at work in Russia today.

When at the trial of these Christians the sentence was announced for the crime of singing Christian hymns in public, the condemned fell on their knees and said, "We surrender ourselves into the hands of God. We thank thee, Lord, that Thou hast allowed us to suffer for this faith." Then the audience, led by the "fanatic" Madan, sang in the courtroom the hymn for which their brethren had just been sentenced to prison and torture.

On the first of May, the Christians of the villages Copceag and Zaharovka, having no churches, organized a divine service secretly in the forest!

They also organize meetings under the pretense that they are having a birthday party. (Many Christian families with four or five members will have thirty-five "birthdays" a year as a cover for secret meetings.)

No prison and no torture can frighten the Christians of the Underground Church. Just as in the Early Church, persecution only deepens their dedication.

~Pravda Ukraini~ of October 4, 1966, said about Brother Prokofiev – one of the leaders of the Russian Underground Church – that he has already been in prison three times, but as soon as he is released, he begins to organize secret Sunday schools again. Now he is arrested again.

He wrote in a secret manifesto: "Submitting to the human regulations (he means the Communist laws), the official church has deprived itself of the blessing of God."

And never imagine a prison as in the West when you hear about a sentenced Russian brother. Prison there means starvation, torture and brainwashing.

~Nauka i Religia~ (Science and Religion) No. 9 of 1966 reports that the Christians spread Gospel Literature inside covers of ~Ogoniok~ – a periodical like ~Look~ or ~Time~. They hand out books on the cover of which you see ~Anna Karenina~, a novel by Leo Tolstoy. Inside is a portion of the Bible!

They sing songs. The tune is "The Communist International," but the words praise Christ!

(~Kazakstanskaia Pravda~, June 30, 1966).

In a secret letter published in Kulunda (Siberia), the Christians say that the official leadership of the "Baptists," "has destroyed the church and its true servants in the world, in the same way as the high priests, scribes and Pharisees betrayed Jesus Christ to Pilate." But the faithful Underground Church works on!

The bride of Christ continues to serve Him! The Communists themselves admit that I am right when I assert the Underground Church wins Communists for Christ. They can be won!

~Bakinskii Rabochi~ (The Worker of Baku) of April 27, 1966 reproduced a letter of Tania Ciugunova (a member of the Communist Youth League) who was won to Christ. The letter was seized by the Communist authorities:

"Dear Aunt Nadia, I send you blessings from our beloved Lord. Aunt Nadia, how much He loves me! We are nothing before Him. Aunt Nadia, I believe that you understand these words: 'Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you and pray for them which despitefully use you.'"

Once this letter was seized, Peter Serebrennikov, the brother who brought her and many other young Communists to Christ, had to go to prison. The Communist newspaper quotes from one of his sermons: "We must believe our Saviour as the first Christians did. For us the principal law is the Bible. We recognize nothing else. We must hurry to save men from sin, especially the youth.' - When told that the Soviet law forbids telling youth about Christ, he answered: "For us the only law is the Bible" - a very normal answer where a cruel atheistic dictatorship rules the country.

Then the Communist newspaper describes a "savage" picture: "Young boys and girls sing spiritual hymns. They receive the ritual baptism and keep the evil treacherous teaching of love towards the enemy."

~Bakinskii Rabochi~ says that many young boys and girls, who carry membership in the Communist Youth League are in reality Christians! It concludes the article with the words: "How powerless must be the Communist school, how boresome and deprived of light ... that the pastors are able to snatch away its disciples from under the nose of their indifferent educators."

~Kazakstanskaia Pravda~ of June 30, 1966 is horrified to have discovered that the best pupil with the best grades was a Christian boy!

~Kirgizskaia Pravda~ of January 17, 1966 quotes an underground Christian leaflet to mothers: "Let us join our efforts and prayers to dedicate to God the lives of our children from the time they are in the cradle! ... Let us save our children from the influence of the world."

These efforts have been successful! The Communist newspapers bear witness to it! Christianity advances among the youth!

A newspaper from Celiabinsk, Russia, describes how a Young Communist League girl, Nina, became a Christian. It was by entering a secret Christian gathering.

~Sovietskaia Justitia~ No. 9 of 1966 describes such an Underground Meeting. "It is held at midnight. Hidden, wary even of their own shadow, men came from different parts. The brethren filled the dark room which has a very low ceiling. They were so many that there was no place to kneel. Because of the lack of air, the light in the primitive gas-lamp went out. Sweat ran from the faces of those present. On the street, one of the servants of the Lord was watching for policemen." But Nina said that in such an assembly she was received with embraces, warmth and care. "They had, as I have now, a great and enlightening faith - a faith in God. He takes us under His protection. Let the Komsomols who know me pass near me without greeting me! Let them look at me with spite and call me, as if slapping me, 'Baptist'! Let them do so! I don't need them."

So many other young Communists, like her, have taken the decision to serve Christ to the end.

~Kazakstanskaia Pravda~ of August 18, 1967 describes the trial of the brethren Klassen, Bondar and Teleghin. We are not told what sentence was given to them, but their crime was proclaimed. They have taught children about Christ.

~Sovietskaia Kirghizia~ of June 15, 1967 complains that the Christians 'provoke the application of administrative measures against themselves.' So the innocent Communist authorities, being continually provoked to arrest Christians by these obstinate Christians themselves who are not content to remain free, have arrested another group. Their crime was to have an illegal printing press with fifteen hectographs and six bookbinding machines, on which Christian literature was printed.

~Pravda~ of February 21, 1968 reports that thousands of women and girls were discovered wearing belts and ribbons on which Bible verses and prayers were printed. The authorities researched and found that the person who had launched this new fashion, which I could recommend also to the West, was none other than a Christian member of the Communist police, Brother Stasiuk of Liubertz. The newspaper announces his arrest.

The answers Christians of the Underground Church give, when brought before Communist courts, are divinely inspired. One judge demanded: "Why did you attract people to your forbidden sect?" A Christian sister answered: "Our aim is to win the whole world for Christ."

"Your religion is anti-scientific," the judge taunted at another trial, to which the accused girl - a student - answered: "Do you know more science than Einstein, than Newton? They were Believers. Our universe bears Einstein's name. I have learned in high school that its name is the Einsteinian universe. Einstein writes: 'If we cleanse the Judaism of the prophets and Christianity as Jesus has taught it from what came afterwards, especially from priestcraft, we have a religion which can save the world from all social evils. It is the holy duty of every man to do his utmost to bring this religion to triumph.' And remember our great physiologist Pavlov! Do not our books say that he was a Christian? Even Marx, in his preface to ~Das Kapital~ said that 'Christianity, especially in its Protestant form, is the ideal religion for remaking characters destroyed by sin.' I had a character destroyed by sin. Marx has taught me to become a Christian in order to remake it. How can you, Marxists, judge me for this?"

It is easy to understand why the judge remained speechless.

To the same accusation of having an anti-scientific religion, a Christian answered before the Court: "I am sure, Mr. Judge, that you are not such a great scientist as Simpson, the discoverer of chloroform and many other medicines. He, when he was asked which he considers to be his greatest discovery, answered: 'It was not chloroform. My greatest discovery has been to know that I am a sinner and that I could be saved by the grace of God.'"

The life, the self-sacrifice, the blood which they are ready to shed for their faith, is the greatest argument for Christianity presented by the Underground Church. It forms what the renowned missionary in Africa, Albert Schweitzer, called "the sacred fellowship of those who have the mark of pain," the fellowship to which Jesus, the Man of Sorrows, belonged. The Underground Church is united by a bond of love towards its Saviour. The same bond unites the members of the church with each other. Nobody in the world can defeat them.

In a letter smuggled out secretly, the Underground Church said: ~"We don't pray to be better Christians, but that we may be the only kind of Christians God means us to be: Christlike Christians, that is, Christians who bear willingly the Cross for God's glory."~

With the wisdom of serpents, according to the teaching of Jesus, the Christians always refuse at questioning and before the court to say who their leaders are.

~Pravda Vostoka~ (The Truth of the East) of January 15, 1966 tells how the defendant, Maria Seveiuk, asked who had brought her to Christ, answered: "God attracted me in His congregation." Another, asked: "Who is your leader?" answered "We have no human leader."

Christian children were asked, "Who has taught you to leave the Pioneers and to take off the red necktie?" They answered, "We have done it out of our free will. Nobody taught us."

page 122 Tortured for Christ

Although in some places the tip of the "iceberg" shows, in other places, Christians practice self-baptism to prevent the arrest of their leaders. In some places, baptisms are made in a river with the baptizer and the baptized both wearing masks, so that nobody can photograph them.

~Uchitelskaia Gazeta~ of January 30, 1964, tells of an atheistic lecture in the village Voronin, of the district Volnecino-Korskii. As soon as the lecturer finished, "the believers began to publicly attack the atheistic teaching through questions," which the atheistic lecturer could not answer. They asked, "where do you Communists get the moral principles you proclaim, but do not obey - such as 'don't steal, and don't kill'?" The Christians showed the lecturer that every such principle came from the Bible against which the Communists fight. The lecturer was entirely confused and the lecture finished with a victory for the Believers!

Persecution of the Underground Church Grows

The Christians of the Underground Church are suffering today more than ever before. All religions are persecuted in Russia. For Christians it is heartbreaking to know about the oppression of Jews in the Communist countries. But the principal target of persecution is the Underground Church. The Soviet press reports a wave of mass-arrests and trials. In one place, eighty-two Christians were put in an asylum for madmen. Twenty-four died after a few days because of "prolonged prayer!" Since when does lengthy prayer kill? Can you imagine what they went through?

The worst suffering imposed upon them is that, if it is discovered that they teach their children about Christ, their children are taken away from them for life - and no visitation rights.

The Soviet Union signed the United Nations declaration "against discrimination in the sphere of education," which stipulates: "Parents must have the right to assure the religious and moral education of the children according to their own convictions." Traitor KaIev, leader of the official Baptist Union of the Soviet Union, in the article quoted above, assures that this right is a reality in Russia - and dupes believe him! Now, listen what the Soviet press says.

~Sowjetskaia Russia~ of June 4, 1963 recounts how the Baptist Makrinkowa had six children taken away from her, because she gave them the Christian faith and forbade them to wear the Pioneer necktie.

When she heard the sentence, she said only: "I suffer for the faith." She has to pay for the boarding of the children taken away from her. They are now being poisoned with atheism. Christian mothers, think of her agony!

~Uchitelskaia Gazeta~ tells us that the same thing happened to Ignatii Mullin and his wife. The judge demanded they leave their faith. The judge said, "Choose between God and your daughter. Do you choose God?" The father answered: "I will not give up my faith."

Paul says, "All things work together for good...." I have seen such children who were raised as Christians taken from their parents and put in Communist schools. Instead of being poisoned by atheism, the faith they had learned at home was spread to the other children!

The Bible says that whoever loves his children more than Jesus is not worthy of Him. These words have meaning behind the Iron Curtain.

Try to live a week without seeing your children! Then you will know the sufferings of our brethren in Russia. Depriving Christians of parental rights continues even today. The most recent facts which we can document from the Soviet press itself concern Mrs.

Sitsh from whom, according to ~Znamia Iunosti~ of March 29, 1967, her son Vsetsheslav was taken away only because she brought him up in the fear of the Lord; and Mrs. Zabavina of Habarovsk, deprived of her orphan granddaughter Tania because she had given her a Christian 'unnatural education' (~Sovietskaia Rossia~ of January 13, 1968).

It would be unfair to speak only about the Protestant Underground Church.

The Orthodox Christians in Russia are completely changed. Millions of them have passed through prisons. There they had no beads, no crucifixes, no holy images, no incense, no candles. The laymen were in prison without an ordained priest. The priests had no robes, no wheat bread, no wine to consecrate, no holy oils, no books with prepared prayers to be read. And they found out that they could get by without all these things, by going to God directly in prayer. They began to pray and God began to pour forth His Spirit upon them. A genuine, spiritual awakening, very similar to fundamental Christianity, is taking place among the Orthodox in Russia.

So it happens that in Russia, as well as in the satellite countries, there exists an Orthodox Underground, which is in reality evangelical, fundamental and very close to God, keeping only, by the power of habit, a very little of the Orthodox ritual. This Orthodox Underground has also given great martyrs. Who could say where the aged archbishop Yermogen of Kaluga is now? He dared to protest against the treacherous collaboration between the Patriarchy and the godless Communist government.

Fifty years of Communist rule! And the Russian press is full of the triumph of the Underground Church. It passes through unspeakable hardships but has remained faithful... and grows!

We in Rumania have sown the seed by our secret work in the Russian army. So have others in Russia itself and in other countries invaded by the Russians. The seed has given fruit.

The Communist world can be won for Christ. Communists can become Christians. So can those oppressed by them, if only we will help them.

The proof that I am right is that the Underground Church flourishes in the Soviet Union, in China and in almost all Communist lands.

To show the beauty of our fellow-Christians under terrible circumstances I give below a few letters from Russia, the last ones from Russian prisons.

How Varia, a Communist Girl, Finds Christ, Witnesses and Becomes a Slave-Laborer

The first three letters are from Maria, the Christian girl who led Varia to Christ.

First letter

"... I continue to live here. I am very beloved. I am beloved also by a member of the cell of the Komsomol (the Communist Youth League). She told me; 'I cannot understand what a being you are. Here many insult and hurt you and yet you love all.' I answered that God has taught us to love all, not only friends, but also enemies. Before, this girl made me much harm, but I prayed for her with special concern. When she asked me if I can love her, too, I embraced her and we both began to weep. Now, we pray together.

Please, pray for her. Her name is Varia.

When you listen to those who loudly deny God, it seems that they really mean it. But life shows that many of them, although they curse God with their lips, in their hearts have a great longing. And you hear the groaning of the heart ... These men seek something and wish to cover their inner emptiness with their godlessness.

Your sister in Christ, Maria"

Second letter

"In my former letter I wrote you about the atheist girl, Varia. Now I hurry to tell you, my beloved ones, about our great joy: Varia has received Christ as her personal Saviour, witnessing openly before everybody about this.

When she believed in Christ and knew the gladness of salvation, she, at the same time, felt very unhappy. She was unhappy, because before she had propagated that there is no God. Now she has decided to atone for her guilt.

We went together with Varia to the assembly of the godless. Although I warned her to be reserved, it was useless. Varia went and I went with her to see what would happen. After the common singing of the Communist hymn (singing in which Varia did not participate), she came forward before the whole assembly. Courageously and with much feeling, she witnessed before those gathered about Christ as her Savior and asked for her former comrades forgiveness that she had had her spiritual eyes closed until then and had not seen that she was herself going to perdition and leading others toward it. She implored all to give up the way of sin and to come to Christ.

All became silent and nobody interrupted her. When she finished speaking, she sang with her splendid voice the whole Christian hymn: 'I am not ashamed to proclaim the Christ who died to defend His commandments and the power of His cross.'

And afterwards ... afterwards they took away our

page 127 Tortured for Christ

Today it is the ninth of May. We know nothing about her. But God is powerful to save her. Pray!
Your Maria"

Third letter

"Yesterday, the second of August, I had a talk in prison with our beloved Varia. My heart bleeds when I think about her. In fact she is still a child. She is only nineteen years of age. As a believer in the Lord, she is also a spiritual babe. But she loves the Lord from all her heart and went at once on the difficult way. The poor girl is so hungry. When we knew that she was in prison, we began to send her parcels. But she received only little of what was sent to her.

When I saw her yesterday, she was thin, pale, beaten. Only the eyes shone with the peace of God and with an unearthly joy.

Yes, my dear ones, those who have not experienced the wonderful peace of Christ, cannot understand it ... But how happy are those who have this peace ... For us who are in Christ no sufferings and frustrations should stop us ...

I asked through the iron bars: 'Varia. Don't you regret what you did? 'No,' she answered. 'And if they would free me, I would go again and would tell them about the great love of Christ. Don't think that I suffer. I am very glad that the Lord loves me so much and gives me the joy to endure for His name.'

I beg that you may pray specially from your heart for her. Probably she will be sent to Siberia. They have taken away from her her clothes and all things. She has remained without anything, except what is on her. She has no relatives and we must collect for the most necessary things. I have put apart the last sum which you sent me. If Varia is deported, I will hand it to her. I believe that God will strengthen her and will give her power to endure in the future too. May God keep her!

Your Maria"

Fourth letter

"Dear Maria, at last I am able to write you. We arrived well at ... Our camp is ten miles from town. I cannot describe our life. You know it. I wish to write only a little about me. I thank God that He gives me health and that I can work physically. I and sister 'X' were put to work in the workshop. We were there at machines. The work is difficult and sister 'X's' health is bad. I must work for both me and her. I finish first my work and then I help my sister. We work twelve to thirteen hours a day. Our food is just as yours, very scarce. But it is not this that I wished to write to you.

My heart praises and thanks God that He showed to me through you the way to salvation. Now, being on this way, my life has a purpose and I know where to go and for whom I suffer. I feel the desire to tell and to witness to everybody about the great joy of salvation, which I have in my heart. Who can separate us from the love of God in Christ? Nobody and nothing. Neither prison nor suffering. The sufferings which God sends us only strengthen us more and more in the faith in Him. My heart is so full that the grace of God overflows. At work, they curse and punish me and give me extra work because I cannot be silent, but must say to everybody what the Lord has done for me. He has made me a new being, a new creation, of me who was on the way of perdition. Can I be silent after this? No, never! As long as my lips can speak, I will witness to everybody about His great love.

On the way to the camp, we met with many brethren and sisters in Christ. How amazing it is that you feel through the Spirit that they are children of God when you first see the brethren and the sisters. It is useless to speak. From the first look you feel and know who they are.

While we were on the way to the camp, at one railway station, a woman came, gave us food and said only two words: 'God lives.'

The first evening when we arrived here (it was late), we were taken to underground barracks. We greeted those present with the words 'Peace with you.' To our great joy, from all corners we heard the answer: 'We receive you with peace.' And from the first evening we felt that we are in a family.

Yes, it was really so. We are here many who believe in Christ as our personal Saviour. More than half of the prisoners are Believers. We have among us great singers and good preachers of the Gospel. In the evening, when we all gather after heavy work, how wonderful it is to pass at least some time together in prayer at the feet of our Saviour. With Christ there is freedom everywhere. I learned here many beautiful hymns and every day God gives to me more and more of His word. At the age of nineteen, I celebrated the Birthday of Christ for the first time. Never will I forget this wonderful day! We had to work the whole day long. But some of our brethren could go notwithstanding to the river nearby. There they broke the ice and prepared the place where, during the night - according to the Word of God - I and seven brethren were baptized. Oh, how happy I am and how I would like that you, Maria, should be with me, too, that I may atone at least a little bit, through my love towards you for the wrong I committed in times past against you. But God puts every one of us in his place and we must stand firm where God has put us.

Give greetings to the whole family of God's children. God will richly bless your common work, as He blessed me, too. Read HEB 12:1-3.

All our brethren greet you and are glad that your faith in God is so powerful and that you praise Him in your sufferings unceasingly. If you write to others, tell them our greetings.

Yours, Varia"

Fifth letter

"Dear Maria. At last, I have found the opportunity to write you a few lines. I can tell you, my dear one, that, by the grace of God, I and sister 'X' are healthy and feel well. We are now in ... They send us to ... and we remain there.

I thank you for your motherly care for me. We received all you have prepared for us. I thank you for the most valuable thing, for the Bible. Thanks to all, when you write to them, transmit my greetings, and thanks for what they have done for me.

  Since the Lord revealed to me the deep mystery of His holy love, I consider myself to be the happiest in the world. The persecutions which I have to endure, I consider as a special grace. I am glad that the Lord gave me from the first days of my faith the great happiness to suffer for Him. Pray all for me that I may remain faithful to the Lord to the end.
  May the Lord keep you all and strengthen you for the holy battle!
  I and sister 'X' kiss you all. When we are sent to ... perhaps we will have the opportunity to write to you again. Don't worry about us. We are glad and joyful, because our reward in heaven is great. MTT 5:11-12.
Your Varia"

  This is the last letter from Varia - the young Communist girl who found Christ, witnessed about Him and was sentenced to slave labor. She was never heard of again, but her beautiful love and witness for Christ shows the spiritual beauty of the suffering, faithful Underground Church in the one third of the world under communism.

page 131 Tortured for Christ

HOW WESTERN CHRISTIANS CAN HELP

My Message to you from the Underground Church

  I have been called "the voice of the Underground Church." I do not feel worthy to be the voice of such an honored part of the Body of Christ.
  However, in Communist lands I led for years a part of the Underground Church. By a miracle I survived fourteen years of torture and imprisonment, including two years in a prison "dying room." By an even greater miracle, God somehow saw fit to reach into the prison and take me out, delivering me to the West to speak to the free Church.
  I speak on behalf of my brethren who lie in countless nameless graves. I speak on behalf of my brethren who now meet secretly in forests, basements, attics and other such places.
  It was decided by the Underground Church in Rumania that I should try to leave my country, and bring out a message to the free Christians of the world. By a miracle, I have now been able to come out, and I fulfill the charge given me by those who remain behind laboring, risking, suffering and dying in Communist lands.

The message I bring out from the Underground Church is:

"Don't abandon us!"

"Don't forget us!"

"Don't write us off!"

"Give us the tools we need! We will pay the price for using them!"

This is the message I have been charged to deliver to you.

I speak for the silenced Church, the Underground Church, the "dumb" Church, which has no voice to speak.

Hear the cries of your brothers and sisters in Communist lands! They do not ask for escape, safety or an easy life. They ask only for the tools to counteract the poisoning of their youth - the next generation - with atheism. They ask for Bibles to use in spreading the Word of God. How can they spread the Word of God if they do not have it?

The Underground Church is like a surgeon who was traveling by train. The train collided with another train and hundreds of people lay in the ground, mangled, injured, dying. The surgeon walked among the dying, crying out: "If only I had my tools! ... If only I had my tools!" With these surgical instruments he could have saved many lives. He had the willingness ... but he did not have the tools. This is where the Underground Church stands. It is so willing to give its all. It is so willing to give its martyrs! It is so willing to risk years in Communist prisons! But all its willingness is of no value if it does not have the tools with which to work. The plea of the faithful, courageous Underground Church to you, who are free, is: "Give us the tools - the Gospels, the Bibles, the literature, the help - and we will do the rest!"

How Free Christians Can Help

Every free Christian can help at once in the following ways:

Atheists are men who do not acknowledge the invisible sources of their life. They have no sense for what is mystery in the universe and in life. Christians can help them best by walking themselves not by sight, but by faith, leading themselves a life of fellowship with the invisible God.

They can help us best by leading the lives of consistent Christians, lives of sacrifice. They can help by protesting publicly as often as Christians are persecuted.

Western Christians can help us by praying for the Communists that they may be saved. Such a prayer may seem naive. We prayed for the Communists and they tortured us next day even worse than before the prayer. But the prayer of the Lord of Jerusalem was also naive. They crucified Him after this prayer. But only a few days later, they beat their breasts and five thousand were converted in one day.

For the others, too, the prayer was not lost. Any prayer which is not accepted by the one for whom you intercede returns to you with great blessings and becomes a curse for the one who is the object of your prayer. Fulfilling the word of Christ, I and many other Christians always prayed for Hitler and his men. And I am sure that our prayer helped to defeat him as much as the bullets of the allied soldiers.

We have to love our neighbors as ourselves. The Communists are our neighbors as much as anybody else.

Communists are the result of not fulfilling the words of Christ: "I have come to give life and life more abundant." Christians have not yet made life abundant for everyone. They have left some on the fringe of everything valuable in life. These have rebelled and constituted the Communist party. They are often the victims of social injustice. Now they are bitter and cruel. We have to fight against them. But Christians, even if they fight against an enemy, understand and love him.

We are not guiltless of the fact that some are Communists. We are guilty at least by neglect of duty.

For this we have to atone by loving them (which is something entirely different from liking them) and praying for them.

I am not so naive as to believe that love alone can solve the Communist problem. I would not advise the authorities of a state to solve the problem of gangsterism only by love. There must be a police force, judges and prisons for gangsters, not only pastors. If gangsters do not repent, they have to be jailed. I would never use the Christian phrase about "love" to counteract the right political, economic or cultural fight against Communists, seeing that they are nothing else than gangsters on an international scale. Gangsters steal a purse; they steal whole countries.

But the pastor and the individual Christian have to do their best to bring the Communist to Christ - whatever crimes he commits - as well as his innocent victims. We have to pray for them with understanding.

Bibles, Gospels Are Urgently Needed

Secondly, free Christians can help by sending Bibles and Bible portions. Means exist by which they can be safely sent into Communist lands. Since I have come out I have already sent many, which have arrived safely. There definitely are ways to send them if only you free Christians will provide them for your brothers and sisters of the Underground Church. When still in Rumania, I received many Bibles brought in by certain means. There is no question of the ways to send them. Only that they must be provided.

They are desperately needed. Thousands of Christians have not seen Bibles or Gospels for twenty to fifty years in satellite countries and Russia.

Two very dirty villagers came to my home one day. They had come from their village to take the job of shoveling the frozen earth all winter long to earn money in the slight hope they might be able to buy an old, tattered Bible with it and take it back to their village. Because I had received Bibles from America, I was able to hand them a new Bible, not an old tattered one. They could not believe their eyes! They tried to pay me with money they earned from shoveling frozen earth. I refused their money. They rushed back to their village with the Bible. A few days later I received a letter of unrestrained, ecstatic joy thanking me for the Scriptures. It was signed by thirty villagers! They had carefully cut the Bible into thirty parts and exchanged the parts with one another!

It is pathetic to hear a Russian begging for one page of the Bible. He feeds his soul on it. They are happy to exchange a cow or a goat for a Bible. One man I know traded his wedding ring to get a battered New Testament. Our children have never seen a Christmas card. If they had one, all the children of the village would gather around it, and some old man might explain to them about the baby Jesus, and the Holy Virgin, and from there the story of Christ and salvation. All this ... from one Christmas card! We send Bibles, Gospels and Literature. This is one way you can do something.

Thirdly, we must print and send special literature to counterattack the atheistic poison being given the youth from kindergarten to college. The Communists have prepared ~The Atheist's Guidebook~. It is the atheist's "Bible." Simple versions are taught to kindergarten children and more advanced versions of the same Guidebook are taught as the children progress. The evil "Bible" follows a child as he grows and advances - poisoning him with atheism all the way. The Christian world has never printed an answer to ~The Atheist's Guidebook~. We can and must print and send in the Christian answer to the poisonous, atheistic teachings. We must do this at once, for the Underground Church has no literature to give to the youth poisoned by this book. The Underground Church has its hands tied behind its back until it has such literature in the different languages of Communist countries.

Our poisoned youth must have an answer - God's answer - the Christian answer - our answer! This is another thing you can help do, by helping provide such literature as the answer to ~The Atheist Guidebook~ - illustrated youth literature and children's Bibles.

The fourth thing we must do is "join hands" with members of the Underground Church and give them financial means to travel about and move around with the Gospel in person-to-person evangelism. At this moment so many of them are "chained" to their homes for lack of funds to use for travel tickets, bus fares, train fares and for food while traveling. Thus they are stranded, unable to move about while villages twenty to thirty miles away vainly call for them to come for secret meetings. By giving them a few dollars a month ($10-$20) we can "unchain" them to answer those calls and go out to distant towns and villages with the Word of God.

The former pastors who have been in prison for their faith have a burning Gospel message; they have a burning love for lost souls, but they do not have the means for taking that message to towns and villages. A few dollars a month will give them the means.

Christian laymen and laywomen must have help. Being Christians, they earn barely enough to survive, leaving nothing with which to go from village to village, town to town with the Gospel. This is the "miracle" a few dollars a month will do for them.

Pastors of official churches who conduct a secret, parallel ministry at great risk must have funds secretly provided them for such purposes. Their "salary" set by the Communist government is extremely small. The willingness of these pastors to risk their freedom by ignoring Communist regulations and preaching the Gospel to children, youth and to adults in secret meetings is not enough. They must have the means to carry out their fruitful secret ministry.

Ten to twenty dollars a month will help such a member of the Underground Church effectively spread the Gospel. This is another way you can help the Underground Church.

Next we must broadcast the Gospel into the Communist lands by radio. Using stations in the free world, we can spiritually feed the Underground Church which itself is in great need of the Bread of Life. Because the Communist governments use short-wave radio to give out their propaganda to their own people, millions of Russians and other enslaved peoples have radios which will receive these broadcasts. Doors are open now to broadcast into Communist lands by radio. This work must be extended. The Underground Church must have the spiritual food these broadcasts provide. This is another way you can help the Underground Church in Communist lands.

The Tragedy of Families of Christian Martyrs

We must provide help for the families of Christian martyrs. Tens of thousands of such families are now suffering in an indescribably tragic way. When a member of the Underground Church is arrested a terrible drama strikes his family. It is highly illegal for anyone to help them. This is very well planned by the Communists to increase the suffering of the wife and children left behind. When a Christian goes to prison - and often to death and torture - the suffering only begins. His family suffers endlessly. I can tell for a fact, that if rank-and-file Christians in the free world had not sent me and my family help, we would never have survived and lived to be with you and write these words!

Just now a new wave of mass-arrests and terror against Christians has broken out in Russia and elsewhere. More martyrs are being made all the time. Though they go to their graves and to their reward, their families live in horribly tragic conditions. We can and must help them. Of course we must help starving Indians and Africans. But who deserves the help of Christians more than the families of those who have died for Christ or who are tortured in Communist prisons for their faith?

Since my release, Jesus to the Communist World has already sent much help to the families of Christian martyrs. What has been done is little in comparison with what we could do with your help.

As a member of the Underground Church who has survived and escaped, I have brought you a message, an appeal, a plea from my brethren whom I have left behind.

They have sent me to deliver to you this message from them. Miraculously I have survived to deliver it.

I have told you of the urgency of bringing Christ to the Communist world. I have told you of the urgency of helping the families of Christian martyrs. I have told you of practical ways you can help the Underground Church fulfill its mission of spreading the Gospel.

When I was beaten on the bottom of the feet, my tongue cried. Why did my tongue cry? It was not beaten. It cried because the tongue and feet are both part of the same body. And you free Christians are part of the same Body of Christ that is now beaten in Communist prisons, that now give martyrs for Christ.

Can you not feel our pain?

The Early Church in all its beauty, sacrifice and dedication has come alive again in the Communist lands.

While our Lord Jesus Christ agonized in prayer in the Garden of Gethsemane, Peter, James and John were a mere stone's throw away from the greatest drama of history - but they were deep in sleep. How much of your own Christian concern and giving is directed towards the relief of the martyr church? Ask your pastors and Church leaders what is being done in your name to help your brothers and sisters behind the Iron Curtain.

Behind the walls of the Iron Curtain the drama, bravery and martyrdom of the Early Church are happening all over again - now - and the free Church sleeps.

Our brethren there, alone and without help, are waging the greatest, most courageous battle of the twentieth century, equal to the heroism, bravery and dedication of the Early Church. And the free Church sleeps on, oblivious of their struggle and agony, just as Peter, James and John slept in the moment of their Saviour's agony.

Will you also sleep while the Underground Church, your brethren in Christ, suffer and fight alone for the Gospel?

Will you hear our message: "Remember us, help us!"?

"Don't abandon us!"

Now I have delivered the message from the faithfuL martyred, Underground Church in Communist lands - from your brothers and sisters suffering in the bonds of atheistic communism.

Mozart, at the age of four, when asked how he composed music, answered, "I just put together little notes that like each other."

This is what I have done, too. Thoughts and stories gathered together according to the own affinities have been put on paper. That is all.

p007 VICTORIOUS FAITH

Once upon a time, there was a prince who received a very rare and beautiful bird. He named it Twee-Twee and placed it in a golden cage. But the poor creature was not impressed by the gold. It pleaded for freedom, but the prince like it too much to part with it. Then Twee-Twee begged him at least to visit her relatives in the forest and tell them that, though captive, she was still alive.

The prince went and told them. At once, Twee-Twee's sister fell to the ground, and the prince realized that she had been killed by the grief of knowing freedom-loving Twee-Twee was in a cage. Sad at heart, he returned and told Twee-Twee the sad news that her sister had died. Immediately Twee-Twee collapsed in the same way at the bottom of the cage. The prince then took the poor bird out of the cage and threw her through the window. What would be the purpose in keeping her when she was dead? In a flash, Twee-Twee flew away and, from a tree, chirped, "What you thought was bad news was a lesson. By pretending to have died, my sister taught me the way to escape."

p008 VICTORIOUS FAITH

Nobody can exhaust the sense of Jesus' death on Calvary. But the wise have always taught by deeds. Through dying by his own will at the age of 33, young and full of power, He gave us a lesson on how to handle the problems of life. Die to them!

Does sin attract you? Would you commit sin if you were dead? Surely not. Then drop dead! The world wishes to involve you in its race toward destruction. Be dead to it! Religions wish to force your life into the mould or a law. Die to the law! Jesus died to sin, the world, and the law. Because of this, He lives. You, the captive, can become free by following His example. Are problems haunting you? Be impassive to them, as if you were dead.

Learn from the story of the bird which obtained its freedom.

The purpose of this book is to show the way of liberty.

*

My book is not the expression of opinions and sentiments of a man. I hate stuffy - as well as inspired - sermons in which clergymen express ~their~ views and ~their~ standpoints. I also hate political rallies at which good or bad opinions are expressed. I would prefer that nobody open his mouth unless he knows a truth, an objective truth.

In times of old, there were men among the Jews called prophets, who, when they wrote or when they spoke, began with the words, "Thus spake The Lord". -

I write the present book with the full assurance that I am only a voice. Through me, God Himself speaks.

Some will laugh at this assertion at the beginning of a book.

I always like it when people laugh, even at me. Laughter is healthy. Doctors recommend it. There is little reason to laugh in this world. Why should people not laugh at me? Take it as foolishness if you like, but through this my book, God speaks to you.

How do I know that? Is not God Someone other than me, Someone totally different from me? My means of communication with Him can sometimes work well, but can also be troubled: I might misunderstand Him.

Jesus on the cross cried, "Eli, Eli" (the Hebrew words for "My God, My God"). Those beneath the cross believed they heard the name of the prophet Elijah. Such misunderstandings are daily occurrences.

How then can I have the assurance that what I, Richard Wurmbrand, write is exactly what God wishes me to convey? How did the prophets know?

A great confusion of spheres has taken place. The sphere of grammar and the sphere of religion are different from each other. Every pupil in school, who, when asked to conjugate a verb, replies that God is love and that whosoever believes in Him is born of God, will get a bad mark, even if the teacher is religious. Religion has no place in an examination on grammar.

But neither has grammar any say in religion. In the sphere of practical life we have to conjugate verbs, and for this we need personal pronouns. We have to distinguish between ~my~ house, ~my~ book, ~my~ wife, and that belonging to another. And so we have to use "I", "you", and "he". But please leave pronouns in the realm of grammar, to which they belong: do not introduce them into religion!

When Jesus Christ met Saul of Tarsus, a great persecutor of the Christians, on the road to Damascus, He asked him, "Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou ~Me~?" Saul could have answered truthfully, "I never persecuted ~you~. I persecuted your disciples". But Jesus, though omniscient, does not know that He and His disciples are different persons. He feels ~Himself~ persecuted as often as His disciple is hurt; He weeps with every disciple who weeps, He rejoices with every disciple who rejoices.

Jesus says that at the last judgment the wicked will hear the reproach, "~I~ have been hungry, sick, or in prison and you did not visit ~Me~". And He then explains that as often as one of His little brethren suffered hardships, it was He Himself who passed through suffering.

The Lord Jesus is our leader in religion. But He might not pass an examination in grammar because He uses interchangeably the personal pronouns "he" and "I".

The Christian religion consists in becoming inebriated with love. Inebriated men confuse things and persons. The distinction between "I", "you", and "he" disappears. Therefore, when I speak, if I am inebriated with love for God, God speaks through me.

Two thousand years ago Jesus said, "~I~ am the Truth". And for 2,000 years this assertion of His has been falsified and quoted as meaning that Jesus said, "~He~ is the truth". But He never said that ~He~ is the truth. He said, "~I~ am the truth". If you make Him a "he", even with a capital H, you have lost the truth.

What can Jesus, the "he", the God embodied in a carpenter of 2,000 years ago in Palestine, tell you about modern techniques, about socialism, democracy, or military dictatorship, and which of these to prefer, about whether or not we should accept the philosophy of Teilhard de Chardin or the philosophical implications of Einstein's theory, about whether we should be fundamentalists or modernists?

What can Jesus, the man who lived 2,000 years ago in Palestine, tell you about the theory of evolution? Can He tell you to marry George rather than Steve? Can He guide you in any practical matter?

Jesus never wished to be "he". As a condition for His being the truth, He must always remain an "I". ~I~ am the truth, not ~he~ is the truth. If I wish to have the truth and to be the truth, Jesus must be for me an "I".

It is not true that He must ~become~ an I. He ~is~ an I. Luther says, "The Christian ~is~ Christ". This is the fact, though you may not realize it yet. When my eyes are opened with St. Paul, "I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me". Then

I become sure of my own thoughts. I write a book, which means that God speaks through my book.

Men of God have always thought like this.

Luther wrote: "I have to distinguish between myself and my calling. I consider myself as the smallest. But my calling is untouchable ... Nobody should have a high opinion of his own person, but everyone should mightily praise his calling to the glory of God. Even more. The man who holds the office has not even to prove what he says, he has to be listened to as God Himself".

To become a Christian means to become Christlike. In what sense? Not everybody is a Jew as Jesus was, not everybody a carpenter, not every disciple of His a male. In what sense then can I become like Him?

He lived a human life with the full assurance that He was right. In His time, like today, there existed hundreds of religions. In Galilee alone many nations and many religions met. He never chose any of these religions. He believed that man must choose ~His~. Palestine was divided into many groups: the Zealots, the Herodians, the Essenes, etc. Jesus never chose among them. He spoke about earthly things, but others had to accept what ~He~ said. He never accepted what others said. He knew Himself to be the ugh this my book To be a Christian means to become Christlike, that is, a man without doubts about the message, a man who knows that Christ is not a "he". When this man speaks, Christ speaks.

Putting the realities of spiritual life in human words, I will have to use the personal pronouns, but my words will be transparent. Through them, you must grasp the reality behind them: It is the Lord who tells you "Come unto me". You have to come to ~him~ by seeing to it that he is no longer a "he" for you.

I have to make it very clear again. I do not call you to come to him. The sacred words are "Come to ~Me~". Do not come to ~him~, which means, do not have in the future a "he" as an object of worship and do not be content with this.

The whole idea of subject and object is an illusion, which has been strengthened in us by linguistic structures. These will oblige me, too, to "misuse" pronouns. But I do so, conscious that what we call the "I" is only a temporary meeting point of different forces, which continually change their intensity and direction. Learn to think outside the categories of "I", "you", and "he". The thinker, the thought of, and the act of thinking are one.

There is one all-powerful "I". The ten commandments start with the words "I am God". Within this only God, we live and move and have our being (ACT 17:28). We form the inward life of God. We are not exterior to Him.

God continually contradicts the notion of an "I" of ours as opposed to His. Jeremiah does not wish to accept the call to become a prophet. He says to God, "I am a child"; but God answers, "Say not, I am a child ... for I am with thee" (JER 1:6-8). Significant are the words of God, "Say not I ... for I ..." Where His "I" intervenes, the state of our "I" does not count.

Zacharias, when told by the angel that he would have a son, the future John the Baptist, says to the heavenly being, "I a an old man". This objection is cancelled with the words, "I am Gabriel" (LUK 1:18-19). For a man to speak in terms of an "I" when he hears a voice from heaven is senseless. It is again "not 'I', Zacharias, but 'I', the angel".

God calls a man "a fool" (LUK 12:16-20). This was the man who thought only about his earthly riches. It would have been easy to recognize him as a fool. In three verses of the Bible, he uses the words "I" and "my" nine times, not knowing that this "I" was meant to die on that very night and the "my" to pass into the possession of others.

We will come back to this idea later on. To come to God is just another way of saying to come to yourself, to your real being, to the One whose image and likeness you bear, to the only real "I".

p013 VICTORIOUS FAITH

Jesus told St. Catherine of Siena: "I am He who is, you are she who is not".

*

In my church in Bucharest, I had a Russian member who did not know one word of Romanian, the language in which all services were conducted. He was never absent from church. During the sermon, he would read his Russian New Testament.

I felt a responsibility to him. I called him one day and said, "Look, I am your pastor. I would like to know what you understand from this book. Choose a part of it at your convenience and explain it to me!"

He read to me Chapter 1 of the first epistle to the Corinthians and then interpreted, "The apostle writes that Paul had planted the gospel and a certain Apollo had watered, but God gave the increase. From this he draws the conclusion that neither Paul, nor Apollo are anything, but only God. Now, if St. Paul and Apollo are called just nothings, how much is your worth, Brother Wurmbrand? God has called the things which are not. Be happy to be just a nothing".

I embraced and congratulated him for understanding the Bible better than I.

*

Jesus says, "Come unto Me". Accept the call! Do not be one of the ice-cold hearts which very often are as hard and as unfeeling as the stones of the prison floor on which Jesus might have slept, after being arrested in the garden of Gethsemane.

*

Jesus says, "Come unto Me!" and not only to pompous Church services. The great inquisitor in Dostoievsky's ~The Brothers Karamasov~ said to the Lord, "We have improved upon your work". Jesus in His humility is thankful for improvements. He has promised us that we will do even greater works than He did. But He wishes you to come to Him, to ~Him~ alone.

Christianity has changed many times during the centuries. Christianity in the time of Jesus was different from that of the first Christian community in Jerusalem, which in turn differed from the first Christian churches in the gentile world. The state church after Constantine the Great was something else again. The church then changed in the Middle Ages, the Reformation, the time of rationalism, and the times of pietism, modernism, state-controlled and underground churches in Communist lands, and the charismatic movement in the free world. Origen considers Christianity as part of a divine movement which prepares for something even higher. Superior forms of Christianity may yet arise. All of them are vehicles of the one Christ, who never changes. He says, "Come to Me!"

How should I come to Him? In LUK 24:5, it is written that Jesus parted from his disciples. This parting is a definite and abiding fact, a truth valid for all our earthly life, except that the contrary of truth need not be an error. It can be an opposite truth. Everything in the world has a dual nature: so also the relationship between men and Christ. The fact is that Jesus parted from men; the fact is that Jesus can become an 'I" in men.

Do you seek Jesus? Then the first condition for reaching Him is to fulfil what Jesus told the Roman soldiers: "If therefore ye seek me, let these (My disciples) go their way" (JHN 18:8).

Jesus has parted from them.

When the high priest asked Jesus about His doctrine, Jesus answered him, "Why askest thou me? ask them which heard me, what I have said unto them" (JHN 18:21).

Luckily enough, the discussion was interrupted by a slap which Jesus received from an officer who stood nearby. Otherwise, He would have received a terrible blow from the high priest himself, who could have answered Him, "Whom among those who heard you could I ask about your doctrine? One of them sold you to us, and you will understand that he did it with many bad words about you. Another disciple of yours is just now in the court and says that you are only a man, a man whom he has never known. Your other disciples have fled. Men who have heard you are in the other room waiting to testify, 'This fellow said, "I am able to destroy the temple of God and to build it in three days"'- surely not a very attractive point of doctrine. You have spoken to thousands. They understood nothing. They will shout tomorrow, 'Crucify Him!' John, your beloved, is here but is silent. You are the only one who can tell us your doctrine. If you refuse, we will do without it".

The situation has not changed much since.

If you wish to know the doctrine of Jesus, let His disciples go.

The first recommendation I give to you is this: "Let everybody in the world go his way; let churches and those who repudiate them go their way, right or wrong; and you, answering only for your own soul, come to Jesus! Look neither to the right nor to the left, do not look behind, do not care about what others say! ~You~ come to Jesus!"

*

Come so near to Him as to be one with Him!

When the first Christians met in the catacombs, they used in their sermons the following illustration:

A boy loved a girl to folly. One day he could not bear it any more. Late in the night, he knocked at the door of his sweetheart, asking her to allow him to enter. She asked him, "Who is it?" He answered, "It is I". Her reply was "My chamber is narrow. There is room only for one. Go!"

He departed into the world to forget his sorrow. He would not understand her refusal, knowing that she loved him too very much. After years of erring around, he all at once had an illumination.

Late one night, he knocked again at the door of the girl. When asked, "Who is it?", he replied, "It is you." The door opened. His beloved embraced him and said, "I have waited for you a long time".

What dimensions has God? He speaks with Moses between the two staves of a box, in which the Jews carried the Ten Commandments given to them on Mount Sinai. Heaven is the narrowest place in the universe. It has place only for One. Only those will enter into heaven who have become one with Him.

Shakespeare says in "The Phoenix and the Turtle": "Number in love was slain". Love cannot coexist with multiplicity. Those who love are always one soul and one heart. Husband and wife are one. Christ and the Father are one. So is the faithful soul and Christ. In love, distinctions between a "he" and an "I" are impossible.

King Solomon says in his Song (SOS 6:8-9), "There are three score queens, and four score concubines, and virgins without number. My dove, my undefiled is but one ..."

Before going further, let me repeat the warning: God speaks to you in the present book, setting before you a high responsibility. If you do not receive Jesus, you commit spiritual suicide.

There was a man who all his life had very great troubles. One night he tossed around in his bed, not finding rest. He asked God to show him what unseen enemy destroyed his life, and from behind a curtain this enemy appeared: himself! You are your greatest enemy if you do not receive Christ.

We are like the silkworm which prepares the cocoon in which it will develop. How do you build the house of your future?

In the Romanian town Lugoj, the director of the prison received an order to arrest the sub-director, a lieutenant. The director called the sub-director and told him, "Today we will have a new political prisoner. See to it that you prepare a cell for him!" The lieutenant took a warden with him and chose the worst of cells. Now, all prison cells are bad, but some have a little more light, others less; some are damp, others are dry; in some you can take three steps to and fro, in others only two. He chose the worst of cells, the worst of straw mattresses. Then he came back to the director and told him, "I have prepared the cell".

The director said, "I would like to see it myself". He went to the cell with the lieutenant and asked him, "Do you not think that you should give the man better housing than that?" The lieutenant replied, "You are too softhearted, captain! That is the right cell for a bandit".

The director told him, "Well, you are the bandit. Please enter!" And the door was locked behind him.

We, all of us, decide our future habitation by receiving or refusing Christ.

Those who refuse Him will have to suffer in hell.

It is a bad place; I know it. In spirit I dwell there often, because hell is not surrounded by the indifference but by the love of Christians. In Luke 16, it is written that some who are in heaven love those in hell so much that they would be ready to pass from heaven to hell only to be able to help. But they cannot.

Hell is a terrible thing. How awful to be there for all eternity with the devils!

St. Catherine of Siena once saw a devil and wrote that rather than look again for an instant on such a monster, she would prefer to walk until the end of her life on a bed of red coals.

And the devils will torment infidels. St. Anselm said, "In hell, souls are so utterly bound that they are not even able to remove from their eye a worm that gnaws it".

You had better receive Jesus!

Jesus speaks about a last judgment. I will describe it to you.

God will sit on a white throne, behind Him a curtain, before Him in one line those who have to be judged. God will lift

His right hand, and at this sign beings of unspeakable splendour, radiant in all colours, will appear from behind the curtain and will stand before each of those to be judged. Then the wicked will ask God, "Who is this beautiful being before me?" And God will answer, "This is you as you would have become if you had believed in Jesus". Then, in despair over what they have lost, the wicked will flee to hell, unable to endure the picture of what they could have become.

You will never be you, the radiant being, made in God's image, if you do not come to Jesus.

God calls you through me.

There is someone else to call you. This is your real self. In a parable, Jesus tells the story of a prodigal son who prematurely took his inheritance from his father, went to a distant land, and squandered the money in loose living. Then a famine ravaged the land. Having no money left, he took a job tending swine. Starving, he would have liked to eat the husks thrown to the pigs, but "no man gave unto him". At the end of his tether, the prodigal son of the parable - so the Bible says - "came to himself" and decided to return to his father.

"He came to himself" - what an expression! Where had he been until then? Well, we say in English, "he was beside himself". He was outside himself. He had not exercised his own mind, he had not been guided by the best impulses of his own heart. Like an ape, he had followed the selfish ways of others. Like a parrot, he had repeated their stupidities. Most men would rather die than think for themselves. Once the prodigal son "came to himself", to his real self, he implicitly returned to the truth and to his father. In the parable, God is the father.

It is simply not true that you have lived without Jesus until now. It was only that your real "you", the beautiful being created after God's own image, has not been within. You belong to Jesus. You have not known it until now. The Son of God has been within you and would have liked to reveal Himself to you, but you were in a distant land (GAL 1:16). Through me your real personality speaks to you. Right now, I am your conscience, your real I. I love your soul more than you love it yourself. You are a hodge-podge of all kinds of prejudices and beliefs gathered from others. The actor plays "Hamlet" one day, and "Othello" the next, but he is neither the prince of Denmark nor the jealous moor. He is himself.

You have acted until now as an atheist, an agnostic, a revolutionary, a drug-user, a sex-abuser, a moneygrabber, a pleaure-seeker, a churchgoer, or any number of things. But all these are only roles you have played. Your real you has been waiting, waiting. It speaks to you now through me.

Luther, a great teacher of Christianity, made a distinction between direct faith and faith which knows itself as such. When someone asserts "I believe" or "I believe not", he expresses his opinion about what happens within him. His opinion about himself may be as wrong in this matter as he can be wrong in judging others. One man may consider himself healthy while cancer ravages his body. Another thinks himself ill, but his malady is in his imagination.

Your infidelity can also be in your imagination. You may not have what theologians call "fides reflecta", a faith conscious of its existence. But you can have "fides directa", a faith which simply exists. A baby exists without knowing that what it has is existence. But its loving mother knows about its existence and needs. Likewise, you do not know what happens within you because your real you is outside waiting. I am your "you". I am your conscience.

As you read these lines you will find how right Plato was when he said that "knowing is recognizing". I will not tell you things which are new to you. You will recognize in my words the light which enlightened you when you came into the world.

Later, like the prodigal son, you drifted far away from yourself. Now you are being called back. When you return, your faith will become conscious. The Son of God will be able to reveal Himself within you. Your coming to yourself will be identical with your coming to Christ.

*

You are reluctant? You say that religion is irrelevant? I fully agree with you. The question is only how relevant relevancy is. How relevant are you and I? How relevant is your or my opinion about what is relevant?

Walls determine the size of a room. Only the empty space between the walls makes the room useful. So does the empty space within the cup. We live on what is empty, not on what is full. For walking, are only the soles relevant? The whole foot walks. But the foot could not walk without those things which seem irrelevant to walking, like the heart, the lungs, the cortex, the spine, the law of gravity, the atomical and chemical structure of the earth, and the way itself.

Yes, religion is irrelevant. You can live without it, but you can also live without art, without books, without literacy, without trousers, without fresh air, without sunshine, without loving and being loved. But such an existence does not deserve the name "life". It is the "irrelevant" things which make life beautiful and rich in meaning.

You ask yourself what Jesus can give you. Why must someone be useful to you in order to be your love? Why this constant search only after what is relevant? Men followed Jesus long ago, when He predicted only His death on the cross and His own resurrection, long before He promised eternal life also to others.

Mary Magdalene loved Him and washed His feet with her tears, having no idea that she could obtain from Him forgiveness of sins and a place in paradise. She loved Him just for love's sake. Do the same!

*

Arise! Do not stop at the beggarly things which are "relevant!"

Life has changed more in the last fifty years than in the 5,000 before. Some are interested in quasars and novas and the expansion of our universe, others in mesons and quarks, others in genes. Do not busy yourself only with trivia, with things which minister only to creature comforts. Seek the ultimate reality. Seek the explanation of the whole. Seek God!

If you do, a thousand questions may arise in your mind, questions a true Christian teacher may ignore. The teacher from God does not teach what the pupil chooses but what the teacher considers good for him to learn. In spiritual things one does not need the answer to innumerable religious problems but rather what Jesus calls "poverty in spirit". The soul must become calm as the sea, which mirrors the beauties above.

The proper teacher does not answer questions. Neither am I prepared to give you complicated replies to your multitudinous queries. The best thing for a teacher of religion to do is to efface himself, to withdraw into the shadows, not to be the embodiment of a word of God, but only a voice through which the Master might say whatever word He wishes, or a silent lute awaiting His desires.

When Alexander the Great asked the philosopher Diogenes, "What can I do for you?" Diogenes answered, "Get out of the sun". This is what souls thirsty for God should say to theologians. The purpose of the present book is not to speak to you about Jesus, but to allow Jesus to appear Himself. He who became incarnate within an unknown stable, who became enshrined in the written Word, now humbles Himself even further. He uses the voice of a sinner to make attentive to the whisper of your own inner voice, which is the voice of your conscience.

There are men who tell you, "Fight capitalism", or "Fight Communism", or "Fight Islam". Suppose one of these fights succeeds, what will be the difference? Nazism was fought against victoriously. Has the world become any better since? There are men who tell you, "Do not fight either capitalism, or Communism, or Islam. Make peace with them". What kind of peace can there be between those who hate each other? Peace is not the absence of war but the presence of love. There are men who tell you, "Do not care about fighting or making peace with capitalism, Communism, or Islam". If I care about none of the great problems of humanity, what have I a mind for? I say, leave them all! Seek God! He is all you need. When you have Him, you have the answer to all problems, because the problems will not be problems for you any more. Jesus says, "I am the life". This applies to you, too. You will simply live your life with Jesus at the controls, and this will be His life.

The eroding doubt will disappear. Jesus once asked one of his disciples, "Why did you doubt?" Peter had walked on the water and had been in danger of drowning. The disciple never answered the Saviour's question, neither did the latter insist. If He had, Peter could have answered, "I doubted that I would be saved from this deadly danger, because you are incalculable. So many of those who believe in God drown. Sometimes they escape in a miraculous manner. But you never know how it will be in your case". Peter would still have been wrong to doubt. This because, once you belong to Jesus, life and death are the same to you. He is eternal. So are you, because the distinction between "he" and "you" does not exist. Grammar has no place in real religion.

Our adversaries say that religion is a kind of opium, an illusion. Well, is every illusion wrong? The man who drowns has the illusion of sleeping on soft cushions, the man who freezes, of resting near a heated oven. Some illusions are mechanisms of defence that help us pass over difficult moments. There exist good and bad illusions, as there exist good and bad thoughts. An illusion can be a loving mother who passes her breasts through iron bars and gives her imprisoned and dismayed child to suck. Illusions are a tremendous force. They can give new life and strength to those who are almost lost.

But the comfort of Christ is no illusion. It is reality.

You will ask how I know this. Christians believe that Buddhists and Hindus, and Jews, and Moslems, and atheists, and agnostics are all mistaken. They consider others to be taken in by myths. But what can happen to others can happen to Christians, too. They should check on their own beliefs, lest they be beguiled by myths.

An evangelist once told a Jewish boy of twelve that Jesus was the Son of God and that he would be lost if he did not believe on Him. Very earnestly the boy answered: "Pastor, the contrary also holds true. If Jesus is not the Son of God, and you believe on Him, you are lost". We must know that everyone, whether Hindu, or Jew, or atheist, or Mormon, or Catholic, or Protestant, rests his eternal life on what he believes; and nobody can simply dismiss the question of whether or not Christ is a myth.

Kant rendered mankind a great service. He showed, as nobody had before, to what extent the world is manufactured by the mind. We catch impressions through our senses; the impressions are categorized by our minds according to causality, finality, quality, quantity, modality. Out of this we construct a universe, our inner universe, through intricate operations of the mind. Then we speculate about these notions and make hem more and more abstract. Our notion of Godhead is surely also the manufacture of our mind.

How far does it correspond to reality?

The possibility of deception is enormous. The adherents of all religions believe that the majority of mankind is deceived, because everyone believes that only his religion, or his lack of religion, is the truth. So, if the majority of mankind is deceived, this possibility exists for me, too.

Within the framework of religion, assuming the existence of God is already accepted, there still exists the possibility of deception. The Pharisees of old were sure that through their teachings they opened to men the gates of the Kingdom of Heaven. Then came Jesus proclaiming that their teaching closed the gates of the Kingdom. The Pharisees allowed themselves to be slaughtered for their faith. Jesus died, asserting ~His~ belief. Which of the two is true?

Dante says in his ~Divina Comedia~: "Midway upon the journey of my life, I found myself in a dark wood, where the right way was lost". This is the experience of all thinking men.

We have one sure truth, and that is the quest for truth in the minds of men. A sure truth is that there exists in mankind an incessant search for the true, that mankind takes enormous pains to sift the true from the false, and this sometimes in a completely disinterested manner.

Why should we trouble ourselves to learn whether the sun goes around the earth or the earth around the sun? A knowledge of the truth about this makes not one penny's worth of difference to any one of us. Notwithstanding, we all pursue such incessant quests, impelled by an instinct which tells us that truth is desirable and should be followed.

In this quest we meet Jesus.

He does not make excessive claims.

He does not teach us to consider the founders of other religions as being His competitors or His enemies. In Solomon's Song (SOS 1:7) the other religious bodies are called flocks of the companions - not the rivals - of Jesus.

He does not speak about Himself as being only the truth. There exists one sentence in the Gospel of John (14:6) in which everything depends on punctuation.

What is the correct punctuation of Jesus' words, "I am the way the truth and the life"? I would say, "I am the way: the truth and the life."

Bottles of medicine are mostly mixtures. Jesus Himself says that in His teaching He gives us a mixture. He had in mind the circumstances of the way which everyone of us has to follow, the answer to the quests of truth, and the necessities of life.

Life based on truth alone would be impossible. How could we live calling every hunchback a hunchback and every ugly girl ugly? Life is basically unfair, endowing men so differently and burdening the majority of us with undeserved handicaps. We must say the truth without crushing life.

A boy was given two dimes: one for Sunday school, one for candies. He stumbled, and the coins rolled away. One he recovered, the other fell into the gutter. He said, "Well, Lord, there goes your dime".

Truth declares: one coin for candies, one for the Lord. Life always loses the coin reserved for holy purposes. Then truth condescends: "Would you not give at least one penny of the remaining coin or at least a sincere regret that nothing has been left for God?"

Jesus dwelt among us "full of grace and truth" (JHN 1:14). Which is more important, "grace" or truth"? The most important word is "and", the sign that we have a combination. Then the order of the two. Grace comes first. "And of His fulness have all we received, and grace for grace" (JHN 1:16). As to our receiving truth, the Lord has to wait longer. He is patient. He knows that nobody on earth can walk a straight line, the earth being a sphere.

There is in everyone a quest for truth and also a rebellion against its demands, and a doubting of the truth when it is discovered. Jesus is the only founder of religion who proclaims Himself to be the truth, and even more, the Son of God and at the same time is an embodiment of doubt as to His own calling. He cries on the cross, "My God, My God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?" He is the synthesis between truth and doubt of the truth, and therefore He is the truth.

If Jesus had been an invention, the ones who invented Him would never have written in their gospels that they themselves had doubts about Him. They would never have said that they doubted Him, even after His resurrection. The Gospel is the only religious book of the world which expresses the truth together with doubts about this same truth. Therefore, it is truth.

In Jesus, we meet God, a God who became specific, born in the fifteenth year of the reign of Caesar Augustus. He is not questionable, but He questions Himself and He is questioned even after His resurrection by His apostles. Therefore He is the truth on whom we can rely.

Yea, more. There is no believer to whom blasphemous thoughts do not occasionally occur, thoughts of quarrelling with God. Religious men repress these thoughts, which are part of their being. Thus they incapacitate their mind for the full truth. (Temptations should be brought to the bar of reason.)

The Bible is the only holy book of the world which propagates the loftiest ideas about God, at the same time saying scandalous things about Him; for instance, that He shall put a bridle in the jaws of a people - His creation - and will cause them to err (ISA 30:28), or that He is a slave trader (Joe 3:8).

In EZE 6:12, God describes Himself as sending upon His chosen people famine and pestilences and blood and the sword.

God's prophet Jeremiah says to Him, "O God, thou hast deceived me; will thou be indeed to me as a deceitful brook and as waters that fail?"

The Bible praises God and expresses at the same time the harshest criticism which can be brought by the human mind against Him. By this we know it to be the truth. Then it dissolves these contradictions in a superior harmony.

*

Many say: "I already have a religion. Is not one as good as another? Why must I become a Christian?"

It is because Christianity contains the truth.

All religions are not alike. To put them on the same level would be like saying, "I like music so much that I do not care what kind of music it is, Beethoven or the Beatles". Religious people have to make a difference between the right religion and the wrong.

Christianity is the right religion because it comprehends in its all embracing love, all other religions, and even the irreligious. It is the only religion in whose holy book it is written that we should not believe only "Christianity". The essence of Christianity is love, and ~love believes everything~, not only Christianity (1CO 13:7).

It is the only religion which tells us not to restrict ourselves only to what this religion teaches, but to think on ~whatsoever~ things are honest, ~whatsoever~ things are just, ~whatsoever~ things are pure, ~whatsoever~ things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report (PHP 4:8), from whatever quarter these things come. And because it already embraces what is good and right from all quarters, it does not need to unite with any other religion.

It is ~the~ religion.

There are many partial truths. Jesus is ~the~ truth, the whole truth.

During His earthly life throngs of people followed Him. He promised them nothing except a cross. Some followed Him because He cured and gave bread. But reason cannot explain why so many should have followed Him unselfishly at least for a time. People normally follow only demagogues, who promise them heaven on earth but can never deliver. Jesus was beloved because the glory of divine beauty shone upon His face. Sinners followed Him because He was full of grace and truth. He said simply, "Cone unto Me", and they came. He says to you, "Come unto Me". Simply, come!

*

You might say, "But I am a man of science. I cannot believe in all kinds of miracles such as the virgin birth. I know that there are laws of nature and that they cannot be broken". They have not been broken in the case of Jesus. For a being like Him, the natural thing was to be born of a virgin. For a being like Him, it was natural to do things which no other man could do.

But in any case, the virgin birth and other miraculous incidents of His life which you accept with difficulty are of secondary importance. If somebody unites or equates a higher truth with lesser truth, the more important suffers and ultimately dies because of this misalliance. Nobody has ever called you to come to the virgin birth. You are called to come to Jesus. Come!

But do not dismiss lightly the virgin birth. Boris Pasternak, the Nobel prize-winner brought up under Communism, wrote in ~Doctor Zhivago~, "Christ's miraculous birth teaches us that life should consist of the unusual instead of the commonplace, the festive instead of the workaday".

We call you to Jesus not because He is good, but because for you He became sin. In this sense, Jesus is not above you, He is below you. In order to come to Him, you do not have the difficulty of climbing but the ease of descending.

How many sins have you committed in this life? Have you murdered a hundred men? Jesus has taken upon Himself the murder of millions. Have you committed ten robberies? Jesus has taken upon Himself thousands of robberies. How many adulteries have you committed? Jesus has taken upon Himself the sexual impurity of millions of men.

So with lies, and with all other sin.

He meets with a sinner, a Canaanite woman, and addresses her with an admiring "@!" In MTT 8:10, it is written that when Jesus heard the words of a Roman centurion, He marvelled at him and paid him a compliment.

It is a great thing to be an adorer of Jesus. It is an even greater thing to be a man admired by Jesus. Jesus knew this centurion to be a sinner, but how many sins did He have? Jesus took upon Himself, as His own, many more sins than those of the centurion.

In the Song of Solomon, there are the very words that the heavenly Bridegroom, Jesus, says to His Bride: "I will go ~up to~ the palm tree" (SOS 7:8). His approach to us is an ascension. Our approach to Him is one of condescension to the greatest sinner who has ever existed. There has never been a greater murderer, thief, robber, or liar than Jesus Christ- only not in the sense that He committed these offences Himself, but that, in a more profound way, He took them upon Himself. They are His!

It is easy to come to Jesus.

Are there some features in Jesus' character and teaching, are there some flaws in His life, which you dislike? He also disliked them. He refused categorically the title "good teacher" replying that only one is good, and that is God. He did not please Himself (ROM 15:3), which means that if you had asked Him, "What opinion do you have of yourself?", He would have answered, "A bad one". He appropriated to Himself the sins of all men of all times. He felt them as burdening Himself.

Even if you dislike some things in His earthly life, come to Jesus! He did the things you dislike, because He had taken upon Himself your sinfulness and mine.

I once had a vision.

Surprised, I saw myself descending into a very low valley. I had believed heaven to be above us. A beautiful female angel, who guided me lovingly, explained that because many could not reach heaven, which was originally very high, because not all could bear the cold of the northern peaks, the heavenly had descended below any lowness. However low I might be, it would always be lower. We can be in heaven not only in sublime moments, but also in moments of despair.

*

A poor farm woman brought her daughter to the capital so that she might earn money as a maid. From what she could send home, they will be able to buy some land and cattle.

The girl was beautiful and clever. She learned quickly that in a big city a girl like her could earn much more by not working than by working. She succeeded in attracting rich lovers. Passing from one to another, she gathered jewels, cars, and furs, and indulged in a life of fun.

In her life of pleasure, she forgot about her old mother altogether. One day she remembered her painfully. Taking the train to her village, she arrived late at night. Approaching the gate of her mother's house, she discovered that it was wide open. She was surprised, because she knew it had always been locked with great care.

She passed through the yard and saw that the room in which her mother slept had the light on. When she was on the threshold, the mother called from inside, "Jean, is it you?"

"Yes, mother. But how is it that the gate is wide open so late at night?"

"My daughter, for ten years, ever since you left, the gate has never been locked."

"And how is it that there is light in your room so late?"

"My daughter, for ten years the light has never been off. The loving heart of a mother waited for you."

The heavenly Jerusalem is our mother. She waits for us.

You are uneasy, "If I accept Jesus, I have to accept the Bible, too. And it has been proven to be full of many errors".

People who have never read the Bible in the original languages in which it was written maintain that it cannot contain errors. I can assure you that it is full of "errors". Grammatical errors abound in it. They are in almost every sentence. Luther knew it, and his answer was that God does not speak words of grammar, but true realities. Sun, moon, heaven earth, you, and I - we are words of God, His poem, verses and rhymes of His creation. Nature, reality appear in our mind.

as incoherent. The Bible is errorless just because it reflects this incoherence.

A very frequent grammatical error in the Hebrew Bible is, for instance, the fact that the substantive is in the singular and the verb is in the plural. The question is only, whose is the error? I believe that the grammar is at fault and not the Bible. In English it would be like writing "He do a thing" instead of "He does". Grammatically it is wrong because grammar is false. Grammar begins with the supposition that there can exist a unitary "he" who does. But every "he" is very complex, with many contradictory impulses. Every "he" is a multiplicity. Therefore, the verb applied to him has to be in the plural form. So it happens that the Bible is full of "errors" and is always right. The standards of right and wrong wherewith we measure the Bible may be wrong. The Bible contains "errors" only because our notion of what is an error is erroneous.

"But to receive Jesus means to pass your time uselessly praising God. By the way, what does He need our praises for? Why is He so jealous for His prestige?"

He does not need your praises. You have need to praise Him. He is the supreme good. If you do not praise Him, you will praise yourself or other inferior beings, and will thus bar the way of your advancement.

Pasteur should not have been humble. Men like him do well to assert themselves. The life of thousands is at stake in their being recognized. How much more, then, is God justified when He asks for praise.

*

I call you to Jesus, because He can make you a saint and the world needs saints. It has had plenty of politicians whose decisions have cost the lives of untold millions in foolish world wars and revolutions. It has had plenty of men of science, who provided the rulers of nations with the accoutrements of war and now with ultimate weapons. It has had a multitude of missionaries of many religions, who have created the religious confusion reigning in the world. It does not have saints enough. One more is needed. You should be this one. Come to Jesus!

Your relationship with Him will be complex. Some know Him only as their Saviour. That is like knowing someone only as one's dentist. Jesus is more than Saviour. He will be your Lord. He will be your child, as much as He was the virgin Mary's child. Jesus says these strange words, "Whosoever shall do the will of My Father which is in heaven, the same is ... my mother" (MTT 12:50). He will be your brother. He will be your bridegroom. (In Hebrew and in Greek, the languages of the Bible, the words for soul, "neshama" and "psyche", are female substantives.) Jesus is the son of Mary, the Son of man, the Son of David, the Son of God. Jesus never called His mother "mummy", but only "woman", because the word "mother" would have circumscribed His relationship toward her in too narrow a sphere. He was not only her Son, but also her Saviour.

So He will be very diverse in His relationship to you. But more, He will be yours in what He is in Himself, beyond all possible relationships which you can have toward a human being. You will have not only someone to save you, to instruct you, but you will have JESUS.

*

You may have attended church during a holy communion service. If not, do it out of curiosity. You will hear a priest or a pastor pronouncing over a piece of bread the words, "Take and eat this; this is my body broken for you". He means the body of Jesus Christ. Then he imparts a cup of wine, saying, "This is my blood shed for you for the remission of sins".

And the believers eat and drink, expressing by this act how intimately they appropriate to themselves the personality of Christ.

Jesus says that He takes all the sins of the world - that is, your sins too, all of them - upon Himself, that He bears their punishment and dies for them on the cross.

If you come to Jesus and become a Christian, you will have the right to partake of holy communion. The words of the pastor, "This is my blood given for you", will bring you the good news which remains always fresh, that every injustice done by you is undone, that all your wrong is set right and what has been crooked is straightened. You will be able to say, "I am justified", which means, "I am ~just as if I had~ never sinned". You are free from the past forever. You have no more consciousness of sin. Your wicked deeds have not been repaired, but erased; your wicked thoughts have been blotted out; your bad words have been cancelled.

The salvation of Christ is full and complete. He saves to the uttermost.

You have the choice of accepting this sacrifice which Christ made on your behalf or of bearing the responsibilities of your sins yourself. Do not take it lightly. God does not pay at the end of every week, but in the end He pays.

Think it over well. How will you answer for all your sins? Why not rather receive His salvation? You have only to believe in Him in order to be saved. You need not even ask Him for forgiveness for your sins.

*

An interesting part of the gospel is what is not written. For instance, you will never find mention that anybody asked forgiveness from Jesus for anything. People looked in His face and saw forgiveness written there. Peter once said such wrong things that Jesus had to call him "Satan". On another occasion, the disciples quarrelled about who should have the highest place in the kingdom. When Jesus was most in need of comfort, His disciples slept; they forsook Him and fled. Peter denied Him with oaths. Yet it never seemed to occur to any of them to say to Jesus, "I am sorry for what has happened". Neither will you have to use such words. Come to Jesus, even if you have a heart too proud to acknowledge that you have been mistaken. To forgive is His profession.

He saved Mary, His mother. Nothing was more natural. She was His flesh. But it is written about all Christians that they are "members of His body, of His flesh, and of His bones" (EPH 5:30). If I am a Christian and He does not take me to heaven, He will be there with some bone and muscles missing in His body. Who can imagine that He will not rather save us?

Your sinfulness is not a hindrance to your salvation. On the contrary, it is just what impels Him to save you. He understands all. Therefore He forgives all. If you can, pray to Jesus as Mary Magdalene does in ~Doctor Zhivago~, "Unbind my debt as I unbind my hair". If you cannot pray, just leave it and come to Jesus without prayer. He forgives. He knows what will be the result.

In times of old, there were two brothers: the older, a pious and good man, the younger a rascal. The older often entreated his younger brother to change his ways. He prayed for him But all was in vain. The teenager slid into worse and worse sins until one night he rushed into the room of his brother with blood-stained clothes and cried, "Save me! The police pursue me. I have committed a crime". The other one understood the situation. There was not much time for thinking. He told the criminal, "Let us change clothes". They scarcely had done this when the police appeared and, obviously, arrested the older brother because he was wearing the bloodstained clothes. He did not defend himself in court but on the contrary said "I bear the full responsibility for the crime".

The judges had no doubt about his guilt, as he had been dogged from the very spot of the crime and had been with traces of blood on his garments. He was sentenced to death. When asked about his last desire, he answered, "It is only one: that my brother should receive at the very moment of my execution this letter which I have written to him".

p035 VICTORIOUS FAITH

Next day, the youngster received the letter and read: "At his moment I die for your sin, in your bloodstained clothes. I am happy to perform this sacrifice for you. And I am sure that henceforth, in the white garment which I left you, you will lead a pure and holy life".

The youngster was overtaken with remorse. He tried to stop the execution. It was too late. But as often as his former comrades in revelry tried to call him to new wicked deeds, he replied, "In the pure garment left to me by my brother, who died on my behalf, I can no longer commit the evil deeds of earlier times".

Jesus knows that this will be the result of His sacrifice in our heart, too. He will save you, however sinful you might be.

If Judas had come to Jesus instead of trying to settle his ugly past with his ugly accomplices, we might know him today as St. Judas.

As a rubber erases a mistake, so does Jesus erase sins.

*

The angels were not disgusted by the sores on the corpse of the beggar called Lazarus. They carried him to Paradise. Jesus, who during His earthly life had not a place to lay His head, is not choosy. He gladly accepts your home and your heart as a place of rest. It is surely better than nothing.

You have sins and they are red like scarlet. If a source of light recedes from the observer, the spectral ray corresponding to this radiation will be red. Sins are called red in Scripture because they put a huge and ever-growing distance between you and God. But the white of purity is at your disposal. White is the plenitude of light. Jesus is the Light of the world. You can have Him.

Only thus can you become righteous. Everything else is cant.

p036 VICTORIOUS FAITH

We consider ourselves as righteous without this light only because we do not know the law of God.

A Brahman once boasted of the fact that he had never destroyed any living being in his life. Then a missionary showed him a drop of water under a microscope. The Brahman was afraid when he saw that he had swallowed innumerable beings as often as he had drunk water. But he quickly found a solution to ease his conscience. He destroyed the microscope. For the same reason, we set aside the Christian religion because it would show us our real state, that we are sinners.

When we realize that we are sinners, we abhor ourselves. We are disgusted at the state of our soul. Not so with God! The greatest pleasure for God is to exercise pity. Count von Zinzendorf wrote: "Nobody will have part of the mercy of God who has something of his own left, and something to show. Jesus is more thankful to men who give Him the opportunity to do something good for them, than when they attempt to do something good for Him. He prefers to see around Him men who need Him, instead of men who wish to do Him good. What should Jesus do for a righteous man? He seeks somebody in great need, and nobody is in bigger need than a sinner".

A prince once saw a tigress starving. Three cubs tried to suck her breast, but there was no milk. Now this prince was holy, and he pitied the beast. He knew self-sacrifice to be the highest virtue. He lay down near the tigress and cut his arm so that the sight of blood might arouse her natural appetite. He was devoured by her. But the tigress survived, and so did her little ones.

It is an insult to tigers to compare them with men. Tigers do not eat their own. Men kill their kin, even when they are not cannibals. Hitler killed millions of men. And he was a vegetarian.

Men had killed, had practised all the refinements of cruelty and sin. Now they were starving. Mankind lived on sin, and all sins had been committed already, save one: deicide. Men had betrayed one another, but they had never sold out a Son of God.

So Jesus lay down near the tigress. He came to mankind. He aroused their cruelty and hatred. In order to continue to live, they had to eat His body - as He Himself foretold - and drink His blood. The tigress devoured Jesus.

And behold, beastly mankind can live again! This led Michelangelos and Leonardos to enshrine the crime of the race in painting and sculpture; it led Beethoven and Bach to memorialize it in music; and mankind translated and printed this story of its deicide into 1,000 languages. Christian civilization has been built on this crime. Tigers live because of this crime - the Borgias, the Torquemadas, the non-excommunicated Catholic Hitlers of all centuries. This crime has allowed tigers to gather huge treasuries on which fat clergy live. But this crime was for some tigers the last. Horrified at what they had done, some tigers became tame. They became saviours of life instead of destroyers.

Perhaps you can understand from this what Jesus has done for us.

In COL 1:14, it is written that in Christ we have Redemption through His blood, even the forgiveness of sins.

If you are a citizen of, for instance, the United States, you have the privilege of living in a free country and of sharing in the benefits of its social welfare. In like manner, whosoever is in Christ and who belongs to Him has certain privileges, among which are redemption and forgiveness of all sins. We need this redemption, because we are sinners.

Dostoievsky wrote, "Every one of us is guilty of everything before everyone".

In 2CH 15:17, Asa, king of Judah, is reproached because places of idolatrous worship were not taken away out of another country, Israel.

p038 VICTORIOUS FAITH

Worthwhile social or religious institutions in your country can, by their example, have a good influence on like institutions in another country. Similarly, too, you are responsible for what is happening elsewhere. You need salvation, and you can have it through Jesus.

*

Jesus can save because He gave His life to make you righteous.

The Japanese philosopher Ekken writes, "If a man will not live his life for righteousness, he does not know the relative value of righteousness and life".

Jesus can save because He is the God-Man. Just as some chemical elements can combine only with certain other elements, not with all of them, so man is the only being who is compatible with God. God could not become animal or devil or vegetable or mineral.

Only a God-Man was possible, because we are of the same order; that is, we both have personality. Therefore, between man and God there is no possibility of distinguishing between the "I" and the "he". It is possible to distinguish God and man from animals or things. You can graft a fruit only on a fruit tree. You could never graft vegetables on a fruit tree. You could couple different breeds of sheep and get a hybrid. You cannot couple a rhinoceros and an insect. The fact that God could become man reflects the uniqueness of man. An unknown Greek poet quoted in the Bible (ACT 17:28) said rightly that we are God's offspring.

God could become only man. Men's sin attracted Him. He took it upon Himself. He gave His blood for our sins, and so He saved us.

*

You are a sinner. You are not guilty of this.

I may be born ugly or misshapen or with a low I.Q. This can be a terrible burden on me, which I have to face and deal with, though I have no guilt in my estate.

I was born a sinner. My parents and all my forefathers were sinners. It was not my choice. The Hebrew word for "sin" means "to miss the mark". We all fall short of the glory which would be ours without the innate sinfulness. It is there without my personal guilt.

The Old Testament tells the story of how Joseph, a Jew who had become ruler of Egypt, arraigned his brother Benjamin because in his sack had been found Joseph's silver cup. This cup had really been found in Benjamin's sack. But it is also true that Joseph had ordered his slaves to hide it there without the knowledge of Benjamin or of his many brothers. The purpose of Joseph in so doing was to develop a sentiment of solidarity in his brothers, who had shown themselves in times past to be very selfish men, even going so far as to sell their brother as a slave. Joseph wished to see if they would abandon Benjamin to his fate of suffering innocently as a thief or if they would stand behind him in his extremity. Fortunately, they stood the test of loyalty, and they were able to return to their father with great honour and an abundance of gifts.

Sin is a fact of life. It is due to some ancient happenings in which you had no personal part. It is a tragedy in which we all are involved and which is too deep to delve into. It is a tragedy somehow similar to being deformed or liable to so many painful and deadly sicknesses. We do not shrug the shoulder about being in the hospital, saying, "I have not created the virus". We fight it. A sickness may have its spiritual significance and value for us. Our sinfulness has its meaning in the universe. It makes us one with all other sinners. All mutual judgment disappears.

Dostoievsky tells the story of an angel who had no peace in heaven because of the torments through which the inhabitants of hell passed. Again and again he would descend asking them to remember at least some good deed which he then would bring before God as a plea to obtain their release. But these had done no good deeds. In the end, a lady remembered, "I gave an onion to a beggar. Is this not a good deed?" "It surely is," replied the angel. He flew to the archives of heaven and found in her file a note about the onion. He then took an onion to hell and told her, "Hold it with your hand. I also will hold it at the other end, and we will fly upwards. Thus you will arrive in heaven". They did so. The onion held well. The weight of the woman's body did not break it. She flew upward. When the others in hell saw this, they took hold of her garments, arms, feet. Others took hold of the feet of those who clung to the woman. Multitudes clustered beneath her, and the onion resisted. They all began to fly toward heaven. But the woman, looking down, saw them all and was afraid that the skin would be torn and she would fall. So she pushed the others away with her elbows, telling them, "Remain in hell, you sinners, who have never done anything good". In that moment, the onion broke. A sinner herself, she had judged others. This was the end of all her hopes. Because we are all sinners, we should love one another and not judge.

Do not seek the cause of your innate sinfulness! It is told in the story of Adam and Eve. Accept the fact that you are a sinner. There is a purpose in your sinfulness. And there is the possibility of being saved from sin. Jesus offers salvation. Get rid of the most deadly sickness of the world: sin!

President Coolidge of the United States was a man of few words. When he returned from church one Sunday, his wife asked him, "What did the pastor preach about?" He answered, "About sin." She asked again, "And what did he say?" Coolidge replied, "He's against it."

*

Jesus loves His whole creation. I learn this from his disciples. St. Isaac prayed every day for the whole creation. So do I. Jesus must be at least as good as I am. Nobody is excluded from His love.

Now, in this creation, there is the human race, to which a great catastrophe has happened. The race has fallen into sin. The life of every one of us has been marred by it. No one has quite escaped the stain of sin upon his name.

The remembrance of past sins makes us torment ourselves and others. There are today countless trouble-makers in the world. Nobody is a trouble-maker unless he is troubled himself. What troubles him are deeply rooted complexes, which very often are the result of past sins.

Now, how can sin be dealt with?

In times past, people would put their hands upon an animal so that atonement might be made for their sins. With some people, the ritual sacrifice was not an animal but another man, usually a slave. Such ritual murders exist even today among primitive peoples.

The Bible tells us in HEB 10:6 that God has no pleasure in burnt offerings and sacrifices. Our past sins should not be allowed to torment anybody in the world. They should not torment our fellowmen. Neither should we torment ourselves with endless remorses. Past sins must not be a motive for you to fill the pockets of clergy in order to receive absolution. Sin must not be a motive for squandering energy. Quietly accept the fact that we are sinners!

We have not become sinners by sinning. You sinned because you were a sinner. You will not become a thief by stealing. You steal because you are a thief. Sinfulness is your very nature, as it is the nature of every man. Except for Jesus, nobody who has ever lived on earth in human form has been anything other than a sinner. You must accept the fact that you have a nose, and hair, and lungs. These are part of being human. Accept also the fact that you are a sinner! Sin is part of being human.

Even saints sin. The apostles were sinners. Jesus told them in MRK 13:3 that Jerusalem and the Jewish state would be so utterly destroyed that stone would not remain upon stone. They did not pray for its preservation. They were not moved by the impending tragedy. They wished just to satisfy their curiosity when this would happen, although the happening had to mean death and slavery to millions of innocent people. They reacted to the words of Jesus like sinners.

As long as we dwell on earth, we will always have sins, as we will always have noses. They belong to human nature. But we can come to the point of having "no more conscience of sin" (HEB 10:2).

The lives of many of us are like a car which has lights only in the back, so that the driver can see through the rearview mirror how many chickens or dogs he has killed in his driving. The lights should be in the front to prevent one from killing people! There is the possibility of leading a life which is not burdened by yesterday's sins. We should be careful not to neglect today's duties or make wrong plans for the future.

The past is erased by the fact that Jesus gave for our salvation His blood, about which Justin the Martyr writes that "it was not of human seed, but from divine power". Christ's blood was different from ours in that it could cleanse from sin.

Jesus purposely used the psychological mechanism of transfer, one of the powerful drives of the human soul.

It is part of sinful human nature to seek a scapegoat for everything that goes wrong. If you have mislaid something in your house and cannot find it, you feel better if you can blame your wife or your child. You still miss the object, but you feel relieved by the presumption that somebody else is the culprit.

A child hurts himself on a stool or table. If the mother beats the bad stool which has hurt the child, the child does not feel any more pain and begins to laugh.

Unscrupulous politicians often use this mechanism of transfer, putting the whole blame for everything wrong in the world on the Jews, the Blacks, the Whites, the Communists, the bourgeoisie, the king, the opposition party. "American imperialists" are the scapegoats for the poverty of the world. But American imperialism is only sixty years old! There was poverty long before its rise, there was poverty before the very discovery of America, there was poverty before the first capitalist made his appearance, there was poverty under feudalism, under slavery and under primitive Communism. There is poverty under socialism, but we all need scapegoats!

Now, Jesus has also used this mechanism of transfer, which is so often misused, but in a good sense. Men seek a scapegoat, but there is something in man which makes him realize at least in part that his own convictions about the guilt of his scapegoats is illogical. Anti-Semitism existed before Hitler, tyranny before the Bolsheviks. One person or one institution cannot be blamed for social problems as old as humanity. But men need a scapegoat.

Therefore, God the Creator became man, and He tells us, "I take the full responsibility for everything that happens in My creation. I knew when I created man that man would fall into sin, but notwithstanding I created him. So I take upon Myself the responsibility for your sins, too. Instead of seeking other scapegoats, put all your sins upon me! I will gladly expiate them. I will bear the punishment of your sins". This satisfies the human mind. Now we have found the real Lamb, on which the sins of the whole world can be placed. He dies for our sins, and we no longer bear a guilty conscience.

We have in heaven a powerful intercessor with the Father who has been tempted in all things like us.

I happened to be a prisoner for a long period of time in a Communist country. I had as fellow prisoners a multitude of former judges and prosecutors, sentenced because they had, at one time, tried Communists. When these judges and prosecutors who had formerly administered the law were themselves forced to endure the hardships of prison life, they all said that if they were ever judges again, they would never hand down the harsh sentences they had given before. They had never realized before that five years of prison written as a sentence on a sheet of paper is not the same as five years spent behind bars. Nobody spends five years in prison. You make every day of prison separately, and each minute of each day is a pain apart. The experience of suffering changes a man's outlook on the question of punishment.

p044 VICTORIOUS FAITH

The incarnation of Jesus Christ and His death on the cross not only offered salvation to all who should believe on Him, but also enriched the Godhead! Therefore, it is written in Solomon's Song, SOS 3:11, "Go forth, O ye daughters of Zion and behold king Solomon with the crown, wherewith his mother crowned him in the day of his espousals". Solomon is here a type of Jesus Christ.

From eternity Jesus Christ has had many crowns, but the most beautiful was given to Him by his blessed mother, Mary, when He, as God, espoused human nature. God had always judged men righteously, but He had judged them from the divine perspective. But when God became man, He saw human life from a human perspective. He knew by experience what it meant to be a poor child belonging to a despised race, to be hungry, to have nowhere to lay His head, to be tempted by woman, to be scourged, to be unjustly sentenced. God has been enriched through the experience of Jesus Christ. Not only does He save, but - as it is written in the Greek of COL 2:1 - "he graces our offences". God adds to our offences the grace of His own experience of human life. He has full understanding of our offences and forgives them whole-heartedly.

*

When you visit Jerusalem, you find something which puzzles the average tourist, but which the spiritual man would expect. There are two places considered to be the garden of Gethsemane where Jesus was arrested, there are several places of crucifixion, two tombs where He lay, and several places from which He is supposed to have ascended. This corresponds entirely to the fact that one gospel puts His crucifixion at the third hour, while another puts it at the sixth. According to one gospel, Judas the traitor participated in holy communion; according to another he was absent.

Historically, the sacrifice on Golgotha and the events connected with it happened just once. But this was the expression of a liturgical, cosmic drama happening continually at different hours in different places under different circumstances, as the walls of Jericho, the cursed city, fell - archaeologists say - at various times during its history. Those belonging to the body of Christ have passed always and continue to pass through Gethsemanes, crucifixions and ascensions. Jesus suffered that you might be saved. This was a unique event. Christians suffer in persecutions that you might know about salvation, because it is the blood of the martyrs which is the seed of the church.

Behind Jesus and His suffering church is the Father who sacrifices His only Son for our salvation.

Is it right to sacrifice an innocent being for the salvation of sinners? According to our human standards - no! We would not consider a man righteous who, with power to prevent it, would nevertheless give his son to be scourged, spat upon, and crucified in order to save criminals from well-deserved punishment. God is righteous, but He has a righteousness apart, which we attribute to Him by faith. Only by doing so, only by considering righteous a God who, according to our standards, would not be so, can we apprehend that God considers as righteous sinners who, according to divine standards, would deserve only condemnation.

We cannot understand God's ways, but we know from His Word that He is prompted by love. Love frees us from sin. Love always frees. The word "free" comes from the old Etruscan word "freo", the Gothic "frion", which means "to love".

In Macedo-Romanian, they do not have the word "to love". They use in its stead "to will". God not only loves you. He "wills" you with His all-powerful will. He wills to have you. All your resistance is in vain.

He loves you in the supreme sense of the word "love", which is to want somebody even if having him means death.

p046 VICTORIOUS FAITH

Therefore His love could not be expressed by any other means than a painful death, by way of Golgotha.

On Golgotha, your debt toward God was paid. Your sins were expiated.

The greatest penitent does not desire to have his sins forgiven so much as God desires to forgive them. Proof of this is that none of us is so eager to give an hour for prayer or money for a Christian cause as God was eager to give His Son for our salvation.

*

You are not like Jesus. You will continue to sin. But you will say about every sin of yours, "It is not mine; it belongs to Jesus, who will deal with it".

But will not the remembrance of past sins continue to trouble you?

I once told a mass-murderer the story of the two brothers, quoted above, in which the older gave his life for the younger, asking from him only one thing: to live henceforth, in the white garment which he had left him, an unspotted life. The murderer became a Christian. I asked him some time later if he was joyous at having been freed of his past through the sacrifice of Christ, our older Brother. His answer was, "I will be joyous only when an occasion arises in which I am able to play toward another sinner the role of the older brother and suffer for him". The occasion presented itself, and he became a happy man.

You can be happy even without such special occasions. Every man who becomes a Christian becomes an innocent sufferer because he bears punishment he no longer deserves. Immanuel Kant wrote, "The criminal has a right to punishment". A former murderer, liar, adulterer, drunkard, or sinner of whatever kind will continue to suffer the results of his past life even after his conversion. Through repentance he has become an entirely new creature who normally would not have to suffer. The sorrows and pains which the new man suffers for the old man are a continuation of the sufferings of Christ. Do not worry: you will have your part of suffering and also the joy of being able to suffer. But you will have been saved from all your sins.

Is a man who has been cleansed from all his sins still a man? The question is legitimate. He will not be a mere man any more but a child of God, a partaker of the divine nature.

Up to a certain stage, the embryo of a man cannot be distinguished from the embryo of an ape, which does not mean that the difference does not exist. The proof of its existence is that one embryo becomes a man, while the other becomes an animal. So those around you will not be able to distinguish easily between you, a child of God, and some good moral man. But there will be a tremendous difference. There might still be many sinful things in your life, but you are saved.

Good moral men who do not believe in Christ are also sinners, and their fate is to suffer the pangs of hell and eternal separation from God.

In English, the word "love" means very different things in the propositions "I love apple pie", "I love Mummy", and "I love God". So "eternal" may not mean the same thing when applied to heaven and to hell. But in any case, those without Christ will be lost and will have to suffer, whereas for you, a child of God, "dying" will mean entrance into a new, beautiful world. Death wears for us a mild face.

Do not worry about whether hell is eternal in the absolute sense of the word or whether it might end after a very long period of torment! It is an idle question.

If Jesus had said this much, that the punishment for sin will be to have boiling water poured just once over your whole naked body, would you commit the sin? One thing is sure from the revelation given by Jesus: it is that the punishment for sin will be worse than this.

*

We are saved by the grace of Christ. With our sins we pierced His heart, and from this pierced heart came blood which cleanses us from these sins.

The Bible records for use the seven words spoken by Jesus on the cross:

(1) A prayer: "Father, forgive them because they do not know what they do".

(2) A word to a thief crucified near Him: "Amen, amen I say unto you, Today you will be with me in paradise".

(3) A cry of despair: "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?"

(4) A word to John about Mary: "Behold, your mother" and a word to her: "Behold, your son".

(5) An expression of need: "I thirst".

(6) A word of assurance: "It is fulfilled".

(7) A word of prayer again: "Father, into thy hands I surrender my spirit".

Through Christ's suffering on the cross we are saved.

But tradition records an eighth saying of the crucified Lord. Jesus, it is said, told the soldier who would soon pierce Him, "Friend, there is a shorter road to my heart than that".

*

Jesus saves not only from sin, but also from the solitude which oppresses so many. You will enter into close communion with Mary, the mother of the Lord, the saints of all ages, the angels, and more: you will walk continually in the companionship of the Lord Himself. You will also find loving brethren and sisters in the faith.

*

Jesus saves from the tyranny of the circumstances of life. The beautiful lotus flower grows out of mud and filth. It thrives in unattractive places. It blossoms where oppressive poverty reigns. It furnishes breathless purity in stinking yards. So will be your new life: full of glory even if it is poverty- and sorrow-ridden. You will live far above your environment. Out of misery, poverty and dirt, holiness will come.

You have been a slave of your surroundings. Now you will be free.

At an auction in Lexington in the United States, a beautiful slave, Elsa, was for sale. The young Methodist minister Fairbank competed with a Frenchman. When the Frenchman hesitated to raise the bid, the auctioneer pulled Elsa's dress back, showing her breasts: "Who is going to lose a chance like this?" Later, he lifted her skirts to bare her body: 'Who is going to be the winner of this prize?" Fairbank got her and said, "I bought her to free her".

All kinds of political and religious movements wish to have you for their own pleasure and profit. Jesus desires nothing from you for His own good. He paid the biggest price - His own life - just out of love, to free you, for your good.

All honour to Pastor Fairbank. He served seventeen years in prison for anti-slavery activities. But who can put in words the honour due to Jesus, who died on the cross to set us free from the slavery of sin, death, and circumstances?

*

There is no limit to our future growth. It is not only until death that you will grow in knowledge of God and virtues and inner beauty. In a parable, Jesus teaches us to allow the children of His kingdom and the children of the wicked one to grow not until death, but until the end of the world (MTT 13:40). Christian will grow after death, too.

We have a very high aim. We wish to become like Christ.

What we are has been fixed by circumstances without our consent. Our real "I" is what we would like to be, if ordering of things were in our hands. In our hours of religious meditation and contemplation, we dream about being a Jesus in miniature. Fortunately, we have more than our short earthly life to reach this goal.

Jesus saves from anxiety. You know that God is love, and you do not have to worry.

With God on his side, one of the heroes of the Old Testament, Joshua, slew giants like Og and Sihon. You also will defeat huge forces gathered against you. Your quietness will give you the victory.

When my son Mihai was small, he once asked me, "Father, what should I do? I am bored". I replied, "Think about God!" He said, "Why should I with my little head think about the great God? Let Him, with his big head, think about me, the little child".

Christ is the head of the church. As long as there are no wrinkles on his brow, there is no reason for you to have wrinkles on yours.

If Jesus is the head, let Him think! The leg does not have to think, nor does the head have to walk. Therefore Jesus said, "~Take no thought~ how or what you shall speak" (MTT 10:19), and, "~In such an hour as ye think not~, the Son of man cometh" (MTT 24:44).

For a Christian it is false even to think rightly. His mind is passive in order to receive impulses from Christ. It is never active on its own.

Luther sometimes went to the window in the evening and asked, "God, is it my world or yours? Is it my Church or yours? If it is your world and your church, take care of them! I go to bed. Good night, my God!"

You do not have to carry the whole burden of your life. God carries it.

*

Freedom from anxiety in the Christian life goes very deep. You do not have to worry even about your mistakes. In every mistake you make in life lies the seed of an equivalent benefit.

p051 VICTORIOUS FAITH

The Old Testament tells us about a lad, Joseph, who made the mistake of telling his brothers his dreams, which were offensive to them. This mistake resulted in Joseph's becoming ruler of Egypt. A Christian can have confidence even in his mistakes.

Just as you are not to worry about this life, so you are not to worry about the next.

Once when Baalshem, founder of the Hassidie movement in Judaism, passed through a period of despondency and feared that he had lost eternal life, he comforted himself with the words, "If I love God, why do I need eternal life?" What is eternal life if it is not the knowledge of God and His Son Jesus Christ?

Therefore, all worry for tomorrow ceases. Your food will be manna, and manna has to be collected daily. You cannot treasure it up for the next day.

Jesus saves from the fever of ambition. Jesus Himself was never worried because He was known by so few. He lived so as to make Himself worthy to be known.

Jesus will teach you not to cherish inordinate ambitions that goad you on, nor to stretch yourself beyond your reach. As a Christian, you will accept yourself with your assets and liabilities. You will never attempt the impossible, but you will measure the height of the tower for which you have material.

Jesus saves from complications in life. In EXO 20:25, God commands, "Thou shalt make an altar of unhewn stone", that is, a very simple one. The enemy of simplicity is our sense organs with their separate and limited functions. Chuang Tsu said, "The eye is a menace to clear sight, the ear a menace to subtle hearing, the mind is a menace to wisdom, every organ of the senses is a menace to its own capacity. Sad it is indeed that men should look upon these seats of menace as their greatest treasure". Man's real treasure is the inward vision, an over-all perception that can come into play only when the distinction between inside and outside, between self and things, between this and that has been entirely obliterated. This is the chaos, the ~tohu-vabohu~ as the earth was when God first created it. Every system of our mind is a falsification of the creation, which is not systematic. In science, Heisenberg finished with systematics, introducing the indeterminism factor. Things do not happen according to our systems.

Most men suffer from lopsidedness. Concentration on one segment of life prevents one from appreciating the whole gamut of human experience.

When you become a Christian, you become all-embracing.

Nietzsche wrote: "The wishing not to see what one sees and as one sees, is almost the first condition for all who are party in any sense. Every partyman becomes a liar. The eye sees according to points of view. Convictions are prisons. To be able to see, free of all convictions, is part of strength". Jesus is the truth beyond your convictions about what is true. He sets you free.

*

Men who do not belong to Jesus look at things from their own viewpoint. They do not know that every viewpoint is a point of blindness, because it incapacitates them for the understanding of every viewpoint which differs from theirs. From a certain viewpoint, a room has no entrance door. From another no window or no ceiling. You can know the room only by an intuition of the whole or by changing viewpoints.

Jesus saves you from viewpoints. Reality is not only material. It contains also spirit. So it knows itself. Jesus is the Logos, the self-knowledge of material and spiritual reality.

Jesus saves us from a limited horizon. Just as there exist sound waves beyond human perception, so there are light waves which we cannot see. We see only wave lengths between 3800 and 7600 Angstr”ms. Below 3800 are the ultraviolet, the X- and Gamma-waves; above 7600 are the micro- and radio-waves. Through instruments, we see many times as much reality as with the unaided eye. But there exist in addition farsightedness (the church elders are called in the Greek Bible "presbyters", far-seers), insight clear vision, the mystic vision, and above all, the beatific vision, the seeing of God face to face. Whoever does not have these is still more or less blind. We consider the eye the organ of sight, when in fact it prevents us from seeing the ultimate realities. Jesus saves us from the illusions of our senses.

The sun and the moon quarrelled once. The sun said, "The leaves on the trees are green", whereas the moon said, "They are silver". The moon said, "Men usually sleep", whereas the sun said, "They are usually in motion". "Why then is there such a silence on the earth?" the moon asked. "Who told you this?" the sun wondered. "There is much noise on earth."

So they debated. And then the wind appeared. He heard the talk and laughed. "What is this whole quarrel about? I blow when both the sun and the moon are in the firmament. During the day, when the sun shines, it is as the sun says. There is noise on earth, all men move, and the leaves are green. But during the night, when the moon shines, everything changes. Men sleep, silence reigns, and the leaves get a silver colour. When clouds cover the moon, the leaves even become black. Neither you, sun, nor you, moon, know the whole truth."

Jesus is master of sun, moon, wind, clouds. He sees reality as a whole. It is His understanding of the full truth which He imparts to His disciples.

He is the full truth because He is the only one in whom truth has never been distorted by sin. Every sinner is emotionally attached to something wrong, and this throws a shadow on the truth. Christ was sinless and knew Himself to be so. He was never hesitant or uncertain in dealing with others. He never questioned the wisdom of having been too severe. He never asked Himself if He should not have been gentler. His life was woven in one piece as was His garment. He came to each new duty untrammelled by accusing memories. Thus He was able to speak with authority. He was able to proclaim Himself as truth.

p054 VICTORIOUS FAITH

The church to which you will belong if you receive Christ is the continuation of His incarnation. You will walk through life with the same assurance He had.

*

Without the full truth, your whole life will be a failure and, if you are a very gifted person, a catastrophe for others. The greatest mischief to mankind has been imposed by its geniuses, if they propagated with art and skill or enforced by dictatorial measures their limited viewpoints. How useful they could have been if they had renounced their own viewpoints for the truth as it is in Jesus.

*

Jesus frees you from reason in matters of faith. Luther says, "Whosoever wants to be a Christian should tear the eyes out of his reason and not know anything of it, and even kill it as one who will not enter into the Kingdom of heaven". Christians sacrifice their intellect and so get rid of its unavoidable errors, when it interferes in a sphere where it cannot be effective.

*

Seekers after truth must take heed to two warnings. One given by Tertullian: "Christ did not call Himself the custom but the truth". The multitude worship custom. The Christian will find himself with the minority or even alone. The second warning was given by Emerson, and it derives from the first: "God offers to every man the choice between truth and repose. You cannot have them both".

*

Jesus saves from hatred.

It is remarkable that the Evangelists tell the story of Jesus' sufferings without one single bad word or epithet for those who inflicted the sufferings on Him. The only exception is Judas, who is called a traitor.

p055 VICTORIOUS FAITH

The apostles had no resentments, no grudges. Therefore there is restraint in the style of their writings.

You will be saved from hatred, too.

Why should you hate a man? If he does wrong things, it is because he does not know what he does. You who know the law of God will treat him with benevolence and justice.

Jesus is a very complex being. He has many aspects.

The Hebrew language does not have a word for "face" in the singular. It has only the plural "panim" - "faces". Every Hebrew word which ends in "-im" is plural. There is a deep meaning to this fact. The Hebrew language, in which the revelation of God has been given, does not acknowledge that a man has only one face. We all have many faces. Therefore, the labels "murderer", "thief", "crook", "saint", "Protestant", "Catholic", "reactionary", "revolutionist", are all false. Men cannot bear one label because they have many dimensions, and every one of us is an alloy.

Iron exists only as a concept in our mind. In nature, you will never find iron alone. You find it always allied with something else. The same is true of men. To approach or receive a man puts you already in a relationship with a very complex being. You might be very much attracted to his physical appearance, while his character might be repulsive. Highly intelligent people can be very wicked. One's relationship toward a man must be based on the different aspects of his mental, physical, and spiritual qualities.

This is all the more true in our relationship with Jesus.

To come to Jesus means to come to the saving Jesus, to the suffering Jesus, to the fighting Jesus, to the crowned Jesus, to the whole Jesus, and through Him to God.

*

It is really not easy to find God. We are before God as the judge before a defendant who refuses to testify. We must find God by means of presumptions.

p056 VICTORIOUS FAITH

It is very difficult to find a being defined by St. Augustine as a circle, which has its centre everywhere and its boundaries nowhere.

Modern technical knowledge and the miracle of television allow men to be everywhere, the centre of a circle with a very wide boundary. To a small degree this helps us understand a Being with no boundaries at all and a centre everywhere.

If God has His centre everywhere, I reckon myself to be the centre. I find Him then within myself.

I begin by trying to see God in what He has created. In PRO 20:12, it is written that Jehovah God is the one who made the hearing ear. It is enough to think about your ears, to come to a belief in God. The curves, hills and gullies of the ears allow us to determine from which direction sound is coming and the approximate distance of its source. Every convolution and crinkle helps in the perception of sounds and echoes. When you hear a sound above you, the tiny echo added by your ears' crinkles will differ from that added to a sound coming from below or behind, and so you will be able to discriminate. When you hear a sound coming from your right, then your right ear hears it just before your left ear does, and vice versa. Thus sounds are perceived.

If there were no God, how could you explain a flying machine or parachute as subtle and perfect as a dandelion?

The scientists in aerodynamics have calculated that it is impossible for the bumblebee to fly. But the bumblebee ~does~ fly, oblivious to the computations of aerodynamic specialists. Can you explain this, without a God?

If you do not see God, it does not mean that God does not exist. It might mean that you are blind. Now, blindness is not a positive attribute. It is just the absence of sight. Likewise, theism is the absence of knowledge of the truth. You grope if you do not know God.

*

What is God like?

A man who had been blind from birth once asked someone to give him a glass of milk and queried, "What does milk look like?" The other man answered, "Milk is a white liquid". The blind man asked, "But what do you mean by white?" The other man answered, "White is the colour of a swan". The blind man asked, "What is a swan?" The other replied, "A swan is a bird with a bent neck". The blind man asked again, "What does bent mean?" The other man said, "I will bend my elbow and you will touch it, and then you will know what bent means".

The blind man touched the bent elbow of the other man and said, "Now I know what milk looks like!"

In a book, even in the Bible, only words can be used to tell about God. These might seem ridiculous to you, as it seems ridiculous for a blind man to know the appearance of milk from a bent elbow. But we are all very limited and by nature blind to the all-comprehensive, omniscient, omnipotent God. We come to know Him by approximations. Read the words, forget about them, look at the ear, the dandelion, the bumblebee, and simply believe that God is!

*

The English word "God", as well as the corresponding German and Scandinavian words, comes from the Sanskrit "Hathu", which means, "The one to whom sacrifice is brought". Who is worthier of sacrifice than God? In the form "Huta", the word means, "The one invoked". Whom else should we invoke than the Creator?

The word "Deity" comes from the Sanskrit "Deia", to shine. He shines as the sun and causes you to shine. Throw yourself trustingly in His arms!

Some beg for alms. Some bestow them. In the great game of life He, the Incomprehensible, encompasses all. He enjoys everything twice, because He is the Giver and the Receiver of every gift. By uniting with God through Christ, you will also know unspeakable joys.

*

p058 VICTORIOUS FAITH

A man came to a Christian and complained about a great sorrow. The Christian recited the creed: "I believe in one God, the Father almighty, Maker of heaven and earth, of all things visible and invisible". The man in pain answered, "It is enough. Now I am comforted".

Do not surmise that I speak to you about my God. I tell you about yours. He is the God of Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Richard. He is your God, too. He can be your loving Father, and as such He causes all things, visible and invisible, to work together for your good.

What is He? The French have a saying, "Un Dieu defini est un Dieu fini". (A defined God is one with whom you have finished.) We do not know the structure of an atom and yet wish to explain a holy trinity!

Tolstoi, when asked, "What do you think about God?" replied, "What can an infusory think about man?"

We do not have to speculate about Him, but simply acknowledge Him in all our ways. A. Compton, Nobel Prize winner in physics, wrote, "The hypothesis that there exists an intelligent God gives a more plausible explanation for the universe than any other hypothesis". And Einstein, whose name the universe bears, wrote, "My religion consists in the deeply felt conviction about the existence of a higher Being, who reveals Himself in the world which we can comprehend".

If Einstein could believe in God, you can too. You are meant only to believe in Him, not to dissect Him.

A man can surely live without God, too. We all use inventions of scientists. We do not know the scientists personally. We Christians are men who have the passionate desire to know the inventions but also the Inventor of the universe.

*

When the shepherds came to see the little babe Jesus, they saw Him with Mary. Those who stood on Golgotha saw Jesus with Mary. Those who assembled in the first church assembled with Mary. Mary cannot be separated from her Son. We cannot adore Him without venerating her.

p059 VICTORIOUS FAITH

In human conflicts, people usually take opposite viewpoints. This is what happened during the Reformation. Some had exaggerated the role of Mary so much that others simply left her out of the plan of salvation.

It is said that a Protestant and a Catholic died at the same minute, and both went to heaven. The Catholic immediately bowed before Mary and kissed the hem of her garment. She caressed him on his head and said, "You have served me faithfully. May I introduce you now to my Son?" And then, for the first time, he made the acquaintance of Jesus Christ.

The Protestant, on arriving in heaven, immediately knelt down before Jesus and showed Him his respect. Then Jesus said to him, "May I introduce you to my mother? You seem not to have known her during your earthly life".

Jesus is a Person of the Godhead. He belongs to the triune God, to the Creator. Mary is only a creature, but she has her role in the economy of God.

In PSA 22:9, the Messiah speaking through the prophet says, "Thou art he [the Lord] that took me out of the womb". It is the only part of Scripture where a man is referred to as having been taken out of the womb of a woman. Otherwise, both in the Old and the New Testaments, the expression is that he comes from the loins of his father.

Jesus is the One born of ~the~ woman ("Haishah" in Hebrew, prophesied in GEN 3:15, the one woman with a special role in history, whose seed shall bruise the head of the serpent).

Jesus never called her mother. It would have been too common a name. He always called her "woman," hinting at the fact that she is this one woman foretold in Scripture, whose radiance cannot be put in words.

The Bible puts a question: "Who is she that looketh forth as the morning, fair as the moon, clear as the sun, and terrible as an army with banners?"

Finding the answer is not difficult.

She whose bridegroom became her babe is the beautiful one.

p060 VICTORIOUS FAITH

Every century she becomes more beautiful, yet sadder because of so many sufferings and betrayals.

*

The Christian is Christ, His body, His flesh, His bone. If she is the mother of Christ, she is our mother, too. Jesus is the head, we are the body. The mother of the head is also the mother of the body. Luke calls Jesus her firstborn, because we are also her children.

When Mary sees you, she sees Jesus. No child is ever too dirty for a mother to wash, too bruised by any fall for her not to kiss away the hurt, too headstrong and selfish for her not to love.

God honoured Mary. Why should I not? She is near to every cross and to every altar, as she was near to Jesus on Calvary.

I wonder only that our Orthodox and Catholic friends do not take heed to the words of the Psalmist (PSA 71:16): "I will make mention to thy righteousness, even of thine ~only~". Mary does not like it when attention is diverted from God to her, a humble servant.

I am also not at ease when she is called "mother of God". The council of Chalcedon had all the reason in the world to give her this title as against the Nestorians, who did not acknowledge the unity of the two natures of Jesus, the human and the divine, in one single person. But in everyday use, this title degrades God. If God has Mary as mother, He has St. Joseph as adoptive father. In the end, we have a God with a multitude of aunts and uncles and cousins.

So there are mistakes on both sides in the attitude taken toward Mary.

*

There are some Christians who have as little pity for the suffering Jesus as those who tore His divine flesh with scourges. But there are others whose supreme joy it is to share his sufferings.

p061 VICTORIOUS FAITH

In ZEC 11:1 it is written: "Open thy doors, O Lebanon, that the fire may devour thy cedars". Quite a demand! When you see a fire approaching, open your doors that it may burn down your possessions!

Knowing that our Lord has suffered for us, we Christians open the door to sufferings, even very severe ones. We open with gladness and receive sufferings as friends.

In 2PE 1:14, the apostle speaks about his impending crucifixion and says, I know "that shortly ~I must put off~ this tabernacle" (he means the tabernacle of his body).

Now, he did not put off his body; he did not commit suicide. He was crucified head-down by Roman soldiers. But

St. Peter had so readily opened the door and agreed to his crucifixion, as foretold by Christ, that he considered it an act of his own. This is the Christian attitude toward suffering. We will it.

*

As Christians we are unruffled when bad words are spoken against us. We know that a wicked man who reproaches a Christian is like one who spits at heaven: the spittle does not soil heaven but comes back and defiles his own person. The slanderer flings dust upon another only to have the wind return it to himself. The virtuous man cannot be hurt by slander, and the misery another would inflict on him returns to the sender.

It makes no difference to the Christian whether he is praised or insulted.

A man asked St. Macarius, "What does it mean to die to the world?" The saint answered, "Go to the cemetery, stop before every grave, and say to the dead bad, insulting words". The man wondered at this command but did as he was told. Macarius sent him again, this time to stop before every grave and say flattering words to the dead. This he also did.

Macarius then asked, "Were the dead angry when you insulted them?" "No", was the answer. "Were they pleased when you complimented them?" The answer was again "No".

Macarius pointed out the intended lesson: "This then is what it means to die to the world".

We accept suffering under any false accusation. My wife, Sabina, adds at this point: "Suffering inflicted upon us by the will of God does not contradict love. It is one of its methods. Therefore Jesus calls God, who willed His crucifixion, ~Father~".

St. Joan d'Arc was burnt as a witch, St. Thomas Moore was executed for treason. Likewise Bonnhoeffer. In Russia, some Christians are falsely accused of ritual murder, collaboration with the Nazis, theft, etc., and are given severe sentences.

Whoever becomes a Christian says with St. Peter, in LUK 22:33, "Lord, I am ready to go with thee, both into prison, and to death".

Every Christian goes to a sort of prison. It is written in the Song of Solomon that the Christian is a sealed fountain, a closed garden. It is as difficult to visit him as it is to see a prisoner. In the ark which saved him, Noah was shut up. The wise virgins were locked in the bridal room with their bridegroom. You cannot be His except behind a locked door.

Every Christian goes with Jesus to death. He dies to sin, he dies to the world, the flesh, and the devil.

*

I have seen suffering Christians dance for joy. Can you understand why?

There was once a fiddler who played so beautifully that everybody danced. A deaf man who could not hear the music considered them all mad. Those who are with Jesus in suffering hear this music to which other men are deaf. They dance and do not care if they are considered insane.

Other men could not understand the joy of the suffering Christians, just as a frog in a well could not understand the mighty ocean.

The Christian can rejoice even in the most unbelievable circumstances. One of the possible translations of the Hebrew title of Psalm 4 is "Song of the one who rejoices when He is vanquished".

But there are many tears mingled with the joys of Christians.

The friends of Jesus suffered over the fact that He rode towards Jerusalem at the pace of the slowest animal, a donkey. He chose the pace Himself.

They tried at least to make His riding more pleasant. They put their coats on the donkey. Others put their coats on the road, in the path of the animal, so that the garments were torn and tangled in the feet of the donkey. The pace of Jesus was slowed down even more.

We suffer because peoples chose constantly to release Barabbas, a murderer, rather than the Messiah who came to save them. They do it even today.

*

Those who do not seek God in suffering men will not find Him. Meister Eckhart says: "You seek something through God, and you are like somebody who would make out of God a candle to use for its light. Once you have found what you sought, you throw away the candle. Some people would love God as they love their cattle. The cattle you love for their milk, and for the cheese, and for your own need". But those who love God for Himself, not only for His gifts, love Him also in suffering men.

How sorry we are for those who have adored Christ in the spirit, who have looked up to His divinity, who have bowed before the altar in His sanctuaries, and who do not recognize Him when He appears to them in the form of a sufferer.

When St. Joan d'Arc was in prison, no hand was lifted to help her. Charles VII, king of France (whom she had fought for), did not make the slightest attempt to free her. She was abandoned by all men. She never received from anybody even one token of sympathy. She was like Christ, utterly forsaken. At the same time, the king and others who could have helped her adored Christ in their sanctuaries. This has been true also in modern times, under the Nazis and the Communists.

*

Christians should weep with those who weep, but above all they should console Christ with their tears of sympathy.

St. Th,rŠse of Lisieux said: "It is for ~us~ to console our Lord, and not for Him to console us. His heart is so tender that if you cry, He will dry your tears. But thereafter he will go away sad, since you did not suffer Him to repose with tranquillity within you. Our Lord loves the glad of heart, the children that greet Him with a smile. When will you learn to hide your troubles from Him or to tell Him gaily that you are glad to suffer for Him?" When St. Therese got up in the morning, she would put the crucifix on her pillow while she dressed and say, "My Jesus, you have toiled and wept enough in your three and thirty years on this miserable earth. Rest you, today! It is my turn to suffer and fight". "Let us give our Lord pleasure. Let us by self-sacrifice give Him souls!"

St. Th,rŠse of Lisieux once reproached a nun for complaining so much about her troubles to her sisters. The nun answered, "You are right. Such was my own thought. Henceforth my tears will be for God alone. I shall confide my worries to One, who will understand and console me". To which St. Th,rŠse replied, "Tears for God! That must not be! Far less to Him than to His creatures ought you to show a mournful face".

*

At the Last Judgment, nobody will be asked how much he suffered but only how much he loved.

St. Maria Goretti, who was stabbed by a murderer, said while dying, "I wish to have him near me in paradise". This murderer, who had become a Christian in prison, attended the ceremony of beatification for the same Maria.

Christians, while suffering at the hand of enemies, love them.

p065 VICTORIOUS FAITH

They can do so because they have before their eyes the great innocent Sufferer - Jesus.

A Christian also becomes a ruthless fighter. Look only at Martin Luther in his great struggle.

And a Christian is no quitter. He will fight to the end all the enemies of love and truth.

A Christian never submits to his enemies. I knew a Christian in a solitary cell where there was room for only three steps to and fro. He never made three steps but only two. He - not his jailors - decided what he had to do.

*

We have an example of a fighting spirit in Jesus. He knew that the priests and rulers would send the multitude to arrest Him in Gethsemane. He who recommended that others flee in times of danger Himself stood by.

Not only this. Sometimes He was very aggressive, as for instance when He drove out the merchants from the temple. Then, too, His disciples were armed. They were armed because He willed it so.

The state motto of Virginia (U.S.A.) consists of the words of Brutus as he drove his knife into Caesar: "Sic semper tyrannis" (so alway to tyrants). This was the spirit in which Jesus had lived from childhood and which He passed on to His disciples. The only holy book which He left them was the Old Testament, a book of epic and hard fights.

But the truth is always dual in nature. On the other hand, you see in Jesus a great leniency toward the wicked. He recommends, for example, that they not be uprooted but to grow together with the good until the time of the Last Judgment.

This does not mean that Jesus ever abandons the fight. But a marksman levels his gun at a point higher than the target.

The wicked man is driven by a force over which he has no control, the power of sin. Sometimes you have to fight hostile men as such. You have to fight men who keep you from fulfilling your duty. The Satan about whom Paul complains in 1TH 2:18 for putting obstacles in the way of his preaching might very well have had a human name. But the Christian fight is not so much a fight against men as a fight against Satan and against sin, which is not primarily a stain on the soul but a betrayal of a friend, Jesus. Our fight is against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places.

We have to fight against pride.

After washing the feet of His disciples, Jesus dried them. Wet feet show that the feet were dirty and needed to be washed. Dry feet show simply that they are clean. Jesus does not wish us to be washed sinners, but clean men!

We too are called to wash away the sins of others in all humility. St. John of the Cross said, "Where there is no love, place love, and you will find love".

*

Jesus served even more than was needed. His simple death would have been enough to atone for our sins. But He took upon Himself sufferings which were not prophesied - as, for instance, the crown of thorns - so that even if you have committed the most surprising sins and crimes, crimes yet unequalled and known by nobody, you might be very sure that the sacrifice of Jesus is enough to save you from those crimes.

Since He humbled Himself to the uttermost, you must fight your pride to the uttermost.

We should do more for Him than we are asked. The servant who does only the things demanded of him is called by Jesus unprofitable. When He wished to enter into Jerusalem, He humbly asked for a donkey to sit on. Today Christians fly with jets and drive with cars to proclaim Him. Do not restrict your vision! Magnify Him, which means, make Him bigger! Do not make Him always sit on an ass, do not make of Him the God of a small confession, of one race, of one nation, or of one religious point of view!

God had ordered that His temple be a tent. David gave more than God demanded. He decided that God must have a palace for a temple.

Christ also did not only everything God commanded Him to do for our salvation - He did more.

*

While fighting, the Christian yet serves with gentleness. What Jesus praised most in MTT 26:10-13 was a woman's act, a poetic gesture, that served no useful purpose. In the end, what is the use of the sufferings of martyrs? If they had been clever, they could have prevaricated and survived. But there is beauty in sacrifice, not utility. Beauty is appreciated by Jesus. Lead your fights beautifully!

*

Fight without fear, knowing that the ship of Christ navigates contrary to the law of hydrodynamics. It can float even when it is full of water (LUK 8:23). At that point the calming of the tempest by Jesus did not make any difference. Ships full of water drown even when the sea is quiet. The advance of the church is a continuous miracle.

*

We have to fight to win souls. Jesus said that we should be fishers of men. Now let us begin by trying to catch the greatest Fish. The symbol of Jesus in the first centuries was the fish, called in Greek Ichtys, a word composed of the initials of the words "Jesus Christ, Son of God, Saviour" in Greek. Let us catch this great Fish, and then we will have other fishes, too.

p068 VICTORIOUS FAITH

After having suffered for us, Jesus was resurrected and ascended to heaven, where he was crowned. He had emptied Himself to become a man. Now He is again on the throne of God.

God identifies Himself with us. In Hebrew and in Greek, it is not written "the God of Abraham and of Isaac and of Jacob" but simply "the God Abraham, Isaac and Jacob". He is a God who has identified Himself with us. If He is crowned, we are crowned. "Isaac" means in Hebrew "he will laugh". He is a God who has victory in His pocket. He is the God Isaac. He will laugh.

He takes our names, even if they are sometimes ridiculous, like the name of Jacob, which means "holding by the heel".

No one has so stained himself with sin that God would not be ready to identify with him. You can be crowned together with Jesus! And then you will lead the life of a crowned being, a life of happiness.

There exists a God whose name is "God Abraham, God Isaac". One of His names is "God Richard". The church fathers said that God has all names. God through His church wishes to identify with men.

When I first read the New Testament thoroughly, it seemed to me a ridiculous book. St. Paul writes about having been crucified and buried with Jesus and about being seated in heavenly places, assertions which could not possibly be true.

Paul had not been crucified with Jesus. Jesus died between two thieves, and that was all. Paul could not have been buried. Whoever has been laid in a tomb dead does not write epistles about this experience. When he wrote that he was seated in heavenly places, he was seated in a prison cell. How can a book considered holy by millions of good minds contain such fantasies or outright lies?

The answer to my puzzle I found in St. Thomas Aquinas. He says, "Actiones et passiones sunt suppositorum". (Actions and passions belong to the person.) It is not my stomach that is hungry, but ~I~. ~I~ walk, not my legs. ~I~ think, not my brain. Every member of mine is me. ~I~ am healthy, sick, rich, poor.

~I~ die. The whole person is involved in every action and passion.

Now, Christians belong to one great body, Jesus Christ. Just as I am hurt if you kick my shins, so Christ is hurt or caressed in the things which are done to us, His members. Do not believe that I speak about Christians constituting the body of Christ in some mystical sense. St. Paul writes, "We are members of his body". This could be interpreted in a spiritual sense. He adds "[members] of his flesh". This perhaps could also be spiritualized. (What can an exegete not spiritualize?) So, to be very sure, he emphasizes his meaning, "We are members of his body, of his flesh, ~and of his bones~" (EPH 5:30).

I am a member of His body. I am involved in everything which has happened and now happens to Him. I have been crucified and buried with Him. I am seated with Him in heavenly places. I will return with Him in glory. He is with me in my daily life. Luther says rightly, "The Christian is Christ". I identify myself with Him, He with me. Our religion is one without pronouns.

Knowing that they are crowned together with Jesus, Christians need fear no one, because fear, the soul's greatest enemy apart from sin itself, will have disappeared.

We can be calm in all things. As you grow old, you do not have to ask yourself what you will do in your old age, but what God will do with your old age. If you come to great age, He will make your age be great.

*

Crowned with Jesus, you can fulfil the words of St. Bernard of Clairvaux: "Let your ears fast from rumours, praise, slander, gossip, controversy, and your tongue fast from detraction, murmuring, faultfinding".

*

p070 VICTORIOUS FAITH

The serenity of the crowned believer resists in the most difficult circumstances.

In a Siberian prison, Catholic nuns refused to lay down their garbs and take up the prison uniform, which they considered to be the sign of the Antichrist. So they were taken to the bathroom, and while they were in the bath, their garments were changed. When they emerged and still refused to put on the prison uniform, they were forced to sit out in the cold, where the temperature was forty below zero. Undaunted, they began to say their prayers. The woman doctor of the prison, a Jewish Trotskyite, told them, "You are committing suicide". They did not answer but continued their prayers. Even when the male warders entered, the sixty nuns did not move. The director of the prison feared to bring in Communist youth to dress them by force because he was afraid they would be contaminated by the courage of these nuns.

By this time the shivering women were blue with the cold. Naked, they were driven over the snow to their cells. A major, director of the prison, said: "It was easier to fight with the Nazis than these nuns".

Each nun passing the major bowed to him, saying, "May God forgive you". Some of them could no longer walk and were supported by others.

So they ran over the snow, singing the "Our Father" in the old Gregorian melody. Not one of them fell sick. In their cells, they dressed themselves with some rags from other prisoners. They had been six hours in the cold.

A second woman doctor asked the Jewess, Doctor Bravermann, "How do you explain the fact from a medical point of view that not one of them fell sick?" The atheist Jewish doctor answered, "They have explained it themselves by singing the words, 'Our Father who art in heaven'."

*

Crowned with Jesus, you are free from the worry of calculating results. You quietly follow your impulses, knowing that the law of God is written in your new heart.

p071 VICTORIOUS FAITH

You know that God is as much your Father as He was the Father of Jesus Christ, and that He cares for every detail of your life.

In DEU 16:6-7, God commands that at Passover the Jews, His chosen people, eat a lamb. A lamb can be prepared in many ways: it can be grilled, fried, broiled, cooked. But surely roasted lamb is the best kind, and you see that in verse seven God cares even about such a detail and recommends how the lamb should be prepared in order to appeal to the taste. He acts as if He were chief waiter in a big restaurant who wishes to recommend what to eat. So He says, "Thou shalt roast the lamb".

*

When you know that you are sustained by such a God, everything around you becomes beautiful.

Only the Bible comes from God - not the titles in the Bibles. You sense this immediately. Jesus tells a parable about a man who sowed good wheat in his field, only to have an enemy come and sow tares. In the end, the tares were burned and the good wheat was taken into the barn. Angels made the determination. The title in the Bible is "The parable of the tares". Why it is not "of the wheat and the tares"?

Jesus tells a parable about ninety-nine sheep that remained faithful and one that was lost. This is called by men "The parable of the lost sheep".

Jesus tells another parable about a good father and his two sons, one of whom remained with the father, while the other left with his inheritance, squandered it, and then returned home. This is called "The parable of the prodigal son". Why not "The parable of the good father" or "The parable of the repenting son"?

The titles have not been well chosen.

The children of God should look for what is beautiful and true, because their souls and minds have been purified through the hygiene of worship. They should avoid such misleading titles.

Being crowned with Jesus, you can lead a life full of love. You risk nothing in loving without being loved. That is how Christ loved us. Though despised and forsaken, He yet became Lord of all.

If you have reached this point in life, stay with it!

A certain son was a very great lover of nature. With much difficulty, he succeeded in convincing his comfort-loving father to climb on a hill during a walk. From the top of the hill the son, much moved, exclaimed, "Look, father, how beautiful it is down below!" To which the father angrily replied, "You drove me to this height in order to make me see how beautiful it is down below?"

Do not look back! Do not look into the valley from which you have come.

Crowned with Jesus, you have arrived at the very peak. Stay there and look up.

If you believe in the crowned Jesus, you can accept what every day brings you, since your days are preordained by a loving God.

In JHN 18:31-32, we read that the Jews did not wish to execute Jesus according to their own laws, which prescribed punishment by stoning. They decided rather that He should be crucified and not stoned. They believed that they did this of their own free will, not realizing their decision had actually been foreordained. They shouted "Crucify him!" so that the words of Jesus might be fulfilled, which He spoke, signifying what death He should die.

So all things are foreordained in our lives. We are like people viewing a movie. Once I surprised myself in a theatre by praying for someone on the screen, an innocent man in deadly danger, but the outcome had long since been decided. It was "foreordained" on the reel in the operator's booth.

*

We live favoured lives. Christians not only do not have free will. By virtue of their being Christians they agree beforehand with everything that is in God's plan for them. Like angels, they simply fulfil God's decisions.

As fire changes into fire everything thrown into it, so God changes into Godhead everyone who approaches Him. The will of God and the will of the individual become one in purpose, while remaining two wills.

*

Christians welcome brother Death.

My body has had many shapes: that of a foetus, that of a babe, of a child, of an adult, of an old man. It has sometimes been healthy, sometimes sick. Why should I worry about the fact that the body will take the shape of a corpse? I am not my body; I will remain. I am indestructible.

In AMO 8:2, the Lord says to the prophet: "The end is come upon my people of Israel". But here, even the almightyness of God has a limit. Not even He could destroy the people of Israel. This people is safe.

*

To die does not mean to disappear. It means to leave through one door and enter another.

Believing in the crowned Jesus, our hearts become quiet. God can shut the many doors surrounding us but never the one above us.

*

Believing in the crowned Jesus, you have a right to holy communion. One such communion is worth all the troubles of a lifetime.

p074 VICTORIOUS FAITH

Christians are members of the body of Christ, flesh of His flesh and bone of His bones. He is the high priest. The whole high priest, head and body, stands before God. Christ, who sacrificed His earthly body on Calvary two thousand years ago, now sacrifices His mystical body in the cross-burdened lives of the believers. Christ is represented on the communion table. The Christian is Christ. We are also in the bread and in the chalice. So are all our brethren from all ages and places, even the frailest ones.

From the sacrifice of her Chief, commemorated in holy communion, the church learns to sacrifice herself and all her possessions.

At holy communion, the one who officiates and the communicants must also say of themselves, "This is my body, ... this is my blood, shed for the remission of sins".

St. Cyprian wrote, "The sacrifice of our Saviour is not celebrated with the required sanctity if our offering of ourselves does not correspond to his passion".

St. Augustine taught, "God knows nothing better, all-powerful though He be, God can do nothing more precious than the most holy eucharist" (the ancient name for holy communion).

Catholics and Orthodox on one side and Protestants on the other have debated for centuries the question of tran-substantiation, that is whether the bread and wine actually become the body and blood of Jesus Christ. It would be much more important to believe that we are trans-substantiated, that our bodies are really His and that His blood circulates through our veins. Then our lives would be godly, strengthened by the reminder of holy communion.

*

You have the saving, the suffering, the serving, the fighting, the crowned Jesus.

Therefore you can cry defiantly to your passions that though they conquer you a million times, they will never vanquish you, that you will crush them in the end however long the struggle may be. The essence of the Christian religion is not winning, but daring. Jesus is the way, not only the prize.

What should you do to lead a victorious life?

Generally speaking, the question "What should I do?" has no place in the Christian religion. There is no answer to it, because the question is wrong. No matter how much you do, you can never repay the gifts of God. With how much would you pay for having eyes? The Christian simply says, "I have received countless gifts, and I have confidence that the One who has been so generous toward me till now will continue to give. He will give victory, too".

The Christian also avoids wishing for what God does not give. Temporary riches are gained by requiring, spiritual gifts by renouncing.

Simple trust in God and renunciation of what He does not give will assure one of victory.

The Christian has no goals of his own to attain. He is passively at the disposal of God. Therefore, he is sanctified without being strained. Strain exists only when one is goaded on by ambition. But your sanctification is not your ambition. It is God's ambition for you. You will attain it by being relaxed.

*

When you become a Christian you begin a new chapter in your life. Musicians tune their instruments before playing. Do the same! You will have to play a different kind of music.

*

Young David, a shepherd boy, was brought to the court of King Saul and soon became everybody's favourite. Once, when the court was assembled, he asked the king's permission to play a harp which the king had near his throne. The king replied, "No use! I have been deceived by the one who made it for me. Nobody could ever play on it. It produces only discord".

p076 VICTORIOUS FAITH

David insisted. When he touched the cords of the harp with his fingers, lo, the instrument began to rejoice and weep and rejoice again at his comr brethren from he played was so glorious that when he finished, everyone was in tears.

The king asked him, "How is it that all the others could not play on this harp and you could?" David answered, "All the others tried to play their own songs on the harp, and the harp refused to obey. I have played to the harp its own song. I reminded her of the beautiful times when she was a young tree in the forest, when birds chirped in her branches and her leaves were bathed in sun - and you heard the joy of the harp. Then I told her of my sympathy for the suffering through which she passed on the terrible day when men cut down the tree. But its death had not been in vain. For out of its wood a harp was made, on which God's praises could be played. And the harp rejoiced when she understood her calling".

When the Messiah comes, many will try to play their own songs on His harp. The result will be a Christianity of terrible ugliness. But there will always be the chosen ones who will play His songs, the song of His eternal glory, the song of His humiliation in becoming a babe in a manger, the song of His life of sorrow, the song of Calvary, the song of His resurrection and ascension.

Tune your instrument for playing His songs!

In "The parable of the tares" Jesus teaches that the devil can imitate God well. He can sow tares so similar to the good wheat that even the elect cannot be trusted to distinguish rightly between them.

Never trust your own judgment in matters of faith. Christ has instituted the church as a fellowship which should establish the rules of Christian behaviour according to the Word of God. It is not right to do what you consider right. You can be honestly deceived.

By believing in Jesus, you enter into the communion of saints. You are in communion with the saints of old, such as St. Paul and Silvanus, who continue to give thanks in heaven for your faith (1TH 2). You are in communion with the saints of all ages as well as those who are your contemporaries.

I have told you to leave the disciples in order to come to Jesus. Once you are His, seek the disciples.

*

The church has a code of rules, but it is not fixed in all matters. It has changed many times throughout history. Except for the main tenets of behaviour, the church leaves the decision for your Christian life to your own conscience enlightened by the Word of God. Spiritual guides who claim to know all the answers to every individual case prove by this that they are false teachers. The true teacher says about many things, "I do not know".

You will have to make your own decisions even in very big matters. There is such a thing as a moral relativism.

Even the commandment "Do not kill" is not absolute. Not every killing is wrong. How mankind would have been benefited if a plot against Hitler at an early stage had succeeded.

But the church knows about such extraordinary circumstances, too. As a member of the church, you drive on well established rails. The great lines of behaviour, including the possibility of exceptions, are fixed. The church has wise pastors. Take your own decisions, but consult them. One of the best decisions you could make is to obey your pastor.

*

The church has had and still has many true saints.

I will tell a few episodes from the lives of these saints. Some of them will seem extravagant. But exceptional men cannot be judged by ordinary standards. They are different from anyone else.

*

p078 VICTORIOUS FAITH

The governor asked St. Justin the Martyr, "Listen, you so- called man of the Word, believed to possess true wisdom; if you were scourged and executed now, do you believe you would enter into heaven?" Justin answered, "I trust firmly that I will live there if I endure all this. I am full of this certitude". The governor threatened him again, only to be told again, "Our ardent desire is to suffer for our Lord Jesus Christ and then to be saved".

The man now known as St. Anthony the Great once heard in church the familiar verse, "If thou wilt be perfect, go and sell that thou hast, and give to the poor, and come and follow me".

(MTT 19:21). Anthony, as if alone in the church, knew the words were addressed to him. Jesus had uttered them and the evangelist had recorded them for him. Anthony straightway went out and got rid of his 120 acres of land and 300 sheep. Everything went to the poor. He induced his sister to follow suit. She became a nun, he a monk.

Bread, salt and water were his diet once a day; sometimes once a week. He lived in a ruined castle on the top of a mountain. Every six months, bread was brought. There he stayed some twenty years.

Every night was passed in prayer. Once he admonished the rising sun, "Why do you turn me from contemplating the splendour of the true Light?"

After twenty years of meditation, he re-entered active life. During the persecution of Maximin, he journeyed to Alexandria to comfort the imprisoned faithful. (In our day not one single church leader has thought to do such a thing.) He visited the convicts condemned to work the mines in the Sudan.

He hid St. Athanasius from his persecutors.

Once in a vision the saint had seen the earth covered with so many devilish snares that it seemed impossible for anyone to escape falling into them. He asked God how they could be avoided. He was answered by one word - ~humility~.

A man who was a widower decided to enter the monastery. He had an only daughter who insisted that she go with him, disguised as a man, so that she might care for him. She was received among the monks. She enchanted all the brethren through her voice and her skill in cooking and washing. Believed to be a man, she won the confidence of the abbot. He sent her together with two other monks into town for the purpose of shopping. Now the innkeeper at whose establishment they were accustomed to stay had a daughter. She became pregnant after an affair with a soldier, who did not wish to marry her. In despair, she asked, "What will I do? Father will kill me! " He replied, "Tell him that this young nice monk raped you". This is what she did.

When Theodora (this was the name of the monk) returned from town, the abbot, who by now had received a complaint from the father, was ready to beat him. "How could you bring such shame upon our monastery?" he thundered. Theodora was afraid that one of the other monks might have committed the sin. She knew that, if found guilty, he would be expelled from the monastery and might fall into even worse sins. So she fell on her knees before the abbot and said, "Forgive me, all my gross sins". The abbot drove her out. She lived as a beggar at the gate of the monastery, bowing to every monk who passed by with the words, "Forgive me, a miserable sinner".

After many years, the abbot pardoned her. She could re-enter the monastery but was put to the most menial tasks and was despised by all. When she died, her body had to be washed. Then it was discovered that she had been a girl and that she had covered somebody else's sins. Since that time, she has been honoured as St. Theodora.

*

p080 VICTORIOUS FAITH

St. Paphnutius sold himself as a slave to a comedian with the sole aim of converting him. The conversion took twenty years, whereupon the comedian set him free. So he sold himself in order to relieve the hardships of a poor widow.

When released the second time, he was given a cloak, a tunic, and a gospel as presents. The cloak went to the first beggar, the tunic to the second. It was easy to do this. But how could he keep a gospel when there were so many poor people? He sold it and gave away this money, too.

Nothing but dry bread and water ever entered his mouth, and little besides Scripture ever came out of it.

*

St. Cyprian wrote to the imprisoned Christians of his time, "You have no ganents on your body and only a little bread as food, but you are clothed with Christ in glory. Man does not live on bread alone".

*

The motto of St. John Chrysostom was, "Glory to God for all things". He finished his letters from exile with these words. After being dragged by soldiers through the winter snow, he died in a little wayside church. His last words while lying on the cold stone floor were, "Glory to God for all things".

*

Thais had been a courtesan in Egypt. St. Serapion, a monk, converted her. He had put on normal clothes and had waited in line as if to receive her favours. She was so impressed with his words that she forthwith burned her furniture, dresses, and the accoutrements of other luxury. Serapion took her to a convent, where he kept her three years in a cell with a sealed door. Her diet was bread and water. The whole time she said just one prayer: "You who have made me, save me".

At the end of the three years, the monk had a vision, in which he saw a splendid mansion prepared in heaven. He was sure that it was for St. Anthony, but a voice told him, "This place is for Thais". Serapion unsealed her door. After fifteen days, she passed away.

In 1899, excavations uncovered her cell and that of Serapion, with inscriptions which made their identification possible.

*

Old Zosimus saw in the wilderness a naked being. She cried from afar, "I am a woman. Throw me your mantle to cover myself". She confessed to him that she had led a shameful life all during her youth. At one time she went to a big Christian festival in Jerusalem to engage in her profession. While there, she came to her senses and asked Christ to obtain for her the grace of repentance. Since then, she said, she had spent 47 years in the desert, eating berries and herbs. Her clothes had fallen to pieces.

She asked Zosimus to return the next year with holy communion. She took communion, sang, "Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace ...," and begged the priest to return in Lent. But this time he found her dead.

You will have recognized the story of St. Mary the Egyptian.

*

Robbers broke into the cell of St. Macarius and then spoiled the monastery, too. He assisted them, carrying out divers things which they had overlooked.

On another occasion, he caught thieves stealing into the cell of a fellow monk. He warned them to move or before they got caught.

*

St. Polycarp, when faced with the alternative of being devoured by wild beasts or of denying Christ, said, "Fourscore and six years have I been His servant and He has done me no wrong. How then can I blaspheme the Lord who saved me?" He died a martyr's death.

*

p082 VICTORIOUS FAITH

When St. Perpetua was thrown into the circus under the Roman emperors to be devoured by wild beasts, she fell and her thighs were seen. She covered them, mindful of modesty rather than of pain.

St. Francis of Assisi during a sleepless night was persuaded that the song of a nightingale was an act of worship. So the whole night long he chanted the praises of God alternately with the bird.

St. Thomas Moore was in prison because he refused to acknowledge that King Henry VIII, who was at that time seeking sanction for divorce and remarriage, was head of the church. The wife of Thomas reproached him, "Why should you stay in gaol full of lice and attacked by rats when all the bishops have acknowledged the king's claim to lead the church? Your house is waiting for you". He replied, "Is my house nearer to heaven than this cell? Will not the same death take me from my house, too?" He remained steadfast in his refusal and was beheaded.

*

In the beginning of the past century, the bloody queen Ranavalona reigned over Madagascar. She hated Christians because they opposed the slave trade. She ordered all missionaries out of the country and commanded that all Bibles be burned. Any avowed Christian had all his property confiscated and was sold as a slave or killed.

Christians gathered in the woods. They formed underground churches. But the queen could not take away from them the Spirit of God. And they were encouraged by examples of heroism of martyrs like Rasalama, a woman who went to death singing, and others who were burnt alive rather than deny their faith. Some who were thrown from cliffs remain faithful to the end. This persecution lasted for fifteen years.

*

William Wilberforce dedicated his whole public career to the cause of the slaves. And he succeeded. First he stopped ocean traffic in slaves by British ships. Then he obtained the emancipation of the slaves in the British Empire. At midnight on July 31, 1834, 800,000 slaves became free. It was Wilberforce's deed.

His whole fight was animated by the love of Christ. He said, "God Almighty has set before me the objective of suppressing slavery".

He left us this teaching: "No inner feelings ought to be taken as a demonstration of the Spirit being in any man, but only the change of disposition and conduct".

From pastor Kaj Munk, killed for his faith by the Nazi in Denmark, we have the words, "There are men who believe that you can somehow salt the truth. They suppose that you can hold it hidden in a barrel well salted and use a part of it when the need arises. But we, too, have men with a living faith that truth exists in order to be said - and that it exist only when it is said. These good men are of the same stuff as John the Baptist. Like him, they sense fear for their own fate and fear even more the damages and sufferings which the naked truth can bring upon their people. But one day they realize that cowardice must not bind their tongue anymore, that the sufferings which come to people because of hypocrisy, silence and lies are a thousand times more dangerous. We have also in our country a Herod, who commits incest with strange gods. I have named the spirit of compromise which does not shrink back from undignified actions for the sake of comfort".

*

p084 VICTORIOUS FAITH

Pastor Bonnhoeffer, a German martyred under Hitler, wrote from prison: "I have become perfectly sure of my faith. It has resisted unshattered under heavy burdens. There has never been a moment of hesitation or despair ... However strange it may sound: I have learnt in prison to rejoice".

When called out of his cell to be executed, he uttered these words: "This is the end: the beginning of life".

*

An American pastor preaching in 1954 in India was asked to participate in a service of prayer for the sick. One young woman with a wild look in her eyes refused to come into the service but kept apart, surrounded by people who said that she was demon-possessed. When the pastor endeavoured to kneel beside her, she became frantic and rolled over on her mat unconscious. He prayed in the name of Christ for her health. At the end of the prayer, she opened her eyes and they were normal and full of light. A beautiful smile came over her face as she stretched out her hands for him to lift her to her feet. She was marvellously delivered through the name of Jesus.

There are pastors who are real saints to whom God has given such power.

*

David Brainerd died in the early part of the eighteenth century at the age of 29, after having borne great hardships while preaching the gospel to the American Indians.

In his diary he recorded his struggles: "I lodge on a bundle of straw, my labour is hard and extremely difficult, and I have little appearance of success to comfort me ... The Dutch hate me because I preach to the Indians". Insinuations were brought against him as though he were training them to cut people's throats.

One August 20 he wrote: "Having lain in a cold sweat all night, I coughed much bloody matter this morning. On August 22: "Continued my course up the river ... at night lodged in the open wood". August 24: "Visited some of the Delaware Indians and discoursed with them about Christianity".

He has left behind a few precious thoughts:

"It is worth the while to follow after God through a thousand snares, deserts and death itself".

"God has made me willing to do anything that I can do, consistent with truth, for the sake of peace, and that I might not be a stumbling block to others. For this reason I can cheerfully forego and give up what I verily believe, after the most mature and impartial search, is my right, in some instances. God has given me that disposition that, if this were the case that a man has done me a hundred injuries and I (though ever so much provoked by it) have done him one, I feel disposed and heartily willing humbly to confess my fault to him, and on my knees to ask forgiveness of him; though at the same time he should justify himself in all the injuries he has done me and should make use of my humble confession to blacken my character the more and represent me as the only person guilty".

"Oh, it is an emblem of heaven itself to love all the world with a love of kindness, forgiveness and benevolence; to feel our souls sedate, mild and meek; to be void of all evil surmisings and suspicions and scarce able to think evil of any man upon any occasion; to find our hearts simple, open and free to those that look upon us with a different eye".

*

In the Soviet Union, a pastor was led to prison, together with a teenager whom he had brought to conversion. The mother of the lad threw stones at the pastor, who turned to her and said, "I admire your motherly love".

*

God is beautiful in His saints.

*

p086 VICTORIOUS FAITH

You do not have to try to lead a heroic Christian life. It is as futile to try to be a hero as it is futile to try to be an elephant. Very few have the stuff of which great saints and martyrs are made.

It is good for Christians to know that in the Roman, medieval, Nazi, and Communist persecution, the majority of Christians were not ready to suffer and die for their faith. Only a minority faced torture and death with courage. But the others were also Christians. God saw how sorry they were for their weakness and how eagerly they returned to faith when the immediate danger had passed.

It is a miracle that Jesus can make at least some sheep lie down in green pastures (PSA 23:2). Normally, a sheep does not lie down. It will graze for hours, even if it is not hungry. How can you lie down with so much green grass around? How can you renounce the world when it offers you so many pleasures?

But among the saints are reckoned not only a St. Anthonie or a St. Paphnutius, or others who have been canonized, or those who have died in prison for their faith. An average Christian life is also a Christian life. An everyday Christian is also a saint.

*

A small dog once stood near a big Doberman. The Doberman scorned him and asked: "Do you also claim to be a dog?" The little creature did not dare to contradict the Doberman. He answered politely: "Sir, I am surely not as big a dog as you. But neither can you assert that I am a cat". Small dogs are also dogs! And small Christians are also Christians.

When my son Mihai was five years old, he worried when I read to him from the Bible that the saints will walk with Jesus clothed in white. He asked if Jesus had clothes small for children. I had to assure him that Jesus has white garments for all Christians, large or small in size, and large or small in faith.

p087 VICTORIOUS FAITH

Not all of us can perform the deeds of heroes of the faith. But we can admire, love and rejoice in them. We can battle unceasingly against the guile of oblivion which threatens the life of the hero. Mirrored in the love of the admirer, the deed of the hero will appear even more beautiful than they were in reality. The admirer makes of the hero, who was also only human, a legend.

You must not worry that you cannot be like him. A snail and a hare can walk the same path and arrive at the same goal. It may take you more time, but you will have over the hero the advantage of longer perseverance. Every Christian is called a saint. If you cannot do better, be a saint snail!

If you cannot be the best, be second best.

In a sense an embryo is already a man. You are a great artist only if you have the gift before you have drawn a line. A Christian has Christ within, as well when he makes his first unsure steps as when he is mature in the faith.

*

Do not fear the great demands of the Bible. They might overwhelm you, as for instance the words of Jesus: "Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect". These express a desire. What professor of music does not desire that all his pupils be future Wagners and Beethovens? But life does not work out this way. Nobody becomes a genius by willing, nor an exceptional saint.

Spurgeon used to tell a story: A man was renowned for his orchard in which grew the best apples of the world. His friend, however, was unconvinced because several times He had passed by the orchard, had picked up out of curiosity a few apples that had fallen from the trees, and had found them to be sour and tasteless. Therefore he repeatedly refused the invitations of the owner to have a look at his orchard. Finally, the owner insisted on knowing the reason, and his friend told him his experience. The owner laughed: "Knowing that I have the best apple in my orchard, I was faced with the problem of how to protect them from thieves and children.

So I planted around the fence two or three rows of worthless apple trees. These discourage theft. As for my guests, they are taken to the inner orchard where they can taste apples of unparalleled quality and aroma".

Jesus has done likewise. He has for His guests the best of gifts, a quiet reliance on His sacrifice, which is effective without human deeds and virtues. But to prevent hypocrites from taking advantage of this, He has surrounded His property with a few trees which yield very sour apples.

It is a sour apple for those who are not among God's elect to hear that they have to be perfect as the Father in heaven is perfect, that they have to take up their cross daily, that they have to mortify their flesh.

The children of God do not enter into Jesus' garden this way. They enter by the royal gate and are happy to be saved without any effort on their part, but just by what Christ has done for them.

We have the precious gift of being beloved without any merit of our own, just as little children are beloved by their parents.

It does not matter how much in the Christian life we are able to accomplish. God looks only at the will. Kierkegaard said that purity of heart is to will one thing, and Christians surely will this one thing. Every Christian is a model of the good and the true: he is so in his intentions.

His ideals are high. He wills always to be at the peak. It is said about the sculptor Phideas that he worked with very great care on the back of a statue of the goddess Dianna, which was to stand in a niche. He was asked: "But who will see in there?" He answered: "The gods". We try to do all things well, that God might have pleasure. We also know that we have a God who understands our weakness. The beginning of godliness in us makes us pleasant to God.

We have time to achieve our ideals. Christians are never in a hurry. In MTT 27:52 it is written that when Jesus died the graves were opened and many bodies of the saints which slept arose. But even in these circumstances, they were in no hurry at all. They came out of their graves only after His resurrection, which means the third day. You recognize those who are eternal by the fact that they take their time.

*

A rabbi asked a Jew: "What would you do if you found a wallet on the street containing much money, along with the owner's card?" The Jew answered: "To tell you the truth, rabbi, I have many children and am poor. I would consider it a gift from God". The rabbi told him: "You are a thief". The rabbi put the same question to a second Jew. His reply was: "I would restore the money immediately". The rabbi told him: "You are an idiot". He asked a third Jew, who said: "I know what my duty would be. I know my weakness. I could not say what I would do in such circumstances. Everything depends upon the grace of God". The rabbi praised him: "This is the right answer".

We know it is our Christian duty to be perfect. We know our inability to be so. We are in every moment of our lives what grace makes us.

*

Svetlana Alliluyeva, the daughter of Stalin, writes that in the Soviet Union everybody has to learn to lie from early childhood in order to survive. Otherwise one is crushed by the tyranny.

Happily, it is not so in the free world. But life would not be possible anywhere if you were always to tell everyone the naked truth. Neither can you go around decrying the falsity of all attitudes you consider erroneous. Rather, you must be with Paul be a Jew to the Jews and a Greek to the Greeks in order to achieve something for the Lord Jesus and to bring men to Him.

Leave the absolutes to those specially equipped by God to deal with them!

Absolutes cannot be applied always and by all in time of war. The church is at war. In a war, you must not be idealistic with regard to the means you use, but effective.

It is said that Sir Stafford Cripps, on hearing one of the radio broadcasts of the British psychological warfare branch, remarked: "If we have to resort to this sort of thing to win the war, I had rather we lost it". Let people who think like this not enter the war! Whoever wishes to clean a dirty place must be ready to get himself dirty.

Fortunately, Great Britain had not only a Sir Stafford Cripps, but also a Churchill and many others who thought like him.

While General Montgomery was putting the final touches to the D-day plans in London, a double of Montgomery was sent from Gibraltar to Algiers to deceive the German spies. Hitler was disarmed: Montgomery is not even in England, so probably an invasion of France is not imminent.

The German battleship Graf Spee was in for repairs only 48 hours in Montevideo. It was not allowed to stay longer in a neutral harbour. But lying in wait were only two small British ships, which it could easily defeat. The nearest British warships were too far away to arrive in time. Then the admiralty resorted to deception. They sent to their small British ship a signal that a big battleship and aircraft were joining them. They knew that the German admiralty and German captain would break the code. In fact, they purposely used a code that could be broken. As a result, the German captain Langdorff sank his ship and committed suicide. We see the same thing in JDG 20:29: "Israel set liers in wait round about Gibeah" in order to ambush the children of Benjamin. Then when the Benjamites went out against the people of Israel, they were drawn away from the city and made to believe that their enemies were smitten down before them. The children of Israel pretended to flee, so as to draw them further away from the city into the highways, and then at a certain moment the liers in wait of Israel came forth out of their hiding places. So Benjamin was smitten.

It takes cunning to win a war. It takes cunning to win the Christian war, too.

Nobody is asked to lead a Christian life without compromise. But a Christian is very conscious of the fact that these compromises, though necessary sometimes in life and in a fight, are also very dangerous. There is no lie without injury to someone's faith in what another says. Necessarily, society is injured by every instance of lying.

A man asked a traveller through the desert to allow him to ride on the back of his camel. The request was granted. Once mounted, the man threw the owner of the camel into the sand and fled. The owner cried after him: "I am not troubled that you took my camel. I have others. But you have destroyed faith between men. In future, camel owners will not help lonely travellers. Nobody will be allowed any more on the back of the camel".

A Christian takes such facts into account. He never says an untruth because he wills it, but because the necessities of a holy fight impose this burden upon him. Nuns hid Jewesses, sought by the Nazis in order to be burned, and lied when asked saying they did not know where they were.

*

The question of compromise in Christian life does not refer only to saying the truth but to a whole range of problems. Let us not forget that the disciples of Jesus were armed. Peter had a sword on him. Jesus did not rebuke him for this but only for using it at the wrong time, though he surely knew the danger of being armed. Homer says: "The sword itself often provokes a man to fight".

So we will have compromises in different spheres of life.

p092 VICTORIOUS FAITH

But if we do not recognize other absolutes, neither do we recognize an absolute necessity of compromising. Withal, there must be a steadfast clinging to principles.

If every bad man can master his good desires, why should we not be able to master our bad passions?

*

Not too much will be demanded of you. It would have been nice if the shepherds who went to see the baby Jesus had brought a little bit of butter, cheese and milk for the hungry family. You will be taught to do such little practical things.

Every letter you write can become an ambassador of love.

One of the rules of the Bible in moral matters is continued in ECC 7:16: "Be not righteous over much".

Exaggerated honesty can be exaggerated stupidity. I know about a Christian who had in his office desk two pencils, one his own and one belonging to the company. All personal notes he made with his personal pencil, and those of the company with the company's. He stole the company's time to choose between these two pencils.

The man who will not act or speak except in total righteousness achieves nothing. He does not enter the path of progress, and he is not true because he is not real.

Christianity will make you wise in everyday living. You will know how to give the devil an opportunity to flee. If you cut away from him the possibility of withdrawal, you force him to resistance.

*

A teacher once asked his class: "What is religion?" A child gave this answer: "It is the set of things which are forbidden". Flee such a religion as you would flee from a rattlesnake!

Life is not possible without a certain amount of accommodation. We sometimes have to do things which normally would be forbidden. Blaise Pascal wrote: "Whosoever wishes to play the angel becomes a devil". Even as a Christian, remain a man! Be a saint, but - for the sake of those around you - be a human saint. Christians have been made kings. Every king who ruled according to inflexible principles would ruin his country.

*

Christians have great promises from God, some of which go so far as to say that fire will not burn nor water drown us. These promises are fulfilled daily by the fact that God gives us the wisdom to keep away from fire and deep waters.

You have to coat bitter medicine with sugar to make it acceptable to children. You are surrounded by children, in mind if not in body. When Count von Zinzendorf came to the United States, he found that people had a tremendous respect for the clergy. They would not learn religion from a man who was not ordained. So he introduced himself with the title "pastor", which no man had given him. (Neither had any man given to Paul the title of apostle. He had it from God.) Beethoven would never have been accepted into higher social circles because he did not belong to the nobility, so he put before his name the word "van". "Van Beethoven" sounded like the title of a Dutch nobleman. Thus he succeeded. Perhaps his symphonies would not have come to us without this trick.

When King Pedro of Brazil wished to erect the first public hospital in his country, he appealed in vain for funds. Then he made it known that whoever gave one million pesos would get the title of a duke, whoever gave half a million would be a count, whoever [gave] 100,000 would be a baron. In no time, he had all the money needed. The hospital was built. All the notables were gathered when the commemorative plate was to be unveiled. It bore the inscription: "This hospital has been given to human suffering by human stupidity and pride".

If you wish to achieve things for Christ, pay your tribute, with a smile of understanding, to human childishness. You are a child of God through Jesus. Others are not. You do not communicate with others on the same level of maturity.

If you are a child of God, be aware, without being proud about it, that you have only men to speak down to.

*

At the same time, recognize that you too are a sinful man. With authority Peter reproaches the Jews: "Ye denied the holy one". He also had denied Him. This is the paradox o Christian life. We reprove others for sins we commit ourselves.

Do not be surprised at anybody else's sin, not even at great sins in those whom you admire as stars in the spiritual sky.

Luther and Calvin were very far from being models of Christian love. There were stains on their characters as big those of the popes and bishops against whom they fought. There were dark sides in the lives of Wesley and Livingstone. These have been bitterly denounced by their adversaries. The Baptist Union of Britain did not find it easy to cope with their greatest preacher, Charles Spurgeon.

If you do not accept these facts of life, you will wear yourself out in useless conflict with the unchangeable laws of existence.

Do not struggle to amend the unalterable tendencies of your own nature. Just yield to Jesus. Do not compose your life. Let Jesus compose it. Believe only that He has taken over control and give play to your feelings. He will take care to allow you as much sin as you need to be kept humble; He will give you as much righteousness as you need to shine before men.

The ordinary man has to choose which things to do and which not to do. About Abraham it is written that "God was with him in ~all~ that he did" (GEN 21:22). This is your privilege if you are a child of Abraham by faith.

Some men have to choose where to go and where not to go. Joshua hears the words: "The Lord thy God is with the ~whithersoever~ thou goest".

p095 VICTORIOUS FAITH

I have mentioned above the inconsistencies of great preachers. Soon I will pass away. It is probable that I will be completely forgotten. If not, some future author will give my sins as an example in his book to encourage those who have fallen, to show them that even a man who suffered much and preached in many countries, as a certain Richard Wurmbrand did, had great blots upon his character.

I have been accused by adversaries of the Gospel, but also by some Christian leaders, of very great sins and also of grave errors in doctrine. Miriam and Aaron, sister and brother of Moses spoke against him. Aaron was the high priest ordained by God. Their accusations could not be discarded lightly. They knew Moses well. I, too, had men very near to me pointing their finger at me.

Some future biographer may sort these things out and find that the one or the other accusation has been factual, or he may find that my sins are in quite another sphere. To a few really bad features in my life, some will be added by adversaries. With a little ingenuity, you can make any criminal look like a saint, and vice versa. Even in the best of lives, there is much that can be read amiss deliberately. But there is residual evil which is always present in the life of every man.

When you read about evil in me and are certain of it, do not wonder. Accept sin as a fact in Wurmbrand's life, too, and praise God who had pity on such a sinner. Remember that the most beautiful book of the Bible is a song written by one of the sorriest characters of the Bible, King Solomon. Some even doubt his salvation.

*

Great preachers failed. A man of much lesser importance, Wurmbrand, has failed too. Jesus, before departing from among us, left his cause without fear or misgiving to Peter who had failed.

Archbishop Cranmer failed in his years of compromising with a tyrant. When arrested, he first recanted. He went to the stake for Christ only after wavering.

St. Joan of Arc also recanted at first.

Bismarck, at the end of his life, confessed that he had failed, that all he had done had brought happiness to not one human being.

We all live and will be saved only by grace.

You will never have peace until you accept the first postulate of dialectics, that there is nothing that does not contain contradictions. There exists no mathematics without plus and minus, no events without actions and reactions, no electricity without a positive and a negative pole, no war without offence and defence, no saint without sins and no sinner without virtues.

Accept yourself with your contradictions. Luther said that every Christian is "simul justus et peccator, comprehensor et viator" - "simultaneously righteous and sinful, a man who has reached the goal and one who reaches out towards it".

Contradiction is universal and absolute.

*

Never abandon a fearless fight! Think only about Pharaoh: how many plagues he resisted! And you, child of God, fear that you will not resist temptations?

You will surely overcome evil, but sometimes you have to take it slowly.

St. Francis of Assisi knew that some robbers surrounded his monastery and robbed from people who came to worship. The other monks wished to call the police to arrest them. St. Francis told them not to do so. He proposed that they go to the robbers with some food and wine and obtain from them a promise not to kill, but only to steal. After a time he got them to promise never to steal on Sundays or feast days. And so, slowly, slowly, he brought them to conversion.

You, too, as time goes on, will progress in the ways of righteousness. Be happy about those who can break bad habits at once. But if you cannot, and you find yourself slipping back into the old habit patterns, do not despair!

For the rest of your life, you must realize that you depend more on Christ's repairing your wrongs than on your not committing them in the first place. We are all men and seem to learn only from the errors which we commit.

*

Be careful not to fall into the sin of pride! It is easy to become proud when you are crowned together with Jesus. St Augustine writes: "Every other kind of evil is wrought by the doing of bad things. But it is the peculiar feature of pride, that it ruins even good deeds".

God will take infinite pains to keep your soul humble. Thank Him for this!

Having put aside pride, the Christian is not critical of other men. Shakespeare wrote: "I will chide no breather in the world than myself against whom I know most faults".

Try to be good avoiding that kind of conventional goodness which is negative, censorious, narrow and altogether despicable.

*

It is sometimes the duty of a Christian to oppose other men. But he should weigh their faults without putting his thumb on the scales.

Sometimes a Christian even has to take part in armed fights, as for instance when his fatherland calls him. But he does not do it with a haughty spirit. Executioners in the Middle Ages did not execute someone without first begging his pardon. They knew themselves to be sinners punishing fellow-sinners. The murderer of Mahatma Gandhi first bowed to him, showing him his respect. It is only in this spirit that a Christian is allowed to criticize and to fight.

He always casts his nets on the right side, which the Bible symbolizes the side of clemency. You catch more fish with meekness than with harshness.

*

A Christian has humility as his boat and flexibility as his chariot. To use Shakespeare's words in "As You Like It", a Christian "translates the stubbornness of fortune in a quiet and sweet style". He recognizes in what the world calls "justified indignation", the shine of satanic wisdom.

Against what are you righteously indignant? Against the sins of men? Sins of what gravity and of what number? Are they more and heavier than yours? There exists a God who must reserve for you eternal punishment if you do not forgive. What would you choose if you had to decide this very moment between forgiving and going into hell? Decide, with this in view! You will decide for meekness.

*

I will share with you three thoughts which may help you to keep humble.

First, the thought about the unimportance of mankind.

A professor at the University of Moscow said to a Western Christian colleague: "I find it difficult to accept your faith in God's concern for human beings. Why did we have to wait so long if God really cared so much for the individual? Why were there all those thousands and millions of years before human life began? Why did God create man only on the sixth day? He seems not to have been in a hurry! "

The answer is simple. Before there were men, God loved the sun and the flowers and the animals. God did not plant cork trees to provide stoppers for our wine bottles, but because God loves the cork tree. He saw all that he had done, and behold, it was good. God walked through the garden of Eden planted by Him before there was an Adam and Eve. He could enjoy the fragrance of the lilies and the beauty of the roses.

The second thought is about your own unimportance.

p099 VICTORIOUS FAITH

Before going to prison, I had considered myself an important person. I was pastor of a growing church, author of books. I worked for the World Council of Churches, I was involved in charitable actions, and so on and so on. I could not imagine how all the church work in Romania would manage without me. When I came out after fourteen years of prison, I saw that the church had progressed very well without me, that others had written better books than mine. I had not been as necessary as I had considered myself to be.

This might be true in your case, too.

The third thought is about the importance of your brother.

Clement of Alexandria wrote, "He who sees his brother, sees God". This view puts you at once far below every fellow Christian with whom you might disagree. See the Godhead in him and bow with respect, even if he should be the frailest Christian. He is the master, you are the slave. Some theologians believe that Lucifer's fall lay in his refusal to be a ministering angel for men. He had replied haughtily: "Non serviam" (I do not serve).

*

The Christian speaks little. Nature has given us one tongue and two ears. Let the Christian eliminate his idle words and use his tongue to praise the Creator of his two ears.

*

I know that much of what is written above is only common sense. But common sense is not very common. And every ounce of religion requires ten pounds of common sense to apply it.

But do not be so meek as to give up the fulfilling of your aim. We see in the parable of the pounds (Luke 19) t the Lord Jesus does not make the attaining of His goals dependent on the consent of men. He likens Himself to a nobleman who receives his kingdom from the ruler of a far country, not from the votes of his fellow citizens. These latter hated him. Some of his servants were slothful. He slays his enemies that refused his reign. He must reign because he is the supreme good. To the measure that you identify yourself with him, you will be firm, that your faith may prevail at all costs (GAL 1:8-9).

*

Your life should be Christ. Jesus had nowhere to lay His head. You may have a house, but only as a necessity, not as an indication of your desire to possess.

Birds from Alaska caged in the San Diego Zoo always look northward. So we look heavenward, to our true home.

A Christian has one great guiding principle: it is love. We have to love our neighbour, to love him even when he steals our time, when he borrows and does not return, when he says bad words behind our back.

A Christian loves thus, without asking for love in exchange. George Bernard Shaw distinguishes between Christianity and Crosstianity, by which he means forcing on others a sadistic moralism. The whole Christian ethic is a code of rules only or us. Pliny the Younger wrote about the first Christians "how much they love each other".

*

Wherever possible, prefer a competition in love to a quarrel with hatred.

Do not spend the few days of your short earthly life as a busybody meddling in the affairs of others, unless a common good is involved. Do not allow your attention to be distracted from Christ.

Accept the simple fact that some do not sympathize with you. This is normal. That you do not act according to their will can be a source of joy for you.

Avoid personal enmities as much as possible. "Make to yourselves friends," says Jesus (LUK 16:9). Never break a friendship even for a sincere reason. No motive for breaking it is more important than a friendship.

*

The queen of Saba came to visit king Solomon and told him: "Your wisdom is world renowned. Allow me to see how you judge the people". So the next day two thrones were set up in the palace yard and the parties which had quarrelled were summoned to appear.

The first were two Jews, each with his hand in the other's beard, kicking and shouting the worse insults at each other. After the servants had parted them, the king asked what the fight was all about.

One said: "O King, I sold to this rascal two acres of land and he paid me the money for it. With this the question was settled. But on the next day he digged deep in the newly bought earth and found there an enormous treasure in gold and jewels. It was surely his, because I had sold to him the earth with everything it contained. It was my fault that I had not found the treasure before selling the land. But just imagine, this crook coming to me and saying: 'Dear brother, you were mistaken to sell me that field for nothing at all. Restore to me the money I gave you. The treasure is yours and take back your land also.' He would like me to cancel the bargain and afterward be punished by God for injustice, because I have no title-deed at all for either the land or the treasure. It had been a definitive sale".

And the man shouted to the other Jew: "You deceiver! The treasure is yours".

The king asked the other party to speak out. He begged:

"Lord, have pity on my soul. I have bought only a piece of land, nothing more. I did not buy a treasure. I cannot keep a treasure worth millions for a few silver mines, which I paid as the price of the land. It would be unfair and I wish to be able to look in the eyes of God as an honest man. Tell this man that the treasure is his and only his!"

The queen of Saba could not believe her ears.

p102 VICTORIOUS FAITH

The king asked the first Jew, "Do you have any children?" He replied, "An eighteen-year-old daughter". He asked the other, "And you?" "I have a boy of twenty". The king gave the sentence: "The boy will marry the girl, and the treasure will be their dowry". The two parties embraced each other. The court case was finished.

The queen said: "I have never seen such a dispute in which each party says the other is right. How is it that such things happen with you?" The king answered: "But don't you know that we are the chosen people of God? We are a holy nation, which means that we have big quarrels, but all because the one esteems the other higher than himself, and every Jew would like his neighbour to be right in all differences. Is it not so with you? What would have happened if such a case had arisen in your country?"

The queen answered: "Everyone would have shouted, 'Mine is the treasure!'" Solomon asked: "And how would you have settled the dispute?" The queen was prompt in her reply: "I would have cut off the heads of both and taken the treasure for myself". The king asked again: "Do you have dogs and cats in your country?" The queen said: "Surely! Why do you ask?" Solomon finished the discussion with these words: "It is only for your pets that the sun still shines in your empire. God does not send the sun upon men who shout that they are right".

*

We have it from St. Anthony the Great that the only way to know God is through goodness.

Popular legend says that the wise men who came to worship the baby Jesus were three: Melchior, Balthasar and Gaspar. But the story is told that there were four. The name of the fourth was Artaban. Seeing the star which announced the birth of the Saviour, he had sold everything and had bought three very precious stones, a ruby, a sapphire and an emerald, to bring as gifts.

But while hurrying to the place where he was to meet the three others for the journey to Palestine, he saw on the highway a man who had been robbed and beaten almost to death. He took him to an inn and gave the innkeeper the sapphire to cover expenses. The man he saved was a Jew, knowledgeable in the Scriptures. On learning of the purpose of his journey he gave him his blessings and told him that the Messiah whom he went to greet was to be born in Bethlehem.

Artaban arrived at the meeting place too late. The other wise men had already left. So he travelled alone and came to Bethlehem. Here he was told that in truth a mysterious babe had been born in a stable not long before, that angels had sung at his birth, but that his parents had fled with him to an unknown destination.

Artaban rested from his journey at the home of a poor widow, mother of an only child. Suddenly at midnight, a neighbour rushed into the house and in tears said that the soldiers of Herod had killed her son and were slaughtering all the children in town. Artaban instructed the widow not to move. He went out of the house, locking the door behind him. When he saw an officer with drawn sword approaching, he met him with the ruby and said, "You can have this if you leave the house undisturbed. I live in it and I have no child". The officer, greedy, took the precious stone and went on his way.

The wise man comforted himself with the thought that he had at least one jewel left to offer to the newborn king of the Jews.

Over thirty years passed and Artaban could not find the One he sought. Finally he heard that He was living in Palestine, a prophet and doer of good deeds. Since Artaban had sought Him everywhere else, he turned eagerly toward Jerusalem. To his dismay, he was told when he arrived that the one in Bethlehem was being led to Golgotha to be crucified, because he had called Himself the Son of God.

Artaban hurried to Calvary, knowing Him to be truly the Son of God because he had seen His star. The ageing wise man had one jewel left. Perhaps he could ransom Him by giving the precious stone to the executioners.

But on his way he passed through a slave market. A young girl begged those passing by, "Free me! I believe in Jesus. My religion teaches purity and I am to be sold to a life of shame and sin". Artaban sighed and said, "Forgive me, Son of God, but I have to give away even the last jewel that I have reserved for you". He ransomed this girl.

At once, darkness covered the earth. There was a great earthquake. The house where Artaban took shelter fell and buried him under its ruins. Dying, he begged the Son of God to forgive him for having given away everything to men and not to him. At the last moment, he heard a voice telling him "Whatsoever you have done to these little brethren and sisters of mine, you have done unto me. Come and inherit the Kingdom which the Father has prepared for you from the beginning of the world". And so Artaban died.

*

One thing is sure: Lenin loved mankind. He loved it so much that he would have been able to kill all men for the good of mankind, because mankind was for him an abstraction.

Jesus teaches a personal love for one's neighbour.

When missionaries wanted to translate the New Testament into the Mireba language of New Guinea, they found no word for love. So they used "Nanumangund", which means, "I give you my inner parts". Let our love be such.

And let us always remember that the soul of love is love for souls.

*

Love is the distinctive feature of all Christians. From pastor, especially, burning love is expected.

The story is told that St. John Chrysostom once went to a remote part of his diocese that suffered much from the absence of priests. There he instructed a peasant as best as he could and ordained him. After returning to his see in Constantinople, he could not be quiet. "Have I not committed a mistake to install as priest somebody so unprepared for the ministry?" So he travelled back to that place and planned to arrive at the church a few minutes after the service had started. He hid himself behind a column to see how this peasant priest fulfilled his duty. Tears streamed from his eyes. He had never before seen a priest praying with so much devotion and such a glowing face, putting so much fervour in his short allocution and so gripping the hearts of all those present as he lifted them to heaven. When the liturgy was finished, St. Chrysostom entered the vicinity of the altar, knelt down before the priest, and asked for his blessing. The priest was shocked to see the bishop and said, "It is for you to bless me". The bishop insisted: "You bless me, because I have never before seen a priest serving God with so much fire and love in his heart". The ignorant priest, wondering, asked, "But, brother bishop, is it possible to serve God otherwise?"

God expects no better than to be vanquished by the loving look in your eyes. But men will resent your power. Spirit-filled Christians are hated. Great trees give more shade but also suffer stronger winds. But the arrows of hate aimed at you will never hit you, because you bear the shield of faith and you belong to another world which these arrows cannot reach.

Men will be able to inflict upon you only outward suffering. And even this you will recognize as coming ultimately by the will of your strange God, from whom you have decided to accept everything. Even an Auschwitz or a Buchenwald, burning ovens or gas chambers, will never succeed in making a Christian abandon his belief in God or his love for Him.

Nobody, not even God, has a club great enough drive me away from Him. I will love Him though He slay me.

Believe in Christ and love. This is enough. Do not accept any extras - dogmas, rituals, rules, conditions attached by different organizations - as of primary importance.

Just love. Love even if you are not loved in return.

Jesus taught that when you are slapped you should turn the other cheek. The probable result will be a second and a third slap. I had the experience myself. A meek attitude is interpreted as weakness by the adversary. Christians in concentration camps would seek to fulfil the commandment of the Lord when compelled to walk one mile with some heavy loads on their shoulders, they would walk two. The result was that the norm was increased next day and the exhausted prisoners had to fulfil tasks which crushed their bodies. Jesus told us to walk the extra mile. He never promised that this would give us success in our enterprises, but only that we would become perfect in love. This is enough.

This rule of simply fulfilling commandments without expecting any benefit beyond the perfection of Christian character applies also to other spheres of Christian life.

We have to bring the good news about Christ to other people. What reception we will get is not our business.

The story is told of a ship that sounded an SOS out on the stormy waters. The rescue crew immediately began to make preparations to take to sea.

One of the young lads spoke up: "Captain, don't you think these waters are too rough and the winds too fierce for us to go?"

The captain said, "No, the orders have come to go. There is a ship in distress. We must go".

The lad objected: "But, captain, we may not come back".

The captain replied, "Young fellow, we have not been commanded to come back, we have been commanded to go".

*

Accept injustice with satisfaction and joy.

The Jews have a joke. A man cried in a railway station, "Rubinstein! Rubinstein!" A Jew put his head out of the window. The man who had shouted gave him a slap, saying,

"Here you have what you deserve, you miserable Rubinstein". All in the compartment began to laugh. The slapped Jew also laughed, wholeheartedly. The other passengers asked him "Why do you laugh?" He answered, "Well, I deceived him. I am not Rubinstein".

Gladly accept the kicks and slaps deserved by others and rejoice that somebody has been mistaken in hurting you instead of another. Jesus gave Himself to be beaten and killed in our place, for our sins.

During the socialist persecution of religion in Mexico in the Thirties, high prices were put on the heads of fugitive Catholic priests.

A Judas explained to a priest that he had always been poor. "By selling you," he said, "I could get some money and would have something to live on with my family." The priest left the forest where they had met and went with him to town that Judas might sell him and give a piece of bread to his children. The priest was shot.

*

Thieves stole from a church during the religious service. Observing them, the abbot said to the monks: "Look how well they do their work. Let us do ours as well: let us pray for their salvation". And he continued the liturgy. The robber left with their spoil.

*

Though love ends with defeat for the lover, it is still the best of ways. But sometimes it can be victorious.

An English sergeant once stationed in Egypt tells this incident about himself: "There was a civilian in the same company who was converted. We gave that fellow an awful time. One very wet night, he came in tired. Before getting into bed, he went down on his knees to pray. My boots were heavy with wet mud, and I let him have one on each side of his head. He just went on with his prayers. Next morning, I found those boots beautifully polished and standing by the side of my bed.

p108 VICTORIOUS FAITH

That was his reply to me, and it broke my heart. I was saved that day".

*

Stick to the Bible. Do not give a penny to any criticism of it, however scholarly it may be. Do not criticize the Bible, but let yourself be criticized by it.

In an exhibit of modern art, there was an empty canvas instead of a painting. Below it was the title, "A cow grazing". A visitor asked the artist, "What does this title mean? I see no grass. Where is the cow grazing?" The artist answered, "Well, the cow has eaten up all the grass". The visitor persisted: "But where is the cow?" The painter replied, "Why should the cow have remained if there was no grass left?"

*

Bible critics are like this artist. They leave in the Holy Scriptures only empty pages. No God, no miracles, no true history, no reliable teachings, no devil, no hell, and no paradise. Do not pay any attention to such artists!

St. John Chrysostom said: "We bid you believe the Scriptures. If any one agrees with the Scriptures, he is the Christian".

*

If you study it attentively, you will surely find contradictions in the Bible. I mistrust stories which hold together in every detail. They are artificially construed. Believe in the Bible ~because~ the stories do not match.

*

Do not be concerned about the scepticism of some scientists regarding the Bible. How much do scientists know? In one of Balzac's novels, a scientist, unmoved by his wife's weeping says: "What are tears? I have analysed them. There is some phosphate of lime, chloride of soda, some mucus and some water". The one who looks at the Bible with such a distorted mind is doomed not to understand it. You believe every letter of the Bible.

*

Beware of bigotry! Do not force others to have the same belief as yours. Rabindranath Tagore said rightly: "Bigotry tries to keep truth safe in the hand with a grip that kills it".

ant once stationtian is tolerant with everybody, even with the intolerant.

An atheist lecturer proved that the Bible is not reliable. He opened to ECC 1:9, where it is written, "There is no new thing under the sun". Mockingly, he said, "This is an obvious lie. There are so many new things under the sun - X-rays, radio, cable, railways! So many inventions about which mankind had no idea centuries ago".

A Christian replied unperturbed. "The Bible is right, every iota of it. There is nothing new under the sun". Now the infidel got angry. "How can you be so stubborn and give such a stupid answer?" And he began to enumerate again the X- rays, the radio, railways, and so on.

The Christian's reply was: "Since the beginning, believers have said to unbelievers: 'You cannot deceive God with outward religion. God looks at the heart'. The unbelievers were sure of themselves: God cannot see the heart because it is covered with flesh and bones and skin. It is well hidden. So God asked Rontgen to make X-rays, with the help of which even we, men, can see inward parts. But they are not something new. They are modern illustrations of a truth we believers have known for thousands of years".

The unbeliever had not expected this. He asked, "And what about radio?" "Old," was the immediate reply, "old as mankind itself. From the beginning, the faithful have said to those who lived in sin, 'Be careful in your speaking! God hears every word'. But the infidels have only replied in scorn, 'Heaven is so far away. I cannot hear a debate going on in the next room. How can God in His distant heaven hear my words, especially the bad ones I pronounce in whisper?' So God ordered Marconi to construct a radio, which makes it possible for the people of London to hear even the cough of a speaker in Moscow. It all helps to awaken our souls to eternal truth. You do not see the one who lectures over the radio. He is far away. So God in heaven can hear every word of yours."

The infidel was at his wits' end. "Can you also show me that railways are not new?" "Surely! We have always warned, 'Repent today! Tomorrow it might be too late'. People delayed their repentance. So God arranged to have Stevenson create the railway. In order to avoid collisions, every train has to leave on the minute. If you arrive one minute too late, the train will have disappeared before your eyes - a good example of the old truth that the time for repentance is always now. You can have a heart attack the next minute."

Thus the Atheist lecturer said that there is no joking with this book.

The Bible is true, every letter is true. It is true even in its contradictions.

*

Stick to prayer. Heaven and earth can be in as direct communication as London and Berlin. Only make your prayer a radical decision between you and God.

*

Never pray as to a God who is unwilling to give. Seneca wrote: "The gods are not like men. They give and give to others until they leave themselves bare".

* Unanswered prayer does not exist. During the last war, Christians in both Germany and Britain prayed for victory. The unanswered prayers of the Germans were an answer to the prayers of the British. We live in a world divided into nations, races, classes, parties, religions and conflicting individual interests. Why must your interest always prevail with God? If after having prayed for a victory you are defeated, be happy! It means that your adversaries' prayers have been accepted by God. He is still a God who hears prayer.

*

Let your life be one of service.

Do not say that you have no spiritual power or qualifications. A boy gave to Jesus five loaves of bread and two fish. Jesus multiplied them. But what if the boy had had nothing? Such a possibility does not exist. In the Bible, the word "zero" or its mathematical symbol "0" never occurs. The Bible is constructed mathematically. Every letter of the Hebrew and Greek alphabet corresponds with a figure. Every word has a numerical value. My son has written his thesis for the B.D. degree at the Lutheran University of Paris on the subject of mathematics in the Bible. But the Bible contains neither the word "zero" nor the sign for it "0", which is especially significant when you realize that the Chaldean ancestors of the Jews already had the zero written as a circle. The very word "zero" comes from the Chaldean "zer".

Nobody is a zero before God. Nobody is without some gift. Your gift is perhaps the humility to believe that you have none.

*

On May 21, 1972, I had a vision in St. Stephen's Church in Southport, Great Britain. I meditated kneeling before the altar. I remembered that Elijah had asked a widow for a piece of bread. The woman answered that she had very little flour and oil left, just enough for one last meal for her son and herself (1KI 17:11-12).

At once, I had before my eyes a hungry man, begging from the Virgin Mary. She answered: "I have none. I am a mother of sorrows and my Son was hanged on a cross. He cried that He was forsaken even by God. Bread I have not, but I can give you the comfort of knowing that it is worthwhile to endure all things for God".

This hungry man became a zealous preacher and made thousands nourish Jesus with adoration.

Never complain about your cross.

A Christian once complained to God about it. So God took him to His storehouse and told him, "You are free to choose whatever cross you like". One was beautiful, golden, but very heavy; another light but rugged and apt to wound one's shoulder. In the end he found in the corner a cross which he thought would suit him. God said to him, "Have a better look at it". It was the cross which he had first received from God.

Suffering is sacred. Never squander as much as the smallest crumb of it!

*

Know God, but know also the devil.

"The Pastor Hermas," an ancient Christian book, says that every man has a personal devil haunting him, as he has a personal guardian angel. Try to know well the angel, who is your bodyguard. Try to know well your devil, too.

*

There exists a dangerous fashion among some youngsters today. The moment they are converted, they drop their jobs and studies in order to become preachers. This antagonizes their families. Running after others, whom they most probably will never win to Christ, they lose the possibility of bringing salvation to their relatives. Remain in your place and in your own family for Christ, if you can.

To be a missionary is a rare and exceptional vocation.

The truer a Christian is to Christ, the greater is the likelihood that he will live in intellectual and spiritual isolation.

This does not mean that he will not be a missionary. He will be one of a special kind. You do not have to force water down the mountainside into the valley. It flows by itself. Missionary work is not done strenuously. Exist on a high level and the word of God will pour down upon those below you. I appreciate missionary work. There is something wrong in missionary effort.

*

In the Louvres is the painting "The Miracle of San Diego" by Murillo. Two noblemen and a priest enter a kitchen. They are amazed that all kitchenmaids are angels. One handles pot, another a joint of meat, still another a basket of vegetables and one tends the fire. But they all do angelic work.

No labour is common unless we make it so. Jesus Himself the One with the greatest mission, worked in a woodshop. Please, unless you have a very clear, exceptional call, do not become a missionary in the professional sense of the word. Rather, be a missionary in your kitchen or factory. You will be more useful there.

*

But never lose the broader prospective. Care for the evangelizing of the world. Care also for social justice.

The Lord Jesus told a parable about a prodigal son who wasted his father's substance with riotous living. After many adventures, he returned to his father, who received him with love, fed him with the fatted calf, gave him good garments and even placed on his finger a golden ring.

This prodigal son now enjoyed himself, and that was all.

The Lord warned us not to seek the truth in His parables. The parables are for those who cannot take in the truth.

Normally, a youngster who had done such things would have to think about restitution to his father and about trying to win for God his former comrades in revelry and wickedness. He also could have eaten a little bit less of the fatted calf and cared about the inhabitants of a hungry country in which he had lived for a while.

p114 VICTORIOUS FAITH

A Christian thinks about all these things, which means that he gets involved in evangelistic and social problems. But he has no illusions about perfecting society before the return of the Lord Jesus. Do your duty to witness for Christ and to improve society, but be temperate in all things. Do not overdo. Overwork is a drug for the disappointed, and revolutions are the worst opium for the people.

Keep the right balance between a small life of self-interest and an exaggerated desire to bring about the immediate conversion of mankind or the establishing of justice, which take generations to accomplish.

*

For centuries there has been a war against poverty. But there is more poverty in the world today than ever before. For centuries men have talked of disarmament or the abolition of war, yet in Vietnam alone more bombs have been dropped than were used against Germany in the whole World War II. We try to fill the gap between generations. In the museum of antiquity in Constantinople, there is the oldest piece of writing known to men. It bears the following inscription: "Alas times are not what they used to be! Children no longer obey their parents, and everybody is writing a book about it".

It is a utopian dream to force a caterpillar to be a chrysalis, or a chrysalis to be a butterfly. It is a utopian dream to plan a good social state for unrighteous men.

It is a hard thing for a Christian to see demons triumph over nations. But the best remedy is to enter into quietness and say to yourself: "We have no solution for the social problems of mankind, just as we have no solution for the squaring of the circle".

*

At the root of all social and racial unrest is the trespassing against the tenth commandment: "Thou shalt not covet". Why do you need more than you have?

p115 VICTORIOUS FAITH

I wonder if there are many who have experienced as much hunger and destitution as I have. For a long time, my ration of food was one slice of bread a week and daily a soup of dirty potato peels. I had neither shoes nor trousers. I trembled for cold. You can be happy even under such conditions. You can be happy even while knowing that your wife, too, suffers the same hardship and your child is deprived of all the joys of life. This is what your mysterious, heavenly Father has allotted you, and that is it.

I know that voluntary poverty is one thing: a poverty imposed upon you by exploiters is something else. You have to oppose the latter. But in order to oppose it successfully, you must have power.

You are never so influential as when you are really quiet. You do not seem mighty, but that not-seeming is part of the quality. Live in eternity, not in daily incidents and the succession of events. Eternity cannot be disturbed even by the cry of a million hungry children. If you are seated serenely in heavenly places, what you do for these hungry children will bring fruit. Otherwise your whole fight will be just vanity. It will be like Sysiphus rolling a huge stone uphill: each time it falls back he has to roll it up again. The whole of human history has been like this. That which stands has been accomplished by the quiet spirits, by those who are above the intermittent bubbles called centuries with their transitory sufferings and joys.

The world is not just a garden, a wonderful creation, as some religious hymns say. There is an ugly side to it. It will be overcome by the fierce fight of the quiet. The still small voice prevails.

*

Even the ungodly accomplish very good things through social fights, reform, revolutions and war. Only that these will not last.

There were once two boy silkworms who raced for love of a girl silkworm and ended up in a tie.

p116 VICTORIOUS FAITH

This is also the end of all social struggles. The fighters on both sides become clay.

*

The Tibetan ascetic Milarepa had kept for himself only pot from which to drink water. One day it broke. Then Milarepa said:

> My earthly pot now is and now is not.
> My sole possession –
> By breaking, it has become a lama.
> For it has preached an admirable discourse
> On the impermanence of things.

Dedicate yourself to your soul. Others will come to salvation by the contagious force of a faithful character. As for human society, leave it to the One who bears the responsibility for it. "Except the Lord build the house, they labour in vain that build it. Except the Lord keep the city, the watchman walk but in vain. It is vain for you to rise up early, to sit up late, to eat the bread of sorrows". (PSA 127:1-2.)

Three times – "in vain".

Surely, many things have to be done in society. But from Livingstone, the great fighter against slavery and the great missionary and explorer, we have the word, "Whosoever has faith is not in haste".

*

We are not in haste because we believe in our immortality. Many things which are not achieved now will be achieved later. Moses pleaded with God to enter the Holy Land. God refused him. He had to die outside of it. Some two thousand years pass. The Lord Jesus speaks on Mount Tabor with Moses.

Tabor is in Palestine, which means that the desire of Moses has been fulfilled notwithstanding, though a little bit later. What are two thousand years to one who lives eternally?

p117 VICTORIOUS FAITH

"Always be true to your immortality," wrote Solzhenitsyn. Then people will be able to say about you what Goethe said about Lavater: "In his vicinity, you become virginal".

Why do some people riot? There are many motivations. Among others is the fact that rebellion is one of the greatest of human pleasures. Many consider it a higher pIeasure than sex, alcohol, music or drugs.

During the disorders in Belfast, the number of suicides decreased by fifty per cent. The number of persons treated by physicians for depression also decreased. Aggressiveness against one's neighbour diminishes that against oneself. For those who do not have worthwhile tasks to engage their energies, social peace or peace between nations and races is boresome.

There is also in every rebellion an element of exasperation. Wild crowds do not care much if things are better, provided they will be different. They exchange flies for bumble bees and bees for hornets. Revolutions change the social order, but they rarely improve it.

Sun-Yat-Sen, who started the Chinese revolution that has continued for sixty years, wrote towards the end of his life: "If we analyze our first promptings to carry out the Chinese revolution, we shall see that we had in view the salvation of the Chinese people and the country, whereas the result has been quite the opposite, and the Chinese people are becoming more and more oppressed, the country more and more unhappy".

For these and many other reasons, real Christians have always opposed rioters, guerrillas and the like.

When the peasant troubles started in Germany during the Reformation, Luther first wrote "Advice for Peace". But when the events became violent, he wrote a pamphlet "Against the Murderous Rioting Bands of Peasants". He condemned them in the strongest possible terms as rebels against God and their rightful lords. He called for their suppression. When the rebellion had been suppressed, he interpreted the event as a righteous judgment of God.

Know all this! Do not enter easily into battle. But if you are forced to do battle, be prepared to win.

You will regret bitterly every weakness in your fight. When Danton attacked the Tuileries, Louis XVI did not permit his troops to defend the palace, that blood might not be shed. He took refuge in the National Assembly. The result was that more blood was shed than if he had defended his authority. Danton's rebels killed everybody in the palace, starting with the marshal and finishing with the cook. The corpses were maimed. Then followed the reign of terror, to which even Danton fell victim.

*

Shakespeare wrote in "As You Like It" that "Love is to be made of sighs and tears, of faith and service, fantasy, all made for passion and all made of wishes; all adoration, duty and observance, all humbleness, all patience and impatience, all purity, all trial, all obeisance". There is more to love than this. Love for the French people should have obliged Louis Ludovic XVI to fight to the uttermost against the rebels.

Let us be sure that our fierce fighting proceeds from love.

*

Church Fathers living in the desert discussed, after decades of prayer and fasting, which is the highest Christian virtue. The one said "love", the other "righteousness", the third "austerity", the fourth "humility", and so on. St. Anthony the Great ended the debate with the words: "The highest virtue is to have in all things the right measure". All agreed.

*

After coming to Jesus, you will love His church, too. You will see His church with new eyes. There are many ugly and repulsive things in the church, but like a seed it also contains much potential. The seed has within it the possibility of coming a beautiful flower. So has even the most decadent church.

You cannot bear the sermons of the pastor? You consider them very bad?

As if to accustom us to poor and very wrong sermons, Jesus delivered a sermon which superficial Christians would consider bad. You find it in MTT 15:23. He calls a woman a dog, only because she belongs to another nation. The sermon seems to be full of spirit of caste by saying that Jews are the children and that the food reserved for them should be given to dogs. But this sermon, which we would consider bad, is the black background on which is painted the beautiful deed of healing the sick daughter of that woman and of teaching her humility.

Could it be that the bad sermons of pastors are meant to teach you humility and to remind you how often your own words are bad? In any case, unbearable sermons are the output of an institution that for two thousand years has kept before mankind the remembrance of the one who deserves our whole love, our Lord Jesus Christ.

Learn from weak and bad sermons. Balaam set an example of humility. He was ready to listen even to an ass when it told him in very plain language a truth from God.

You complain about the preacher. There might be something wrong with the listener, too.

*

Learn to distinguish between the true church and institutions which only bear the name. The one who gave a definitive status to the church state from which most of the major denominations derive, the emperor Theodosius, slaughtered the whole male population of Thessaloniki. The biography of Constantine the Great is horrible.

Clovis, king of the Francs, became a Christian because he loved the Christian princess Clotilde. He promised during a battle that he would take her God as his God, if he conquered the Allemans. His victory was hardly sufficient reason to accept the Christian faith, according to which Francs should not fight against Allemans, but live in peace with them. The people accepted Christianity because the king ordered it.

Duke Vladimir of Kiev became a Christian in order to marry the Byzantine princes Anne. He forced the whole of Russia to become Christian.

When Finland was defeated by the Swedes under St. Eric, the people were compelled to embrace Christianity.

There have been some very bad popes and many bad bishops as well as many good ones. But often offerings heaped upon the altar of the apostles went straight into the pockets of the clergy.

Pope Julius who built St. Peter's dome in Rome was a man of war.

Pope Leo X, who excommunicated Luther, is reported to have said: "What profit has not the fable of Christ brought us!"

*

When Protestantism separated from Catholicism, peace was settled after many wars on the principle "Cuius regio, eius religio", which means that people everywhere had to follow the religion of their prince.

A church created and perpetuated in such a manner could only be unfaithful to Christ. We tell about the authority of this church what Samuel said to king Saul: "Thou hast rejected the word of the Lord and the Lord has rejected thee" (1SM 15:26).

Luther and Melanchthon regretted that they had reformed too much. Melanchthon wrote in 1530: "Oh, if I could re-establish not the worldly, but the spiritual administration of the church through bishops, because I see what a church we will have after the dissolution of church order and discipline". Luther wrote to Melanchthon: "I think we have gone too far in the good". I, on the contrary, regret that the reformers did not go far enough.

The Reformed churches have been intolerant toward the preaching of the true gospel just as the Catholic church had been before them. The Church of England had no place for either Bunyan or Wesley when they were alive. Today, there are commemorative plates for them in Westminster Abbey, centuries after their death.

The Reformed churches as well as the Catholic and the Orthodox (except under atheist or non-Christian regimes) are identical with the world. Everybody is baptized as an infant and everybody is a Christian. The world cannot accept the whole Christ. Neither can such a church.

She can only misuse money entrusted to her, as the world does. We read in II Kings 12, that bricklayers were more trusted in money matters than priests. Things have not changed since.

Wycliffe wrote: "If the priesthood misuses church treasures, they must be taken from it. Otherwise, you neglect your duty". And Bonnhoffer: "The church is a church only when she exists for others. To begin with, she must give away all her property to the needy. Pastors must live only on the free will offerings of believers. If necessary, they must exercise a secular profession".

Thinking about the nominal church, Paul Tillich wrote: "The first word to be spoken by religion to the people of our time must be a word spoken against religion".

He expresses in other words what we find already in ~The Sum of Theology~, written by Thomas Aquinas: "When there is an imminent danger for faith, prelates can be accused even publicly by their subordinates".

*

In this false church, the word "Christian" can strike terror to the heart. Christians have done to Christians as much harm, in as cruel a manner, as Nazis or Communists or other pagans have done. Not every man you consider a Christian is a Christian.

*

p122 VICTORIOUS FAITH

But the word "church" also has another sense. By becoming a Christian, you will enter into a real fellowship of brethren and sisters in the faith.

Nobody counterfeits what is not valuable. The many counterfeits of Christianity prove its value. There are pretenders only to pure life, none to a bad one.

Leave the pretenders to Christianity and attach yourself to the true church. In it are some big saints, real poems of God. This is the Greek word which the Bible uses to describe them - "poema" (EPH 2:10).

I agree with Pope Pelagius II that God cannot be on the side of a man who is not in peace and unity with the church, provided that we understand by "church" this sacred fellowship of cross-bearing real believers.

But be prepared to have disappointments here, too. God's true church consists of people who only strive towards godliness, without having reached it yet. Remember that you are also a disappointment to others.

Real Christians are also capable of treachery and cruelty.

Wicked men have virtues, saints have sins. The world is not divided into white and black. It will sometimes be difficult for you to distinguish between the true and the false.

St. Thomas Aquinas said: "Gratia non tollit naturam" (Grace does not destroy nature).

Beware especially when you receive many gifts from God. Graces and gifts can serve as enemies. They seldom provoke admiration. In most cases they provoke envy.

In spite of the weaknesses of its members, the church is real if it is a fellowship of believers and in it you are taught the Word of God.

But again: Do not have too great expectations!

In the Bible we have the word of God, but what an imprecise word. In MTT 21:7, we read that the disciples brought to Jesus an ass and a colt, ... and they set Him thereon, which gives the impression that they set Him on two animals. The word of God is written in part by uneducated man in an unpolished language.

When God became man, he became a despised man, counted among robbers. When he gave his written word, he gave it with many imprecise and obscure parts. When he gave us priests and pastors he knew we would be taught sermons and books containing much human ignorance and distortion.

At poor religious services, remember Jesus in His humility. The humble church is the extension of the humble incarnation

*

After having made this distinction between denomination as such and the real church, children of God must maintain unity. It is a shame that on Sundays we scatter to hundreds of confessions and often leave Him alone (JHN 16:32). The Greek word for "scatter" is "scorpithete" which is akin to "scorpions".

Apply to all brethren this principle: "In necessary things unity, in dubious things liberty, in all charity".

Very important is this unity. The last words of Melanchthon were: "Let them be one!" He had them from Jesus: "... that they all may be one".

Strive towards unity, but again without illusions. You will not achieve much. Confusion and discord shall spread more and more even among the children of God, like clouds of darkness. Even among believers it will be a problem to find a congregation and a pastor to satisfy the needs of your soul. Guard what you have already received and keep the faith in Christ, even if you have to hold unto the root of the tree by your fingernails to stop yourself from being swept away, and thus remain until the day of your death. A better world awaits you where clarity reigns.

I spoke about faithfulness toward the church, but it must also be clear that we cannot be in communion with God through the church and have at the same time a direct relationship with God. The church makes the relationship indirect. Liberty of conscience vis-a-vis God is greater than the authority of the church. The church has always found it difficult to identify the saints. She has sentenced and condemned many godly persons as heretics.

You must be aware that you run in vain if you do not run with the true church. But at the same time, you have to keep certain distance even from the truest church.

*

Never allow yourself to be discouraged by things which you see in the church. The story is told of a Jew who was converted after having seen the Vatican during the time of Borgia. He said: "A church which exists in spite of such leaders must be with God".

I love the church mostly for its ugly sides. When you enter a hospital, you feel revulsion at the stench, pus, blood, groanings. This is the beauty of a hospital, that it receives sick men and that doctors and nurses are prepared to spend their days amid such unpleasant conditions in order to help. The beauty of the church consists in the fact that it receives sinners and criminals. After being received by the church, these sinners commit new wicked deeds, this time under the cloak of Christianity. And the church, a loving mother, continues to keep them at her loving bosom.

I find this beautiful.

And then there is also another side to the church. It contains not only wicked men.

It has men like Pope Gregory the Great who, while putting on liturgical garments, was told that a man had died for hunger. Immediately, he put aside the robes, saying, "If one man dies for hunger in Rome, the Pope is not worthy to say the mass".

The church has given and still gives a whole constellation of men who love God and their fellowmen wholeheartedly and put themselves at their service.

p125 VICTORIOUS FAITH

The church has a rich experience with God and with men. Its treasury is at your disposal.

Whatever happens in the church, good or evil, there remains one crucial fact: the resurrection of Jesus. It is surely true.

Suppose, as our adversaries say, that this whole story is forged. Why would forgers invent the episodes in which Mary Magdalene does not recognize the resurrected Lord? According to LUK 24:16 and JHN 21:4, His closest disciples did not recognize Him to be Jesus. Imagine, if you will, that several persons plot to accuse a man falsely for a crime he did not commit and then, when they appear in the witness stand, each one says that he does not recognize the accused as having been the criminal. Obviously, their whole cause would collapse. Now, forgers are usually very intelligent men. If the apostles were forgers, why would they have repeated the stupidity, unforgivable for a forger, of saying that they did not recognize the person before them as the resurrected Jesus. The explanation is simple: because they were lovers of truth and things had happened just as they tell them. Jesus later gave signs enough to dispel every doubt in their heart. They knew that he was alive. So do we.

He is alive not only in heaven: He lives in our hearts. If your spiritual eyes are open and you look at a believer, you see Jesus enthroned in his heart, or, to change the figure, the believer himself lying at His bosom, safely wrapped in both arms of Jesus.

Cling always to the one sure fact: Jesus rose from the dead. He is alive. He has been dead, now what had happened to His corpse? Had His disciples stolen it? Then they would have known that He had not fulfilled His promise to rise again. They would assuredly have lost their faith. Almost all of them later died a martyr's death. No one goes to death under torture for what he himself knows to be a lie. So the corpse of Jesus was not in the hands of the disciples.

If it had been in the hands of His adversaries, Christianity would never have arisen. When the apostles preached the resurrection of Jesus, the chief priests who had sentenced Him to death would only have had to open the tomb and show the body of Jesus. The three thousand who were converted in one day in Jerusalem - a heavy blow indeed for the Pharisees - would never have accepted the claims of the resurrection had they seen the body of Jesus still lying in the tomb. Peter would easily have been humiliated and discredited if his claims about his resurrected Lord had been disproved.

Neither the friends nor the enemies of Jesus possessed His corpse because on the third day Jesus was no more a corpse, but alive. He is alive today and will be throughout eternity.

You might have tribulations in the world and within the church, but the living Jesus will give you joy amidst tribulation.

In fellowship with Jesus, how easy it will be for you to know the right Christian attitude toward the problems of your life.

In Dostoievski's ~Brothers Karamazov~, the Great Inquisitor, on learning that a certain Jesus Christ was walking through the streets of Madrid and by his unwanted presence endangering the Christian religion which he had happened to found, summoned Jesus before him and lectured him on how foolish he had been. As an idealist and a utopian, Jesus could only have been crucified. It was men like the Great Inquisitor who have made Christianity persist by putting it in a fixed frame and burning those with the mind of Jesus.

To all the insolence and cruelty of the Great Inquisitor, Jesus never answered a word. He listened attentively to the end. Was it not a creature of God, a man for whom he had died, that spoke? When the Great Inquisitor had finished, Jesus kissed him. That was all.

Let a kiss be your final answer to any insolence and cruelty. Even Judas Iscariot desired the kiss of Christ.

*

p127 VICTORIOUS FAITH

You have to deal with men, to listen to them, to give them your replies. But leave them as quickly as you can. "One thing is needful," and Mary Magdalene chose "that good part": she sat quietly at Jesus' feet and heard His word. She needed only Jesus, even when He was crucified, yes, even when He was a corpse. She loved Him and only Him. And He loved her so much that He took great risks in accepting her kisses and loving gestures. In that time no rabbi would have allowed a woman even to touch him. For Jesus also only one thing is needful: to show love to Magdalene's.

The eye by which she saw Jesus was the same as the eye by which Jesus saw her. There are many bodily eyes. The spiritual eye is one. It is common to God, the angels, and believers.

*

A shepherd said to a nightingale, "Sing!" The nightingale replied, "The frogs make too much noise. It takes away the pleasure of singing. Don't you hear them?" The shepherd said, "I surely do, but only your silence makes me hear them".

Walk through the world singing the song of Jesus. It is to your shame if so many words of hatred and unbelief are heard.

If you are faithful to Christ and to His church, when you finish your earthly life paradise will be honoured to receive you. But you have a higher calling than paradise and the heavenly Jerusalem. You are called to sit with Jesus on His throne, from which universes are created and ruled, just as Jesus has overcome and sits on the throne with His Father (REV 3:21). Paradise will be for you just a time of relaxation. Divine tasks await you, because you will have become Christ-like, a partaker of the divine nature.

p128 VICTORIOUS FAITH

I have told you the word of God. It will help you if you listen to it.

I do not know if you will. But the present book has helped me.

Since I came to the West nine years ago, I have written tirelessly about the Communist persecution of Christians. It is now a long time since I came out of Communist prisons. But till now, Communist prisons had not come out of me.

A young patient of a psychotherapist painted dozens of women's faces cracked like broken vases, faded like worn flowers, and with hard, unyielding eyes. Only when he had painted a whole and healthy face did he know that he could be cured and that he was a painter.

For the first time, I have written a book the only subject of which is Christ. Through it I have been healed of having my mind burdened continually with Communism and its prisons.

Are you confronted by the terrible fact of suffering? This book will give you light.

Richard Wurmbrand is a Christian pastor who suffered under the Nazis first, and then endured tortures during 14 years' imprisonment in jails in Communist Rumania. When released he came to the West, where he has devoted his life to bringing the message of Christ to Communist countries. His first book, "Tortured for Christ", followed by others, is a best-seller in 50 languages and depicts the difficult life of Christians under Communist rule. An entirely different book, "Victorious Faith", sails from tribulation into the peace-giving waters of Christian faith and testimony - a voyage certain to refresh and inspire every person confronted with the fact of suffering.

"This is a most astonishing, perhaps the most astonishing book that I have read," says Dr. J. B. Phillips.

"Richard Wurmbrand must surely be one of the most remarkable Christians living today. He went far beyond what most of us would think were the limits of human endurance, and he retained his faith in Christ and the power of love."

Dr. James Stewart wrote: "These pages are a veritable testimony ~de profundis~, and what makes them so intensely moving is that there we can see faith going right to the breaking point and beyond - and remaining unbroken."

"Shattering," Dr. William Neil said. "Here is a man who knows what Christianity is all about. In his rat-infested cell the Bible comes alive. These are gripping and moving sermons, a humbling but triumphant vindication of the truth of the gospel."

Out of fourteen years in jail under the Communists in Rumania, I spent three years alone in a cell thirty feet below ground, never seeing sun, moon or stars, flowers or snow, never seeing another man except for the guards and interrogators who beat and tortured me.

I seldom heard a noise in that prison. The guards had felt-soled shoes and I did not hear their approach.

I had no Bible, nor any other book. I had no paper on which to write my thoughts. The only things we were expected to write were statements accusing ourselves and others.

During that time I rarely slept at night. I slept in the daytime. Every night I passed the hours in spiritual exercises and prayer. Every night I composed a sermon and delivered it.

I had a faint hope that one day I might be released. And so I tried to memorize the sermons. In order to do this, I used a device of putting the main ideas into short rhymes. There are precedents for this. Omar Khayyam, Nostradamus, Heinrich Seuse and Angelus Silesius all condensed into extremely short verses a wealth of philosophy, religion and prophecy. So I composed my rhymes. These I learned by heart and kept in my memory through continual repetition. When my mind broke down under the influence of heavy doping, I forgot them. But as the effects of the drugs passed, they came vividly back to me.

Here are just a few of the sermons. My unusually good memory retains some three hundred and fifty.

These sermons are not to be judged for their dogmatic content. I did not live on dogma then. Nobody can. The soul feeds on Christ, not on teachings about him.

From the dogmatic point of view, David and Job were wrong to argue with God. From the dogmatic point of view, the author of the book of Esther was wrong not to write one word of praise for the God who had just wrought such a great deliverance for his people. From the dogmatic point of view, St. John the Baptist was wrong when in prison he questioned the fact that Jesus was the Messiah. Dogmatists could even find fault with Jesus Himself. He ought not to have trembled in Gethsemane. But life, even religious life, is not concerned with dogmas. It pursues its own course, and that course seems foolish to reason.

I have lived in exceptional circumstances and passed through exceptional states of spirit. I must share these with my fellowmen. They need to be known, because even now tens of thousands of Christians are in prison in Communist countries, tortured and drugged and kept in solitary cells and put in strait-jackets as I have been. Many of them must have similar reactions to mine. Jesus, in his compassion for the multitudes, became one of them, a carpenter in a poor country among an oppressed people. You cannot have compassion (the word means suffering together) unless you know the state of heart of those who are suffering.

To be in a solitary cell under the Communists or the Nazis is to reach the peak of suffering. The reactions of Christians who pass through such trials are something apart from everything else.

The purpose of this book is to make these thoughts and feelings known to those who are on the side of the innocent victims. With many of the thoughts expressed in these sermons I no longer agree myself any more, now that I am living under normal conditions. But I record my thoughts as they occurred to me then.

Reader, instead of judging, enter into fellowship with your Christian brothers who are in prison in situations where, to use the words of Bede, "there is no voice but of weeping, no face but of the tormentors." Put yourself in their situation; "remember them that are in bonds as bound with them." [1] Use your imagination to feel what it is like to be in solitary confinement and tortured. Only then will you be able to understand this book. It contains the sermons of a pastor whose pillars of reason rocked under strain, as I recognize now. There were times when I was near to apostasy. Happily, just on those worst days I was not tortured. Probably I would have cracked then. The tortures happened only after I had overcome despair.

It has been easy for me to reconstruct the whole sermon out of a short poem, because while I left the solitary cell the solitary cell has never left me. Not one day passes without my living in it, whether I am in a large rally in the United States, in a church or a committee meeting in Britain, or just sitting in a train. My real being has remained for ever in solitary confinement. I don't so much live my present life, as relive continually those prison years. This is not because they are an essential part of my personal history but because I am not the real me. The real me is those who are in lonely, dreary, damp cells today, in Red China, in Albania, in Rumania, in North Korea and other Communist countries. They are the little brothers of Jesus. They are the most precious part of the mystical body of Christ on earth. I am living their life when I relive my years of solitary confinement. It is a strange experience. It may lead to madness. There may already be madness in these sermons of mine.

But if Erasmus was right when he wrote In ~Praise of Folly~, why should not folly be allowed to speak for itself? Communism has driven mad many pastors and other Christians, whose mental health broke down under prolonged torture. Why should only wise men say what they think about Communism? Why not let the mad speak out of their madness? It is the maddened thoughts of those who are kept in conditions of hardship beyond description that I here put down on paper. I have had moments of knowing the victory of faith in prison. I have also had moments of despair. I thank God for both. The latter had some good in them, in that they showed me my limitations and taught me not to rely on my own victories, nor on my faith, but on the atoning blood of Jesus Christ.

page 10 With God in Solitary Confinement

New causes always produce new effects. Solitary confinement under the Communists is something new in church history. It cannot be compared with the Roman or even the Nazi persecutions. Consider the difference made by the fact of intensive doping or scientific brainwashing, and don't be surprised at our thoughts and reactions.

I am conscious that some of the speculations in these sermons are bold, with a boldness that can come only from a long term of silence. Do they represent the truth, or are they heresy? Truth is the correspondence between thought and reality. But does anyone know the whole reality? We lived in a reality apart, and our thoughts may have mirrored it correctly, although it seems strange to those who live a quiet, normal life. In any case, that is how I thought then. The minds of thousands of Christians who are tortured in Communist prisons today are battered by just such tempests. This is what I have to put on paper, for the benefit of those Christians who do not wish to lead selfish lives but to have fellowship with those who are passing through not only physical tortures but also extreme spiritual tension.

And now let me tell you the words of the psalmist: "Hearken, O daughter, and consider, and incline thine thine ear. Forget also thine own people (whether you are Catholic or Protestant, fundamentalist or radical), and thy father's house" [PSA 45:10] and, blindfolded as we prisoners were, go down with me into the subterranean prison. Hear the cell door shut behind you. You are alone. All noise has ceased. Your only air supply comes to you through a pipe. If you feel the impulse to scream at the thought of being confined in such a place, just scream. The guards will soon put you in a straitjacket. But "the King shall greatly desire thy beauty" [PSA 45:11], if you stay here as long as he has ordained for you. Accept your thoughts of despair and of faith, your doubts and their solution, your moments of madness and their passing away. Allow it all to happen to you. You imagine that you are thinking. In fact, you are being thought. You may be an experiment for angels. You may be the object of a bet between God and Satan, like Job. Be determined only to cling to God, even if he slays you, even if he slays your faith. If you lose your faith, then remain faithlessly his. If all the fruits of the spirit disappear, and you remain a barren tree with only leaves, remember that leaves also have a purpose. Under their shadow, the fruitful ones may rest in the embraces of their Divine Lover. Leaves are used by the bride to make a garland for her beloved. Leaves are changed into healing medicines. And even when the leaves become yellow and fall withered to the ground, they can form a beautiful carpet on which he will walk towards those who, unlike you, have remained faithful to the end.

Go down into solitary confinement. I have brought you to the door of your cell. It is here that I disappear. You remain alone with him. It may be your bridal chamber. It may be a chamber of spiritual torture. I have to leave you. My place is in my own cell. You look at me and think you see madness in my face? I don't mind. Very soon, you will look like me. And perhaps you will be able to say to Jesus: "I am black, but comely." [SOS 1:5]

We have gone down into the darkness. Here you will experience the pressure, but also the rapture, of the great depths. At a great depth, things do not have the same colour as on the surface. Your sense of direction disappears. Your mind changes, supposing that you are able to keep your mind. You will probably wander off the right way.

May God help you! May God have mercy on all miserable sinners who pass through the rapture of the final depths.

R. W.

Note: In the following pages there are several references to the fact that prisoners communicated by code through the cell walls. In my book ~In God's Underground~ I explain how nearly all the prisoners came to learn this code. The Nazi prison I mention was a Rumanian prison, under the right-wing dictatorship of General Antonescu, imposed on our country by the Nazis.

GOD

For years I have been preaching to men. I had almost forgotten that there is an invisible audience in church, too; that the angels are listening as we expound your word.

Now that I am alone with you, and with your invisible servants, I can begin a new series of sermons. In church I had to be careful not to hurt the feelings or prejudices of my listeners. With you I can be absolutely frank. You have no inquisition. You will not try me for heresy. In front of other people I had to praise you. Here I am free to question you, and to reproach you, as David and Job and others have done.

I will tell you openly everything that is in my heart.

You have said: "It is not good that man should be alone." [GEN 2:18] And yet you are keeping me in solitary confinement. You created Eve to be with Adam. Yet you have taken away from me my wife. You are doing to me the very thing that you yourself have acknowledged to be wrong. How will you justify yourself when we meet? You will ask me why I have done things condemned by your word. It is surely far worse for a God not to fulfill his own word than for a man not to obey God commandments. The judgment will be reciprocal. I can now understand the words of Isaiah: "Come now and let us reason ~together~, saith the Lord."

[ISA 1:18]

Jesus said: "The Father makes the sun to rise on the evil and on the good." [MTT 5:45] Our torturers are now at the beaches enjoying the sun. I have not seen it for months, being in a cell thirty feet under the earth. Jesus will ask me many things at the last judgment. That is his right. But I will ask him why the Father kept me without the sun. I am curious to know how he will answer me.

Ever since my conversion I have been intrigued by your word in Ezekiel: "I have them also statutes that were not good and judgments whereby they should not live." [EZE 20:25] I have never heard a preacher explain this verse. The commentators also avoid it. Now I am beginning to understand something of this mystery.

No law can be righteous, even if it is divine, because every law fixes equal standards for men of unequal abilities, who are put in unequal situations.

This is true even of the ten commandments. "Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image" is a law given equally to the man brought up in a strict puritan religion and the man with a long Catholic heritage. This law is not just, because the two men cannot fulfill it with the same ease. I once spoke to a Catholic about the second commandment, and he replied candidly: "Why are you Protestants so blind? The law says, 'Thou shalt not make ~unto thee~ any graven image.' This does not mean that Michelangelo or even a modest sculptor is not allowed to make one for you. It is only forbidden to individuals to make holy images, everyone according to his fancy. But the church is not forbidden to provide Christians with these means of inspiration."

I stared in amazement at this Catholic brother, who was not at all bothered by what worried me so much. He continued: "When God became incarnate in Jesus Christ, he took all the qualities of a man, including that of being a potential model for an object of art." And so on. I had never thought of it like that.

"Honour thy father and thy mother" is said to those whose fathers are saints and good men. But I have known people who reacted violently against this commandment. All they could remember was that their father was a drunkard and beat them unjustly, or that their mother had abandoned them. In my congregation I had a girl who had been raped by her father. Your law is not just. It commands us to honour every father, every mother, even the one who has bequeathed to me a criminal heredity. I have to honour my superiors in the church. Some of them have chosen martyrdom. Others have become stooges of the Communists. And I have to honour both categories. It is your law, but an unjust one.

"Thou shalt not kill" is said to a Swede or a Swiss whose nation has known no war for centuries. We, Rumanians, have the same commandment, although our country has been invaded by foreigners in every generation, and we have to defend ourselves.

"Thou shalt not steal" is said to a billionaire, who has more than he will ever need and has no reason to steal. I am terribly hungry, and would steal bread if only I could find it. But in doing this I would be breaking one of your unjust laws.

"Thou shalt not commit adultery" is said to a man who has a loving and beautiful wife who is a good sexual partner. But the law is also valid for the person who has an unbearable wife or husband, or none at all. How much John, one of our congregation, has suffered! He had a wife who had been sick for years and could not give him satisfaction. One unjust law after another.

"Thou shalt not bear false witness" is a law for the man who has no reason to lie, or perhaps is not even able to do so, not having the slightest imagination; it is also for me, who have to answer the Communist interrogator. If I tell him the truth, as he asks me, appealing to my Christian obligation, many other arrests will follow.

Rahab, after having hid the two Israelite spies, lied, saying that she did not know where they came from or where they had gone. Did she do wrong?

I remember that Spurgeon preached on this subject, and said that he had often tried to put himself in Rahab's place. Supposing he had hidden some persecuted Protestants and was asked by the authorities if they were in his house. What would his answer have been? It is known that he was very strict against lying. We had to lie in the Nazi times, too. So I was interested to read what he said; "I have tried to imagine what I would say, and have never yet been able to make up my mind ... I have more light than Rahab, and certainly I have had more leisure to consider the case, and yet I do not see my way. I am not sure whether Rahab's lie was not more honest and outspoken than many an evasion which has suggested itself to very clever people."

I have often quoted his words to brethren who were worried about having to lie to oppressing authorities. Spurgeon could not make up his mind. I have made up mine. I lie to the Communist examining officers, and I must say I do it with delight.

"Let not your heart be troubled" [JHN 14:1] is said equally to the chronic worrier and to the phlegmatic character who by his nature is never anxious about anything. It is said to a well-to-do American who has never known real trouble, and to my prison-mate who has just tapped to me by morse code through the wall that he is sentenced to death.

A law cannot help but be unjust. Even you, God, could not avoid injustice once you started to make laws.

So your injustice is not only that you keep me alone in a place without sun. The problem is a bigger one. You have committed an injustice by placing men under laws in the first place.

I will leave my personal problem with you. One way of being free of something which worries you is to drown your individual sorrow, which is only a drop, in the infinite ocean of universal sorrow. But I put the general problem. Why did you commit injustice towards mankind by giving us statutes which you yourself acknowledge to be unjust?

You need Jesus, just as I need him. He is the Intercessor and Mediator. I hear him every night interceding and mediating for you, to make me understand and love you, just as he intercedes with you on my behalf.

You needed his incarnation as much as I need it, though for an altogether different reason. You have always known man as he looks from the perspective of Godhead. But this does not give you the whole truth. From the cell on the other side of me

page 19 With God in Solitary Confinement

a former judge tapped through the wall how he regrets all the prison sentences he has ever given. He passed sentence without knowing what it was to spend years in prison. You judged men without having lived as man and suffered and been tempted; You needed the experience of manhood. You were enriched by the experience of your Son becoming man. "Go forth, O ye daughters of Zion, and behold king Solomon with the crown wherewith his mother crowned him in the day of his espousals." [SOS 3:11] From eternity Christ has had all kinds of beautiful crowns. The most beautiful was given to him by his holy mother: the crown of being the God-man. He was poor, mocked, beaten, tempted. He died. Enriched by this experience, he returned to you. Now you can understand us much better.

You are a living God. To be alive means to evolve, to grow, to increase. A thing which always stays the same is not alive. The constant appeal in churches to "magnify the Lord" teaches us that you can be magnified - that is, made greater. Jesus made you greater.

From the experience of human life actually lived, Jesus Christ made the mystery of human life, as known from within, manifest in heaven.

On the other hand, he explains to us on earth, every night, the mystery of a God who gives laws which he himself acknowledges to be wrong.

There has been a pause in my speaking to you. It was not a rhetorical pause. In speaking with you such artifices are not necessary.

I paused because I was listening, just as in heaven the song of the seraphim is interrupted by moments of silence, when the smoke of the incense which comes with the prayers of the saints ascends up before you. [REV 8:1-4]

I heard Christ explaining to me - how clearly his sheep distinguish his voice - that you gave us the law in the hope that we would not stop there but go beyond it, and so arrive at what you really intended.

page 20 With God in Solitary Confinement

One thing I am sure about now: your commandment is one thing, and your wish another.

You say, for example, that "vengeance is mine." You express that will to show your wrath, but you believe that our faith will be big enough to stay your hand when you desire to avenge yourself. Yes, we will prevent you, even if you command us to the contrary. A good sheepdog does not easily stop barking at a stranger even if the shepherd orders it.

I once spoke harshly to my son, reproving him for some wrongdoing. He did not look me in the face and I asked him why. He answered: "I am not looking at your mouth which is speaking the bitter words but at your loving heart from which they flow." So we are not meant to look at the strict words of your commandments but at the loving intentions with which they were given.

David knew all your laws about animal sacrifices, but he said: "Sacrifice and offering thou didst not desire." [PSA 40:6] The Jews had got from the Egyptians the wrong ideas about gods who always expect us to give them something. Jehovah, to warn them against bringing human sacrifices as other people did, ordered them to stop at a lamb or a pigeon. But David guessed that new life begins when a man understands that it is you who sacrificed the one whom you most love. You don't expect us to take life in order to become pleasant in your eyes.

One of your most unrighteous laws is about the cities of refuge. [Num 35]

If someone killed unintentionally and the kinsmen of the victim wanted vengeance you ordered the murderer to flee to a city of refuge. Suppose that several men are guilty of such a murder, but one cannot run as fast as the others. Not everyone can run uphill at the same speed. The one who runs well reaches the city of refuge and is safe, although he is as guilty as his comrade, whereas the slower man is killed by the avenger.

Can righteousness depend on the speed at which a man can move his legs?

This unrighteousness is perpetuated in the New Testament, where it is said that those who overcome will receive their reward. And what of those who are defeated by sin, although they longed for holiness?

Love will always lose the prize, according to the law, because love is always beaten in the race. Only evil and vice can make the records. Love is always late.

Jesus teaches us this in the parable of the good Samaritan.

Did the three men make a wager as to who would travel fastest from Jerusalem to Jericho? They were a Jewish priest, a Levite and a Samaritan.

All three started at the same time. The priest and the Levite were ambitious, and hurried on because they wanted to win the wager and gain fame. They heard groans from someone wounded and in pain; somebody cried for help. Because they were good men, they felt compassion for him; as they ran, they said a prayer for the wounded man, but they did not stop because there was a prize and fame to be had at the end of the race. Besides, the place was dangerous. There were rumours of bandits around.

The Samaritan was quite a different sort of man. One wonders why he entered into the wager. For him, the most important thing was not the money, nor the fame, but love for every living thing. When he heard the groans, he stooped down, anointed the wounded man and took him to an inn, which lay in the direction from which he had come. So he lost the race, as love always does.

"I am sick of love," says the bride. [SOS 5:8] The sick cannot win races; they cannot overcome. Jesus said that the Kingdom of Heaven is taken by violence. [MTT 11:12] But love has no strength to commit violence. It is easy for a great sinner to force the gate of heaven. Saints and loving characters have to rely on grace more than the others in order to be saved, because they can do the least for themselves.

It is unjust for the law to demand the same swiftness and victories from everyone.

I understand now why I have to wait so long in prison for my Bridegroom to come. I am sure he has left his place to come to help us, but he stops at every wounded person along his way. Jairus implored him for his daughter who was dying, but

Jesus found a sick woman on the way, and so he allowed Jairus' daughter to die in the meantime. [MRK 5]

Who knows if Jesus, coming to our rescue, has not met on his way a flower whose petals were burdened with drops of dew, and stopped to straighten them out?

I am sick of love, and so I cannot do your works. You are love itself, and therefore sickness itself. You cannot come in time to give me back to my family, although you know that "it is not good for man to be alone." You are sick of love, and cannot make the sun rise for me, too. Who knows what sheep fallen into a ditch you had to help, Father, when Jesus was on Golgotha. So he had to remain without a ray of light and without a drop of water.

I cannot fulfill your law. Through Jesus you have released me from this obligation.

You have all the handicaps of love and cannot fulfill your many promises to be my helper. But I also release you from all obligations towards me taken by covenant, as you release me from all your statutes. They are not good. They are simply generalities. For you I am unique, as you are for me.

And we will pass together the years of solitary confinement, satisfied with loving and being loved. I will not reproach you for your evil statutes and unjust laws. You will not reproach me for having broken them.

How glad I am that for the first time I have been able to speak so openly with you. So, in the end, I realize that you have not left me alone. I am with you. Neither have you left me without the sun. I see the sun of righteousness rising in my dark cell.

Thanks and praise. ~Amen~.

DEAR BROTHERS AND SISTERS

I cannot see you, but I will preach to you from a distance.

I have several times experienced what is called extra-sensory perception. Here is one example.

A Russian lady officer was converted in our home. Then she went away with her regiment towards Hungary and Austria, and I did not hear from her again. Meanwhile, we moved into another house. One morning, just at the busiest time, I felt an irresistible impulse to return to my former apartment, although I had nothing to do there. When I approached the house I saw coming towards it from the other direction that Russian sister. She was passing through Bucharest on her way home to Stalingrad. Between trains she had some hours to spare, and she had prayed with all her heart that I would be at home so that she might get some further instruction in Christianity. Had I not been there just at that moment the unique opportunity would have been lost.

I could quote many other such instances.

You also may be capable of such perception at a distance. The prophets of old spoke to men far away. "Pass ye away, thou inhabitant of Saphir ... O thou inhabitant of Lachish ... I will bring an heir unto thee, O inhabitant of Mareshah... thou, Bethlehem Ephratah," said Micah in one and the same speech, (MIC 1:11-15; 5:2] being sure that the angels would bring his words to distant cities.

So I am sure that my words, uttered in a solitary cell, will reach at least some of you, those who have the rare virtue of being silent and listening.

I will share with you some of the spiritual experiences through which we pass in our underground prison. Although everyone is alone in a cell we communicate with each other by tapping messages in code through the wall. So I happen to know the following events.

It was ten o'clock at night. We always know exactly when it is ten o'clock. With chronometric exactitude at this hour the great tortures begin. In the mornings you can get a heavy beating. But the tortures are reserved for this dark hour. You can hear the screams. The acoustics in the arched corridors are such that the wailings bounce off one wall and on to another with ever-increasing volume. At the first cry, the signal is given through the wall from one cell to the other, three knocks reminding us that we must begin our spiritual exercises; first, the examination of conscience, judging all our attitudes, thoughts and actions of the past day. A Jesuit priest taught us all to do this.

The Christian about whom I speak to you today did not have a very high regard for such self-examination. He considered that conscience is not so much the voice of God in us as the voice of our social environment. An action which would produce great remorse in one Christian is considered morally justified by another who comes from a different background. Conscience judges us according to its own law. But laws are generalizations, and do not take into account individual abilities and circumstances. You may be the staunchest Protestant and believe in salvation by faith alone. The conscience is always Catholic and tortures you with the remembrance of your actions, as if our relationship with God depended on these.

Conscience knows nothing about causality. It does not accept determinism. It believes in the fallacy of free will. It does not acknowledge the obvious fact that my action was the unavoidable result of my character, shaped by my whole past life, and the only response which I, as a unique personality, could give to external stimulants. Conscience attributes to me alone the guilt of an action which was the end result of the influence of thousands of other people: ancestors who transmitted to me a certain heredity; teachers and parents who gave me a faulty education; authors, actors, friends and enemies who moulded my soul; the pressure of my social environment; and so on.

Conscience knows nothing about God's plans in which my sinful act may have played a necessary role - "Against thy holy child Jesus, whom thou hast anointed, both Herod and Pontius Pilate with the Gentiles and the people of Israel were gathered together, for to do whatsoever thy hand and thy counsel determined before to be done." [ACT 4:27-28]

Conscience is biased. When you examine yourself about everything you have done during the day, it will remind you only of the bad things. The good it forgets. And it only distinguishes between black and white. It does not know about the grey - the necessity, imposed sometimes by the circumstances of life, to choose not between good and evil but between two evils.

Conscience does not accept the words of St. Philip Neri that we must not expect to become saints in four days. The best it can do, after much doubt and torment, is to accept the remission of sins, that is, pardon for guilt. The highest doctrine of the Bible, the one about justification, according to which we appear before God absolutely free from guilt, is completely unacceptable to conscience. It is totally unable to grasp the truth that not only the sinner but also the sin can become as white as snow. [ISA 1:18; PSA 51:7]

I would not like to abolish conscience, as Hitler did, calling it a Jewish invention. The results of that were horrible. Conscience has an enormous social value. A tender conscience gives you a right attitude to your fellow-men. But God does not love you more after a good deed or less after a bad one.

Self-examination always leaves you sad. You compare what you have done with what Jesus would have done in similar circumstances, and bitterly reproach yourself. But to ask what Jesus would have done in similar circumstances is as reasonable as to ask how far a snail would have gone during a day if it had been a hare. It is a snail and not a hare. And I am I. I am not Jesus. To act like Jesus I would have to be God incarnate, born of a holy virgin. I would have to have his education. I would have to have angels at my disposal. I would have to possess his miraculous power. I would have to be a prophet, and a carpenter of two thousand years ago in Palestine.

Luther warned men of the great sin of sadness. He said that it is better for a Christian to be drunk than to be sad. The Communists have tortured us enough. Why should we torture ourselves? Luther said again that remorse before Calvary is of God; remorse after God have been to Calvary is of the devil. Repent of your sin, yes; but do not make your sin a subject for long and melancholy meditation. Why should I cheat God by spending my time and energy on remorse? I am greater than my sins. Conscience would try to identify me with them.

Our brother did not care for these torturings of the soul. The Talmud says: "The sun has set and the day is clear." When the signal was given each night our brother would prepare to dance to the glory of God.

Before the signal was given he lay on his bed. Like the ticking of a watch, in every pulse beat of his heart there was a thought about Jesus. His longing after the Bridegroom was a burning fire. He whispered "Jesus" at every breath. And now the signal came. It was time to begin his holy - or perhaps his crazy - dance.

While he was dancing he heard an angel say: "Hail, Gheorghe, full of grace. God is with thee. Blessed art thou." The brother had been brought up in respect for the traditions of the early desert fathers. He knew what to do in such cases. He asked the angel: "To whom are you sent?" The angel answered: "To you, Gheorghe." The Christian answered: "There are many others with the name of Gheorghe around me in other cells. You have come to the wrong one. I am not worthy to hear the voice of angels." His circling round became even crazier to drive away the temptation. The dance was a sacrifice on the altar of God.

But the angel - it was Gabriel - remained. How insistent angels are! Then something was conceived in this Christian, as in Mary in times past (or perhaps he only then discovered what had long been there). There quickened in this Christian the germ of a new life which would give him in the future the power to overcome where he had been defeated in times past. He knew now that he would be able to bear things more painful than death, even the worst of mockeries.

Since that experience, that Christian lives no more. Christ lives in him. He lives only to nurture this new life, to raise up in all good the author of all virtue. What a responsibility! As with Mary, it is his task to bring to maturity the very king of heaven.

This Christian feels it is his special task to make Jesus a man of the twentieth century - or rather of the twenty-first century; to make him a modern intellectual - or rather, the one who will show the modern intellectuals the path ahead. His task is to make him a man who will weep in our generation as he wept in Jerusalem two thousand years ago; to make him today's man of sorrows.

Jesus is for ever weeping.

There is an ancient legend which says that, when Jesus was a child, Joseph loved him so much that he would never come home from the market without bringing him some toy or candy. The little Jesus was so used to this that, whenever Joseph went to town, the child would wait by the window to see when he returned. Then he would run to meet him and ask him: "Father, what have you brought me?" Once, Joseph had no money and came home empty-handed. When Jesus ran to meet him and put the usual question, Joseph replied, discouraged: "Nothing." Then the child began to weep bitterly. And, seeing this, Joseph began to weep too.

The holy virgin came out of the house and saw both of them in tears. She asked what was wrong. When Joseph explained, she said, amazed: "I can understand why he is weeping. He is only a child. But why are you in tears?" Joseph answered: "The weeping of Jesus has a deep meaning. This child will always sit at the windows of heaven waiting for his beloved ones to return. He will run to meet each one, asking him 'What have you brought me?' And if the answer is, like mine 'Nothing,' he will weep in heaven as you see him weeping now."

The Christian of whom I am speaking feels it to be his task to actualize these tears. As in times past Jesus wept over Jerusalem, so he will weep now over Moscow, which kills the prophets and stones those who are sent to it. He will weep over Berlin, capital of a great nation which cannot be unified. He will weep over Oslo and Stockholm, towns with empty churches. He will weep over London and Washington, which have sacrificed one-third of the world into the hands of the Communist torturers who have just beaten a woman. I can hear her heart-rending cries.

Jesus is now living in the heart of this Christian. Those who do not have Jesus, or who have only a ghost (that is, the Jesus of two thousand years ago), will mock this man who is a present-day Mary. They say the rosary endlessly - "Hail, Mary, full of grace," meaning always the Mary of old, and remaining blind to a Mary of today.

But this Christian has met Gabriel. He has lived in the reality of the mystical union. Christ has been conceived in him. ~Amen~.

DEAR BROTHERS AND SISTERS

We live on very little. A rich child with many toys is bored with them. A child in the slums has a box, and pushes it around. He calls it a car, a wagon, an engine. He has a stick and rides on it, and calls it a horse.

So we live on little things, but enrich them by our imagination.

Our telegraph through the wall functions perfectly. In the fourth cell to my right is a girl, from the Underground church, who has been severely tortured but does not betray. She is only eighteen. Her name is Mary.

This communication started in me a series of thoughts which I wish to share with you.

Mary - what a holy name!

Primitive peoples have always had their goddesses as well as their gods. They have, in a distorted form, a basically sound intuition, or perhaps something of the primary revelation has remained with them. There is a female principle in Godhead. Scholars who are privileged to study the Holy Scriptures in the original languages, know that "~ruah~," the Hebrew word for "spirit" is a feminine noun. In Genesis I, if you translate literally you must read: "And the Spirit of God moved in a feminine manner (~merahefet~) upon the face of the waters." In Aramaic, the language spoken by Jesus, the word for spirit is also feminine - "~ruha~."

The angel who appeared to Joseph in a dream told him that his bride, Mary, "shall bring forth a son, and thou shalt call his name 'Jesus'" (in Hebrew "Jeshuah," again a feminine word). It is as though we were to call a boy Helen or Katherine.

page 34 With God in Solitary Confinement

A man with a female name. It was this mystery which was expressed in the outward appearance of an orthodox priest: he had to have a beard, but wear a woman's robe.

Whenever I feel God near me in this solitary cell I always have the impression that there is also a female presence. St. John the Evangelist, in conditions similar to mine, alone, exiled on Patmos, saw God sitting on the throne. "And he that sat was to look upon like a jasper and a sardine stone." [REV 4:2-3] But there also appeared to him in heaven what was to him a great wonder, as it was to me: "a woman clothed with the sun and the moon under her feet and upon her head a crown of twelve stars." [REV 12:1] Commentators make all kinds of guesses as to who this woman might be. We have the explanation in the very beginning of the Bible: "God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him, male and female created he them." [GEN 1:27] This is the image of God: male and female. So there is a female principle in Godhead. The Kabbala calls it "the Matrona." God has all the perfections; he cannot be limited to the male ones.

When I was arrested under the Nazis, I saw prisoners being taken out to exercise in the prison yard. Each one was handcuffed behind his back, and they were chained one to another, so that they had to walk in a circle. A Catholic priest, noticing this, exclaimed: "A human rosary!" And, as he had no beads, he said his "Hail, Marys," seeing every man chained to him as a knot in the rosary.

An incident like this can move the heart of a Protestant, too.

I would never consent to call Mary "Queen of heaven," "Leader of the angelic hosts," "Queen of the Church," "Queen of mankind" and so on, because I would not like to leave God unemployed. But my love and reverence for her was certainly increased with my experiences in prisons.

And now, when I hear about the tortured Mary near me, my thoughts go to the mother of the Lord.

The genealogy of Jesus, as recounted by Matthew, gives forty-two generations from Abraham to Christ. But count them and you will find that only forty-one are enumerated, including Christ. St. Matthew was a publican. So we may presume that he knew how to count. Why did he list forty-one and say that there are forty-two? If this was a simple error, how is it that it has been perpetrated for twenty centuries? You can see that St. Matthew wished to hide a mystery by the fact that he really pretends to give forty-two names by a cunning device. He has three sets of fourteen names each. He repeats the name of Jechonias, the last in the second series, as the first in the third, so that the inattentive reader may never observe that one of the alleged forty-two is missing. Who is this missing forty-second link?

Another biblical curiosity: nearly all the women of the Gospels are named Mary. We have Mary, the holy virgin; Mary Magdalene; Mary of Bethany; Mary the mother of James and Joseph; Mary the wife of Cleopas; and one simply called "the other Mary." This makes six. If we had one Mary more, we would have the holy number seven. Is one Mary missing?

By the cross there stood only Marys, four of them. The relevant Bible verse sounds very strange: "There stood by the cross of Jesus his mother and his mother's sister, Mary." [JHN 19:25] But the mother's name was Mary. Two sisters don't have the same name.

What if Mary (in Hebrew Miriam, "the star of the sea," the star which shows the way to those who sail on the ocean of spirituality) is not used in the Bible as a name only? It seems that it was also a title given to a certain type of Christian woman in the early church, as the Communists call each other "comrade," and as there are titles in the army and in masonry.

So anybody can become a Mary, just as anybody can become a comrade, or a major in the army.

A third mystery: Jesus said, "Whosoever shall do the will of my Father which is in heaven, the same is my brother and my sister, and mother." 6 He is the first-born among many brethren. It is easy to understand what it means to hold him in the relationship of a brother. But how can one become his mother? He says that this is possible, too.

It is a great privilege to be God's child, but how much greater a privilege to have God as one's child! Jesus tells us that this is possible for us. Nestorius fought against calling Mary "Theotokos" (the one who gives birth to God), but a general council of the church defeated him. Christ is God. And Mary held God as a baby in her arms. She washed him, she cared for him, she fed him, she brought him up. Her God was dependent upon her. She is unique as the first and the greatest mother of God. But this experience is not entirely reserved for her. Jesus says that the one who fulfils his will can be his mother, can be with him in the relationship which a mother has towards her child.

What does all this mean?

The highest form of love is that of a mother for her child. The child's love towards its mother contains a grain of interest; it turns to its mother for every need. The child's love towards its father is similar: Father gives the pocket money. In every human love some kind of interest is mixed. Only a mother's love is totally self-sacrificing. She gives everything for her children, expecting nothing in return.

Mary, the mother of God, gave everything for Jesus and never received anything from him, not even good words. After the resurrection, when he showed himself to so many, comforting their sad hearts, he did not show himself to his mother. There was a purpose in this. He offered her, by this, the highest opportunity: to give to God without claiming ever to receive anything in return.

Those who have attained this spiritual position bear the title of a "Mary." I think that this should be the sense of the Catholic word "marianite." Then Protestants could not object.

And now we come back to the one missing link in the genealogy of Jesus. This genealogy is not history. Even a superficial comparison with the genealogy of the Jewish kings in the Old Testament, and with the one in St. Luke, is sufficient to show that they do not agree. The genealogy of Jesus according to St. Matthew is not a historical succession, but a ladder of initiation.

You begin by identifying yourself with Abraham, the father of all the faithful; you pass through the experience of Isaac sacrificed by his father, as Christians in our country have to deprive their children of a happy childhood in order to remain faithful to Christ. You then become Jacob, who saw the angels ascending and descending, to teach him that in the spiritual life you cannot stop at any point. If you do not advance, you slide back. God is at the top of the ladder. Sweet communion with him in the highest sense of the word is possible only there. You continue the initiation, reliving the lives of Judah and all the others until you arrive at the stage of Mary, of being towards God as a mother is towards her child. The Mary of two thousand years ago gave birth to Jesus Christ, the historical person of whom the Gospels speak.

But you too can have your meeting with the archangel Gabriel. Christ can be conceived in your heart, as a result of the forty preceding experiences of communion with saints, common men and sinners of all the ages. You can be a Mary with self-sacrificing love, which wishes only to give, not asking anything in exchange. The Christ in you, the hope of glory, will be the forty-second person in the chain. Your aim will have been accomplished.

You will concentrate on one thing, to serve God who is your child. You will not depart from this, not even when the Communists tempt you with their promises of release if you betray; not even when you are tortured.

Hail, Mary, my beloved sister in the fourth cell; hail, Mary, full of grace. God is with you. Blessed are you among women, and blessed is the fruit of your heart. And whence is this to me, that the mother of my Lord should sit near me in a royal prison cell? For lo, as soon as the tapping through the wall of the cell gave me knowledge of your presence and of your faithfulness, my babe leapt in my heart for joy.

God help us all to arrive at the final, missing link in St. Matthew's genealogy. ~Amen~.

DEAR BROTHERS AND SISTERS

St. Paul could write letters when he was in prison. He had ink and parchment. St. John, too, could write to the churches from his exile on Patmos.

We have no paper and no ink. But there is one way of writing which they cannot forbid us: to write with the Spirit on the hearts of men, even if they are far from us.

I may as well teach you the technique of this kind of writing, so that you may be able to use it too.

A technique in matters of the Spirit? Usually, Christians are very vague in thinking and speaking about spiritual matters. But there are laws of the Spirit just as there are laws of the material world. It is possible to orientate yourself in the spiritual world, just as you do in the material world. The seers of old knew not only that they had met an angel, but what legion he belonged to, and what his name was - Michael or Gabriel. When you know the laws of the Spirit, you can use a certain technique, just as a technique in material things becomes possible when you know the natural laws.

The basic principles of writing with the Spirit in the hearts of men far away are these:

1. Don't think about the man on whom you wish to concentrate in order to convey to him a message from God, except in the hour of that concentration. Don't speak about him. He should be out of your mind. Then all your potential of interest and love for him, which would otherwise be dissipated, will be available in the hour of concentration. I tell myself jokes and play chess with myself and hum all kinds of melodies before I concentrate on speaking to you.

2. Meditation must precede the delivery of the message. I must think the message through, and refine it to contain, in the most condensed form, what I consider to be essential for you to know. I must meditate about how the knowledge of this message from God might beautify your soul; what loss it could be for you not to know exactly the state of heart of your brothers and sisters in jail, you being one soul with them, their sufferings and doubts and victories being yours.

3. From meditation I must pass to contemplation. I must see you with my spiritual eyes as I used to see you in church. I must recognize every face. You must be as real to me as if I were actually seeing your picture. More than this, I must see you laughing or weeping according to what I tell you. Meditation calls for burning love; contemplation requires an exercise of the imagination. We can all evoke a loved one in our daydreams. Exercise this faculty, and you will be able to write in the Spirit.

4. Actually write with letters your message on the hearts of those whom you now have before you in the spirit. At first, it is best to make the gestures with your hand, as if you were actually inscribing the words.

5. Never allow the mental pictures of those to whom you are writing to disappear from your view until you can see on their faces that they have understood your message. There should be a nod, a smile or a shake of the head. But there should be a reaction.

All prisoners, and pastors and Christians of the Underground church should learn this forgotten art, as the possibilities of normal communication become less and less.

In the end, prayer is also something like writing with the Spirit on the heart of God. And the technique of real prayer is something like that I have just described, the face which the Christian has before him being that of Jesus Christ.

But it was not really about this that I wished to speak to you today. I have something else to tell you.

I have observed that Jesus and the angels, listening to my sermons delivered in the solitary cell, enjoy particularly the stories which illustrate them. Just as my son Mihai used to beg me: "Tell me that story again," I have the feeling that they too would like to ask me to repeat a story.

So I will tell you a story:

A young king was quarrelsome and gave no peace to the wise old king of a neighboring country. The old king entreated for friendly relations, but in vain. The young king started a war. The old king, remembering how many foolish things he himself had done in his youth, and that there is an age from which we cannot expect wisdom, gave orders to his officers to capture his young enemy alive.

So it was done. He was brought in chains before the victor. The old man pitied the youngster, but pretended to be very angry with him and sentenced him to death. The young king begged for his life. So the old man told him: "I will give you a chance. Tomorrow you will be given a jug of water, full to the brim. You must carry it from one end of the main street of the city to the other, without spilling a drop. If you do not succeed, your life is lost."

The next day the procession started - the prisoner with the jug of water; around him soldiers to guard him; behind him the executioner with his axe, a terrifying reminder that he would be beheaded on the spot if he failed. The old king had given orders that on one side of the street there should be a mob to boo the prisoner, on the other side a crowd to cheer him.

The prisoner succeeded. He did not spill a drop. The old king asked him: "When so many people were mocking you, did you answer them back?" The young man answered: "I had no time for that. I had to be careful about my jug." "But did you thank the ones who cheered you?" "What business had I with them? Their acclamation could not help me. I was concerned with my jug of water."

The old king set him free with this advice: "You have been entrusted with a soul. You have to bring it back to the Lord whole and clean. That is the only thing that counts. If you do not succeed, you perish. Don't seek the applause of men by cheap victories. Don't worry if they mock you. Watch over your soul."

The tick-tock of the pendulum in the prison corridor makes me conscious that time passes here, as it passes for those who are free. Soon I will have to give an account of every second of my life. Today is my fortieth birthday. I have to account for 1,261,440,000 seconds. While I was making this calculation, other seconds have passed. I have a duty to fulfill every second. The fact that I am in solitary confinement does not release me from this duty.

As a rule, prisoners pass their time in trifles. I know this from my time in the Nazi prison. If they are not compelled to do slave labour, they tell each other stories and jokes. Sometimes they quarrel. They waste their time, just as some millionaires do.

Millionaires use a lot, prisoners very little, of nature's wealth, without always feeling it their duty to give something to the world.

In prison there is a feeling of being released from duty, especially when you are in solitary confinement. Who has the right to ask anything from you when you are in such terrible circumstances?

But the imperative of life knows no excuses. Duty is a categorical demand, whether you are in happiness or unhappiness. Mocked, hungry, jailed, sick, falsely charged, tortured, alone, you have to serve the Highest.

I know my duty. It does not consist so much in doing things. Prison conditions hinder me from accomplishing deeds. Duty consists mostly in becoming something. "I am what I am" is the usual translation of what God said to Moses. A more literal rendering of the Hebrew "~Ehjeh asher ehjeh~" is "I will become what I will become." He himself is constantly becoming something. This is my duty too. My duty is to become more and more myself. When God formed me in the hidden place, he made me to be myself, to be in my own way the herald of his glory, to be unique, as God himself is unique.

To be yourself is much more than being truthful, or loving, or religious, because your self contains all these and much more. Jesus was not content to be the truth alone. Truth was too little a thing for him. Hitler said: "Truth is an oft-repeated lie." That is nonsense. But if we take the classical definition of the word, "truth is correspondence between reality and our thoughts," what about the realities which are incomprehensible to us, which we don't even know? Jesus did not wish to be truth alone. He is truth and way and life. He did not wish to be love alone. He knows how to hate, too. He said to the church at Ephesus: "This thou hast, that thou hatest the deeds of the Nicolaitans, which I also hate." [REV 2:16]

The Hebrew word for truth is "~emeth~." It is written with the first, the middle and the last letters of the alphabet. But reality has no beginning and no end. Reality is greater than truth. The Greek word for truth is ~alethia~, which means, etymologically, "nothing forgotten." But there is something more than ~alethia~; there is the forgetting, too.

Truth belongs to the conscious part of our being, a little island in the ocean of the unconscious. Love is one among many human feelings. Jesus is more than truth and love. Myths belong to him as much as the truth. So they have a powerful meaning for me.

I have to become myself, a self not imprisoned in a set pattern, as my body is imprisoned in this cell.

I must become the greatest being that I can become here on earth; "I will become what I will become," taking as my final goal Jesus, who did so.

Then I will be able to fulfill an outward duty even here.

And what if I am tortured? Christ saved a robber while he was on the cross. My brethren to my right and left have sometimes brought their torturers to Christ. A Communist officer, beating a Christian prisoner with a rubber truncheon, put his stick aside and asked: "What is it about you? How is it that your face is shining? You have something like a halo round your head. How can you look at me so lovingly? I would never love a man who jailed and beat me. How is it that you can obey the foolish commandment of your Christ to love your enemy?" The Christian answered: "I am not obeying a commandment. It is not that I love you only because Jesus orders me to. Jesus has given me a new heart and a new character. If I wanted to hate you, I would no longer be able to do so. A nightingale cannot sound like a crow, because it is a nightingale and not a crow. So a Christian can only love." That rubber truncheon has remained put aside for ever.

We are in hell. Sometimes, during nights of horror, I look at the cup of water which is in my cell. Only this assures me that it is not the eternal hell. There the damned have no water. But even in hell you are not released from duty. How often I have said the words of the creed: "He descended into hell." He descended to enrich the tormented souls with the gifts of God.

That is what we are doing. We bring souls to Christ by tapping the gospel through the wall.

The important thing is always to have one aim, and to pursue it in stormy and fair weather. Jesus wants our eyes to be single. [MTT 6:22] The Hebrew language did not have the word "intention." Jesus, using these words, meant that our intention should be single: to be the highest we can be, and then not to worry any more. Man always does what he is; he reacts to outward circumstances according to his character.

The Romans had a proverb: "~Quod agis, agi~" (do what you do), do just one thing. Most of us, when we are praying, think of the pancake on the fire which might burn. While making pancakes, we think how nice it would be to pass our time in prayer. While speaking with one man, we think how useful it would be to pass our time with another. We never do anything well. Only one thing can be done well at a time. Those who participate in too many sports never become champions.

Our earthly life is short. Let us not be like the ass in the story who, having two heaps of hay before him, died of hunger, not knowing which to choose. But let us concentrate upon our single aim: to develop a heavenly character, which by contagion will fill God's heaven with men. ~Amen~.

DEAR BROTHERS AND SISTERS

I used to consider those of my fellow-prisoners who are in prison for their belief as martyrs. But communicating with them through the wall (and the telegraph is functioning through many cells to my right and my left), I discovered that none of them were conscious of being martyrs. They felt that God was punishing them for their sins. Even St. Paul, who suffered so much for his faith, called himself "the chief of sinners." [1TM 1:15]

And I think they are right. We must distinguish between the appearance and the substance, between what people call "facts" or "truth" and their spiritual significance.

Who can work as a conspirator in the Underground church and always speak what is generally called "truth"? When I introduced myself, I did it under a cover-name. The one with whom I was speaking might be an informer. If asked by someone where I was yesterday, a factually correct answer might bring many people into great trouble. Today again the interrogator told me: "You are a Christian and a pastor. Your religion obliges you to tell us the whole truth." I had my own thoughts about this. If I had complied with his demands, other brethren would have been arrested.

Nobody can be a leader in the Underground church without re-evaluating the notion of truth.

So, to come back to the problem of martyrs. To outward appearance, anyone who has been killed or imprisoned for his convictions is a martyr. But the substance may be otherwise. God may use the Communists to punish you for a sin. He can lead them to put you in a solitary cell because he wishes to deal better with your soul.

page 50 With God in Solitary Confinement

How offended the Jews must have been by Jesus when they told him about some Galileans whose blood Pilate had mingled with their sacrifices. [LUK 13:1] Now these were surely martyrs of the Mosaic faith and for the national cause. The Jews had a deep respect for men like these who had died "~al kidush hashem~," for the glory of the Name. But Jesus called the slaughtered Galileans simply "sinners."

He looked at the substance. Sinners - that is what even martyrs are before God. Luther makes a distinction between "sinners of the left" and "sinners of the right," between scoundrels and law-abiding men who observe the religious commandments, even that of self-sacrifice, in order to earn paradise. Both types of men are sinners.

I am nothing else than a sinner. I have never known a man worse than me. The One who can free me prefers to keep me in prison as a punishment for my transgression. Samson was in prison because he had sinned, although the Philistines had jailed him because of his noble fight for the Mosaic cause. I am a sinner, but I know that if I accept my punishment with wholehearted humility, my strength will grow.

Like all the other prisoners, I had my hair cut short until today. Now they announce that I am to be allowed to let it grow, a sure sign that I shall soon be brought before the court. They make you look a little bit more human before presenting you to the judges. The hair will grow very slowly in this subterranean cell, in which never a ray of sun enters. But still it will grow. This made me think about Samson. His strength grew simultaneously with his hair.

I will become an embodiment of power, and will be able to slay more Philistines at my death than I slew in my whole Christian life. I will kill them, even if I die with them.

Once this power has come back, I will no longer wish for my release. This age has produced powers unknown in the past. But I will draw from God the still unknown powers of the ages to come, the hidden spiritual powers. Though they remain behind prison walls, those who possess this power can demolish temples and build them again. They can remain in a dark cell, and yet make the sun shine in many hearts. They can be sad and depressed, yet fill many souls with gladness.

How I would like to become what Samson became in prison!

True worship is not that on Mount Gerizim, the place of the Samaritan temple, nor that in Jerusalem. True worship is to grow in power to destroy everything which opposes the One crucified for me.

Sin is every second of my life spent on something other than the destruction of what opposes the triumph of love.

There are not certain deeds which are sinful under all circumstances, and other deeds which are always good. The mud with which we are all smeared contains in its mixture many compassionate actions.

Charity given to a drunkard, who after having drunk liquor with your money, beats his wife, is sin. Judith, on the other hand, killed. So did Jael. [JDG 4:21] But they freed the world from tyrants. Around me, in the other cells, are many patriots who have killed. It was for the sake of freedom. It is foolish to consider that knitting a pullover for some lazy man is a good deed, while the attempt of German generals to stop the slaughter of millions of innocent victims by killing Hitler is to be despised as murder.

For me, the only criterion of a deed is: does it prepare the way for the final triumph of love or not?

We have to choose between good as the means, and good as the end. If I am always good towards all men, even those who by deceit and terror hinder the victory of love, good will never triumph. The wicked will profit by my meekness, and consolidate the position of evil. If I choose good as my goal, I have to commit many actions which are condemned as evil in the moral catalogue of the world.

The Bible writes about God sending enticing spirits. [2CH 18:19-20] So I have no scruples about using untruth to lead astray my interrogators. My only scruple is in having scruples about such an attitude.

God praised those who killed Sisera, Agag, Holofernes. The same words are used in the Bible about Jael, who killed Sisera, as are used by the archangel to the holy virgin: "Blessed above women shall Jael, the wife of Heber the Kenite be, blessed shall she be above women in the tent." [JDG 5:24] This, because she smote an enemy of God. In one of the cells on this corridor is Nina, a Rumanian girl, who did something similar. If it was right to kill a foreign oppressor several thousands of years ago, it must be right now also. The New Testament praises such heroes of the Old Testament. The Jewish people had to be defended. The Rumanian people have the same right.

The same Spirit of God who inspired I Corinthians 13, [1Cor 13] the poem of love, inspired the book of Esther, in which the enemies of God are ruthlessly destroyed. The Holy Spirit has arranged for both to be part of the same holy book. What is more, the first Christians had as their only holy Scriptures the scrolls of the Old Testament. The New Testament was written decades later, and completed towards the end of the first century.

God has brought together poems of love and books which teach determination to uproot the enemy, in order to perfect us and give us only one aim: to cause love to triumph at last. Bloody fighting against tyrants must work together with acts of tender charity towards the attaining of this aim.

We must set ourselves in our life the highest aim, to be his servants and the servants of all. Then "good" or "evil" deeds will have the same result, to bring love to triumph.

The question is a very real one for me. Christians around me have participated in the patriotic fight against the Communist oppressor and have had to kill. They tap their confessions through the wall. But was their action sin? Would I take part in such a fight?

In Dostoievsky's ~The Brothers Karamazov~, Ivan says, in effect: "It is not God that I don't accept, understand this, it is the world that he has created, the divine world which I do not accept, and cannot agree to accept ... I am as convinced as a child that ... at last, in the world finale, at the moment of eternal harmony, something so precious will happen and appear that it will be enough ... to expiate all people's crimes ... but I don't accept it, and I don't want to ... I would rather remain with unavenged suffering ... And besides, they make the harmony too expensive, we cannot afford to pay quite so much to enter. That is why I am hurrying to return my entrance ticket. If I am an honest man, I am obliged to return it as far in advance as possible. That is what I am doing. It is not God I don't accept, Alyosha, I am only returning the ticket to him in the most respectful manner."

Ivan goes on to say to Alyosha: "Tell me frankly yourself, I am asking you, so answer: Imagine that you yourself are erecting the edifice of human destiny with the purpose of making people happy in the finale and giving them, at last, peace and quiet, but that to do so it is necessary and inevitable to torture just one tiny creature, that same little child who beats his chest with his little fist, and base this edifice on his unavenged little tears, would you consent to be the architect on these conditions? Tell me and don't lie."

"No, I wouldn't," Alyosha said softly.

My answer is: "I would." This was Abraham's answer. He was ready to sacrifice his own child for this. His followers know that the five octillions of atoms which constitute the body of the child are the shrine of a spirit, perhaps the prison cell of a spirit, and that the spirit will be happy to have got rid of it. They believe what the ~Bhagavad Gita says, that the killer may be no more than the fulfiller of God's predestination for a man. It is right, when necessary, to kill for the sake of freedom, of fatherland, of God. If it is sacred history when the Jews fought against tyrants, why should the fight of Rumanians to get rid of Communist slavery not be sacred also?

No, you have not sinned, patriotic fighters.

St. Augustine said: "Love God, and do what you will."

It is written: "Sing unto the Lord a new song." [PSA 96] This is a warrior's song. Nobody is so courageous a warrior as the Lord himself. He never slumbers nor sleeps. Christianity teaches us not so much to be good as to be warriors for the good. You cannot be a warrior for the good without fighting, and so striking not only abstract evil and evil institutions but also evil men.

God is the beginning and the end. The middle of the day is ours. We do not know what the future holds for us. And I do not want his Kingdom in the future only. Fight today for his Kingdom of righteousness, peace and love. ~Amen~.

MY SOUL

I can no longer speak to the One who created me. I can no longer cry out to him with my voice. I can no longer speak across the distance to my brothers and sisters.

Today, for the first time, I burst out into yelling cries, for no obvious reason. I have often heard such cries, interrupting for a few moments the deep silence of our prison. We all knew then that one of us had become mad. The cries very soon ceased. I did not know how the guards quietened those whose nerves had cracked. Now I know.

They have put me in a straitjacket, very tightly bound. They have put a gag in my mouth.

The only one to whom I can speak is you, my soul. David often spoke to his own soul, asking it to praise the Lord, or questioning why it was troubled. But David, too, knew madness. The Bible recounts how he pretended to be a lunatic while living with the Philistines. Psychiatrists tell us that nobody simulates madness unless he has a tendency towards it. I will do what David did. I will now deliver, in utter silence, a sermon to you, my soul.

I ask you, first of all, to take knowledge of yourself and to declare, like God, "I am."

The body needs few things in order to be fully satisfied: simple food, warmth, exercise, rest and a partner of the opposite sex. My body had all these things, but, notwithstanding, I was not happy; I sighed for something more. Who was this "I," dissatisfied when the body had plenty of all that it needed? It was you, my soul.

It was you who wished to know, out of purely scientific interest, about galaxies far away, and about facts of prehistory, which have absolutely no influence on my bodily state. It was you who took delight in art and philosophy, but also in exaggerations and refinements of bodily needs, even when these did harm to the body.

Don't you see, my soul, how right Jesus was in saying that "man shall not live by bread alone"? [MTT 4:4] I get one slice of bread every Tuesday. And what bread! But I don't just vegetate. I live. I sometimes laugh heartily at jokes which I tell myself, being alone in my cell. I think about politics, about how nations which I have never seen should be ruled; I remember works of art; I lead a life of worship. All this is you. Say, my soul, "I am."

A few days ago a Christian prisoner, unable to bear the tortures any more, and fearing that he would finally betray the brethren, jumped from the window of the third floor during an interrogation. He was healthy. He was not satisfying a need of the body by destroying himself. You know my secret. You know the place where I have hidden some thirty sleeping pills which, taken at once, will ensure that I do not become a Judas. These suicides are acts of love and honour. They protect the Underground church. Love, decency, honour, belong to you, my soul, and not to the body. I am gagged and cannot speak. But because of this, you must speak even more loudly, and assert yourself: "I am."

You saw me dancing when I was in unspeakable pain. You saw me dancing with heavy chains around my ankles. Who was the one who exuberantly rejoiced? It was not my body. My body had no reason to dance. There was no music to incite it to do so. It was you, my soul.

Take knowledge of yourself, my soul, and take knowledge of your incomparable value. The body will die. Around me, prisoners are dying, because of the great hunger, the cold and the tortures. But who has ever seen a soul die? I have lost everything I had in the world, but if you are saved, I shall have kept the pearl of greatest price.

The enemies of Jesus took away everything he had. Naked, he hung on a cross. His foes stood around it, rejoicing. But at the last minute he spoiled their joy by saying: "Father, into thy hands I surrender my spirit." He had one thing which they could not take from him. And by this he lives and rules for ever more. There is no one who can destroy you, my soul.

You must only repent, in the biblical sense of the word. The Greek word "~metanoia~" has nothing to do with remorse about sin, with which we confuse repentance in our modern languages. Etymologically, ~metanoia~ means "a change of mind" or "to go beyond reason." Parallel biblical expressions are "to receive a new heart," "to become a new creature," "to deny oneself," "to be born again," "to become a child," "to be clean every whit."

I will tell you what is wrong with you, my soul; why you need a radical transformation.

Some believe that when we repent we have to change the content of our soul. They fill their souls with heavenly thoughts and feelings instead of earthly ones. But can a damaged car be repaired by changing the passengers who travel in it? The experience of men who deceive themselves about being Christians shows that a broken car does not move, no matter who are the passengers. You may have all your thoughts and feelings directed towards God, and still not be in friendship with him, because the intimate structure of the soul, its psychological mechanism, its fundamental defect, has not been corrected. Repentance must affect not only your thoughts and feelings and wills but the very being of the soul, its complicated organism out of which thoughts, emotions and actions flow.

My soul, I reproach you for one great defect: the lack of a sense of proportion.

Jesus tried to convey this sense in the words "Fools and blind ... whether is ~greater~...? Ye have omitted the weightier matters of the law ..." [MTT 23:17,23] St. Paul asks: "Are we stronger than the Lord?" [1CO 10:22]

We have to distinguish what is smaller, less important, weaker, from what is greater, weightier, stronger.

page 60 With God in Solitary Confinement

You, my soul, have made yourself the pivot round which everything else has to revolve. The animals cannot speak, as I cannot because of being gagged. They have interesting things to say. The story of Balaam's ass shows this. How much our dog could have told us! He knew beforehand that I was going to be arrested. He was miserable for two weeks, and barked the whole time. But animals cannot speak. You never used to be worried about the dumbness of animals. You are only worried now that I am gagged. But the whole Communist camp is gagged. Nobody is allowed to say everything he thinks. I am in a straitjacket. But some angels are in everlasting chains. How much worse it must be for winged beings, accustomed to fly from planet to planet! I am obsessed only with the suffering of one little insignificant being - me. Why can't you have a right sense of proportion? Why don't you worry about yourself in proportion to the share of your suffering in the universal pain, and in proportion to what you, an unimportant man, mean in this infinite and eternal universe?

You judge things, events and men according to their usefulness or harm for ~you~, as if the universe existed for you, and not the reverse.

True repentance is a reversal of proportions. God is at the centre. I am an extremely valuable being, but one of innumerable billions of beings, of whom every one has to bear the fate assigned to him by the Creator.

The soul which has repented does not become lost in details. The whole world, and not only the world of men, is passing through a huge and long-lasting catastrophe, and I am worrying about what is happening to me. During the war, a quarrel broke out in a family, in my presence, because the husband reproached the wife for not dusting a cupboard. At the same moment, tens of thousands of young lives were being wiped out in Stalingrad, London, France and our own country.

If this defect, this lack of a sense of proportion, is not repaired in a soul, the fact that a man has changed from being an atheist to being religious does not help him. The soul will continue to be busy with trifles, with this difference, that now

page 61 With God in Solitary Confinement

they will be religious trifles. The object at which you look with short-sighted eyes will be a different object, but your eyes will remain short-sighted.

Consider yourself, my soul, as a small detail in a huge mechanism, as one cell in a vast organism. White blood corpuscles are sacrificed in order that the whole body may live and be healthy. You have to suffer for some hidden purpose of God, about which you know as little as the white corpuscle knows why it has to die.

Let it be enough for you that you are suffering for the Kingdom of God. All suffering serves this final cause.

Jesus looked on his suffering like this. He accepted it willingly and, even on the cross, thought not about himself but about the thief near him, about his mother and about you. Drown your small suffering in the vast ocean of pain. Believe that there is meaning in it, and you will be comforted.

Listen to me, my soul, and praise the Lord in all his doings. ~Amen~.

DEAR BROTHERS AND SISTERS

In Hebrew, "~davar~" is a homonym which means both "word" and "thing"; the real thing. In the language of the chosen people, words are not only symbols and echoes of a reality but they are themselves reality. When St. John thought out in Hebrew the prologue of his Gospel, he meant it to mean: "In the beginning was the reality. And the reality was with God. And the reality was God."

I almost never sleep at night. There is a blessing in night vigils. "Behold, now bless ye the Lord, all ye servants of the Lord, which ~by night~ stand in the house of the Lord." (PSA 134:1] During the night men meet to practise evil. Burglaries, murders and rapes occur at night. Stalin did not sleep during the night. That is when he received people and planned his mass murders. Saints must use the weapon of night vigils to counteract the power of darkness. Those who have to work during the day cannot do this. But I have the privilege of being an isolated prisoner. I can sleep during the day. I can keep vigil during the night.

I pass my nights in spiritual exercises, in prayer, in travelling in spirit round the world and remembering every country before God, in preparing and delivering sermons.

Every night I also compose a poem. I compose it in my mind, not having any paper to write it down.

Poor poems of an ungifted spirit! What are they compared to the works of the great artists? But even so, in my concern with metre and rhyme, I can feel the difficulty which poets must have in putting love and wisdom and life into poetry.

page 66 With God in Solitary Confinement

The words, confined in verses, feel as I felt when I was put in a strait-jacket.

The Word became flesh two thousand years ago. The Word would like to be flesh today, too, and not merely a piece of poetry. The Word desires to be incarnate once more in a man who can perform deeds of love, and can also speak harshly for righteousness' sake and rebuke wrongdoing, as Jesus did - a man who leaves all, loves all and offers himself as a sacrifice for all, even for those who betray him and scourge him; even for those whom he himself has had to strike with a whip for the sake of justice.

The word of God and the spirit of love are always longing for incarnation. Christ was incarnate not only in the carpenter Jesus; he also lived in St. Paul. We throw only words into the agitated sea of this world, and the multitude of words takes the place of reality.

God has brought me into the sphere of silence. The silence around me is absolute. You cannot hear the guards approach. God wishes me to unlearn words. It is becoming more and more difficult for me to formulate long, clear sentences.

Perhaps they are putting some drug in the food to destroy my mind.

I live in profound silence, a silence like that inhabited by the fish in the depths of the sea. The secret sign of the first Christians was a fish.

I am beginning to love this silence. I sometimes make up verses to pass the time, but what I would really like would be to make men, each one of whom would be a fine piece of poetry. In the original Greek of Ephesians, it is written that Christians are the poem (~poiema~) of God. [EPH 2:10] So God is a poet, too. His poems are serene, flexible, rich in meaning. He has embodied his poems in flesh. Each one has a different subject. One is the embodiment of heroism, another of sanctity, another of wisdom, yet another of practical common sense. Christians are not only different, but also sometimes divergent and even contradictory characters. But every one is pleasing to the Lord.

page 67 With God in Solitary Confinement

According to Ephesians [EPH 3:11-12] the role of the pastor is not to make sermons but to make saints.

I would also like such a task. First of all, I would like to make myself into a temple of embodied love, so that those who follow the wise men and shepherds of old may see in me Christ in miniature, and worship the Saviour in me.

Instead of a world in which bookshops sell volumes of sermons and poetry, I would like a world in which each man and woman is a poem of high thought, filled with melody and colour.

If I am a hindrance to the coming of such a world, may God kill me here in prison! But this is how the world should be.

I will do my part towards the coming of such a kingdom by following the example of Laban. His name in Hebrew means "white." He had two daughters, Rachel and Leah. A young man, Jacob, loved the beautiful Rachel. But Laban did not allow him to have her, unless he took the ugly Leah too. Laban was a just man, and did not allow preferential love. Christian love must embrace both the good and the bad.

Goethe called colour the suffering of light, because colour is the result of the tearing asunder of light beams while passing through a prism. Full, undivided light is white, "~laban~." White embraces everybody and everything you see, and even more. So the man who cultivates the white in his soul walks with devotion, as in a liturgy, through the world of the unloved and unlovely Leahs, whose constantly weeping eyes are unpleasant to look upon. It is a world full of girls whose hearts are broken because nobody loves them. Not being loved, they become uglier and uglier, and even a saint like Jacob does not want them. He desires only to pass his life with the beautiful Rachel. For her he works zealously for fourteen years, and it seems to him but a few days. He would not have worked one day for Leah.

Within the ~ecclesia~, the church, there is an ~ecclesiola~, a little church, which accepts the good and the bad, which embraces both the beautiful and the ugly. If God has united in the same church a criminal like a Borgia and a saint like Francis of Assisi, and brought into the same institution the priests who betrayed us and the martyrs who suffer with me, then I, too, must love them all.

Jesus showed his love first for the ugly Leahs by sitting at table with publicans and sinners to bring them to repentance. There are beautiful Rachels near me in prison who do not feel his presence. They will receive their part, only much later.

Love all men, my dear brothers, but bestow the greatest part of your love on the ugliest souls. They need your love more than anyone else. You, my fellow-prisoners, must show your greatest love to the Communist torturers and those who betrayed us. The beautiful souls can endure without tokens of your love. Spend your energy where it is most needed!

I lay especially on your hearts love towards the pastors and priests who collaborate with the Communist persecutors and denounce their brethren. I am afraid at the thought that things may develop in our country towards the situation that exists in the Soviet Union, where in many instances these traitors have been lynched or stabbed by Christians of the Underground church. The church of the catacombs has to be protected from traitors, and if there is no other way, they resort to such means. The church of the first centuries did it, too, though those who teach church history don't say very much about it.

But this is the extreme solution. In the Nazi times, we won for Christ men who had betrayed us and put us in prison. We should do our utmost to achieve this now, too. Let the word become flesh in us, flesh of a man who accepts the kiss of Judas and calls him friend, even when he comes at the head of an armed gang to arrest you. ~Amen~.

MOST BELOVED CHILDREN

Today the Communists beat me heavily. In the end I fainted. They revived me by pouring water on me, and then began to beat me again.

And then the worst happened. The door burst open, and into the room where I was being interrogated rushed our brothers and sisters - Brother Davidescu, the one with the long beard, and Brother Marinov, and old Auntie Ionescu, and Suzanne, and all the others whom I love so much. I wondered how they had got into the prison. Then they began to beat me, they to whom I have never done any wrong. Then the door opened again. This time it was Binzea, my wife, and Mihai, my son. They also spat on me, and mocked me, telling me that they were ashamed to have me for a husband and father. And Mihai put out his fist to strike me. It was too much. I fainted again. When I awoke I was alone with the interrogators. The whole scene had been a hallucination.

I knew then that I had gone mad, as so many have done before me, whose yelling cries I can hear resounding in the arched corridor.

And now you have come, my dear children, to fill my lonely cell. You really are here. I don't know if it is what those who are sane call the real "here," or if it is my "here," the here of a lunatic. But you are here. And it is not only you, children, who fill my Sunday-school class. This time I can see your guardian angels, too, hoping that I will tell you the right thing, thirsty to listen themselves to some beautiful story about Jesus.

And look, there he is himself, the holy child. In the old days,

page 72 With God in Solitary Confinement

he appeared in the shape of a child to St.Jerome, the monk who first translated the Bible into Latin.

Jerome was working on his translation in Bethlehem, the birthplace of our Lord. As he prayed, Jesus appeared to him in the shape of a child. This filled the heart of the saint with such overwhelming sweetness that he said: "Beloved Jesus, I would like with all my heart to give you a present. Tell me, what would please you most?" The child smiled, and answered: "Heaven and earth and all that is in them are mine. What can you give me?" The saint said again: "But I love you, and wish to make you a gift. Will you accept all the little money which I, a monk, possess?" The child replied again, still smiling: "Give your money to the poor. I have no use for it." St. Jerome insisted: "I cannot let you go away empty-handed. What shall I give you?" Then the child became very grave and said. "If you wish to bring me an offering which will fill my heart with joy, give me all your sins and all your lusts. I will die because of them on the cross. There is no other gift which would fill my heart with such gladness as this."

Blessed is he that cometh in the Name of the Lord!
Here, among us, is the child Jesus. Let us bring him this gift - our untruthfulness, our selfishness, our anger, our bitterness. And so he will have passed his time with us in joy.

St. Anthony of Padua, when he was still a child, also met Jesus. There was a knock at the gate of his home, and Anthony ran to see who was there. Opening the gate, he saw a beggar in rags, shivering in the frost of a winter day. Taking pity on him, Anthony said: "I will ask my father to give you some warm clothes." The beggar answered: "It is very cold in your world, but I am not begging for clothes." The child then said: "You must be hungry. Come in, and my mother will give you some food." The beggar replied: "I am hungry, but I do not beg for bread." Astonished, Anthony asked: "Why then did you knock at our gate?" The beggar said: "I have come to ask you to give me your heart." The child stepped backward: "But if I give you my heart, I will die." Then the beggar opened a bag which he carried on his shoulder, and took out from it some hearts, saying: "This is the heart of St. Paul, and this of Mary Magdalene, and this of St. Ignatius. All those who have given their hearts to me, far from dying, are alive eternally." Then Anthony understood that the one who stood before him was Jesus himself, and he became his follower. Let us also give him our hearts.

And now I will tell him, and you, and your guardian angels, a story about him.

Jesus's earthly father, Joseph, was poor. He could not afford to give him a proper education. When the child reached the age of twelve, he told him: "Now you must make an end of playing and dreaming. I will make you into a carpenter, like me."

The next day he went with the child into the forest to cut trees. But this time he could not touch the trees with his axe. Again and again he was stopped by the child, who said: "Father, you know that the Scriptures forbid killing. This tree is young and has not yet lived its life. Let it continue to enjoy the sun. See how, seeking the light, it has lifted itself towards the heights. There will be men enough ready to kill it when it has lived one year longer ... And do not cut that one. See how many ants there are at its foot. How busily they gather herbs and little pieces of straw! I am afraid that, if you cut down the tree, many of them will be killed ... And save that one. It has a nest of birds in its branches. Their chirping is heard in heaven. The baby birds will die, and you will be accused in the country beyond the stars of their murder ... And leave this one, because the sound of the saw, as its teeth enter the wood, will go up to heaven, to the Father who has commanded us to have mercy on men and trees, on animals and birds, on flowers and plants. Holy eyes are weeping at the sorrow of them all."

Jesus pleaded so fervently, and so many tears ran down his cheeks, that Joseph sat down in the shade to comfort him. It was the second Sabbath that week. A leaf whispered to another: "It is the Saviour." Ants played around their feet. The birds sang: "Our longing is fulfilled." There was no cloud in the sky.

The child laid his head in Joseph's lap. Joseph played with the child's curls. The son was the teacher, the father the disciple. The angels watched them both.

The child asked: "Tell me, Father, why do you have an axe? You know that iron tools were invented by a descendant of the wicked Cain. When the Romans asked you to make a cross on which to crucify a man, you also shortened the life of a tree. I have seen men carrying their crosses to the place of execution. I have seen them falling under the burden. You have told me that this will be my end, too. Will a tree lose its life for me, before I lose mine for mankind? I cry when I see men cutting rods, because rods are used for beating children. You cut something which has life, in order to use it to commit brutalities."

As the oil runs down the beard of a priest when he is anointed, so the tears ran down Joseph's beard, a sign that the words had touched his heart.

But he tried to make excuses: "If a carpenter takes pity on the trees, he will starve." He spoke too soon. The idea of death as a result of doing right fell on fertile soil.

The child said: "If by not killing trees for carpentry, we die of hunger, we will go to the country where there is no more death, and where we will love each other all day long. There, Mother will weep no more. You know that here men mock her. She will sit at my right hand, you at my left, and I, in the middle, will love you. I shall not become a carpenter, but I will be the one who dies that the trees may have life abundantly, and that there may be one more sun in the sky. I will not destroy the life of the trees."

On that day the trees remained alive. The child was their saviour. For the dark forest, he foreshadowed a cloudless day.

But Joseph the poor carpenter had great burdens. There was a whole family to be cared for. He was not a child who could afford to lead a life of dreams.

The next day he took Jesus into the carpenter's shop. He taught him to measure a board with a yard-stick, to draw a straight line on it, to use a plane and the different tools. In this life you have to work. Otherwise you die.

But Mary his mother noticed that every day the child became more pale and serious. He was silent, and kept hidden from everybody the reason for his pallor. It was because, as often as the hammer hit the wood, he felt the blows in his own body. He wept every time the saw bit into the wood. He fell prostrate to the floor, his tears running down on to the sawdust which was sacrificed to provide beds and chairs on which men could rest; in the same way he himself would one day be sacrificed that others might have eternal rest. He wept because he had made his decision. He would atone for the sins committed by men against the trees. On a tree which had been the victim of injustice, he would be the sacrifice.

And now every little branch can wait patiently in silence. Jesus died on the tree to give assurance that you, broken branches, will be grafted again into the olive tree. Jesus fought your battle on the wood of the tree, to prepare for you a wonderful future.

So the child Jesus fulfilled his apprenticeship. He learned to be a carpenter, a carpenter who practised his art weeping, the carpenter who made the gates to heaven.

You, the one who created me - I do not address you by the name men usually call you. I remember that St. Paphnutius, when he had brought to Christ the renowned courtesan Thais, told her: "Your lips are not worthy to pronounce the holy name of the Creator. Your prayer should only be, 'You who have made me, have mercy on me.'" She prayed like this for three years, alone in her nun's cell. After three years, a brother had a vision of a beautiful soul on a bed covered with roses waited on by angels. He was sure that this must be the place reserved in heaven for St. Anthony the Great, the founder of monasticism. But Anthony told him that he had seen the place of Thais, the humble sinner who had refrained from pronouncing your name.

You, the one who created me - The children whose presence I enjoyed so much have vanished. So also have their guardian angels and the holy child. So this was a hallucination, too, like the one I had this morning when they beat me. I really have become mad.

I have visited many mental asylums. Some of the patients are happy. They believe themselves to be emperors or saints. Others suffer from continual nightmares, believing that they are persecuted, in danger and being tortured.

Would it be too much to ask you just one thing? Give me a happy madness. Let me see the children thronging round me, and let me see their beautiful angels. Let me always behold the child Jesus. It may be that there are some who would not even consider this a hallucination, but as a vision from you. These, perhaps, would be mad like me. But they will appreciate what I tell them, and I will be comforted.

This much, a happy madness, I ask from you. ~Amen~.

DEAR SOUL OF MINE

I will speak with you again today. Again there have been the yelling cries, which neither I nor the other prisoners can master. I am in a straitjacket and gagged for the second time. With whom else could I speak now but you? I wonder how St. Francis of Assisi would have felt in my place.

I remember his conversation with Brother Leo, who asked him wherein is perfect joy. Does it lie in knowing many things? Francis denied this. Leo asked again if perfect joy lies in being a prophet and knowing the mysteries of God. Francis shook his head silently to show that the brother had missed the point. Leo asked again if the winning of many souls for Christ would not be perfect joy. The answer was still the same: "No." Leo inquired whether great sanctity, enabling one even to perform miracles for the good of men, would not be perfect joy.

Francis answered: "None of these things can give perfect joy. We shall know such joy only if, when we reach St. Mary of the Angels, soaked with rain, hungry and shivering with cold, the doorkeeper drives us out, mocking us with cruel words as beggars and rogues. We shall know perfect joy if we remain hungry outside the walls of the monastery, enduring the rain and the mud, and if we endure this with gladness and patience and thankfulness. The cross is the only tree on which the flower of perfect joy will grow."

I have the cross. So I decided to be joyful, and I danced. I spun round until my mind became completely blank. My whole body was in a sweat when I fell on to my bed with tears

page 80 With God in Solitary Confinement

running down my cheeks, while the guards, who had been looking through the peep-hole in the door, laughed.

Now I am living my life backwards, from the eternal bliss which waits for all who love the Lord, through the moment when you, my soul, will be released from the prison of the body, to my present state. Then I remember how a few minutes ago I could still move my arms. I remember the beautiful years with my church and my family, and then my whole life backwards until my early childhood. I can somehow remember being a babe in arms. Before that I was an embryo, watched over by a guardian angel. Before that I was in the loins of my forefathers. I know so many of them, having had the privilege of being Jewish. I know that Abraham was my ancestor, and Terah and the others. I was in Adam falling into sin, and before that enjoying fellowship with God. And before that? I was a spirit with God. Before that ... there was no me and he. There was only the One in full serenity from all eternity.

Why, my soul, are you so stupidly concerned with the latest event, the fact that I have been put into a straitjacket and gagged?

Uninitiated souls always judge by the latest impression. A wrong word spoken by somebody today makes us forget the many good deeds we have observed in the same person over many years. One kind gesture makes us trust a man whose past record does not make him trustworthy. Uninitiated men are incapable of taking into account all they know about a man before judging him. For them, only the latest event counts.

The Pharisees judged like this. For them, Jesus was a sinner, because he broke the Sabbath. That was all they could think of. All the good works and teachings of Jesus were forgotten. Can I form a right opinion of a man, having in view only his breaking of the law in one particular instance, and losing sight of his total personality?

There are men who repent outwardly, and now live in the church instead of living in the world as before. But the mechanism of their soul has remained the same. So they now judge the brethren according to the latest event, instead of judging men of the world in this way. But their thinking has remained false. They even judge God according to this criterion; they praise him when he gives them something good, and begin to doubt when affliction comes.

But you, my soul, must not judge according to the fact that for the last hour I have been in a straitjacket. Keep in view the whole of life and its whole orbit. There is something more than the infinite. There is the transfinite. If, starting from a certain point, I draw an endless line, its value is infinite. But if from the same point I draw two endless lines in opposite directions, that is transfinite. You are more than eternal, my soul, you are from God to God, and you will enter again into him, enriched by human experience. "God saw every thing that he had made, and, behold, it was very good." [GEN 1:31] Only when you see everything will you see how good it is. The most beautiful painting is only a formless mixture of colours and senseless lines until it is completed. The most beautiful sculpture is just a hewn stone until it receives its definitive shape.

Wait, my soul, until you are again at large in God. Then you will see the sense of the straitjacket, too.

And then, being gagged again and again, perhaps I shall begin to like the gagging. It takes me out of the sphere of words, in which men are imprisoned. Preachers are specially exposed to the temptation of becoming talkers.

Words, which were first formed for naming surrounding realities, become emptied, with time, of their original meaning. Retarded souls continue to accord them the same value and respect as when they had a rich content. They don't realize that they are now merely outwardly beautiful dolls, stuffed with straw.

The word "bishop" originally meant the chief pastor, the most advanced in faith, the man who gave his life for his sheep in time of persecution. Now he is a man of some academic learning, chosen by men who often are not children of God themselves. Even before my arrest, all our Orthodox bishops, except one, had subscribed to what the Communist killers of Christians demanded. The Reformed bishop did the same. Now they praise the Communists and denounce their own sheep.

So the words "priest," "pastor," "rabbi," "church," "Christian," "Jew," "believer," "faith," "religion," "art," have entirely changed their meaning.

The fact that I am now gagged gives me freedom to see the reality which corresponds to a word today.

The Communists are torturing us in the beautiful name of a happy future for mankind.

"Let every man be ... slow to speak," [JMS 1:19] which means that he should always consider whether every word has a corresponding reality. My chief interrogator is called Dulgheru, which means Carpenter. But this is only a name. He never held a plane in his hands.

One of the high priests who judged Jesus had the name of Annas, which means "pity."

Bless, my soul, the Communists who, by gagging me, free me from the vanity of words, and give me an insight into reality. There is a meaning in this gagging, too. Thanks be to God. ~Amen~.

DEAR BROTHERS AND SisTERS

For a few days I could not preach to you as usual. The physical pain was too great. Still, there was some joy in the pain. Up to now, they have beaten and whipped me. Now, for the first time, they have tortured me, so that visible marks will remain on my body until death, or perhaps even after.

I used to wonder how it was that the resurrected body of our Lord bore the marks of wounds. Can a resurrected body look like this? Will we be resurrected with rheumatism, deformities, twisted limbs? Will the resurrected body bear the marks of the experiences through which it has passed? Jesus spoke about some who will enter into life having one eye or one hand. [MRK 9:43-47]

He had to be resurrected with marks on his body, in order that, as often as the sins of men are brought before the Father, he may show his wounds, received in order that the sinner may be saved.

By this sacrifice of his, I am saved, too.

But perhaps my scars also will be helpful. My prayers for my torturers will perhaps be more effective if I can show the Father the wounds I received from them. If I can continue to love them, if I can forgive, why should God exclude them from his love and not forgive them?

And then, perhaps, perhaps there is a slight possibility that I shall one day be out of prison and in the West. Then I shall be able to show the unbelieving Thomases, who do not accept that Communism is crime on a huge scale under the cloak of an ideal, what Jesus showed to his doubting apostle and so convinced him - the marks of the wounds.

page 86 With God in Solitary Confinement

There is a blessing in the tortures through which I have passed. We must thank God for everything. While they tortured me, I could not think. Just one word flashed through my mind once: "We were appointed thereunto" [1TH 3:3] - that is, to afflictions.

The tortures have made some transformations in my soul. They have lessened my desire to go to heaven. What happiness would it be for me to sit in bliss in heaven, knowing that others are being tortured in the meantime on earth? I would be among the few of whom Jesus spoke who are ready to leave Abraham's bosom and be with the tormented souls in order to comfort them. [LUK 16:26] My wish is rather that God's will should be done on earth as it is in heaven. Why not make a heaven out of earth, as Jesus taught us to pray?

I long for an earth filled with righteousness and justice and love; a world where even the animals would live in paradise, lions lying down with lambs and not devouring them.

When I was in prison under the Nazis we noticed how the birds seemed to have a sympathy for humans, and how they always had a presentiment of what would happen to us. There were pigeons in the prison yard. They used to come to our barred windows, and we gave them crumbs of bread. It was not just one man's imagination, all the prisoners agreed that they observed, before days of heavy beatings, that the pigeons would beat their wings and flutter frantically, uttering cries of alarm. The farmers with whom I am imprisoned tell me, in our long conversations in code, that their dogs knew beforehand about their arrests, and could not be stopped from howling all night long, as they had never done before.

In my cell there is only one animal, a spider. I don't know how he happened to enter the underground cell. But one day he was there. He just took advantage of a moment when the guard unlocked the door. He made his web. We became good friends. I fed him. I talked to him. I had observed that he was unusually agitated the day before I was taken out for torture. It may have been a coincidence. I don't know. But I have the feeling that he sympathizes with me. We ought even more to sympathize with the animal world, and wish for them and for ourselves, not that we should go to the Kingdom of God - the way might be too far for a spider - it would be much simpler if his Kingdom were to come here. Jesus taught us to pray for this. Then criminals and lions and foxes would have a much easier entrance.

On that day the world from which we come will seem like the place where we were caterpillars. In the sufferings of today, we are cocoons. One day we shall be butterflies. We shall be able to fly from star to star, not neglecting our own planet. The angels were ascending and descending between earth and heaven on Jacob's ladder. So there is a ladder uniting earth to God. Sometimes we will ascend. Then we will descend again. There will be no difference, because it will be on earth as it is in heaven. Those who are Christ's will then be like Christ. To be with them will be like being with the Son of God himself.

I am much more concerned now with making earth a paradise than with going to a heavenly paradise. This means a fight in every sphere of life to defeat the red dragon and all the other manifestations of the apocalyptic beast. [REV 12:3]

Dear brothers and sisters, I want you to fight for the triumph of righteousness and love, that is for the triumph of Christ on earth; but remember that it is always easier to fight for a principle than to live up to it. Don't choose the easy way, but the way of the Cross. Don't remain yourselves unrighteous and lacking in sweetness while you are fighting for righteousness. Clothe yourselves with Christ and with all his virtues, and so fight.

It is not only I who sit in prison. You are all in the prisons of your sinful selves, and of your wrong and limited ideas. Let Jesus free you of these! Then you will be able to fight and attain your aim.

I am so happy to have been able to speak with you again tonight, after a short pause.

As I told you, I had some small, flickering joy in those days too, thinking about the value of the torture marks. But don't think that I am a hero, and that I just whistled and laughed when I was in great pain. It was rather a time of great depression. I could not pray. I could not realize the presence of God, except in very short glimpses, which lasted perhaps only seconds.

The marks are a blessing. The time of depression has been a blessing, too. It showed me how horrible eternity without God would be. Those days without feeling him near were each a thousand years long. I realized how horrible it would be to remain in hell with unrepentant criminals who through eternity would swear, curse and think only evil, as my Communist torturers do. God brought me into a Communist prison, God made me pass through tortures, and through the dark night of the soul, in order that I may learn what hell is and do my utmost to avoid it.

My brothers, strive after heaven, a heaven which will comprehend the earth too.

There is a legend which says that a monk once left his monastery to cut trees in a wood. In the forest a bird from paradise was singing. He listened to her beautiful trills for a while, then he quickly finished his work and returned to the monastery. But the porter was not the usual one. He would not even allow him to enter. He gave his name. It was completely unknown. He asked for the abbot. A man came whom he had never seen before. It was in vain that he protested that he had left monastery only an hour ago. Nobody recognized him. Finally, somebody remembered that the monastery kept a story about a monk who had left the monastery centuries ago to cut wood and had disappeared without leaving any trace. The heavenly song of a bird from paradise, which seemed to have lasted only a few minutes, had lasted for centuries counting after the human manner.

The days during which you have not heard from me have been days of depression, but a depression filled with deep meaning. There have been rare moments of joy, when I realized the value of the wounds I have received. But I finally came out of my depression because I too heard a song from paradise. I have heard in my lifetime the music of Beethoven and Bach, but how poor they are in comparison with the song I have now heard!

Brothers and sisters, fight to fill the earth with this heavenly song! Forsake all the old songs for this one: "~Shiru le-Adonai shir hadash~" - "Sing unto the Lord a new song." This is the commandment given to the angels. Just listen. You will learn it from them. ~Amen~.

DEAR BROTHERS AND SISTERS

Today the subject of my sermon will be Sabina, my wife, whom you and I love. We call her Binzea.

If Ruth and Esther can be the subjects of whole books of the Bible, why should not the wife of a preacher be the subject of his sermon? Binzea is dear to God, and dear to me as Ruth was to Boaz and Esther to Ahasuerus.

Today I saw myself in a mirror, the first time for two years. They had to make repairs to our latrines, so the guards took us to theirs, and there was a mirror.

A homeric laughter overcame me, looking at myself. I used to be considered a handsome man. Now I am thin, ugly, with black circles under my eyes. So that is what remains of bodily beauty! And one day I shall be even uglier than that. I shall be a skeleton with a skull.

Coming back to my cell, I remembered another time when I had stood in front of a mirror. I had often thought about the words "God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him," and I had wondered in what our Godlikeness consists. I could not find a satisfactory answer. One day I stood before a mirror, asking myself once again the question: Which feature of mine corresponds to a feature of God?" My wife, having an intuition of what was going through my mind, silently came and stood beside me. And then I understood at once. "God created man in his own image ... male and female created he them. [GEN 1:27]

Our Godlikeness consists in the union of the two sexes. Through this we become "pro-creators," or deputy creators.

page 94 With God in Solitary Confinement

We become capable of creating eternal beings, just as God created Adam and Eve.

The unmarried also have a partner of the opposite sex in the spiritual realm, the girls their animus, the men their anima, as Jung calls them - their ideal love, whom they have never met and with whom they could never unite. But life is infinite.

Binzea is the one who, by union with me, made me become more Godlike. Although I was converted before she was, it is to her that I owe my being a Christian today.

I remember the prison days with her in the Nazi time. Then we met every day in the corridor and could take walks together. I remember how, on another occasion when I was arrested, she demanded that she should go to prison with me.

Then the Communists came to power. A high Orthodox prelate, stooge of the Communists but personally friendly to me, had warned me that the decision had been made to arrest me. I had an opportunity to flee. Should I use it or not?

When I consulted my wife, she answered: "If you flee, how will you ever be able to preach again from the text, 'The good shepherd giveth his life for the sheep. But he that is an hireling, and not the shepherd, whose own the sheep are not, seeth the wolf coming and leaveth the sheep and fleeth ...'?" [JHN 10:11-12]

I was still tempted to flee. Then one day I was visited by a pastor for whose conversion God had used me. He had been an alcoholic. I found him drunk on the street, refusing to go home. So I accompanied him from bar to bar, and spoke to him. When he awoke from his drunkenness next day, he was a new man. And now he reminded me of this. During our conversation, he repeated again and again: "What struck me most in what you told me then was the verse: 'Escape for thy life, look not behind thee.'" [GEN 19:17]

When he left, I asked my wife: "Were not his continual repetitions a guidance from God that I must save my life by fleeing?" She answered: "Yes, you must save your life. But whoever saves his life in this world, will lose it. The man who loses his life will save it."

page 95 With God in Solitary Confinement

So I decided to stay. I don't regret it.

I do regret that I was kidnapped from the street by the Communist police. If they had taken me from my home, I would have been able to ask her forgiveness for having often been mean to her.

Now I sometimes surprise myself by saying, instead of "Jesus, help me!," "Binzea, help me!" She is so like Jesus. Those who followed St. Paul followed Jesus. For sick men, it was the same thing to appeal to Jesus himself or to his apostles for help. They were cured just the same. One day Christians will be like Christ. To talk with them will be like talking with the Saviour. It may not even be wrong to say, "Binzea, help me." It would be considered quite normal if she were near me. But now, in my narrow cell, I am free from the limitations of space. There is no near and far. Why should I not appeal to her? All good men of all ages are close to each other and can help one another. It is probably from this experience of Christians in great suffering in the first centuries that the practice of appealing to the saints arose, with all that remained valuable or became harmful in it in later years.

Binzea did not know what it was to avoid danger. She incited me to speak out openly against the Communists at the Congress of Cults convened by them in our Parliament building.

I once quoted to her a Cambodian proverb: "When two elephants are fighting, the ant should step aside." She laughed and said: "I am not a Cambodian, I am a Rumanian. We have a proverb of our own: 'A little log can overturn a large cart.'"

Where is she likely to be now? Probably in a prison cell somewhere near me. I heard a woman shrieking. I could have sworn that it was her voice. I last her in the spirit. She was bleeding, as if she had been heavily tortured. While I wept with longing for her, the thought occurred to me: It is written that "the blood of Jesus Christ, his Son, cleanseth us from all sin." [1JN 1:7] But where is the blood of Jesus? Where can I find it to make it cleanse my sins? The glorified body of Jesus had no blood. The Lord used, instead of the standard Jewish expression "flesh and blood" (~basar vedam~), the words "flesh and bones." [LUK 24:39] The blood which he spilled from the scourging, the crown of thorns, the crucifixion, no longer exists, just as the blood of all those who have died has passed, over the centuries, through the thousands of transformations of nature and does not exist anywhere.

Then where is the blood of Christ which can save me from sin? I am afraid the blood of Jesus about which certain priests and pastors preach is more like the artificial blood used in cinema studios in scenes of violence, which consists only of chemicals painted on the actor's face.

The name of Christ can be used in two senses. It can mean both the historical person of two thousand years ago, and the mystical body of which the glorified Jesus is the head and we are all the body. [1CO 12:12] This Christ bleeds continually. There has never been a day in history when at least one member of this mystical body has not bled. Their blood is the blood of Christ. Everything in them belongs to Christ. And they fill up in their flesh that which is behind of the afflictions of Christ. [COL 1:24] They perpetuate the sacrifice, and so it is his blood which continually cleanses.

We apply to events a false notion of time. When we travel in a train we have the impression that the villages and towns are passing us. We say that one station has passed and another follows. The truth is that all towns coexist at the same time. What we see is a delusion of our senses. So our mind, limited in time, sees some events of history as belonging to the past, and others as future. The reality is that there exists only an eternal "now," in which the bleeding of Jesus on Calvary is as actual today as it was two thousand years ago. And the bleeding of martyrs from before the time of Jesus and those of all centuries all belong to the eternal now.

In the vast picture of this eternal now there is also a spot where I will see Binzea again, and you will see your loved ones, in eternal gladness. Good night, Binzea. God give you peace.

page 97 With God in Solitary Confinement

Brothers and sisters, let us love our wives and husbands as Christ loved us and gave himself for us!

"If the salt have lost his savour, wherewith shall it be salted?" [MTT 5:13] Salt is sodium chloride. The salt molecule can lose one of its atoms. It then ceases to be salt, and loses its savour. It can become salt again so long as it remains open to receive union with another atom. No man is lost as long as he has somebody to give him instruction which will "salt" him. Now, when the best of your teachers sit in jail, and you have so many unreliable ones who have compromised with Communism, the one who can salt you best might be your wife or husband. Profit from this possibility for as long as you are together. ~Amen~.

page 99 With God in Solitary Confinement

page 101 With God in Solitary Confinement

So here you are again, the victims of my life. Good evening! I know nothing which cleanses the soul so well as a straight face-to-face discussion with you.

I believe that truth is to be found not only in the Bible. I believe that I can rely on a book of arithmetic in its own sphere as much as on the Bible. I also believe in Shakespeare. As the Scriptures teach you the maximum which a man can know about God, so Shakespeare teaches you the most a man can know about human character. ~Romeo and Juliet~ can even be seen as an allegory of the love between the Saviour and his bride, just as we find an allegory in the ~Song of Solomon~ and the Hindus in the ~Bhagavad Gita~.

There are only two things I wonder about Shakespeare. First, why does he not describe Christian characters? Secondly, I wonder whether the apparition of the ghost of Hamlet's father, and the presence of the murdered Banquo at Macbeth's table, represent fiction or reality. I have always been rather inclined to consider them as a description of reality.

In the Nazi prison I was with a murderer who denied his crime. The prosecutor put him in a solitary cell whose walls were covered with dozens of pictures of the victim. The killer pounded on the door of his cell, confessing everything and demanding only that the pictures should be removed. What was for us only a picture evoked for him a reality which was with him in the cell.

Now I am passing through the same experience. Night after night, you come. But I don't bang on the door. I do not wish to escape from your reproaches. Do not try to terrify me by circling round me in this mad dance and pointing at me with your skeleton fingers.

I know how to dance, too. And you know that my dance is more effective than yours, just as the miracles of Moses were greater than those of the Egyptian magicians who opposed him.

You dance? I will dance, too, singing the song which Jesus sang when he danced. Ha, ha, ha. You don't even know that he danced? Listen to the words of incantation while I dance - words which I learned from him:

~"Glory be to thee, Father. Amen.
... Glory be to thee, Grace. Amen.
Glory be to thee, Spirit: Glory be to thee, Holy One:
Glory be to thy glory. Amen ...
I would eat, and I would be eaten. Amen.
I would hear, and I would be heard. Amen ...
Grace danceth. I would pipe; dance ye all. Amen ...
The number Eight singeth praise with us. Amen.
The number Twelve danceth on high. Amen.
The Whole on high hath part in our dancing. Amen.
Whoso danceth not, knoweth not what cometh to pass.
Amen ...
I would flee, and I would stay. Amen ...
A place I have not, and I have places. Amen.
A temple I have not, and I have temples. Amen.
A lamp am I to thee that beholdest me. Amen.
A mirror am I to thee that perceivest me. Amen.
A door am I to thee that knockest at me. Amen.
A way am I to thee a wayfarer. Amen ...
Now answer thou unto my dancing~ (if you can.
Why can't you? Ha, ha, ha, I laugh at you!)
~... If thou hadst known how to suffer, thou wouldest have been able not to suffer.

Learn thou to suffer, and thou shalt be able not to suffer."~ [~Acts of John~ 94-96. ~The Apocryphal New Testament~ trs. Montague Rhodes James, quoted by permission of the Clarendon Press, Oxford.]

Why do you shrink back into a corner? Come, I have no wish to scare you. I love you all. Come on, let us reason with each other.

page 103 With God in Solitary Confinement

Yes, I killed many of you. Some of you I killed while you were yet unborn. You would have hindered my selfish life. I did not allow you to be born. Now I understand the gynaecologist who asked me to baptize him because he was haunted during the night by the many children he had killed.

You have learned the words from the Bible: "The wages of sin is death," [ROM 6:23] and you threaten me with them. You may know the Bible. The devil knows it, too. But I would not call him theologian. Neither are you. Things are not as simple as that. "Whosoever killeth shall be in danger of the judgment." [MTT 5:21] Have you heard? The killer is not lost. He is only in danger. He will be judged, which does not mean that he will be sentenced. He may be acquitted, too. I may explain to the Judge my bad heredity, or perhaps he will reveal it to me. I may explain to him my wrong education, my bad environment, my madness. He will know how many devils were unchained to fight against me. Weighing all this, I may still be acquitted.

And you, with whom I have committed adultery - are you not as guilty as I? Why do you throw stones at me? Or you, the holy ones who never sinned in this respect because you were impotent, or ugly or never had occasion for it. "Whosoever looks on a woman to lust after her has committed adultery in his heart." MTT 5:28] And you, women, take advantage of the special kindness of Jesus towards the female sex which kept him from speaking against women who look on a man to lust after him. Don't play the righteous with me! And don't quote Bible verse at me.

We are all the same. And the eye which must be plucked out and cast from us is only the right one, the one which judges actions after the standard of righteousness and morality, not knowing that life has its own laws, and that the law of the Spirit of life, that is the simple acknowledgement of life with its intricacies, sets you free from that other law of sin and death.

I reminded Jesus once that Luther had called Christ The greatest liar, perjurer, thief, adulterer and murderer that mankind has ever known. Not in the sense that he committed these sins, but because he appropriated them to himself. I asked Jesus: "Do you accept this charge?" and I heard a definite reply: "Yes, everything except the adultery." I was sure then that this was not his voice. I cannot believe that he is less concerned about those who neglect their parents, or cheat their employers, or gossip, or steal, than about those who experience a love story. Portia said in ~The Merchant of Venice~. "The quality of mercy is not strained." It is not difficult for Jesus to appropriate to himself our adulteries, too.

And here you are, the many thousands who have listened to my sermons and read my books. You, who are of many religions and traditions, accuse me of the gravest of sins, heresy. All other sins are trifles in comparison with this, the distortion of the Word of God. Have I been guilty of this? What is truth? I stood for a truth once. Here, I am not sure of it any more. I am battered by many storms. The see of Rome attracts me with its prestige, and I wonder how I could have been anything else than Catholic. Is Adventism the real truth? There are hundreds of texts teaching us to keep the Sabbath, and not one commandment about Sunday. I see the beauty of the Orthodox tradition, quiet and deep like the Pacific Ocean. Which is the right one. Which is heresy? What ought I to have preached? I am I, and nobody else. Perhaps Protestantism, in which everyone establishes for himself his own relationship with God, is the truth. Then I am not a heretic. Each man an Abraham in personal relationship with God - that is the end result of Protestantism. What is wrong with that?

What I knew, I preached. And I don't care about your accusations. "After the way which they call heresy, so worship I the God of my fathers," said St. Paul [ACT 24:14] when he was charged as you charge me.

Why are you all so angry with me? What have you lost by the fact that I sinned gravely against you? Zacchaeus stole from one man perhaps a hundred dinars, with which in any case he could not have done much. But he repented and gave back to everyone fourfold. Now the man he had cheated has four hundred dinars, enough to open a little shop. Christ is called in the

Hebrew of isaiah 53 "~asham~," which means not only "an offering for sin," but also "a restitution." To all of you whom I have robbed of this transitory life, he will give life eternal. To all of you whom I have polluted, he will give the whiteness of purity. To all of you whom I have caused to weep, he will give a pearl for every tear. To all those to whom I have taught error, he will give the final truth.

Will no reasoning quieten you? Can nothing stop you from haunting me? I see that reasoning cannot overcome the sense of guilt. Guilt drives a man mad. Arguments cannot help a madman.

Years ago they used to burn Christians at the stake. At least they had it warm. We are shivering from cold in our cells. Nevertheless I am bathed in sweat, watching you and hearing how you yell at me.

And now you are here, too, Moses. I knew you as the first keeper of the threshold of the most holy place. You, too, tell me that I have broken the law, and that therefore I am defiled and cannot enter.

You talked like this to Luther, I guess. Sometimes his hatred exploded against Jews and Catholics; at times he was as unbridled as a mad man. He was one of those he called "martyrs of Providence," a man who loved Jesus wholeheartedly but who had a choleric character which he had never been able to conquer. Luther taught: "If you meet Moses, kill him." In another sense, Zen Buddhism says the same thing: "If you meet Buddha, kill him." I am not afraid of you, Moses. You are not allowed to stand in my way. I will fight you, and I will enter.

Do you oppose me with the tables of the commandments? But did you not smash them to pieces yourself? Paul also smashed them again. Did he not write that the tables of stone are done away?

I remember vaguely that some church council branded as heresy antinomianism, the teaching that no moral law is any longer valid. But at this moment I am not particularly worried about church councils and their decisions.

I want forgiveness. I want justification. I want peace, whatever

page 106 With God in Solitary Confinement

I have done in the past. The past is gone. I live in the present and the future, and the ghosts of the past are not permitted to haunt me. Neither are you permitted to torture me, setting my sin against the commandments. You did not respect them yourself. What right have you to play the moralist with me?

You are circling round me again, and yelling at me?

I can yell, too, and I will do it, even though I know that I shall be put in the straitjacket again. Yes, I yell: "No sin is mine. All sin belongs to Jesus. It is he who has committed them all. Ask him, and he will confirm it. If you cannot forgive me my sins, if you are so wicked as to torture me every night in my helplessness, then forgive my sins to the one who has taken them on himself. Forgive my sins to Jesus. If you do not forgive him, he will not forgive you. And don't forget he has power to throw you into everlasting hell."

And now my last cry: "Yes, I have murdered, I have committed adultery, I lied, I was a heretic, but the blood of Jesus Christ washed me from all my sins and can wash you, too. Then you will become good, and will no more give pain to those whose victims you have been. Out! Out! I am baptized. I am washed in the blood of Jesus."

The guard has already put the key in the lock. Now I shall be gagged again. But the clock is striking one hour after midnight. Is it a coincidence? Is this the hour when you have to disappear? It cannot only be this. The blood of Jesus Christ has overcome you. I do not see you any more.

While they put the straitjacket on, before they gag me, I cry out to you my final word: "You tortured me so much because you must be terribly tortured yourselves. Saints pray for those who have victimized them, instead of throwing mud at them. St. Joan of Arc, when she saw the Catholic bishop who had sentenced her to death approaching, cried: 'Beware that the flames may not endanger your life.' You are not saved. Believe in the blood of Jesus Christ. It will set you free." ~Amen~.

ANI-HU

DEAR BROTHERS AND SISTERS

True knowledge of anything means as deep a union with your subject as that experienced in sexual intercourse. The knower, the known and the act of knowledge become one. You forget that you and your partner exist. You no longer think, but your mind is dissolved in the heat of the embrace.

It is perhaps in this sense that Meister Eckhart, the great German mystic, said that the Christian, in abandoning all things, must also abandon God. As long as you are still conscious of having a God, you have not yet become one with him.

The man who thinks and reasons about truth, shows by this that he does not possess it. Whoever has met King Truth, and has known his ardent kiss, does not seek the truth any longer, does not speak the truth, but is its very embodiment. Christ is no longer the object of your thoughts. You are his manifestation. Instead of being like Christ, you are identified with him. He is the light of the world. You are the light of the world. You are the same light.

St. Gertrude prayed: "I am you. You are I. I am not you, you are not I. I and you, we are a new being: an I-you."

Before I was put in the underground prison where I now am, I once stood at the window of my prison cell and cried: "Lord, where are you?" I had scarcely finished the last word, when I saw entering the prison yard my wife, with Bianca and another sister, who had come to inquire from the governor if I was in that prison. I had called to the Lord. Three sisters had come. Since then I have made it a habit to identify them and all true children of God with the Lord himself, and I know this is not a fancy.

Jesus himself identifies himself with us. "Whoever has fed, or given to drink, or clothed, or visited in prison one of these little brothers of mine, has done it to me." [MTT 25:31-40]

When Jesus met Saul of Tarsus, he asked him: "Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?" [ACT 9:4] Now the truth is that Saul had never persecuted Jesus. He had only persecuted the disciples. But Jesus knows no difference between himself and his disciples. When he speaks of his disciples, he does not use the third person. He says "me." He knows that I am he. And every Christian ought to know himself to be identical with Christ, a part of his mystical body.

So many people have helped me during my lifetime. I see the arm of the Almighty in all the arms which have been laid lovingly on my shoulder whenever I was depressed. God and the believing, good soul are one. Look at a believing soul, and you see the Lord himself.

Our Bibles translate ISA 48:12 with the words: "I am he. I am the first, I also am the last." The Hebrew words are: "~Ani-hu ani harishon af ani haaharon,~" which means, literally translated: An 'I-he' (a union between me and him) is the first, and an 'I' (which is only I) is the last."

I was once looking for the Presbyterian pastor in a certain town. I went to the church, but the caretaker told me that he lived some distance away. Some boys were playing in the churchyard. Overhearing our conversation, one of them offered to show me the pastor's house. While we were walking along, I asked him if he believed in Christ. The boy, aged fourteen, decidedly answered: "No." I asked him why. He replied in his childish manner: "I believe that if God created this good and meek and loving Jesus of two thousand years ago in Palestine, in whom we are meant to trust, he must have created some little Jesus in every generation in every place, so that in looking at the little Jesus we may believe in the big one. But I have never met a little Jesus. I am a poor child. My father is a drunkard and beats me. My mother is a washer-woman and has no time for me. I have never had a good suit. Nobody has ever bought me chocolate or sweets. I have had no toys. If God is almighty, why did he only make Jesus once? An almighty God could make many Jesuses. Then it would be easy to believe." I asked him again: "But isn't your pastor a Jesus?" The answer was as decided as the first: "No."

And so we arrived at the pastor's house. The boy left. I was alone with the pastor. I spoke with him about Christ. It was an uninteresting subject for him. Then I told him what the boy had said. The pastor exclaimed: "What an idiot!" wherewith I whole-heartedly agreed. Only I considered somebody else to be the idiot.

To be a Christian means to be an "Ani-hu," an "I-he," an intimate union between a human soul and Christ. Jesus said to Philip: "Have I been so long time with you and yet hast thou not known me? He that hath seen me, hath seen the Father." [JHN 14:9] In the same way, a Christian can say to anyone who has known him for a long time: "He that has seen me, has seen Christ."

Humanity, in its religious development, has passed through the so-called animist period. Primitive man believed every object of nature to be possessed of a spirit. We have now left behind this stage of development, just as little girls stop playing with dolls at a certain age. A Christian sees things in a realistic manner and leaves dolls to children.

Dolls are made of plastic. They have no understanding. It is useless to speak to them and dress them up. The brides of the heavenly king do not populate their minds with the objects of their imagination. We look cold reality straight in the face. We prisoners have cried out in our pain for years, without getting any answer. So many of the Lord's vineyards have been destroyed. The Lord has hidden his face from us.

As savages saw spirits behind every tree and in every stone, it is our sick imagination which evokes in our mind the presence of Jesus. Some see him in the bread and wine of Holy Communion and believe that a transubstantiation has occurred, or at least a consubstantiation as the Lutherans put it. We do not wish to acknowledge freely that the Heavenly King is not there. We cry in vain, as he cried in vain: "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?"

He is beyond the wall of partition which we ourselves have created between him and us by our sins. Beyond the wall are the angels. Only cold light comes from the stars, and dark thoughts whiten my hair.

It is so cold in the cell. am nearly frozen. The only living companion I had for a short while, a spider, froze. I live in a cold universe.

The only place where there is still life is deep within me. But is he not there? Is it not true that the one whom I seek in vain in the outward world, breaks the ice of silence in me; that Christ and God are in me, that my voice, my whispers or my yells which provoke the guards to reprisals, are their whispers and their yells?

Christ has promised that he will come to dwell in those who keep his commandments. I did not keep them fully but, notwithstanding, he came. He is much more generous than his word. Or perhaps with him remorse at not fulfilling the commandments is the same as fulfilling them.

Perhaps there is something else. I think he must have been bored in his empty heaven. I am his real heaven. Heaven is no heaven for him without me and others like me. And so he came. But he came.

I am an ~Ani-hu~. This gives me an enormous power to do good. In me is the living God.

Like St. Peter, I would exclaim: "Lord, it is good for us to be here!" [MTT 17:4] It is much better with you here in prison than when I was in the pulpit. Then I preached so many sermons and wrote so many books about you, that you had come to be a habit with me. I spoke and wrote so easily about Christian things that I had no need to pay attention to you.

And so you took me to the peak of the mountain, that is to this underground cell. Here you, and those who now take pleasure in gagging me even if I don't yell, taught me silence. So the startling thing happened, the mystical union, the realization of ~Ani-hu~.

Seek to attain this, my beloved brothers. Amen.

JESUS

In a luxurious bedroom embellished with flowers, in a kingly palace, a rather theatrical setting for love, the bride of the Song of Songs waited for Solomon to come.

We are sick of love for you in our prison cells.

She was surrounded by girls to wait on her. We are surrounded only by hatred and wickedness. Every day they mock and beat and torture us. It is years since I saw a man who loves me, or heard one single good word.

Jesus, leap over the mountains which separate us and come to your beloved ones! We perish. The spirit within us was quenched long ago. We don't have your Holy Book. Our eyes weep tears day and night.

Is it right that the One who cried "My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken me?," who knew himself the anguish of loneliness, should forsake us?

Jesus, a broken heart cries out to you. I am weary. Give me rest. You who can change a hell into paradise, who by the one word "I will" made a leper clean, give me quiet. Solomon gave maidens to wait on his bride. Give me angels to surround me, but, I beg you, angels whom I can see, not angels whose presence I always have to imagine.

Until a few weeks ago, I had at least the consolation of bringing souls to Christ by tapping the Gospel in morse code through the wall. The guards have found it out. And now they have emptied the cells on my right and on my left. My self has become entirely useless. I sit and wait for the passing away of this senseless life which consists in eating dirty soup twice a day and enduring boring beatings. Even these no longer have the thrill of novelty. The torturers have no imagination. The pains they inflict on us are always the same. They are senseless, too, because I have forgotten everything and could not tell them any secrets of the Underground church, even if I wanted to.

What people seek most in religion is to keep their self in eternity. I would like to get rid of my self and to become "you." If I lie sick of love and wait for you to come, it is not in the hope that you will give my self, which I abhor, eternal life but that you will take it from me. There will then be in my place another being, one loke you, one full of grace and truth.

In the past, I would spend hours thinking of what I would do if I were a king, a beggar, a millionaire, a girl; what I would do if I were the Pope, or the ruler of my country.

Now I dream more and more about what I will do when I am like you. Wlll I have to suffer again, even worse than now? You had a heaven and left it because on a speck of dust in your infinite universe there was a tiny creature, man, and this creature suffered. What if there should be suffering or rebellion again somewhere in what is wrongly called the universe (I would rather call it a pluriverse. It is so big and varied)? I would feel like you, and I would come to suffer for those who had rebelled. I would bear the infirmities of others, and take their sickness upon me. The prophecies of Isaiah would refer to me too. [MTT 8:16-17]

I was once your disciple. Then I became a worker in your harvest. There are three degrees in Christianity as in every profession, as in masonry. From being a disciple and worker, you advance to the higher degree. I have to become, like St. Paul, a "master builder." [1CO 3:10]

Woe to the disciples who never become workers, to the workers who never become masters. They are like perpetual students who never become doctors or engineers. What is the use of a violin player who does not try to become a virtuoso?

So you have brought me to prison to make me a master. But while the disciples dance after a day of labour, and the workers sleep, the master stays up late into the night to plan future work and to care for everything necessary. Masters have no peace. Will I, too, never have peace?

No, I cannot become like you if I continue to think these things. Was it by thinking that you became a man of sorrows? Or did it come to you in the simplest manner, through accepting what the Father willed for you?

The Catholic church says that you have a high opinion of scholastic theologians, that when St. Thomas Aquinas finished his ~Summa Theologica~ he heard your voice from heaven saying: "You have written well of me, Thomas."

To me they are all unacceptable. They made the truth too clear-cut. Of course, they could not know Heisenberg's theory of the indeterminacy of elementary particles. The standard of measurement changes the object measured. This is not only true in microphysics. A God whom I love is different from one who is unloved. With the pure, He is pure, with the froward, froward. [PSA 18:26] There is no absolute truth. Truth is a direction, not an attainment. The truth about God is different for every man.

But anyhow, the scholastic theologians made a difference between what they called in Latin ~mens agens~ (the active mind) and ~mens patiens~ (the passive mind). The active mind will pass through valleys, mountains and caves to find the truth. The passive mind lies sick of love and, like a magnetic tape, simply records what it hears.

While other Christians go forth to battle, the masters, those with passive minds, remain quietly in the most holy place of the temple. They know that a God who has to be defended by me, a God whose holy ark can be overthrown by oxen so that I have to keep it in its right place, is not worthy of the name "God." [2SM 6:6]

You need no defenders. You need no men armed with sticks to fight your cause. What you seek is worshippers in the highest sense, that is, lovers - men who love you, serenely and quietly, whatever is happening around and in them.

You seek for souls in whom are rest, quietness, immovability, for only these can mirror the splendours of heaven.

page 118 With God in Solitary Confinement

You were so greatly beloved by God because you mirrored in serenity his glory. You did not fear that you would become a man of sorrows. You did not even think about it. "Ehjeh asher ehjeh," said God to Moses. This may be translated not only as "I am what I am." It can also have the meaning, "I will become what I will become." When you are a son of God you become quietly whatever you become by the will of the Father and by the working of his laws. The source becomes a river, the egg becomes a bird, the bud a flower, the living being a corpse, the still sea becomes tempestuous, the tempestuous sea still. There is nothing to think about. I develop towards becoming you, as a caterpillar develops towards becoming a butterfly. "Ehjeh asher ehjeh." I will become what the laws of the divine nature of which I am a partaker will make me become. The caterpillar becomes what the law of his nature makes him become.

I was always so active. Finding no other means of achieving your aim, you arranged for me to have fifty-pound chains on my legs so that I am obliged to sit quietly at your feet, like Mary of Bethany.

The active mind always returns from its hunting parties empty-handed, like Esau, while Jacob, the passive mind, remaining at home, can buy Esau's birthright with a mouthful of soup.

Quietness is the antidote to all the sorrows of this life. It is also the antidote to the sorrows of prison life and a shield against the fear of future suffering.

Fighting is for those who are still caught up in the vanity of this world. In my subterranean cell I remain like Moses on the mountain top. I cannot keep my hands stretched upwards. I am too weak for this. I am alone. I have no Aaron or Hur to hold up my arms. But I stretch my heart upwards, and know that thus Israel becomes unconquerable.

I will lie sick of a burning love and make no effort to think what I will do when I become you. There is nothing in my cell to stimulate the active mind. The passive mind simply rethinks in quietness a thought which was thought long since by God.

page 119 With God in Solitary Confinement

We play back what was recorded on our minds long ago by the Holy Spirit.

Thank you, dear Jesus, for putting me in this solitary cell with the purpose of making me a master mind. Thank you for the paralyzing sickness of love. I wish for nothing else than that my self should pass away and that my last breath should take the shape of one more flower in the garland wherewith you are beautified. And if it should be the fate of this flower to wither away on another Golgotha, I have no need to worry about it now.

Now, I only love. Amen.

THE FULLEST SABBATH

page 123 With God in Solitary Confinement

MY DEAR SOUL

I must be really mad.

While I was free I visited many asylums for the insane. With some of the madmen one could have very pleasant conversations. Some of them were men of exceptional intelligence. Only sometimes, suddenly, they would give way for a time to unreasonable behaviour, which did not last for long.

I am reduced to the self-diagnosis of someone who is not a psychiatrist. No doctor has been to see me to tell me what is happening to me. Sometimes I am afraid of my lucidity. I have the impression not only that I can see and understand things rightly but that I can see right through them. As a matter of fact, I direct the interrogations. I make the interrogator ask me the questions that I like. I always succeed in diverting him from subjects where I am not at ease. I entice him into discussions lasting for hours about the relationship between Marxism and Christianity, until he forgets why he has called me. T feel that I could preach or write books as never before. And then, all at once, my mind becomes confused, darkened, filled with mad thoughts. I begin to yell without any obvious motive. I bang on the door of the cell crying: "Give me back my Mihai. Give me back my son."

Things seem to be getting worse and worse. It is a Sabbath day. This time I am not only in a strait-jacket and gagged but I have heavy chains at my feet which prevent me from walking. A Sabbath day. The fullest Sabbath I have ever enjoyed in my life. I cannot disturb my rest even by a movement of my hands, feet or lips.

At first I felt an impulse to ask God, as St. Theresa asked him: "Why do you treat us so? I don't wonder that you have not many friends." I wanted to tell God: "You may do everything in your power to destroy my trust and my love towards you, but you will not succeed." But then I decided to give him a rest. Let him also enjoy a full Sabbath, undisturbed by any reproaches of mine.

I will once again speak only to you, my soul, my only treasure. I hope this is not blasphemy, because I believe you to be one with Christ - with Christ who has humbled himself again, to be sin and man full of frailties within me. You are he, and therefore you are the jewel. In any case, I have no bishop, no theologians, no church elders to censor what I think. So I call you just what I like, my only treasure.

Enter into Sabbath, my soul. Overcome your anxieties and doubts. Your sins are forgiven. Not only the past sins but the future ones, too. If you don't believe me, believe Spurgeon. He also put it exactly like this. Although I wonder why you should believe Spurgeon more than me. Enter into Sabbath, my soul. You are saved from the fear of judgment. You don't even have to judge yourself. You can think about yourself entirely objectively, as if you were somebody else.

It is understood, forgiven, you must not worry about it, but it is simply not right that so much of your worship has been honouring God with my lips only, the heart remaining far from him. I don't reproach you for it. It could not be otherwise. Jesus said: "The hour is coming, and now is..." [JHN 4:23] We are not all of one piece. While for a part of our soul the hour to worship in spirit and in truth is already here, for another part it is still to come. Luther taught that we are "simul justus et peccator, comprehensor et viator" (at the same time righteous and sinners, men who have attained the goal and traveller towards it). I do not ask you, my soul, to judge and condemn yourself but rather to strive to love and worship with all your heart, with all your soul.

But, having in my heart both good and bad inclinations, how can I love God with all my heart? The answer of the Kabbala, the ancient mystic teaching of the Jewish people, is "Serve God also with your bad impulses, then you will serve Him whole-heartedly." If you understand, you understand. If you don't, no explanation will help.

But your religion must become a full reality. Even if you quarrel with God, as David and Job quarrelled with Him under similar circumstances, it must be a deeply religious, whole-hearted quarrel.

The prodigal son, when he returned home, did not stop at the house of an aunt, or a neighbour. He went through to the Father. Even to stop at Jesus is wrong. Jesus teaches that through him you must arrive at the Father, the Most High, the God of gods, the highest point of Jacob's ladder.

"Religion" comes from a Latin word which means "to tie again". Do you feel so tied to God, as I am tied in this strait-jacket and chains, that you cannot move unless he unties you?

Don't let words take the place of reality. In Hebrew, "davar" is a homonym which means "word" and "thing". The genius of the Hebrew language demands that words should be things. Don't forget, my soul, that it is your privilege to be a Jewish soul. Here, among the "internationalist" Communists, who had as the founder of their party an anti-semitic Jew, Marx, it means one more beating. But before God it means a great deal, and lays upon you a special responsibility.

Don't stay in the sphere of words and names. The name of one of the high priests who killed Jesus was Annas, which means in Hebrew "pity". And what a ruthless man he was!

Understand me well, my soul. I don't judge you, nor do I reproach you. Self-judgments are always false. Life is very complicated, and we always err in such judgments by applying to life only one criterion. In justice, human actions should be valued according to many criteria.

A word may not be truthful but it may be useful. It is rumoured that at the Teheran conference Churchill said: "Truth is so precious that it has to be surrounded by a numerous bodyguard of lies." A sentence dreadful to read. But I wonder who could win a war with military or diplomatic weapons without using deception. St. Paul used it when, after calling the high priest a "whitewashed wall" and putting him under a curse, he apologized, saying that he had not known him to be the high priest. He used deception when, in order to divide the Pharisees and Sadducess, he cried: "I am a Pharisee ... with respect to the hope and the resurrection of the dead I am on trial," which was not at all the issue. [ACT 23:3-6] He used deception, or if you prefer a milder word, diplomacy, in circumcising Timothy, although he had written that whoever practices the Jewish ritual falls from grace. There are other words of ours whose aim is not to impart truth but to lift men into the realm of mystery; others again may embellish life, or make it easier to bear. This is the case with works of art, and with funny stories. Some words may not be true, but they may be a valuable means of self-defence and of defending the innocent. Such are the words with which I lead astray my interrogators. There exist not only truth and lies. There are also intermediate stages between them.

Humility is sometimes right, and wrong at other times. What a catastrophe if Koch, the discoverer of the tubercle bacillus, had been humble enough to give in when all the members of the academies of science contested his discovery! He was self-asserting. So also was St. Athanasius. You cannot detect, in his debate with Arius the heretic, even the slightest sign of humility. In vain will you seek for it in Wycliff or Luther.

You cannot judge human actions according to isolated criteria like truthfulness, love, humility, or religiosity.

And then there is in our psyche an objective law. I cannot always do the things I want to do. There are natural reactions and impulses which I cannot master, as I cannot master the beating of my heart, the working of my kidneys and the movement of stars in the skies. They are not submitted to my will. Ancestral forces are battling within me. I am the descendant of men who for two thousand years have refused Christianity. It is not easy to implant it in a soul fighting against such an inheritance.

I don't judge you, nor condemn you, my soul, but I lay before you this noble task: be whole-heartedly Christian.

page 127 With God in Solitary Confinement

How? I really don't know. You can easily recognize false teachers by the fact that they know the answers to all the questions.

But perhaps my actual state could be an indication for you: enter into full Sabbath. Don't move at all, as I do not move. Lao Tse recommended inaction as the highest type of action.

Simply trust, knowing that Jesus holds in his hands the bridle of the ass.

I will tell you a story.

A preacher went on Palm Sunday to preach to a congregation of cowboys, who were used to taming wild horses. When he had finished telling how Jesus entered into Jerusalem on a foal which nobody had ridden before, and how he was received with shouts of joy and men waving palm-branches, the cowboys surrounded him, exclaiming: "Jesus was one of us! He too was a cowboy!" The preacher did not understand, so the cowboys explained: "If you rode on a donkey which nobody had ridden before, and thousands of people around you were shouting and waving branches in the donkey's face, you, pastor, would have finished up under the donkey! If Jesus could keep his donkey quiet, believe us, he had the strong hand and the skill of the cowboy."

Just leave the bridle in the hands of Jesus. He has made saints out of murderers and thieves. He can make you a saint, also, provided you leave him alone. It is the Sabbath. Don't hate. Always be like I am, gagged, only speaking out when it is for the honour of the Lord and for the good of His work.

It is the fullest Sabbath imaginable. Don't even be afraid of error. You are a pawn in the hands of a master chess-player. He will not lose the game.

Leave your remorse, the terrible "ifs": "If only I had acted otherwise." You could not have done otherwise. There is no free will. You are what heredity, education, social environment and the influences of good and bad angels have made you. In the last analysis, this means that at every stage of your development you are exactly what God meant you to be at that moment.

Leave your doubts. Life is incalculable. We don't know even one atom of the five octillions of atoms which make up our body. We don't know our genes. We don't know the complexities of our souls, nor what happens in our subconscious. You can remain in Sabbath only by trusting that your life has been calculated by the one who knows every drop of rain and every hair on my head. Every step of our pilgrim life is counted.

Trust in Him, even if He slays me. This is the only advice I can give you. ~Amen~.

There Is No God

(A MEDITATION)

Our oppressors say: "There is no God." The Communists ask us, too, to deny God as a condition of our release. I wonder if I should not do it.

Our experiences in Communist prisons have helped us to understand many parts of the Bible in a new way. I do not agree that we should consider all atheists fools because David wrote: "The fool hath said in his heart, there is no God." [PSA 14:1] First of all, even according to the Bible, it is only the man who says it in his heart who is a fool. He deserves the name because he does not say openly what he thinks. We cannot widen the use of the term to describe those who sincerely and openly tell us that their experience of life has made them convinced atheists.

The faith of some Christians around me has been destroyed by the weight of suffering. Job said: "Oh that my grief were thoroughly weighed, and my calamity laid in the balances together! For now it would be heavier than the sand of the sea ..." [JOB 6:2-3] Now there are once again prisoners in the adjoining cells. One Christian prisoner has just read me - in Morse code - a short poem entitled "God, I Forgive Thee". He composed it after passing through terrible torture. Others find more ease for their mind in simply denying that God exists, instead of accusing him or forgiving him. I cannot call these men fools.

And then, the facts of science known to us today were not known in David's time. Some modern scientists, analyzing the facts, have come to faith. Others in the same laboratory, having the same facts before them, have become atheists. In justice, we must say that the material reality is open to interpretation in both ways, just as there are two theories of the nature of light. Is it fair that one set of scientists should call the other a bunch of fools?

I believe. My Communist oppressor does not. That is all. He is an oppressor and I am not. But I have my sins which he has not, and these may be much more heinous than his. St. Paul considered himself the chief of sinners. I believe him when he says this, as I believe him in other things. It was he who was the chief of sinners, not Annas or Caiaphas, not Judas, not the Roman torturers and executioners. St. Paul knew facts about his own life which we do not know. He also knew all the horrible deeds of those who were responsible for the death of the Son of God. There was no false humility in him. If, after comparing what he knew about himself with what he knew about these others, he said that he was the chief of sinners, I have no reason to disagree with him.

Probably, the brothers who are free look on me as a martyr. They think of sermons which they have heard me preach. They have read some of my books. They have had pleasant talks with me. They don't know me. I know myself. I am no better than my torturers. Only my sins are in a different category.

The opinions of the oppressor are as valid as those of the oppressed. He disbelieves. I believe. He has the same rights as I. I cannot call him a fool.

Deny God? There is a sense in which any Christian can do it.

The great mystic teacher Meister Eckhart taught that a disciple of Jesus, after having left all for love of him, must at the end leave God, too. This seems to me to be self-evident. In the supreme moment of sexual union, those who are united are not conscious of the separate existence of the partner. In supreme moments of mystic union, I, the thinker, God, the object of my thoughts and the act of thinking become one. This is the fulfilment of "Hear, O Israel, the Lord thy God is one." It is only the man who has not yet united with God who has a God. In a sense, there is a religious atheism, transcending the stage in which a man has a God.

page 133 With God in Solitary Confinement

What have I asserted when I say that "God is"?

St. John Chrysostom said that the expression "God" is not the name of his being or of his existence, and that it is not possible to find the proper name of that being. St. Augustine says that it is not lawful to call God even "the inexpressible", because even by this you express something about Him.

Maimonides, and many others with him, thought that the best way to know God is the ~via negationis~, the way of negation, that is to deny everything about him which can be put in human words.

When Moffatt went as a missionary to Africa, he wished to explain a train to the natives who only knew the ox-cart. So he put two pieces of wood on the ground, to symbolize the rails. He put a few carts one behind the other. To the first cart he hitched a pair of oxen, and hung a steam kettle round the neck of one animal. This, he explained, represented a train. If anyone of his hearers had been bold enough to deny the existence of such a thing, he would have been right. and not the missionary.

So it is with God. Those who deny wnat we assert about God may be nearer to the truth than we are.

Human words grew out of the necessity for men to communicate with each other in hunting, cultivation or marriage. Then we projected words on to the spiritual realm, which is totally different. Words are inadequate - the word "God", too.

A monk once agreed with a brother that the one who died first would try to come back to describe what it is like in the other world. The first to die fulfilled his promise. When the living man asked him in Latin, "qualiter?" (how is it?), the answer was "totaliter aliter" (entirely otherwise).

Christians use words for the best attributes of God. About some other attributes - for example his terribleness ("the terror of the Lord" as the Bible calls it) and his revengefulness, they prefer to be silent, because they think that what is ugly in a human character must be unfit for God, too, a thought which I consider stupid. Many things which would be a shame for a child are allowable in a man. God cannot be put into words.

page 134 With God in Solitary Confinement

"The expressed Tao (God) is not the real Tao," says Lao-Tse.

If the Communists see in God only a word, and I myself do not believe in the word either, why not deny him and be free?

Formally, I would be right to do it, and I would do it if I did not fear that, by doing so, I would cause the most harm to my oppressors.

If I say "there is no God", towards what will they develop? What will be the aim of their life? The Bible says that when Christ will appear we shall be like him, and that those who overcome will sit with Christ and God on the same throne. I am developing towards Godhead, as the embryo develops towards man. If there were no man in the whole world but only one male and one female child, you could not say that mankind did not exist. There would soon be a man. If I develop rightly, there will soon be a Christ, a godly being, sitting on a heavenly throne.

If I deny God I cause my torturer to lose such an opportunity for development. I leave him no aim in life, and cause him to lose his soul, with the huge potentialities hidden within it.

The Hindus call God "No, No," in the sense that he is nothing of what we presume him to be. Even if there is no God, I will think only about him, about how a world with God would be. I will never forsake God as my aim.

I owe it to my Communist torturers to confess to them in words which they can understand the one who is mystery for myself, about whom nobody can tell the "when" and the "how", who is inaccessible, incomprehensible even to religious geniuses, and who can reveal himself only in the etymological sense of the word "re-veal", that is to put another veil upon his face by reducing himself to the ridiculously humble sphere of words.

No, I will not deny him. My mind does not know who he is or where he is. When I was strung up by my arms with my toes barely reaching the floor, and under other similar tortures, I had no evidence that he exists. I was inclined to accuse him as St. Theresa, the great Christian mystic, dared to accuse him before me: "O Lord, no wonder you have so few friends when you treat them so hard." But I believe in the incomprehensible and terrible one. I believe that he is love, although at this moment I feel nothing of his love. I have to believe in its expression in a sacrifice two thousand years ago. I will not leave him, nor deny him, even if he leaves me.

The Unreasonableness of Love

DEAR BROTHERS AND SISTERS

I once met a woman who was a missionary in Africa. She was renowned for her extreme zeal in the service of the people. At first, we chatted on the surface of things. Then deep spoke to deep. I was able to ask her: "What is it that prevents you from sitting down quietly to pass hours and days with the Christ whom you love? What drives you to leave him and rush into outward activity?"

I had touched a sore point. She admitted she was overzealous because she was not sure of the rightness of what she was doing. She told me: "Jesus said, 'If ye were blind, ye should have no sin.' [JHN 9:41] I went to a blind people, Muslims who, not knowing about Christ, did not have the sin of unbelief. God could not reproach them for their wrong belief, since they had not heard of a better one. Now I tell them about Christ. With almost no exception, they refuse my message. But they have heard it. So their sin remains. By my missionary activity I am doing them harm rather than good. It is impossible to convert Muslims. Then why burden them with a knowledge which they cannot accept?"

She loved those Muslim people. But she had brought her love and her concern for their salvation to the bar of reason. Once you allow reason, which Luther called "the beast", to judge feelings, feelings are always defeated. From the point of view of reason Romeo was a fool. How can you prove to reason that it is right to die for a Juliet when in Verona there are thousands of Rosalindas who are just as charming?

Reason will tell you about the foolishness of the cross. Jesus was young, handsome, vigorous. He could have made a good living as a carpenter, or as a doctor of the law. He could have married, and enjoyed life, and still remained religious and a philanthropist. Why die to save people who do not want to be saved? Why start a religion which will not be accepted, or even heard of, by the overwhelming majority of mankind, and which will be practised only by a few isolated saints?

Who would conceive such an unreasonable project? Only St. Paul dared to answer this question. A chill runs down your spine when you hear the answer. This plan of salvation arose from "the foolishness of God" [1CO 1:25] The Bible is the only religious book to contain such an expression, which must surely be considered a blasphemy by all the religions of the world, including Christianity – "the foolishness of God!"

Love must submit to being condemned by reason. I told my missionary friend: "Just follow the promptings of love. Don't try to justify your actions by arguments."

We in prison use the same unreasonableness. When we hear the cries of someone being beaten, all the others begin to bang on their doors, crying: "Help! Help! Stop beating!" There is nobody to hear us, except those who are beating and who now, instead of beating only one, beat us all up, one after the other. You hear the doors being unlocked. Now it is the fourth prisoner to my right. Follows the third. I have only two left. Then I hear the cries of my nearest neighbour. Only two or three minutes left – how long these minutes are – and then I will be beaten, too. What is the sense of a collective protest here? What is the sense of expressing your solidarity with those who are beaten? It is non-sense, which means that it is pure love. Love does not think about what it will achieve, what it will gain. Love does not think at all. Love does not care about reason. Why should it?

If we are to love our enemies, why should we not love reason, that bitter critic, too? We can succeed in doing this. But we shall never persuade reason to love love. Reason considered Jesus and Paul to be madmen. My reason condemns me as mad, too.

This time I attained a paroxysm of unreasonableness. When the guards entered to give me my share of the beating I jumped at one of them and kicked him. I am so thin. They are so many. It was foolish. Reason tells me: "Christ taught you to turn the other cheek." I answer: "Shut up! I have to turn the other cheek when I am slapped, not when my brother is tortured and my whole nation is oppressed."

Now I am punished to stay, I don't know for how long, in a cell I have known about for some time. It is full of dozens of rats which, being hungry, jump around, not allowing me to sleep.

I have just passed the first hours here. I am not tired. I watch the rats and am reminded of Heisenberg's law of the undeterminacy of elementary particles. (How foolish to think about physics in such circumstances.) When you boil water, you know that the mass of molecules as a whole enters into quicker movement. But what each single molecule will do is unpredictable. Some continue to move at the old speed, and some even slow down their movements. I observe the same thing happening with the rats. I had thought about them as a species. But rats are also individuals, and each one has a character of its own. Some are running around looking for food which does not exist. Some are trying to gnaw the rags I have on my feet. I don't even drive them away. Some are gnawing their own tails. Some seem like philosophers, resigned. They sit quietly and wait for their death. They have given up the search.

Dear rats! It is written: "The young lions roar after their prey, and seek their meat from God." [PSA 104:21] And God gives them their meat. Sometimes he gives them as meat the bodies of his saints. And why not? If a saint eats the meat of a guiltless lamb in a religious ceremony, why should not his own turn come, and his own guiltless life be eaten up by a lion? Shouldn't you, rats, also seek your meat from God? I used to recite in church every Sunday that God is the maker of all things, visible and invisible. So he is your maker too, although I don't see the slightest reason why rats should exist. But neither do the Communists see any reason why Wurmbrand should exist. God's thoughts are not my thoughts.

page 142 With God in Solitary Confinement

It is said that St. Francis of Assisi made the birds praise God at his command. St. Anthony of Padua is supposed to have called the fish near to the shore to listen to his sermons. What about rats?

Ha, ha, ha! Here you have it, Richard. Your jailers are right to put you in a strait-jacket occasionally. You are definitely mad. Everything you have just said is sheer foolishness. I agree, but I only ask myself if it is not "the foolishness of God".

I don't ask you, reason, if my love and care should extend to rats, too. I too would say that they should be exterminated. They eat the crops needed by us men. They would say: "The farmers eat the crops needed by us rats." But then they are carriers of disease. I wonder how they would defend themselves for that.

My mind is getting more and more confused. Probably I shall yell soon.

My mind jumps about from molecules to rats. Now it has forgotten the rats and thinks about Western Christians. I remember the tragic word in Philippians: "No church communicated with me." [PHP 4:15] Why are we abandoned by the Western Christians?

Their reason, probably, tells them that they could do nothing practical for us. But why do they follow reason, which Luther called "the beast" and not love? Why don't they come to free us, with the risk that they will be defeated and suffer the same fate as us? Their strategists may tell them that the balance of power is not in their favour. But since when has love consulted strategists? Why does not a group of a thousand Western Christians come as tourists, attack our prison, rush into the corridors and tell us: "We have not forgotten you. We love you"? It may be a foolish enterprise. But from our side it was also a foolish thing to bang on a cell door when our brother was beaten.

And then, the Western Christians all have their guardian angels. Each has six wings, which means that they are prepared to fetch messages. Why don't they send their guardian angels to caress our weary heads and to tell us about love? I feel the nearness of such angels, but when I ask them where they come from they are nearly always from another prison cell or from a brother in Rumania itself. Can angels from the West be stopped at the Iron Curtain? How big are their wings? Are they the wings of a chicken, which cannot fly, or the wings of an eagle ?

Where is the unreasonableness of love? If these Christians are partakers of the divine nature, why are they not also partakers of the foolishness of God?

Foolish questions, dear brothers and sisters. If I spoke to you tonight it was to teach you one thing: dare to walk in the foolish, completely unreasonable, paths of love! St. Augustine said: "Love God, and do what you will." Love, and your foolish actions will be wiser than the wisdom of men. Amen.

The Lesson of the Cell with the Rats

page 147 With God in Solitary Confinement

DEAR BROTHERS AND SISTERS

Communication between us was interrupted for a while.

God, in ancient times, sent an angel who shut the lions' mouths so that they did not hurt Daniel. I am sure he did the same for me. The angel was sent. But angels are unpredictable beings. If on their way they see a flower whose petals are weighed down by heavy rain, they will stop to put the flower straight again. They will pause to dry someone's tears, or to help an overburdened donkey to carry its load. If they meet a child, they stop to caress him. My angel did not arrive in time. The mouths of the rats were not shut. Because of them, I could not concentrate.

Happily, I did not stay with them long, only for forty-eight hours. Then I was taken back downstairs to my own cell. Going down to it was like approaching heaven.

It was no mystery to me that heaven was below rather than above.

I once had a vision of being led to heaven. I had thought until then that heaven was above. But a beautiful female angel who lovingly showed me the way explained to me that, because heaven was too high for many to reach, because so many could not bear the cold of the heavenly peaks, heaven descended in the person of Jesus Christ until it was lower than every lowness. However low a man may have fallen, heaven is even lower. A man can be in heaven not only in moments of sublime rapture but also when he commits a gross sin. The publican who said in the temple: "God, be merciful to me, a sinner," went down to his house justified. [LUK 18:14] Nowhere are we told that he ceased to be a publican. He never voiced such a desire. But, because he prayed rightly, heaven descended below him, to the level of publicans who were worse extortioners than he. He could be in heaven, while still remaining, for a time at least, a publican.

page 148 With God in Solitary Confinement

So I found it quite natural that the cell with the rats should be above, and that my own cell, this beautiful place of serenity, should be below.

My quiet cell to which I descend is a higher heaven. But even the cell with the rats is not outside heaven. "In God we live and move." [ACT 17:28] If in God we move, Christians who are moved into torture cells and out of them again never leave God and his heaven.

How can even a cell with rats be heaven? It is about this that I want to speak to you today.

Jesus said on the cross: "My God, my God, why didst thou I forsake me?" [MRK 15:34 RV margin] Notice carefully the tense of the verb. He did not say: "Why dost thou forsake me?" He used the past tense. He was speaking of an episode already in the past, not of what was happening at that moment. But was it not at that moment that God had forsaken him, because he had become the personification of sin? Was not the cross, Golgotha. the place of forsakenness?

Yes, but I experienced the days with the rats not as the present, but as a past to which I looked back. Not only did I believe that we, Christians, are seated in heavenly places. My faith – or, if you prefer it, my imagination, or my madness – showed me many heavenly places of indescribable beauty. I chose a site, and deliberately sat down. It was a "green bed", [SOS 1:16] and beside me was "my beloved, fair and pleasant". This heavenly place, filled with delights, was my present state in the cell of the rats, and will remain my state in all eternity. Then what about the rats? They could only be my past. I looked on their gnawing as on a past suffering which worried me, my real being, my spirit, as little as the spanking which I had received from my mother thirty-five years earlier. It was over and done with.

That is why Jesus, while on the cross he was passing through the worst of sufferings – being forsaken by his God – used the past tense. He said that he had been forsaken, not that he was forsaken at that moment.

Every man can construct a future for himself, even if it is only "a castle in Spain". But an imaginary castle in Spain is a very real castle. You can sometimes be much happier in it than the owners of real castles are.

In the same way I can construct for myself an imaginary past (except that I don't consider it as imaginary, but as a spiritual reality), and I can situate the present suffering, the cross or the cell with the rats, in this past. Huss, Cranmer and other saints in heaven no longer feel the pain of being burned at the stake, because this belongs to the past. Jesus no longer feels the pain of being scourged and nailed to the cross. Golgotha is a past episode of his eternal life. And he lived it as a past even when he was on Golgotha.

I would build too much on the fact that the verb ~sabachthani~ is in the past tense, if it were not for my own experience and that of many Christian sufferers. There is a "religious anaesthesia". It was this that enabled Paul and Silas to sing after a heavy beating and with their feet in the stocks.

And then there followed another stage. The rats may have remained so far as my body was concerned, and perhaps the lower faculties of simple aperception of the soul. My knowledge of them disappeared.

At the marriage feast in Cana, Jesus changed water into wine. What sort of wine? It is recorded that he changed it into "good wine". The ruler of the feast said: "Thou hast kept the good wine until now." [JHN 2:10] Only old wine is good wine. So he did not change the water into new wine. He made it to have been wine already for many years. You don't become a saint when you are converted. Jesus changes water into old wine. He makes the harlot Magdalene to have always been a saint. He does not make the torture cease at a certain moment. He makes the torture never to have begun. He does not seat you in holy places the moment you realize it practically. He makes it that you have always been seated there.

Men can change for good or evil the present or the future of their fellow-men. Jesus is the only one who can change the past. So the cell with the rats no longer existed, even in the past. The spirit had detached itself from outward reality and enjoyed the Bridegroom.

When they unlocked the door to take me out, I awoke. I saw the rats. I was afraid, and thought it would be heaven to be taken out of there. But it was only for a few minutes that I was out of heaven, while the guards unlocked the door, entered and made me come back to what they call reality and what I consider to be just a nightmare.

Live actual sorrows as though they were past. Believe that Jesus has changed your whole past, wiping out of it everything that is ugly and sad. This is the key to happiness, and I found it in the blessed cell with the rats.

It is this discovery that I wished to share with you. Amen.

Talk with My Son Mihai

MIHAI

When the holy virgin entered into Elisabeth's house, her babe leaped for joy. Was this something exceptional? Do babies understand? In Yugoslavia a few years ago a miracle child was born, who spoke and answered questions at six weeks. The Bible says: "Out of the mouth of babes and sucklings thou hast perfected praise." [MTT 21:16]

In any case, your mother and I talked to you about God from the time you were a baby. We believed that you would understand.

Now you are eleven. Now you certainly understand. You know how much I love you. For hours on end I caress my pillow and talk to it, imagining that it is you. Jesus said that a piece of baker's bread was his body, and that wine bought from a pub was his blood. Why can't my pillow be you? Every material object can support a spiritual reality. Jesus is a door and light and a lion and a lamb. Spiritual realities can express themselves through all kinds of things, even contradictory ones.

As I embrace the pillow it becomes warm, and then I have the same feeling as I had when I pressed your body to mine when you were small. I sing and talk to you. The pillow becomes the conductor through which love streams from me to you. No, it is not the conductor. Here again reason is trying to set right my feelings. It is you, you yourself.

Mihai, the end has arrived. I cannot bear it any more. I have saved thirty pills. The torture has become too painful. I am afraid that I will crack. I will take the pills and go to the one whom you once, as a child of five, saw walking through the room. I will go to that one who said: "I am the resurrection and the life." [JHN 11:25]

He never forbade suicide. He could not. He himself committed a sophisticated form of suicide. He said it himself: "No man taketh my life from me ... I lay down my life for the sheep." He provoked his own death. He asked wolves to become lambs, which is not in their power. The only possible result, which he foresaw, was that the wolves had to devour him. His intention was that, devoured by them, he might produce from within the change which nobody can make of his own free will.

He will understand my suicide. And you will understand it one day, too, even if not for many years. You will have to remain fatherless, as I was left without a father at the age of nine.

I read somewhere that ninety per cent of famous men were orphan children. You complained to me once: "Father, you know the answers to all my questions. You stop me thinking for myself because you are always right." I will no longer stand in the way of your development. My suicide can work for your good.

My last word to you, Mihai, is: "Love the Lord Jesus." You cannot do without him.

We have a telegraph system that functions perfectly from cell to cell. So we learn that the Communists are putting more and more of their own people in prison. These are men who have sinned against Communist ethics, against the rules of the Party. The Communists also have their moral code. It demands full obedience to the Party line. Everyone acknowledges a moral code. Thieves share fairly what they have stolen together. Torturers hold it their duty to be ruthless against the class enemy. And everyone disobeys his moral law. It is a fact that Goering, the killer of millions of Jews, saved the life of one Jewish family. He was not loyal to his anti-semitism. Our guards sometimes do us some little favour, or disobey the Party line in some other manner, just as Christians accept the Christian standard, but sin in one matter or another. Nobody can avoid sin. Even if a man's religion were the devil's own, with the firm decision to commit every mortal sin daily, he would sometimes have a moment of weakness and allow one possible victim to escape. So he would sin against his religion.

I don't know what your future religious development will be. Perhaps Mother is in prison, too. Perhaps the Communists will poison you with atheism. Perhaps, being brought up on the streets, you will become a delinquent. Maybe you will become a saint. But I have many saints around me. They are also sinners, and their only righteousness is that they have a part in the forgiveness of sins.

Mihai, you will need the only one who can forgive sins. Even non-Christians know the forgiveness of sins. They grant it to themselves after every deed which their own conscience considers ugly. But when I, a crook, grant myself, the crook, forgiveness for my crookedness, then I, the crook, am clever enough not to believe the absolution given to me, the crook, by me, the crook.

Only the Righteous One can absolve me from sin. You will sin, Mihai, whatever you become, whatever you believe. You will need a saviour, even if you become an atheist, because you will sometimes sin against your atheism. Nobody is a consistent atheist twenty-four hours a day. One atheist lecturer confessed to me how frightened he was when he had to speak against God in a former church building now turned into a club. Sadly, there is no atheist God. This man would have needed forgiveness for the sin of having wavered in his godless belief.

Mihai, you will need a saviour. Life will teach you that, in a greater or less measure, all men are liars. This will make you disbelieve any salvation brought by men. You need God as saviour. It is written that God has purchased the church with his own blood. [ACT 20:28] God became man, had blood, and shed it for our sins. Only this can save you.

He is a God, and therefore beyond our understanding. When you were small you could not understand why I would not let you throw a watch on the floor. It would have made such a nice noise. I showed you a poem by our greatest poet, Eminescu, and asked you what it was. You answered: "Black letters on white paper." That was all it was for you at that time. You did not know how to read.

So you cannot read the writing of God's providence. You will have to suffer, and you will not understand why. You may be even now picking food from a garbage heap, while in some rich countries the garbage vans carry away wasted food. You may be driven to despair. Perhaps you will one day sit in prison, too.

Because he is a God, his ways must be mysterious, as the doings of the scientist are mysterious to the illiterate. I have no idea why I have had to suffer so much.

But what I do know is that God is determined to make you and me into masterpieces. It took Goethe forty years to perfect ~Faust~. Leonardo da Vinci worked for decades on the "Gioconda". I told you the story of the first, and I showed you the picture. Eminescu rewrote some thirty times his great poem "The Morning Star". God's hammer and chisel will hurt you again and again. The sculptor does not tell the marble what he intends to make out of it. When you have become a masterpiece of grace, admired by angels, you will understand the suffering.

Not understanding, only believing, cling to Jesus, the divine Saviour. The scars on his hands are the proof of his love towards you. The hand which strikes you bears the marks of wounds endured for you. Believe that your suffering is necessary for your own good and for the good of the whole of which you are only a small part.

And, bought by a sacrifice, lead a life of sacrifice. The sacrifice of Christ is not enough. St. Paul said: "I fill up on my part the penury of the afflictions of Christ." [COL 1:24] What an amazing word - the penury of his afflictions. To be rejected by your own people, betrayed by your own disciple, deserted by nearly everyone, to be scourged, crowned with a crown of thorns, crucified and reviled - this is "a penury of afflictions"! What then would a richness of afflictions be? But St. Paul uses the same Greek word as is used in the Gospels about the widow who gave out of her penury. Many thousands of others have to sacrifice their liberty and lives to make the cross of the Lord known. Otherwise it is condemned to remain a poor thing unable to save mankind.

Choose, Mihai, the way of sacrifice. I cannot. I am deserting to another world. Do better than me, Mihai. Bear what I could not bear. Love Jesus and endure to the end.

Mihai, make Mother happy. Tell her that I loved her and that I am sorry I have sometimes been unkind to her.

Note: In his book ~In God's Underground~ the author narrates how at the last minute the guards unknowingly took from his cell the mattress in which he had hidden the death-bringing pills.

Sermon to the Churches in the West

page 160 blank

page 161 With God in Solitary Confinement

MY DEAR BROTHERS AND SISTERS IN THE WEST

The one who is speaking to you is a Christian isolated in a Communist prison cell.

For two years I have been speaking by spiritual telepathy to my former church congregation, and I believe it works.

Now I have decided to go one step further, and to speak to you who are in distant lands.

In order to succeed, I have kept silent for a long time. I have ceased to deliver sermons to my own people. I have ceased for a longer time even to speak to God. I did not allow any inner voice to disturb the quiet. I kept silence inwardly and outwardly. I remembered that, before the fall of Jericho, Joshua ordered the people: "Ye shall not shout, nor make any noise with your voice, neither shall any word proceed out of your mouth, until the day I bid you shout." [JOS 6:10] When the people shouted after such a prolonged silence, the wall fell down flat. [JOS 6:20] How far you can reach in the spirit depends on how long you have been silent.

The voice of Jesus reached the whole world and is still heard after two thousand years, because he imposed silence on himself until the age of thirty. Silence, although he had so much to sayl

I have been silent for your sake. Now listenl

The man who has a narrow horizon cannot think rightly. A man who knows only what is happening in his own room may be killed the next moment by someone who has already penetrated into the next room with the intention of murdering him. If your horizon is your parish, your denomination or your country, you are doomed. What if another country has already prepared the weapons to kill you? What if some other religion has valuable insights unknown to you, which may prove that it can assure salvation?

Only the strategist who knows what is happening on the whole front can think correctly. "The world is my parish," said Wesley. The world (not in the sense of the earth, but of the cosmos), with all its inhabitants and its creator, is the horizon of the Christian. He does not stop at less than that.

Don't tell me that such a wide horizon is only for the highest church leaders, and not for rank-and-file Christians. There is no such thing as a rank-and-file Christian, because every Christian is of the highest rank. Every Christian is a partaker of the divine nature. God doesn't put anyone away in a file in the archives. There are no rank-and-file Christians. Christians think in terms of the whole cosmos and its creator, as they think in terms of infinity and eternity.

I, in my solitary cell, in the grip of the tuberculosis which has invaded my whole body, sit with the angels as in a theater and watch everything that is happening, that has happened, and is yet to happen. I continue to be attached to my body only by a very weak fluidic tie. My spirit has escaped from the bedlam in which mankind with its accursed mentality is doomed to live.

Now I see reality as it is: a burden which I have to bear.

If God is in me, the whole responsibility of the cosmos becomes mine. "If a man love me, he will keep my words: and my Father will love him, and we will come unto him, and make our abode with him." [JHN 14:23] Don't tell me, Satan, that I have not kept his words. You don't know our human vocabulary. Jesus did not lay down as a condition for his abiding with us that we fulfil his word, but just that we keep it. I have not fulfilled it, but I have kept it unaltered. I have not accommodated Bible verses to my sins, but when I have committed sins I have left the word unaltered. Like David, I danced before the ark containing the tables of the commandments which I have broken in my personal life. But David did not abuse his royal powers to change the commandments.

So God abides in me. If he abides in me, he brings with him all his responsibilities. They become mine. That is why Jesus says that I have the power to remit sins or to retain them, [JHN 20:23] to bind and to loose. [MTT 16:19] If God lives in me and in you, it depends on us whether beauty will conquer, or whether mankind will deteriorate more and more.

If God the Father and Jesus Christ abide in a Christian, it becomes his task to change the perverted, the immoral, the obsessed, the ambitious, the robbers; to transform a neurotic world into a world full of serenity.

If the Father abides in me, every time anyone in the world says an "Our Father", he addresses the Godhead within me, too. I feel the prayers of all mankind addressed to me, as if my address – Cell number eleven in the prison of the Ministry of Interior Affairs in Bucharest – is in fact God's address.

I used to wonder why the Church repeats the Lord's prayer so often. Now I understand. Every time I say it, I am reminded that mankind expects me and my brethren, the bearers of Godhead, to make his kingdom come – his kingdom of righteousness and joy. We have to see that his will is done on earth. We have to provide the hungry with the bread of life. We have to forgive.

Now I see the explanation of the words "Lead us not into temptation". God tempts nobody. But Godhead is in me. And I might tempt my fellow-man to sin. In saying these words, I am reminded of the many who wish to keep their innocence and pray to God that they may not be tempted. The prayer is addressed to me, too, because God is in me. I must not tempt.

It is I, and you, who must deliver the world from evil.

It was prophesied that God would gather the scattered Jews back into their former land. God did not do it from heaven. There was a man: Theodor Herzl. He created the Zionist movement, and this gave birth to the Jewish state, where Jews are now gathered from all countries. God brought it about through the Zionist leaders, and through the pioneers who brought their young lives as a sacrifice.

Men pray, "Deliver us from evil." Don't wait for a God in heaven to do this! Godhead is in you, as it is in me. The prayer is addressed to you, too. You must deliver mankind from the evil one. God's responsibilities are yours.

You, brothers and sisters in the West, are free. Don't you know about the evils of Communism? Some of you may be indifferent. But there is something worse than indifference. It is indifference to indifference. Some of you may not even care that the Church has become indifferent to the cries of millions of men martyred by the Communists.

When I say the prayer "Deliver us from evil", I don't address it to a God somewhere far away in heaven. I address it to you, those in whom God abides. All our prayers in these underground dungeons are an appeal to you, too. The Kabbala says: "God with Israel is God. God without Israel is not God." Even the greatest violinist can produce perfect music only if he has a good violin. What could he do without a good violin? What can God, to whom I pray, do if all his workers are on strike and his soldiers refuse to fight?

I see you congregated in your churches and praising God in beautiful songs. But why don't you leave God alone? According to the Talmud, God says: "O, that men would forget me and begin to love each other."

Don't you heed the word of Scripture? "To what purpose is the multitude of your sacrifices unto me?" saith the Lord: "I am full of burnt offerings... Bring no more vain oblations ... Learn to do well ... relieve the oppressed." [ISA 1:11-17] To relieve Christians oppressed by the Communists is a much more pleasing divine service than your holy masses and liturgies.

Abou Ben Adhem awoke one night from a dream – so runs the legend – and saw an angel writing in a golden book. He asked: "What writest thou?" The angel replied: "The names of those who love the Lord." He asked if his name was there, and the angel told him, "No." And so he begged:

page 165 With God in Solitary Confinement

"I pray thee, then,

Write me as one who loves his fellow men."

The angel wrote, and vanish'd. The next night

It came again with a great wakening light,

And show'd the names whom love of God had blest,

And lo! Ben Adhem's name led all the rest.

[Leigh Hunt, ~Abou Ben Adhem~]

Jesus said that the second commandment, to love your neighbour, is like the first, to love God. If you love us, the oppressed Christians in the Red camp, you love God, because God is within us, in cell eleven, and twelve, and thirteen, and in the cell with the rats and in the cell reserved for tortures.

I cannot tell you what to do for us. The pastors among us have been smitten, and the sheep are scattered. Care for these sheep, gather them in. Our Bibles have been confiscated. Our families eat garbage. I don't know how you can reach them. But you are the abode of the almighty and omniscient God. He must know. I speak to God. That means I speak to you. I say an "Our Father". Listen, it is addressed to you: "Our Father, which art in heaven." What heaven is more beautiful for him than your believing soul? He is in you. "Deliver us from evil." Communism is evil.

Brothers and sisters from the West, deliver us. Amen.

JESUS

I wonder if Greek or Indian mythology is simply a collection of fantasies, or if it contains a dim apprehension of spiritual reality.

Has Agni, worshipped in India as the god of fire, any real existence? They call him god. I would rather call him angel. But I like him. And is it possible that you can exclude from heaven one being who pleases me, your beloved?

Queen Isabella of Spain said to Columbus: "I don't know if the land you go to seek exists. But if it does not exist, I am sure God will create it as a reward for your faith."

So, if Agni is only a mythological figure, you can make him exist, just in order to give me pleasure.

I like him because of the following story. It is said that, in the course of a severe persecution of his worshippers, one of them was burned at the stake. His soul came to heaven, but Agni refused to admit him. The believer protested: "But don't you know that I gave my life under torture for you?" "I know," replied Agni, "but while you were burning, you did not rejoice."

Don't you like this story? It reminds me of how you went to Gethsemane singing psalms.

I can imagine how sad you must be when a Christian who has died in prison comes to tell you how he has borne the cross for you, and has two witnesses to this fact: Brother Murmuring and Sister Disputing. You sang when you went to face your arrest.

Neither can I imagine your mother as ~mater dolorosa~, the grieved mother weeping at the foot of the cross. She taught you from childhood that you were the Suffering Servant, that you would die by crucifixion, but would rise with the knowledge of having redeemed mankind. I see her going before you on the way to Calvary, singing to you psalms of encouragement, while the uninitiated daughters of Jerusalem wept.

page 170 With God in Solitary Confinement

She was a Jewess. On the very evening of your crucifixion the Passover ritual must have been performed in the house of St. John, during which the ritual prescribed singing. She must have sung on that day and, as she is holy, I believe that she did it whole-heartedly.

Before my arrest I saw certain mothers of young Christians who were in prison. Their faces shone for joy. They considered it a privilege to have martyrs for sons. The holy virgin must have been even more exalted.

So let us forget for a while, Jesus, that you and I are in prison. I am very sorry we are detained in a cell. Because it is your character to stay with your little brothers, if one of them is in a damp and dreary prison cell, you have to stay in prison, too. I may get a heavy sentence. You may have years of prison before you. You know it is not my fault. If you stand and knock at the door of a free man, it depends on him whether he opens the door or not. You knew that you would knock on my cell door in vain. The guards keep the key. So you came in through the locked door. Then you invited me to sup with you, which was good. But afterwards you wished to sup with me. I had not much to offer you. We have one slice of bread a week, and every day a bowl of dirty soup.

But let us forget all that, and do what prisoners all over the world do when they have company in their cell. They try to have a bit of fun.

I will begin by telling you a joke. You must have heard many jokes at the marriage feasts and in the houses of publicans, and you must have enjoyed at least some of them.

An elderly lady once accidentally sat on her false teeth and broke them. Her husband was in dismay. "What a catastrophe! What will you do now?" She answered: "Don't worry. Let us look on the bright side. It is better to sit on your false teeth than on your natural ones."

What optimism!

This reminds me to tell you the difference between an optimist and a pessimist. The optimist says: "Under this Communist regime we shall all become beggars." The pessimist replies: "But who shall we beg from?"

Come, Jesus, can't I make you laugh a little? True, the gospels speak of your weeping, and never about your laughter. But how is it, then, that children flocked round you? Children are not attracted to sad men.

I will tell you another story. This is sure to make you laugh.

A sultan once drove in a luxurious carriage over a bridge. The horses were frightened, overthrew the carriage, and the sultan fell into the river. On the bridge sat a beggar named Osman. He could not imagine the world without the sultan. So he jumped into the water and saved the sultan's life. Another carriage was brought, and the sultan invited the beggar to sit at his side, as an honour for saving his life.

While they were driving towards the palace, the sultan said: "Osman, I owe you my life. So I have decided to give you a sack full of gold coins. You will be happy and always remember me before Allah in your prayers. Are you satisfied with this reward?" The beggar was delighted, but the sultan regretted having promised so much. So he said: "It is not good for you to have so much money. You might be killed by robbers. I had better give you a hundred sheep. You will eat their meat and drink their milk and remember me before God. Are you satisfied with this?" The beggar, having no choice, agreed. But the sultan again regretted his generosity, and said: "There may be an epidemic, and your sheep will die. I had better give you a small hut. There you will live in peace and pray for me. Are you satisfied with this?" The beggar was happy to have at least a hut. But even this seemed too much for the sultan. By this time the carriage had entered the palace yard. The servants ran to meet it. The sultan said: "Give this man a good beating. Then he will surely remember me for his whole life."

You are weeping, Jesus. Isn't the story amusing?

I am sorry I have made you sad. Instead of laughing, you are crying. I should have thought of that. I have just remembered Dostoievsky's ~Idiot~, the best portrait of a Christian character. He never laughed.

You are weeping bccause you see that my teeth have decayed through lack of sun and calcium. You thought of this, when I told you the joke about the false teeth. You are weeping because men rule over great countries, transforming other men into beggars, wiping out the rich instead of wiping out poverty. You did not enjoy the joke about optimism and pessimism. You weep because you yourself have been the victim of ingratitude. You were whipped like poor Osman because you saved lives. It was very tactless of me to tell you such a story.

How will you appear before the god Agni, Jesus? He will reproach you, too, for not being joyful. Just take it as another joke. I know the truth. Agni will appear before you, not the other way round. But the Indian religion is a very old one, older than the one you established. Old religions are very daring, and Agni might forget his position of utter inferiority before you. He might question you.

But until then, may I tell you something very frankly? You insist on sharing my cell. But it is not funny to be with you in here. Under the Nazis, I had many cell companions. Some of them made me forget all my sufferings. They knew how to make me laugh.

I have tried to make you laugh, but it is not possible. I wonder how it was in the furnace, in Daniel's day, when you were there with the three young men. You saved their bodies from being burned, just as my body miraculously survives the heavy attack of tuberculosis. Did you comfort their souls, or did you sadden them with your infinite sorrow? I think the latter must be the truth. Evidence of this is that, once released from the furnace, they remained for ever silent. Not one word more was heard from them, not even a word of heroism.

I sometimes have the feeling that you come to us who suffer, not in order to comfort us, but to draw comfort from us. You called the Holy Spirit "the Comforter". Why, then, did the Comforter have to descend on you at your baptism? Were you - are you - in great need of comfort?

Most of the great mystics have experienced the dark night of the soul, when they felt terribly alone, without you. St. Gertrude prayed: "You are I and I am you." If this is true of mystics, then the dark night through which they passed was only a mirror of the dark night in your own soul. You, who have been tempted like us in all things, must have known spiritual dryness, too. The words of the Song of Solomon must have had meaning for you too: "By night on my bed I sought him whom my soul loveth: I sought him, but I found him not. I will rise now, and go about the city in the streets and in the broad ways I will seek him whom my soul loveth: I sought him, but I found him not.'' [SOS 3:1-2] You know what it means to be without any comfort.

How stupid of me to try to tell you jokes. Your depression is too deep. You cannot laugh.

When you were about four or five you were told about the children who died in Bethlehem, and about Rachel weeping for them. It was the man who received you into the stable who was to blame. If he had not given you shelter their innocent blood would not have been shed. As a grown man you brought the wrath of God upon Israel by demanding love from those who have no love, by demanding that wolves should be lambs, and by provoking your own crucifixion, which was inevitable after such demands.

And so there followed the punishment of God.

Since then, all who receive and love you have to bear a heavy cross. They have to crucify their lusts - a painful task. The pain may be as great as that which you endured on Golgotha. Some have to die in prison. Some are tortured. Some are killed.

And you suffer the sufferings of them all. You still endure far greater pain than we, because we feel only our own sufferings. You feel the sufferings of all. You need comfort more than we do.

Jokes were the wrong way to comfort you. I apologise. I am only human. I meant well. I wanted to make you happy. I remember how St. Onofrei as a child offered to your image half of his apple, and you stretched out a hand from the image to take it. I remember the Orthodox tradition about the circus boy who did his juggling act in front of your icon, and how, when the monks tried to stop him, you smiled in the icon, showing your approval. But that was in the early centuries when Christians were children and could believe such things. You must have been happier. Now we have systematic theology in which St. Onofrei has no place.

Now you need a different kind of comfort.

The only comfort I can give you is to tell you that I, and thousands of others who suffer, love you. Even if the beast rules the world, when our candles burn out our last words will be, "Beloved Jesus."

Don't be depressed by our suffering. Believe me, we can bear it. We can bear it more easily if we know that you are happy in your heaven and enjoying the fellowship of the angels and the glorified saints. We love you, Jesus. Be happy.

Look, I will do something like the boy in the circus. Our prison is an old one. The bourgeois regime built it for the Communists. Now the Communists are using it for their own enemies. Chalk is crumbling from the walls. I will take a piece of chalk and draw your picture on the door. Here are the curls, the beard, the eyes, the nose. And now it depends on me. If I give an upward curve to your lips, you will have a smiling face. You will not be able to help it. So I will do it. And now you are smiling again, as you did for St. Onofrei, or when you had a St. Rose of Lima, to whom you could say, "Rose of my heart."

I have made you smile. Hallelujah!

Now, just be happy for a while. And please don't reproach me for breaking the second commandment by making an image. To make you, the Man of Sorrows, smile, is more important than the entire decalogue.

Who can live without an image? The mystics claim unmediated communion with God, but when you compare them with each other you can see that even they had fellowship with God, not as he is, but with an image of him formed by their individual background. Even yogis, when they arrive at perfect imagelessness, have an image of imagelessness given to them by Hindu tradition. In other circumstances these same men would have had a different mystical experience. We all draw pictures of you in our minds. I have drawn one on the door to make you smile.

And you, reason, be silent. Don't tell me that it was only the picture of Jesus which smiled, and not Jesus himself. He is himself an image - "the express image of God's person". [HEB 1:3] If you challenge my right to attribute to Jesus the smile in my picture, then you have to challenge the fact that whoever sees him, the image of the Father, sees the Father himself.

This is a day of great triumph for me. I have made you, Jesus, smile. I pray that I may do it always. Amen.

DEAR BROTHERS AND SISTERS

When they take us out of our cells to lead us away for interrogation, they always blindfold us. We must not get to know the layout of the prison. It might help us to escape. I don't mind. They blindfolded him, too. [LUK 22:64] And whenever they do it to us, they do it to him again.

I remember how St. Paulinus wrote that Christ did not die only once but was the Lamb slain from the beginning of the world. He was murdered in Abel, offered up in Isaac, persecuted in Jacob, betrayed in Joseph, blinded in Samson, sawn asunder in Isaiah. I have often pondered the thought with which he goes on, that Christ's passion continued after his resurrection. It was he who was stoned in St. Stephen, flayed in the person of St. Bartholomew. He was roasted upon St. Lawrence's gridiron, burned in St. Polycarp, frozen in the lake where stood the forty martyrs of Cappadocia.

St. Hilarv goes even further, saying that the sacrament of Christ's death is to be accomplished only by suffering all the sorrows of humanity.

It is he who is blindfolded by my jailers.

Everything transitory is only a parable, says Goethe. So this blindfolding must have a spiritual meaning too. Why do the Communists blindfold not only their fellow-men but also the divine Christ? Why did his judges blindfold him two thousand years ago?

If I had to defend them before God, I would tell him: "Understand them, and forgive them. They are simply retaliating. You blindfolded them first. Is it not written that you have 'blinded their eyes, and hardened their hearts; that they should not see with their eyes, nor understand with their hearts, and be converted'? [JHN 12:40] You were the first to blindfold men. You cannot condemn them for doing the same to you. I have had to pass through unspeakably bitter experiences. I had to be spat on and mocked and beaten before I understood why you did it. They, lacking the experience, could not know why."

It is a terrible thing to have one's spiritual eyes opened. It is a blessing from God to have them blinded and not be converted by the devious and difficult path of understanding. St. John, the seer, when he saw Jesus in his divine glory, fell at his feet as if dead. [REV 1:17] Which of us could bear to see all the seven heads and ten horns of the red dragon of Communism? [REV 12:3] Who could understand why this beast has seven crowns on his head, when Jesus had only a crown of thorns? What a good thing God has blinded our eyes and hardened our understanding, so that we should not be converted by seeing or understanding but simply by loving and trusting. It is only right that there should be nobody more blind than he that is perfect, the Lord's servant. [ISA 42:19]

The enemies of Jesus two thousand years ago did not understand, and neither do the Communists today, that nobody can see God and live; that those whom God loves most and wishes to be his servants must be blind to the final realities. The Communists retaliate by hating God. That is why they blindfold us and beat us while we are blindfolded, an excessive torture because you don't know from which side the blow will come, and you cannot defend yourself at least by bending your head the other way.

I can understand our torturers, because I also had a grudge against God for not answering my questions and not showing me if there was any hope. But today I have decided to accept blindness.

I was washed long ago in the blood of Christ. But today I have told him I will give him my feet to be washed, too; my feet which, walking through the valley of deep sorrow, have become soiled with the dust of murmuring against God. Then I shall be clean every whit. [JHN 13:10]

page 181 With God in Solitary Confinement

I read, when I was free, that the Red Indians, wondering at the paleness of the white men's skins, removed their shoes to see if their feet were white, too. My feet must be white. When my torturers beat me on the soles of my feet they have the right to see clean feet, whiter than snow. Jesus said: "He that is washed needeth not save to wash his feet, but is clean every whit." My feet may be swollen because of prolonged hunger and the other experiences through which I have passed, but those who beat me have the right to see the beautiful feet of a bride of Christ who brings, even to them, good tidings. [ISA 52:7] I must have my feet washed by Jesus. He is far away. But I preach in his name, by Morse code. I have given sacraments in his name. Why should I not wash my feet in his name, believing that he himself is doing it?

Down with you, rags. I have no shoes. For two years I have walked in them, to and fro across my cell, three steps one way, three steps the other, chanting prayers in the Jewish manner. For two years I have danced in them. They have done their job. A shoemaker gave them to me as a present before I went to prison and told me: "Use them in the service of the Lord." He did not know, neither did I, that they would be used to dance in the Lord's honour.

On one foot I have only rags. On the other I have a fine woman's stocking. I found it in the toilet. How and why a female prisoner left it behind there, I don't know. I needed it badly. I took it. We don't think in terms of property here.

I have undressed my feet. The cement is cold. The water which I pour over them is icy. What was the water like which Jesus used to wash the disciples' feet? Perhaps it was very cold, too. On that same night, the guards had to kindle a fire in the temple yard to warm themselves. Perhaps St. Peter shrank back from the coldness of the water when he said: "Thou shalt not wash my feet." What Jesus did on that evening happened on the icy peaks of the highest spirituality, where God takes the humblest form of a servant. It is not easy to have your feet washed in the almost freezing water from those divine springs.

page 182 With God in Solitary Confinement

I wash my feet in the name of Jesus. It is he who washes my feet. Listen, God; listen, angels and demons; listen, brethren and Communist torturers. I have washed my feet. Now I am clean every whit. Listen, you victims of my past life.

I don't know what my future will be. Perhaps I shall break down under torture and become a traitor. Perhaps I shall lose my faith. Perhaps I shall earn the martyr's crown. Perhaps I shall be released only to commit great sins. Perhaps prison life will have destroyed my character. Perhaps I shall do great deeds for God. I tremble to think about Hans Nielson Hauge, the great Norwegian evangelist, who was imprisoned for his faith some two centuries ago. He, who had set Norway aflame with love for Christ, lost his simple faith in prison. Who knows what fate is reserved by Providence for me?

But I need not worry. Jesus has washed my feet. Jesus is in me. He is my real me. I am his real he. I speak and act in his name. It was not I myself but he who washed my feet, and I will believe that now I am and shall remain clean every whit.

Once, having passed through a terrible torture, I tapped through to a pastor near me: "What can I do? I have lost my faith." He tapped back: "But did you ever believe?" I replied: "Certainly I did." His answer was: "It is written, 'Blessed is she that believed.' [LUK 1:45] The verb is in the past tense. To have believed is enough. Rely on this."

I am clean every whit, and I shall remain so because I have once been so. Betrayals and gross sins may come. They will never change my status before God. I recall that Spurgeon once said that the past, present and future sins of believers are all forgiven. I cannot remember on which Bible text he based this teaching. But if it is false, that is his business with God. God should not have given him such a great name among his children if he taught falsely. I will rely on his word.

I am, and remain, clean every whit through the humility of Jesus Christ, who washed my feet.

My torturers, I offer you a precious gift. I offer to your rubber truncheons the soles of feet washed by Jesus himself, feet which, like those of the angels, have to be covered [ISA 6:2] because they are surrounded by a divine halo. You will beat my feet, and the halo around them will speak to you of the holiness of the one who humbled himself for me. Amen.

Epilogue

It was not my intention to give you another exposition of Christian truth. For this you have your Bible, your church and your religious teacher, who answers for your soul before God.

I know your problems. Religious teachers of Christianity differ widely in the most essential questions. There are so many divisions, and in each, especially in Protestantism, innumerable subdivisions. You may understand that I had thoughts apart under conditions apart. But you would like to know what my theology and moral rules are now, when my outward life has returned to normal.

I have no original ideas to offer. I am not an original religious thinker. I believe that theology is like wine: the older the better. If you were to ask what I think about one or other religious matter, my answer would in general be that of any average Evangelical pastor, with one of the slight variations which are the beauty and privilege of Protestantism, and the result of the liberty which it has brought. But I could never define, finally and absolutely, what my theology is, and I will tell you why.

I once tried to explain "systematic theology" to a Russian pastor of the Underground church, who have never seen a whole New Testament. Systematically, I began to explain to him the teaching about the Godhead, about its unity in three persons, the teaching about original sin, about the fall, about salvation, about the church, about the sacraments, about the Bible as infallible revelation. He listened attentively. When I had finishcd, he put to me a most surprising question: "Have those who thought out these theological systems and wrote them down in such perfect order ever carried a cross?" He went on: "A man cannot think systematically even when he has a bad toothache. How can a man who is carrying a cross think systematically? But a Christian has to be more than the bearer of a heavy cross; he shares Christ's crucifixion. The pains of Christ are his, and the pains of all creation. There is no grief and no suffering in the whole world which should not grieve him also. If a man is crucified with Christ, how can he think systematically? Can there be that kind of thought on a cross? Jesus himself thought unsystematically on the cross. He began with forgiveness; he dreamed of a paradise in which even a robber had a place; then he despaired that perhaps there might be no place in paradise even for him, the Son of God. He felt himself forsaken. Then all at once he remembered his mother. But the thirst was so unbearable that he forgot about her and asked for water. Then he surrendered his spirit into his Father's hand. But there followed no serenity, only a loud cry. Thank you for what you have been trying to teach me. I have the impression that you were only repeating, without much conviction, what others have taught you. Systematic theology of any kind is impossible in Christianity."

This pastor, uncultured theologically, did not even know that he was thinking the same way as Kierkegaard, the most eminent Lutheran theologian who, from another standpoint, also denied that a Christian can ever speak academically about Christ. A Christian is a person who is madly in love with Christ. Juliet could not make a peroration about the anatomy of Romeo's body. She could only caress him and express to everybody her burning desire for him.

I think the same way as that Underground pastor. So I could only put in writing some of the thoughts I had when I was in solitary confinement. By now many of these thoughts have changed. That is the fate of thoughts. The thoughts of today will not last either. They may change again tomorrow, if the Communists kidnap me and put me in a solitary cell again. Thoughts about the Godhead, just like thoughts about any other subject, belong to the transient world. In our solitary cells, we lived in the sphere of eternity.

I felt it to be my duty to lead you by a roundabout way into this sphere and not to bother you with the thoughts which I hold today. Thoughts are a reflection in our mind, true or distorted, of reality. We should try to apprehend the reality of God and not remain in the sphere of words and thoughts. Thoughts about God are not God. Only God is God. Never be satisfied with anythihg else than God himself. I am in fellowship with all men who seek God - to seek him means to have found him, says St. Augustine - and with all those who bear the marks of suffering. A Christian, even if he is a healthy young millionaire, is a man of sorrows. That is what makes him a Christian: that he appropriates to himself the sufferings of Christ and of all creation.

As regards moral problems, ask the pastor of your church. Morals are concerned with the relationship between man and man in the sight of God. I am still living basically in solitary confinement. There the relationship is only with God. Morals cease to exist. But looking out from there to the church and the world, where man enters into contact with man, I can tell you two things.

First, there is a tremendous value in the traditional Biblical standard of morality. If it did not have the whole weight of the Godhead and of thousands of years of man's experience behind it, how is it that every sin committed even thirty years ago gave such painful remorse in prison? By sinning today, you prepare for yourself hours of regret in the future.

Secondly, understand that nobody can live an endless crucifixion. Jesus was on the cross only a few hours. When a man experiences great suffering, or the pain of an unsatisfied imperious longing, condemn him if he yields after a few hours. But after years of struggling a man may fall under the burden of the cross. To understand, to love and to free him from this cross is also a part of morality. Love is the interpretation which God himself gives to all Bible verses and commandments. I know nothing better than St. Augustine's words: "Love God, and do what you will."

"Of making many books there is no end." [ECC 12:12] There are enough books of Christian doctrine and morality. I did not feel called to add another one.

I wanted to describe to you the hell of Communist solitary confinement. I wanted to illustrate for you the words of the Creed that "he descended into hell", to suffer himself its anguish, and to take upon himself its terrors as he has taken the sins of mankind, and to bring even there a ray of the light of God.

Every man must be believed in his own art. When it comes to the things of the spiritual life, you must believe those who know it thoroughly. St. Catherine of Genoa said about hell: "When we shall have departed from this life in a state of sin, God will withdraw from us his goodness and will leave us to ourselves, and yet not altogether, since he wills that in every place his goodness shall be found and not his justice alone. And if a creature could be found that did not, in some degree, participate in the divine goodness, that creature would be, one might say, as malignant as God is good", which would deny the sole absoluteness of God.

Communist solitary confinement with the remembrance of past sins is a corner of hell. There were times when I looked at the cup of water which I had in my cell to convince myself that I was not yet in hell. I knew that in hell there was no water.

But even in the moments of utter doubt and utter despair, we were not left to ourselves entirely. The one who promised "I am with you always" [MTT 28:20] (in Hebrew he could say only ~bekol iom~, which means literally translated "every day the whole day") has proved to be faithful. So we were able to overcome.

There are thousands of other Christians in solitary confinement today, in Red China, North Korea, Vietnam, Russia, Albania, Rumania, Czechoslovakia and so on. Will you stand by them? Will you send your winged guardian angel to tell them that you love them? Will you consider as your responsibility the work of the Underground church, from which they have been snatched away, that it may continue to grow in their absence?

To make this appeal to you was my purpose in publishing this book.

==========

The End of "WITH GOD IN SOLITARY CONFINEMENT"
